Hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Generally, it is inadmissible, unless an exemption or exception applies. Here, the hospital intake form is offered to show P's injury immediately after the crash. It was created out of court and is therefore hearsay. It is inadmissible unless an exception applies.

Double Hearsay

Documents or statements that have different layers of out of court statements are double hearsay, and each statement must be analyzed for admissibility. Here, not only is the hospital form hearsay, as discussed, but P's statement contained within is also hearsay, as it was made out of court and is offered to prove its truth. Thus, both the form and the statement must apply to a hearsay exception to be admissible.

a. Pete's Statement

Opposing Party

A statement made by an opposing party is not hearsay and thus is admissible. Here, P has offered the hospital record which contains his statement for evidence.

Accordingly, this is not an opposing party, and this exception does not apply.

Medical Diagnosis / Treatment

An out of court statement made to obtain a medical diagnosis or treatment is considered reliable. It is therefore excepted from the hearsay rule and admissible. Here, P had just been in a car accident and was transported to the hospital. There, he told the attending nurse that he "struck his head on the windshield," and that he "was still in a great deal of pain." Accordingly, P was making these statements to obtain a diagnosis and treatment for his pain. This statement is likely admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule.

Physical Condition

A statement by the declarant describing his current physical or emotional condition is admissible as a hearsay exception. Here, P was describing his current condition - he was in a great deal of pain. The defense may argue that the entire statement does not qualify: while the "great deal of pain" portion describes P's condition, the "my head hit the windshield" does not. It describes the reason for the condition, but not the current condition itself. Accordingly, D may move to strike that portion of the statement.

However, because the statement was made for medical treatment and diagnosis, and the "my head hit the windshield" was necessary to determine the type and extent of the injury, the entire statement is admissible.

b. Hospital Record

Business Record

A business record is an out of court statement and thus is hearsay. However, it may be admissible as an exception if it was created in the ordinary course of business, by someone with knowledge, and not in anticipation of litigation. Here, the facts indicate that Nurse Nellie created the document immediately after speaking with P. She had actual knowledge of the information she included in the form. Additionally, the form was created pursuant to standard hospital procedure. Accordingly, the hospital form is admissible as a business record.

Authentication

Evidence must be authenticated. Typically, personal knowledge is sufficient to authenticate a document. Here, Nellie herself is available to testify as to the creation and the contents of the form. She has personal knowledge and the form is properly authenticated.

Best Evidence Rule

The Best Evidence rule states that an original document must be admitted whenever the contents of a document are at issue. The contents are at issue when a witness is testifying about its contents. Here, P has moved to admit the hospital form. Accordingly, the best evidence rule mandates that the original be admitted. The facts do not indicate that the form is a copy, or that the original is unavailable. It appears that the form is the original, and the best evidence rule is satisfied.

2. Erin's Statements

Relevance

E's statement to P at the scene admits liability, and therefore proves a material fact of the case. Further, there is no risk of unfair prejudice. D may argue differently, claiming that E was acting outside of the scope of D's control and thus the statement is irrelevant to the case against D, and unfairly prejudices her. However, as discussed below, this argument will fail. The statement is both logically and legally relevant.

Hearsay

See rule above. Here, Erin (E) told the P at the scene that she "was in a hurry to make a delivery and that's why [she] ran the red light." This is an out of court statement offered to prove that E ran the red light. It is hearsay.

Opposing Party

See rule above. An employee or agent may be considered as part of the opposing party, if the statement was made within the scope of employment. Here, E was a delivery driver for Donna's Pizza (D). She was delivering pizza when the accident occurred. Accordingly, she was acting within the scope of her employment. Subsequently, when she spoke to the officer at the scene, she was speaking within that same scope of employment. E's statement can be attributed to D, and is thus a statement by an opposing party.

However, D will argue that she is not responsible for the accident. She has claimed that she has no connection to the events. Thus, D will argue, E's statements cannot be attributed to her. However, because E is acting as D's driver, within the scope of her employment, the statement can be attributed to D, and it is admissible as a statement by an opposing party.

Excited Utterance

An excited utterance is admissible as a hearsay exception if the statement is in response to a shocking or startling event, and if the statement is made while the declarant is still under the stress of that shocking event. Here, even if E were not an opposing party, P may argue that her statement is an excited utterance. She was just in a car accident that resulted in injury, a startling event, and she was describing the event immediately after it occurred.

However, D will argue that E was not still under the stress of the accident; enough time had passed and the parties were speaking calmly after the fact. This is likely not an excited utterance.

Present Sense Impression

Like an excited utterance, a present sense impression is admissible if the statement describes an event and was made during or immediately after the event occurred. Here, P will also argue that E was describing the event immediately after it occurred. However, as above, it is likely that some time had passed, and a court may rule that this does not qualify as a present sense impression.

Because E was acting within the scope of her employment, the statement is likely admissible as an admission by an opposing party.

3. Donna's Statements

Relevance

See rule above. D's offer to P tends to prove her control over the car and E's conduct. It is relevant to D's liability.

Hearsay

See rule above. D's statement to P in the hospital in which D promised to pay for P's medical expenses is an out of court statement. It is hearsay.

Opposing Party

See rule above. D is the opposing party, and the statement likely qualifies as an admission by an opposing party. This is non-hearsay, and the statement is admissible barring some other limitation.

Offers to Pay Medical Expenses

Offers to pay medical expenses, even if admissible as a hearsay exception, are inadmissible as they violate public policy. However, the statements, though not admissible as substantive evidence, may be admissible as impeachment or to establish ownership or control of the thing in question. Here, D will argue that her offer to pay P's medical expenses is inadmissible, because public policy encourages these offers. Therefore, the statement is inadmissible.

Ownership: However, P may bring in the statement for two reasons. First, D has denied liability for the accident. An offer to pay medical expenses may be offered to show ownership or control of the subject matter in question. Her offer to P then, may be offered to establish that D owned and/or controlled both the car and her employee E. This is a disputed fact and highly relevant. Thus, the statement may be offered for this purpose.

Impeachment: The credibility of a witness is always at issue. Thus, statements offered to rebut witness testimony are admissible as impeachment evidence. D has testified on the stand that she did not offer to pay P's medical expenses. Accordingly, P may offer D's out of court statement to him, offering to pay expenses, as impeachment evidence. This is a prior inconsistent statement offered to impeach, and it is admissible.

Q4 Business Associations

Years ago, Art incorporated Retail, Inc. He paid $100 for its stock and lent it $50,000. He elected himself and two family members to the Board of Directors, which in turn elected him as President and approved a ten-year lease for a store. He managed the store and was paid 10% of Retail's gross revenues as compensation.

Subsequently, Barbara bought 20% of Retail's stock from Art.

Retail's board approved a contract to buy 30% of the inventory of XYZ Co., a company owned by Art.

Subsequently, Art began taking home some of Retail's inventory without paying for it.

Retail had net profits in some years and net losses in others. It paid dividends in some years, but not in others. In some years, Retail's board met three times a year; in others, it never met.

Recently, Retail ceased business. Its assets were limited to $5,000 in cash. Among the claims against Retail was one by Supplier, who was owed $10,000 for computer equipment. Another claim was Art's, for the $50,000 that he had lent and had just become due. Supplier and Barbara, individually, filed lawsuits against Retail and Art.

1. On what legal theory, if any, can Supplier reasonably seek to recover against Art on its claim against Retail? Discuss.

2. Does Barbara have a cause of action against Art, either derivatively or personally? Discuss.

3. If Retail is forced into bankruptcy court, will Art be able to collect from Retail any portion of his $50,000 loan? Discuss.

Answer A

1. Recovery Against Art on Supplier's Claim Against Retail

Corporation

Retail, Inc. is a corporation, as indicated by the word "Inc." (for Incorporated) in its name and by the fact it was "incorporated". Perhaps the most important feature of a corporation is the limited liability of its shareholders. The shareholders of a corporation are generally not liable to the corporation's creditors, beyond the amount of their capital contributions (i.e. their stock ownership). There is an important public policy interest in preserving the limited liability of shareholders, so that corporations can feel free to take risks, which is good for the economy and society in general.

Limited liability can be ignored by the courts only in very particular circumstances. This is called "piercing the corporate veil", and requires that: (i) the corporation be a closely-held corporation, (ii) it be necessary to prevent fraud or abuse, and (iii) it would be unfair not to do so. Courts will rarely order a piercing of the corporate veil, but may do so in circumstances such as these ones, which require piercing to avoid unfairness to Retail. Where piercing is ordered, the shareholders involved in the wrongdoing can be held personally liable for the corporation's liabilities.

Here, Art incorporated Retail, Inc. and owned 100% of the stock. He later sold 20% of Retail's stock to Barbara. Accordingly, Retail is a closely held corporation (held by Art an Barbara only). Supplier has a claim against Retail, not guaranteed by Art personally, for $10,000 for computer equipment. Absent a finding by the court that the situation warrants piercing the corporate veil, i.e. that there is sufficient fraud or abuse, and sufficient unfairness, Supplier cannot seek recovery against Art.

Piercing the Corporate Veil

Piercing of the corporate veil can occur under either a finding of "alter ego", fraud or insufficient capitalization.

Alter Ego. Under the alter ego doctrine, the corporate veil can be pierced where the shareholders have sought to benefit from the benefits of incorporation but ignored all of its burdens. Factors which will be taken into consideration by the courts include: failure to observe corporate formalities, failure to keep the corporation's assets separate from that of its shareholders, failure to keep proper accounting, self-dealing, etc.

Here, there is some evidence that Art used the corporation as his alter ego. He elected himself and two family members to the Board of Directors and elected himself as President, all things which ensure that he keeps full control over the corporation, but which are not wrongful in any way. He then used that control to approve a compensation for himself of 10% of Retail's gross revenues, which is also not wrongful. Retail's board then approved a contract to buy 30% of the inventory of XYZ Co., a company owned by Art. Although XYZ Co. was owned by Art, the transaction is not necessary self-dealing, if it was fair to the corporation. The terms of the transaction are not known, but there is no indication of abuse or that the transaction was so much more detrimental than beneficial to Retail as to be "fraudulent" vis-a-vis Retail's creditors.

Art then began taking home some of Retail's inventory without paying for it. The facts do not state whether Art intended to return this inventory, or to keep it, or to use it for his own purposes, but it seems that he failed to keep the corporation's assets separate from his own. A court would frown upon this and see it as a relevant element in the action for piercing the corporate veil.

Retail had net profits in some years and net losses in others. It paid dividends in some years but not others. This in itself is perfectly normal.

In some years, Retail's board met three times a year; in others, it never met. This shows a disregard for corporate formalities, since a corporation's directors must meet on a regular basis. A board that does not meet at least twice a year is not complying with corporate formalities. A court would frown upon this and see it as a relevant element in the action for piercing the corporate veil.

Fraud. Under the fraud theory, the corporate veil can be pierced where the shareholders have been using the corporation merely as a shield against their existing liability and for the sole purpose of defrauding existing creditors.

Here, there is no indication that Art has used the corporation only to defraud existing creditors. The fact that the corporation is now insolvent and has unpaid debts is not in itself indicative of fraud.

Insufficient Initial Capital. Under the insufficient capitalization theory, the corporate veil can be pierced where the initial capital contributions of shareholders at the inception of the corporation were clearly insufficient to meet the corporation's foreseeable future liabilities, taking into account the corporation's foreseeable future revenues.

Here, Art incorporated Retail Inc. years ago. He paid $100 for his stock and lent it $50,000. Retail then entered into a ten-year lease for a store, approved compensation for himself, etc. The liabilities of a retail store are likely to quickly exceed $100. In particular, if Art had to lend the corporation $50,000 at its inception, it is an indication that Retail needed this amount of funding either to fund its initial operations or to induce potential co-contractants, such as the landlord, to enter into transactions. By choosing to do almost all of Retail's initial funding by loan rather than by capitalization, Art was likely trying to ensure his $50,000 would not be last in the waterfall in the event of a distribution in bankruptcy.

It is for situations like this one that the insufficient capitalization theory exists. It was foreseeable at incorporation that Retail would have liabilities greater than $100, yet its initial capital was no more than $100. When Barbara became a shareholder, she bought 20% of the stock from Art, not in the context of a corporate issuance. The corporation's capital was not increased.

Art will argue that Retail is a retail store and that it has expected revenues, which should be sufficient to satisfy liabilities. He was not operating a highly risky business. The facts show that he has had net profits in some years and that at some point Retail probably had become capable of meeting its liabilities "on its own". However, the facts also show that the initial capitalization was extremely low and that large liabilities, such as the ten-year lease, were incurred immediately at Retail's inception.

It appears that Retail was inadequately capitalized at incorporation.

Unfairness. In all cases, the proponent of piercing the corporate veil must show it would be unfair if the veil was not pierced.

Here, Retail has ceased business and its assets ($5,000) are insufficient to satisfy all of its liabilities. If Supplier cannot seek recovery against Art personally, it will receive next to nothing on the dollar for its $10,000 debt. Among the reasons that Retail is insolvent, Art's wrongful conduct is likely responsible: Art took home some of Retail's inventory; Art had Retail enter into a transaction with XYZ Co., a company owned by Art - which transaction was potentially unfair to Retail (this will be up to Supplier to prove); one of the biggest claims on Retail's assets is a loan by Art himself (which he had to make to Retail to make up for the insufficient initial capital contribution), etc.

Supplier can make a strong argument that it would be unfair to allow Art to hide behind the corporate veil and not hold him directly liable for Retail's debt to Supplier.

Conclusion

Accordingly, Retail is a closely held corporation and there is evidence that Art, a shareholder, has insufficiently capitalized it at incorporation (and perhaps even used Retail as its alter ego, although this will be much harder to prove), and that it would be unfair not to allow Supplier to seek recovery against Art directly. The court will likely pierce the corporate veil and allow recovery against Art.

2. Barbara's Cause of Action Against Art

Art's Duties to Barbara and Direct Action

Shareholders generally do not owe fiduciary duties to each other. Only in closely-held corporations, majority shareholders can be found to owe fiduciary duties of care and loyalty to the minority shareholders. In accordance with those duties, majority shareholders may not abuse their position of power to abuse the minority shareholders and deny them their rights as shareholders.

If they do, a minority shareholder can ask the court to order remedies in oppression, including a mandatory repurchase by the corporation of the minority shareholder's stock. Other remedies in oppression are available to the court, going all the way to mandatory dissolution of the corporation in particularly egregious situations of oppression. Where a minority shareholder is oppressed, the proper recourse is a direct recourse by the minority shareholder against the majority shareholder(s), seeking oppression remedies.

Here, while Art and two of his family members composed the Board of Directors, Retail's board approved a contract to buy 30% of the inventory of XYZ Co., a company owned by Art. If there is evidence that the corporation was not made on arm's length terms, Barbara could argue that the transaction was an abuse of power of a majority shareholder. Art began taking home some of Retail's inventory without paying for it, which Barbara can argue is an abuse of his power as a majority shareholder, director and President of Retail.

Because Retail is closely held, Barbara cannot simply sell her shares on a stock exchange and exit the corporation. Barbara could likely seek oppression remedies. If the corporation is ordered to buy out her shares for their fair value, this will likely be worthless to Barbara: her stock is worth nothing or next to nothing, since the corporation is insolvent, and even if it had a worth the corporation would not have sufficient assets to buy her back.

A dissolution of the corporation will not be helpful either, given that the corporation is insolvent and creditors will be paid first.

Accordingly, Barbara can likely take oppression remedies against Art, but unless she can convince the court to order damages in her favor (which would be extremely difficult), this recourse will not be useful.

Art's Duties to Retail

Shareholders generally do not owe fiduciary duties to the corporation, unless they participate in the management of the corporation to a great extent, either as directors or if a unanimous shareholders' agreement gives them the power to do so.

Here, Art is a director of Retail.

Directors owe fiduciary duties of care and of loyalty to the corporation.

Duty of Care. The duty of care requires a director to act as a reasonable, prudent person would do in the management of his own affairs. The directors are not "guarantors" of their bad decisions and will generally be protected by the business judgment rule (the "BJR"), and found not to have breached their duty of care even where they made a decision which later turns out to have been ill-advised. The BJR protects directors only where the decision has been (i) informed, (ii) made in good faith, (iii) made in the absence of a conflict of interest and (iv) had a reasonable basis.

Directors will also generally be found to have acted in compliance with their duty of care if they have relied on reports, opinions, information, etc. reported to them by directors, officers and employees of the corporation, by outside advisors or by a committee of the board of which they are not a member, in each case provided that the information reported was within the competence of the person(s) reporting it and that the reliance was reasonable, taking into account the directors' duty of care to the corporation.

Here, Art voted on his own compensation (10% of Retail's gross revenues) - this is not necessarily a breach of the duty of care or duty of loyalty, if the compensation is what a reasonable, prudent person would grant to a manager. 10% of gross revenues is not unreasonable for a store manager, although it could be unreasonable depending on the store's revenues. There is no clear breach of the duty of care here.

Here, Retail entered into a transaction with XYZ Co. There is no indication that Art breached his duty of care by entering into this transaction, because the terms of the transaction are not known. Art is not protected by the BJR here because he is in a conflict of interest, but again, there is no indication that the transaction was not one which a reasonable, prudent person would approve.

The distribution of dividends is at the directors' discretion - failure to pay a dividend in some years is not a breach of the duty of care or duty of loyalty and will not be reviewed by the court absent extreme circumstances.

Finally, Art began taking home some of Retail's inventory without paying for it. This is a breach of the duty of care and a breach of the duty of loyalty.

Duty of Loyalty. The duty of loyalty requires a director to act in good faith, in what he reasonably believes to be the best interests of the corporation. A director is in a conflict of interest if he (or a close relative or another of his corporations) has a personal interest in a transaction with the corporation.

In the event of such a conflict, the director will be found to have breached his duty of loyalty unless the transaction is shown either (i) to have been fair to the corporation, or (ii) to have been approved by a majority of disinterested directors or disinterested shares, after having been fully informed.

Here, the Retail/XYZ transaction involved a conflict of interest for Art. He should not have voted on it. Neither should the other board members have voted on it, since they are family members of Art, and therefore not "disinterested" directors. A vote of a majority of disinterested shares (i.e. Barbara's shares) should have been held to approve the transaction, and she should have been fully informed.

However, the facts do not describe the terms of the transaction. If Art can show the transaction was fair to the corporation, he will not be held to have breached his duty of loyalty.

Art breached his duty of loyalty by taking home some of Retail's inventory without paying for it, unless he reasonably believed this to be in the best interests of the corporation. There are no facts indicating that this might be the case, and the conduct appears improper. This is likely a breach of Art's duty of loyalty.

Derivative Action

Where a director breaches his duty of loyalty or his duty of care to the corporation, only the corporation has a recourse, not the shareholders individually. A shareholder may, however, take a derivative action provided that (i) the shareholder held stock at the time of the alleged breach and continues to do so throughout the derivative action, (ii) the shareholder can adequately represent the corporation's interests, (iii) the shareholder has made a written demand on the board to enforce the claim, but his demand was denied, and (iv) the shareholder joins the corporation as a defendant to the lawsuit.

In some cases, the court may accept a derivative action without a written demand having been made on the board, if the shareholder can show such demand would have been futile (for instance, if he is asking the corporation to sue all of the directors, it is extremely unlikely that the directors will agree).

If the shareholder is successful in his derivative action, the corporation will receive the benefit of the judgment. The shareholder can be indemnified for his legal costs and fees. If the shareholder is unsuccessful, he will be personally liable for all legal costs and fees, including the other party's if their reimbursement is ordered.

The corporation itself can have the suit dismissed only if it can show to the court that the transaction was fair as determined by an independent committee of the board or outside independent advisors.

Here, Barbara was a shareholder at all relevant times. She can likely represent Retail's interests adequately - there is no indication she can't do so. As noted above, she would have to first make a written demand on the board to take action. If they refuse, she can then take a derivative action to enforce Retail's rights against Art.

Conclusion

Retail has a recourse against Art for any loss caused by a breach of his duty of care or duty of loyalty. The recourse can be taken by Barbara in a derivative action. However, except for a recourse for the value of items which Art took home without paying for it, it will be difficult to show that Art is otherwise liable to Retail.

3. Collection by Art of The $50,000 Loan to Retail

In bankruptcy, secured creditors have a priority. All unsecured creditors are treated the same, unless there has been subordination. Under the Deep Rock doctrine, when the corporate veil is pierced, the court can order that any loans made by the shareholders to the corporation be subordinated to the debts of the corporation to other ordinary creditors.

Here, Art lent $50,000 to Retail. Given the piercing of the corporate veil described above, Art's claim can be subordinated to the claim of Supplier. Accordingly, Supplier will be able to recover the $5,000 if Retail is forced into bankruptcy.

Art will be unable to collect from Retail any portion of his $50,000 loan.

Answer B

1. Supplier's legal theories of recovery against Art on its claim against Retail.

Supplier's ability to recover from Art depends on what type of business entity was created and if Art has breached any duty to Supplier.

Corporation

A corporation is a business entity separate from its shareholders. Therefore, shareholders of a corporation are not personally liable for the corporation's obligations unless the corporation was not properly formed, or the shareholders abused its corporate form. A corporation requires proper formalities for creation, which include filing with the secretary of state. A closely held corporation is one in which there are few shareholders, and liability of the shareholders is more readily found because of its more intimate nature.

Here, it appears that Art incorporated Retail, Inc. years ago; therefore without any further facts it appears that Retail Inc. was properly formed with regards to formalities. Retail Inc. can also be seen to be a closely held corporation by the court.

Shareholder Liability: Corporate Veil

Assuming the corporation was properly formed at its onset, Art can only be liable if the corporation abused its corporate form and thus will not be afforded the protections of the corporate veil.

A shareholder is generally not personally liable unless the corporate form is abused. A court will disregard the separateness of a corporation and its shareholders and pierce the veil if it appears that 1) the corporation was undercapitalized at its inception, 2) the corporate formalities were not adhered to, or 3) the corporation was created to perpetrate a fraud. It will also consider whether a parent corporation was operating by mixing its directors and officers with another corporation owned by it.

Alter Ego

Art is a shareholder, director, and as president, he is an officer of Retail Inc., and at the same time he is XYZ Co.'s owner. Retail Inc.'s board approved a contract to buy 30% of XYZ's inventory, which alone may appear to only have an impact on Art's duty of loyalty as a director of Retail Co. who approved the transaction. However, it does not appear that Retail Co. owns or otherwise deals with XYZ other than the contract. Nonetheless, because Art is an owner of both, a court will consider it.

Undercapitalized

The shareholders of a corporation must put at risk enough unencumbered capital to take care of the corporation's potential liabilities.

When Art incorporated Retail, he paid $100, for its stock, and thus he became a 10% shareholder. He also lent the corporation $50,000 at its onset, which appears to have satisfied Retail Inc.'s potential debts because after years it had only owed $10,000 under a contract to outside creditors and ceased business with $5K left. Therefore, since it was able to operate for years with the $50K capitalization, this appears to be sufficient.

Formalities

Supplier would argue that Retail's board did not hold meetings every year, which shows that it was not a proper corporation. However, Art will likely argue that since Retail's board had no significant matters to discuss, it only met when necessary, which is apparent by the fact that it met three times a year in some years. Because a corporation should hold regular meetings, this appears to be against the proper corporate formalities.

Therefore, a court can use this to decide whether to hold Art liable.

Perpetrate a fraud

There appears to be no bad faith in creating the corporation so this will not be considered.

Overall, a court is reluctant to pierce a veil absent clear evidence of lack of separateness; therefore Art may be personally liable to Supplier, but it is unlikely.

Personal Liability

If the veil is pierced, Supplier will be able to obtain $10,000 personally from Art.

2. Barbara's cause of action against Art.

Barbara's Derivative Suit

Barbara may bring an action on her own or as a shareholder of Retail Inc. against the corporation.

Derivative Actions

A shareholder may bring a derivative action on behalf of the other shareholders of the corporation for a breach by the directors. Any recovery will go to the corporation rather than to the shareholder personally. To bring such an action, the shareholder must 1) have made a demand on the board for the complained-of action, to which the board either refused, or 90 days have passed without an answer, or demand would be futile;
2) the shareholder must adequately represent the other shareholders; and 3) the shareholder must hold shares throughout the entire suit.

Futile

Here, there are no facts to suggest that Barbara made any demand on the board, however, because Retail's board consists of Art and two of his family members, Barbara will argue that demand would be futile, because his family members would be biased in favor of Art. Art will argue that had she made a demand it would have been answered, and the derivative suit would be improper. Nonetheless, the fact that only three members are on the board and all three are related, would likely render the demand futile.

Adequately represents

The shareholder must have enough shares to adequately represent the shareholders.

Here, the only shareholders appear to be Barbara and Art; therefore, since Art took action with regard to the complained-of event, Barbara is essentially asserting it on her own behalf; therefore this is met.

Shareholder throughout suit

Barbara owns 20% stock and has retained that stock until suit, therefore this is met.

Therefore, Barbara can bring a derivative action.

Breach of Duty of Loyalty

A director has the duty to put the corporation's best interest before his own. The duty of loyalty can be breached in three ways: 1) usurping a corporate opportunity, 2) engaging in an interested director transaction, and 3) engaging in a competing venture.

Interested Director Transaction

A director is not permitted to engage as an interested party in a transaction, which essentially means that he may not sit on both sides of the transaction, or that the director may not engage in a transaction with one of his family members, unless he gets the approval of the majority of the disinterested board or its shareholders, or the transaction is substantively fair.

Here, Barbara can bring an action for a breach of duty of loyalty by Art for approving a contract to buy 30% of the inventory of XYZ Co., a company owned by him. Since Art is a director of Retail Inc. and also an owner of XYZ Co., he sat on both ends of the transaction when he approved a contract to buy inventory from a company he owned.

Approval by Board

However, Art will argue that the board approved the contract, and in the alternative that the transaction was substantively fair. However, since the board consisted of three people, who were each related to one another, and the board also consisted of Art, who was the primary interested party, then the approval was not obtained by a majority of the disinterested shareholders, because family members are always interested parties in their family's affairs. This can be further shown by the fact that the family has close ties, since Art elected the two family members to the board, which in turn elected him as president.

Substantively Fair

If the transaction is substantively fair, an interested party transaction will be permitted after full and fair disclosure.

Even though the board could not have properly approved, the transaction involved buying 30% of XYZ's inventory, which is close to half of its inventory. While there is no price indicated, it is likely that Art gave a discounted price for the contract because he was a party to both sides. Art will argue that it was beneficial to the corporation to buy from XYZ since he could provide them with better quality inventory at a better price, whereas an outsider would have no such incentive. Nonetheless, he would have had to disclose the information to the board, and the board would have to agree. Since the board approved, he may be able to defend against the derivative suit for breach of loyalty under this theory.

However, if the court finds that the bias of his family members on the board is superior to the transaction being substantively fair, Barbara will prevail in showing a breach of the duty of loyalty.

Competing Venture

Art has taken Retail’s property for himself, and since XYZ appears to have a similar business as Retail, perhaps the inventory was that which originally came from the contract between them. Therefore, if so, he would be replenishing his inventory at XYZ at the expense of Retail Co., and thus would be engaging in a competing venture.

Therefore, Barbara can also prevail by showing this.

Duty of Care

A director owed the corporation a duty of care to act in good faith as a reasonable prudent director would under the circumstances.

Good Faith

Art's taking of the inventory from Retail without paying for it can be used to show bad faith by a director. He may also be seen as an officer because he managed the lease for a store and was paid 10% of Retail's gross revenues as compensation. Therefore, as an officer, he must have also acted in good faith for the best interest of the corporation.

Ordinary Prudent Director

Barbara can argue that an ordinary prudent director would not steal inventory from the corporation without paying for it; therefore he acted against his duty of care.

Business Judgment Rule

The business judgment rule protects the good-faith decisions made by directors in compliance with the duty of care that in hindsight end up being erroneous.

Here, Art did not act in accordance with the duty of care because he acted in bad faith with regards to taking the inventory. Therefore the BJR will not protect him.

Dividends

Barbara can also bring an action derivatively for the fact that the corporation did not distribute dividends in some years. However, a corporation has discretion whether to distribute dividends, because dividends are not a right of the shareholders.

Since Retail had net profits in some years and net losses in others, it was prudent for them to withhold dividends for the years they had no profits, assuming that the times corresponded. Even if they did not correspond, distributing dividends is in the discretion of the board.

Barbara's Personal Action

A personal action may also be brought by Barbara against Art (if the veil is pierced - as a director) and if it is not pierced, then as a shareholder.

Duty To Shareholders

Generally, shareholders do not owe a duty to other shareholders, however, a majority shareholder owes the duty to a minority shareholder not to use its majority share to discriminate against the minority shareholder, and not to sell his shares to a prospective looter.

There are no facts to suggest how much the stock of Retail Inc. cost; however Art paid $100 for its stock and Barbara owned 20% of the stock from Art. Assuming Art holds the remaining stock himself, Art would be a majority shareholder, and would thus be required to act fairly with regards to the use of his shares.

Here, Art's transaction with XYZ does not appear to prejudice Barbara as a shareholder in any way; therefore Barbara will not be able to prevail in a personal suit against Art.

3. Liability of Retail Inc. for Art's loan.

Liability of Corporation at Dissolution

A corporation that ceases business is still held liable for debts to creditors. A shareholder who contributes capital will receive reimbursement.

Equitable Subordination

Under equitable subordination, all creditors, whether shareholder creditors or outsiders, may seek to collect their debt to the corporation equally. However, if a shareholder acted wrongfully, the Deep Rock doctrine prevents him from recovering equally.

If Retail Co. is forced into bankruptcy, Art will be able to recover his loan in proportion to the debt owed to Supplier. Since there is only $5,000 cash left, he will be able to obtain a proportional amount, taking into consideration Supplier's $10K debt. If Art is found to have acted wrongfully, however, then he will not be able to recover since there is only $5,000 left and Supplier would have priority over Art's debt.

Q5 Professional Responsibility

Claire met with Len, a personal injury lawyer, in his office and told him that she had burned her legs when she slipped on some caustic cleaning solution spilled on a sidewalk outside Hotel. Len agreed to take her case and they properly executed a retainer agreement. Claire showed Len scars on her legs that she said were caused by the cleaning solution. She also showed him clothes that she said were stained by the cleaning solution. Len took the clothes from her and put them in his office closet for safe keeping.

Len filed a lawsuit in state court against Hotel. Hotel's lawyer, Hannah, called Len. She told him that this lawsuit was the fourteenth lawsuit that Claire had filed against Hotel, and that she intended to move the court to declare Claire a vexatious litigant. Len and Hannah had been engaged two years ago before they amicably decided to go their separate ways.

Len called Claire and left a message asking her to call him "about an important update in the case." He also sent her an email with a "read receipt" tag, with the same request. He received a notice that she had read the email, but did not receive any response. Over the next week, he sent her a copy of the same email once each day with the same "read receipt" tag; each day, he received a notice that she had read the email, but did not receive any response. He then sent her a registered letter asking her to contact him, but again, did not receive any response. A week later, he sent her another registered letter stating that he no longer represented her and that he would return her clothing to her.

Claire soon called Len, begging him not to "fire" her, saying she had not responded to him because "I didn't think calling you back was such a big deal." He then asked her about "the thirteen prior lawsuits against Hotel." She replied: "What 'thirteen prior lawsuits'? Besides, Hotel's got more money than I do." He told her that he was sorry, but that he was no longer her lawyer.

The next day, Len went to his office closet to retrieve Claire's clothes to send them back to her. To his dismay, he realized that he had sent her clothes along with his to be dry-cleaned. He rushed to the dry-cleaner and learned that all of the clothes he had sent had been dry-cleaned and that all of their stains had been removed.

What ethical violations, if any, has Len committed? Discuss.

Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

Answer A

Under the ABA and CA rules, a lawyer owes a duty of loyalty to his or her clients to zealously advocate on their behalf and be free of conflicts of interest that have a significant chance of materially affecting their ability to do so. That duty begins, at the very least, at the execution of a retainer agreement. Claire and Len executed a retainer agreement, and thus the attorney-client relationship was formed and Len owed Claire all of the duties under the ABA and CA rules.

1. Duty of Loyalty

Moreover, under both, a lawyer is deemed to have a conflict if they represent a party who is adverse to another party that is represented by one of the attorney's immediate family members. In such an instance, the lawyer is required to get the informed written consent of their client before pursuing the representation. (Such personal conflicts would not be imputed on other attorneys in a law firm, however.) Ignorance of a conflict is not an excuse for failing to obtain consent or notify about the conflict. An attorney can still represent a client, notwithstanding such a conflict of interest, so long as the client consents and the lawyer reasonably believes that the conflict will not infringe on his or her ability to zealously and competently advocate on behalf of her client. While the ABA would require written consent for such a conflict, California requires only written notification by the attorney because the conflict is only personal.

The issue, though, is whether a former fiancee of two years representing the other party is a conflict of interest at all that need be reported to the client for her consent. Under a strict framework, a former fiancee would not qualify as a family member. It is true that a current fiancee qualifies as a family member, but this rule is unlikely to apply to former fiancees from over two years ago. The rationale for the current fiancee rule is that they are engaged to be members of the family; a former fiancee has, on the other hand, specifically decided not to be a part of the family. Therefore, for purposes of this rule, Hannah was not a member of the family and thus this did not trigger an ethical situation under this rule.

Nonetheless, a lawyer has a general duty to remain loyal to a client, and being close friends with the attorneys on the other side could warrant notification and consent. Here, Len and Hannah "amicably" decided to go their separate ways and Hannah seemed to "call" up Len as more of a friendly notice than as an opposing party counsel. Therefore, it seems that Len and Hannah were quite close. Indeed, in response to the notification, there is no indication that Len looked into the truthfulness of the representation, but rather accepted it at face value, showing that he still trusted Claire quite a bit. This goes to show that Len was not, in fact, able to maintain a fiduciary relationship with Claire notwithstanding the personal connection with Hannah. As a result, Len violated an ethical rule by not disclosing this conflict as it came to pass to Claire.

2. Duty to Represent a Client

A lawyer is free to (more or less without restriction) take or not take clients and causes of action (although is encouraged to do pro bono). But once they decide to do take a client, many ethical rules apply. CA and the ABA allow an attorney to withdraw from representation under certain circumstances and require an attorney to do so under others. For example, if an attorney is not receiving their fees or other obligations pursuant to the attorney-client relationship and they have notified the client and given the client a reasonable time to remedy the situation, then the attorney is permitted to withdraw. Additionally, attorneys may withdraw if the clients are using their legal services for illegal purposes. Moreover, if the attorney finds the representation of the individual repugnant to their sensibilities, they may withdraw so long as they do not materially harm the client's interests. If representing the client would require the attorney to violate other ethical rules or laws, then the attorney must withdraw. Thus, for example, if representing a client would require the attorney to file a frivolous lawsuit, then the attorney must withdraw.

a. Frivolous lawsuits

Here, Len will argue that he had to withdraw from representing Claire because failing to do so would violate the rule that attorneys are not allowed to file frivolous lawsuits. He will point to Hannah's representation--whom he had been engaged to and amicably decided not to marry, and thus trusted--that Claire was a serial litigant that had filed fourteen other lawsuits against the Hotel and that Hannah intended to move the court to declare Claire a vexatious litigant. But having been a vexatious litigant does not, in and of itself, show that this lawsuit was frivolous. In fact, Claire showed Len scars on her leg and clothes that were stained by the supposed cleaning solution that caused the scars. Opposing counsel's representation that Claire was a vexatious litigant did not even include any allegation that this lawsuit was frivolous. Instead, it was merely that other lawsuits filed by her might have been. And indeed, only that they might have been because Claire did not even represent that these lawsuits were frivolous or that a court had yet deemed her a vexatious litigant. A reasonable lawyer would not have relied solely on these representations in determining to no longer represent Claire. Instead, a reasonable attorney would have looked into whether these allegations by Claire were true by searching court documents or, at the very least, asking Claire about these cases. And Claire's later response saying "what 'thirteen prior lawsuits'" indicate that doing so might well have revealed that Claire did not actually file those, or that they were not frivolous. In sum, Len did not take reasonable precautions to ensure that the lawsuit that he was attempting to withdraw from representing Claire was, in fact, frivolous, and as such cannot rely on this rationale for withdrawing from representing her.

b. Costs of representation

Len might also argue that because Claire was a vexatious litigant, representing her would unreasonably financially burden him. Indeed, California allows the unreasonable financial burden on the attorney as a justification for discontinuing representation of a client. Len appears to be a solo practitioner, this making this claim more reasonable.

However, Len has not shown any financial burden that would necessarily result in trying to defend a claim that Claire was a vexatious litigant (or even that he would have to defend that claim in court). Therefore, it is unclear what financial burdens this revelation would reveal. Moreover, as discussed above, Len did not make any effort at all to determine if there was any basis for determining that Claire actually was vexatious.

c. Lack of communication

Len's best argument is that Claire's failure to respond to his numerous requests constitute a permissible reason for him not to continue representing her. Indeed, the rules allow a lawyer to withdraw from representing a client when the client fails to communicate with the lawyer. Much like a lawyer has a duty to communicate with the client (as Len effectively did here once he learned of the potential vexatious litigant problem), a client must fulfill their side of the bargain and communicate back. Len left a voicemail saying that he had an "important update" and asking to be called back. He sent her one e-mail a week with the same request, and received confirmation that Claire had read the e-mails. He then decided to send her a registered letter asking her to contact him. Notwithstanding the three forms of communication asking for a reply because of an "important" update and the registered letter, Claire did not respond at all. Importantly, though, Len failed to mention the reason for why he wanted her to contact him. He might respond that he could not have provided details in e-mail, voicemail, or letter because it might have violated his duty of confidentiality to keep all information he learned about her secret absent her consent (which we have no evidence of here). This will likely be sufficient, especially considering the read receipts and the registered letter confirm that Claire actually received the communications.

Even more importantly, though, is the fact that Len never made clear the ramification of failing to respond. Much as in failures to pay attorney fees, the attorney must reasonably notify the client of the consequences of failure to and give them a chance to respond before withdrawing from representation. Here, Len violated that duty by never telling Claire that he would withdraw from representing her unless she responded.

Instead, he simply repeated the same content in different methods asking for a response. This, in conjunction with the fact that he waited what seems like no more than a little over two weeks before withdrawing from representation. If this speed were justified in light of approaching deadlines, that might be reasonable. But there is no indication here that such a rapid action was necessary or, more importantly, that Claire had any reason to believe that such a rapid action was necessary. Len did not tell Claire that he would withdraw if she didn't respond (and he cannot rely on Hannah's representation that she was a vexatious litigant without actually looking into that at all, as a reasonable attorney would, to augment the implication of her nonresponse). Taken together, Len violated his duty of continued representation by withdrawing for this reason.

d. Court's approval

Moreover, in California after a lawsuit has been filed, an attorney cannot withdraw from representing a client without attaining the judge's permission to do so. While he likely would have gotten it here, because of the failure to communicate because the case had just been filed and there is no indication that allowing withdrawal would otherwise prejudice Claire, that does not excuse his not following this rule. Therefore, regardless of the merits of any justification for withdrawal, Len breaches this rule.

3. Duty to the Court to Investigate Positions

Even if Len were correct that Claire's lawsuit was entirely without merit, he would have still likely violated ABA and CA ethics rules by filing the lawsuit in the first place. An attorney is required to investigate legal positions and pleadings taken and represented to a court before doing so. The standard for this is what a reasonable attorney would do in similar circumstances. Thus, if the lawsuit was entirely without Merit, Len likely violated his ethical rules in filing it in the first place. Len will argue that the scars and stained clothing were sufficient to file the suit, but the record does not indicate that Len provided any additional investigation or research into the merits of the claim. Whether that is reasonable depends on how a qualified attorney in like circumstances would have acted.

4. Returning Property

A lawyer has the obligation to keep any property of the client's that is in his possession in a safe and secure location. Moreover, the lawyer certainly cannot destroy evidence that the client entrusts to him. The lawyer must take reasonable protective measures to safeguard such evidence, if the lawyer chooses to accept responsibility for possessing it. Here, Len accepted responsibility for maintaining Claire's clothes and those clothes were relevant to the legal claim that Claire was pursuing. As such, he had a duty to his client to implement effective measures for ensuring the safeguarding of the property entrusted in his care. However, he "sent her clothes along with his to be dry-cleaned." Thus, it seems that he did not put her property in a separate location or otherwise implement methods to ensure that the inadvertent destruction or disclosure of the evidence would not occur. Len, therefore, violated this duty to Claire.

If Len received any money following the "properly executed retainer agreement," he violated his duty by not attempting to give it back to her when he sent her the letter saying that he would send her the clothing. However, since there is no evidence that he had any property but for the clothing, he likely did not violate this duty.

Answer B

Attorney-Client Relationship

Len formed an attorney-client relationship with Claire. An attorney-client relationship is formed when the client reasonably believes the relationship formed. The attorney's beliefs are irrelevant. Within the scope of the representation, an attorney determines the means, including which claims to present and which witnesses to call, and a client determines the ends, including whether to accept a settlement offer and other duties.

Retainer

L and C executed a valid retainer agreement. In California, an agreement to represent that is worth more than $1,000 must be in writing. In ABA, it is strongly encouraged. Additionally, the fees must not be unreasonable under the ABA authorities, or unconscionable in California. Here, there is no indication that the fees were unreasonable/unconscionable. The retainer must describe the nature of the relationship, the responsibilities of the parties, and the method of determining fee. Here the facts tell us there was a properly executed retainer agreement.

Duty of Loyalty

An attorney owes a duty of loyalty to his clients, and cannot accept representation if it would result in a conflict of interest that would materially impair his representation of client. A conflict of interest may occur between an attorney and his client; between two clients, whether former and current or two or more current clients; between a third party and client; or between the members of an organization and the organization itself. A conflict of interest may occur between the attorney and his client when the attorney has a close relationship with opposing counsel in a case. Here, L has a close relationship with H, the Hotel's attorney. They were engaged for two years before amicably deciding to go their separate ways. L should have informed C of his relationship with H. In California, L needs to inform C in a written disclosure of his relationship with H. In the ABA authorities, L needs to obtain written consent from C with respect to his relationship with H. Because L did not inform C of his relationship with H or obtain written consent, L violated his duty of loyalty to C by not disclosing his relationship with H.

Duty of Communication

An attorney must promptly and diligently communicate with his client. This duty includes a duty to inform the client of their responsibilities and obligations with respect to the representation. Here, L owed C a duty to tell her about the scope of her responsibilities, including communicating with him regarding material facts. When L met with C, he should have informed her about her duty to respond to his inquiries so that he could competently represent her. C's statement that "I didn't think calling you back was such a big deal" indicates that L neglected to tell her that she should promptly return his calls and inquiries because failure to do so may hurt her case. C has a responsibility to make decisions with respect to her representation. If L had received a settlement offer with a deadline, he could not have accepted it without C's permission. Because L failed to communicate her own responsibilities to C, L violated his duty of communication with C.

L also owed C a duty to communicate all of the material facts so that she could make an informed decision. L should have communicated with H regarding the "thirteen prior lawsuits" before attempting to withdraw from the representation. L called C and left her a message, and sent many emails and a registered letter. But none of the communications informed C that he was concerned about prior litigations or that he was considering withdrawing until he did attempt to withdraw. L owed a duty to C to communicate all of the material facts before he attempted to withdraw. Because L did not inform C of the material facts, L breached his duty of communication with C.

Duty of Competence

An attorney owes a client a duty of reasonable knowledge, skill, and ability in the scope of the representation. Here, L did not inquire into the prior lawsuits that C may have filed against Hotel. Instead, he relied on the word of opposing counsel and did not do his own research. Because L did not do his own inquiry, he violated the duty of competence he owed to C.

Duty to Safeguard

L owed C a duty to safeguard the evidence she gave him. An attorney owes a duty to the client to safeguard possessions of the client, including money given as a retainer and any possessions or evidence entrusted to the attorney. Here, C gave L evidence related to her litigation, the clothes that were stained by the cleaning solution. L had a duty to diligently safeguard this possessions with reasonable competence. L placed the evidence in a closet and negligently sent them to the dry-cleaners, where they were cleaned. Placing material evidence in a closet is not a reasonable way to diligently safeguard important items. L should have placed them in a safe deposit box or other manner of safekeeping. Material evidence with respect to C's case was destroyed. L violated his duty to safeguard C's evidence and possessions entrusted to him.

Mandatory Withdrawal

An attorney may withdraw if representation will necessarily cause a violation of an ethical rule. Under the ABA, this extends to any law. An attorney must also withdraw if, because of his physical or mental condition, continued representation would materially impact the client. In California, an attorney must withdraw if the client insists on pursuing a claim without probable cause and with the purpose of harassing or maliciously injuring another person. Under the ABA authorities, an attorney must withdraw if he is fired. None of these events have occurred and L does not have a reason that would support mandatory withdrawal.

Permissive Withdrawal

An attorney is permitted to withdraw if a client insists on pursuing an illegal course of conduct. An attorney is also permitted to withdraw if they insist the attorney take actions against the attorney's judgment, violating the scope of the relationship so that the attorney is no longer dictating the means of the litigation. An attorney may also permissively withdraw if the client does not pay her fees or for any other "good cause shown." An attorney is also permitted to withdraw if the client makes representation unreasonably difficult.

Here, L may argue that C has made the representation unreasonably difficult. He attempted on numerous occasions to contact C in order to inquire about the prior litigations and discuss the case with her. He called her and left a message, sent at least 7 emails that he knows she read but did not respond to, and sent a registered letter with a return receipt requested. A reasonable client would likely have understood that L had a matter of some urgency to discuss with L and would have returned his call. But a week is too short of a time for L to say that this behavior made the representation unreasonably difficult. C could have been on vacation or with limited access to email and phones, and she did not want to take the time to respond to L. A week or two is not an unreasonable amount of time for a client not to respond. He at least should have waited to withdraw until he had discussed with her the importance of returning his calls and communicating with him. It was perhaps L's failure to communicate the responsibilities of the client to C, to inform her of her responsibility to also communicate with him so that he could adequately represent her, that caused the breakdown in communication in the first place. Therefore, C's lack of communication for two weeks does not make L's representation of her unreasonably difficult.

There is no indication that C did not pay her fees. Her statement to L that "Hotel's got more money than I do" may suggest an inability to pay her fees in the future, but this is not a reason to permissively withdraw. Additionally, there does not appear to be any other "good cause shown" to permissively withdraw. L did not have any reason to permissively withdraw from the representation and therefore violated the ethics rules.

Additionally, in California, an attorney may not permissively withdraw if the matter is currently pending before a tribunal. Because L filed the lawsuit in state court, the matter is currently pending before a tribunal and L must seek court permission to withdraw. Because L did not seek court permission to withdraw, he violated the California ethics rules.

Withdrawal from Representation

When an attorney withdraws, either permissively or because the withdrawal is mandatory, he owes a duty to the client to mitigate the harm from the withdrawal. An attorney must timely inform the client of the withdrawal and give the client time to seek new representation. Here, L simply told C he was withdrawing. He did not give her adequate time to find new representation and she may therefore be prejudiced in her case if there are upcoming deadlines or other issues in the case and she is not adequately represented.

Additionally, an attorney must mitigate the harm by returning all papers or possessions to the client. Here, because he did not competently and diligently safeguard C's evidence, it was destroyed when he negligently sent it to the dry-cleaners.

An attorney may collect fees for reasonable compensation, but must return any remainder of fees to the client. In California, an attorney may retain a true retainer, meant to ensure the attorney's availability. Here there is no indication that L retained any unearned fees or was paid a true retainer.

Because L did not give C adequate notice and time to find new counsel, and failed to return C's possessions, his withdrawal from representation violated the ethics rules.

Q6 Criminal Law and Procedure

Ivan, an informant who had often proven unreliable, told Alan, a detective, that Debbie had offered Ivan $2,000 to find a hit man to kill her husband, Carl.

On the basis of that information, Alan obtained a warrant for Debbie's arrest. In the affidavit in support of the warrant, Alan described Ivan as "a reliable informant" even though Alan knew that Ivan was unreliable.

Alan gave the arrest warrant to Bob, an undercover police officer, and told Bob to contact Debbie and pretend to be a hit man.

Bob called Debbie, told her he was a friend of Ivan and could do the killing, and arranged to meet her at a neighborhood bar. When the two met, the following conversation ensued:

> Bob: I understand you are looking for someone to kill your husband.
> Debbie: I was, but I now think it's too risky. I've changed my mind.
>
> Bob: That's silly. It's not risky at all. I'll do it for $5,000 and you can set up an airtight alibi.
>
> Debbie: That's not a bad price. Let me think about it.
>
> Bob: It's now or never.
> Debbie: I'll tell you what. I'll give you a $200 down payment, but I want to think some more about it. I'm still not sure about it.

When Debbie handed Bob the $200 and got up to leave, Bob identified himself as a police officer and arrested her. He handcuffed and searched her, finding a clear vial containing a white, powdery substance in her front pocket. Bob stated: "Well, well. What have we got here?" Debbie replied, "It's cocaine. I guess I'm in real trouble now."

Debbie has been charged with solicitation of murder and possession of cocaine.

1. How should the trial court rule on the following motions:

    a) To suppress the cocaine under the Fourth Amendment? Discuss.

    b) To suppress Debbie's post-arrest statement under Miranda? Discuss.

2. Is Debbie likely to prevail on a defense of entrapment at trial? Discuss.

Answer A

SUPPRESSION OF COCAINE

The Fourth Amendment prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures, and is incorporated against the states through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. For a search by a state actor to be valid, it must be conducted pursuant to a valid warrant issued by a neutral magistrate or an exception to the warrant requirement. In this case, Bob, who arrested and searched Debbie, was an undercover police officer, and therefore a state actor, so his search needed to comply with the Fourth Amendment.

Bob did not have a warrant to search Debbie. While the facts state that Alan obtained an arrest warrant, there was no warrant specifically for the search. That said, pursuant to a valid arrest, police can search the arrestee, including the arrestee's person and anything within the person's wingspan. Such searches are meant both to protect officer's safety and to ensure that the arrestee does not destroy any evidence with reach. The search must be at the same time and place as the arrest. Because, in this case, Bob found the white, powdery substance on Debbie's person - her front pocket - at the same time and place as her arrest, the search was lawful as long as the arrest was lawful.

Valid Search Warrant?

The first possible basis for the arrest was the arrest warrant that Alan obtained. The Fourth Amendment itself requires that warrants describe with particularity the place to be searched and the people or things to be seized. The warrant that Alan obtained appeared to satisfy this requirement, because it named Debbie as the person to be "seized," i.e., arrested.

That said, a warrant must be based on probable cause, which is defined as a fair probability that the searched place will contain contraband or other evidence of crime, and that the arrested person has in fact committed the crime of which they are suspected. In this case, the arrest warrant was not supported by probable cause. It was based only on one statement by Ivan, an informant who had often proven unreliable. Probable cause is determined by examining the totality of the circumstances. While each determination is necessarily very fact-specific, the say-so of one unreliable informant cannot be enough to satisfy the probable cause requirement. Courts have held that a tip from an anonymous informant, while relevant to probable cause, cannot by itself establish probable cause. A tip from an unreliable informant is no more reliable than a tip from an anonymous one, so Ivan's statement did not provide probable cause for the arrest.

Good Faith Exception?

An officer can nonetheless rely on an invalid warrant if the officer relied on it in good faith, meaning the officer did not know that the warrant was lacking in probable cause. This exception is not available, however, when any of the following is true: (i) the warrant, on its face, is so lacking in probable cause that no reasonable officer would rely on it, (ii) the warrant, on its face, is so lacking in particularity that no reasonable officer would rely on it, (iii) the affiant officer misled the magistrate in issuing the warrant, or (iv) the magistrate was so biased against the object of the warrant that he could be said to have given up all neutrality.

Here, the warrant probably appeared, on its face, to be supported by probable cause. Alan had told the magistrate that Ivan was a reliable informant, and a tip from a reliable informant is enough to establish probable cause. Bob, who executed the warrant after Alan gave it to him, therefore fell outside the first two exceptions to the warrant requirement. However, the third exception clearly applies. Alan misled the magistrate by telling him that Ivan was a reliable informant, when in fact Ivan had often proven unreliable. Police cannot obtain a warrant through deception, but then take advantage of the good-faith exception by having an officer who doesn't know about the deception execute the warrant. Debbie's arrest was therefore not permissible under the good-faith exception to the warrant requirement.

Valid Warrantless Arrest?

Police almost always need a warrant to conduct an arrest in a home or other private place, unless they are pursuing evanescent evidence, where they either have reason to believe that evidence in the house is being destroyed, or they are within 15 minutes of a suspect in hot pursuit. That said, Bob did not arrest Debbie in a private home; he arrested her in a neighborhood bar where they had arranged to meet. Police can generally effect a warrantless arrest in a public place whenever they have probable cause to believe that the person has just committed a crime. The validity of Debbie's warrantless arrest by Bob thus turns on whether he had probable cause to think she had just committed a crime.

Bob did in fact have probable cause. Just seconds earlier, Debbie had paid him $200 as a down payment for committing murder. This gave him probable cause, at the very least, to think that Debbie had just committed a crime. Murder is the intentional killing of another person with malice aforethought. In most states, premeditated murder is first degree murder, but murder is committed even by acting with reckless indifference to an unjustifiably high risk to human life. Hiring a hit man probably satisfies the former standard, and it certainly satisfies the latter. When she paid Bob, Debbie arguably committed solicitation. A person is guilty of solicitation where they urge, request, or pay another person to commit a substantive offense. By paying Bob an advance, Debbie was arguably soliciting his commission of the murder of her husband, Carl. Because she had just committed this crime in front of him, Bob had probable cause to arrest Debbie. The arrest was therefore lawful.

Debbie may argue that she did not actually commit solicitation in front of Bob, because she made clear that she was not yet sure she wanted him to kill Carl, and that she still needed some more time to think about it. It is not clear that this defense would work at trial, because Debbie still paid money as consideration for keeping open the promise of committing the crime. Bob had said she needed to pay him now or never if she wanted him to commit the murder, and she did pay him, albeit not the entire amount. That said, it does not matter that Debbie might win this argument at trial, because the arrest only required probable cause - again, a fair probability that the person had committed the substantive offense. By paying money to a hit man, Debbie at least came within a fair probability of committing solicitation, such that the arrest was lawful.

Furthermore, Bob had probable cause to think that Debbie had committed solicitation by offering Ivan $2,000 to find a hit man to kill her husband. While Ivan's unreliable testimony might have not established probable cause on its own, Debbie corroborated his report by saying "I was," by showing interest in Bob's offer when she said "not a bad price," and by ultimately offering him the $200 to keep the offer open. This earlier solicitation could also be the source of probable cause.

As mentioned above, a search can occur incident to a valid arrest. The officer can search the arrestee's person and everything within her wingspan, as long as time and place are contemporaneous. Bob's search was at the time and place of the arrest, and did not go beyond Debbie's person. It was therefore a lawful search pursuant to arrest. Once such a search is carried out, any evidence found is not subject to suppression, even if it is not evidence of the same crime for which the person was arrested. Thus, although the white powder was not evidence of the crime for which Debbie was arrested - solicitation of murder - it is not subject to suppression.

The judge should therefore deny Debbie's motion to suppress the cocaine.

SUPPRESSION OF POST-ARREST STATEMENT

Debbie's post-arrest statement, on the other hand, is subject to suppression. Under the Self-Incrimination Clause of the Fifth Amendment (and the Miranda case implementing it), incorporated against the states by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, police must warn people of their rights to remain silent and to an attorney before commencing a custodial interrogation. The warning need not be verbatim, but it must convey that (1) the person has the right to remain silent, (2) anything they say can be used against them at trial, (3) they have the right to speak to an attorney, and (4) that if they cannot afford an attorney, one will be provided. The trigger for these warnings is custodial interrogation. An interaction is "custodial" any time a reasonable person would not feel free to leave, and would expect that the detention will not be of relatively short duration, as with a routine automobile stop or a Terry stop. Another test for whether the interaction is custodial is whether it presents the same inherently coercive pressures as a station-house questioning. The interaction is an "interrogation" any time the police act in a way that they know or should know is likely to elicit an incriminating response. They need not actually conduct a formal interrogation, as long as this likelihood exists. Violations of a suspect's Miranda rights provide grounds to suppress any incriminating statements, though they will not necessarily lead to the suppression of the investigatory fruit of such statements.

Here, Debbie was clearly subject to a custodial interrogation. She was in custody because she was being arrested. Bob had just identified himself as a police officer, handcuffed her, and begun searching her. No reasonable person would feel free to leave such an arrest, and any questions asked while being handcuffed and arrested are just as coercive as questioning at a police station-house. Moreover, Debbie was subject to interrogation, because Bob, upon finding the cocaine, asked her "What have we got here?" Bob should have known that this question, asked by a police officer about a suspicious substance found on Debbie's person in the course of an arrest, was likely to elicit an incriminating response. Therefore, Debbie's incriminating response identifying the substance as cocaine is subject to suppression. So is her statement about being in trouble, which has the tendency to incriminate her by demonstrating her awareness of culpability.

The court should therefore grant her motion to suppress her post-arrest statement under Miranda. That said, the physical evidence itself - the bag of white powder - need not be suppressed, because Miranda suppression applies only to testimonial statements like Debbie's verbal statement, not physical evidence. Because the powder was not obtained in violation of Miranda, the police are free to test it and introduce it as evidence at trial if it proves to be cocaine. Debbie might argue that the nature of the bag's content is the fruit of an illegal interrogation, because Bob only knew what was inside because Debbie told him. This argument will fail for a number of reasons. First, Bob had an independent source for knowing that the bag might be cocaine - namely, his own eyesight and common sense. A bag of white powder carried around in a person's pocket is sufficiently likely to be drugs that a reasonable officer would have it tested no matter what. Second, and relatedly, the police could claim that discovery of the powder's chemical makeup was inevitable, because all suspicious powders found on arrestees are tested as a matter of course (assuming this is true, which it should be). Third, the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine does not apply to evidence whose discovery can be traced back to a statement suppressible under Miranda - only the statement itself is subject to suppression. The Supreme Court has determined that the evidentiary value of such down-the-line evidence outweighs the deterrent effect of suppression, unless the officer's failure to give Miranda warnings occurred in bad faith. Here, there is no indication that Bob acted in bad faith, withholding a Miranda warning so that he could gather evidence from Debbie to be used to further an investigation. It appears that, in the heat of the arrest and subsequent search, he simply forgot to give the warning. That said, even if this third argument against suppression failed, either of the first two would be enough to make the cocaine admissible at trial.

ENTRAPMENT

The defense of entrapment requires a defendant to show (i) inducement and (ii) a lack of predisposition. Inducement occurs when a criminal design originates with the police. A lack of predisposition occurs when the defendant was not otherwise intending to commit the crime, but only did so because the police applied pressure or some sort of other unfair deceit. The defendant must establish both elements by a preponderance of the evidence in order to make out the defense of entrapment.

If Debbie is found to have committed solicitation, it is unlikely that she will be able to establish an entrapment defense. As to predisposition, while the specific plan - to have Bob kill Carl - may have originated with the police, the underlying idea to kill her husband through a hit man was Debbie's. She had already taken a major step to achieve the underlying crime by paying Ivan $2,000 to find a hit man - a fact that she confirmed when she said that she "was" considering it. (While she may argue withdrawal, from discontinuing her plan, the entrapment defense assumes that she has otherwise been convicted.) She will thus struggle to show that she was not already predisposed to commit the crime. The plan originated with her, and she had already put significant money toward showing that it was not a mere fancy, but in fact a serious plan.

As to inducement, Debbie would have a slightly better argument. When she told Bob that she had changed her mind because her original plan was too risky, Bob applied pressure in several ways. He told her that her change of heart was silly, because the plan was not risky at all; he tried to persuade her that her alibi would be "airtight"; he offered her a presumably unnaturally low price; and he told her that she needed to accept on the spot. These all show police attempts to induce the crime through a combination of emotional and financial pressure.

That said, mere precatory language like this is rarely enough to establish inducement, or to negate predisposition that otherwise appears to exist. Generally the government must apply more forceful pressure - like an affirmative threat - to reach entrapment. For drug stings, these elements can be satisfied by offers to buy or sell drugs at a price that is grossly more favorable to the defendant than the defendant could obtain in the real world. But for solicitation of murder, the fact of offering a discount is probably not enough to show inducement or lack of predisposition. A person who does not otherwise intend to engage in murder is generally not induced to solicit murder by being offered a low price. Debbie's entrapment defense is therefore not likely to prevail at trial.

She may have slightly better luck at sentencing, by offering either a sentencing entrapment argument or a sentencing factor manipulation argument. These typically allow a judge to reduce a sentence, even to go below the guidelines, based on police conduct that is unfair or pressuring, but that does not rise to the level of entrapment. Bob's pressuring statements might satisfy these sentencing defenses, if Debbie can convince the sentencing judge that she in fact had decided not to carry out her plan, and indeed would not have carried it out, but for the officer's pressure. This may reduce her sentence, but it will not excuse her from criminal liability.

Answer B

Suppression of Cocaine Under the 4th Amendment

4th Amendment

Under the 4th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which has been incorporated to the states via the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment, the government must not conduct unreasonable searches and seizures.

Exclusionary Rule and Fruit of the Poisonous Tree

The Exclusionary Rule provides that the product of unreasonable searches and seizures in violation of the 4th Amendment and coerced confessions in violation of the 5th Amendment is to be excluded from any subsequent trial. The Fruit of the Poisonous Tree Doctrine states that all products/evidence derived from police illegality are excluded/barred from introduction at trial. The Fruit of the Poisonous Tree Doctrine can be overcome if (1) there is an independent source for the evidence/contraband; (2) there was an intervening act of free will on the part of the defendant; or (3) it was inevitable that the police would have obtained that evidence.

Harmless Error Rule

Even if there is a violation of the 4th Amendment and the Exclusionary Rule/Fruit of the Poisonous Tree Doctrine, a conviction will not be overturned unless there is a reasonable probability that the jury's determination would have been different but for the introduction of that information. This is called the "Harmless Error" Rule.

Search and Seizure of the Cocaine

As provided above, the 4th Amendment bars police from conducting unreasonable searches and seizures. There are a number of steps that we must go through in order to determine whether the seizure of the cocaine violated Debbie's 4th Amendment rights.

(2) We first need to determine whether this is government conduct. Government conduct occurs when the publicly paid police, or private police that are deputized with arresting power, conduct an action. Here, it appears as though it was government/police conduct. Alan was a detective and Bob was an undercover police officer. Accordingly, there was police/government action.

(3) Next, we need to determine whether Debbie had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the area searched or the item seized. Put another way, we need to determine whether she has standing to complain about this particular search. Standing is always present when (1) an individual owns a premises; (2) an individual is the possessor/leasor of the premises; or (3) the individual is an overnight guest at a premises. These do not apply to Debbie's particular situation. A defendant sometimes has standing if they have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the area searched. Here, the search took place on Debbie's person, in her pockets. Debbie undoubtedly has a reasonable expectation of privacy in her pocket. As such, the government/police must have had a valid warrant or a valid excuse for not having a proper warrant when they searched Debbie.

(4) As stated above, we next must determine whether Bob and Allan had a valid warrant for the search and arrest of Debbie. A valid warrant has two specific requirements: (1) particularity; and (2) probable cause. Particularity requires the warrant to state with relative specificity the items to be recovered, the person to be arrested, or the areas to be searched. Probable cause is the reasonable belief that contraband will be found in the area to be searched or reasonable belief that the individual to be arrested committed a crime. Here, there appears to be serious problem with the arrest warrant in this case, specifically with the probable cause requirement.

The particularity requirement appears to be satisfied because it is a warrant for the arrest of Debbie. This is a specific person and particular enough to satisfy the first prong of the valid warrant requirement. The problem arises with regards to the creation of probable cause. Alan obtained the warrant on the basis of an informant's information.

There are many circumstances where an informant's information may be used to establish probable cause. That being said, whether the informant may be trusted is based on the totality of the circumstances. This includes the informant's previous reliability, whether there is independent evidence to support the informant's testimony and, most importantly, whether the informant's testimony can be corroborated. Here, there does not appear to be any sort of corroboration of Ivan's testimony. Furthermore, it is made clear that Ivan has often proven unreliable. As such, there is no reason to believe Ivan's information without any additional corroborating evidence. Because probable cause is not based on sufficient information, there is a good argument to be made that the warrant was invalid to begin with.

(5) Even if a warrant is invalid, a search/arrest may still be considered legitimate if the arresting/searching officer uses good faith in the execution of the warrant. Here, there is no indication that Bob knew of the lack of probable cause, and appears to rely on the warrant in good faith. That being said, there are a number of situations where the arresting/searching officer's good faith does not excuse an invalid warrant: (1) when the warrant is so lacking in particularity that no reasonable officer could believe in good faith that the warrant is valid; (2) when the warrant is so lacking in probable cause that no reasonable officer could believe in good faith that the warrant is valid; (3) when the magistrate judge who issued the warrant is biased; or (4) when the officer who obtained the warrant lied in the warrant application. Here, there is nothing on the face of the warrant to demonstrate that it is so lacking in particularity or probable cause such that no officer could reasonably believe it valid. There is also no indication that the magistrate judge who signed the warrant is biased. There is, however, evidence that Alan lied in the warrant application in order to obtain the warrant. The facts indicate that Alan described Ivan as "a reliable informant" even though he knew that was not the case. Had the magistrate judge been aware that the warrant was solely based on information provided by an unreliable informant, they would probably not have issued the warrant because there is not sufficient probable cause to support the warrant. Accordingly, the warrant was invalid and the officer's good faith reliance on the warrant does not overcome that deficiency.

(6) If a warrant is invalid and the officer's good faith is not enough to overcome that deficiency, there are still some instances where a search and/or arrest is not required to be conducted pursuant to a valid warrant. Some such instances include, but are not limited to: (1) the plain-view doctrine; (2) searches incident to a valid arrest; (3) exigent circumstances; and (4) the automobile exception. Here, Bob may be able to validly argue that the search and seizure of the cocaine was valid pursuant to a search incident to a valid arrest. When an officer validly arrests an individual, they are allowed to search the clothes/body of the person, as well as any area around the person within their wingspan. Any contraband/evidence of crime that is obtained as a result of the search conducted pursuant to a valid arrest is admissible, despite the absence of a proper warrant. Here, Bob will argue that his search of Debbie and seizure of the cocaine was valid pursuant to a valid arrest. He will argue that he personally witnessed Debbie commit a crime (solicitation of a murder - which is discussed in greater detail below) and therefore was allowed to arrest her and entitled to search her person. Debbie will undoubtedly have a different view of the situation.

Debbie will argue that she committed no crime and that the search and seizure was not done pursuant to a search incident to a valid arrest. Solicitation requires (1) the defendant to request or ask another person to commit a crime; and (2) an intent that the requested crime be committed. Solicitation is a specific intent crime. If there is an agreement between the parties to commit the crime, solicitation merges with conspiracy and is no longer alive for purposes of prosecution. Here, it is unclear whether or not Debbie manifested the intent to commit the murder. If she did not have the requisite intent, she did not commit the crime of solicitation. Debbie used words such as "let me think about it," "I've changed my mind," and "I'm still not sure about it." While she did give Bob a down payment, she does not seem to express the necessary intent for Bob to commit murder against her husband. Her argument will be that no crime was committed, therefore there was no valid arrest and the search incident to the arrest was also improper.

Conclusion - Here, it appears a close call as to whether the court should suppress the cocaine pursuant to the 4th Amendment. As an initial matter, there was not a valid warrant and the conducting officer's good faith reliance on the warrant does not save it because Alan lied in obtaining the warrant. There does appear to be a valid reason for the search conducted by Bob, but Debbie will argue that she did not commit the crime of solicitation because (1) she never expressly asked Bob to commit the crime of murder; and (2) she did not express the intent for Bob to commit murder. The government will counter that the down-payment was meant to obtain the services and the exchange of money was enough to establish solicitation.

Ultimately, it appears as though Debbie does not commit the crime of solicitation because she did not expressly ask Bob to commit the murder and she did not have the necessary intent. While she did provide money, there was no agreement to commit the murder or express request to commit it - it appeared to simply compensate Bob for his time spent during their meeting. If Debbie had called back later and said to apply that money towards the commission of the crime, then the money would have been given with intent for Bob to commit the murder. Accordingly, it seems as though no crime was committed and the search that Bob conducted that uncovered the cocaine was not incident to a valid arrest. Therefore, the cocaine should be suppressed.

Suppression of Debbie's Post-Arrest Statement Under Miranda

5th Amendment and Miranda

Under the 5th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, which has been incorporated to the states via the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment, individuals are entitled to Miranda warnings prior to "custodial interrogation." Miranda warnings include (1) the defendant has the right to remain silent; (2) anything the defendant states can be used against them in the court of law; (3) the defendant has a right to an attorney; and (4) if the defendant is indigent and can't afford an attorney, one will be supplied to her. The warnings need not be verbatim. As previously stated, the trigger for Miranda warnings is "custodial interrogation." "Custody" means any situation in which an individual would not feel able to leave on their own volition. While this may be in a jailhouse, it can also occur in any other situations where police conduct does not leave a reasonable belief that the person can wilfully leave. "Interrogation" occurs when the police can foresee that the line of questioning may elicit an incriminating response. Once there is custodial interrogation, the individual being questioned must be given the Miranda warnings. If not, the exclusionary rule and fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine may apply.

The Exclusionary Rule provides that the product of unreasonable searches and seizures in violation of the 4th Amendment and coerced confessions in violation of the 5th Amendment are to be excluded from any subsequent trial. The Fruit of the Poisonous Tree Doctrine states that all products/evidence derived from police illegality are excluded/barred from introduction at trial. The Fruit of the Poisonous Tree Doctrine can be overcome if (1) there is an independent source for the evidence/contraband; (2) there was an intervening act of free will on the part of the defendant; or (3) it was inevitable that the police would have obtained that evidence.

Harmless Error Rule

Even if there is a violation of the 5th Amendment and the Exclusionary Rule/Fruit of the Poisonous Tree Doctrine, a conviction will not be overturned unless there is a reasonable probability that the jury's determination would have been different but for the introduction of that information. This is called the "Harmless Error" Rule.

Custodial Interrogation of Debbie

In order to determine whether Debbie's post-arrest statement violates Miranda and is thus entitled to suppression, we need to determine whether she was in a state of custodial interrogation. After receiving the $200 from Debbie, Bob identified himself as a police officer, handcuffed her, and searched her. During the course of the search, Bob found a vial of white, powdery substance and asked "well, well, what have we got here?" Based on the facts of this particular case, it appears as though Debbie was in custody at the time Bob made this statement. She was handcuffed and being searched by Bob. Accordingly, no reasonable person would believe that they have the right to leave on their own free will at that point.

Next, we need to determine whether Bob's question qualifies as "interrogation" under the meaning of "custodial interrogation" defined above. Bob's question is "What have we got here?" While this seems relatively innocuous, it is most definitely intended to elicit an incriminating response. When the police ask someone what the contents of a vial suspected to be contraband are, they are undoubtedly attempting to obtain a response that can incriminate the defendant.

Debbie was in "custody", as defined by Miranda, because no reasonable person would feel able to leave when they're handcuffed and searched by the police and she was being "interrogated" because Bob asked a question that is foreseeable to elicit an incriminating response, it appears as though she was entitled to her warnings under Miranda prior to Bob's questioning. Because Bob's questioning was a violation of Miranda, Debbie's response should be excluded pursuant to the 5th Amendment.

Debbie's Defense of Entrapment

As stated above, Debbie was charge with solicitation of murder. Solicitation requires (1) defendant to ask or request someone to commit a crime; and (2) specific intent that the requested crime is to be committed. Murder, the crime that Debbie supposedly wanted to commit, is defined as the unlawful killing of another human being with malice aforethought, expressed or implied. There are multiple "degrees" of murder - first and second degree. First degree is premeditated murder, with intent to kill, and knowledge, or felony murder (murder in the commission of a dangerous felony independent from the murder itself). Second degree murder is any other kind of murder. The intent required for murder is (1) intent to kill; (2) intent to commit serious bodily harm; (3) intent to commit a felony; or (4) depraved heart/reckless indifference.

While there is some question about whether or not Debbie manifested the intent necessary for solicitation, the defense determined that the defense of entrapment was a viable defense. In order to bring a successful entrapment defense, a defendant must show (1) the government unduly encouraged/enabled/aided the defendant in the commission of the crime; and (2) the defendant would not have committed the crime but for the government's actions. This is an extremely difficult defense to establish and Debbie may have trouble succeeding in its presentation.

Initially, we must determine whether the government encouraged and/or enabled Debbie to commit the crime in question. Here, Debbie's actions seem to indicate that she was predisposed to committing the crime of solicitation of murder. First, Debbie agreed to meet Bob at a neighborhood bar when the only information he provided was that he was a friend of Ivan and could do the killing. When they met, Debbie stated "I was [looking for someone to kill my husband], but I now think it's too risky. I've changed my mind." This statement seems to suggest that Debbie is not withdrawing because she doesn't want to commit the crime, but that she is afraid of getting caught. Bob does not force her to continue, but states that "it's not risky at all" and gives her a price quotation. At this point, Debbie states "let me think about it." When Bob states that he needs an answer now, Debbie proceeds to put a down payment and states "I'm still not sure about it." Based on Debbie's statements and behavior, it does not seem that Bob unduly coerced her to commit the crime of solicitation. Bob merely provided her with the opportunity to do so. Debbie's statements seem to suggest that she has the desire to do it, but is simply afraid of getting caught. Bob's assurances that she won't get caught do not rise to the level necessary for the first prong of entrapment.

We also must determine that Debbie would not have committed the crime but for the government's actions. As established in the preceding paragraph, Debbie has the intent to commit the crime, but is simply afraid of being caught. The government will argue that the provision of money was a down payment to commit the murder and Debbie had the necessary intent to commit the underlying crime necessary for solicitation. Debbie will claim that she would not have given the money, but for the assurances made by Bob that she would not be caught. That is not enough to establish the second prong necessary for entrapment. If a separate/non-governmental actor had provided the same assurances, Debbie appears to have been likely to react in the same manner.

Because (1) the government did not unduly encourage or enable Debbie to commit the crime of solicitation, and (2) Debbie would have still committed the crime without the government's interference, the defense of entrapment does not appear to be a valid defense for Debbie.

Q1 Civil Procedure

Paul, a citizen of Mexico, was attending college in San Diego on a student visa. He drove to San Francisco to attend a music festival. While there, he bought and ate a bag of snacks from Valerie, a resident of San Francisco. The snacks had been manufactured in Germany by Meyer Corp., a German company with its sole place of business in Germany. The snacks contained a toxic substance and sickened Paul, who incurred medical expenses in the amount of $50,000.

Paul filed an action pro se against Valerie and Meyer Corp. in the Superior Court of California in San Diego. In his complaint, he alleged that Valerie and Meyer Corp. should have known the snacks were contaminated and demanded $50,000 in compensatory damages.

Paul drove to San Francisco where he personally handed Valerie a summons and copy of the complaint. He sent a summons and copy of the complaint to Meyer Corp. by ordinary mail to the company in Germany.

1. Did Paul validly serve the summons on:

    a. Valerie? Discuss.

    b. Meyer Corp.? Discuss.

2. Does the Superior Court of California in San Diego have personal jurisdiction over:

    a. Valerie? Discuss.

    b. Meyer Corp.? Discuss.

3. Does venue properly lie in the Superior Court of California in San Diego? Discuss.

4. Is Paul's action properly removable to federal court? Discuss.

Answer A

I. Service of Process

The issue is whether Paul properly served process over Valerie and Meyer Corp.

Service of process in California can be accomplished in a variety of ways. First and foremost, a defendant may be personally served with a summons and a copy of a complaint. When in-person service does not work, substituted service may be attempted by leaving the summons and a copy of the complaint with the defendant's registered agent or another person who resides at the defendant's domicile. The summons and complaint must also be sent via certified mail to the defendant's address of record. However, process must be served by a person over the age of 18 who is not a party to the case.

A. Valerie

Here, Paul personally served Valerie with process. Paul might be over the age of 18, but he is a party to the case and therefore cannot properly effect service himself. Though service by handing the defendant process personally is proper, Paul was not a proper process server. Accordingly, Paul did not validly serve process on Valerie.

B. Meyer Corp.

Paul's service of Meyer Corp. suffers from the same defect as his service of Valerie: he is not a proper process server because he is a party to the case. Additionally, service of process on an international is subject to different rules: process may be served either in compliance with governing international treaties, or via certified mail with a return receipt.

Here, Paul mailed the complaint via ordinary mail, rather than certified mail. Further, there does not appear to be an international treaty governing service of process. Accordingly, Paul cannot have validly served process using ordinary mail; he did not validly serve process on Meyer Corp.

II. Personal Jurisdiction

The issue is whether the San Diego Superior Court has personal jurisdiction over Valerie and Meyer Corp.

In personam jurisdiction describes the personal jurisdiction of a court over the parties before it. There are three traditional bases of in personam jurisdiction: when a defendant consents to the court's jurisdiction, when a defendant is domiciled in the jurisdiction in which the court sits, and when a defendant is present in the jurisdiction and is properly served with process while present. When the traditional bases of in personam jurisdiction do not apply, a state long-arm statute may provide an alternative basis for jurisdiction.

A. Valerie

Here, Valerie appears to satisfy one of the traditional prongs of in personam jurisdiction. She is a resident of San Francisco, and so is domiciled in California and therefore subject to the personal jurisdiction of California state courts. While Paul personally served Valerie in San Francisco after driving there, this service of process was improper as discussed above. Nonetheless, because another of the traditional bases has been met, Valerie is properly subject to the San Diego Superior Court's personal jurisdiction.

B. Meyer Corp.

1. Traditional Bases

Here, Meyer Corp. does not appear to satisfy any of the traditional bases of in personam jurisdiction. It does not appear that it has consented to California state courts' jurisdiction. Further, it is domiciled only in Germany. Finally, Paul did not serve process on Meyer Corp. in state. Accordingly, none of the traditional bases apply.

2. Long-Arm Statute and Constitutional Limitations

However, California also has a state long-arm statute that may provide an alternative basis for personal jurisdiction. California's long-arm statute goes to the full extent of the federal Constitution, subject only to Due Process limitations. For a court's exercise of personal jurisdiction to comport with Due Process, the defendant must have sufficient minimum contacts with the jurisdiction, the exercise of jurisdiction must be related to the defendant's contacts, and the exercise of jurisdiction must not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.

a. Minimum Contacts

For a defendant to have sufficient minimum contacts with California, it must have purposefully availed itself of California, such that it was foreseeable that its minimum contacts would cause it to be haled into the California courts. In stream-of-commerce cases, purposeful availment consists of some action by the defendant deliberately targeting the jurisdiction. Here, it is not clear whether Meyer Corp. has purposefully availed itself of California, as it is incorporated in Germany, headquartered in Germany, and conducts all of its manufacturing in Germany. More information is needed into its distribution chains. For example, if Meyer Corp. specifically shipped its snacks to Valerie for distribution in San Francisco, then Meyer Corp. will have purposefully availed itself by intending that its products be sold in California. By contrast, if Valerie purchased the snacks in Germany and decided on her own volition to sell them in California, then Meyer Corp. will not have purposefully availed itself. In the absence of such evidence, it appears that Meyer Corp. does not have sufficient minimum contacts with California.

b. Relatedness

Relatedness is satisfied either in a specific sense when a cause of action arises out of a defendant's contacts with a jurisdiction, or more generally when a defendant is domiciled in a jurisdiction and is essentially "at home" in that jurisdiction. Here, Meyer Corp. is domiciled in Germany and conducts all of its activities in Germany. Accordingly, it is not "at home" in California and does not satisfy the general relatedness criteria. However, the action arises out of Meyer Corp.'s snacks being consumed in California. Accordingly, the specific relatedness criteria is met.

c. Fair Play and Substantial Justice

Even when a defendant has sufficient minimum contacts and relatedness is satisfied, the exercise of personal jurisdiction must not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. In considered whether the exercise of personal jurisdiction does so, a court considers a multitude of factors, including the plaintiff's interest in relief, the forum state's interest in providing a forum such that the plaintiff can seek redress, and whether other forums might be more appropriate. Here, Paul was sickened quite extensively and incurred substantial damages. He has a strong interest in relief. Further, California has a strong interest in providing a forum. Even though Paul is not a citizen of California, California nonetheless has an interest in making sure that contaminated food products are not distributed within the state. Finally, while Meyer Corp. might claim that Germany is a more appropriate forum, given that the snacks were manufactured there and it conducts all of its business there, California nonetheless may be more appropriate, given that Valerie, Meyer's co-defendant, is a citizen of California. Given that she ultimately sold the snacks to Paul and is being sued jointly with Meyer Corp., California is a more appropriate forum than Germany. Accordingly, a California court's exercise of personal jurisdiction over Meyer Corp. would not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.

Therefore, whether the San Diego Superior Court can properly exercise jurisdiction over

Meyer Corp. depends on whether Meyer Corp. has sufficient minimum contacts with California. While more evidence is needed, it does not appear that Meyer Corp. has purposefully availed itself of California, and therefore, the court cannot properly exercise personal jurisdiction.

III. Venue

The issue is whether venue properly lies in San Diego Superior Court.

Venue in California is organized by each of the 58 counties in the state. Different rules apply based on whether the action is a local action or a transitory action. Venue is proper in a local action, one involving real property, in the county in which the real property lies. For a transitory action, venue is generally proper in a California Superior Court in any county where any defendant resides. For contract actions, venue is additionally proper in the county where the contract was entered into and the county where the contract was expected to be performed. For tort actions, venue is proper in the county where the act or omission giving rise to the tort occurred. If no venue is proper following the application of these rules, then venue is proper in any county in which a court has personal jurisdiction over the defendants.

A. Residence

Here, the action at issue is a transitory action as it does not involve any real property. Therefore, venue is proper in any county in which a defendant resides. In this case, the two defendants Valerie and Meyer Corp. are residents of San Francisco County and Germany, respectively. Because only Valerie's residence, San Francisco, is a county within California, the first venue provision only provides that the Superior Court in San Francisco is a proper venue.

B. Tort Actions

Here, Paul's claim appears to be a tort claim: he appears to be arguing negligence on behalf of Valerie and Meyer Corp. in producing the snacks, or possibly strict products liability. Accordingly, the venue rules for tort actions may also provide an alternative basis for proper venue. In this case, the acts or omissions giving rise to Paul's action occurred in both San Francisco County, where Valerie sold him the snacks, and Germany, where the snacks were manufactured. Accordingly, under the analysis for a tort action, venue remains proper only in San Francisco.

C. Contract Actions

Paul could also plausibly allege that his action is a contract action, and that Valerie breached, for example, an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose when she sold him the snacks. Accordingly, venue is additionally proper in the county in which the contract was entered into, as well as the county in which the contract was expected to be performed. Here, both of those locations are the City and County of San Francisco: Paul agreed to purchase, and did purchase, the snacks from Valerie there. Accordingly, under the analysis for a contract action, venue is proper only in San Francisco.

D. Fallback Venue

Because venue is proper in at least one county in California, the fallback venue provision of any judicial district in which the court has personal jurisdiction over the defendant does not apply.

In conclusion, venue is only proper in San Francisco County Superior Court. Venue is not proper in San Diego Superior Court.

IV. Removal to Federal Court

The issue is whether Paul's action is properly removable to federal court.

A case initially filed in state court is properly removable to federal court when the case could originally have been brought in federal court. Removal is accomplished by filing a notice of removal in federal court within 30 days of service of a document that shows the case to be removable, but cases removable to federal court solely on the basis of federal diversity jurisdiction cannot be removed more than one year after the filing of the action in state court. Here, nothing indicates that Paul's case would be subject to these time restrictions. Accordingly, the issue is whether the case could have initially been brought in federal court.

For a case to be properly brought in federal district court, the federal court must have subject matter jurisdiction. A federal court may have federal question jurisdiction or diversity jurisdiction over a case. In cases where at least one "trunk" claim is within the court's federal question jurisdiction or diversity jurisdiction, the court may have jurisdiction over additional claims that share a common nucleus of operative fact with the federal trunk claim.

A. Federal Question Jurisdiction

Federal question jurisdiction consists of claims arising under the Constitution, treaties, and federal laws and regulations. The question must appear on the face of a well-pleaded complaint. Here, Paul does not appear to be asserting any federal rights. Unless he is asserting any causes of action under federal food safety regulations, for example, he appears solely to be asserting state-law tort claims -- that Valerie and Meyer Corp. were negligent in failing to detect that the snacks were contaminated. Accordingly, the federal court does not have federal question jurisdiction over Paul's action.

B. Diversity Jurisdiction

Diversity jurisdiction arises when there is a diversity of citizenship between the parties and the amount in controversy in the action exceeds $75,000.

1. Diversity of Citizenship

To satisfy diversity of citizenship, each plaintiff must be fully diverse from each defendant. A U.S. citizen or permanent resident alien is considered to be a citizen of the state in which she is domiciled, an alien is considered to be a citizen of the country of his citizenship, and a corporation is considered to be a citizen both of all jurisdictions in which it is incorporated and the state in which it has its principal place of business. However, even when each plaintiff is fully diverse from each defendant, a federal court still will not have subject matter jurisdiction if both the plaintiffs and defendants are aliens and U.S. citizens are not present on both sides of the action.

Here, Paul is not a permanent resident alien, as he is present in the country only on a student visa. Accordingly, for diversity jurisdiction purposes, he is a citizen of Mexico. Valerie resides in San Francisco, which is her domicile. Accordingly, for diversity purposes, Valerie is a citizen of California. Meyer Corp is incorporated in Germany only and has its principal place of business in Germany. Accordingly, Meyer Corp is a citizen of Germany.

Accordingly, the parties are fully diverse from each other: Paul does not share citizenship with either Valerie or Meyer Corp. However, the alienage restriction nonetheless bars Paul's action from satisfying the diversity requirements. Paul, as the only plaintiff, is an alien. Valerie is a U.S. citizen, but Meyer Corp. is also an alien, as it is only a citizen of Germany. Accordingly, aliens are present on both sides of the action, but U.S. citizens are not. Therefore, diversity of citizenship is not met.

2. Amount in Controversy

The amount in controversy is the amount, when plaintiff asserts a monetary damages claim, that a plaintiff seeks from the defendants. When a claim asserted jointly against two defendants, the amount in controversy is the total relief sought from the defendants. For a federal court to have jurisdiction, the amount in controversy must exceed $75,000.

Here, Paul seeks $50,000 in compensatory damages jointly from Valerie and Meyer Corp. Accordingly, the amount in controversy is $50,000, which does not exceed $75,000. Therefore, the amount in controversy requirement is also not met for diversity jurisdiction purposes.

Because neither the diversity of citizenship nor amount in controversy requirements are met, a federal district court would have not diversity jurisdiction over Paul's action. Accordingly, because a federal court has neither federal question jurisdiction nor diversity jurisdiction over Paul's action, it could not have originally been brought in federal district court. Therefore, Paul's action is not removable from California state court to federal district court.

Answer B

1. SERVING A SUMMONS

A. WAS VALERIE SERVED PROPERLY

The issue is whether Paul properly served Valerie by personally handing her a summons and copy of the complaint.

PROPER SUMMONS

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure allow for a party member to be served with process in a number of ways. One accepted method of service is personally serving the summons and complaint on the Defendant. A person may be served personally by any non-party who is 18 years or older. To effect proper service the Defendant should be given a summons and two copies of the complaint. Under California civil procedure, a person may similarly be personally served by a non-party 18 years or older by the same rules. This case has been filed in the superior court so it is under California rules. The CA rules prefer personal service.

In this case, Paul, a party to the case, drove to San Francisco where Valerie lived and handed her a summons and one copy of the complaint. This was improper. Paul was not allowed to serve Valerie because he is a party to the case. Further, there are no facts as to Paul's age, but service must be given by someone who is 18 years of age or older. Valerie was given one summons and one complaint. The rules require that Valerie be given two copies of the complaint. Because of this, service was not valid on Valerie.

B. WAS MEYER CORP SERVED PROPERLY

The issue is whether mailing a copy of the complaint and a summons by ordinary mail to Meyer Corp. in Germany was proper. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure dictate that it is proper to serve a Defendant by mail. The summons and two copies of the complaint must be sent by first class mail, postage paid, with a waiver and a pre-addressed and prepaid envelope in which the Defendant can return the signed waiver. California rules of civil procedure also allow service by mail to a person out of the country in a similar manner. CA rules prefer personal service, but the California rules specifically say that a defendant who is out of the country may be served by mail according to the California rules. However, in CA (which governs in this case) the mailing of service is not technically a waiver as it is in federal court but it operates in the same manner.

In this case Paul sent a summons and a copy of the complaint to Meyer Corp. in Germany by ordinary mail. This was improper. First, the complaint needed to be sent with one summons and two copies of the complaint. It should have been sent by first class mail, postage paid, and should have included a form for the Defendant to sign with a pre-addressed and prepaid envelope to send the signed documents back to the plaintiff who will file them. Under the California rules, the mailing of a summons and complaint is not actually waiver (it is a form of service) but it operates like the federal waiver. Thus, Meyer Corp. was not properly served.

2. PERSONAL JURISDICTION

A. DOES THE SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA HAVE PERSONAL JURISDICTION OVER VALERIE

Personal jurisdiction over the Defendant is required for a court to hear a case. It refers to the court having authority over the defendant. To have personal jurisdiction (PJ) over a defendant traditionally occurs when a Defendant is served with process while voluntarily in the state, the defendant is domiciled in the state, or the Defendant consents to the court exercising its power over him/her. If there is not a traditional basis for jurisdiction the court will look to see if there are minimum contacts with the forum state so as not to offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. In evaluating this the court looks to three factors: (a) contacts with the forum state focusing on whether the defendant has purposeful availment and reasonably foresees being sued in the forum state; (b) Relatedness which occurs with general or specific jurisdiction in the forum state; and (c) fairness looking at if the defendant will be so gravely inconvenienced as to cause a substantial unfairness. The court will also look at the plaintiff's interests and the state‘s interest in effectuating justice under the fairness prong.

In this case Valerie is a resident of San Francisco. This means that Valerie is domiciled in California because she lives in a city (San Francisco) that is located in California. Therefore the court has personal jurisdiction over Valerie because she is domiciled in the forum state (California). Further, the court also has a traditional basis of jurisdiction over Valerie because she was personally served while voluntarily in California. Valerie was in San Francisco voluntarily because she lives there and was served with process while there. Thus, the court does have personal jurisdiction over Valerie according to two of the traditional bases of PJ.

B. DOES THE SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA HAVE PJ OVER MEYER CORP

Personal jurisdiction over the Defendant is required for a court to hear a case. It refers to the court having authority over the defendant. To have personal jurisdiction (PJ) over a defendant traditionally occurs when a Defendant is served with process while voluntarily in the state, the defendant is domiciled in the state, or the Defendant consents to the court exercising its power over him/her. If there is not a traditional basis for jurisdiction the court will look to see if there are minimum contacts with the forum state so as not to offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. In evaluating this the court looks to three factors: (a) contacts with the forum state focusing on whether the defendant has purposeful availment and reasonably foresees being sued in the forum state; (b) Relatedness which occurs with general or specific jurisdiction in the forum state; and (c) fairness looking at if the defendant will be so gravely inconvenienced as to cause a substantial unfairness. The court will also look at the plaintiff's interests and the states interest in effectuating justice under the fairness prong.

California's long-arm statute allows PJ over a defendant as long as it does not offend the constitution. Therefore the analysis of California's long-arm statute is merged with the constitutional analysis. The constitutional analysis is the minimum contacts test described above and analyzed below.

Meyer Corp. is a German company. It is incorporated in Germany with its sole place of business in Germany. Meyer Corp. was not served while voluntarily present in California. Further, there is no evidence that Meyer Corp. has consented to California having PJ over it. Because of this there is no traditional basis for personal jurisdiction. Therefore we must analyze PJ with the constitutional test of Minimum Contacts.

MINIMUM CONTACTS

There must be minimum contacts so as not to offend the traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. This is analyzed looking at purposeful availment and foreseeability of being dragged into court.

PURPOSEFUL AVAILMENT

To have PJ Meyer Corp. must have purposefully availed itself into the forum state (CA) as such that it used the protections of its laws. In this case Meyer Corp. is a snack company. Its sole place of business is in Germany; however, the snack did get to California. If the company sold its products, advertised its products, or in some other way targeted California there will be purposeful availment. If Valerie brought these snacks back from Germany and the corp did not in any way reach out to CA, there will be no purposeful availment. There will be purposeful availment if Meyer Corp. directed sales to CA. It is unclear where and how Valerie came to get these snacks so the purposeful availment prong is unclear.

FORESEEABILITY

If Meyer Corp. did target CA in any way (by selling there, advertising there, selling candy to CA over the internet) then it is foreseeable that they would be sued there. If, though, Valerie got these snacks in Germany and then sold them when she was in California then it is not foreseeable that Corp. would be dragged into court in CA.

RELATEDNESS

If the defendant is essentially at home in the forum state there will be general jurisdiction. Corp. is located only in Germany with its sole place of business in Germany. Therefore no general jurisdiction.

If the defendant's contact with the forum state results in the cause of action there will be specific jurisdiction. This is unclear because we don't know if Corp. was in any way targeting to sell in California. If they were then specific jurisdiction, if not then no specific jurisdiction.

FAIRNESS

We look at if it is so gravely inconvenient that it will put Defendant at severe disadvantage. In this case Defendant is a corporation and monetary concerns are not good arguments. Therefore it is probably fair. Further CA has an interest in adjudicating for its citizens. Paul the plaintiff is in CA.

CONCLUSION

There is PJ over Valerie. PJ over Meyer depends on its operations and how the snack got into CA.

3. VENUE PROPER

Under CA civil procedure, venue depends on the type of action. If it is not a local action (land action where the venue is where the land is) then venue is where any defendant resides. Further for a personal injury case venue is proper where the injury took place.

This is a personal injury case because Paul was sickened. Therefore venue is proper in San Francisco (where injury took place) and in San Francisco (where a Defendant lives). Neither of the defendants lives in San Diego (Valerie lives in San Fran and Meyer lives in Germany). Therefore venue in San Diego was improper. Proper venue would be in San Francisco.

4. ACTION REMOVABLE?

An Action is removable to federal court when there is a federal question jurisdiction. This occurs when the plaintiff is enforcing a federal right - when the cause of action arises under federal law. In this case the cause of action arises under state law because it is a tort or personal injury action. There is no federal law at issue. Any federal defenses do not matter in determining whether there is federal question jurisdiction. Therefore action cannot be removed under federal question jurisdiction.

An action can also be removed if there is diversity jurisdiction. Diversity jurisdiction requires that there be complete diversity (no plaintiff can be a citizen of the same place as any defendant) and that the amount in controversy be in excess of $75,000. Further, an action cannot be removed if the defendant is a citizen in the same state as the action is brought. A plaintiff may aggregate her claims against multiple defendants if the defendants are jointly and severally liable.

In this case the amount in controversy is $50,000. Paul can assert this amount against both defendants because it is a case where he is saying both are jointly and severally liable for the entire amount. This amount is below the required $75,000 so there is no diversity jurisdiction. Further Valerie is a citizen of California because she is domiciled in CA. This means that Valerie is a citizen of the forum state - this prevents her from removing the case to federal court in CA because she is a citizen of CA. Further, the case cannot be removed because there are aliens on both sides of the case. Paul is a citizen of Mexico and is the plaintiff. Meyer is a citizen of Germany and is a defendant. We have an alien on each side which prevents diversity. To remedy this there must be diverse citizens of the United States on each side.

In conclusion, the action cannot be removed.

Q2 Real Property

Al owned a farm.

In 1990, Al deeded an easement for a road along the north side of the farm to his neighbor Ben. Ben immediately graded and paved a road on the easement, but did not record the deed at that time. Al and Ben both used the road on a daily basis. The easement decreased the fair market value of the farm by $5,000.

In 2009, Al deeded the farm to his daughter Carol and she recorded the deed.

In 2011, Ben recorded his deed to the easement.

In 2012, Carol executed a written contract to sell the farm to Polly for $100,000. The contract stated in part: “Seller shall covenant against encumbrances with no exceptions.” During an inspection of the farm, Polly had observed Ben traveling on the road along the north side of the farm, but said nothing.

In 2013, Carol deeded an easement for water lines along the south side of the farm to Water Co., the local municipal water company. The water lines provided water service to local properties, including the farm. Water Co. then recorded the deed. The easement increased the fair market value of the farm by $10,000.

In 2014, after long delay, Carol executed and delivered to Polly a warranty deed for the farm and Polly paid Carol $100,000. The deed contains a covenant against all encumbrances except for the easement to Water Co. and no other title covenants. Polly recorded the deed.

In 2015, Polly blocked Ben’s use of the road and objected to Water Co.’s construction of the water lines.

Ben has commenced an action against Polly seeking declaratory relief that the farm is burdened by his easement. Polly in turn has commenced an action against Carol seeking damages for breach of contract and breach of the covenant under the warranty deed.

1. What is the likely outcome of Ben’s action? Discuss.

2. What is the likely outcome of Polly’s:

    a. Claim of breach of contract? Discuss.

    b. Claim of breach of the covenant under the warranty deed? Discuss.

Answer A

QUESTION ONE

At issue is the outcome of Ben's (B) action against Polly (P) for blocking the access to the road that he received an easement from Al (A) to use.

Express Easement

An easement is the right to enter onto someone's land and use a portion of that land for a specific purpose. Easements may be granted expressly to an individual by deed. An express easement by deed must meet the deed formalities to be valid, including a valid writing, and other statute of frauds requirements. Moreover easements are deemed to be perpetual in nature unless otherwise indicated. Here in 1990, A deeded an easement to B for using a road along the north side of his farm. There are no facts indicating whether or not the deed itself meets the formalities of a valid writing; however it can be presumed here because there are no facts to the contrary. Therefore given that A created an easement by deed, that expressly named the easement in the deed, an express easement was likely created for B's use. Thus in 1990, after A's valid deed, B obtained an express easement to use the road on the farm.

Reasonable Use/Scope

An easement must usually be used reasonably within the scope of the granting instrument if an express easement. This typically allows the holder of the easement to improve the land where the easement lies and to enter on to it to repair it. Here after A granted B the easement, B immediately graded and paved the road for his use. These actions are likely valid given that B was entering onto the property to pave a road. It would be implied that the holder of this easement for use of a road could enter onto land to improve the land, grade it and maintain the road. Therefore it would appear that B has been validly using the easement and comporting with its ramifications.

Termination

The next issue is whether B's easement could be said to have terminated in any way after P took title to the land it was on. Termination of an easement may occur where the easement is abandoned, where the granting instrument states a specific condition to occur, or where the properties that the easement lies on and the adjacent property holder are merged. Typically easements are perpetual in nature unless stated otherwise. Here A granted the easement to B by deed. There was nothing in the deed that stated any kind of condition as to whether the easement could terminate. Therefore no conditions have occurred. Moreover there was no abandonment of the easement as B has used the road ever since he was granted it. Finally no merger occurred under these facts as B still maintains his own property and the property that the easement lies on is separately owned by P now. Thus the easement did not terminate.

Transfer of Land - Notice

Generally when land that is burdened by the easement, the servient estate, transfers title the easement runs with the land. Thus even though A transferred the land to Carol (C) and then C transferred the land to P, each time the transfer occurred the easement would automatically run with the land. However a subsequent bona fide purchaser may attempt to argue that they lacked notice of the easement. If a subsequent bona fide purchaser can do so and state that they did not have notice of the easement then they can typically defeat an easement holder’s title. The goal is to show that the subsequent bona fide purchaser did not have notice of the easement on the land. Thus P must show she did not have notice; this is done through a recording act.

Recording Act

Under the common law, title in land was measured by first in time, first in right. However under modern recording acts, people who record their interest in land can preserve their title by putting the world on notice of that interest in the land. There are jurisdictional splits as to what type of recording statute is used and there are three main ones: race, race-notice, and notice. Race recording statutes are used only in a minority of jurisdictions. Therefore notice and race-notice jurisdictions are typically the most commonly used. Here in order to use a recording statute, P would have to show that she was a SBP and that she met the requirements of each recording statute.

Subsequent Bona Fide Purchaser (SBP)

In order to actually argue that one did not have notice to the easement, they must be a SBP. Typically a SBP is someone who took title to land subsequently to the current holder of the land and they did so for value. Here P paid for title to the farm in which B's easement lies. Moreover B's interest was received in 1990 and P's interest was received in 2014, so she was subsequent.

Thus P is a SBP who could seek to use a recording statute to take superior title in land and invalidate B's easement.

Notice and Race-Notice Jurisdictions

In a notice jurisdiction and a race-notice jurisdiction, the SBP must show that at the time that they took title to the land they did not have a notice of the competing interest. There are three kinds of notice: inquiry, actual and constructive. Inquiry notice occurs where the SBP is charged with looking at the property to examine it, and if they had examined it they may have found the competing interest. Actual notice occurs where the SBP is actually aware of the interest and recording notice occurs where the competing interest was recorded so that the SBP was on constructive notice via the recording. Here P actually saw the road that B had built on the property and she saw that B was using it. Therefore P likely had actual notice since she physically saw someone driving on the land. Moreover B recorded his deed in 2011 and P did not record until 2014. Thus she would be on constructive notice as well. At a very minimum P should have asked C who B was and what he was doing. Therefore notice would most likely be charged to P.

Thus P as a SBP cannot argue that she took title to the land without notice of the competing interest.

Race Jurisdiction

In a race jurisdiction, the person who records first wins and that is why it is not used in many jurisdictions because it often results in unfair outcomes. Here B recorded in 2011 and P recorded in 2014. Thus under a race jurisdiction B would win as well.

Conclusion

In total, P cannot use a recording act to argue that she as a SBP should take title without B's interest. She had notice of B's usage of the land and moreover she did not record first. Thus the common law rule applies of first in time and first in right and B's interest is superior. P would lose to B's claim as B's easement would automatically run with the land.

Shelter Rule

Under the shelter rule, a SBP may be able to step into the shoes of a previous grantee and argue that the previous grantee could have validly used a recording in order to defeat a previous claim. The shelter rule may be used despite the fact that a SBP may have had actual knowledge. Here P could argue that C was a SBP under a recording act and therefore P could step into C's shoes to invalidate B's claim.

C as SBP

A SBP must typically pay value for title to the land and take subsequently to the competing interest. Here B got his easement in 1990 and C took title in 2009. Therefore C was subsequent. But it is not clear that C paid for the land. Her father was A and he just deeded her the land. If she did not pay value for the land then she was a mere donee and not a valid SBP. Any value is enough; typically only a "mere peppercorn" would suffice; but if someone did not actually give value then they are not a SBP. Thus if C was not a SBP then she could not use a recording act. As such it is unlikely that the shelter rule could be used here.

Recording Claim

Under a race notice and a notice jurisdiction it is likely that C would be charged with inquiry notice. Since B built and paved a road on the farm, that would have went from his farm to C's farm, any inspection of the farm that C was to take title to would charge with her inquiry notice. She would have seen the road and been charged with asking what it was. Moreover given B's usage of the road, she likely would have seen him, especially if this was her father's farm before it was hers. Thus under a race and race-notice jurisdiction it is unlikely that C would prevail since she likely took title with notice.

Under a race recording statute C would probably prevail however, since she did record before B did, as she recorded in 2011 and B recorded in 2014.

Conclusion - Shelter Rule

In total, P cannot likely use the shelter rule here to step into C's shoes because C was probably not a SBP. Moreover under a notice and race-notice recording statute she would not win since she probably would be charged with notice of B's claim. However she may win under a race recording statute if she was a SBP because she recorded first.

Overall Conclusion

In conclusion, B's claim against P would likely be valid. B can establish that he had a valid express easement and that it automatically ran with the land when it was transferred from A to C and then to P. Moreover P cannot argue she did not have notice of the easement nor can she use a recording statute. Moreover she cannot use the shelter rule here either since C was not likely a SBP.

QUESTION TWO

At issue is the likely outcome of P's lawsuit against C.

Part A

At issue is P's claim for breach of contract. When parties convey land it is a two-step process: first the parties enter into a contract for the sale of land and then there is a period of escrow. Following escrow, closing occurs. At closing is where the actually deed is delivered and at that point the deal is finished. P's first claim arises under the land sale contract.

Land Sale contract - Marketable Title

A contract for the sale of land is required to be in a valid writing satisfying the statute of frauds. Here on 2012, P and C executed a written contract to sell the farm to P for $100,000. The contract stated that the seller "shall covenant against encumbrances with no exceptions". This express provision essentially was stating that the land would not be sold with any encumbrances on it. An encumbrance is something that includes easements. In every contract for the sale of land there is the doctrine of marketable title however. This means that upon closing, the land would not have any defects of title in it, including easements. Therefore even though the contract stated that the land would not be sold with any encumbrances on it, this would be implied in the contract. Here at closing the land had an easement on it with the water company as well as B's easement as argued above. Thus at closing two easements existed on the land.

The problem however is that at closing, under the merger doctrine, the land contract merges into the deed and cannot be used to provide relief to a buyer.

Merger

Under the merger doctrine, the contract is said to merge into the deed and the buyer may not use the contract to recover for defects on the property. Here at closing the land sale contract that C and P entered into would be said to merge into the deed. Thus even though the contract was breached at closing, there could be no relief afforded under the terms of the contract. As such, P cannot make a breach of contract claim here.

Conclusion

In total, P's breach of contact claim would fail because the merger doctrine merged the contract into the deed and it can no longer afford relief to P.

Part B

The next issue then is the buyer's ability to recover under the warranty that was contained within the deed. Deeds contain covenants in them that allow for recovery to a buyer. Whether the buyer can recover depends on the type of deed and covenant contained in a deed.

Type of Deed

There are three kinds of deed: general warranty deeds, special warranty deeds, and quitclaim deeds. Quitclaim deeds do not provide any relief under a covenant. General warranty deeds provide relief under several different kinds of covenants. Here the deed that was given to P contained the covenant that stated there would be no encumbrances on the property, except the easement to Water Co. (W). Thus we must examine that covenant.

Covenant Against Encumbrances

The covenant against encumbrances states that at closing, there will be no encumbrances on property. This is breached immediately at closing and is considered a present covenant on the property. Here at the time of closing there were two easements contained within the property. Since both were on the property, they are both subject to the covenant against encumbrances.

B's Easement

As stated above B has a valid easement on the farm that P bought. Thus this easement will exist on the property and therefore at closing the deed covenant against encumbrances was breached. As such P has a valid cause of action against C for breaching this covenant with respects to B's easement. It does not matter that P saw B's using the road at the time of contract formation; notice is not material for purposes of the covenants. C specifically included a covenant against encumbrances in her deed. Therefore the presence of this one breached that covenant.

W's Easement

As explained above, an easement can be created by express deed. Here in 2013, C deeded an easement to W for water lines along the property. This was during the escrow period. Given that an express easement was likely created via deed to W, W had an easement on the property at closing. The covenant however specifically disclaimed liability for W's easement. Given that C specifically disclaimed the easement in her covenant, and P accepted closing at that time, P likely waived any argument she has that C breached this covenant.

Insofar as this was a present covenant the statute of limitations for it began to run at the time of closing. Therefore P should have raised any objection to this encumbrance at the time that it existed. However P went through with closing, specifically accepting the deed that contained a waiver with W's easement on it. Therefore P cannot likely recover for W's easement under the covenant in the deed.

P can attempt to argue for fraud or some other kind of defense to C's actions here but it is unlikely that such an argument would prevail. It does seem unfair that C would include in the contract a provision stating that there would be no encumbrances in the title, yet during escrow she actually put another on her property. But C specifically included a waiver of this encumbrance in the warranty in her deed. Therefore P would be charged with reading the warranty and seeing such waiver. If P did not like the waiver she should have raised the issue during closing and not accepted the deed as is. Therefore P likely waived any argument against W's easement given her acceptance of the deed with the waiver on it.

Remedies

Typically the remedy for a defect in title to land such as occurred here with B's easement is the difference of the value of the land with the easement on it and the value of the land without the easement on it. Here the difference in value of the land would be $5,000 as the facts indicate that the farm is worth $5,000 less with B's easement on it. Thus P can likely recover $5,000 from C for B's easement in violation of the covenant in her deed.

However P cannot recover the $10,000 that W's encumbrance decreases the value of the land by since the covenant would not extend to that encumbrance as P likely waived it as stated above.

Conclusion

In total, P can recover under the covenant in the warranty deed for B's easement only and she would likely get only $5,000.

Overall Conclusion

P's cause of action against C for breach of contract would fail under the merger doctrine. Yet P can recover under her deed against C for B's easement on the property, but not W's easement.

Answer B

1. Ben v. Polly

Easements

An easement is a right in land granted to a third party. Easement may be created expressly or impliedly. Implied easements may be created by prescription, by prior use, or by necessity. Easements can additionally be classified as appurtenant or in gross. Easements in gross have no dominant estate and are personal in nature and are generally non-transferable.

Appurtenant easements are those which burden one estate (servient estate) while also benefiting another estate (the dominant estate). Appurtenant easements run with the land to subsequent takers who take with notice of the easement. Notice can be actual, constructive, or inquiry. Actual notice arises when the subsequent taker is actually aware of the easement. Constructive notice arises when the easement has been properly recorded. When an easement has been properly recorded, takers are put on constructive notice of the existence of the easement whether or not they were actually aware of the easement. Lastly, inquiry notice arises when based on the facts or circumstances of the property a reasonable person would have inquired about the existence of any easements or interests in land.

An express easement must be in writing.

Here, in 1990, Al deeded an easement for a road along the north side of his farm to his neighbor Ben. The facts indicate that Al deeded the easement to Ben thus satisfying the writing requirement and establishing an express easement. Further, the easement will be classified as an appurtenant easement because Al and Ben are neighbors and therefore the easement concerns the land and benefits Ben's land by allowing an access road, while burdening Ben's land by granting access to a third party.

Additionally, the facts indicate that the easement decreased the fair market value of Al's land by $5,000 which further shows that the easement burdened the farm (the servient estate) thus establishing an easement appurtenant. Because the easement granted to Ben was an easement appurtenant, it will run with the land to successive takers who take with notice of the land.

Priority

Here, because Al deeded the property to Carol who recorded her deed prior to Ben's recording of his easement, it must be determined who has priority. There are three methods of recording statutes in the different jurisdictions: race, race-notice, and notice. If the recording statute applied in the jurisdiction does not apply, the courts will resort to the common law principles of first in time to determine priority. Under the shelter rule, a subsequent purchaser in land may take shelter and be protected under a recording statute, if a previous transferee of land would have otherwise been protected by a recording statute.

Race

Under a race notice jurisdiction, priority goes to the first to record. Here, Carol recorded her deed in 2009 and Ben did not record his deed until 2011. Therefore, between Ben and Carol, in a race jurisdiction, Carol would have priority over Ben. Polly would then be able to use the shelter rule, if it applies, to be protected by Carol's priority under the recording statute and thus Polly would have superior title to Ben. However, if the shelter rule does not apply between Polly and Ben, because Ben recorded his deed in 2011 and Polly did not record her deed until 2014, Ben would take priority and Polly would be burdened by the easement.

Notice

Under a notice recording statute, priority is given to subsequent bona fide purchasers who took property without notice. Notice may be actual, constructive, or inquiry. Actual notice arises when the taker actually knew of the interest. An individual is deemed to have constructive notice when a look into the grantor-grantee index would have put them on notice of the interest. Lastly, inquiry notice arises when the facts or circumstances would have led a reasonable person to inquire about other interests in the land.

Under a notice statute, Polly would have priority over Ben if she could establish that she took the property without notice of Ben's interest. Ben, however, will successfully argue that Polly had notice of his easement both under constructive notice and under inquiry notice. Because Ben recorded his easement in 2011, had Polly looked at the grantor-grantee index for the parcel of land, she would've seen Ben's easements. Further, because Polly had observed Ben traveling on the road, she likely was put on inquiry notice to inquire into Paul's right to be on the land at issue. Further, because Al deeded the farm to Carol and there is no evidence that she paid any value for the farm, she is not a bona fide purchaser protected by the recording statute and Polly could not use the shelter rule in a notice jurisdiction.

Race-Notice

Under a race-notice recording statute, priority is given to the first bona fide purchaser to record without notice. Here, Carol recorded her deed in 2009, Paul subsequently recorded his deed in 2011, and Polly lastly recorded her deed in 2014. Because Carol likely is not a bona fide purchaser since she did not pay value for the farm, priority would go to the next bona fide purchaser who records without notice. However, because Carol has recorded her interest, Polly will argue that Ben was put on notice of the conveyance to Carol. However, because Ben received the deed in 1990 there was likely no requirement for him to look into the grantor-grantee index after he received the easement. However, if so, he will be deemed to have been put on notice. Further, Polly cannot claim priority over Ben because, as discussed above, she also took with notice to the property; thus in a race-notice jurisdiction, the priority will resort to common law rules of first in time and Ben will have priority over Polly.

Therefore, it will likely be determined in any of the three jurisdictions that Ben had priority over Polly and thus Ben will be successful in his action against Polly.

Easement by Prescription

Alternatively, Ben can claim that he acquired an easement by prescription. An easement by prescription requires the holder to take actually, openly, and continuously use the land in a manner hostile to the true owner, for the statutory period. At common law the statutory period for adverse possession was 20 years. Thus, Ben will argue that because he used the land continuously and openly from 1990 to present day, he has acquired an easement by prescription. However, because Ben used the road with permission by Al, his use will not be hostile and he will not succeed on such a claim.

2a. Polly v. Carol (Breach of Contract)

Here, Polly has commenced an action against Carol seeking damages for breach of contract based on the clause in Carol and Polly's written contract stating that "Seller shall covenant against encumbrances with no exceptions." Polly's claim for such a breach may lie wither in the concept of marketable title or a breach of an express condition of the contract.

Implied in any sale of land is a warranty that at closing the seller will convey marketable title. Marketable title warrants that there are no encumbrances on the property which are defined as any interest in a third party that diminishes the value or use of the land but is consistent with a granting of a fee interest in the property. While a seller must convey marketable title at closing, once a deed to the property is delivered and accepted the land sale contract merges with the deed and any rights to sue under the contract are extinguished and the buyer may only sue upon the deed.

Here, Polly has commenced an action against Carol seeking damages for the breach of the clause in the contract covenanting against encumbrances. Polly's claim may arise out of a claim that title was not marketable based on the easement to Ben or the easement to Water Co., or breach of the specific covenant in the agreement. While the easements to Ben and Water Co. are encumbrances which would warrant a breach of the contract or of marketable title, provided that Polly was unaware of them at the time of signing, because the facts indicate that in 2014 Carol executed and delivered to Polly a warranty deed which Polly accepted, the land sale contract has merged with the deed and Polly can no longer sue on the contract and must sue on the deed. Polly may, however, have a claim under the deed which is discussed below.

2b. Polly v. Carol (Breach of Covenant Under the Warranty Deed)

Type of Deed

Upon the transfer of land, the seller may execute and deliver to the buyer one of the following three types of deeds: general warranty deed, a special warranty deed, or a quitclaim deed. The parties' rights under the deed depend on the type of deed granted to the seller. A quitclaim deed contains no covenants or promises to the buyer and is essentially an "as is" deed leaving the buyer with no rights to sue the seller. Alternatively, warranty deeds may include all or any of the six covenants of title including: the covenant of seisin, the right to convey, the covenant against encumbrances, general warranty, further assurances, and quiet enjoyment. Warranty deeds can be classified as either general warranty deeds or special warranty deeds. General warranty deeds are the most protective deed and warrant that neither the seller, or anyone in the chain of title, has breached the covenants included in the deed. Alternatively, a special warranty deed only warrants that the seller has not breached the covenants of title.

Here, Polly is commencing an action for breach of the covenant under the warranty deed. The facts indicate that the deed was a warranty deed containing only the covenant against encumbrances. Because the covenant was included in the deed, Polly may properly sue Carol for breach of the warranty.

Covenant Against Encumbrances

The covenant against encumbrances in a deed warrants that there are no unknown encumbrances on the property. Under title, encumbrances are defined as any right in a third party that diminishes the value or interferes with the use and enjoyment of the land. Such encumbrances include mortgages, liens, easements, and covenants. Here, Polly is suing for breach of the covenant against encumbrances. There are two possible easements on the property which may be the subject of her claim, the easement to Water Co. and the easement to Ben. Because the deed expressly warrants against any encumbrances other than the easement to Water Co., Polly cannot successfully claim a breach of the covenant in relation to that covenant because it was expressly excluded in the deed. However, Polly may be able to assert a breach based on the encumbrance to Ben. The determination of whether Ben's easement is valid is discussed above and, provided it is valid, Carol will likely argue that Polly was put on notice of such easement based on inquiry notice because the facts indicate that she had observed Ben traveling on the road along the north side, but said nothing. Polly will argue that those circumstances alone did not give rise to suspicion that he claimed an interest in the property; however, considering she was aware of his passing over the land, it is reasonable to assume that a buyer would have inquired into the circumstances. Further, Carol will argue that even if she did not have inquiry notice of Ben's interest, she would have constructive interest of Ben's interest because he recorded his deed in the easement in 2011 before Carol and Polly had entered into the land sale contract. Therefore, while Polly can properly claim a breach of the covenant based on the warranty deed received by Carol, provided it is valid, it will likely be determined that she had sufficient notice of the easement.

Q3 Contracts

Dirt, a large excavating company, recently replaced all of its gas-powered equipment with more efficient diesel-powered equipment. It placed the old gas-powered equipment in storage until it could sell it.

On May 1, Builder, a general contractor for a large office development, and Dirt signed a valid written contract under which Dirt agreed to perform all the site preparation work for a fee of $1,500,000. Dirt estimated its total cost for the job at $1,300,000. The contract states: “Dirt hereby agrees to commence site work on or before June 1 and to complete all site work on or before September 1.” Because no other work could begin until completion of the site preparation, Builder was anxious to avoid delays. To ensure that Dirt would give the job top priority, the contract also states: “Dirt agrees to have all of its equipment available as needed to perform this contract and shall refrain from undertaking all other jobs for the duration of the contract.”

On May 29, an unusual high pressure weather system settled over the state.

As a result, on May 30, in an effort to reduce air pollution, the state banned use of all diesel-powered equipment.

On June 2, Dirt told Builder about the ban and stated that it had no way of knowing when it would be lifted. Builder told Dirt to switch to its gas-powered equipment. Dirt replied that using its old gas-powered equipment would add $500,000 to its costs and asked Builder to pay the increased expense. Builder refused.

On June 4, seeing that no site work had begun, Builder emailed Dirt stating that their contract was “terminated.”

On June 8, Builder hired another excavating company, which performed the work for $1,800,000.

Dirt has sued Builder for terminating the contract. Builder has countersued Dirt for the $300,000 difference between the original contract price and what it paid the new contractor.

1. Is Dirt likely to prevail in its suit? Discuss.

2. Is Builder likely to prevail in its countersuit? Discuss.

Answer A

Governing Law

The contract involves excavation related to the construction of a large office development. Common law principles, rather than the UCC, will apply as the sale of goods is not implicated.

Dirt's Suit Against Builder for Termination of Contract

Builder's termination of the contract will be wrongful unless one of the relevant grounds for rescission is satisfied. Builder can argue, alternatively, that: 1) Dirt's breach was material; 2) Dirt's comment regarding costs constituted an anticipatory repudiation; 3) Frustration of purpose, or impossibility, gave provided grounds to discharge the K.

Minor versus Material Breach

Breaches of the promises or covenants contained in a contract provide grounds for the non-breaching party to sue for damages. The ability to treat the contract as discharged on the grounds of a breach, however, depends on the nature and extent of the breach itself. A material breach does provide the non-breaching party with grounds to discharge the contract. A minor (non-material) breach does not. Whether a breach is material or minor depends on a determination as to whether the non-breaching party received the "benefit of the bargain" sought under the contract. Courts will address an assortment of factors in seeking to arrive at such a determination, including the hardship to the defendant, the reason for the breach, whether the breach was willful or inadvertent, the cost of remedying the breach, the ability of damages to remedy the breach, and the overall degree of completion at the time of the breach.

If a promise or covenant is implied into a contract, courts will generally accept substantial performance (as to avoid a breach). If a promise or covenant is express in the contract, generally literal compliance is required. However, even when dates are included in a contract, including construction contracts, courts do not construe time to be of the essence unless otherwise clearly stated.

Was Time of the Essence

Here, the contract itself reads "Dirt hereby agrees to commence site work on or before June 1 and to complete all site work on or before September 1." It additionally contains a promise from Dirt to have all equipment ready and to refrain from undertaking other jobs during the duration of the contract. Each party will seek to argue in the affirmative/contrary that time is/is not of the essence. Builder will argue that multiple contractual provisions outlining the importance of expediency and availability of supplies mandate a finding that time is of the essence in the contract. However, Dirt can argue that time of the essence was never explicitly stated in the contract, and that any such reading of such a promise would be implied only. Dirt will additionally argue that, if time is not of the essence, then not having started by June 4 -- three days after the intended start date -- would not constitute a material breach and thus Builder could not treat the contract as discharged. Builder will argue the opposite -- time was of the essence; three days late was therefore a material breach, and therefore the contract can be discharged.

Conclusion

A court is more likely to find in Dirt's favor based on these facts. Firstly, the contract did not explicitly state time is of the essence, despite multiple references to the timeliness of performance. Secondly, if time was of the essence, it would likely be in regard to the completion rather than the starting date. Starting three days late would not constitute a material breach; therefore, even if time was deemed of the essence. The conjunctive power of these two arguments likely means Dirt would prevail and would not have deemed to have been in material breach of the contract by failing to start performance by June 4. This would, therefore, make Builder's termination of the contract improper and Dirt would prevail in his suit, subject to the analysis below.

"Having All Equipment Available"

An explicit term of the contract between Dirt and Builder was that Dirt "agrees to have all of its equipment available as needed to perform this contract..." When Dirt and Builder communicated on June 2, Dirt communicated to Builder that using its old gas-powered equipment would cost an additional $500,000 and asked for the increased payment. The parties will contest what was meant by the term of the contract, and whether Dirt breached the term of the contract by not having gas-powered equipment ready. Dirt will contest that "all of its equipment" refers to the equipment its business employs in carrying out excavation contracts, which, at present, is diesel-powered equipment. Builder will argue the equipment provision mandated for Dirt to have any and all necessary equipment ready to perform.

Builder likely has the stronger argument on these facts. Builder can likely demonstrate that the failure to have the necessary equipment to perform the excavation -- the very purpose for which Dirt was hired -- is a material breach of the contract. It is material, Builder will assert, because it deprives Builder of the entirety of the benefit of its bargain; without proper equipment, the contract cannot even begin to be performed. Therefore, as a material breach, Builder has grounds to terminate the contract. Dirt's counter-argument that it had the reasonably foreseeable necessary equipment to begin likely won't succeed -- Dirt did still have gas-powered equipment, although it was in storage; when Builder contracted with Dirt, it could expect that Dirt would employ all equipment that it owned in performing the contract. Therefore, Builder likely has a stronger argument that by not having gas-powered equipment ready Dirt was not able to meet the requirement of the contract to have "all of its equipment available as needed to perform this contract." Such a material breach would give proper grounds to terminate the contract on Builder's part, but Builder's argument is by no means a clear and certain winner.

Anticipatory Repudiation Versus Perspective Inability to Perform

An anticipatory repudiation occurs when one party, in a fully bilateral executory contract, communicates explicitly and unequivocally that it will not be able to perform its duties or obligations under the contract. An anticipatory repudiation discharges the non-repudiating party's duty to perform and that party can 1) treat the contract as discharged

2) sue immediately, 3) wait and sue on the contract date, 4) attempt to urge performance by the other party. A perspective inability to perform is a statement by one party to the other expressing doubts or reservations about a potential ability to perform an obligation or duty under the contract. It differs from an anticipatory repudiation in its explicitness and unambiguousness.

Here, Dirt told Builder that using its old gas-powered equipment would add $500,000 to its costs and asked Builder to pay the increased expense. Builder refused the request. Nothing in Dirt's language would rise to the level of an anticipatory repudiation -- it made no representation that it absolutely could not perform under the contract or that it would not, despite an increased cost. It merely requested a greater sum of money due to the elevated cost of performance. Builder could not justifiably have treated Dirt's comment as an anticipatory repudiation. Dirt's comment may have constituted a prospective inability to perform, but analysis as to whether it did or not is largely superfluous derivative of the fact that, even if it was, Builder's duties under the contract would only have been suspended. Builder could not treat the contract as discharged via a perspective inability to perform.

Concluding, Builder could not treat the contract as discharged on grounds of an anticipatory repudiation or perspective inability to perform based on Dirt's comments regarding the increased cost of performance.

Frustration of Purpose

Builder can seek to advance the argument that frustration of purpose provided grounds to discharge its contract with Dirt. Frustration of purpose occurs when a supervening event, which was unforeseeable to the parties, and which neither party expressly assumed the risk of, frustrates the purpose of the contract (i.e., deprives the contract of value and benefit.) Builder will seek to argue that the state's banning of diesel-powered equipment frustrated the purpose of its contract with Dirt, as state regulation due to the unusual weather system was unforeseeable, and that the value and purpose of the contract have been frustrated via this unforeseeable event. Builder will seek to argue neither party assumed the risk, and the change was not foreseeable to the parties at the time the contract was entered into.

Dirt will likely have a winning counter-argument to Builder's claim of frustration of purpose. While the state regulation has changed the cost of the contract -- and has changed the cost of the contract to Dirt alone -- the underlying value and benefit of the contract has remained. The purpose for which the parties contracted is still achievable, and increased cost alone does not frustrate the entire purpose of a construction contract.

A court is more likely to favor Dirt's argument, especially because Builder, in seeking to advance an argument of frustration of purpose, is not in fact the party enduring hardship in this contract from increased cost. While the cost of performance has changed via the state regulation, the basic purpose and value of the contract remains -- the land can be excavated for the purpose of constructing a building subsequently.

Impossibility

Builder could seek to argue, ultimately unsuccessfully, that impossibility and impracticability should allow the contract to be terminated. Impossibility refers to the situation where a subsequent event, which was unforeseeable, which undermined a material element of the contract (or a basic assumption upon which it was formed), and which neither party assumed the risk of, has rendered performance of the contract (by one or both parties) illegal. One form of impossibility is illegality, occurring where the subject matter of the contract has subsequently become illegal after the contract was entered into.

Builder's arguments are likely to fail because, despite the intervening illegality of the use of diesel-powered equipment, the contract itself, and the purpose for which it was formed, has not been rendered illegal. A required-by-law change in the instrumentality used to carry out the contract would not render the contract itself dischargeable on grounds of impossibility. Impossibility would therefore not serve as a viable grounds for discharge of the contract on the part of Builder.

Damages

If Dirt successfully prevails in its suit against Builder on the grounds that Builder impermissibly breached the contract, Dirt can recover its lost profits under the contract. As a general rule in construction contracts, Builder can recover lost profits if the owner breaches prior to commencement of the construction; if the owner breaches during construction, the builder can recover the contract price - the cost of completion. Here, Dirt would receive lost profits -- that is the $1,500,000 - $1,300,000 = $200,000.

Overall Conclusion

Builder's strongest argument to justify terminating the contract was that Dirt's breach of the material term of the contract to have all equipment available needed to perform the contract constituted a material breach by Dirt, and therefore provided grounds for discharge. This is not a clear-cut certainty, however. Impossibility, impracticability, frustration of purpose, and breach of the time for performance clause all would not be winning arguments to justify termination of the contract for Builder. However, even if Builder can show Dirt was in material breach of the contract, Dirt likely has some persuasive counter-arguments to avoid liability, found below.

Builder's Countersuit

Much of the analysis regarding potential avenues for Builder to seek to have the contract discharged (rescission) apply to excuse Dirt's performance under the contract. Frustration of purpose, impossibility, and impracticability all provide grounds by which a party's performance under a contract is excused, in addition to providing potential grounds by which a contract can be discharged between the parties. However, as we established above, the contract was likely rightfully discharged because Dirt breached a material term regarding having "all supplies available." That being said, if Dirt's performance was excused for a valid reason, Dirt will not be held liable for damages (amount discussed below) under the contract.

Impracticability

Dirt likely has a strong argument for impracticability. Impracticability encompasses the situation where a subsequent event, which was unforeseeable, and has a material effect on an element of the contract or a basic assumption upon which the contract was formed, and which neither party assumed the risk of, has rendered one party's performance extremely or unreasonably difficult or expensive. Here, Dirt will argue that the subsequent enactment of law was unforeseeable because it was the result of an unusual weather system, and that it was inherently unforeseeable. Furthermore, it has had a material effect on the contract (Dirt's cost of performance), and neither party expressly assumed the risk of the event. Builder can counter that Dirt assumed the risk of increased cost of performance via restrictions on the use of certain types of machines by law, but Builder's argument is not overly persuasive. Rather, the cost of increase in Dirt's performance will likely be determinative in the eyes of the court.

The subsequent enactment of new law has increased the cost of Dirt's performance by $500,000, out of an initial cost of $1,300,000 -- a cost increase of less than 50%. Courts, historically, have generally been unwilling to excuse performance under a contract due to the increased cost in performance unless such an increase is excessive and extreme. Here, a less than 50% increase in cost may not meet that standard; although the increase does make the performance on the contract a profit-negative transaction for Dirt, the increase in cost may not be so unreasonable as to excuse performance, a court may find. Nevertheless, Dirt can and should advance the argument -- likely, however, it will be a losing one.

Impossibility

As discussed in detail above, impossibility -- via illegality -- will not serve as a valid excuse to Dirt's performance because the contract itself did not become illegal, rather merely one means by which the contract could be performed became illegal. A court is unlikely to extend the reasoning so far as to entirely excuse Dirt's performance because diesel-powered equipment has been subject to regulation, especially considering the fact that Dirt has gas-powered equipment available. Dirt's arguments will fail on impossibility grounds.

Frustration of Purpose

Dirt's arguments regarding frustration of purpose will similarly fail for the reasons outlined above -- the value, benefit, and purpose of the contract remains despite an increased cost to Dirt. The essence of the contract and its purpose was the excavation, not what type of machine Dirt used in the process. Dirt's arguments will fail on frustration of purpose grounds.

Mutual Mistake

Dirt could seek to argue that his performance is excused via mutual mistake. Mutual mistake applies when both parties are mistaken as to a basic assumption, material to the contract, upon which the contract was formed. Here, Dirt would argue mutual mistake occurred in regards to "equipment available." Dirt could seek to argue there is ambiguity in the term, as Dirt meant diesel-powered equipment while Builder expected the use of all of Dirt's equipment. Dirt's argument will likely not fail -- the term is plain on its face -- "all of its equipment" -- and would be interpreted to require of Dirt to employ all the equipment it owns, which includes gas-powered equipment. While Dirt may have intended a different meaning for the term, because the term is plain on its face and there was not an actual "mistake" regarding the meaning of the term, Dirt's argument will fail. Dirt's subjective belief will not constitute a mutual "mistake" in the eyes of the court.

Damages

An owner's countersuit in a construction contract which has not been fully performed by the breaching party can recover damages in the amount of the difference between the contract price (with the breaching party) and the cost of completion (obtained via the hiring of a third party.) Here, that would provide Builder with the $300,000 damages outlined as the amount of its lawsuit.

Conclusion

If Builder succeeds in showing that failure to have all equipment available was a material breach by Dirt, it can rightfully treat the contract as discharged. Furthermore, it can recover damages from Dirt if a court determines that the difficult to Dirt did not rise to the level of impracticability (the most likely finding). Alternatively, if no grounds existed to discharge the contract because the court does not find Dirt has breached a material term, then Dirt can recover the profits it would be entitled to from the contract. If the contract was rightfully discharged but Dirt's performance did rise to the level of impracticability, then Dirt would not be paid to force damages. Builder prevailing in regard to both breach and damages is the most likely outcome.

Answer B

Introduction

Applicable law

The issue is whether the UCC applies. The UCC applies to the sale of goods. Goods are things movable and identifiable at the time of contracting. Here, the contract is for the performance of construction services. Construction services are not goods. Therefore, the UCC does not apply. Therefore, the common law governs.

1. Is Dirt likely to prevail in its suit?

Anticipatory repudiation by Builder

The issue is whether Builder anticipatorily repudiated the contract. Anticipatory repudiation occurs when one party unambiguously and clearly states that it will not perform the contract. An anticipatory repudiation counts as a breach. The non-breaching party can either find someone else to do the performance, sue the breaching party, or do nothing. Anticipatory repudiation generally applies to executory contracts. In the event that the contract is wholly executory, then the non-repudiating party can immediately sue for damages, regardless of the date of performance. If the non-breaching party has already performed, then it cannot sue until the time for the other party's performance is due. For anticipatory repudiation in construction contracts before anything has begun, the general measure of damages is the non-breaching party's expected lost profits.

Here, the parties made a valid contract on May 1st. The contract provided that construction would begin on June 1 and that performance was due on September 1. On June 4, Builder stated that the contract was terminated. Saying that a contract is terminated is an anticipatory repudiation--is unambiguous and clear. Builder had no intention of following through on the contract at that point. Moreover, the contract was still executory. Dirt had not commenced any sort of performance, and Builder had not paid anything. As a result, Dirt would have the option of suing for breach of contract at the time of breach. Because the contract was completely executory, Dirt would be entitled to its lost expected profits. In this case, the total fee was expected to be $1,500,000 and the expected cost was $1,300,000. As a result, the expected profits would be $200,000. Thus, Dirt would be likely to win $200,000 if there are no applicable defenses to enforcement.

Mitigating damages-defense

In order for a party to recover damages, they must be certain, causally related to the breach, foreseeable, and unavoidable. Here, the damages are foreseeable and caused by Builder's breach. Had Builder not breached, Dirt would have been paid, and non-payment is a foreseeable consequence of breach. Moreover, the damages here are certain--$200,000. We generally use expectation damages in contract law, which puts the party in as good of a position as they would have been had the contract been performed. Generally, the non-breaching party is required to mitigate damages, which means that they must try to reduce damages as much as possible. In the context of construction contracts that are anticipatorily repudiated, mitigating damages might involve taking other work during the time in which the party was expecting to work for the breaching party. Thus, Builder might claim that Dirt has failed to mitigate damages. However, the fact that Builder made Dirt refrain from entering into any other contracts during this time might hurt the mitigation argument -- Dirt would probably be able to show that it was unable to mitigate due to this clause in the contract. Had the clause not been present, perhaps Dirt would have been out finding other business.

Anticipatory Repudiation by Dirt-defense

The issue is whether Builder might be able to defend on the basis that Dirt actually repudiated first. However, this argument is likely to fail. On June 2, Dirt merely told Builder about the ban and asked Builder to shoulder the increased expenses, after which Builder declined. However, this is not sufficiently unambiguous to constitute an anticipatory repudiation. If a party is uneasy about whether the other party can perform (due to an ambiguous situation like we have here), then the party can demand further assurances from the other party, and may temporarily suspend performance for a commercially reasonable time until it receives those assurances. Here, Dirt did not actually say that it was not going to be able to perform. Had Dirt been unambiguous, then perhaps Builder could have deemed it an anticipatory repudiation and hired another party (one of the options when there is an anticipatory repudiation). However, the June 2 conversation was not clear enough. It is perfectly possible that Dirt may perform the contract regardless. Therefore, this defense would be unlikely to be effective.

Breach of Promise/Condition by Dirt-defense

The issue is whether Dirt breached a condition of the contract such that Builder's obligation to perform was discharged. A promise is something that a party is supposed to do under a contract. A condition is an event that, if it does not occur, means the entire contract does not come into effect. Courts generally construe terms as promises as opposed to conditions, because they do not want an entire forfeiture of the contract.

Builder may argue that the June 1 start date was a condition precedent to the contract taking effect. Essentially, they would say that, because Dirt had yet to commence construction by June 1 (indeed, even by June 4), that the condition was not satisfied and the contract did not take effect. However, a court would probably not buy this argument. There are two types of conditions--express and implied. An express condition must be in the contract explicitly in conditional language ("on condition that"), which was not present here. An implied condition may arise from the intent of the parties. Here, Builder was worried about timing, but there is insufficient evidence to infer that the start date was a condition to Builder's entire performance. Thus, a court would likely construe the start date as a mere promise. Indeed, the courts abhor a forfeiture.

In the event that the start date is considered a promise, then the common law doctrine of substantial performance applies. Substantial performance holds that a non-breaching party has a duty to perform if the breaching party has still substantially performed her end of the bargain. There must be a "material breach" in order for the non-breaching party to be completely discharged. When determining whether there has been substantial performance, the courts take into account (i) prejudice to breaching party; (ii) prejudice to breaching party; (iii) amount of performance rendered; (iv) whether the breach was willful; (v) cost of fixing the problem; and (vi) a variety of similar factors.

In service contracts, time for completion is generally not considered a material breach if performance is completed slightly late. The only time when a complete breach and forfeiture might be found is when there is a "time of the essence" clause, which must be very explicit. There was no such clause in this contract, and the breach only applied to the start of performance, so it would be very unlikely for a court to find that Dirt materially breached to the extent that Builder will be completely discharged form performance.

Conclusion

Overall, it appears that Dirt would have a good case against Builder for breach of contract for the amount of $200,000.

Is Builder likely to prevail in its countersuit?

Anticipatory repudiation by Dirt

This is the same argument as has been described above. Essentially, Dirt's statements over the course of the June 4 conversation are unlikely to constitute a full-blown anticipatory repudiation. Builder should have first demanded further assurances before terminating the contract and hiring someone else.

Breach of promise/condition by Dirt

This is the same argument as has been described above. Essentially, it is unlikely that a court would find the start date to be a condition precedent to effectiveness of the contract. Moreover, it is unlikely that Dirt's failure to start completely on time would count as a material breach justifying Builder's non-performance.

Impossibility-defense

Dirt might argue in defense that it would be unable to perform its end of the contract due to supervening impossibility. Indeed, in many cases, a subsequent law or regulation may render a party's performance illegal or impossible. In such case, that party may be excused from performing. Generally, the party claiming excuse must have not expressly borne the risk.

Here, the government banned all diesel-powered equipment two days before Dirt was supposed to commence performance. This was certainly unexpected, and was the result of the May 29 high-pressure weather system. However, performance is definitely not impossible. Dirt still has its gas-powered equipment, which it could use to complete the project. It might be more expensive to do so, but mere increase in expense is insufficient for an impossibility defense. Therefore, impossibility would not be an effective defense.

Dirt might argue in defense that it should be excused from performance due to supervening impracticability. Impracticability is a defense where the occurrence of an unforeseeable event happens, which renders performance impracticable. The unforeseeable event must affect an underlying assumption of the agreement. The party claiming excuse must not have borne the risk. Generally, the mere inability to make a profit is not sufficient for a claim of impracticability.

Here, the high pressure system was characterized as unusual. Builder might argue that strange weather systems are foreseeable, and that Dirt should have known that this was a possibility. On the other hand, Dirt would claim that a weather system resulting in the banning of all diesel-powered equipment is not foreseeable at all. Overall, it would probably be seen as unforeseeable. Moreover, the ban had an effect on an underlying assumption of the contract. Dirt was expecting to use its diesel equipment--it had put all of its old equipment in storage. Moreover, if Dirt knew that it would have to spend an additional $500,000, it would not have accepted a $1,500,000 contract price. There is no evidence that either party expressly assumed the risk (though sellers generally bear the risk in sale of goods contracts, and a court could, by analogy, deem that Dirt was allocated the risk). The key question is whether the ban makes performance impracticable. Dirt is a large excavation company, which presumably has a lot of contracts. If Dirt had to use its gas equipment, it would expect to see a $300,000 loss on this job. It is unclear the effect that such a loss would have on Dirt, but a court would probably find that such a loss is insufficient to make performance of the contract wholly impracticable. It is possible that a court could find that performance is impracticable, but it is rather unlikely.

Dirt might try to argue that there was a mutual mistake, which should lead to discharge of contractual duties. Mutual mistake occurs when both parties were mistaken about a fundamental aspect of the contract. Dirt could argue that both parties mistakenly assumed that Dirt would be able to use its diesel-powered machines. The fact that a basic assumption has been violated (by Dirt having to use gas-powered equipment) could perhaps render the contract unenforceable and both parties would be excused. This is somewhat of a stretch of an argument. It depends on whether Builder actually had diesel as a basic assumption of the contract, and whether either side assumed the risk.

Damages

$300,000 would be the proper expectation damages. Builder would get the difference between the contract price and the reasonable cover price.

Conclusion

For the reasons mentioned, Builder would be unlikely to win its countersuit.

Q4 Constitution

State X has a valid contract with public school teachers providing a fixed salary schedule. State X recently passed legislation to address its failing public schools. Now, when a school falls below established standards, each teacher at that school has 10% of his or her salary withheld each pay period for a maximum of two years. The withholding ends, and the money is returned with interest, upon the completion of a ten-hour certification program or termination of employment.

City High is a public school in State X where salary withholding has begun.

Bob has been a teacher at City High for the past three years. Paige is a highly-regarded probationary teacher at City High. A probationary teacher may be terminated for any reason upon written notice within the first year of employment.

Bob and Paige have been outspoken opponents of the State X law and its application to City High, appearing at various community and school board meetings throughout the school year.

Shortly before the end of Paige's first year of employment, City High served her with written notice terminating employment, and refunded the money withheld with interest.

Bob and Paige have sued State X, the Attorney General of State X, and City High in federal court seeking damages and injunctive relief. State X and the Attorney General have moved to dismiss the suit based on standing and the Eleventh Amendment.

1. Did City High's termination of Paige without a hearing violate the procedural due process guaranty of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution? Discuss.

2. How should the court rule on the State and the Attorney General's motion? Discuss.

Answer A

1. WHETHER PAIGE'S TERMINATION VIOLATED HER FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS RIGHTS

The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits the states from depriving any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law. Due process generally requires a fair procedure, usually notice and a hearing. Under procedural due process analysis, the first inquiry is whether the plaintiff had a constitutionally protected liberty or property interest. If the plaintiff has a protected interest, the court will then balance that interest against the state's interests under Matthews. The court will also look to the risk of erroneous deprivation and whether additional procedural safeguards would reduce such risk. The issue for Paige (P) is therefore (1) whether she has a protected liberty or property interest, and (2) whether she was entitled to a fairer process.

WHETHER PAIGE HAS A CONSTITUTIONALLY PROTECTED LIBERTY OR PROPERTY INTEREST

Property Interest

The issue is whether P's probationary employment at City High is a protected property interest. Traditionally, the Supreme Court differentiated between "rights" and "privileges" and provided that only "rights" are protected under the Due Process Clause. The Court since Goldberg, however, has held that a property interest is protected by the Due Process Clause if the plaintiff has a "legitimate claim of entitlement."

Under Supreme Court precedent, a tenured public school teacher has a protected property interest in their employment; however, a teacher does not have a protected interest if she is terminable at will during an initial probationary period. Kelly. P is a probationary teacher and may be terminated for any reason upon written notice within the first year of employment. There is also no indication that City High made her any assurances that she would not be fired during the probationary period. P, therefore, does not have a legitimate claim of entitlement to her job and thus has no protected property interest.

Liberty Interest

The Court has also recognized that when a person's freedom of movement is restrained (e.g., detention) or when a person's constitutional rights are denied, the person has a liberty interest that is protected by the Due Process Clause. P may argue that she was terminated during her first year, not because of poor performance, but rather in retaliation for her exercising her First Amendment rights in speaking out against the State's law that withholds teachers' salaries based on the school's performance. If P can make a showing that her First Amendment rights were violated, she could trigger due process protections and seek additional termination procedures beyond the written notice provided to her before she was fired.

Some speech is not protected under the First Amendment. Generally, the speech of a public employee made in the course of their employment can be regulated by the government employer. Employees' speech outside the scope of their work and regarding public issues, however, is protected by the First Amendment. P will argue that her outspoken criticism of the State law at community and school board meetings was not related to her job duties and therefore is protected. City High may argue that it was related to the job and therefore not protected. A court will likely find her speech protected.

Content-based regulations of speech must meet strict scrutiny; the restriction must be necessary to achieve a compelling government purpose. Content-neutral restrictions must meet intermediate scrutiny; they must be substantially related to and narrowly tailor to achieve an important government purpose. P would need to show that her termination was in relation for her speech, which would constitute a content-based regulation because it is based on her viewpoint. If P can make this showing, the state would have to meet strict scrutiny, and would likely fail. Regardless, P may be able to show that she had a protected liberty interest in her Free Speech rights under the First Amendment.

MATTHEWS BALANCING TEST

If the court recognizes P's liberty interest, it must apply the Matthew balancing test to determine whether she should have been entitled to any additional procedures beyond her pre-termination notice. The court will balance: (1) the private interest affected by the government action, (2) the government's interest including administrative and fiscal burdens, and (3) the risk of erroneous deprivate and the value of additional procedural safeguards.

First, P has a relatively strong private interest in her job. Employment is the way individuals earn money to support themselves. Generally courts have viewed employment interests as quite weighty. Second, the state has an interest in not having to provide a full hearing on this type of probationary termination. The state likely saves a lot of money by not having to develop elaborate procedures to ensure that all of its termination decisions are fair. This interest is therefore quite strong. Finally, P will argue that the risk that she was fired because of her First Amendment rights is high, and that a few additional procedures such as allowing her to present countervailing evidence, or a hearing in front of the school board or committee would allow her to challenge the basis of the decision and force City High to justify their actions, or at least show that the basis of the decision was not to silence her.

The outcome of the Matthews test is difficult to predict. However, a court may require City High to provide at least minimal additional protections such as a post-termination hearing.

2. WHETHER THE COURT SHOULD GRANT THE STATE AND ATTORNEY GENERAL'S MOTION TO DISMISS

STANDING

The State and the Attorney General (AG) filed a motion to dismiss for lack of standing and under the Eleventh Amendment. First, standing is the issue of whether the plaintiff is the proper party to bring the claim before a federal court. The plaintiff must have a concrete stake in the outcome of the litigation. The Court has interpreted Article III's conferral of the judicial power over "cases" and "controversies" to require the plaintiff to show (i) that he has suffered an injury in fact (injury in fact), and (ii) that the defendant's conduct was the cause of that injury such that a favorable court decision will remedy the injury (causation and redressability). The issue for Bob (B) and P is therefore whether they can demonstrate injury in fact, causation and redressability.

First, the requirement that the plaintiff prove an injury in fact is generally satisfied if the plaintiff shows that they suffered an injury that was actionable at common law, such as pecuniary loss. However, the Court has also recognized an injury in fact where the plaintiff's constitutional or statutory rights have been violated. Environmental, aesthetic, and stigmatic injuries are also judicially cognizable. However, when a plaintiff is seeking injunctive relief, he must show that there is a concrete, imminent threat of future injury that is neither conjectural nor speculative. Lyons.

Here, B and P are challenging the State law seeking damages and injunctive relief. They would argue that they have suffered a pecuniary injury because a portion of their salaries was withheld. This is likely sufficient. City High may argue that because their salaries are refunded with interest if they are terminated or complete a certificate program, that there is no real financial loss. B and P, however, will probably succeed in arguing that even a temporary pay cut is a sufficient financial injury. The extent of the injury is generally de minimus. With regard to the injunction, B and P will likely succeed in arguing that they are presently suffering from the financial injury and that will continue in the future; therefore it is sufficiently imminent and concrete. In conclusion, the court should likely find that B and P have shown an injury in fact based on the loss of income, even if temporary. P may have an additional basis for standing by arguing that she was terminated based on protected First Amendment activities. Either would likely be sufficient.

Second, causation and redressability are easily met here. B and P can clearly show that lost earnings are directly caused by the pay withholding required by the statute, and that a court order reimbursing them or enjoining enforcement of the statute would remedy this injury. In conclusion, B and P will likely succeed in showing that they have Article III standing, and therefore the court should deny the State and the AG's motion to dismiss.

ELEVENTH AMENDMENT

The State and the AG also seek dismissal of the suit based on the Eleventh Amendment, which provides that a state is immune from suit in federal court. The Eleventh Amendment is similar, if not identical, to the doctrine of state sovereign immunity, which also applies to suits against states in state court. Alden v. Maine. A state may waive sovereign immunity under certain conditions, and Congress can override state sovereign immunity by statute using its enforcement powers under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. In addition, state officers may be sued in their official capacities to enjoin the enforcement of a state law under Ex Parte Young. A state officer may also be sued in his or her individual capacity for retroactive damages, and may be indemnified by the state. So the question depends on the party being sued and the basis of the claim.

The State may not be sued in federal court under the Eleventh Amendment. The court will therefore dismiss B and P's claims against the state. The AG, however, may be sued in his individual capacity to enjoin him from enforcing the state law being challenged. If B and P's claims allege that the AG is liable for their financial losses, he may also be sued in his individual capacity for money damages. However, B and P do not appear to have alleged that the AG is personally liable, or liable under a theory of respondeat superior; therefore he is likely not a proper party for the individual damages

In conclusion, the court should grant the motion in part. The claims against the State should be dismissed. The claim for injunctive relief should be upheld against the AG, and potentially also the claim for damages if B and P allege that the AG is liable for damages.

Answer B

1. City High's Termination of Paige

14th Amendment--Due Process

The Due Process clause of the 14th Amendment prevents the government from taking a person's life, liberty, or property without first giving them due process of law. The due process clause has been interpreted to have two sets of rights: substantive due process and procedural due process. Substantive due process prevents the government from arbitrarily denying rights. Procedural due process requires notice and a hearing before (or sometimes after) the government takes a person's life, liberty, or property. Here, Paige is claiming that she was deprived of her right to liberty in her freedom of speech and her right to government employment without procedural due process.

In analyzing a procedural due process claim, the court first determines whether a person's life, liberty, or property has been taken from her. Then, the court determines what process, if any, was due before or after the taking of this right. The Supreme Court laid out this analysis in Matthews v. Eldridge. The court balances three factors: (i) the individual's interest in the right at issue, (ii) the government's interest in efficiency, and (iii) the likely added value of additional protective procedures.

Paige's life has not been taken; thus her claim must be that she was deprived of a liberty interest or a property interest.

A person has a liberty interest in being free from being restricted in movement and in being free to engage in constitutional rights. Paige was not restricted in movement, but she may argue that she was restricted from engaging in a 1st Amendment right, the right to free speech. Sometimes the right to free speech intersects with government employment and the right of the government to control its employees. This is the case here because Paige is a government employee, but she also has been engaging in free speech as an outspoken opponent at various community and school board meetings of a State X law that affects teacher pay. Generally, a government employee has a right to free speech on matters not connected with her employment, and any government restriction of this right is subject to strict scrutiny; it will only be upheld if the government action is necessary to achieve a compelling government purpose. This is a very high burden to satisfy and the government will usually lose. Here, Paige was engaged in speech not associated with her employment because she spoke out against a State X law in her individual capacity as a citizen, not as an employee. Thus, a court could find that if her firing was based on her speech (as she was a "highly regarded" probationary teacher) then she was denied her right to liberty without due process. To determine the amount of process that was due, the court will balance the Matthews factors and likely find that she was entitled to a hearing before termination. The right to speech is great and highly regarded in society and a hearing would be likely to remedy the wrongful termination to great process is added. Moreover, the government interest in efficiency would not overcome these other two factors.

Alternatively, Paige will argue that she has a property interest in her employment. For a person to have a property interest, the Supreme Court has explained that the person must have an entitlement to the property. This entitlement must come from something concrete such as a state law. Generally, employment is at will. In other words, either an employee or an employer can terminate a contract at any time without notice and for any reason (except an illegal reason). Such an employee does not have an entitlement to property because there is no promise of future employment. A tenured employee who can only be fired for cause, on the other hand, has an entitlement to continued employment and is entitled to notice and a hearing before her employment is terminated by the government.

Here, Paige was a probationary teacher at City High, a public school. As a probationary teacher, she could be terminated for any reason upon written notice within the first year of employment. While still in this probationary period, City High notified Paige of her termination. City High is a government actor because it is a public school. Thus the only issue is whether Paige had a property interest that could give rise to a right to due process before her termination. A court will likely find that because Paige's employment was essentially at will during the probationary period, she had no right to continued employment. She was not entitled to future employment because as a probationary employee her contract clearly stated that she could be terminated for any reason. Thus, when City High terminated her employment, it did not deny Paige any property interest and no process was due.

If a court were to find that Paige had a property interest in continued employment at City High, then the next step the court would engage in is determining what process is due before the government can lawfully take the person's property.

Here, the individual's interest is great. Employment is an important aspect of a person's life because it is generally a person's greatest (if not their only) source of income. Being deprived of an income can have serious consequences on a person's life as they may be unable to pay their bills, put food on the table, etc. Thus, a person has a strong interest in continued employment. The government too has a strong interest here, though. The government would incur a significant cost by having to hold a hearing every time that it discharges a government employee. This could have a number of negative consequences. For one thing, it may result in ossification in government hiring because the government would be weary of entering into employment contracts if terminating such contracts would require a hearing. It would also place a financial burden on the state as it would have to pay for the procedures necessary for the hearing, which would be due every time the government seeks to fire an employee. Finally, as to the last factor--the value of the added protections to the individual's rights-- a court would likely find this to be relatively little. There are many reasons for which the government may choose to discharge an employee, particularly a probationary employee, and most of these would be legal because employment is presumed at will. Thus, the hearing would probably provide little use, as the government would only need to show that it sought to discontinue the employment relationship.

In conclusion, a court may find that termination of Paige without a hearing violated the procedural due process guarantee of her liberty. However a court is unlikely to find that City High's termination of Paige without a hearing violated the procedural due process guarantee of the 14th Amendment on the grounds of denial of a right to property.

2. State's and Attorney General's motion

The State and the Attorney General have moved to dismiss on standing grounds and the 11th Amendment. Each will be handled in turn.

Standing

A plaintiff must have standing to assert a claim in federal court. Standing is a judicial doctrine developed from interpretation of Article III of the United States Constitution, which requires that courts can only hear "cases and controversies." The Supreme Court has interpreted this to mean that courts cannot give advisory opinions. For a case or controversy to exist, the plaintiff must have an injury in fact, caused by the action which the plaintiff is challenging, and the injury must be capable of being remedied by a judgment in his favor. An injury in fact occurs when a plaintiff has a concrete stake in the litigation that is not generally held by all other people. The injury is typically an economic injury, but need not necessarily be.

Here, Bob has standing because he can show injury in fact, causation and redressability. He is a teacher at a school that withholds 10% of his salary each period. This injury was caused by the State X legislation which Bob is challenging and it will be redressed by a judgment in his favor because such a judgment would rescind the legislation resulting in Bob receiving his full salary.

Paige too has standing. She can show injury in fact because she lost her job so she lost the income stream associated with that job. This job loss was caused by the fact that City High terminated her employment. And this injury can be redressed by an injunction requiring City High to rehire her and damages for her lost wages.

11th Amendment

The 11th Amendment to the United States Constitution has been interpreted by the U.S. Supreme Court to provide state governments with immunity from suit by private citizens or foreign countries suing in federal court. There are a number of exceptions to the 11th Amendment's bar on private individual suits against the State, including when the State waives its sovereign immunity, and when Congress authorizes suit within its 14th Amendment powers. Moreover, even though the 11th Amendment bars federal courts from hearing suits brought by individuals against States, it does not prevent courts from hearing cases brought by individuals against State officers in their individual capacity or in their official capacity. However, the Amendment does bar suits brought against State officers in their official capacity if the suit seeks damages to be paid out of the State's treasury.

Suit Against the State

Here, the suit against State X will be prohibited by the 11th Amendment. This is a suit by private individuals, Bob and Paige, against a State, State X, brought in federal court. As such, it falls within the 11th Amendment's immunity. Moreover, there is no evidence that the State has waived its sovereign immunity. Nor is there any evidence that Congress has abrogated sovereign immunity in accordance with its 14th Amendment powers for cases brought by teachers against the State for termination or withholding of wages. Thus, the case against State X should be dismissed.

Suit Against the Attorney General

Bob and Paige have also named the Attorney General of State X in their suit. Whether this claim will be barred by 11th Amendment sovereign immunity will depend on whether Bob and Paige are suing the Attorney General in his individual capacity or his official capacity. If they are suing him as an individual, the suit, both for injunctive relief and damages, will not be barred and the Attorney General's motion to dismiss will be denied. The reason is that the 11th Amendment does not protect officials from suit in their individual capacity.

If Bob and Paige have sued the Attorney General in his official capacity, the 11th Amendment will have different effects on the suit for an injunction than on the suit for damages. The suit for an injunction will not be dismissed under the 11th Amendment because it does not prevent individuals from suing officials for injunctive relief. The 11th Amendment will, however, bar the suit if the suit is for damages to be taken out of the State's coffers. Such a suit is barred by the 11th Amendment and the Attorney General's motion to dismiss should therefore be granted.

Q5 Community Property

In 2003, while planning their wedding, Harry and Wanda, a California couple, spent weeks discussing how they could each own and control their respective salaries. Sometime before their wedding, they prepared a document in which they stated, “After we marry, Wanda’s salary is her property and Harry’s salary is his property.” At the same time, they prepared a separate document in which they stated, “We agree we do not need legal advice.” They signed and dated each document. They subsequently married.

In 2004, Harry used his salary to buy a condominium and took title in his name alone. Harry and Wanda moved into the condominium.

In 2005, Harry and Wanda opened a joint savings account at their local bank. Each year thereafter, they each deposited $5,000 from their salaries into the account.

In 2015, Harry discovered that Wanda used money from their joint account to buy rental property and take title in her name alone.

In 2016, Harry and Wanda permanently separated and Wanda moved out of the condominium. Wanda thereafter required emergency surgery for a medical condition, resulting in a hospital bill of $50,000. Harry later filed a petition for dissolution of marriage.

What are Harry’s and Wanda’s rights and liabilities, if any, regarding:

1. The condominium? Discuss.

2. The joint savings account? Discuss.

3. The rental property? Discuss.

4. The hospital bill? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

Answer A

Community Property and Separate Property

California is a community property (CP) state. Property acquired during a valid marriage while domiciled in CA is presumed to be CP. Property acquired before marriage or after permanent separation is presumed to be separate property (SP). Property acquired during marriage through gift, bequest, devise or descent is also presumed to be SP. Under the source rule, tracing will be permitted to determine the source of the funds, and therefore the character of the asset as CP or SP. Upon divorce, CP will be divided equally in kind unless some special rule requires deviation from this equal division, or the spouses agree otherwise in writing or orally in open court.

Prenuptial Agreement

Spouses may deviate from the community property presumption by agreeing that their salaries, for instance, which normally would be a product of community labor during the marriage and thus CP, be SP. They may do so before the marriage through a written prenuptial agreement. Prenuptial agreements must be voluntary and not unconscionable. A court will find a prenup to be unconscionable if the terms are unfair, or if a spouse did not know the extent of the other spouse's property before signing the agreement. Additionally, prenuptial agreements must be in writing. A court will find that a prenup is not voluntarily executed if a spouse is not represented by counsel before signing the agreement. In order to rebut the presumption of involuntariness without counsel, the spouse not represented by counsel must be advised to seek the advice of counsel in writing, and must waive that right in writing, and if she does waive that right, she must be allowed 7 days between the presentation of a prenuptial agreement and the signing of it, and she must also write, in a separate writing, that she understands the rights she is giving up, and from whom she received the information regarding what the extent is of her spouse's property.

Here, while planning their wedding, Henry and Wanda, both California residents, spent "weeks" discussing "how they could each own and control their respective salaries." Although it is not clear how long before the wedding this occurred, merely, "sometime before their wedding," they jointly "prepared a document in which they stated, 'After we marry, Wanda's salary is her property and Harry's salary is his property.'" They both signed and dated this document. Simultaneously, they "prepared a separate document in which they stated, 'We agree we do not need legal advice,'" which was also signed and dated by both of them. After doing so, they married.

Formalities of Prenuptial Agreement Not Followed: Voluntariness and Unconscionability

As discussed above, a prenuptial agreement must be in writing. It appears from the facts that Henry and Wanda were attempting to create a prenuptial agreement through the "document" that they prepared "sometime before their wedding" in which they agreed that Wanda's salary is her "[separate] property" and Harry's salary is his "[separate] property." Although couples may choose to contract around the general CP presumption through a prenuptial agreement, they must do so voluntarily and it must not be unconscionable. Because neither spouse was represented by counsel, the agreement is presumed to be involuntary. As stated above, this presumption can be rebutted if the spouses who are not represented by counsel are advised to seek counsel and explicitly waive that in writing. Here, it appears that the couple attempted to waive this right to counsel by stating, "We agree we do not need legal advice." This may be a sufficient writing in a court's opinion to waive the right to counsel. Nonetheless, there is still a problem with voluntariness, here. Even if this right is waived in a signed writing, the unrepresented couple must still be given 7 days with which to mull over the prenuptial agreement.

Either spouse (depending on the asset discussed below) may argue that because they spent "weeks discussing how they could each own and control their respective salaries," this was more than enough to satisfy the 7 day rule. However, because the agreement was signed simultaneously with their waiver of counsel, and there is nothing in the facts to demonstrate that there was a period of 7 days AFTER presentation of the document and signing, given that the facts only state "sometime before their wedding" they prepared a document. If this document was prepared and signed 2 hours before the wedding, this would not be deemed voluntary, and may even be deemed unconscionable by a court given its unfairness.

Additionally, neither spouse executed an additional separate document stating that they understood the rights that they were giving up and that they stated the source where they got information about the other spouse's financial assets and liabilities. Therefore, this prenuptial agreement will not be deemed voluntary. However, it probably will not be deemed unconscionable because it does not appear that the terms were patently unfair, given that both spouses were attempting to transmute their salaries into SP, and it does not appear that either spouse was hiding substantial debts or liabilities or significant assets from the other spouse.

In sum, this prenuptial agreement is not likely effective. This will mean that the analysis below will reflect the fact that earnings during marriage will remain CP for purposes of the analysis. Nonetheless, I will still discuss the possibility that this agreement is valid within each spouse's argument, and how that may arguably alter the characterization of property, below.

What are Harry's and Wanda's rights and liabilities regarding:

1. The Condominium

Title Presumption

Property titled in one spouse's name alone is not presumably SP in CA.

Here, Henry will argue that he took title in the condominium alone, and therefore it is his separate property.

Wanda will argue that this is not conclusive in California, because ownership does not necessarily follow title. Wanda has the stronger argument here. She will argue that the court must trace, using the source rule to determine the character of the condo.

General CP Presumption

Assets acquired during marriage are presumably CP.

Wanda will argue that because the condo was purchased during the marriage, in 2004, it was presumably CP. She will argue that it is irrelevant that the condo was titled in Henry's name alone, because the court can trace.

Tracing: Source Rule

Under the source rule, a court will trace the assets used to purchase a particular property during marriage to determine its character.

Wanda will argue that by tracing, the court will determine that the condo was purchased with Harry's salary during marriage, and therefore it is CP.

Harry will argue that the prenup was valid, in which they agreed that his salary during marriage would be his separate property, and therefore by purchasing the condo with his salary, which is SP, and since SP breeds SP, the condo is also his SP.

Harry's argument will likely fail because, as discussed above, the prenup is likely invalid and therefore the salaries of both spouses earned during marriage will be community property, and therefore by purchasing the condo with CP funds, the condo itself is CP and it is immaterial that it is titled in Henry's name alone.

Transmutation

Spouses may alter the character of property from CP to SP, or from one spouse's SP to the other spouse's SP, or from SP to CP. After the "easy transmutation period" ended, courts now require transmutations to be in writing, and consented to or accepted by the spouse whose property is changing in nature, and the writing must explicitly state that a change in property is occurring.

Harry will argue that a transmutation of the CP condo occurred when he titled it in his sole name. He will argue that this was a gift from the community to his separate property, and that titling it in his own name was sufficient for a transmutation.

Wanda will argue that this was not sufficient for a transmutation because she did not consent to the change of CP to SP and given that she is the adversely affected spouse, her consent or acceptance was required, and that there is also no writing in the title document stating that the property is changing in form from CP to SP. Wanda has the stronger argument here, and the title of the property will not be deemed a transmutation.

Gifts Between Spouses

As a last ditch effort, Harry will argue that the condo was a gift between spouses and therefore was a valid transmutation that did not need to be in writing. An exception to the writing requirement for valid transmutations is when a gift of a personal nature is given from one spouse to another, and that gift is used primarily by the recipient spouse and is not substantial in nature, taking into consideration the financial situation of the couple.

Wanda will argue that a condo is not tangible personal property, and a condo is also substantial in nature, financially, given that they did not come into the marriage with significant amounts of SP, and moreover, the condo was used by both of them because they both "moved into the condominium." Therefore, Harry's argument that the condo was a gift from CP to SP will fail.

Conclusion

The condo is CP because it was purchased with earnings during marriage and the prenup is likely invalid. Therefore, it will be subject to equal division in kind upon divorce and Harry and Wanda will each take 50% of the proceeds from the sale of the house, assuming it is sold.

2. The joint savings account

Jointly Titled Property CP Presumption

In CA, when title to property is taken in joint form, there is a presumption that the character of the property is CP unless in the title document or elsewhere it is stated that a portion or all of the property is to be reserved as an SP ownership interest. In this case, under Lucas, a court will not allow tracing to determine the funds used to purchase a jointly titled home through the source rule and the property will be deemed CP. However, this joint presumption does not apply to bank accounts. With bank accounts, a court will allow jointly titled bank accounts to be traced to determine the source of funds and how it should be characterized.

Tracing

Because both spouses deposited $5,000 each from their salaries during the valid marriage in 2005 into the account, and these salaries were earned during marriage, property earned during marriage through community labor during the economic community is CP. In light of the fact that the prenuptial agreement is likely not valid, both spouse's salaries would be CP, and therefore the court would trace to the source of these funds and determine that the bank account is CP. If, for some reason, the court found that the prenup was valid, and therefore each spouse's salary was SP, then the account would be comprised of $5,000 worth of Wanda's SP and $5,000 worth of Harry's SP. However, this is unlikely.

Conclusion

Presuming that the prenup was invalid, the characterization of the joint savings account would be 100% CP, and therefore should be subject to the equal division in kind rule upon divorce, and whatever is left in the account will be divided equally between the spouses.

3. The rental property

Title Presumption

Property titled in one spouse's name alone is not presumably SP in CA.

Here, Wanda will argue that she took title in the rental property alone, and therefore it is her separate property.

Harry will argue that this is not conclusive in California, because ownership does not necessarily follow title. Henry has the stronger argument here. He will argue that the court must trace, using the source rule to determine the character of the rental property.

General CP Presumption

Assets acquired during marriage are presumably CP.

Harry will argue that because the rental property was purchased during the marriage, in 2015, it was presumably CP. He will argue that it is irrelevant that the rental was titled in Wanda's name alone, because the court can trace.

Tracing: Source Rule

Harry will argue that, by tracing, the court will determine that the rental was purchased with both spouses' salaries during marriage, and therefore it is CP. He will argue that because the funds were taken from the joint savings account, which is conclusively CP if the prenup was invalid, therefore Wanda used CP funds to purchase the rental, and therefore since CP breeds CP, the rental property is also CP.

Wanda will unconvincingly argue that the prenup was valid, in stark contrast to her earlier argument, stating that the couple agreed that her salary during marriage would be her separate property, and therefore by purchasing the rental with her salary, which is SP, and since SP breeds SP, the rental is also her SP.

Wanda's argument will likely fail because, as discussed above, the prenup is likely invalid and therefore the salaries of both spouses earned during marriage will be community property, and therefore by purchasing the rental with CP funds held in the bank account, the rental itself is CP and it is immaterial that it is titled in Wanda's name alone.

Transmutation

Spouses may alter the character of property from CP to SP, or from one spouse's SP to the other spouse's SP, or from SP to CP. After the "easy transmutation period" ended, courts now require transmutations to be in writing, and consented to or accepted by the spouse whose property is changing in nature, and the writing must explicitly state that a change in property is occurring.

Wanda will argue that a transmutation of the CP rental occurred when she titled it in her sole name. She will argue that this was a gift from the community to her separate property, and that titling it in her own name was sufficient for a transmutation.

Harry will argue that this was not sufficient for a transmutation because he did not consent to the change of CP to SP and given that he is the adversely affected spouse, his consent or acceptance was required, and that there is also no writing in the title document stating that the property is changing in form from CP to SP. Harry has the stronger argument here, and the title of the property will not be deemed a transmutation.

Gifts Between Spouses

Finally, Wanda will argue that the rental was a gift between spouses and therefore was a valid transmutation that did not need to be in writing. An exception to the writing requirement for valid transmutations is when a gift of a personal nature is given from one spouse to another, and that gift is used primarily by the recipient spouse and is not substantial in nature, taking into consideration the financial situation of the couple.

Harry will argue that a rental property is not tangible personal property, and a rental property is also substantial in nature, financially, given that they did not come into the marriage with significant amounts of SP.

Wanda will counter that she, alone, was using the rental property, and therefore that property and any income, profits, or rents derived from it should be her SP because it was used primarily by her. This argument will fail because it is not an item of tangible personal property and thus was not an exception to the transmutation in writing rule.

Wanda's argument that the rental was a gift from CP to SP will fail.

Rents, Issues and Profits

The rents, issues, and profits of CP will be CP, and the rents, issues, and profits of SP will be SP.

Because the rental property is CP, any rental income that Wanda derives by renting it out (the facts are silent about whether she has a tenant) will be CP, and therefore will be subject to the equal division in kind rule. Half of rents must be therefore shared with Harry.

Equal Management and Control

Each spouse has equal ability to manage and control CP. However, this is subject to certain limitations. For instance, a spouse may not sell or encumber personal property in the home or CP clothing belonging to either spouse or children without consent of the other spouse.

Gifts of CP

Moreover, spouses may not make gifts of CP without the written consent of the other spouse. A spouse may void the gift upon finding out about it.

Harry will argue that he did not consent to Wanda sneaking off and using money from their joint savings account to purchase the rental property and take title in her name alone. He will argue therefore that he should be allowed to void this transaction within one year of finding out about it. He will also argue that he can void this transaction because Wanda disposed of the CP without his written consent.

Wanda will argue that because she has equal management and control of the property, she does not need his consent to purchase a rental property with money from their joint savings account because she has a community interest in both of their salaries, and therefore can do what she wants with the money given that she had equal withdrawal rights on the bank account. She will also argue that this was not a "gift" of CP because she got her substantial benefit of the bargain from it: namely, a rental in exchange for the funds.

Wanda, unfortunately, likely has the stronger argument here, and she did not need Harry's consent before purchasing the rental and he likely cannot void it and cause the seller to return any of the purchase price despite finding out about the sale/purchase within one year.

Breach of Fiduciary Duty

Spouses owe each other fiduciary duties similar to those of business partners. They owe each other the highest duty of good faith and to avoid self-dealing.

Harry will argue that Wanda breached her fiduciary duty to him as a spouse by going behind his back and taking their joint CP funds and buying a rental and titling it in her own name without his knowledge. He will argue that this breaches her duty of loyalty to him and that this act was not in good faith.

Harry likely has a strong argument here, and he may also argue that this lack of good faith should cause the court to deviate from the equal division in kind rule.

Conclusion

The rental is CP because it was purchased with earnings during marriage, which were held in the bank account which is CP, given that the prenup is likely invalid. Therefore, it will be subject to equal division in kind upon divorce and Harry and Wanda will each take 50% of the proceeds from the sale of the rental, assuming it is sold, and assuming the court does not find justification for deviating from this, in light of Wanda's lack of good faith and fair dealing when going behind Harry's back to purchase the rental.

4. The hospital bill

End of the Economic Community: Permanent Separation

The economic community begins during marriage, and ends upon permanent separation. Permanent separation is understood through physical separation plus an intent not to resume the marital relationship.

Separate Debts of Spouses

Debts acquired after permanent separation are SP and the debtor spouse will be liable to his creditors for such debt incurred.

Here, Harry will argue permanent separation occurred in 2016 per the facts when "Wanda moved out of the condo" demonstrating an intent to not resume the marital relationship, and therefore the hospital bill incurred is her SP and only she will be liable for it because the economic community had ended.

Wanda will argue that Harry had not yet evidenced an intent not to continue the marital relationship because he only filed for divorce after her surgery and therefore the economic community was still intact, and thus the debt is CP to be shared between both of them.

Harry has the stronger argument, because per the facts, Harry and Wanda had "permanently separated" prior to the surgery.

Necessaries of Life

Despite the general rule that debts incurred post-separation are the SP debt of the debtor spouse and that spouse only will be liable for that debt to creditors, there is an exception for the "necessaries of life" and debts incurred on their behalf post-separation but before divorce, because of the duty spouses owe to each other to take care of each other during marriage.

Wanda will argue that her surgery was an "emergency surgery for a medical condition," and therefore was a necessary of life similar to food and water. Harry will have a difficult time countering this, because a court is likely to hold that this is a necessary.

Therefore, despite Wanda being the debtor spouse, if she does not have sufficient SP to pay for the $50,000 hospital bill, the hospital can attach to the CP of either spouse, and Harry may also be required to pay for the debt using his SP, because of the duty owed to take care of one's spouse prior to divorce, even after separation for necessaries of life.

Conclusion

In sum, the condo is CP and subject to equal division, the bank account is CP and subject to equal division, the rental property is CP and subject to equal division unless the court finds that it should deviate from this rule because of Wanda's breach of her fiduciary duty, and the hospital bill, despite being Wanda's separate debt, is a necessary of life which Harry may be required to pay for with CP and/or his SP.

Answer B

Harry and Wanda's Rights and Liabilities

California is a community property state. In a community property state, the marital economic community begins on the formation of a valid marriage, and ends with the death of a spouse, divorce, or permanent physical separation with intent of one spouse not to resume marital relations. Property, earnings, and debt acquired during the marriage is presumed to be community property. Property acquired by either spouse before the marriage, or at any time via gift, devise, or inheritance, is presumed to be separate property. Property acquired by the couple while living in a non-community property state, if it would be considered community property if acquired in California, is considered quasi-community property upon death of a spouse or divorce.

Valid Marriage

A valid marriage requires mutual consent, sufficient age (at least 18 years old) and legal capacity, and formalities, including a license and solemnization. Here, though the facts do not specify the details of Harry and Wanda's marriage, we can assume for the purposes of this question that they were validly married.

A valid marriage ends upon the death of a spouse, divorce, or physical separation of the spouses with intent of one spouse (or both) not to resume the marital relationship. Here, Harry and Wanda permanently separated and Wanda moved out of the condominium where they had been living together in 2016. Harry also filed a petition for dissolution of the marriage. These actions--the physical separation of the two and the petition for dissolution--indicate that the spouses intended to permanently separate and not resume the marital relationship in 2016.

Premarital Agreements

Before analyzing Harry and Wanda's rights and liabilities in specific pieces of property, we first must determine whether their premarital agreement is valid and effective. A premarital agreement may alter the couple's ownership status in property if it is valid. To be valid, a premarital agreement must be in writing and signed by both couples, though there does not need to be valid consideration exchanged. Additionally, the proponent of the premarital agreement (as of 2005) bears the burden of proving that the agreement was neither involuntary nor unconscionable at the time it was executed.

Voluntariness

To prove that the agreement was voluntary, the proponent of the premarital agreement must prove (1) that the other party was represented by independent counsel, or had knowingly waived in a separate, signed writing the rights to separate counsel after being fully informed of the advantages of such separate counsel, (2) that the other party, if not represented by independent counsel, was fully informed of the rights it was giving up, (3) that the agreement was not obtained by fraud, duress, or undue influence by one of the spouses, and (4) other factors that the court may think appropriate and just.

(1) Here, neither party was represented by independent counsel. Though the proponent of the premarital agreement may argue that the parties waived their right to independent counsel by saying, in a separate signed document, "We agree we do not need legal advice," it is not clear that this waiver was valid, because the parties likely were not fully informed of the advantages of obtaining legal counsel. It is possible that they could argue that they were both legally sophisticated--as evidenced by their knowledge that they needed a separate signed document to waive--but in the absence of additional evidence of this sophistication, a court would likely hesitate to enforce the agreement on this basis.

(2) Similarly, it is not clear from the writing signed by the parties--either the agreement or the separate signed writing--that the parties were fully informed of the rights that they were giving up. Unless the proponent can produce evidence that the other party was fully informed, the court may decline to enforce the agreement.

(3) Here, the facts are unclear regarding whether there was fraud, undue influence, or duress. The party seeking to enforce the agreement would bear the burden of showing that these factors did not exist at the time the agreement was signed.

Unconscionability

To prove that the agreement was not unconscionable at the time it was executed, the proponent of the agreement would need to prove that the other party was fully informed of the assets and liabilities of the proponent party, or that the other party had waived such a right to full disclosure of the assets and liabilities of the proponent party, or that the other party actually knew or had reason to know of the assets and liabilities of the proponent party. In the absence of facts speaking to such disclosure, we assume that the agreement was not unconscionable for the purposes of this analysis.

Transmutation

Finally, in order to be a valid transmutation (agreement that changes the status of ownership of property), a premarital agreement or other agreement must expressly declare the intent of the parties--particularly the adversely affected spouse--to change the ownership status of property.

The spouse aiming to defeat the premarital agreement will argue that saying that "Wanda's[/Harry's] salary is her[/his] property" is insufficiently clear to demonstrate intent to make the property separate property because it does not use the word "separate." However, the other spouse will argue that the intent is clear. Since the earnings acquired during marriage would otherwise be community property, saying that it would be the earning spouse's property is sufficient to demonstrate the parties' intent to make it separate property. The court would likely agree with the latter argument, since the intent to change the ownership status is clear.

Ultimately, however, since there was no independent legal counsel and the parties were likely not fully informed of the rights they were giving up, the party opposing the premarital arrangement will likely be able to prevent it from being enforced on the basis that it was not voluntarily signed.

The Condominium

Source of Funds and Time of Purchase

Property acquired during marriage from community property funds is presumed to be community property. This presumption holds true even if the spouse takes title in his or her name alone. The general community property presumption may be rebutted by a preponderance of the evidence.

Here, Harry used his salary to buy a condominium in 2004. The condominium was purchased after the marriage, using Harry's salary. Assuming that Wanda were able to defeat the premarital agreement and prevent it from being enforced, Harry's salary earned during the marriage would be community property. As a result, property purchased with this salary, as the condominium was, would be community property.

The Community Property Presumption

Harry will argue that the condominium should be his separate property. He may succeed in this argument if he can rebut the community property presumption by a preponderance of the evidence. Harry will argue that his title to the property in his name alone indicates his intent that the property should be his separate property. This alone, however, is not sufficient evidence to rebut the general community property presumption. Harry may also argue that he used separate property funds earned from before the marriage to purchase the condominium in addition to some of his salary after the marriage. Harry may be able to prove that separate property funds were used to purchase the condominium by either directly tracing the funds used in the purchase to a separate property source (by showing that separate property funds were available and that he intended to use them in this purchase) or by indirectly tracing the funds via the exhaustion method (showing that community property funds commingled with separate property funds were exhausted by family expenses such that only separate property funds remained in the account that was used for the purchase). If Harry can succeed in this tracing, it will not change the status of the property, but Harry may be entitled to an equitable right of reimbursement for the separate property funds that he used in purchasing the property (without interest), and he may be entitled to a pro rata share of the property as separate property in proportion to the part of the purchase price paid with separate property funds.

However, in the absence of such evidence--and there is no such evidence suggested by the facts--we assume that Harry's salary referenced in the facts was earned between 2003 and 2004, and that it was thus community property.

The Special Presumptions

Harry may also argue that the Special Presumption of Title should be applied to the property. The Special Presumption of Title states that the property's title and the manner in which it is held is presumed to reflect the status of the property. But this presumption only applies at death, so it is inapplicable.

Instead, the Special Presumption that applies at divorce is the Special Community Property Presumption. This presumption states that any property jointly held by the spouses (as joint tenants or as tenants in common) is presumed to be community property at divorce. Wanda will likely argue that this presumption applies. Harry may attempt to defeat this presumption via clear and convincing evidence, which evidence (after 1984) must include an express statement in writing, demonstrating that the property should be held as separate property. To defeat the presumption, Harry would need to produce in addition to this express statement--and there does not seem to be such a statement referring to the condominium--evidence of the sort discussed three paragraphs above. Again, in the absence of such evidence, Harry would not be able to rebut the community property presumption.

There are no transmutations suggested by the facts (again, assuming that the premarital agreement is unenforceable) that would change the ownership status of this property.

Dispositions

Thus, again assuming that the premarital agreement is unenforceable, the condominium is likely community property.

Upon divorce, the equal division rule applies, and community property is divided evenly between the spouses. Thus, Harry and Wanda are likely each entitled to 50% of the value of the condominium.

The Joint Savings Account

The joint savings account was created in 2005. Both Harry and Wanda deposited $5,000 from their salaries into the account. These deposits of $10,000 a year over the course of 10 years would likely amount to $100,000, plus whatever interest the account has earned in that time. This $100,000 stemmed from Harry and Wanda's salaries. Again assuming that the salaries were community property, because they were earned during the marriage and the premarital arrangement is likely unenforceable, this bank account and the $100,000 it contains is community property.

At divorce, the special community property presumption applies (see rule above). Since the bank account is held in both of their names--it is a joint account--it is presumed to be community property, and the income earned on the account is also presumed to be community property.

There is no transmutation affecting this joint account.

At divorce, community property is divided equally between the spouses. Thus, not addressing for the moment the funds removed from the account to pay for the rental property, which will be addressed below, Harry and Wanda are each entitled to 50% of the account. This would be $50,000 (plus half of the interest) to Harry, and $50,000 (plus half of the interest) to Wanda.

The Rental Property

The rental property was purchased by Wanda in 2015, during the marriage. Wanda used funds from the joint account to purchase the property. Assuming that the funds in the joint account were community property, this would make the rental property presumptively community property, as it was acquired during the marriage with community property funds.

Wanda will argue that the rental property was held in her name and that it should thus be separate property. However, this is not enough to rebut the community property presumption. Additionally, the special presumption of title does not apply at divorce, only at death. So, unless she were able to enforce the premarital agreement, which she will likely not be able to do, Wanda will not be able to argue that the rental property is her separate property.

Spouses owe each other fiduciary duties. These duties include the duty to inform the spouse of the status of community property and the duty to obtain consent for major decisions affecting the disposition of community property. If a spouse violates his or her fiduciary duty to the other spouse, as a remedy, the other spouse may have his or her name added to the title of the affected property, the spouse may be entitled to a larger share of the community property, or, if the property was fraudulently concealed, the innocent spouse may request that the court order the other spouse to forfeit the property entirely to the innocent spouse.

Here, assuming the joint account was community property funds, Wanda may have breached her duty to obtain consent for major decisions. She did not notify Harry about using money from their joint account to purchase the rental property, and she took title in her name alone. It is possible that she also intended to keep the proceeds from this rental property, which would be community property themselves, for herself, which would be a violation of the duty of loyalty and highest good faith owed to her spouse. Since there is insufficient evidence of fraudulent concealment of this property, the court is not likely to order that Wanda forfeit the property entirely, but the court may award Harry a larger share of the community property as a result of Wanda's breach.

The rental property is thus community property. At divorce, it will be divided evenly between the two spouses, with Harry receiving a larger share as the court deems just due to Wanda's breach of her fiduciary duties.

The Hospital Bill

Debts of spouses acquired after permanent physical separation are generally the liabilities of the debtor spouse, with that spouse being responsible for the debt payment after divorce. However, even after separation, both the debtor and the non-debtor spouse may be personally liable for payments for the necessities of life of either spouse.

The court may divide liability for such debts according to each spouse's ability to pay.

The hospital bill was for an emergency surgery. Such an emergency surgery is a necessity of life, and, as such, both Wanda and Harry will be personally liable. Harry may have an equitable right of reimbursement for any of his funds used in payment for the hospital bill, however, if he can show that Wanda had separate property funds available at the time the hospital bill was paid.

At divorce, either Harry or Wanda may be personally liable for the hospital bill. Assuming that Wanda's $50,000 share of the joint account is still intact, she may have had funds available for the payment herself. If this is true, Harry may be entitled to an equitable right of reimbursement for his own funds used to pay the hospital bill. Any funds that he used that made up for funds that Wanda did not have available will not be reimbursed to Harry.

Q6 Professional Responsibility

Len, an attorney, is a member of Equal Ownership Inc. (Equal), a nonprofit organization that seeks to help low-income families purchase homes throughout the state. Len does not represent Equal as an attorney. Equal helped to get a statute enacted that requires that all new residential developments contain a certain percentage of low-income housing.

ABC Development Corp. (ABC) is a corporation that wants to challenge the statute. Pat, the President of ABC, asked Len to represent ABC and Len agreed. Len does not personally agree with ABC's objective, but moves forward with the representation nonetheless by filing a complaint challenging the statute. Len personally thinks the statute is a good law and secretly hopes that ABC is not successful in its lawsuit.

During the course of Len's representation of ABC, Pat informs Len that he (Pat) has filed false reports with the State Environmental Protection Agency regarding the disposal of non-hazardous waste, and is planning to file another false report next month. Filing a false report makes a person and his or her employer liable for a substantial civil fine. Len does not take any action with respect to the impending filing of the false report.

What ethical violations, if any, has Len committed? Discuss.

Answer according to ABA and California authorities.

Answer A

Attorney-Client Relationship

An attorney-client relationship is formed when the client reasonably believes it has been formed. The existence of an attorney-client relationship triggers numerous duties, including the duties of competence, confidentiality, loyalty, and fiduciary duties. Breaching one of these duties is a violation of the Model Rules and California Rules.

Here, ABC has hired Len (L) to represent them in an effort to challenge the residential housing statute. Thus, it is likely that they reasonably believe an attorney-client relationship exists. One has therefore been formed. The duties mentioned above now apply to this relationship, and any breach will be considered an ethical violation.

For similar reasons, L does not have an attorney-client relationship with Equal. Although he has helped them get the housing statute enacted, he does not represent them as an attorney. Thus, we may assume that Equal would not reasonably believe such a relationship existed. Even in the absence of a formal relationship, however, his association with Equal may raise other problems, as discussed below.

Corporation as a Client

An attorney may represent a corporation as a client. The corporation acts through its duly-appointed representatives, usually officers. However, the corporation, not the officers, is the actual client and the attorney must be careful not to provide legal information to the officers in a personal capacity or to mislead them into believing that the attorney represents them personally.

Here, ABC, a corporation, has retained L to handle the representation. This is permissible under both sets of rules. ABC, acting through Pat (P), will likely give L instructions on how to proceed and define what the goals of the representation are. However, L must remember that he represents ABC and not P.

Duty of Loyalty

An attorney owes his clients a duty of loyalty. The duty of loyalty includes the duty to refrain from conflicts of interest. Conflicts of interest take several forms: conflicts personal to the lawyer, conflicts between current clients, and conflicts between current and past clients.

Lawyer-Client Conflict

A lawyer may breach his duty of loyalty by representing a client with interests adverse to his own. This often arises when litigation the attorney is handling is adverse to one of his personal interests. When an attorney has a conflict between his or her personal interests and the interests of the client, under the California Rules he or she must provide the attorney with written disclosure of the interest. The model rules, by contrast, require that the attorney get informed consent from the affected client before continuing with a representation that raises a personal conflict. Further, under the Model Rules, the lawyer must reasonably believe that he will be able to provide competent and diligent representation in the face of the conflict.

Here, under either rule, L has breached his duty of loyalty. L is a member of Equal, an organization that helped to pass the statute his new client, ABC, is now challenging. L has admitted that he thinks the law is valid and that he hopes ABC is not successful in its suit. Under the Model rules, this would be a violation because he cannot reasonably believe he will be able to provide diligent and competent representation in the face of this admission. Further, under the California rules, there is no indication that he has provided written disclosure to ABC of his personal interest. He may argue that ABC only knew about him because of his work with Equal, and thus ABC was necessarily informed of his interest. However, California requires written disclosure, which was not provided. L has breached his duty of loyalty by representing a client in the face of a personal conflict without disclosure and without a reasonable basis for believing he can continue to provide competent and diligent representation.

Client Conflicts

A lawyer may breach his duty of loyalty by representing current clients with interests adverse to one another or by representing a current client whose interests are adverse to a former client.

Current Clients

A lawyer may breach his duty of loyalty by representing current clients whose interests are adverse to other current clients. Under the Model Rules, a lawyer must get informed consent from the adversely affected client and reasonably believe that they can undertake the representation in spite of the conflict. The Model Rules require this consent only for actual conflicts of interest. By contrast, California requires informed consent for either actual or potential conflicts of interest. However, California does not require that the attorney reasonably believe he can prove competent representation in the face of the conflict.

Here, although Equal might argue that there is a client conflict, it is unlikely that L has breached either the model or California rules by agreeing to represent ABC. L was a member of Equal, but there was never an attorney-client relationship between L and Equal. There would therefore be no need to get informed consent from ABC or Equal before pursuing the representation of ABC.

Former Clients

Like a conflict of interest arising from the representation of current conflicting clients, an attorney may likewise breach their duty of loyalty by representing a client with an interest adverse to a former client. In this case, the test under the California rules is generally whether the attorney learned any confidential information in the previous representation which could harm the client.

Here, like above, there is likely no former client conflict because there was no attorney-client relationship with Equal. However, Equal's argument on this front would be stronger--there is a strong possibility that as a lawyer-member of Equal, he learned information about Equal's litigation and lobbying strategies that could be used by ABC to defeat the statute. If he obtained confidential information from Equal, some courts might treat it as an ethical violation to use this information in subsequent litigation against that organization without getting informed consent. However, because there was no actual attorney-client relationship between Equal and L, it's unlikely that he breached his duty of loyalty by not getting Equal's informed consent.

Duty of Competence

An attorney owes a duty of competence to his client. Under both the Model rules and the California rules, this requires that he or she have the requisite knowledge, skill, thoroughness, and preparation necessary to handle the case. If a lawyer is not competent to handle the representation, he must become competent before proceeding, associate with a competent lawyer, or withdraw.

Here, although there is nothing to suggest that L is technically incompetent to represent ABC (he likely has experience in this area of law through his membership in Equal), it is possible that his affiliations and loyalties make it such that he cannot provide competent representation. He has admitted that he secretly hopes ABC is not successful in its lawsuit. This signals that he is biased against his client and therefore might be tempted not to use the requisite knowledge, skill, thoroughness, and preparation the representation deserves. If this is the case, then L will have breached his duty of competence to ABC.

Duty of Confidentiality/Disclosure

An attorney owes a duty of confidentiality to his clients. This requires, under both sets of rules, that they keep any information related to the representation confidential and inviolate. The duty of confidentiality is not absolute, and the Model rules and California rules both have exceptions for disclosure in case of fraud or financial harm (Model rules) or the threat of serious bodily harm or death (both sets of rules).

Here there are two potential issues related to confidentiality: (i) the possibility that L will breach his duty of confidentiality and provide information related to the representation of ABC to Equal, and (ii) whether L has a duty (or permission) to disclose information related to ABC's filing of false reports.

(ii)Threat of Disclosure to Equal

As mentioned above, a lawyer must not disclose any information related to the representation to an outside source.

Here, his close association with Equal, a company whose law he is now attempting to strike down on behalf of ABC, presents a serious risk that he will violate the duty of confidentiality by disclosing information related to ABC's challenge of the law. Although there is no indication that he has yet made such a disclosure, if he does, he will have violated the duty of confidentiality and thus have committed an ethical violation.

(iii)Reporting ABC's False Reports

The Model rules and California rules treat the disclosure of confidential corporate information differently. When an attorney discovers that a corporation has undertaken an unlawful act, such as filing fraudulent documents or committing a criminal act, under both sets of rules an attorney must first report up. Reporting up requires that the attorney take the matter to the most senior member of the corporation. Under the Model Rules, if the executives of the corporation refuse to take action, the lawyer may report out if he believes it is in the best interest of the corporation. This is an exception to the duty of confidentiality and allows the lawyer to report misconduct to an outside agency. California does not permit reporting out for financial crimes. California permits reporting out only when he or she has reason to believe that (i) the client or a third party will commit an act that creates a risk of death or substantial bodily harm, (ii) he or she has remonstrated the client to not take this action, and (iii) the disclosure is reasonably necessary to prevent the harm. Under the California rules, a lawyer may not disclose financial harms, although he may choose to withdraw from the representation.

Here, L has discovered that P has filed false reports with the State EPA regarding the disposal of non-hazardous waste and is planning to file another false report soon. Filing this false report opens the corporation up to a substantial civil fine. As a threshold matter, L should report this matter up the chain of command of the company. However, as it appears that P is the president, it is not apparent who else this could be reported to. Under the Model Rules, since L has exhausted his "reporting up" options, L is permitted to disclose the false report to an outside agency, since this involves a threat of substantial financial harm to the corporation. He may also withdraw from representation. He does not violate the Model Rules by not filing the report, although he may not counsel them on committing this type of fraud.

By contrast, L has no ability to report the fraud under the California rules. California permits reporting outside the corporation only where there is a risk of death or substantial bodily harm. The facts indicate that the waste is non-toxic, and thus it is unlikely that there is any risk of bodily harm. Although L may choose to withdraw from the representation and may not counsel the corporation on filing such documents, he is not required (or allowed) to disclose--to do so would be a breach of the duty of confidentiality.

In short, L's responsibilities in the situation depend on the rules applied. Under either circumstance, he can likely withdraw from the representation since the client is committing fraud. Under the Model Rules, he may, but is not required to disclose the fraud to an outside agency. Under the California rules, he may not disclose the fraud and would be liable for a breach of confidentiality for doing so.

Duty of Candor to the Court

In addition to duties owed to the client, an attorney also owes a duty of candor to the court. As part of an attorney's duty of candor to the court, the lawyer owes a duty not to advance or file frivolous claims under both the California and Model Rules. This requires that they not knowingly put forward a claim that is unsupported by the law, although a good faith argument for modification or reversal is not considered frivolous.

Here, L has filed a claim seeking to invalidate the residential housing statute, a law that he helped pass. He has admitted that he secretly hopes that ABC is not successful in its lawsuit and that the statute is good law. Thus, there is a substantial likelihood that he will violate the duty of candor by filing a suit seeking to invalidate the law. This is because, if the law is valid, then claiming it is not valid without a reasonable basis is considered a frivolous claim. L will argue that he does not know that the law is good law, he just believes it is. Therefore, because he does not know whether the law is good or not, he is not prohibited from putting forth a good faith argument that it should be modified or overturned. Whether this argument succeeds depends on whether or not he believes there is a good faith basis for challenging the law. If he does not, and he proceeds to litigate the claim anyway, he will have violated his duty of candor to the court.

Answer B

DID LEN COMMIT ANY ETHICAL VIOLATIONS IN CHOOSING TO REPRESENT ABC?

Duty of loyalty

A lawyer owes to their client the duty of loyalty. Under the ABA rules, the duty of loyalty requires that a lawyer not take a representation when there is a conflict of interest, unless the lawyer: (1) reasonably believes that his ability to represent the client will not be materially limited by the conflict of interest; and (2) the lawyer discloses the conflict to the client and receives their informed consent to continue with the representation. The California rules are quite similar, except the lawyer only needs to have a good faith subjective belief that his ability to represent the client will not be materially limited by the conflict of interest, and if the conflict is a personal conflict, the lawyer only needs to provide a written disclosure of the conflict in writing to the client. However, if the conflict is not a personal conflict, the client's consent itself, and not just a confirmation of consent, must be in writing.

Conflict of interest #1: Len's membership of Equal Ownership Inc. (Equal)

Did a conflict of interest exist?

Although Len did not represent Equal, a conflict of interest still likely existed because Len was a member of Equal, yet he agreed to represent ABC in its suit to challenge the statute. Equal was the nonprofit organization that helped to get the statute in question enacted. As a member of Equal, Len likely assisted or at the very least approved of and supported Equal in its mission to help get the statute enacted. Now, Len is on the opposite side of the same conflict, seeking to get this same statute struck down.

Accordingly, Len had a conflict of interest due to his membership of Equal and his representation of ABC, as Len was required to essentially fight a statute that was supported by the nonprofit which he was a part of.

Did Len take appropriate steps to represent ABC notwithstanding this conflict?

ABA MODEL RULES

Under the ABA model rules, Len could still represent ABC notwithstanding this conflict if: (1) he reasonably believed his ability to represent ABC would not be materially limited by this conflict; and (2) Len obtained ABC's informed consent in writing. Note that Len was not required to obtain Equal's informed consent, because Len does not represent Equal as an attorney.

Here, Len would argue that Len could reasonably believe he could represent ABC notwithstanding this conflict because even though he was a member of Equal, Len did not necessarily participate in the specific lobbying strategies or otherwise directly work on/contribute to Equal's efforts to enact the statute. Len could argue that though he supported Equal's mission at the time, this past support would not undermine his ability to represent ABC, despite the fact that ABC's objectives sought to tear down this specific statute.

On the other hand, it could be argued that Len's belief was not reasonable. Len was a member of the organization that supported and helped to enact the low-income housing statute. It could be argued that it would not be reasonable for Len to believe he could represent ABC and somehow place his membership of Equal and his support of Equal in an "isolated mental box" in his mind, which would not affect his ability to represent ABC, because the interests directly and squarely conflict with one another.

Overall, Len may very well succeed on his argument that he reasonably believed that this conflict of interest would not have materially limited his ability to represent ABC. Len was only a member of Equal, and the facts do not suggest that Len spearheaded or otherwise was deeply involved with the Equal's work in helping the statute get enacted.

However, despite this fact, Len did not disclose the conflict to ABC at the time he chose to take on the representation. The facts do not suggest that Len told Pat he was a member of Equal, and that Pat consented to the representation notwithstanding this consent. Moreover, even if Len may have told Patrick about it and Patrick consented, such consent was not obtained or otherwise evinced by a writing.

Therefore, Len breached his duty of loyalty under the ABA model rules by improperly accepting a conflicted representation.

CA RULES

Here, Len would argue that he at the very least had a subjective good-faith belief that he could represent ABC notwithstanding his membership of Equal. A court would likely agree with Len, on grounds that as discussed above, while Len was a member of Equal, Len did not represent Equal, nor do the facts indicate that Len was directly or deeply involved with Equal's efforts to enact the statute. Accordingly, regardless of whether this belief was reasonable or not, Len may have had a good faith belief that he could have represented ABC notwithstanding this conflict.

However, Len did not provide a written disclosure of this conflict to ABC in writing. Indeed, this was a personal conflict, as it related to Len's membership with Equal and not some other conflict due to representation of other past or present client. However, under the ABA rules, Len was required to give ABC notice of this conflict and obtain its informed consent in writing. Len did not provide such a disclosure or obtain informed consent.

Therefore, Len breached his duty of loyalty under the ABA model rules by improperly accepting a conflicted representation.

Conflict of interest #2: Len's personal disagreement with ABC's objective

Did a conflict of interest exist?

In addition to being conflicted due to his being a member of Equal, another potential conflict of interest existed because Len did not personally agree with ABC's objective. Len personally thought that the statute was a good law, and secretly hoped that ABC was not successful in its lawsuit. Len's interests therefore directly diverged and conflicted with those of the objectives of his client. Accordingly, a conflict of interest also existed as regards Len's personal sentiments as to the merits of ABC's lawsuit, which Len was working on.

Did Len take the appropriate steps to accept the representation notwithstanding the conflict of interest?

ABA MODEL RULES

Len would argue that he reasonably believed that he could still represent ABC despite the fact that he did not personally agree with ABC's objectives, and believed that the statute was good law. He would argue that it is common for lawyers to personally disagree with their client's positions, but for them to nonetheless do the work as required and necessary to further their interests in the current matter.

However, it could be argued that Len's belief was not reasonable. Len's beliefs directly and completely diverged from that of his client's objectives. Such a strong, powerful belief, which even led Len to secretly hope that ABC was not successful in its lawsuit, would have inevitably affected Len's ability to represent ABC fully and to his utmost ability. Accordingly, it could be argued that due to the divergent disparity between his beliefs, and the objectives of his client, which even led him to essentially root for his client's failure, Len could not have reasonably believed he could represent ABC despite his personal beliefs.

A court would likely find that Len's belief that he could represent ABC effectively notwithstanding his personal beliefs was likely to be unreasonable. While it is common for a lawyer to disagree to an extent with the client's objectives, here Len was completely against them. The severity of his belief, and the likelihood of his personal sentiments materially impairing his ability to represent ABC is strongly evinced by the fact that he was rooting against his own client's victory.

Moreover, as discussed above, Len did not disclose such a conflict in writing to ABC, nor did Len obtain their informed consent.

Therefore, Len breached his duty of loyalty in accepting this representation with a conflict of interest.

CA RULES

Indeed, it is still possible that Len had a good faith subjective belief that he could represent ABC notwithstanding his strong feelings against their objective. However, as discussed above, Len did not disclose the nature of the conflict in writing.

Therefore, Len breached his duty of loyalty under the CA rules in accepting the representation with a conflict of interest.

Duty of competence

The duty of competence requires that a lawyer pursue a representation with the knowledge, skill, prudence, and effort that is reasonably required for the representation. Under the California rules, the lawyer only violates his duty of competence if he intentionally, recklessly, or repeatedly commits ethical violations.

ABA MODEL RULES

Under the ABA Model Rules, it could be argued that Len violated his duty of competence in choosing to represent ABC notwithstanding such a conflict. A lawyer acting with appropriate knowledge and skill would have been aware that Len faced multiple conflicts of interest, and should not have taken on the representation. A lawyer acting with sufficient prudence would have been aware of the risks that his ability to represent the client would have been limited, and that he would be subject to discipline for taking on such representation. On the other hand, it may be argued that even a lawyer with appropriate knowledge, skill, and effort would have taken on this representation, as they would have had sufficient knowledge and skill to further ABC's interests notwithstanding the conflict of interest.

Under the ABA Rules, it is likely that Len breached his duty of competence. He did not act with the proper prudence in representing ABC, given the conflicts of interests that had existed.

CA RULES

Under the CA Rules, it is possible that Len did not violate his duty of competence. Len may have failed to act without prudence in accepting such a conflicted representation, but the facts do not suggest that Len had intentionally acted or even recklessly acted incompetently. Rather, he may have merely been negligent in taking on this representation, and this would not have been sufficient to support a finding of a breach of the duty of competence in California.

Conclusion

Len may have violated his duty of competence under the ABA model rules, but likely did not violate the CA rules.

DID LEN COMMIT ANY ETHICAL VIOLATIONS IN FILING THE COMPLAINT ON BEHALF OF ABC?

Duty to avoid filing frivolous lawsuits with the court

A lawyer has a duty to the courts and the judicial system to refrain from filing frivolous lawsuits with the court. A lawsuit is frivolous if the suit as filed was not warranted by the current law, or by a good-faith argument for a change in the law.

Here, Len personally thought that the statute is a good law. Yet, he still filed the lawsuit challenging the suit. Thus, it could be argued that Len breached his duty to the courts to avoid frivolous lawsuits, as he filed the suit without a good-faith belief that the suit was warranted by existing law or by a good-faith argument for a change in the law. However, it could also be argued that Len did not breach this duty because while Len may have personally believed the statute is good law, there is a possibility that other precedent and jurisprudence would have provided a good argument to strike it down.

It is likely that a court will find that Len did not breach this duty to the court. The facts indicate that Len personally thought that the statute was a good law. The statute was not necessarily founded on solid principles and immune from attack on other legal grounds. Thus, though Len personally disagreed with the filing of the complaint, there are insufficient facts to establish that it was frivolous to do so.

DID LEN COMMIT ANY ETHICAL VIOLATIONS FOR HIS FAILURE TO TAKE ACTION WITH RESPECT TO THE IMPENDING FILING OF THE FALSE REPORT?

Duty to protect the interests of the corporate client

When the lawyer represents a corporate client, the lawyer owes a duty to act in the corporate client's best interests. The duty to corporate clients provides that if the lawyer learns that the corporation, or one of its agents or employees, were to commit an act of wrongdoing or other act that would be harmful to the corporation's interests, or be imputed to the corporation to expose it to liability, the lawyer has a duty to report such information to the highest authority in the corporation, such as the corporation's CEO or Head of Counsel. If such reporting is not possible, or would not be effective at preventing the harm, under the ABA model rules, the lawyer may report the information to an outside authority to avoid harm to the corporation. In California, however, although internal reporting is still required, reporting to an outside organization is not permitted except when necessary to comply with the requirements of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act.

Len may have breached his duty to the corporation under the ABA and California model rules. Here, Len found out that Pat had filed false reports with the State Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), and that Pat is planning to file another false report next month. Len was also aware that filing a false report makes a person or his or her employer liable for a substantial civil fine. Accordingly, Len was aware that one of the employees of his client (ABC), had taken actions, and was going to take actions, that could both be imputed to the corporation, AND would expose the corporation to liability. Therefore, Len was required to "run the information up the corporate flagpole."

The facts do not indicate whether Pat was the highest authority in ABC or not. Indeed, Pat was ABC's president. However, it is possible that there were other corporate officers (i.e., a CEO or something) or directors that were higher up on the "corporate flagpole" than Pat. If there were such individuals available, Len was required to inform them of Pat's actions to avoid having civil liability imputed to his client, ABC, and his client being subject to potential civil liability by having to pay a fine. Assuming that there were other individuals who were higher up than Pat on the corporate flagpole, Len may have violated his duty to protect the corporation's interests in failing to take any action with respect to the impending filing of the false report.

Note that under the ABA Model rules that if, however, Pat was the highest authority at ABC, Len was permitted, but not required to disclose the information regarding the false report to the State Environmental Agency. Len was not mandated to disclose, but only was permitted to do so. Accordingly, under these circumstances, because Len did not have an affirmative duty to disclose, but only had the right and the privilege to disclose to an outside authority, Len did not breach his duty to protect the corporation's interests by failing to report the false reports to the State EPA.

Conclusion

Therefore, Len may have breached his duty to protect the interests of his corporate client under the ABA and California rules, depending on whether there were other individuals on the "corporate flagpole" that Len could have reported this information to in order to protect the corporation from having liability imputed onto it by an action of one of its employees.

Duty of confidentiality - was disclosure required or permitted in these circumstances?

Because Len was not required to disclose the information to the State EPA due to his duties to protect the interests of his corporate client, the only other means by which Len may be disciplined is if he was required to make such a disclosure and breach his duty of confidentiality.

A lawyer owes to his clients a duty of confidentiality. The duty of confidentiality requires that a lawyer may not disclose or reveal any information that the lawyer receives as part of the representation. The duty of confidentiality continues even after the representation has ended, and even after the death of the client.

Under the ABA model rules, the lawyer is permitted to reveal confidential information from the client in the following circumstances: (1) Where necessary to avoid serious bodily injury or death to others; (2) Where necessary to avoid or ameliorate financial injury to others that was a result of crime or fraud that was accomplished with the lawyer's services; (3) Where reasonably necessary to further the representation; and (4) Where reasonably necessary to comply with other ethics obligations, such as the disclosure of limited client information for conflicts checks. In California, however, the lawyer is only permitted to disclose confidential information to avoid physical injury or death to others, and if reasonable, before disclosure, the lawyer must first: (1) reason with the client and attempt to persuade him not to follow through with his acts AND (2) tell the client of his intent to disclose.

Avoid serious bodily injury or death

Here, Pat had filed false reports with the State EPA regarding the disposal of non-hazardous waste. While ABC may have been improperly disposing waste, such waste was non-hazardous. Therefore, it is likely that the disclosure of this confidential information was not reasonably necessary to avoid serious bodily injury or harm, as the waste was not hazardous waste.

Moreover, even if the waste was hazardous, the lawyer's duty to disclose was permissive, and not mandatory. Accordingly, Len did not breach his duty of confidentiality under either the ABA or CA rules, as this exception was not applicable, and Len was permitted, but not required to provide such disclosure.

Avoid financial injury to others due to crime/fraud procured through use of lawyer's services

Here, Len's representation concerned challenging the low-income housing statute. However, Pat's statements to Len were completely unrelated to the scope of his representation and provision of legal services, as Pat's false reports were related to the disposal of non-hazardous waste, and false reports in connection with such disposal to the EPA.

Though the disposal of non-hazardous waste may have harmed other individuals' financial interests, as the non-hazardous waste may have caused damage to others' property, such harm was not procured using Pat's legal services. Moreover, as with the duty to disclose information to prevent physical injury or death, the duty to disclose to avoid financial injury is also permissive, rather than mandatory.

Therefore, even if this rule was applicable, Pat did not violate any duty in failing to report or disclose this information, as his duty to disclose was permissive, not mandatory. Note, moreover, that California does not have this exception.

Conclusion

Len was not required to disclose the information regarding the filing of the false report in the present case. Although he may have been permitted to do so under two exceptions to the duty of confidentiality under the ABA Model Rules, Len was not required to do so.

ESSAY EXAMINATION INSTRUCTIONS

Your answer should demonstrate your ability to analyze the facts in the question, to tell the difference between material facts and immaterial facts, and to discern the points of law and fact upon which the case turns. Your answer should show that you know and understand the pertinent principles and theories of law, their qualifications and limitations, and their relationships to each other.

Your answer should evidence your ability to apply the law to the given facts and to reason in a logical, lawyer-like manner from the premises you adopt to a sound conclusion. Do not merely show that you remember legal principles. Instead, try to demonstrate your proficiency in using and applying them.

If your answer contains only a statement of your conclusions, you will receive little credit. State fully the reasons that support your conclusions, and discuss all points thoroughly.

Your answer should be complete, but you should not volunteer information or discuss legal doctrines that are not pertinent to the solution of the problem.

Unless a question expressly asks you to use California law, you should answer according to legal theories and principles of general application.

Q1 Trusts

Wendy, a widow, owned a house in the city and a ranch in the country. She created a valid inter vivos trust, naming herself and her daughter, Dot, as co-trustees, and providing that she had the power to revoke or amend the trust at any time in writing, by a document signed by her and delivered to her and Dot as co-trustees. At Wendy's death, Dot was to become the sole trustee, and was directed to hold the assets in trust for the benefit of Wendy's sister, Sis, until Sis's death. At Sis's death, the trust was to terminate and all assets be distributed to Dot. The sole asset in the trust was Wendy's ranch.

Years later, Wendy prepared a valid will in which she stated, "I hereby revoke the trust I previously established, and leave my house and my ranch to my son, Sam, as trustee, to be held in trust for the benefit of my brother, Bob. Five years after my death the trust shall terminate, and all assets then remaining in the trust shall be distributed outright to Sam."

Wendy died. Following her death, both Dot and Sam were surprised to find her will.

Dot has refused to serve as trustee under the inter vivos trust, and claims that, as a result, the trust fails and that the ranch should immediately be given to her.

Sam has agreed to serve as trustee under the testamentary trust, and claims that the ranch is part of the trust. Sam then sells the house, at fair market price, to himself in his individual capacity, and invests all the assets of the trust into his new business, Sam's Solar. Bob objects to sale of the house and to Sam's investment.

1. What interests, if any, do Dot, Sam, and/or Bob have in the house and the ranch? Discuss.

2. What duties, if any, has Sam violated as trustee of the testamentary trust, and what remedies, if any, does Bob have against him? Discuss.

Answer A

1. What interests held?

Dot

Valid trust

A valid trust is created when a settlor has the intent to give property (res) to the beneficiary in a bifurcated transfer. The settlor gives the res to the trustee, who has legal title, to hold for the benefit of the beneficiary, who holds equitable title. The trust need not be in writing unless required to by the statute of frauds, for example transferring an interest in land. The beneficiary need be ascertained but the trustee does not have to be. The trust can be revocable or irrevocable and it is presumed irrevocable unless otherwise stated.

Here, Wendy created a trust which had an ascertained beneficiary, her sister, and named herself and her daughter, Dot, as trustees. The res is the ranch. She further explicitly stated in the trust that it is revocable. The facts further state that the trust is a valid inter vivos trust.

Revocation/Termination of trust

A trust can be revoked if the settlor is alive and has explicitly reserved the right to revoke the trust. Otherwise it can only be terminated if the material purposes of the trust have been fulfilled.

Here, Wendy explicitly reserved the right to revoke the trust. She further explicitly stated the way in which the trust must be revoked. She stated that the trust can be revoked or amended "at any time in writing, by a document signed by her and delivered to her and Dot as co-trustees." Wendy later executed a valid will explicitly revoking the trust. This satisfies the writing requirement. It can be assumed that the will was "delivered" to Wendy because it was found at her death. However, the will was not delivered to Dot. Dot and Sam were both surprised to find the will at Wendy's death and it seems were surprised by its contents as well. It seems Wendy never gave Dot any other writing indicating the revocation of the trust or informed her verbally. Since Dot was not delivered a writing revoking the trust, and since that was one of the explicit conditions upon which the trust could be revoked, the trust was not properly revoked by the will. Therefore, the trust is still valid and still contains the ranch property.

Appointing a Trustee

A trust will fail if it does not have an ascertained beneficiary or if it does not have any property currently in it, except for a pour-over trust. However, the trust will not fail if a trustee has not been named or if a trustee either refuses to serve or needs to be removed by the beneficiaries or the Court. The Court will appoint a trustee, or the beneficiaries may vote on a trustee.

Here, Dot claims that she will refuse to serve as trustee and as a result the trust will fail. This is not the case. Instead, the court will appoint a trustee to hold the res for the benefit of Sis. Alternatively, Sis may argue that she should be allowed to vote for who will be appointed trustee and the court may allow that as an alternative. Either way the trust will not fail.

Remainder Interest

A remainder is a future interest that vests upon the termination of a life estate. It is vested if the beneficiary is ascertained and there are no conditions precedent.

Here, the trust states that the res is to be used for the benefit of Sis until her death. Upon the death of Sis all assets will be distributed to Dot. Dot is ascertained and there are no conditions precedent to her taking; she will take immediately upon the death of

Sis. Therefore, Dot has a vested remainder interest in the trust property. Dot will receive the trust property upon the death of Sis, but not before. Therefore, Dot does not have any present possessory interest in the trust property but does have a future interest as a remainder.

Sam

Valid Will

A formal valid will is created when there is a writing that is signed by the testator and indicates present testamentary intent (intended this document to be her will) and is witnessed by two witnesses who sign the document as well.

Here there are no facts as to whether or not witnesses signed but the facts do say that Wendy prepared a valid will, therefore it can be assumed. Further it was in writing and establishes present testamentary intent as it contemplates her death.

Pour-Over Trust

A trust can be created by the language of the will. Therefore, the property is held in trust upon the death of the testator instead of being distributed through probate.

Here, Wendy created a pour-over trust when, in her will, she wrote that she leaves her house and her ranch to her son Sam "as trustee, to be held for the benefit of my brother, Bob." The will further states that five years after her death the trust shall terminate and the remaining assets will be distributed to Sam.

Specific Devise/ Res of the pour-over trust

A specific devise is a devise of property that can be distinguished from the other assets of the estate.

Here, Wendy left her house to Sam as trustee to be held for the benefit of Bob. Although Wendy also indicated that she wished to leave her ranch as well, the will did not properly revoke the prior trust (see argument above), so the ranch is not included in the current pour-over trust.

Shifting Executory Interest

An executory interest is a future interest that will divest (cut off) a prior interest upon the happening of a stated event. A shifting executory interest is one that divests a prior grantee.

Here, Sam's interest will divest Bob's interest (a prior grantee) upon the happening of a stated event (five years after Wendy's death). Therefore, Sam has a valid future interest in the house.

Bob

Present possessory Interest subject to an executory interest

A present possessory interest is when a person has a current interest in property. It is subject to an executory interest if it can be divested by a third party.

Here, Bob has a present possessory interest in the trust property. He does not have legal title over it because that is held by the trustee, but he has the right to receive the benefits of the trust as the beneficiary. He has this right until five years after Wendy's death when it will be cut off by Sam's interest. Therefore, it is subject to an executory interest.

2. What duties violated and what remedies available?

Duty of Loyalty

A trustee as a fiduciary has the duty of loyalty to the trust. He has the duty to act in a reasonable manner to ensure the best interests of the trust beneficiaries. He can violate this duty by self-dealing with the trust or by taking an action that would be adverse to the trust beneficiaries.

Here, Sam has engaged in self-dealing of the trust property. He has sold the house to himself in his individual capacity. Although he sold it at fair market price, this is still a breach of the duty of loyalty. It is never considered reasonable for a trustee to engage in self-dealing, unless the trust specifically states that he can do so and it still must be fair to the beneficiaries. Here the power to engage in self-dealing was not explicitly given to him in the trust. He further engaged in self-dealing by investing the assets of the trust into his own business. By selling the house to himself and by investing the assets in his own business, Sam has breached the duty of loyalty.

Duty of Care

A trustee also has the duty to act as a reasonable person would in caring for the trust. He has the duty to use any special skills he may have and to treat the trust property as his own in his care for it.

Here the duty of care was broken because it is not reasonable for a trustee to sell assets of the trust to himself. It is further unreasonable to invest all the assets of the trust property in a single business.

Duty to Invest

At common law a trustee was limited to a specified list of investments that he was approved to make. Now trustees are expected to diversify investments in order to spread the risk of loss and the whole portfolio will be considered.

Here, Sam did not diversify the investments. He invested all the trust assets into a single business. This does not spread the risk of loss. If the business fails, the trust will lose all of its assets. Sam has breached this duty.

Duty of impartiality

The trustee has the duty to fairly balance the trust assets so that the current beneficiaries and remainder beneficiaries are treated fairly. The current beneficiary is entitled to the income and the future beneficiary is entitled to the principal. The trustee must make sure to balance the income and principal when making his investments so that one does not increase drastically while the other depreciates.

Here Sam has not been impartial. He has sold the trust property to himself and invested all of it in his own business. This may yield high income or it may not. Even if this will benefit Bob more than it will benefit him, he still had the duty to be impartial when making his investments so that neither the income nor the principal drastically decreases. He has breached this duty.

Duty to inform beneficiaries

The trustee also has the duty to keep beneficiaries reasonably informed about major decisions including the trust property.

Bob knows and objects to the sale of the house and the investment. It is unclear whether Sam told him about this before taking the actions. If he did not, he has breached his duty to keep the beneficiary informed.

Removal as trustee

A trustee who breaches his duties may be removed as a trustee. A trustee can also be removed for other reasons such as death or incapacity or if a serious conflict exists with the beneficiary.

Here, Sam has breached a number of his duties as discussed above. Therefore, Bob may seek to have him removed as a trustee and the court will likely approve it.

Monetary damages

A beneficiary is entitled to seek monetary damages from a trustee who has breached his duty. He can seek damages that the trust would have been entitled to absent the breach. He may be able to instead get unjust enrichment damages from the trustee.

Here, Bob can likely get either the profits that Sam received from the sale or of the house and the investment in the business or he can receive the full value of the house back.

Answer B

I. What Interests if any, do Dot, Sam, and/or Bob have in the house and the ranch?

First Inter Vivos Trust

An inter vivos trust is created during the life of the grantor. There are two types: private express trusts and charitable trusts. There must be some indication that the grantor intends to part with the property if the grantor is the sole beneficiary. Here, the facts indicate that Wendy created a valid inter vivos trust.

Private Express Trust

A private express trust is where the grantor creates a trust for the benefit of one or more ascertainable beneficiaries. It must comply with the valid trust requirements.
Here, Wendy created a trust during her lifetime. The beneficiaries are Sis and Dot. Thus, because Sis and Dot are ascertainable beneficiaries, this is a private express trust. It must comport with the trust requirements.

Valid Trust

A valid trust requires (i) a grantor, (ii) intent to create a trust, (iii) ascertainable beneficiaries, (iv) a trustee, (v) trust property, or res, and (vi) a valid trust purpose.

Grantor

The grantor is the person who creates the trust.

Here, Wendy is the person who created the trust and is thus the grantor.

Intent to Create a Trust

The grantor must intend to create the trust.

Here, the facts indicate that Wendy created a valid inter vivos trust.

Thus, there is intent to create a trust.

Ascertainable Beneficiaries

The trust must have ascertainable beneficiaries to whom the trust property can be transferred to.

Here, Sis and Dot are the beneficiaries.

Thus, there are ascertainable beneficiaries.

Trustee

A trust must have a trustee although a lack of one at creation does not create an invalid trust. Instead, the court will appoint a trustee.

Here, Wendy and Dot are co-trustees.

Thus, the trust has trustees.

Trust Property

A trust must have trust property. This can be tangible or intangible assets and can include land property.

Here, the trust property is Wendy's ranch.

Thus, the trust is properly funded.

Trust Purpose

A trust must be created for a valid trust purpose. Generally, any purpose is valid as long as it is not illegal.

Here, the trust is created for the benefit of Sis and Dot.

Thus, there is a valid trust purpose.

Revocation of Trust by Will Generally, a trust is presumed to be irrevocable unless the grantor expressly reserves the right to modify or terminate the trust.

Here, Wendy expressly reserved her right to revoke or amend the trust at any time in writing, provided that the document be signed by her and delivered to her and Dot as trustees. Wendy did in fact attempt to revoke the trust when she prepared a valid will stating that she revokes the trust previously established.

Dot has two arguments that the trust has not been revoked. First, as a co-trustee, she will argue that there needed to be unanimous agreement between her and Wendy in order to revoke the trust. This argument would fail though because the grantor is the one who gets to reserve the right to revoke. This does not depend on whether or not the grantor is also a trustee. Thus, Wendy could have acted on her own.

Dot's second argument would be that Wendy did not follow the instructions for revoking the trust. The trust states that a signed document needed to be delivered to Wendy and Dot as co-trustees. However, Dot was surprised to find the will when Wendy died.

Thus, it is debatable whether or not the trust was properly revoked. If the court chooses to strictly read the instructions provided for in the original trust, then it might find that the trust was never revoked because Wendy failed to deliver the signed document to both Wendy and Dot. Therefore, the trust would still be valid and Dot would be entitled to the ranch once Sis died, as provided for in the trust.

Trustee Termination

As mentioned before, a trust does not terminate because there is no trustee. If a trustee has not been named, or a trustee does not wish to serve as trustee, then the court will designate a trustee.

Here, the facts indicate that Dot does not want to serve as trustee. Therefore, the court will appoint one instead.

Thus, Dot's argument that the trust fails and she should be given the ranch is incorrect. Instead, a trustee will be appointed to carry out the trust duties. The ranch will be held in trust for the benefit of Sis until her death. At that time, Dot will receive the ranch.

Testamentary Trust

A testamentary trust is one that is created in the grantor's will. It must comply with all wills requirements in the state where the will is executed.

Here, the facts indicate that Dot executed a valid will creating a new trust. As mentioned before, the trust must also comply with specific requirements.

Trust Requirements

A valid trust requires (i) a grantor, (ii) intent to create a trust, (iii) ascertainable beneficiaries, (iv) a valid trust purpose, (v) trust property, and (vi) a trustee.

Here, Wendy is the creator of the trust and she intended to do so as stated in her will. Bob is a valid ascertainable beneficiary. Keeping the trust for Bob and Sam's benefits are valid trust purposes. There is trust property, although as mentioned before the ranch is likely not going to be held in this trust because Wendy failed to properly revoke her earlier trust. However, even without the ranch, the house is still included in the trust property and satisfies the trust res requirement. Finally, there is a trustee - Sam.

Thus, Wendy has created a valid testamentary trust but it will only hold the house as trust property.

Disposition:

Ranch:

The ranch is still held in the first trust because the first trust was not validly revoked. A new trustee will be appointed and it will be held in trust for the benefit of Sis for her life. Upon Sis' death, Dot will receive the remaining assets of the ranch.

House:

The house should be held in trust for Bob and in five years, the house will go to Sam.

II. What Duties, if any, has Sam violated as trustee of the testamentary trust, and what remedies, if any, does Bob have against him?

Trustee Duties

A trustee is tasked with safeguarding the trust assets and holding them for the benefit of the beneficiaries. He must distribute the trust assets in accordance with the trust terms. He owes the beneficiaries duties of loyalty and care.

A trustee is tasked with safeguarding the trust assets and holding them for the benefit of the beneficiaries. He owes the beneficiaries a duty of loyalty and care. He must distribute the trust assets in accordance with the trust. Traditionally, there was an enumerated list of statutory duties a trustee owed to the trust. Today, the standard is more along the lines of acting as a reasonably prudent person would.

Duty of Loyalty

A trustee owes a duty of loyalty to the trust. This can be broken when the trustee puts his interests before the trust's. Specifically, this can be broken through self- dealing.

Self-Dealing

A trustee can breach the duty of loyalty through self-dealing. This occurs when the trustee interacts and benefits with the trust assets for his own benefit. Self-dealing is a per se breach of the duty of loyalty. Once self-dealing has been proven, there are no further questions asked. It does not matter that the self-dealing was beneficial for the trust or at the fair market price. Furthermore, even if the trust allows for self-dealing, it must be reasonable.

House:

Here, Sam is the trustee of Wendy's second trust. He has sold the house to himself at fair market value. This is per se self-dealing. As mentioned before, it is not a defense that Sam sold the house at a fair market value.

Trust Assets:

In addition to selling himself the house, he also invested all assets of the trust into his new business. This is another instance of per se self-dealing.

Thus, Sam breached his duty of loyalty.

Duty of Care

A trustee must act as a reasonably prudent person would. He must reasonably believe in good faith that his actions are for the benefit of the trust. A trustee has the normal powers to sell, buy, and invest trust property as a reasonably prudent person would. This includes duties of prudence and duties of impartiality.

Duty of Prudence

A trustee must act as a reasonably prudent person would under the circumstances. If the trustee has any special skills, then he is held to the standard of that skilled person. This duty extends to investments of the trust property.

Here, Sam sold the entire house - which constitutes the entire trust property, thus ending the trust. A reasonably prudent person would not do this especially since the reasonably prudent person is tasked with managing the trust property for the benefit of the life beneficiaries and the remaindermen. Sam might argue that the house was going to go to him in five years anyways, but this disregards the duties he owes to Bob during the current five years. Sam might also argue that he believed the ranch was in the trust and thus the trust would still properly be funded. This argument will also likely fail because Sam and Wendy both knew about the will and likely knew that the ranch was contested. If Sam truly believed that the ranch was part of his trust, he should have at least waited until that was concretely determined.

Thus, because Sam sold all of the trust property, and did not act as a reasonable prudent person, he breached his duty of prudence.

Duty of Impartiality

Traditionally, in a trust, the principal went to the remaindermen and the income went to the life beneficiaries. Modernly, the trustee is instead to balance the interests of the remaindermen and the principal equally instead of favoring one over the other.

Here, Sam sold the entire house; this is not only a breach of the duty of prudence, as mentioned before, but also a breach of duty to be impartial. As mentioned previously, nothing remains now for Bob. The interests of the life beneficiary have not been taken into account.

Thus, Sam has breached his duty of being impartial.

Remedies

Constructive Trust

A constructive trust can be imposed on the person holding the trust property if they improperly received the trust property, there is inadequate legal remedy, and the person currently holding the property would be unjustly enriched.

Here, as described above, Sam improperly holds the trust property because he received it by breaching his duty of loyalty and duty of prudence. Furthermore, because the property is a house, it is considered unique and thus there are inadequate legal remedies. Finally, Sam would be unjustly enriched because he would be allowed to keep the house and he is doing so for five years more than he should have.

Thus, the court can impose a constructive trust on the house for Bob's benefit.

Trustee Removal

When a trustee has breached his duties, the beneficiaries can seek to remove the trustee.

Here, as described above, Sam violated trustee duties - particularly that of the duty of prudence and the duty of loyalty.

Thus, the court should remove Sam as a trustee and should appoint a different trustee should the trust continue.

Tracing

Finally, when there is self-dealing and assets are invested, the beneficiaries can seek to retrieve the funds through tracing.

Here, Sam invested the trust assets in his new business.

Thus, Bob can seek to trace these funds and retrieve them for the benefit of the trust.

Q2 Torts

Jack believed that extraterrestrial aliens had come to earth, were living undercover as humans, and were planning a full-scale invasion in the future. Jack believed that his next-door neighbor, Nancy, was one of these aliens.

One day, Nancy called Jack on the phone to complain that Jack's children were playing in her yard. Jack yelled that his children could play wherever they wanted to. He also said that he was going to kill her.

The next day, Nancy approached Jack, who was playing in his yard with his children. She reminded him to keep his children out of her yard. Jack picked up a chainsaw and said, "When the invasion comes, I am going to use this baby to cut off your head!"

From the other side of the street, Ben saw Jack angrily raise the chainsaw at Nancy. Ben ran across the street and knocked Jack to the ground and injured him.

Later that week, Jack decided that he could wait no longer. He saw Nancy's car, which he believed to be an alien spaceship, parked on the street. He snuck over to her car and cut the brake lines, hoping Nancy would have a minor accident and be taught a lesson.

Unaware that her car had been tampered with, Nancy lent it to Paul. When the brakes failed to work, Paul drove off a mountain road and was severely injured.

1. What tort causes of action, if any, may Nancy bring against Jack, and how is each likely to fare? Discuss.

2. What tort causes of action, if any, may Jack bring against Ben, and how is each likely to fare? Discuss.

3. What tort causes of action, if any, may Paul bring against Jack, and how is each likely to fare? Discuss.

Answer A

Whether Jack can be held liable for Intentional Torts

As a preliminary matter, the overarching issue is whether Jack can be found guilty of intentional torts, where he believed that extraterrestrial aliens had come to earth, were living undercover as humans, and were planning a full-scale invasion in the future. Jack further believed that his next-door neighbor, Nancy, was one of these aliens. Jack will argue that, because of his delusions, he does not have the requisite intent necessary to be liable for an intentional tort. Nancy will argue that, so long as Jack intended his actions, it does not matter that the action was motivated by a delusion. A court is likely to find that Jack can be found liable for intentional torts, as he had both the intent to act and the intent to achieve certain results from those actions. The fact that the actions were motivated by an insane delusion will not be a valid defense to the intentional tort actions that may be brought by Nancy and Paul.

Nancy's Tort Causes of Action Against Jack

Assault

At issue is whether Jack assaulted Nancy when he threatened to kill her when they were talking on the phone, and/or when he raised the chainsaw up while they were talking in the yard.

Assault is the intentional creation of apprehension in another of immediate bodily harm. "Apprehension" means that the victim must be aware of the threat against her. Assault requires more than just threatening words alone - the words must be accompanied by an action. Conversely, words may negate immediacy by attaching a condition or time frame to a threat. Here, Nancy could argue that Jack assaulted her twice - once when he said that he was going to kill her when they were talking on the phone, and once when he threatened her with a chainsaw when they were on the lawn.

As to the phone conversation, Jack yelled that he was going to kill Nancy while they were talking on the phone. Nancy will likely not succeed on this claim of assault because the conversation took place over the phone, and, thus, was not accompanied with a threatening action (that Nancy could see, at any rate) that would cause Nancy to believe that she was in danger or immediate bodily harm. Because she and Jack were in separate houses during the phone call, Nancy would likely not be able to demonstrate that she was in apprehension of immediate bodily harm. Thus, this cause of action for assault would fail.

Nancy's cause of action for assault relating to the chainsaw incident is stronger, although it is still likely to fail. After Nancy approached Jack outdoors, reminding him to keep his children off her lawn, Jack raised a chainsaw and said "When the invasion comes, I am going to use this baby to cut off your head!" Raising the chainsaw definitely qualifies as an action that would accompany the threatening words to create an apprehension of immediate bodily harm in Nancy. Additionally, the threat of cutting off Nancy's head would cause apprehension. Jack will argue, however, that his words negated the immediacy required for an assault cause of action, because he stated that he would cut off Nancy's head "when the invasion comes." These words attached a future time condition to the threat, thereby negating the immediacy. Nancy could argue, on the other hand, that since the "invasion" was a delusion by Jack, the time frame could be immediate, not future, as it is possible that, in Jack's mind, the invasion was going to happen right away. If Nancy's point of view prevailed, Jack would be liable for assault. However, since Jack was not screaming that the invasion had arrived, but rather was speaking of the invasion as if it were a future event, a court will likely find that his words negated immediacy, and despite the threatening action he is not liable for assault.

Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress

The next issue is whether Jack's threats to kill Nancy, and to cut her head off with the chainsaw made to her face, make him liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress, even where she does not appear to have suffered any distress.

Nancy could raise a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, which requires for a defendant to commit outrageous conduct that causes severe distress in a plaintiff. Here, Jack's conduct was certainly outrageous, that is, it was outside the bounds of decency as upheld in society. By threatening to kill Nancy and threatening to cut off her head with a chainsaw, Jack clearly made outrageous statements that exceed the bounds of decency. However, there is no indication from the facts that Nancy was emotionally distressed as a result of Jack's statements. Although IIED does not require a showing of physical distress symptoms, there must be at least some allegation that the plaintiff suffered from severe distress. Absent that allegation, as here, there is not sufficient grounds for an IIED cause of action.

Battery

The next issue is whether Jack's tampering with Nancy's car results in a battery against Nancy.

Battery is the intentional infliction of bodily harm caused by harmful or offensive touching to another's person. Here, Jack intended to cause Nancy bodily harm - he was hoping that she would "have a minor accident" to be "taught a lesson." This indicates that, even if he only wished minor harm upon Nancy, Jack intended to cause Nancy bodily harm. Less clear is whether Jack's tampering with Nancy's car resulted in a "harmful or offensive touching to her person." A "person" may be construed liberally to include objects connected to a plaintiff's body, such as her purse. Nancy's car, however, when it was parked on the street, was not connected to her body and it is unlikely that a court would construe the car to be an extension of Nancy's person.

Nancy would argue, however, that battery need not be immediate, and that by cutting the brake lines Jack intended future harm to Nancy's person. Nancy would argue that Jack's actions were akin to poisoning someone - which is a battery even though the harm to a plaintiff's body does not occur until the future. Nancy would likely be successful on this argument if she had actually been injured by Jack's actions. Since

Paul was injured instead, the doctrine of transferred intent may apply (see below), but Nancy did not actually suffer a harm or offense to her person, and, ultimately, she will not be successful in her battery cause of action.

Trespass to Land

Trespass to land occurs when the Defendant unlawfully enters the land of the Plaintiff. Here, Jack cut the brake lines on Nancy's car while it was on the street, and there is nothing to indicate that he trespassed onto her land. Thus, Nancy does not have a claim for trespass to land.

Trespass to Chattel and Conversion

Trespass to chattel and conversion are property torts that occur when the Defendant damages or steals the property of a plaintiff. The difference between trespass to chattel and conversion is one of degree - trespass to chattel occurs where property is harmed but not completely destroyed, and conversion occurs when the property is destroyed or stolen. Here, Jack could be liable for both torts. He intentionally cut Nancy's car's brake lines, and, in so doing, could be liable for trespass to chattel, which means he would owe Nancy the cost of repair for the break lines. Subsequently, however, when Paul drove the car, he drove off a mountain road. These facts indicate that the car was destroyed. If that is the case, Jack could be liable for conversion, which means he would owe Nancy the market value of the car at the time the conversion occurred.

Jack's Tort Claims Against Ben

At issue is whether Jack may bring a claim of battery against Ben, where Ben knocked Jack to the ground and injured him after Ben saw Jack "angrily raise the chainsaw at Nancy." As discussed above, battery occurs when a defendant commits harmful or offensive touching to another's person. Here, Ben did harmfully touch Jack - he "knocked Jack to the ground" and injured Jack, thereby meeting the requirements for a prima facie case of battery.

The next issue becomes whether Ben may raise any defenses against the battery cause of action. Ben may raise the defense of "defense of others" to protect him from liability for any battery committed against Jack. A person may use reasonable force in defense of another when that person believes that the other is in danger of immediate bodily harm. The force used must be proportionate to the threat. Here, it appears that Ben knocked Jack over in order to protect Nancy, whom he reasonably believed was in danger of being attacked by Jack with his chainsaw. Ben used reasonable, non-deadly force to defend Nancy (even though it could be argued that Jack's chainsaw was a deadly weapon). Ben did not escalate the force, but rather responded proportionately. Thus, Ben is likely to be found not liable for battery, because his defense of protection of others would be valid.

It should be noted that, even if Ben was mistaken about his need to defend Nancy, because Jack did not actually intend to harm Nancy until "the invasion comes", this mistake will not negate Ben's defense. Mistaken self-defense (or defense of others) is still a valid defense to an intentional tort so long as the mistake was reasonable. Here, it was reasonable for Ben - who was standing across the street and likely could not hear what Jack was saying - to believe that Nancy was in danger when Jack raised his chainsaw in an "angry" manner.

Paul's Tort Claims Against Jack

At issue is whether Paul may bring a battery cause of action against Jack, where Jack tampered with Nancy's car, which Paul then borrowed. Specifically, the issue is whether, because of the doctrine of transfer of intent, Jack's intention to harm Nancy could be transferred to Paul. Under the doctrine of transferred intent, the intent to commit an intentional tort, such as battery, against one plaintiff may be transferred to another plaintiff if the harm actually befalls the second plaintiff. As noted above, it is unlikely that a court will find that Jack committed battery against Nancy, because Nancy was not actually harmed or touched by Jack's actions. Paul, however, was "severely injured" as a result of Jack's attempt to commit a battery against Nancy. As a result, Paul may sue Jack under a theory of transferred intent, and Paul will likely be successful.

Answer B

1. Nancy's Tort Claims Against Jack

A. Assault for Threat over Telephone

Nancy may bring an assault claim against Jack for the threat to kill her that he made over the phone, but this claim will not succeed.

To establish a prima facie case of assault, the plaintiff must show: (i) an act by the defendant that brings about a reasonable apprehension in the plaintiff of an immediate harmful or offensive contact to the plaintiff's person; (ii) intent by the defendant to cause such apprehension; and (iii) causation.

The facts show that while speaking over the phone, Jack told Nancy that he was going to kill her. A threat to kill someone is generally enough to create a reasonable apprehension in that person that they will suffer a harmful contact.

For the element of intent under most intentional torts, the defendant need not actually intend the specific result, but rather just be substantially certain that such result is likely to arise as a result of the act (general intent). Jack's intent to cause such apprehension can be shown by the fact that he can be substantially certain a threat to kill someone would cause them to fear a harmful contact. And causation may be shown because Jack's threat was what caused the apprehension of an immediate harmful contact.

However, Nancy's claim for assault will fail because the intentional tort of assault requires that the apprehension, or fear, be of an immediate harm. A threat of future harm is not sufficient for the tort of assault. Moreover, the reasonable apprehension may not be created by words alone--there must be some threatening act in addition to the words.

Here, Nancy was speaking to Jack over the phone, and thus was not in his presence when he made the threat. Therefore, her apprehension could not have been of an immediate harm, because he was not present to execute on his threat. He would have had to run next door to make good on his threat to kill her (at which point the threat would have been immediate, but not until then).

B. Assault with Chainsaw

Nancy may also bring an assault claim for Jack's threat with the chainsaw. Here, Jack's conduct amounted to more than a mere threat, as he was brandishing a chainsaw. The combination of telling Nancy he would cut off Nancy's head while lifting a chainsaw is certainly enough to cause a reasonable person to fear that she will suffer a harmful contact--here, in the form of a chainsaw to the head.

Nancy will argue that the immediacy requirement is fulfilled because Jack is standing right next to Nancy, and thus can cause the harm at that moment. However, Nancy is likely to lose on this claim as well, because the existence of conditional words will neutralize the immediacy of the threat. Jack told Nancy he will cut her head off "when the invasion comes." Nancy probably has no idea what he is talking about and when that invasion will supposedly arrive, but from Jack's words it seems clear that the invasion will come in the future. Since he is threatening to cut off her head in the future, there is no reasonable apprehension of an immediate contact to Nancy's person, and thus no assault.

C. Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress (IIED)

Nancy can bring IIED claims for both Jack's threat over the phone and the threat while picking up the chainsaw, so long as she is able to show that she suffered severe emotional distress as a result of such threats.

To establish a prima facie case of IIED, the plaintiff must show: (i) an act by the defendant amounting to extreme and outrageous conduct; (ii) intent by the defendant to cause the plaintiff severe emotional distress; (iii) causation; and (iv) the plaintiff suffered damages in the form of severe emotional distress.

Both the threat over the phone call and the threat in the yard amount to extreme and outrageous conduct, because both involve threats to kill Nancy. A threat to kill someone is definitely extreme and outrageous, and would shock the sensibilities of an ordinary, reasonable person.

The intent element for IIED requires that the defendant intend to cause severe emotional distress, or recklessness as to such a result. Here, the required consent will be found via recklessness--Jack's threat to kill Nancy is a complete disregard of a substantial risk that such a threat will cause his neighbor to fear for her life and safety, and thus suffer severe emotional distress.

Nancy's only potential pitfall on this claim is that there is nothing in the facts that show she suffered severe emotional distress. Such distress does not need to take the form of a physical manifestation, but she does need to show substantial distress (e.g. severe anxiety or fear for her life). Assuming she is able to show such distress, Nancy will prevail on an IIED claim against Jack.

D. Conversion/Trespass to Chattels

Nancy can also bring a claim for conversion for Jack's act of cutting the brakes on her car.

To establish a prima facie case of conversion, the plaintiff must show: (i) an act by the defendant that interferes with the plaintiff's right of possession in a chattel; (ii) intent by the defendant to so interfere; and (iii) causation.

The claim of trespass to chattels has the identical elements, the difference between the torts being in degree of the interference. Conversion requires that the interference with the plaintiff's possession interest be so substantial in quality or nature that it justifies forcing the defendant to pay the full fair market value of the chattel, whereas a more minor interference constitutes trespass to chattel (and Jack would need to pay only the amount of damage caused by the interference).

Here, Jack cut the brakes on Nancy's car, which led the next person driving the car to crash it and presumably damage it further. Thus causation is shown, and the facts show Jack intentionally cut the brakes. Because of the severe damage to her car, Nancy will be able to recover under conversion for its full value.

E. Trespass to Land

Finally, Nancy may bring an action against Jack for trespass since his kids were on her property. However, this action is unlikely to succeed, since a parent is not vicariously liable for the actions of his children. Nancy would need to bring this action against the children themselves.

2. Jack's Tort Claims Against Ben

A. Battery for Tackle

To establish a prima facie case of battery, the plaintiff must show: (i) an act by the defendant bringing about a harmful or offensive contact to the plaintiff's person; (ii) intent by the defendant to bring about such contact; and (iii) causation.

Here, Ben tackled Jack to the ground and injured him, which shows a harmful contact and causation. From the facts, it appears that Ben intended such a contact because he ran across the street and knocked Jack to the ground to protect Nancy.

Jack will have a strong argument against the battery via defense of others. Defense of others is a defense that will prevent Jack from succeeding on this claim. One has the right to defend another if the defendant reasonably believes that that person would be entitled to defend themselves. Here, Ben saw Jack raise the chainsaw and may have even heard him threaten to cut off her head. A reasonable person would believe that Nancy was in danger, and thus Ben acted reasonably by defending her. He used non-deadly force in confronting Jack's potentially deadly force, and thus the type of force he used was appropriate.

Thus Ben will not be liable for battery.

B. Trespass to Land

Jack may also bring a claim for trespass to land against Ben for running onto his property. To show this tort, the plaintiff must show that the defendant interfered with his possession of land; intent; and causation. By intentionally running onto his property, Jack will claim Ben committed this tort.

However, Ben will argue that he was justified in running on his property as a result of a public necessity. A public necessity creates an absolute privilege to enter the land of another. Here, the necessity was Nancy's potential decapitation. Thus Ben will not be liable for this tort.

3. Paul's Tort Actions Against Jack

A. Battery

Paul should bring an action against Jack for battery (see elements above). Paul will show that by cutting the brakes on the car, Jack was substantially certain that a harmful contact would arise in the person of the driver.

Transferred Intent

While Jack may argue that he only intended to harm Nancy, rather than Paul, the doctrine of transferred intent will provide the intent needed to find Jack liable for the tort of battery against Paul.

Under this doctrine, when a person intends to commit an intentional tort against another, but instead: a different tort results against that same person; the same tort arises against a different person; or a different tort arises against a different person; the tortfeasor's initial intent to commit the first tort will provide the requisite intent for the second tort. Transferred intent is available for the intentional tort of battery.

Here, Jack intended to cause a harmful contact to Nancy. The fact that Paul was the first to drive the car, rather than Nancy, will not relieve Jack of liability. Jack's intent to harm Paul will be found via the doctrine of transferred intent, and Jack will be liable for battery.

Defense of Insanity

Jack may argue he did not have the intent necessary to commit the tort because of his insanity, given his belief that the car was an alien spaceship. However, insanity is not a defense to an intentional tort unless the mental defect is such that the tortfeasor does not understand the nature of his act. Here, Jack was aware that he was cutting the brakes with intent to harm Nancy, and thus insanity will not be a valid defense.

Q3 Professional Responsibility

Contractor and Lawyer had been in a consensual sexual relationship for months. Contractor could not afford to hire an experienced lawyer to defend him against Plaintiff's complex construction defect case and to bring a cross-complaint. Contractor told Lawyer, who had never handled such matters, that he wouldn't sue her for malpractice if she would defend him for half her regular rate. Lawyer felt pressured because of their relationship.

Lawyer told Contractor she would defend him for half-price, but she would only bring his cross-complaint on contingency at her regular rate of 30 percent of any recovery. Contractor agreed. Although they continued to have sexual relations, their personal relationship deteriorated. Lawyer forgot to make a scheduled court appearance in the case.

At trial Plaintiff lost, and Contractor won $100,000 on his cross-complaint. Lawyer deposited the $100,000 in her Client Trust Account. She told Contractor she would send him $70,000. Contractor said Lawyer must send an additional $15,000 because she agreed to represent him for half-price on everything, including the contingency fee.

1. Did Lawyer commit any ethical violation by agreeing to represent Contractor? Discuss.

2. Did Lawyer commit any ethical violation by failing to make the court appearance? Discuss.

3. What should Lawyer do with the money in the Client Trust Account? Discuss.

Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

Answer A

1. L committed several ethical violations when she agreed to represent C:

The ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct ("ABA Rules") and the California Rules of Professional Conduct ("CA Rules") both contain provisions relating to sexual relationships with clients. The ABA Rules prohibit sexual relationships with clients, unless there was a preexisting sexual relationship. The CA Rules also allow for a preexisting sexual relationship, but also allow for new sexual relationships so long as sex is not a condition for professional representation, the client is not unduly influenced or coerced into sex, and the lawyer's performance is not negatively affected by the sexual relationship. Here, Contractor ("C") and Lawyer ("L") had already been in a consensual sexual relationship for months prior to L agreeing to represent C. Therefore, this would not be an ethical violation under the ABA Rules by itself because the sexual relationship was already existing at the time L agreed to represent C. The relationship may be considered a violation under the CA Rules, because while it was a preexisting relationship, L's performance and representation of C deteriorated such that she forgot to make a court appearance in the case.

L may have also violated the duty of loyalty. When there is a significant risk that the interests of another client, the lawyer, or a third person could materially limit the representation of the client, there is a conflict of interest. Here, the lawyer's own personal interest in attempting to appease her lover could be seen as materially limiting her competent representation of C, as it would be difficult to separate their personal relationship from the professional one. Further, L felt pressured to take on the case, and it is arguably likely that her professional obligations could be also subject to pressure from C.

L also agreed to represent C despite not having any experience in complex construction defect cases. Under the ABA Rules, a lawyer has a duty of competence, which is to possess the necessary skill, knowledge, preparation and thoroughness reasonably necessary to represent the client. If the lawyer does not have the requisite competence, the lawyer must either learn the law without undue delay or expense, or associate with a lawyer who is well-versed in the law (subject to client approval in bringing on this new lawyer). Since L was not experienced in complex construction defect cases, and does not appear to have taken any action to educate herself in this field of practice or associate with a lawyer who is experienced in these matters, she breached her duty of competence. Further, she failed to appear at a scheduled court hearing, which is also a violation of her duty of competence that may subject her to disciplinary action. Under the CA Rules, a lawyer has breached her duty of competence if the lawyer intentionally, recklessly or repeatedly fails to provide competent representation would they be subject to discipline. Here, L may be found to have been in violation of the CA Rules as well since she intentionally or at least recklessly took on the matter while knowing she was not qualified to do so (and only took it on because she felt pressured). The failure to appear at court because she forgot may not rise to a violation of the CA Rules; however, since it does not appear to be intentional, reckless or repeated - it is probably negligent at the most.

L also agreed to represent C if he wouldn't sue her for malpractice if she would defend him for half her regular rate. Under the ABA Rules, a lawyer may not limit a client's right to seek disciplinary action or to participate in an investigation. The ABA Rules allow for the client and lawyer to limit malpractice liability, so long as the client is represented by independent counsel. The CA Rules, however, expressly forbid any limitation of malpractice liability. Therefore, L is in breach of the ABA Rules because C was not represented by an independent attorney when L's malpractice liability was limited, and is in breach of the CA Rules because they do not allow for any limitation on malpractice liability.

Further, L agreed to represent C for a contingency fee for the cross-complaint, but it does not appear the fee agreement was in writing. A contingency fee agreement under the ABA Rules must be in writing, state the percentage of fees that the lawyer would receive, what expenses would be deducted from recovery, and whether the lawyer's percentage would be deducted before or after expenses were deducted. Under the CA Rules, the fee agreement must also state how other costs will be paid, as well as that the fees are negotiable. Here, it does not appear that L and C entered into a fee agreement, but rather orally agreed on the contingency.

Note that the agreement to represent C for half price under the ABA Rules did not have to be in writing, but under the CA Rules likely should have been. The CA Rules require written agreements for non-contingency fees unless the fees will be under $1,000, is for a corporate client, is for routine matters, the client agrees otherwise in a separate writing, or there is an emergency or other good reason. Here, it is likely even with L's fees being half price for defending C, the fees will be over $1,000; the matter is not for a corporate client but is instead for C individually; the case is not a routine matter that L normally handles for C; C has not agreed otherwise in a separate writing; and there is no emergency or other good reason. Therefore, L would be in violation of the CA Rules because her agreement to defend C for half her normal price was not in writing.

2. L committed several ethical violations when she failed to make the court appearance:

As stated above, L owed C a duty of competence. She breached this duty under the ABA Rules by agreeing to take on his matter without experience, and also by failing to appear at court. She likely breached this duty under the CA Rules by intentionally agreeing to take on a matter in which she was not experienced, but would probably not be in breach under the CA Rules for failing to appear, as this did not appear to be intentional, reckless or repeated conduct on her part.

L also breached her duty of care. A lawyer must act in good faith and as a reasonably prudent person with the same care, skills and caution as would be expended on her own matters. L breached this duty by failing to appear at court, as a reasonably prudent person would not have forgotten to make a scheduled court appearance.

L also breached her duty of diligence to C. A lawyer has a duty to pursue cases to completion, and to diligently represent clients in their matters. Part of this duty under the ABA Rules is the duty to act promptly and expedite a client's case if it is in the client's best interest. Under the CA Rules, the lawyer may not unduly delay for improper purposes or for her own convenience. She breached the duty of diligence because she failed to appear. If she caused a delay in the proceedings due to the rescheduling of the court appearance, she again breached this duty.

3. L should send C the undisputed amount from the Client Trust Account, and is entitled to keep the disputed amount in the Client Trust Account until the dispute is settled.

A lawyer has the duty to notify the client and distribute client funds promptly when funds have been received on the client's behalf, and to distribute funds to third parties (if the client knows and has consented to having third parties being paid out of the client trust account). Here, it appears L has properly maintained a separate client trust account for C. When L deposited the $100,000 in the Client Trust Account, she also appeared to have promptly told C that the funds had arrived. However, C disputed the amount L was to send - L said she would send $70,000, which reflects the $100,000 minus her 30% contingency fee, but C said the contingency fee should also have been half price, so only 15%. Therefore, C claims L should send him $85,000. When there is a dispute as to the fees owed, the lawyer must send the undisputed portion to the client, and is entitled to keep the disputed portion in the client trust account until the dispute has been resolved. As a result, L should send C $70,000, which they have both agreed to, and can transfer $15,000 to her own account as part of her fees. The disputed $15,000 must remain in the client trust account until the dispute has been resolved.

As a side note, the ABA Rules encourage arbitration to resolve fee disputes, while the CA Rules mandate arbitration if the client demands it.

Consensual Sexual Relationship

Under the ABA Model Rules (ABA), it is permissible for an attorney to represent a client with whom she has a pre-existing relationship, as long as the sexual relationship will not compromise the attorney's competence or duty of loyalty to the client. However, the ABA, lawyers may not enter into sexual relationships with clients that begin after they take on the clients. In California, attorneys may carry on sexual relationships that pre-existed the lawyer-client relationship, as well as being sexual relationships during the pendency of the representation, as long as competence and loyalty are not compromised. In addition, under CA rules, an attorney cannot condition acceptance of a client on agreement to have sex with the attorney. Here, the contractor and the lawyer had a preexisting sexual relationship, so their relationship did not automatically violate ABA or CA rules. However, the sexual relationship may have violated both ABA and CA rules because it conflicted with the duties of competence and loyalty (see below).

Duty of Competence

An attorney has a duty to competently represent her client which means using the knowledge, skill, thoroughness and preparation reasonably necessary for the representation. However, an attorney is permitted to take a case which she might not otherwise be competent to take if she can acquire through study the skills/knowledge necessary to represent the client and/or work with another attorney who specializes in that area.

Here, the attorney had never handled a complex construction defect case before. Thus, it appears she was not competent at the outset to do so. We have nothing in the facts to indicate that the attorney studied day and night to become reasonably competent to represent her client in this matter. And she did not partner with another attorney with expertise in construction defect cases.

Therefore, she violated her duty of competency when she agreed to represent contractor.

In addition, it appears that lawyer's pre-existing sexual relationship with client encouraged her to take a case for which she was not competent ("Lawyer felt pressured because of their relationship" may refer to taking the case as well as the fee she accepted.) Therefore, the lawyer also violated the duty not to let sexual relationships with clients interfere with your work, in violation of both ABA and CA rules.

Agreement not to sue for malpractice

Under ABA rules, a client can only contract away her right to sue an attorney for malpractice if the she is represented by outside counsel and agrees in writing. CA rules prohibit attorneys from contracting out of malpractice liability under any circumstances.

Here, Lawyer violated both ABA and CA rules. There is nothing on the facts to indicate that client was represented by outside counsel when he agreed not to sue for malpractice, or that the agreement was in writing. Thus, the ABA rules were violated. Because it is an agreement to limit malpractice liability the attorney violated CA law when she agreed to take on the case on this basis.

Duty of Loyalty

The duty of loyalty is always potentially implicated when a client and a lawyer have a sexual relationship. The duty of loyalty requires an attorney to avoid conflicts of interest. A conflict of interest exists when the interests of another client, a third party or the attorney herself are adverse to materially conflict with those of the client. Here, there is a potential conflict of interest between the lawyer's personal interest (her relationship with the client) and the representation. Under the ABA, when a conflict exists, an attorney can only represent a client if she reasonably believes she can do so competently, she discloses the conflict to the client, and gets the client's consent in writing. In CA, the belief need not be reasonable but only sincerely held, and personal conflicts only require written disclosure, not written, consent. Here, the attorney should have disclosed the nature of the potential conflict and gotten written consent at the outset (ABA). If she reasonably believed she could represent the client she could have done so with written consent, but here her belief would not be reasonable because she already felt pressured at the outset. Therefore, she violated ABA rules by taking on the case. Under CA rules, she would have had to provide only written disclosure (there is no indication of this on the facts) and the fact that her belief she could competently represent him would not matter. However, mere failure to provide written disclosure means that she already violated the CA duty of loyalty when she took the representation.

Fee agreement

Under the ABA, fee agreements must be reasonable. They don't have to be in writing, unless they are contingency agreements, in which case they must state the percentage of the attorney's fee, what expenses will be deducted, whether expenses will be deducted before the attorney’s fee, and must be signed by the client. Under CA rules, all agreements over $1000, not with corporate clients, regular clients, or under exigent circumstances must be in writing. In addition to the ABA contingency fee requirements, CA contingency fees must include in writing that attorney fees are negotiable and state how non-covered services will be paid. In addition, the entire fee must not be unconscionable.

Here, attorney agreed to defend client at half her regular price, but his cross-complaint on a 30% contingency basis. Under ABA rules, the first part of the agreement did not need to be in writing but the second part did. There is no indication of a writing; therefore the contingency agreement violated ABA rules. In addition, the agreement was probably per se unreasonable because it was the result of duress or undue influence exerted by the client.

Under CA rules, the whole agreement would have to be in writing unless they regularly worked together as lawyer-client or the first part was under $1000. Definitely the second contingency part had to be in writing, as it was not here, and lacked everything required in CA. In addition, despite the fact that 30% seems reasonable, it may be considered unconscionable because it was agreed to under duress and undue influence.

2. Failure to make court appearance

When the attorney failed to make the court appearance, she violated her duty of loyalty and competence to the client, and duty to pursue the case diligently. She didn't come to court due to what appears to be the deterioration of the sexual relationship. This means that she violated the duty not to let sexual relationships interfere with the representation, as well as the duty not to let her personal interests conflict with those of her client. In addition, she failed to pursue her case diligently in violation of her duty to her client and to the judicial system.

3. When there is a dispute over fees, the lawyer must retain the disputed portion in the client trust account pending resolution of the dispute. Here, the lawyer can send the 70k to the client, but must retain the additional 15k in the client trust account until the dispute is resolved.

Q4 Remedies

Pop obtained a liability insurance policy from Insurco, covering his daughter Sally and any other driver of either of his cars, a Turbo and a Voka. The policy limit was $100,000.

On the application for the policy, Pop stated that his cars were driven in Hometown, a rural community, which resulted in a lower rate than if they were driven in a city. However, Sally kept and also drove the Voka in Industry City while attending college there.

Subsequently, Pop asked Insurco to increase his coverage to $500,000; Insurco agreed if he paid a premium increase of $150; and he did so. Days later, as he was leaving for Sally's graduation, Pop received an amended policy. He failed to notice that the coverage had been increased to $250,000, not $500,000.

Unfortunately, while driving the Turbo in Industry City, Pop caused a multi-vehicle collision. At first, Insurco stated it would pay claims, but only up to $250,000. Six months later, Insurco informed Pop that it would not pay any claim at all, because of his statement on the application for the policy that both the Turbo and the Voka were located in Hometown.

Insurco filed a complaint against Pop for rescission of the policy. Pop filed a cross-complaint to reform the policy to increase coverage to $500,000.

1. What is the likelihood of success of Insurco's complaint, and what defenses can Pop reasonably raise? Discuss.

2. What is the likelihood of success of Pop's cross-complaint, and what defenses can Insurco reasonably raise? Discuss.

Answer A

(1) Likelihood of Success of Insurco's Complaint for Rescission

Rescission Generally

Rescission is an equitable remedy, under which a court will invalidate a contract in its entirety, such that the parties to the contract are completely excused from continued performance under the contract. Generally, rescission is available when one party has a valid defense to the formation of the contract. Moreover, typically only the wronged party can seek rescission.

Because rescission is an equitable remedy, a court has broad discretion in deciding whether it should be awarded. The court will consider the equities of the situation, taking into account the fairness of rescission to both parties. In addition, as an equitable remedy, rescission is subject to equitable defenses, such as acquiescence, estoppel, laches, and unclean hands.

Here, Insurco seeks rescission of the insurance policy so that it will not be required to reimburse Pop for his liability.

Insurco's Likely Grounds for Rescission

Fraud/Misrepresentation

Insurco's primary grounds for rescission will likely be on the basis of fraud. A contract may be invalid on the basis of fraud where: (1) a party made a false statement of past or present fact; (2) the statement was either fraudulent or was material to the contract; and (3) the other party relied on that statement of fact in entering into the contract.

Insurco can likely make out a claim of fraud under the facts of this case. Here, in applying for the liability insurance, Pop made a misstatement of fact--i.e., that his cars were driven solely in Hometown, a rural community. This was a false statement because one of his cars was driven by his daughter, Sally, in Industry City. Moreover, Pop was driving the other car in Industry City when he was involved in the collision.

Second, this statement may be deemed fraudulent, as it can probably be shown that Pop was aware of the falsity of the statement. It is very likely that Pop knew that the car was not being used solely in Hometown, as his daughter, Sally, used the car while she was attending college in Industry. Moreover, pop certainly knew that he was driving the Turbo in Industry City when he was involved in the accident.

Even if Insurco cannot establish that the statement was fraudulent, the elements of fraud are still likely established because it is clear that this statement was material to the contract. The location of the use of the cars appears to be a key factor in determining the insurance rates, and indeed, the facts make clear that Pop received a lower rate given this false statement of fact.

For this same reason, Insurco can establish that it relied on Pop's false statement in entering into the contract. As made clear in the facts, Insurco would not have entered into the contract at that lower rate, had it been aware that the car was used in Industry City.

Notably, this original contract is not the one Pop is intending to enforce. Rather, he is attempting to enforce the amended contract, in which Pop sought to increase his coverage. Because Pop paid consideration for this increase in coverage ($150), this modification of the contract is valid under the common law. In any event, this amended contract is subject to the same claim of rescission as the original contract, as there is no indication that Pop corrected his false statement when requesting the amended contract. Thus, Insurco's same arguments for establishing fraud discussed above apply equally with respect to the amended contract.

Accordingly, Insurco has a strong case for seeking rescission on the basis of fraud or misrepresentation.

Mistake

Insurco also may seek to rescind the contract on the basis of mistake. Under the doctrine of mutual mistake, a contract may be invalidated where both parties are mistaken about a material fact, that is, a fact that was a basic assumption of the contract. Under the doctrine of unilateral mistake, a contract may be invalidated where one party is mistaken about a material fact underlying the contract, and the other party knows or has reason to know about that mistake.

Here, to the extent Pop was unaware that Sally was using the car in Industry City, and somehow unaware that he was driving the car in Industry City when he entered into the accident, both he and Insurco were mistaken about this fact. Thus, the doctrine of mutual mistake of fact may be found to apply.

Moreover, to the extent Pop was aware of Sally's use of the car, or his use of the car in Industry City, he clearly also knew that Insurco would be mistaken as to this fact, given his false statement in applying for the insurance. Accordingly, under that scenario, the doctrine of unilateral mistake may apply. Note that unilateral mistake can serve as grounds for rescission of the contract only where the unmistaken party had actual knowledge of the other party's mistake.

However, because this situation involves a false statement of fact, this issue is more properly analyzed under the doctrine of fraud, for the reasons discussed above.

Pop's Likely Defenses

As noted above, a court will consider any equitable defenses before choosing to order rescission of a contract.

Laches

Pop will first rely on the equitable doctrine of laches. That defense applies where a claimant unreasonably delays in bringing suit, and where that suit prejudices the plaintiff.

Here, Pop will argue that Insurco's delay in bringing suit for rescission of the contract--six months after the accident, and even longer after Pop entered into the contract with Insurco--was unreasonable. The facts here are unclear as to the reasonableness of this delay, as it is not clear when Insurco became aware of Pop's misstatement. Given the fact that Pop's accident occurred in Industry City, however, there is a strong argument to be made that Insurco should have been aware of the use of Pop's cars in Industry City at the time Pop made his claim for reimbursement. Thus, Pop may be able to show the delay was unreasonable.

That said, there is no evidence that the Pop was prejudiced by the delay. Pop clearly will be prejudiced by not receiving payment for his liability, but there is no indication that the delay itself in seeking rescission caused Pop any harm. Thus, the defense of laches is likely unavailable.

Acquiescence

Pop may also rely on the equitable doctrine of acquiescence, which serves as a defense where the plaintiff has previously acquiesced to similar conduct on the part of the defendant for which the plaintiff is now seeking relief.

Here, Pop will argue that this defense is appropriate because Insurco has not previously objected to coverage on the basis of Pop's misstatement in applying for coverage, and that Insurco stated that it would pay his claims. However, Insurco will respond that it had no reason to be aware of Pop's misstatement until Pop sought reimbursement under the policy, and that this is the first time Pop has sought such reimbursement.

Insurco likely has the better argument here, given that it has never previously paid Pop under the policy in spite of the misrepresentation.

Unclean Hands

Unclean hands is an equitable defense available where the plaintiff has engaged in some wrongful or inequitable conduct with respect to the same underlying transaction for which the plaintiff is seeking relief.

Here, Pop may attempt to point to Insurco's previous statement that it would pay out on Pop's claim, and then its reversal of course. However, a court is unlikely to deem this inequitable or wrongful conduct, especially if Insurco was not aware of Pop's initial misstatement when it first agreed to pay Pop's claims.

Estoppel

Estoppel is an equitable defense available where a defendant reasonably, foreseeably, and detrimentally relied on a plaintiff's statement that the plaintiff's conduct is permissible, and where it is equitable to enforce that promise.

Pop will attempt to argue that Insurco is estopped from refusing to pay out on the claim, given its previous statement to Pop that it would reimburse him for his claim. However, there are no facts indicating that Pop relied on this promise to his detriment. Rather, the only harm Pop appears to have suffered is the fact that Insurco refuses to pay out on his claim. The facts do not indicate that Pop changed his position in any way in reasonable reliance on Insurco's promise itself.

Thus, this defense is unlikely to succeed.

(2) Likelihood of Success of Pop's Cross-Complaint for Reformation

Reformation Generally

Like rescission, reformation is also an equitable remedy. However, under the doctrine of reformation, a court will not invalidate the contract in its entirety, but rather will rewrite the contract to conform it to the parties' original intent. Moreover, like rescission, reformation is typically only available to the wronged party.

Again, because reformation is an equitable remedy, a court has broad discretion in deciding whether it should be awarded, taking account all of the equities. Reformation too is subject to equitable defenses, such as acquiescence, estoppel, laches, and unclean hands.

Pop's Likely Grounds for Reformation

Mistake

Pop will likely seek rescission on the doctrine of mutual mistake. As discussed above, that doctrine applies where both parties are mistaken about a material fact--i.e., a fact that was a basic assumption of the contract.

Here, the elements of that doctrine appear to apply. It seems that both parties intended that the amended contract increase the coverage limit to $500,000, as opposed to $250,000. In reducing the contract to writing, it appears that a clerical error was made, and that the contract was mistakenly written to state that the limit is $250,000. This appears to have been a mutual mistake, as the facts indicate that both parties initially intended that the limit be $500,000. Moreover, the mistake clearly regards a basic assumption of the contract, as a liability limit is one of the key elements of an insurance contract.

The doctrine does not apply where the party seeking to reform the contract assumed the risk of the mistake. That exception does not apply here, however, as it was Insurco, not Pop, who drafted the contract.

Accordingly, Pop has likely made out a prima facie case for mistake, and a court will likely reform the contract to make it consistent with the parties' intent that the liability limit be $500,000.

Insurco's Likely Defenses

Parol Evidence

Insurco may first rely on the parol evidence rule, which generally holds that where a contract is integrated (intended by the parties to be a final agreement), a party may not admit evidence of a prior agreement that is inconsistent with the contract's terms.

However, there is an exception to the parol evidence rule where a party seeks to provide evidence of mistake or clerical errors in reducing the contract to writing. This exception will apply here.

Unclean Hands

As noted above, the equitable defense of unclean hands applies where the plaintiff has engaged in some wrongful or inequitable conduct with respect to the same underlying transaction for which the plaintiff is seeking relief.

Here, Insurco has strong arguments for application of this defense, given that it can likely show that Pop fraudulently induced the contract. For the reasons discussed above, this claim will likely succeed. Accordingly, Pop's wrongful conduct in inducing the contract will likely serve as a defense to any claim for reformation.

Acquiescence and Laches

Insurco may also assert the defense of acquiescence and laches, the elements of which are discussed above.

With respect to both of these defenses, Insurco will argue Pop did not seek to reform the contract until many months after the amended policy went into effect, thus prejudicing Insurco. Insurco will focus on the fact that Pop had the policy in his possession at this time, and easily could have become aware of the mistake and sought reformation at an earlier time.

However, this argument is unlikely to be successful. A court will likely note that Insurco had a greater ability to have found the mistake, given that it was the party that reduced the contract to writing. Moreover, there do not appear to be facts indicating that Insurco was prejudiced by Pop's delay in seeking rescission.

Answer B

1. INSURCO'S COMPLAINT

APPLICABLE LAW

The contract at issue is an insurance contract. UCC Article 2 governs sale of goods. All other contracts are governed by the common law. Accordingly, the common law would control.

RESCISSION

The issue in Insurco's complaint is whether it is entitled to rescission of the contract. The remedy of rescission allows the party asserting rescission to avoid its obligations under the contract. Rescission is allowed if there is a valid basis for rescission and there are no valid defenses. The remedy of rescission is meant to cure a problem that occurred during contract formation. Typical bases for rescission include: mutual mistake; unilateral mistake; fraudulent misrepresentation; misrepresentation of a material fact (even if not fraudulent); and ambiguous terms in the contract that neither party understood. The applicable bases for rescission in this case will be discussed in turn below.

A. Misrepresentation

Misrepresentation occurs when one party: (i) states a fact to the other party; (ii) the fact turns out to be false; (iii) the other party relied on the false statement when agreeing to enter the contract; and (iv) the party making the false statement either did so fraudulently, or the statement involved a material part of the contract (i.e., even if the statement was not made fraudulently, if it involved a material fact, that is still enough to make out a claim of misrepresentation).

Here, Insurco will argue that Pop made either a fraudulent or material misrepresentation in his application for insurance. In the application, Pop stated that his cars were driven in Hometown, which is a rural community that presumably has less traffic and less risk of accident than an urban center. In reality, however, one of the cars to be insured, the Voka, was also driven in Industry City by daughter while attending college. This made a difference to Insurco, as evidenced by its later refusal to pay once it realized that the application had only listed Hometown as the location of the cars, when in actuality the Voka was located much of the time in Industry City. The issue, however, is whether that discrepancy in the application was either fraudulently represented or material to the contract.

Fraud

There is no indication in the facts regarding whether Pop acted in good faith when he listed Hometown as the location of both cars. It is possible that Pop thought because the Turbo was always located in Hometown, and the Voka was only located in Industry City when college was in session, that he only needed to list Hometown. Pop would argue that Hometown was really the Voka's homebase, and that the car was only temporarily in Industry City for periods of time when college was in session.

Insurco would argue that Pop fraudulently listed only Hometown. Insurco would argue that anyone who drives a car knows that insurance rates go up in urban centers and will be lower in rural areas.

Based on the limited facts, Pop will likely prevail on the issue of fraud. Pop may still be on the hook for misrepresentation, however, if the fact at issue was material.

Materiality

A material fact is one that both parties needed to agree on for the contract to be valid--it is a term that cuts to the heart of what the contract is about. Here, the fact of where both cars were located most likely would be considered a material term. It would be considered a material term because the price of car insurance is affected greatly by where a car is driven. In urban centers the rates may be considerably higher than in rural areas. Accordingly, the fact of where the cars were located likely would be considered material.

Pop may argue it was an innocent mistake that he did not include Industry City in his application. Nonetheless, this is not a defense to mutual misrepresentation of a material fact. It does not matter whether the person who made the statement intended to defraud, it only matters whether they made an untrue statement of material fact.

Pop would further argue that he did not make an untrue statement. His statement that the cars were driven in Hometown was true, although incomplete. Although a party to a contract does not have a duty to disclose facts he is not asked about, he is not allowed to conceal facts or fail to disclose facts he is asked about. Here, Pop was asked in the application where the cars were located. By failing to answer the question completely, it is more likely a court would consider this a misrepresentation or concealment as opposed to a mere failure to disclose. Accordingly, Insurco can likely establish that the location of the cars was material.

Other Elements

In addition, Insurco can likely establish that Pop made a statement that turned out to be false regarding the location of the cars and that Insurco relied on that information when entering into the contract. As discussed above, Pop's intent is not what is at issue, it is only whether his answer turned out to be false. Here, the answer did turn out to be false because the Voka was also driven in Industry City.

Finally, Insurco also relied on the fact when it entered the contract. Insurco's rates were tied to the location of the cars. The fact that Insurco later refused to pay out the claim based on the location of the cars is evidence that it relied on the fact when entering into the contract.

Based on the above, Insurco can likely make out a claim of misrepresentation of a material fact. Thus, Insurco would be entitled to rescission unless Pop raises a valid defense.

B. Mutual Mistake

Mutual mistake occurs when both parties to a contract made a mistake regarding a material term of the contract on which the contract was based. For a party to successfully assert mutual mistake, that party must not have assumed the risk of the mistake occurring. A classic example of mutual mistake was the case involving the sale of a cow that both parties believed was barren, but that later turned out to be able to have children. In that case the two parties made a contract for the sale of a barren cow. The fact that the cow was barren was a mistake that involved a material issue that the contract was based on. In that case, if the seller could have easily had the cow examined to find out whether it was actually barren, then the seller assumed the risk and would not be able to assert mutual mistake.

Here, Insurco would argue that even if it cannot establish the misrepresentation discussed above, it can establish mutual mistake. The mutual mistake would be the fact of where the cars were driven. It was a mistake from Pop's end because he mistakenly forgot to include the fact that the Voka was driven in Industry City. It was a mistake from Insurco's end because it mistakenly thought the cars were driven only in Hometown even though the Voka was also driven in Industry City.

This argument is weaker than the misrepresentation argument. Here, Insurco's mistake was not really based on the terms in the offer or acceptance, but instead was based on Pop failing to disclose information. Mutual mistake usually applies in situations where a fact in the offer or acceptance turns out to be different than both parties thought. Here,

Pop knew the Voka was driven in Industry City, and Insurco did not know because Pop failed to disclose that information. Accordingly, mutual mistake is not as strong an argument for Insurco as misrepresentation.

C. Unilateral Mistake

Unilateral mistake can serve as a basis for rescission when one party made a mistake in the contract formation that the other party knew or should have known about. The typical example arises when many subcontractors are bidding for a construction contract and one subcontractor's bid is so low that the general contractor should know that the subcontractor made an error in its bid. In such a situation, the subcontractor who made the error can rescind the contract based on unilateral mistake because the general contractor knew or should have known of the mistake. In unilateral mistake, the negligence of the party that made the mistake is not a defense to rescission of the contract.

Here, Insurco would argue that it made a unilateral mistake in issuing the insurance policy under rates applicable only to Hometown. Further, Pop knew or should have known of the error. It appears Pop reviewed the initial policy because he requested an increase in coverage. Accordingly, Pop should have known that there was a mistake in the initial policy based on Insurco's misunderstanding of where the cars were located.

Unilateral mistake is a difficult claim to make out, and Insurco would likely not succeed in this argument. The doctrine would be more applicable if Insurco made a mistake in information it provided to Pop. Here, the real issue is information Pop provided to Insurco. Accordingly, misrepresentation is a stronger basis for Insurco's argument.

D. Ambiguity

If a term in contract formation is ambiguous, such that it is open to multiple interpretations, then one of the parties to the contract can later avoid the contract based on that ambiguity. The classic example of ambiguity is the case of the Peerless, where one party thought the shipment referred to the November Peerless, and the other party thought the shipment referred to the December Peerless. In that case, because the term Peerless was open to multiple meanings, it was considered ambiguous, and the party was able to avoid the contract as a result. However, if one party knows that the ambiguous term could refer to multiple interpretations, then that party is charged with knowledge and the unknowing party can enforce the contract based on what it believed the ambiguous term to mean.

Here, Insurco would argue that the term regarding where the cars were driven was ambiguous. The term was ambiguous because Pop understood the term to refer only to where the cars were located much of the time, whereas Insurco believed the term to refer to where the cars were located all of the time. Under such an argument, Insurco would claim that because Pop had reason to know that the Voka was driven in Industry City as well, Pop was the party with knowledge, and the contract should be construed against Pop to Insurco's benefit.

This argument is also a difficult one. Usually ambiguous terms refer to the word itself. Here, the word "Hometown" was not ambiguous. What was ambiguous was the question on the application of where the cars were located. If Insurco can establish that the question was ambiguous to the point it led to miscommunication, then it may be able to succeed in its argument. Still, the stronger claim for Insurco is misrepresentation.

E. Defenses

Rescission is an equitable remedy, so equitable defenses apply. The defenses of unclean hands and laches are the most common. Unclean hands refers to the plaintiff taking inequitable actions regarding the contract itself. Laches refers to an unreasonable delay in bringing a claim that prejudices the defendant.

Laches

Here, Pop would argue that the claim for rescission is barred by laches. After the accident, Insurco agreed to pay out the $250,000. Only six months later, did Insurco inform Pop it would not pay the claim at all. Pop would argue the six month delay was unreasonable. After the accident occurred, Insurco had all the information it needed to make its decision about paying the claim. If Insurco intended not to pay out the claim, it should have made that clear right away after the accident. By waiting six months, Pop and Sally were prejudiced by the delay. They likely incurred many costs associated with the accident, and were depending on the insurance payout to be able to cover those costs.

Insurco would counter that it was unable to ascertain the fact that the Voka was located in Industry City until doing in-depth investigation. The facts do not state how Insurco ultimately learned the Voka had been located in Industry City. If it is true that that information was difficult to find out, then Insurco has a good argument for the delay. If, however, it was easily ascertainable that the car was located in Industry City, Insurco's argument is weaker.

Because rescission is an extreme remedy here given the damage in the accident and also given that the most Insurco is willing to pay out is only $250,000 and not $500,000, the court would likely not find rescission to be the appropriate remedy.

2. POP'S CROSS-COMPLAINT

Pop's cross-complaint asserts a claim to reform the contract to allow for the full $500,000 in coverage. For reformation to be available, there must be a valid contract, grounds for reformation, and no valid defense. Reformation is typically ordered in situations where both parties agreed to certain terms of the contract, and those terms did not end up in the finalized contract due to an error such as a scrivener’s error.

Here, Pop will argue that he and Insurco made a valid contract modification to increase the coverage of the insurance policy from $100,000 to $500,000. For a contract modification to be valid, there must be consideration for the modification. Here, there was $150 in consideration paid, and as a result, both Pop and Insurco agreed that the coverage would be increased to $500,000. Here, Pop paid the additional $150, and at that point the agreement was complete and the modification should have been for coverage of $500,000.

Pop will further argue that even though there was a valid modification, the increase was only to $250,000. Pop will claim this must have been due to a scrivener's error or some other error, because the agreement he had made with Insurco before receiving the amended policy was clear.

Based on the facts, Pop has a strong argument for reformation of the contract because it appears that the clear intent of the parties was to modify the contract for $500,000 coverage, and Pop complied with his end of the bargain by paying the $150.

Defenses

Lack of Initial Contract

Insurco can argue that reformation is not permitted because there was never a valid contract in the first place. For reformation to be a possible remedy, there first must have been a valid contract. Insurco would assert the same arguments discussed above regarding contract formation (i.e., mistake, misrepresentation, ambiguity) to argue there never was a valid contract in the first place, and therefore reformation is not allowed.

Parol Evidence

Insurco would also argue that the oral agreement between Pop and Insurco regarding the increase in coverage is inadmissible under the parol evidence rule. Under the parol evidence rule, if there is a final, fully integrated contract, then any communications regarding the contract terms that contradict or supplement the contract either before or contemporaneous with the contract being finalized are inadmissible.

Here, Insurco would argue that the amended policy was a final integration of the contract, and that any evidence of what happened leading up to the amendment is inadmissible parol evidence.

Pop would counter that because the agreement served as the basis for the contract itself, it would not be considered parol evidence, but rather was the basis for the entire modification. Based on the facts, however, it appears the amended policy was a final integrated contract. Accordingly, Pop's arguments would likely fail.

Unclean Hands

Finally, Insurco could assert a defense of unclean hands. Insurco would argue that Pop intentionally misled Insurco into believing the two cars were located solely in Hometown, when in reality the Voka was located in Industry City. Insurco would make similar arguments as discussed above in its claim for rescission. Ultimately Pop would probably prevail on this argument, because there is no evidence he acted in bad faith.

Conclusion

The court would probably not grant Pop's claim for reformation of the contract because of the parol evidence rule. However, they could probably also not grant Insurco's claim for rescission. Acting in equity, the court would most likely find that the contract for $250,000 of coverage controlled.

Q5 Evidence

Mike, Sue, Pam, David, and Ed worked at Ace Manufacturing Company. Mike had been the president and Sue supervised Pam, David, and Ed.

Pam was fired. A week later, David circulated the following email to all the other employees:

> I just thought you should know that Pam was fired because she is a thief. Sue caught her stealing money from the petty cash drawer after Pam's affair with Mike ended.

A month later, Mike died.

Pam sued David for defamation.

At trial, Pam testified that, although it is true she was fired, the remaining contents of the email were false. Pam called Ed, who testified that he had received the email at work, that he had printed it, and that he had received hundreds of other unrelated emails from David. Pam introduced a copy of the email through Ed.

In defense, David called Sue, who testified that she had caught Pam stealing $300 from the petty cash drawer, and that, when Sue confronted Pam and accused her of taking the money, Pam simply walked away. David himself testified that the contents of the email were true. He also testified that he had overheard Pam and Mike yelling at each other in Mike's office a few weeks before Pam left; that he recognized both of their voices; and that he heard Pam cry, "Please don't leave me!," and Mike, in a measured tone, reply, "Our affair is over — you need to get on with your life."

Assume all appropriate objections were timely made.

Should the court have admitted:

1. The email? Discuss.

2. Sue's testimony? Discuss.

3. David's testimony about

    a. what Pam said to Mike? Discuss.

    b. what Mike said to Pam? Discuss.

Answer according to the California Evidence Code.

Answer A

Because this is a civil case, Proposition 8 does not apply.

1. The email

The issue is whether the court properly admitted the email.

Relevance

The first question is whether the email was relevant. Under the California Evidence Code (CEC), evidence is relevant if it tends to make an issue of consequence (a material fact) more or less probable. In other words, evidence must be material and probative (although the level of probativity is very low--it must only affect probability to a slight degree). Under the California rule, the issue must be actually disputed (this is different than the Federal Rules). Relevance is in general a low bar.

Here, the email is relevant. First, it is relevant to the issue of whether the allegedly defamatory statements were made at all. It is also relevant to the question of publication. Defamation requires publication (dissemination) of a statement to a third party. Here, the existence of the email is relevant (although the printing of the email was not necessary for publication). There may be some argument that the issue of the statement and the publication are not disputed, but this would probably not succeed, especially given that under the secondary evidence rule, the email itself should be admitted rather than mere testimony as to its contents.

The next issue is whether the relevance is substantially outweighed by the likelihood of unfair prejudice. It is important to note that any prejudice must be unfair--any evidence counter to a party's case will be prejudicial. The prejudice must actually be unfair--the type that would unduly influence a finder of fact. Here, it is highly unlikely that the email would be found to be unfairly prejudicial.

Authentication/Foundation

The next question is whether the email was properly authenticated/whether a proper foundation for introduction of the email was made. Here, the email has likely been properly authenticated. Ed testified that he has personal knowledge of the email--he received it. Moreover, his testimony that he had received hundreds of other emails from David supports a finding that the email did in fact come from David. It should be noted that the evidence need not be proven to be conclusively authentic. Rather, a jury must be able to conclude that the email is authentic.

Hearsay

Next, there could be an argument from David that the email is inadmissible hearsay. Hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Here, the email is an out-of-court statement made by David. However, it is not being offered for the truth of the matter asserted. The email is not being introduced to prove its contents (Pam is in fact arguing the email was false). The email is of independent legal significance--the fact that the statement was made is relevant to the cause of action. Moreover, even if the email were hearsay, it would be admissible under the exception for statements of a party-opponent (California does not make party-opponent statements exempted from hearsay; they merely fall under an exception).

Therefore, the email was properly admitted.

2. Sue's testimony

Relevance

The first issue is whether the testimony is relevant, under the standard recited above. Here, Sue's testimony is relevant to the issue of whether the contents of the email were truthful, which is an issue disputed in the case. Her testimony makes it more probable that the email is true (as compared to the likelihood without her testimony). And there does not appear to be any unfair prejudice that would substantially outweigh the relevance.

Foundation

The next issue is whether Sue has personal knowledge and the proper foundation has been laid. Here, Sue is testifying based on her own personal knowledge that she saw Pam stealing. Therefore, the proper foundation exists.

Character Evidence

Pam may object to the evidence being introduced as character evidence. Normally, character evidence is not admissible in civil cases. An exception applies when character is at issue. Here, Pam's character is at issue. Her argument is that the email was false. Therefore, whether Pam embezzled or not is directly at issue, and evidence on embezzlement is relevant and admissible. Therefore, Sue's testimony that she had seen Pam stealing money from the cash drawer is not inadmissible as character evidence.

Hearsay

Pam may also argue that the testimony about her walking away is inadmissible hearsay. As discussed above, hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter above. "Statements" can include assertive conduct, such as nodding or hand gestures. Here, Pam would argue that her walking away was an assertive act and therefore a statement. It is questionable as to whether her act in walking away is a statement. But even if it is, here the statement is admissible under the hearsay exception for party-opponent statements. Pam is a party to the lawsuit and she is David's opponent (David is offering the testimony).

Pam could further try to attack Sue's testimony that she "accused [Pam] of taking the money" as inadmissible hearsay. It is unclear exactly how Sue's testimony was phrased. However, even if the testimony did constitute an out-of-court statement, David has several arguments for admitting the testimony. First, he could argue that Pam adopted the statement and that therefore it falls under the party-opponent statement. A statement is adopted where a person could reasonably be expected to respond to a statement but does not. Here, David would argue that Pam could reasonably be expected to deny the accusation and that her silence and walking away adopts Sue's statement. However, this is not a typical situation where the adopted statement theory would apply, since it is unlikely that Pam would adopt a statement that she had stolen the money. There could also be an argument that the statement is not hearsay at all because it is not being offered to prove the content of Sue's statement. For example, it could be argued that the statement is being offered to show its effect on Pam (although this argument does not seem particularly strong). It could also be argued that the statement goes to a fact of independent significance, since it shows the fact that Sue caught Pam stealing money (as asserted in the email).

It seems most likely that this testimony was not recounting an out-of-court statement at all, and was merely discussing Sue's action. But the other arguments above may also allow admission, even if it is testimony of an out-of-court statement.

David could also argue that, if it were determined that Pam had adopted Sue's statement, it was a prior inconsistent statement (Pam testified that the email was false), and that therefore the statement was admissible under the CEC for both impeachment and to show the truth of the matter asserted. However, as discussed above, the argument that Pam adopted the statements seems likely to succeed.

Overall, the court was likely correct in admitting the testimony.

3. David's testimony

The next issue relates to David's testimony.

a. Pam's statements to Mike

Relevance

As to Pam's statements to Mike, the first issue is relevance. This testimony is relevant because it again goes to whether the contents of the email were true. With the testimony, it is more likely than without the testimony that the email's contents about David's and Pam's relationship is true. Pam could argue that her statement by itself does not establish that there was any relationship--it was ambiguous. But, the evidence need not be sufficient to establish the ultimate fact at issue. Instead, it merely needs to make the likelihood that there was an affair (a disputed issue) more probable than it would be without the evidence. The testimony here clears that low bar. And again, there does not seem to be any unfair prejudice that would substantially outweigh the relevance.

Foundation

The second question is foundation. David testified that he recognized Pam's voice. Without more, that assertion may not be enough to show foundation and personal knowledge. But if David were to testify, for example, that he had long worked with Pam and had previously heard her voice, the foundation would likely be sufficient.

Hearsay

Pam may attempt to argue that this testimony is inadmissible hearsay. The statement is likely hearsay--it was an out-of-court statement. And it is being offered to show that Pam made that statement to Mike (because they were having an affair). But this statement falls into the party-opponent exception for hearsay. Even if it did not, it may also fall under the excited utterance exception since Pam's emotions seem to have been aroused the time of her statement. A witness need not be unavailable for that exception to apply.

Moreover, David could argue that this statement is admissible as a prior inconsistent statement. Pam testified that the email was false. David could argue that this statement was a previous inconsistent statement, which under the California Evidence Code would be admissible for both impeachment purposes and to show the truth of the matter asserted.

b. Mike's statements to Pam

The next issue is whether the court previously admitted David's testimony about what Mike said to Pam.

Relevance

The first question is relevance. As discussed above, the question of whether there was an affair is at issue in the case because Pam is arguing falsity of the email. David's testimony about Mike's statements makes it more likely that the email was true than without his testimony. Again, the testimony need not conclusively establish truth. Rather, it must only make it more likely than it would be without the evidence. Mike's statement is even more clearly relevant than Pam's statement, since it explicitly references an affair.

Foundation

The next issue is whether David testified with the appropriate foundation and personal knowledge. As mentioned above, Pam may argue that David lacked the foundation to testify based on only hearing the voices rather than actually seeing the argument.

Without any testimony as to how David knew that Mike was speaking, the proper foundation is probably lacking. But if David were able to testify that he had previously heard Mike's voice, there would be a proper foundation. Moreover, the fact that the conversation was overheard from Mike's office would support the identification of Mike. Again, it need not be conclusively proven that it was Mike's voice. It just needs to be enough to support a verdict.

Opinion Evidence

Pam could potentially argue that David offered improper opinion evidence when he said that Mike replied in "a measured tone." Lay opinion testimony is admissible if it is 1) based on the witness's perception, 2) helpful, and 3) did not require any specialized knowledge. Here, David has a strong argument that his statement that Mike responded in a measured tone is helpful to provide context to the jury and to show the affair (if David were mad, for example, it could be argued that his statements were false or made in the heat of passion). This testimony as to the tone of voice is probably admissible.

Hearsay

The crux of whether the statement is admitted is likely whether it is inadmissible hearsay. Here, there was an out-of-court statement made by Mike. And it is likely being offered for the truth of the matter asserted--that there was an affair (see below for an argument that it is not hearsay). Therefore, the question is whether it falls under the California exceptions.

California has a hearsay exception for dying declarations in all civil and criminal cases. But Mike's statement does not satisfy that exception. True, Mike is dead, as is required by the California exception. But Mike did not make the statement as his death was impending and it does not relate to the cause of his death.

This also is not an excited utterance--Mike replied in a measured tone. This is not a statement of past or present physical or mental condition (although Mike would satisfy the unavailability requirement). And this is not a statement where Mike is describing his current actions.

David may have a good argument that this is a statement against interest. Under the federal rules, a statement is against interest if it is against penal or pecuniary interest. California also applies the exception where the statement is against social interest. The witness must be unavailable. Here, Mike satisfies the unavailability requirement (he is dead). And this statement could be found to be against social interest. Mike's statement that he was having an affair could be seen as exposing him to adverse social judgments. This would be David's best exception for a hearsay exception to apply.

David could also attempt to argue that this was not hearsay at all because, while it is an out-of-court statement, it is not being offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Rather, David could attempt to show that it was being introduced to show its effect on him, the listener. This argument may not be successful because it would be questionable whether such evidence would be relevant. In a defamation case, truth is a defense. But it is not clear that David's state of mind is relevant. If Sue and/or Mike were public figures or if the matter were one of public interest, then David's state of mind would be relevant, since fault would need to be shown. But if fault need not be shown, then the statement may not be admissible for its effect on him. If the statement were admitted for such a purpose, a limiting instruction would likely be given.

David could also attempt to argue against inadmissibility by arguing that this statement is being used for impeachment purposes, since Pam testified. However, the out-of-court statement of another person is generally not admissible to impeach.

Overall, the best argument is that this was not hearsay or, even better, was a statement against interest. It seems that the testimony was very likely properly admitted.

Answer B

California Evidence Code & Truth in Evidence (Prop 8)

The California Evidence Code (CEC) governs the admission of evidence in California state courts. A constitutional amendment called the Truth in Evidence Amendment (Prop 8) was passed in the 1980s. Prop 8 applies only in criminal cases. It provides that all relevant evidence in California is admissible notwithstanding CEC rules to the contrary. Prop 8 has a number of exclusions, however: (1) hearsay rules; (2) the confrontation clause; (3) CEC 352 (balancing test); (4) privileges; (5) character evidence; (6) the secondary evidence rule.

Because this is a civil lawsuit and not a criminal lawsuit, Prop 8 does not apply.

1. The Email

- Logical relevance

In order for evidence to be admissible, it must be logically relevant. That means that it must have the tendency to make any fact of consequence to the dispute more or less probable than without the evidence. Under the CEC, the fact must also be in dispute. Here, the email is logically relevant because it constitutes the basis of the lawsuit and is actually in dispute.

- Legal relevance

In order for evidence to be admissible, it must also be legally relevant, as tested under CEC 352. In order to be legally relevant, the probative value of the evidence must not be substantially outweighed by undue prejudice, waste of time, or confusion. In addition, there must not be any policy exclusions that might apply to prevent introduction of the evidence (such as prior offers to settle, etc.). Here, the email is legally relevant because its probative value--whether it supports a case for defamation--is not outweighed by undue prejudice, waste of time, or confusion.

- Authentication

In order for relevant tangible evidence to be admissible, it must also be authenticated. The standard for testing this is whether it is sufficient to sustain a finding of authenticity. A number of different kinds of authentication evidence are permissible:
(1) personal knowledge; (2) circumstantial evidence; (3) expert testimony; (4) admission, etc. Here, Ed introduced the email. He testified that he had received the email at work and printed it, and that he had received hundreds of other unrelated emails from David. While it would be preferable to have David authenticate the mail he wrote, this authentication is likely sufficient to sustain a finding of authenticity.

- Secondary Evidence Rule

When the contents of a writing are at the heart of the matter, the secondary evidence rule requires that either an original or duplicate of the document be introduced into evidence (or testimony where the original is unavailable). In California, a duplicate can be: (1) photocopy; (2) carbon copy; or (3) handwritten copy (not true in FRE). Here, the contents of the email are relevant to defamation cause of action. This printing of the email is essentially a photocopy and would satisfy the secondary evidence rule.

- Independent Legal Significance

Pam might argue that the email is not hearsay because it has independent legal significance. Indeed, because this is a defamation action and the email is the defamatory statement, this is likely to be successful.

- Layered Hearsay

Hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered for the truth of the matter asserted. It is generally inadmissible unless it falls within an exception. (The FRE has both exemptions and exceptions, but the CEC only has exceptions.) Here, if the email were not admitted as having independent legal significance, the email is layered hearsay so both the email itself and the statement contained therein must fall admissible under an exception.

- Email: Business Record

A business record is: (1) a recording of an event or condition; (2) made by someone with personal knowledge; (3) made at or near the time the event; (4) kept in the ordinary course of business. Here, the email would not qualify as a business record because David was under no business duty to send this email.

- Statements in Email: Admission by Party Opponent

A statement being offered against a party is an admission by a party opponent. The statement need not have been against the party's interest at the time it was made to qualify. Here, David's statement is being offered against him, and thus it would be admissible as an admission by a party opponent.

- Conclusion

The email will be admissible because it has independent legal significance and is thus not hearsay.

2. Sue's Testimony

- Logical Relevance

See rule above. This evidence is logically relevant because it has the tendency to make a fact of consequence that is in dispute (whether Pam is a thief) more or less probable.

- Legal Relevance

See rule above. This evidence is legally relevant because its probative value--whether Pam is a thief--is not outweighed by undue prejudice, waste of time, or confusion. Pam may argue that this is unduly prejudicial because it paints her as a thief, but she has asserted that the statement in the email is false, and thus the court will allow it.

- Competence

For a witness to be competent to testify, she must have personal knowledge, present recollection, the ability to communicate, and understand that she is under a legal duty to tell the truth. These factors appear to be met -- Sue has personal knowledge of her interaction with Pam and appears to have a present recollection of the interaction. Furthermore, there is nothing to indicate that she lacks the ability to communicate or that she doesn't understand her legal duty to tell the truth. Sue is competent to testify.

- Character Evidence: Pam Stealing $300 of Petty Cash

Character evidence is evidence that tends to convey a moral judgment about someone. The testimony about Pam stealing $300 from the petty cash drawer is character evidence. In California, character evidence in civil cases is inadmissible to prove circumstantial evidence of guilt (there are no exceptions like under the FRE). However, character evidence is admissible if it is in issue, as is the case here. This is a defamation case where Pam has alleged that David's statement calling her a thief is false. Therefore, evidence of her being a thief is highly probative and directly in issue. Thus, the court will allow Sue's testimony that Pam stole $300 of petty cash.

[Note that this could also be considered impeachment evidence. Pam has testified that the contents of the email were false. Specific incidents can be used to impeach a witness, and this would also be appropriate impeachment evidence.]

- Sue's statement accusing Pam of Taking the Money: Not Hearsay

Sue's statement accusing Pam of taking the money is not hearsay because it is not being offered for the truth of the matter asserted. Instead, it is being offered to show its effect on the listener (Pam).

- Sue's statement that Pam walked away: Hearsay

Sue also seeks to testify about Pam walking away when accused of a crime. This statement is hearsay. Hearsay encompasses all assertive conduct, which is conduct that is intended to communicate something. Thus, unless it falls within a hearsay exception, this statement which is being offered for the truth of the matter asserted (that she would not have walked away if she weren't guilty) is hearsay.

- Admission by Party Opponent: Adoptive Admission

A statement being offered against a party is an admission by a party opponent. The statement need not have been against the party's interest at the time it was made to qualify. Adoptive admissions occur where a party is accused or confronted and we would expect them to deny a statement but instead they remain silent, implicitly adopting the statement. Here, we would expect an innocent party accused of stealing to defend herself if it were not true. By simply walking away, Pam has adopted the statement.

- Conclusion

Sue's testimony about Pam stealing $300 of petty cash is admissible because it is character evidence that is in issue in a defamation case; her statement to Pam accusing her of taking the money is not hearsay because it is offered to show its effect on the listener; her statement about Pam's reaction is admissible as an adoptive admission by a party opponent.

3a. David's Testimony About What Pam Said to Mike

- Logical Relevance

See rule above. This evidence is logically relevant because it relates to whether Pam was having an affair with Mike, a key subject of the defamation action and one that is hotly contested.

- Legal Relevance

See rule above. This evidence is legally relevant because its probative value--whether Pam was having an affair with Mike--is not outweighed by undue prejudice, waste of time, or confusion.

- Authentication

In order for this testimony to be admissible, David must be able to authenticate that it was, indeed, Pam speaking. The standard for testing this is whether it is sufficient to sustain a finding of authenticity. Here, David is presumably familiar with Pam's voice and has heard it many times before. This will be adequate to sustain a finding of authenticity.

- Hearsay

See rule above. This evidence is being offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted (i.e., that Pam was having an affair with Mike). Thus, unless an exception applies, it is inadmissible.

- Hearsay Exception: Admission by Party Opponent

A statement being offered against a party is an admission by a party opponent. This statement, made by Pam, is being offered against her. It is thus admissible as an admission by a party opponent.

- Hearsay Exception: Excited Utterance

An excited utterance is a statement made relating to a startling event or condition made while under the stress or excitement of that event or condition. A declarant's availability is irrelevant. Here, Pam cried in what appears to be an excited voice: "Please don't leave me!" This may qualify as an excited utterance, but the better fit is an admission by a party opponent.

- No privileges

Because Pam and David are not married, there are no privileges that might apply to this otherwise confidential communication.

- Conclusion

This testimony is admissible as an admission by a party opponent.

3b. David's Testimony About What Mike Said to Pam

- Logical Relevance

See rule above. This evidence is logically relevant because it relates to whether Pam was having an affair with Mike, a key subject of the defamation action and one that is hotly contested.

- Legal Relevance

See rule above. This evidence is logically relevant because it relates to whether Pam was having an affair with Mike, a key subject of the defamation action and one that is hotly contested.

- Authentication

See rule above. Here, David is presumably familiar with Mike's voice and has heard it many times before. This will be adequate to sustain a finding of authenticity.

- Hearsay

See rule above. This evidence is being offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted (i.e., that Pam was having an affair with Mike). Thus, unless an exception applies, it is inadmissible.

- Declaration Against Interest

A declaration against interest is a statement made by an unavailable declarant that was against his interest at the time it was made and that the declarant knew was against his interest at the time it was made. In California, it can be against a person's penal, financial, or social interest. A statement is against someone's social interest if it would subject them to hatred, ridicule, or disgust. Declarations against interest are only admissible where a declarant is unavailable. A declarant can be unavailable due to death, inability to secure their presence through reasonable process, total memory failure, privileges, or their refusal to testify out of fear and despite a court order.

Here, Mike died and is thus unavailable. The statement by Mike ("Our affair is over") is against his social interest. He was acknowledging that he was having an affair with Pam in the first place. Thus the first part of his statement "Our affair is over" is admissible as a declaration against interest.

- Dying Declaration

A dying declaration is a statement made by a declarant while he thought he was imminently dying and describing the conditions or circumstances of his death. The declarant must be unavailable, and in California the declarant must have actually died and it can be used in either civil or criminal cases. This statement does not appear to be while David thought he was dying or about the conditions and circumstances surrounding his death. It is thus inadmissible as a dying declaration.

- Excited Utterance

See rule above. This exception does not apply because the facts state that David responded "in a measured tone." Therefore, he was not under the stress or excitement of an event.

- Present State of Mind

A statement describing a person's present state of mind (usually statements like "I intend" or "I plan") are admissible as hearsay exceptions regardless of the declarant's availability. Here, the first part of the statement may also qualify under the present state of mind exception because it is demonstrating that David intends to end the affair. Nonetheless, the declaration against interest exception is the best fit for this statement.

- No privileges

Because Pam and David are not married, there are no privileges that might apply to this otherwise confidential communication.

- Conclusion

This testimony "Our affair is over" is admissible as a declaration against interest. The second half of the testimony "you need to get on with your life" may be admissible only if it is being offered to show the effect on the listener, Pam.

Q6 Contracts

On February 1, Bing Surfboards ("Bing") ordered 400 gallons of epoxy from Super Chemicals ("Super") using its standard purchase order. Bing's purchase order provided that delivery would be no later than February 20, but stated nothing about warranties, disclaimers, or remedies. Super responded with its standard acknowledgment, which purported to accept the order and confirmed that delivery would be no later than February 20. It also provided: (1) "Seller disclaims all warranties of merchantability and fitness." (2) "In no event shall Seller be liable for consequential damages." (3) "This acceptance is expressly made conditional on your assent to the terms of this acceptance."

On February 15, Bing received the epoxy.

On February 20, Bing tested the epoxy by manufacturing 50 surfboards. The epoxy did not harden properly, leaving the surfboards useless.

On February 23, Bing emailed Super stating that the epoxy had failed to harden properly and that it was returning the remaining epoxy.

On February 25, not having heard from Super, Bing bought 400 gallons of epoxy from one of Super's competitors, paying a substantially higher price for quick delivery, which was necessary to avoid a shutdown of Bing's production line.

On February 26, Super informed Bing that it was shipping replacement epoxy to arrive the following day. The original epoxy had failed to harden because of manufacturing defects of which Super was unaware. Although the replacement epoxy was not defective, Bing rejected delivery and refused to pay.

Bing has sued Super for the increased price of epoxy it had to pay to Super's competitor, and for loss due to 50 defective surfboards.

Super has sued Bing for rejecting its replacement shipment and for not paying under the contract.

1. Is Bing likely to prevail in its suit? Discuss.

2. Is Super likely to prevail in its suit? Discuss.

Answer A

Bing's suit against Super

Governing law

The contract in question concerns epoxy, a good. Thus, UCC Article 2 applies to the contract.

Both Bing and Super are merchants, since Bing deals usually in surfboards and Super deals usually in epoxy and other chemicals. Thus, the rules applicable are those where both parties to the contract are merchants.

Contract formation

An initial question is whether a contract was formed by Super's standard acknowledgment.

In order for a valid contract to be formed, there must be offer, acceptance and consideration. Under the UCC, conditional acceptance is not treated as an acceptance; rather it is treated as a rejection. Here, Super's response to Bing was clearly conditional. Thus, it functioned as a rejection of Bing's offer, and no contract was formed.

Although no contract was formed, a subsequent implied contract may nevertheless have been formed by the performance of the parties. Here, Super did indeed send epoxy to Bing, which accepted it and, at least initially, did not object. All of the subsequent conduct and communications of Bing and Super are also in line with the existence of a contract. Thus, it is possible that the court will find an implied contract between the parties. Such a contract, implied purely from conduct, would not contain any of the disclaimers in Super's acknowledgment form. Thus, default warranties and damages rules would apply.

Terms of the contract

Even if the court instead finds that a contract was formed by Super's acknowledgment, it is likely Bing can show that the terms regarding disclaimer of warranties and consequential damages have not been integrated into the contract.

Under UCC, for a contract between two merchants, offer does not have to mirror acceptance. However, any terms in the acceptance that vary the offer will not become a part of the contract unless (1) both parties are merchants, (2) the terms are not material, and (3) no objection is raised to them within a reasonable time.

Here, both the disclaimer or warranties and the limitation of damages are material terms, since the warranties go to the heart of the quality of goods being delivered and the limitation of damages speak directly to the economic interests of the parties. Since one of the elements is not met, these terms are not part of the contract, and the default warranties and damages rules apply.

Perfect Tender

Bing is likely able to demonstrate that a perfect tender was not made by Super, entitling it to reject the goods and cease performance (also relevant to Super's suit, later) and seek alternative goods.

Under the UCC, failure to make a perfect tender of goods ordered is a breach of the contract that allows the non-breaching party to reject goods and cease performance. Also, a warranty of merchantability is implied if the seller is a merchant, stating that the goods are fit for their ordinary purpose, and a warranty of fitness is implied if the seller knows the buyer is buying the goods for a particular purpose and relying on seller to provide conforming goods. (As noted above, these warranties have not been properly disclaimed.)

Here, it would appear likely that both warranties are breached. The warranty of merchantability is breached since the epoxy was defective due to a manufacturing problem - unless it can be shown that the defect affects surfboards but not the usual uses of epoxy, the warranty is breached. The warranty of fitness is breached since Super knew Bing needed the epoxy for surfboards (because Bing's name is Bing Surfboards) and was relying on Super to deliver the epoxy fit for the manufacturing of surfboards, and failed to deliver that kind of epoxy.

Since the epoxy delivered was nonconforming goods that did not satisfy the implied warranties, perfect tender was not made.

(Note: If the warranties were in fact properly disclaimed from the contract, then perfect tender was made, since Bing would have taken the epoxy "as is" and the defect would breach no contractual term. In that case, Bing would not have been entitled to reject the goods; it would not recover any of the damages noted below; and it would be liable to Super for rejecting the goods and will need to pay the full contract price.)

Cover / consequential damages

Bing is likely able to recover that part of the increased price of epoxy reflecting a higher market price (if any), but will have a harder time recovering the increased price of epoxy reflecting quick delivery.

In general, where a seller breaches by delivering non-conforming goods, a buyer is entitled to seek cover by procuring the same goods on the market, and recover the difference between the cover price and the contract price. Thus, to the extent Bing's cover price is higher because the same goods now cost more on the market, it is able to get that difference from Super.

However, consequential damages (damages particular to a particular non breaching party) are generally not recoverable unless the breaching party could reasonably foresee such damages at the time of contract. Here, to the extent Bing's cover price is higher because it needed the goods faster, such difference would instead be consequential damages. Bing would have to show that Super could foresee that Bing would have incurred these costs to avoid a shutdown of its production line. It would probably be difficult for Bing to show with sufficient certainty what level of damages would have been foreseeable to Super at the time the contract was made on February 2. Thus, Bing will have a harder time getting that portion of damages from Super.

Incidental damages

Loss due to the 50 defective surfboards is incidental damages which Bing may recover from Super.

When a contract is breached, the non-breaching party may always recover incidental damages, which are damages relating directly to the handling of the nonconforming goods. Since Super has breached and Bing has incurred incidental damages relating to the defective surfboards, it can get damages for that from Super.

Super's suit against Bing

The analyses regarding governing law, contract formation, terms of the contract and perfect tender are all the same as above.

Rejecting cure

Super likely will not prevail on the point of Bing rejecting the replacement shipment.

Under the UCC and the perfect tender rule, once the time for performance has passed, seller is not entitled to cure by shipping conforming goods unless it knows it is reasonable for it to do so at that time. Here, the time for performance had passed by six days by the time Super told Bing it was shipping replacement epoxy, during which time Bing had already told Super about the issue and that Bing was returning the defective epoxy. As an industrial merchant, Super should probably be familiar with the manufacturing processes of its clients and should probably be aware that there is at least a good probability that a six day delay is too long for a manufacturing customer, which would probably have made cover arrangements during that period. Thus, Super probably can't show that it was reasonable to provide conforming goods six days late.

In short, Super will fail on this claim.

Not paying

Super likely will also fail on its claim to get Bing to pay under the contract.

Once perfect tender is not made, the buyer is entitled to reject the goods, cease performance and not pay. Here, Bing has properly rejected the goods, and it is therefore entitled to not pay.

If Bing had, instead, kept the defective epoxy, Super would probably be able to recover under a restitutionary theory for Bing's enrichment (in that case, though, Super's recovery would have been based on the value of the defective epoxy, not the contract price). But since Bing rejected, it was not enriched, and Super would not be able to recover under that theory either.

In short, Super will fail on this claim as well.

Answer B

Governing Law

All contracts except for contracts for the sale of goods are governed by the common law. Contracts for the sale of goods are governed by Article 2 of the UCC. Article 2 of the UCC provides special rules for contracts between merchants. Here, the contract was for the sale of a movable good, epoxy. A merchant is an entity that regularly deals in goods of the kind in question. Here, Bing regularly ordered epoxy as part of its manufacturing and Super regularly sold epoxy. Therefore, both parties were merchants and the special rules for merchants applied.

Formation of Contract

Offer and Acceptance

To be valid a contract must contain an offer and acceptance as well as mutual assent. An offer is an expression of intent to enter into a contract, communicated to the offeree, as by making a promise, undertaking, or commitment. The terms of the offer must be sufficiently definite to enable a court to enforce the resulting contract. For a contract for the sale of goods, an offer must indicate the subject matter of the contract and contain a quantity term. An offer is accepted by an expression of assent to the terms of the offer communicated to the offeror.

Here, Bing made a valid offer to Super, indicating the subject matter, epoxy, and the quantity, 400 gallons. Further, Bing indicated an intent to enter into a contract. Super's acknowledgment, however, did not constitute an acceptance. Under the UCC, the "battle of the forms" provision controls the terms of a contract when the terms of the acceptance vary from the offer. Here, Super's acceptance contained additional terms to the contract. Ordinarily, additional terms to the contract will become a part of the contract, unless 1) the terms materially modify the contract, 2) the offer expressly limits acceptance to its terms, or 3) the offeror has objected or objects to the additional terms within a reasonable time. If an acceptance indicates that it is conditional on assent to additional terms, it is not construed as an acceptance, but as a rejection and a counteroffer. Therefore, Super's acknowledgment was not an acceptance of Bing's offer, but rather a rejection and counteroffer. Because Bing did not accept the counteroffer, a contract could only be formed by conduct.

Additionally, even if the acknowledgment had not been conditional on assent to additional terms, the additional terms would likely not have become part of the contract. This is because the terms were material alterations of the contract. A term is considered to be material where it alters or in some way limits the available remedies. Here, the additional terms disclaimed warranties of fitness and merchantability, and disclaimed liability for consequential damages. This would severely limit the remedies available to Bing in the event of breach. Because these were material alterations, they would not become part of the contract under the UCC.

Consideration

To be valid, a contract must have consideration, which is a bargained-for legal detriment by both parties or a consideration substitute. A legal detriment may consist of promises exchanged for each other. Here, if a contract was formed between the parties, there would be consideration. Super promised to provide 400 gallons of epoxy. If Bing accepted the contract by conduct, it would become obligated to pay the stated purchase price. Therefore there was an exchange of promises. Alternatively, if the offer and acknowledgment formed no contract, a consideration substitute might be found through promissory estoppel. Promissory estoppel results when a party makes a promise, intending to induce the reliance of the other party, and the other party foreseeably relies on that promise to its detriment.

Bing's Suit Against Super

Breach of Contract

The first issue is whether Super breached its contract with Bing. Because Super's acknowledgment form constituted a counteroffer, which was not accepted by Bing, a contract could only have been formed by conduct. A court would find an implied in fact contract from the shipment of the goods and payment for the goods. However, the terms of Super's acknowledgment would not become part of the contract unless accepted by Bing, which they were not. As a result, Super's disclaimer of warranty and consequential damages was ineffective. Because the disclaimers were ineffective, Super's goods would include an implied warranty of merchantability. The implied warranty of merchantability provides that when a seller of a particular type of goods sells that good, that the goods will be commercially reasonable and will be fit for the ordinary purpose for which such goods are used. Here, Super's epoxy failed to harden properly because of a manufacturing defect. As a result, Super breached the implied warranty of merchantability.

Under the UCC, shipments of goods are governed by the perfect tender rule. Under the perfect tender rule, goods must completely conform to the buyer's specifications or they may be rejected. Any deviation from the buyer's specifications or from commercial suitability is a material breach allowing the buyer to reject the goods. A breach of the implied warranty of merchantability would be a material breach of contract under the perfect tender rule entitling the buyer to reject the shipment. Because the epoxy did not harden properly and was defective, Bing was entitled to reject the shipment. Further, there would be no contract until Bing paid for the goods. Because Bing did not pay for the goods, there was no enforceable contract except to the extent one was created by conduct or promissory estoppel. Super's shipment of epoxy would then be construed as an offer which could be rejected at Bing's discretion.

Super may have also breached the implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose. The implied warranty of fitness provides that when a seller of goods knows of the particular purpose for which the buyer is using the goods, and the buyer is relying on the seller's skill and judgment in selecting the goods, that the goods must be fit for the particular purpose for which they are used. If Bing had informed Super that it was using the epoxy to make surfboards, and was relying on Super's skill and judgment to furnish epoxy which would be suitable for the purpose, then Super would breach this contract when the epoxy was not suitable for use in making surfboards.

Rejection

The next issue is whether Bing properly rejected the shipment of epoxy. A buyer has a right to inspect the goods before acceptance. Therefore, it was appropriate for Bing to test the epoxy before determining whether to accept the shipment. A buyer of goods may reject a shipment of goods by notifying the seller within a reasonable time of the defect and of intention to reject the goods and returning them. The buyer may accept all the units, or accept some commercial units and reject the rest. Here, Bing tested the epoxy and notified Super a little over a week after the shipment. This would probably constitute a reasonable time after receiving the shipment. Bing returned the defective goods to Super. Therefore, Bing's rejection of the shipment was proper.

Implied in Law or Implied in Fact Contract

A court might find that there was no contract because Bing rejected the offer created by Super's shipment of the goods and never paid for them. A court might also find that a contract existed on the basis of promissory estoppel. Here, Bing notified Super of its requirements and requested shipment by February 20. Super confirmed that it would ship the goods by February 20. Super was aware and would be deemed to know that Bing was using the epoxy in its manufacturing process and might suffer lost profits if the epoxy was defective. Bing relied on this promise to its detriment by not procuring alternative goods in sufficient time to avoid paying a premium and to avoid shutting down its production line. Therefore, a court could likely find that a contract was implied in law by Bing's justifiable reliance on Super's promise to ship the goods by February 20.

On the basis of an implied in law contract, Bing could likely prevail in its suit against Super because it justifiably relied to its detriment on Super's representation that it would ship the epoxy by February 20. If, however, a court found that there was no contract, Bing would not be able to recover any contractual damages.

Damages

Bing would be able to recover compensatory expectation damages from Super for the breach if there was indeed a contract. Expectation damages are designed to put the nonbreaching party in the position it would have been in had the other party properly performed. In a contract for the sale of goods, where the buyer is forced to cover, the buyer must make a good faith effort to obtain a reasonable replacement within a reasonable time. The buyer can recover the difference between the cover price and the contract price. Here, Bing could recover the difference between the price it agreed to with Super and the cover price.

Bing might also be able to recover consequential damages in the form of lost profits, as well as incidental damages. To be recoverable, consequential damages must be certain, foreseeable, and unavoidable. Consequential damages are damages over and above expectation damages resulting from special circumstances of which the seller knows at the time of the contract formation. Here, Super was aware that Bing was using the epoxy in its manufacturing process, and could foresee that Bing might suffer lost profits if the epoxy was defective. Super was aware of Bing's special circumstances. Therefore, it would have been foreseeable to Super that Bing might lose money if the epoxy shipment was defective. Moreover, a supplier is deemed to know of a manufacturer's requirements if it knows that the manufacturer is using the goods as part of the manufacturing process. Here, consequential damages would be measured by the costs expended in manufacturing the 50 defective surfboards, and lost profits resulting from the inability to sell those surfboards, if Bing could sell as many surfboards as it could produce and was a lost volume seller. This would be a sufficiently certain measure of damages because it would be measured by the quantity and cost of defective surfboards produced, as well as any additional surfboards that might have been sold but for the breach. Moreover, Bing made every effort to mitigate its damages and avoid the loss to the extent possible by covering immediately at a reasonable price and reasonable time. Bing might also have incidental damages in locating an alternative supplier of epoxy. Therefore Bing could probably obtain lost profits and incidental damages.

Super's Lawsuit Against Bing

Rejection of Replacement Shipment

Ordinarily when a seller breaches a contract by providing nonconforming goods, the seller has within the time for performance of the contract to cure the breach. Here, Super can argue that because Bing was delayed in notifying Super of the breach, it was not notified within a reasonable time and therefore could not cure within the time for performance. However, likely a court would find that Super was notified within a reasonable time. Because the time for performance of the contract had lapsed, Super had no right to cure the defective shipment. Ordinarily if the seller had reason to believe that the goods would be acceptable with a reasonable allowance, a reasonable additional time might be allowed for the seller to cure. But this is not the case here. Additionally, the fact that Seller was unaware of the manufacturing defects would not grant it additional time to cure. Therefore, Seller had no right to cure.

Paying Under Contract

Because any contract between Bing and Super would be implied rather than actual, Bing would not be liable for payment for the goods if it rejected the goods. Even in a contract formed by mutual assent the buyer would have a right to reject. Further, Super's disclaimers of warranty would not be effective because Super's counteroffer was not accepted. Super's disclaimer might be found to be unconscionable as a contract of adhesion even if it were deemed to have been accepted by Bing. A buyer is deemed to accept those units of the good that he or she actually uses. Further, in an implied in fact contract, there is a contract only to the extent of the goods actually accepted. Therefore, Bing would only be liable for those gallons of epoxy that it used in testing to manufacture the 50 surfboards. Bing would be deemed to accept that quantity of epoxy and would have to pay for it. Otherwise, Bing would not be liable under the contract.

Super is unlikely to prevail in its suit against Bing because there was no mutual assent to terms of a contract. The contract would be implied in law or implied in fact. Further, Super could not disclaim its implied warranty of merchantability in an implied contract. Therefore, Buyer had the right to reject nonconforming shipments, and Super did not cure within the time for performance. Therefore, Bing will not be liable to Super.

Unless a question expressly asks you to use California law, you should answer according to legal theories and principles of general application.

Q1 Civil Procedure

Doctor implanted a valve in Patient's heart in State A, where both Doctor and Patient lived. The valve was designed in State B by Valvco. Valvco was incorporated in State C, but had its headquarters in State D.

Patient was visiting State B when he collapsed due to his heart problems. Patient decided to remain in State B for the indefinite future for medical treatment.

Patient sued Doctor and Valvco in state court in State B for $100,000, alleging that Valvco defectively designed the valve and Doctor negligently implanted it. Another patient had recently sued Valvco alleging that it defectively designed the valve, and had obtained a final judgment in her favor after trial on that issue.

Doctor and Valvco each moved the state court to dismiss the case on the ground of lack of personal jurisdiction. The state court granted Doctor's motion and denied Valvco's.

Valvco then filed a notice in federal court in State B to remove the case. Patient immediately filed a motion in federal court to remand the case to state court. The federal court denied Patient's motion.

Relying solely on the judgment in the other patient's action, Patient then filed a motion in federal court for summary adjudication of the issue that Valvco defectively designed the valve. The federal court granted the motion.

1. Did the state court properly grant Doctor's motion to dismiss? Discuss.

2. Did the state court properly deny Valvco's motion to dismiss? Discuss.

3. Did the federal court properly deny Patient's motion for remand? Discuss.

4. Did the federal court properly grant Patient's motion for summary adjudication? Discuss.

Answer A

Did the State Court Properly Grant Doctor's Motion to Dismiss?

Doctor filed a motion to dismiss based on lack of personal jurisdiction. A motion to dismiss on jurisdictional issues is proper when, viewing the facts in the most favorable light to the defendant, the plaintiff has failed to satisfy the elements of personal jurisdiction. Failure to object to personal jurisdiction before answering or in a party's first 12(b)(6) motion waives the issue. There is no indication that waiver occurred here. Thus, the issue is whether the court in State B had personal jurisdiction over the Doctor.

Traditional Basis for Jurisdiction

Personal jurisdiction refers to the power of a court to adjudicate claims involving a particular party. Traditionally, personal jurisdiction is based on three concepts: consent, presence, and domicile. Here, there is nothing in the facts indicating that the doctor consented to personal jurisdiction. Moreover, there is nothing in the facts indicating that he was served while he was in State B or that he is a resident of state B. The facts indicate Doctor is a resident of state A. Thus, the traditional bases for jurisdiction are not met.

Long-Arm Jurisdiction/Constitutional Limits of Jurisdiction

Many states have adopted long-arm statutes to obtain personal jurisdiction over non-residents. While long-arm statutes can differ by state, jurisdiction under a long-arm statute must satisfy the constitutional requirements for the exercise of jurisdiction. Many states, like California, have adopted long-arm statutes which extend personal jurisdiction to the constitutional limits. In order to satisfy the constitutional requirements for personal jurisdiction, the defendant must have such minimum contacts with the forum state as to not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. In determining whether such minimum contacts are present, courts look to three things: 1) the level of contacts with the forum state, 2) the relatedness of those contacts to the cause of action, and 3) whether the exercise of jurisdiction would be fair, taking into account private and public considerations.

Contacts

To determine whether a defendant has minimum contacts with the forum state to justify an exercise of personal jurisdiction, the court looks: 1) whether the defendant purposefully availed himself to the forum state and 2) whether the exercise of jurisdiction by the forum state would be foreseeable. Here, there is nothing in the facts to indicate that Doctor purposefully availed himself of the benefits and protections of State B. He did not travel to state B and he did not do business with state B or a company in state B. While the valve by Valvco was designed in state B, Doctor (or the hospital with whom he associates) likely dealt with Valvco through its headquarters in State D and purchased the valve through Valvco in State D. Thus, doctor has done nothing to purposefully avail himself of the benefits and protections of state B. It is not foreseeable that Doctor could be sued in State B because doctor did not conduct surgery in state B or take any action in state B. Moreover, Doctor did not interact with any State B residents. Patient was not a citizen of state B when doctor operated on him. While patient collapsed while in state B, such a fact, if considered foreseeable, would make doctor amenable to jurisdiction in any state, as it could be assumed that his patients could travel to any state and then fall ill. This is too tenuous of a connection to be considered foreseeable under the constitutional analysis. Thus, Doctor did not have sufficient contacts with the forum to satisfy the constitutional limits of jurisdiction.

Even though Doctor did not have sufficient contacts to warrant jurisdiction, the remaining elements are discussed for completeness.

Relatedness of Contacts

General Jurisdiction

The court looks to see whether defendant's contacts with the forum state are so extensive, as to find that the defendant is essentially at home in the forum state. If so, the court has general jurisdiction over the defendant and the defendant is amenable to a wider range of lawsuits in the state. Here, as stated above, Doctor did not have sufficient contacts with the state to show minimum contacts. Thus, he is not at home in state B.

Specific Jurisdiction

If general jurisdiction does not exist, the court looks to see whether the defendant's particular contacts with the state relate to or give rise to the particular cause of action. If so, the court has specific jurisdiction over the defendant. Here, the cause of action arises out of doctor's negligence in implanting the valve. This took place in State A. There is nothing to indicate that doctor's negligence extended to state B, except that B collapsed there. Thus, there is no specific jurisdiction over Doctor in State B.

Fairness

To determine whether jurisdiction is fair, courts look to a variety of public and private factors. Courts look to several factors, including the Plaintiff's interest in the chosen forum, a state's interest in providing redress for its citizens or for harms that occur in its state, and whether the exercise of jurisdiction would be so unfair as to offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. Here, the forum state does have an interest in providing redress for its citizens. Patient is currently domiciled in state B. Domicile is determined by someone's physical location combined with an intent to stay. Here, the facts state that Patient is physical in state B and wishes to remain there or the indefinite future. Thus, Patient is a domicile of State B. However, he was a citizen of state A when the negligence occurred. While some of the witnesses concerning the design of the valve may be in State B, the action against the doctor is for negligence. Thus, most of the evidence and witnesses, such as medical records, surgery staff, and nurses would be in State A. Thus, on the balance it is not fair to exercise jurisdiction in State B.

Conclusion

Based on the above analysis, since Doctor does not have any basis for traditional jurisdiction and since Doctor does not have such minimum contacts with the forum, as to make the exercise of jurisdiction not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice, jurisdiction over D was not proper. Thus, the court properly granted his motion to dismiss.

Did the State Court Properly Deny Valvco's Motion to Dismiss?

Valvco filed a motion to dismiss based on lack of personal jurisdiction. A motion to dismiss on jurisdictional issues is proper when, viewing the facts in the most favorable light to the defendant, the plaintiff has failed to satisfy the elements of personal jurisdiction. Failure to object to personal jurisdiction before answering or in a party's first 12(b)(6) motion waives the issue. There is no indication that waiver occurred here. Thus, the issue is whether the court in State B had personal jurisdiction over Valvco.

Traditional Basis for Jurisdiction

As stated above, personal jurisdiction refers to the power of a court to adjudicate claims involving a particular party. Traditionally, personal jurisdiction is based on three concepts: consent, presence, and domicile. Here, there is nothing in the facts indicating that Valvco consented to personal jurisdiction. Moreover, there is nothing in the facts indicating that it was served while he was in State B. For jurisdiction purposes, a corporation is domiciled in the state of incorporation and the state of its principal place of business. The corporation's principal place of business is where its headquarters are or where its officers are located. Here, Valvco is incorporated in State C and has its headquarters in state D. Thus, it is domiciled in State C and D. Since the lawsuit is brought in state B, there is no basis for personal jurisdiction based on Valvco's domicile. Thus, the traditional bases for jurisdiction are not met.

Long-Arm Jurisdiction/Constitutional Limits of Jurisdiction

The requirements for long-arm jurisdiction are described in detail above. In order to satisfy the constitutional requirements for personal jurisdiction, the defendant must have such minimum contacts with the forum state as to not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. In determining whether such minimum contacts are present, courts look to three things: 1) the level of contacts with the forum state, 2) the relatedness of those contacts to the cause of action, and 3) whether the exercise of jurisdiction would be fair, taking into account private and public considerations.

Contacts

To determine whether a defendant has minimum contacts with the forum state to justify an exercise of personal jurisdiction, the court looks to two things: 1) whether the defendant purposefully availed himself to the forum state and 2) whether the exercise of jurisdiction by the forum state would be foreseeable. Here, Valvco used state B to design its valve. Thus, it availed itself of the labor force in State B and the privileges and benefits of operating a business location in state B. Thus, Valvco purposefully availed himself of State B. Moreover, the exercise must be foreseeable. Since the valve was designed in State B, it is foreseeable that someone injured by design of the valve may bring a lawsuit in state B for negligent design. Thus, Valvco has sufficient contacts for constitutional jurisdiction purposes.

Relatedness of Contacts

General Jurisdiction

The court then looks to see whether defendant's contacts with the forum state are so extensive, as to find that the defendant is essentially at home in the forum state. If so, the court has general jurisdiction over the defendant and the defendant is amenable to a wider range of lawsuits in the state. Here, Valvco's only activity in state B from the facts was designing the valve. This is likely not continuous or systematic activity which rises to the level of Valvco being "at home" in the forum state. Thus, general jurisdiction does not exist.

Specific Jurisdiction

If general jurisdiction does not exist, the court looks to see whether the defendant's particular contacts with the state relate to or give rise to the particular cause of action. If so, the court has specific jurisdiction over the defendant. Here, the cause of action arises out of Valvco's negligent design of the valve. The design took place in State B. Thus, there is specific jurisdiction over Valvco.

Fairness

To determine whether jurisdiction is fair, courts look to a variety of public and private factors. Courts look to several factors including Plaintiff's interest in the chosen forum, a state's interest in providing redress for its citizens or for harms that occur in its state, whether the exercise of jurisdiction would be so unfair as to offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. Here, the forum state does have an interest in providing redress for its citizens. As discussed above, Patient is currently domiciled in state B. Domicile is determined by someone's physical location combined with an intent to stay. Here, the facts state that Patient is physically in state B and wishes to remain there or the indefinite future. Thus, Patient is a domicile of State B. Moreover, witnesses concerning the design of the valve are likely in State B. State B also has an interest in ensuring products developed in its state are not defective to protect its residents and other foreseeable plaintiffs. Thus, on the balance it is fair to exercise jurisdiction in State B.

Conclusion

Based on the above analysis, since Valvco has such minimum contacts with the forum, as to make the exercise of jurisdiction not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice, jurisdiction over Valvco is proper. Thus, the court properly denied its motion to dismiss.

Did the Federal Court Properly Deny Patient's Motion for Remand

Removal refers to a defendant's ability to remove a case brought initially in state court to federal court for adjudication. In order to remove a case, the case must have been one that could have originally been brought in federal court. Removal is proper to the federal district encompassing the location where the original action was filed in state court. Moreover, removal has to be timely--it has to be within 30 days of the last pleading giving rise to a removal action and cannot in any cases be more than a year since the filing of the lawsuit. Removal is not proper when a defendant is a resident of the state in which the action is brought and all defendants must join in the removal for it to be proper. If removal is not proper, then the plaintiff can file a motion to remand the case back to state court. A motion to remand must be filed within 30 days of the notice of removal.

Was Timing of Removal Proper

First, as a preliminary matter, removal has to be timely--it has to be within 30 days of the last pleading giving rise to a removal action and cannot in any cases be more than a year since the filing of the lawsuit. There is nothing in the facts to explicitly indicate that the timing issue here was violated. However, the motion for removal was filed after Doctor and Valvco moved the court to dismiss on an issue of personal jurisdiction and the decision on the motion was returned. This likely took more than 30 days. Thus, removal after the motions to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction may not be timely. On these grounds alone, the court could grant Patient's motion for remand.

Is Any Defendant a Citizen of the State in Which the Action was Filed?

Removal is not proper when a defendant is a resident of the state in which the action is brought. Here, as explained above with respect to personal jurisdiction, Doctor is a resident of State A and Valvco is a resident of States C and D. Thus, this is not a bar to removal.

Did all Defendants Join in Removal?

All defendants must join in the removal for it to be proper. Here, the facts indicate that V filed a notice of removal in federal court. The facts do not indicate that D joined in this motion. However, at the time, D had been dismissed from the case. Thus, Doctor was no longer a defendant and was not required to join in the motion for removal. This was not a bar to removal.

Could the Case Originally Be Brought in Federal Court?

For removal to be proper, the case must be one that could have initially been brought in federal court. Federal courts are courts of limited jurisdiction. A federal court must have subject matter jurisdiction over the claims, meaning the court must have the power to adjudicate the dispute. The two most common bases for federal jurisdiction are federal question jurisdiction and diversity jurisdiction.

Federal Question Jurisdiction

Federal question jurisdiction refers to claims that are brought to enforce or decide a federal right. Here, the case brought was a defective design case against Valvco and a negligence claim against Doctor. These are both state law tort claims and do not invoke federal question jurisdiction. Thus, the case could not have been brought in federal court on the basis of federal question jurisdiction.

Diversity Jurisdiction

For diversity jurisdiction to exist, there must be diversity between plaintiffs and defendants and the amount in controversy must exceed $75,000.

Diversity of Citizenship

Complete diversity between all parties is not required for diversity jurisdiction. However, there must be completed diversity between all Plaintiffs and all Defendants -- that is all Plaintiffs must be of diverse citizenship of all Defendants. Citizenship is determined at the time of filing of the action. For individuals, an individual can only have one citizenship--his or her domicile. Domicile is where a person is physically present with intent to permanently remain.

Here, the facts indicate that Doctor lives in State A. Thus, since no facts indicate he does not intend to remain there indefinitely, he is a citizen of State A.

Patient was a citizen of state A when the surgery occurred, but after he was injured he remained in state B with intent to stay there indefinitely. Thus, Patient became a citizen of state B. Plaintiff was a citizen of State B upon the filing of the lawsuit.

Corporations are considered domiciled where they have their principal place of business and where they are incorporated. The corporation's principal place of business is where his headquarters are or where his officers are located. Here, Valvco is incorporated in State C and has its headquarters in state D. Thus, it is domiciled in State C and D.

Looking at the parties, the case is Patient (B) v. Doctor (A) and Valvco (C and D). Thus, diversity exists for federal jurisdictional purposes because the Plaintiff is of diverse citizenship from all defendants.

Amount in Controversy

The amount in controversy for diversity jurisdiction requirements looks at the amount from Plaintiff's well-pleaded complaint, irrespective of costs and fees. Here, the facts indicate that Patient sued Doctor and Valvco in state court for $100,000. Aggregation of amounts in controversy against more than one defendant is proper if each defendant is jointly and severally liable for the full amount. Thus, if Patient's case seeks joint and several liability from Doctor and Valvco, jurisdiction is proper. However, if Patient was seeking $50,000 from Doctor and $50,000 from Valvco individually, the amount in controversy would not be satisfied for jurisdiction. There are not enough facts to determine how the damages may be allocated.

Conclusion

Since there is diversity of citizenship and the amount in controversy requirement is met, assuming joint and several liability, this is a case that could initially be brought in federal court under diversity jurisdiction.

Ultimate Conclusion

Since this is a case that could have originally been brought in federal court, Defendant is not a resident of the state in which the action was filed, and all defendants at the time joined in the removal, removal is proper. Thus, the motion to remand was properly denied. However, based on the timing of the notice of removal, if it occurred after 30 days from the last pleading raising a removable issue, Patient's motion to remand may be granted.

Did the Federal Court Properly Grant Patient's Motion for Summary Judgment?

Summary judgment is granted when there is no issue of material fact and a party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Summary judgment often comes up along with issues of claim preclusion or issue preclusion.

Claim Preclusion

The first issue is whether summary judgment can be granted due to claim preclusion.

Claim preclusion occurs when an identical claim was already fully litigated on the merits to a final judgment, by a court with jurisdiction, between the same parties. This prevents subsequent actions deciding the same claim that was already decided.

Here, the facts indicate that another patient recently sued Valvco alleging defective design of the valve and obtained a final judgment on the merits after a trial. With respect to Valvco, assuming it is the same valve in question, this is the same issue that is at issue in the present case. Thus, the identity of issues was met. The facts indicate that there was a judgment in her favor after trial, so there is a final judgment on the merits. Federal courts do not require all appeals be exhausted before using claim preclusion. However, claim preclusion requires identity of parties. Here, the prior action involved another patient and Valvco, not this Patient and Valvco. Thus, the requirements for claim preclusion are not met.

Issue Preclusion

The second issue is whether summary judgment can be granted based on issue preclusion.

Issue preclusion prevents an issue that was already fully litigated on the merits from being re-litigated. The requirements for issue preclusion are 1) the same issue, 2) actually litigated and decided, 3) a final judgment on the merits, 4) the issue was essential to the judgment and 5) in the cases of non-mutual issue preclusion, fairness.

Same Issue

Here, the facts indicate that another patient recently sued Valvco alleging defective design of the valve and obtained a final judgment on the merits. With respect to Valvco, assuming it was the same valve, this is the same issue that is at issue in the present case. Thus, the identity of issues was met.

Actually Litigated and Decided

The facts indicate that there was a judgment in her favor after trial, so issue was actually litigated and decided.

Final Judgment on the Merits

The facts indicate that there was a judgment in her favor after trial, and it wasn't based on a lack of jurisdiction or other decisions not on the merits, so there is a final judgment on the merits. Federal courts do not require all appeals be exhausted before applying issue preclusion.

Essential to the Judgment

It appears the decision was essential to the judgment, as the other patient brought a defective design case and won. There are no other facts indicating there were separate or alternative grounds for the other patient's success in the suit. Thus, a finding of negligent design is essential to the judgment.

Fairness/Non-Mutual Issue Preclusion

Traditionally, issue preclusion required the same parties to the prior lawsuit assert issue preclusion or at least parties in privity with each other. If that was the case, then issue preclusion could not be used here for the reasons explained above with claim preclusion.

However, many courts now allow non-mutual issue preclusion to be used if it is fair. Here, Patient is trying to use non-mutual offensive issue preclusion--that is, a Plaintiff is using it as a sword against a Defendant in a later action. Courts typically allow this if Valvco had the same or similar motivations to defend the prior suit and if it would not be unfair or unjust. Here, both actions were for defective design. Thus, Valvco had a similar motive to defend this prior lawsuit. Therefore, it is not inequitable for Patient to use issue preclusion.

Since there is issue preclusion and Valvco is precluded from claiming it is not negligent, there is no issue of material fact with respect to Valvco's negligent design. Thus, summary judgment should be granted for Patient. The court was proper in granting the motion.

Answer B

1) State Court Properly grant Doctor's motion ("D") to dismiss?

The issue here is whether the State B court had personal jurisdiction ("PJ") over A. The plaintiff's place of residence or domicile is irrelevant to this issue.

Traditional Bases of PJ

Personal jurisdiction assesses whether the court has power over the defendant such that it may hear a case against him. There are three traditional bases that personal jurisdiction can be established over a defendant. If the defendant consents to the jurisdiction; is domiciled in the jurisdiction; or is served while present in the jurisdiction (although, not if served due to the fraud or deceit of the plaintiff, or, in federal court, if served while serving as a witness or party in a court case). For a person, domicile requires two elements be met: 1) presence in the forum state and 2) an intent to permanently remain in the forum state.

In this case, none of the traditional methods appear to be applicable. D was not served in State B nor did he consent to the jurisdiction of the court (if he did, he would not have brought the motion to dismiss). He also is not domiciled in State B. D lives in State A and is merely visiting State B for these court proceedings; he does not intend to stay permanently.

Long-arm Statute

If the traditional bases of PJ do not apply, we then must analyze the state's long-arm statute. A long-arm statute permits a state to have PJ over out-of-state defendants. There are two types of long-arm statutes--those that apply the minimum constitutional requirements of due process to establish personal jurisdiction and those that have specific limitations beyond those prescribed by the Due Process clause. Here, we are not told of State B's long-arm statute; we are similarly not told of any restrictions the state has regarding PJ. Thus, it is likely (and will be assumed) that the state simply applies the constitutional analysis.

Constitutional Requirements

The Supreme Court has held that, for a state to have PJ over a defendant, the defendant must have sufficient minimum contacts with the state, such that traditional notions of fair play and justice are not offended by the use of jurisdiction over him. The Court has established a three-factor test to determine whether minimum contacts exist: 1) contact; 2) relatedness; 3) fairness.

Contact

Under the contact factor, courts ask whether the defendant purposely availed himself of the benefit and protections of the state's laws, and based on that availment, was a law suit foreseeable. Here, D has not purposely availed himself of the protections of State B's laws. He has not practiced medicine in State B, and there are no facts showing that he has even stepped foot in State B, other than for purposes of this lawsuit. As a result, a lawsuit against him in State B was not foreseeable. PJ would likely fail due to this factor.

Conclusion: Thus, the state court properly granted D's motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction.

2) State court Properly deny Valvco's ("V") motion to dismiss?

The issue here is whether the State B court had PJ over V.

Similarly to D, the traditional bases (domicile, consent, and personal service) of PJ will not work to acquire jurisdiction over V. A corporation's domicile includes both all of the states where it is incorporated as well as the location of its principal place of business--the place where the corporate's headquarters, officers, and main employees that operate the whole company are located. Here, V is incorporated in State C and its headquarters, which would likely comprise its principal place of business, is in State D. Thus, it is not domiciled in State B, it was not served in State B (based on the facts), and it clearly has not consented to PJ. None of the traditional bases works.

Additionally, the long-arm statute likely will apply the constitutional analysis. Thus, the three-factor test will be used here as well to determine if V had minimum contacts with State B to establish personal jurisdiction.

Contact

As mentioned above, under the contact factor, courts ask whether the defendant purposely availed himself of the benefit and protections of the state's laws, and based on that availment, was a lawsuit foreseeable in the state. Here, although the facts are somewhat unclear, it is likely that V has purposely availed itself of the benefits and protections of State B's laws. V designed the valve that purportedly injured Patient ("P") in State B. It likely has employees permanently located and working in the state. If so, it has purposely availed itself of the state's laws, and it was entirely likely that it could be sued in the state.

Relatedness

The relatedness factor identifies if one of two forms of jurisdiction exist--specific and general jurisdiction. Specific jurisdiction exists when the actions that the defendant took in the state are related/caused the cause of action to arise. Specific jurisdiction grants the court the PJ to hear only that case against the defendant. In contrast, general jurisdiction asks whether the defendant has maintained a systematic and continuous presence in the forum state such that it is essentially at home. If so, a court can hear any case against the defendant.

Here, specific jurisdiction exists, and with additional facts, general jurisdiction could be shown to exist as well. V's conduct in the state, designing the valve, led directly to the cause of action at hand. As a result, the claim and its actions are related, and it establishes specific jurisdiction. General jurisdiction could also exist if the company has a factory or team of workers in the state that remain there consistently. However, specific jurisdiction is sufficient to establish PJ.

Fairness

The last factor simply asks whether exercising PJ in the forum state is fair. The court will look to both the defendant's and plaintiff's interests in having the proceedings in the state, as well as the state's interests in exercising jurisdiction. Here, it seems entirely fair that V will be subject to State B's jurisdiction. The employees that designed the valve are likely in State B, making it reasonable for the plaintiff to proceed in the state, and the plaintiff lives in the state. Thus, the plaintiff's interests are in favor of the proceeding. Additionally, State B has an interest in protecting its citizens from the potentially negligent acts of business in the state. Finally, the defendant's interests do not weigh so heavily in favor of the court not exercising PJ to justify dismissal. Only when the D's interest is gravely injured by the exercise of PJ should it be denied.

Conclusion: The state court properly denied V's motion to dismiss for lack of PJ.

3) Fed Court properly deny Patient's ("P") motion for remand

For the court's decision to be correct, it must have had subject matter jurisdiction, and V must have had the power to remove the case. If either of those elements were not met, it should have remanded the case back to the state court. The first issue here is whether the federal court had subject matter jurisdiction ("SMJ") over P's claim, such that V could remove the case.

SMJ

Subject matter jurisdiction ("SMJ") determines whether a court has the ability to hear a case. SMJ can be established in one of three ways, although only two are relevant here--federal question jurisdiction and diversity jurisdiction. Federal question jurisdiction applies when the plaintiff, in its well-pleaded complaint, raises a federal right or claim of relief--the federal claim cannot arise in another pleading, but must be clear from the complaint. If federal question jurisdiction exists, removal to a federal court is always appropriate. Here, P's complaint does not raise a federal issue--it is a state law tort issue--and as a result, federal question jurisdiction does not exist.

Diversity jurisdiction requires that two elements be met. First, there must be complete diversity between the parties--the case must involve citizens of different states or a citizen of the US and a foreign citizen, and all plaintiffs must be from a different state than all defendants. Diversity is determined at the time the case is instituted. A person is a citizen of the state he or she is domiciled (present and intend to permanently remain), while a corporation is a citizen where it is domiciled (incorporation and principal place of business). Here, complete diversity does exist. P is likely a citizen of State B at this moment. He is present in State B and intends to remain there for the indefinite future (however, even if he is a citizen of State A, diversity will still exist). V, on the other hand, is a citizen of both State C (incorporated) and State D (principal place of business). Thus, complete diversity exists.

To have diversity jurisdiction, the second element required is that the suit be for greater than $75,000. Unless it is clear to a legal certainty that the plaintiff's amount is below $75,000, the plaintiff's claim for relief that is made in good faith and greater than the threshhold will establish the amount for diversity purposes. Typically, the amount sued for applies only to one defendant; however, in the case of joint tortfeasors, the amount applies to all defendants. In this case, P sued D and V for $100,000. Although D is no longer a party to the case (as a result of the motion to dismiss), the $100,000 claim is applicable to V. As a result, the amount in controversy requirement is met.

Removal appropriate

The second issue is whether V met the requirements for removal and whether it was appropriate.

Removal must be made within 30 days of being served the complaint in a matter. The notice of removal must be sent to the federal court encapsulating the state court in question, and it must join all defendants currently in the matter. In this case, these initial requirements appear to be met. Although we are not given facts regarding the 30-day timeline, it seems to be met. Additionally, V filed the notice in the appropriate federal court--the State B federal court. Lastly, because D had been dismissed as a defendant, the notice included all required defendants. Thus, at first glance, the elements were met.

In a diversity case, however, removal may not be had in two situations. First, if the defendant is a citizen of the state where the state court sits, it is not appropriate, and removal should be denied. Second, removal may only be had within one year after service, and any removal actions sought after one year should be denied.

Here, as mentioned, V is not a citizen of State D; therefore, that limitation does not apply here. Second, although the facts are ambiguous, it would appear that the motion was timely brought within the one-year period. As a result, removal was properly granted, and P's motion for remand was properly denied.

Conclusion: P's motion for remand was properly denied by the Federal Court.

4) Fed Court properly grant P's motion for summary adjudication?

The issue here is whether issue preclusion should apply.

Summary judgment is appropriate when there are no genuine material issues of fact in dispute and the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. It is at the court's discretion, however, as to whether it will grant the motion. The motion may be made any time prior to 30 days after the end of discovery. Both claim and issue preclusion can be used to establish that no genuine material issues of fact exist, such that summary judgment is appropriate. Additionally, if issue preclusion does not justify the granting of a total summary judgment, a court may grant a partial summary judgment as to that particular issue or permit additional time to prove up the other necessary facts.

Claim Preclusion (res judicata)

Claim preclusion is not applicable here. For claim preclusion to apply, the same two parties from a prior final judgment on the merits must be in a second proceeding, in which one party is seeking to relitigate a claim litigated at the first proceeding or one that should have been made at that proceeding. Here, P was not a party to the first proceeding, and as a result, the doctrine will not apply.

Issue Preclusion (collateral estoppel)

A party can be estopped from relitigating an issue that was litigated at an earlier proceeding if issue preclusion applies. Issue preclusion requires the following elements to be met: 1) a final judgment on the merits in a prior proceeding; 2) the issue sought to be estopped was actually litigated; 3) that issue was essential to the judgment; and 4) mutuality of parties. Here, the prior case involved V and another plaintiff. That plaintiff won the case based on the allegation that V had defectively designed the valve used in P's case. Thus, there was a final judgment on the merits of the case. Additionally, the issue that P seeks to estop V from relitigating--the defective design--was actually litigated and essential to the court's judgment in the final proceeding.

The final determination is whether mutuality of the parties exists in this case. Although mutuality of parties used to require the same parties in both the prior and current proceeding, American courts have relaxed this requirement. Instead, defensive claim preclusion (used by a defendant) has been upheld in nearly all jurisdictions, and offensive claim preclusion (where the plaintiff seeks to estop the defendant) is gaining traction, and it has been used by the Supreme Court. Offensive issue preclusion is allowed if the party that will be estopped had a fair and equitable opportunity to litigate the issue at the prior proceeding. If that party had such an opportunity to litigate, then issue preclusion can apply notwithstanding the fact that the plaintiff was not a party in the prior proceeding.

Here, offensive claim preclusion should be allowed. V had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the defective design issue. It was in its best interest to put forth all of its efforts in winning that case. If not, and as seen here, other users of their products would likely start to sue them using the judgment to their advantage. It had the opportunity to call witnesses and cross-examine the other plaintiff's witnesses. It is fair and equitable that V should be estopped from relitigating the issue here.

Partial or total summary judgment

Although P may have shown a defectively designed product manufactured by V, he has not yet shown the other requirements of either a negligent design action (duty, causation, and damages) or a strict product liability action (causation, damages). As a result, total summary judgment is likely not appropriate in this matter. However, at the court's discretion, it could grant partial summary judgment as to the defective design issue, or give P additional time to prove up the additional elements, such that she could receive a total summary judgment. Thus, it should not have granted the total summary judgment as it did based on the facts at hand.

Conclusion: The state court erred in granting a total summary judgment; at best it should have granted a partial.

Q2 Real Property

Oscar owned a fee simple absolute interest in Greenacre. He conveyed a fee simple defeasible interest in Greenacre to Martha and Lenny "as joint tenants with a right of survivorship for so long as neither Martha nor Lenny make any transfer of Greenacre. In the event of such a transfer, Greenacre shall automatically revert back to Oscar."

Subsequently, without Lenny's knowledge, Martha conveyed all of her interest in Greenacre to Paul. She died shortly afterwards. Unaware of Paul's existence, Lenny paid the property taxes.

Paul entered into a written lease of his interest in Greenacre with Sally for a two-year term at a rental of $500 per month. At the end of the lease, Sally stopped paying rent, but continued to occupy Greenacre without Paul's consent. After three months, Paul confronted Sally. Although they did not agree to a new lease, Sally paid Paul the three months' rent she had not paid and resumed paying him monthly rent.

Lenny then attempted to sell his interest in Greenacre. He soon learned that Sally was occupying Greenacre and that Paul had acquired Martha's interest.

Concerned about conflicting property interest claims regarding Greenacre, Lenny commenced a lawsuit seeking to quiet title against Oscar, Martha's estate, Paul, and Sally, and to obtain from Paul an accounting and contribution for a share of the rent paid by Sally and for a share of the property taxes paid by Lenny.

1. What property interest in Greenacre, if any, is the court likely to find possessed by Oscar, Lenny, Paul, Sally, and Martha's estate? Discuss.

2. Is Lenny likely to obtain an accounting and contribution from Paul? Discuss.

Answer A

1. Interests in Greenacre

To determine who has what interest in Greenacre (G), the validity and effect of each transfer/agreement must be determined. Generally, property may be transferred by sale, gift, will, or intestate succession. Leases may also create interests in possession of property.

Oscar

First, it must be determined what interest Oscar (O) had in the property. A fee simple is the largest property interest possible and O began with a fee simple interest in G.

Fee Simple Determinable

A fee simple defeasible is a fee simple interest that may be cut short by a subsequent event. When a fee simple defeasible contains terms of duration (e.g. as long as, for the time that, until, etc.), it is a fee simple determinable. A fee simple determinable will be a fee simple until a designated event occurs. Here, O's conveyance to Martha (M) and Lenny (L) was likely a fee simple determinable because it contained the phrase "for so long as." Thus, this conveyance conveyed a fee simple determinable interest to M and L.

Possibility of Reverter

The grantor of a fee simple determinable interest retains a possibility of reverter. Here, O's conveyance additionally contained explicit language that he retained a possibility of reverter. A possibility of reverter means that fee simple automatically reverts to the grantor at the time the designated event occurs. The grantor need not go to court to claim this interest; the interest automatically vests at the occurrence of the subsequent event. Here, O had a possibility of reverter. The event in question was if either M or L made any transfer of G. Thus, if his possibility of reverter was valid, O gained a fee simple interest in G at the time M transferred her interest in G to Paul (P).

Restraints on Alienation

However, the possibility of reverter here may not be valid because it may be an undue restraint on alienation. Generally, courts do not allow title instruments/conveyances that absolutely prohibit future transfer of the property. Restraints on alienation may be allowed if the restraint is only conditional/for a moderate time period (e.g. does not transfer for the next 50 years). However, absolute restraints on alienation are invalid. Any language indicating such absolute restraint will be struck from the instrument, so the resulting interests will remain. Here, the proposed restraint was absolute--O conveyed to M and L so long as neither transferred G. There was no condition or limited time period on this restraint; it was absolute. So, this clause will be struck from the instrument and the remaining interests will exist. With this clause struck, there is no future event that gives O a possibility of reverter. Rather, it changes M's and L's interests to fee simple interests and strips O of his possibility of reverter. Thus, because of the striking of the invalid restraint on interest, O conveyed G in fee simple to L and M and retains no interest in the property. So, O has no interest in G.

Lenny

As discussed above, because the alienation language had to be struck, L received a fee simple interest with M in G from O.

Joint Tenancy

There are various forms of co-tenancies. Each form allows all co-tenants to possess the whole of the property, though each holds only a lesser, divided share of the property. A tenancy in common is the default form. A joint tenancy carries the additional right of survivorship between joint tenants. This right of survivorship means that when one joint tenant dies, the surviving joint tenant receives the deceased joint tenant's interest in the property automatically, and the deceased tenant's interest is no longer part of her estate and so cannot be passed through probate. A joint tenancy exists when property is conveyed by an instrument that indicates intent for the property to be held as a joint tenancy with a right of survivorship, and when the four unities of (1) possession, (2) interest, (3) time, and (4) title exist. Here, O conveyed G to M and L "as joint tenants with a right of survivorship." So, the explicit language indicating intent to convey as a joint tenancy and to convey a right of survivorship is present.

1. Possession

The unity of possession means that all joint tenants have equal right to possess the whole property. Here, although L and M (and P as M's successor) took various degrees of possession of G, there is no indication that any ousted the other at any time--i.e. no tenant ever prevented the other from taking possession of the whole property. Thus, there was unity of possession.

2. Interest

Unity of interest means that each joint tenant must have an equal share interest in the property--i.e., for two joint tenants, each must have a 50 percent interest rather than, e.g., one having a 40 percent and one a 60 percent interest. Here, it is not indicated what interest each L and M had in G, so presumably each was conveyed a 50 percent interest in G. So, there was unity of interest.

3. Time

Unity of time means that each tenant must have acquired her interest in the property at the same time. Here, initially, both L and M acquired their interests in G at the same time--when O conveyed it to them. However, subsequently, M conveyed her interest to P. So, P acquired his interest in G at a different time than L (the remaining joint tenant), thus destroying the unity of time (discussed more below).

4. Title

Unity of title means that each tenant must have acquired her interest in the property by the same instrument. Here, as with the unity of time, L and M initially had unity of title because both originally acquired their interests in G by means of the grant from O. However, when M conveyed her interest in G to P, P then got title from M's conveyance while L still had title from O's conveyance. So the unity of title was also broken at that time.

Thus, while M and L originally were tenants in common because the four unities were present and the intentional joint tenancy and right of survivorship language was included in the relevant instrument, the joint tenancy ended when M conveyed her interest in G to P because this broke the unities of time and title.

Tenancy in Common

When any of the unities for a joint tenancy are broken, the tenancy reverts to a tenancy in common. A tenancy in common is the default form. Under a tenancy in common, each co-tenant has equal right to possess the whole of the property, but only a lesser divided interest in the property. Under a tenancy in common, each tenant may devise her interest in the property or it will pass through intestate succession because a tenancy in common has no right of survivorship.

Here, because the unities of time and title were broken when M conveyed her interest in G to P, the tenancy reverted to a tenancy in common. So, at that point, L and P held G as tenants in common with no right to survivorship. However, each's interests in the property (i.e. 50 percent share) was not affected.

So, at the time of the action, L held a 50 percent interest in G as a tenant in common.

Paul

Next, it must be decided what interest P had.

Inter Vivos Transfer

P obtained his interest in G by an inter vivos transfer from M. It must be determined that this interest is valid. First, the provision in the conveyance from O that the property was conveyed to M and L so long as neither transferred it could prohibit the transfer. However, as discussed above, that provision of O's conveyance was an invalid absolute restraint on alienation, so must be struck from the instrument. Thus, M was not restrained from transferring by means of O's clause in his conveyance. Second, the nature of a joint tenancy may prevent M from transferring her interest. Generally a joint tenant may transfer her interest in the property without the consent of her joint tenants. The effect of the transfer is that it converts the joint tenancy to a tenancy in common, but permission is not required to make the transfer. By contrast, a tenancy by the entirety--which is a joint tenancy held by married spouses--requires that property interest cannot be transferred without consent of the other tenant-by-the-entirety. Here, there is no indication that M and L were married to each other, so no indication that this was a tenancy by the entirety rather than a joint tenancy. So, as a joint tenancy, M was not required to obtain L's permission to transfer to P. Third, as a transfer of interest in real property, the Statute of Frauds would ordinarily require that the conveyance be in writing. Here, it is not clear whether the conveyance was in writing, but the Statute of Frauds may nonetheless be satisfied by part performance if P did two of the three: took possession of the property, made payment for the property, or made improvements on the property. So, M's transfer to P was likely valid.

Tenancy in Common

As discussed above, thus, P holds a 50 percent interest in G as a tenant in common with L.

Lease to Sally

However, P has also entered a lease with Sally (S) that may affect his interests. There are three kinds of landlord-tenant leases--(1) tenancy for years, which is a lease for a definite period of time; (2) periodic tenancy, which is a lease for a definite period (e.g. one month) that automatically renews at the end of each period; or (3) tenancy at sufferance, which is a tenancy caused by the holdover of property by the tenant after a lease has ended. Generally, rental leases need not be in writing unless they are a lease for years for greater than a 1-year term (because the Statute of Frauds requires a writing for any contract that cannot be performed within one year). Here, the initial rental agreement was for 2 years, but was in writing. P initially rented G to S as a tenancy for years with a fixed two-year term. A tenancy for years automatically terminates at the end of the fixed period. So, here, this tenancy terminated at the end of two years.

A periodic tenancy is created by implication if a tenant pays rent and the landlord accepts it each period. Typically, a periodic tenancy is created at the end of a tenancy for years when the tenant pays rent and the landlord accepts. However, here, S stopped paying rent at the end of the two-year lease, but remained on G as a holdover. So, at that time, a Tenancy at Sufferance was created. However, when S subsequently paid P for those three months and resumed paying monthly rents, a periodic tenancy was created if P accepted those rents. There is no information to the contrary, so P presumably accepted those rents.

Thus, at the time of the action, P owned a 50 percent interest in G as a tenant in common, but leased possession of G to S as a periodic tenancy.

Sally

S's interest in G is only that granted her by her lease with P. Because P, as a tenant in common, has a right to possess the whole property, he may lease the whole property to a tenant. Further, as discussed above, at the time of the action, S and P had a periodic tenancy by implication. Thus, S has an interest in possessing the whole of G (but no ownership interest) as a periodic tenancy.

Martha's Estate

Finally, as discussed above, M's inter vivos transfer to P was valid. Thus, that property was no longer in M's estate at the time she died. So, M's estate has no interest in G.

2. Likelihood Lenny Can Obtain an Accounting and Contribution from Paul

Next, it must be determined whether L can obtain an accounting and contribution from P, his tenant in common.

Rights to Third-Party Rents

Generally, tenants in common each have a right to possess the whole property. So, one tenant may not demand rent from her co-tenant because the co-tenant possesses the whole of the property exclusively. However, co-tenants may demand accounting for rents received from third parties. Here, P, a co-tenant, rented G to a S, a third party, and received rents from S. So, L may demand an accounting for the rents received from S in proportion to his interest in the property. Here, L had a 50 percent interest in G, so may demand 50 percent of the rents received from S.

Contribution for Operating Expenses

Generally, tenants in common are not entitled to contribution from other co-tenants for costs expended to repair or improve the property. However, they are entitled to contribution for basic operating expenses--which include property taxes. Here, L paid all property taxes on G after M died. Because property taxes are operating expenses, L is entitled to demand contribution from P for his share (proportionate to his interest in the property). Here, P had a 50 percent interest in G, so L may demand that P pay him contribution for 50 percent of the property taxes.

Answer B

1. What Property Interests in Greenacre is the Court Likely to Find Possessed by Oscar, Lenny, Paul, Sally, and Martha's Estate

Oscar

Fee Simple Determinable and the Possibility of Reverter

The issue is whether Oscar has the possibility of a reverter interest in Greenacre. Oscar owned a fee simple absolute interest in Greenacre. He conveyed a fee simple defeasible interest in Greenacre to Martha and Lenny as joint tenants with the right of survivorship, but included a fee simple determinable ("FSD"), so that if Martha or Lenny ever transferred Greenacre, the property shall automatically revert back to Oscar.

Thus, Oscar attempted to give Martha and Lenny an FSD, and leave for himself the possibility of a reverter. A possibility of reverter follows an FSD. A possibility of reverter means that the property automatically reverts back to the grantor upon the happening of an event, and thus, the grantor does not need to take any action in order to regain access to the property.

Improper Restraint on Alienation

The issue is whether Oscar's FSD to Martha and Lenny contained an improper restraint on alienation. If Oscar's FSD is found to be a complete restraint on alienation, then the condition will be removed and Martha and Lenny will own Greenacre in fee simple. Oscar will be left with no remaining interest in Greenacre.

An owner of property may grant interests in property subject to certain conditions. These are known as defeasible fees and include fee simples determinables ("FSD") and fee simples subject to conditions precedents ("FSCS"). A court will generally uphold such conditions, as long as they are reasonable restraints on use and not complete bars on alienation. Public policy favors free alienability of property. Thus, a court will generally invalidate a FSD if the condition contains a complete restraint on alienation. A court will remove the condition, and leave the grantee with a fee simple absolute interest in the property.

Here, Oscar stated that neither Martha nor Lenny may make any transfers of Greenacre. Lenny and Martha's estate will thus argue that this condition is a complete bar on alienation, and thus invalid. The two will argue that in the event that they are to sell Greenacre, it will automatically revert back to Oscar. Thus, they will argue that this is a complete restraint on alienation because it does not require any action from Oscar to determine whether or not to take back Greenacre: it simply automatically reverts back to him upon any alienation of the property.

Oscar, however, will argue that this is not a complete restraint on alienation. He will argue that Martha and Lenny may do whatever they like with the property and may use it however they like; they may even rent it out to tenants, but their only restraint is that they may not entirely transfer the property. Thus, he will argue that when Martha transferred her interest in Greenacre to Paul, Greenacre automatically reverted back to him. However, this argument is a weak one, for it appears that the condition is one barring complete alienation.

Conclusion

If a court finds Oscar's argument persuasive, then Oscar has a fee simple absolute in Greenacre, for Greenacre reverted back to Oscar when Martha transferred Greenacre to Paul. If this is the case, then Paul, Lenny, Martha's Estate, and Sally have no interest in Greenacre. However, a court is more likely to find Oscar's restraint on alienation complete and unreasonable. Thus, a court is likely to find that Oscar transferred Greenacre to Lenny and Martha in fee simple absolute, and that Oscar retains no interest in Greenacre.

LENNY'S INTEREST IN GREENACRE

Joint Tenancy

The issue is whether Lenny owns Greenacre in fee simple, or as a tenancy in common with Paul. Oscar granted Greenacre to Lenny and Martha "as joint tenants with a right of survivorship." As discussed above, the condition that Oscar placed on Greenacre is likely an invalid restraint on alienation, and thus Oscar granted Lenny and Martha the land as joint tenants in fee simple. A joint tenancy gives the co-owners equal right and possession to the property. The right of survivorship, a unique aspect of a joint tenancy, allows one joint tenant's interest in the land to pass to the other joint tenant upon death. A joint tenancy is created with the four unities are present: the joint tenants must have equal interests, rights to possession, must have obtained title by the same interest, and must have obtained title at the same time. Thus, at the onset, Lenny and Martha owed Greenacre as joint tenants with a right of survivorship, in fee simple absolute.

Severance of a Joint Tenancy

A joint tenancy is severed when any one of the four unities discussed above is severed. A joint tenancy may be severed by one joint tenant conveying his interest to another. A severance can occur without the permission of the other joint tenant. When a severance occurs, the new owner of the land will take as tenants in common with the remaining joint tenant.

Here, Martha conveyed all of her interest in Greenacre to Paul. Thus, she severed the joint tenancy. When she severed the joint tenancy, Lenny and Paul became tenants in common.

Tenancy in Common

In a tenancy in common, the only unity that exists is the unity of possession. There is no right of survivorship. Thus, when Martha transferred her interest to Paul, Paul and Lenny became tenants in common, with equal rights of possession in Greenacre. Lenny lost his right of survivorship when Martha transferred her interest to Paul. Lenny may argue that because he did not consent to Martha's transfer, when Martha passed away they were still joint tenants, and her interest passed to him through the right of survivorship. However, this argument will fail. As discussed above, consent of the joint tenants is not necessary for severance.

Conclusion

Thus, a court will likely find that Lenny has a fee simple absolute interest in Greenacre and that he is a tenant in common with Paul.

PAUL'S INTEREST IN GREENACRE

As discussed above, Martha conveyed her interest in Greenacre to Paul before her death. She therefore severed the joint tenancy. Paul thus takes the same as Lenny: he has a fee simple absolute interest in Greenacre, and is a tenant in common with Lenny.

MARTHA'S ESTATE'S INTEREST IN GREENACRE

A court is likely to find that Martha's estate has no remaining interest in Greenacre. Before Martha's death, Martha conveyed all of her interest in Greenacre to Paul. Thus, Martha has no remaining interest in Greenacre.

SALLY'S INTEREST IN GREENACRE

The issue is whether Sally created a new periodic tenancy when she resumed paying monthly rent to Paul. Paul, a co-owner of Greenacre, entered into a written lease of Greenacre with Sally for a two-year term at a rental of $500 per month. At the end of the lease, Sally stopped paying rent but continued to occupy Greenacre without Paul's consent. After Paul confronted Sally, while they did not enter into a new lease, Sally paid Paul the three months' rent she had not paid and resumed paying him monthly rent.

A lease is a possessory interest in property whereby the tenant maintains a present interest in the property, and the landlord retains a future interest. There are four types of leases or tenancies: tenancy at will, tenancy at sufference (a holdover tenancy), periodic tenancy, and tenancy for years. Here, it seems as though initially, Sally and Paul entered into a tenancy for a term of two years. Thus, they had a tenancy for years, which was to terminate at the end of the two year period.

Holdover Tenant - Tenancy at Sufferance

When Sally stopped paying rent, but continued to occupy Greenacre without Paul's consent, Sally became a holdover tenant. When one stops paying rent but remains on the premises, one becomes a holdover tenant. A holdover tenant is one who was once properly on the landlord's premises, but has exceeded her permission to occupy the premises, and thus remains on the premises unlawfully. A landlord has the right to evict the holdover tenant and sue for past rent, or the landlord may create a new periodic tenancy, by operation of law, with the tenant.

Periodic Tenancy

Although they did not agree to a new lease, Sally and Paul entered into a new periodic tenancy by operation of law. It appears as though Paul accepted Sally's late payment of the three months' rent, and Sally resumed paying Paul monthly. Thus the pair created a new month-to-month periodic tenancy, where rent will be due every month. The periodic tenancy will require notice to terminate it. The amount of notice required will be one month, the time of one period under their lease. If Paul has indeed accepted Sally's three months' rent she has not paid and has accepted her next month's rent, then Sally is a tenant and Paul is her landlord.

Conclusion

Sally has a present possessory interest in Greenacre under a periodic tenancy. However, as long as proper notice is given, she or Paul may terminate the periodic tenancy at any point, and Sally will retain no interest in Greenacre.

2. Is Lenny Likely to Obtain an Accounting and Contribution from Paul?

The issue is whether Lenny may obtain a contribution from Paul for a share of the property taxes paid by Lenny and whether Lenny may obtain an accounting from Paul for a share of the rent money paid by Sally.

Contribution

A contribution is a payment from one co-tenant to another co-tenant to reimburse a co-tenant for necessary costs spent in maintaining the property. Co-tenants who do not presently occupy the property (live there or otherwise do business on the premises) are required to share the costs of necessary improvements, principle payments on the mortgage, and taxes paid on the property. If one co-tenant pays these costs up front, he is entitled to contribution from his co-tenants.

Here, Lenny paid taxes on Greenacre. Thus, he is entitled to contribution from Paul to reimburse him for half of the amount spent.

Accounting

An accounting is a sharing of the profits derived from the property that two tenants co-own. Co-tenants of a property are entitled to share in the profits gained from leasing the property to a third party.

Here, Paul leased the property to Sally. He obtained $500 per month for two years, plus as discussed above, started a new periodic tenancy with Sally at the end of the two year period. Lenny is thus entitled to a receipt of half of the profits earned from the leasing of Greenacre to Sally.

Conclusion

Lenny is likely to obtain both an accounting and contribution from Paul.

Q3 Criminal Law and Procedure

Owen, a police officer, had a hunch that Dora might be selling methamphetamine from her house in the country. To learn more, Owen drove to Dora's house with a drug-detection dog and waited until she left.

Owen first walked the drug-detection dog around Dora's house. At his direction, the dog jumped up on the porch, sniffed the front door, and indicated the presence of methamphetamine.

Owen then propped a ladder on the back of the house, climbed to the top, and peered into a second-story bedroom window. He saw a small box on a bedside table, but could not read the label. He used binoculars to read the label, and saw that it listed ingredients that could be used to make methamphetamine.

Owen went back to his car, saw Dora return home, and then walked back to the house and crouched under an open window. He soon overheard Dora telling a telephone caller, "I can sell you several ounces of methamphetamine."

Dora was arrested and charged with attempting to sell methamphetamine.

Dora has moved to suppress evidence of (1) the drug-detection dog's reaction, (2) the small box, and (3) the overheard conversation, under the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

How should the court rule on each point? Discuss.

Answer A

The Fourth Amendment of the US Constitution - incorporated to the states by the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment - protects citizens from unreasonable search and seizure. The touchstone of a search and seizure is reasonability. This means that to conduct a search, the police officer or agent of the state must have a valid search warrant. Where there is no warrant, the search will be unreasonable unless one of the valid warrant exceptions exists.

Exclusion Rule - Suppression Remedy

Evidence seized in violation of the fourth amendment will be suppressed at trial. Further, under the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine, all evidence gathered as a result of an unlawful search will be suppressed as well unless the government can show that the taint of the unconstitutional activity has been sufficiently attenuated.

State Action

A "search" requires government action. Here, Owen is a police officer; thus, this requirement is met.

"Search"

A search only occurs where the government physically intrudes on the person's person, property or effects, or when the government intrudes on a person's "reasonable expectation of privacy" (REOP).

Because there is no indication that Officer Owen had a warrant for any of the activity discussed below, his actions are unreasonable if they constitute a "search" and if no valid warrant exception applies.

1. The Dog's Reaction

The issue here is whether the use of the drug-sniffing dog at the front porch was a search.

Government Action

As discussed above, the fourth amendment is only triggered by state action. Action by a police officer is sufficient. Here, Owen is a police officer. Thus, there is state action.

"Search"

A search exists where the government interferes with a reasonable expectation of privacy (REOP) or where there is a physical trespass into constitutionally protected space (persons, places or effects).

Trespass Theory

The Supreme Court recently held that bringing a drug-sniffing dog to the front porch of a home for the purpose of searching for drugs is a "search" under the fourth amendment. Although the front door is typically held open under implied consent doctrine, the use of a drug-sniffing dog exceeds this consent and is therefore a trespass. (Note: this is unlike the case of using a drug-sniffing dog at a traffic stop, which is reasonable under the fourth amendment.)

Here, Owen brought the drug-sniffing dog to the porch for the purpose of checking for drugs. He did not have a warrant to do so. Because Dora did not consent to this, this is a search under the trespass theory of the 4th amendment.

REOP

Dora could also argue this is a search under the REOP theory of the 4th amendment. A search occurs where state actors intrude on one's reasonable expectation of privacy. AN REOP exists where the person holds a subjective expectation of privacy and the expectation is objectively reasonable. There is always an REOP in one’s own home. Here, the home belonged to Dora. Thus, Dora could argue that a person has an REOP in her front door in regards to drug-sniffing dogs.

The government would point out that the front door is a place where we have no REOP. This was not a search of the home per se. However, even if this is true, Owen also took the dog into the curtilage, where Dora does have an REOP.

Curtilage vs. Open Fields

Curtilage is the area immediately around a home and is intimately tied with the activities of the home. The Court has found an REOP to exist there. Areas that are not curtilage are considered "open fields" and there is no REOP in open fields.

The government will argue that the front door is not part of curtilage. However, the dog also walked around the house immediately next to it. This is likely considered curtilage, where the court has found REOP.

Sensory Enhancing Technology

However, even in the open fields, the government action is a "search" if they use "sensory enhancing technology" not available to the general public. Here, a drug-sniffing dog may meet this test (a plurality of the Supreme Court feels it does). Thus, even if the dog were kept in open fields, the use of a drug dog would still constitute a search.

Conclusion

Because there was a trespass in a constitutionally protected area without a warrant, and alternatively, because the drug-sniffing dog at the front door violated Dora's REOP, the court will find that a "search" occurred without a warrant and the evidence of the dog's reaction should be suppressed.

2. The Small Box

The legality of this evidence will turn on whether a search occurred and whether there was a warrant exception.

Government Action

There was government action (see rule statement above).

"Search" - REOP

The government will argue that no search occurred because the officer was in the open fields and only used binoculars. Dora will argue that the officer's presence in her back yard was an intrusion in the curtilage.

Open Fields vs. Curtilage

See rule statements above. Dora will argue that the officer was in the curtilage of her home because the ladder was propped against her home and he peered into the window. Not only was he in the back yard, but he was also peering into the second story window. This is not open fields because we do not expect people to be propped on a ladder in our backyard. This is clearly curtilage instead of open fields.

Sensory Enhancing Technology

Dora will also argue that the use of the binoculars constituted a search even if the government was properly in the window. The government will argue this was not a search because this technology is available to the public.

The Court has found that a search occurs where the government, even standing in open fields, uses sensory enhancing technology not available to the general public. This covers using heat-detecting technology, for example. Here, the officer used binoculars, which are available to the public. Because binoculars are readily available, the court will likely find that this, alone, will not transform this action into a search.

However, the court will likely find that a search occurred because of Owen's presence in the curtilage. Because it was a search, the evidence should be suppressed unless a warrant exception applies.

Plain View

The government will argue that even if a search occurred, a warrant was not required under the plain view exception. Plain View means that a warrant is not required when officers find evidence in "plain view". We do not require the police to close their eyes to incriminating activity (when walking by an open window, for example). For a search to fall within plain view, two elements must be met: (1) the officer must be lawfully in the place where he made the observation, and (2) the incriminating nature of the evidence must be readily apparent.

Lawfully in the Place

Here, Dora will argue that the officer could not be in the curtilage of her home. The government may argue first that Owen was merely in the curtilage, and so his presence was lawful (see discussion above). Additionally, the government could argue that the dog's reaction at the door provided probable cause for the officer to take a closer look at the house. The court will likely find that without a warrant, this presence in the window on the second story was not proper. The officer needed a warrant to come this close to the house. Thus, he was not here lawfully.

Incriminating Nature of Evidence

If the officer is there lawfully, the criminal nature of the evidence must be readily apparent to qualify under plain view. Here, the box could not be read from the window where Owen saw it - he required binoculars to see that the box contained ingredients used for methamphetamine. However, because binoculars are generally available, the court may find that this meets the "apparent" requirement. On the other hand, the fact that it had ingredients alone may not make it incriminating, unless those ingredients themselves are illegal. The court could find there was nothing apparently incriminating about this evidence.

Thus, the plain view doctrine does not apply.

Fruit of the Poisonous Tree

The fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine suppresses evidence seized as a result of an unlawful search, unless the taint of the illegality has been attenuated. Here, even if the plain view exception applies, Dora could argue that it should be suppressed because it was the result of the illegal use of the drug-sniffing dog at the front door. The government will argue that the taint has been attenuated.

Attenuation

Fruit of the poisonous tree can be admitted if the government can show the taint of illegality has been attenuated. This is often shown where sufficient time has gone by between the illegality and the discovery of the evidence, or where there is an independent source for the evidence, or where it would have been inevitably discovered.

Here, very little time went by. Owen went straight from using the dog to going to the backyard. Further, there is no independent source or reason for inevitable discovery. Thus, the evidence cannot be saved by attenuation and should be suppressed as poisonous fruit.

Conclusion

The court will find that the officer's activity constituted a search when he went into the curtilage of the home and that the plain view exception to the warrant requirement does not apply because the officer was not lawfully in the place where he made the observation and because even if he was, the incriminating nature of the evidence was not immediately apparent. Thus, the evidence of the small box should be suppressed.

3. The Overheard Conversation

State Action

See rule statement above. There is state action here.

"Search"

See rule statement above. Whether or not there was a search will turn on whether Dora had a reasonable expectation of privacy in her conversation with the window open.

Eavesdropping

Generally, there is no REOP in a conversation held in public. There is also no REOP for conversations held in private with another person. The theory is that when one speaks to another person, you assume the risk that that person may be a police informant. Police may not use electronic methods to eavesdrop on phone calls, but that is because there IS an REOP that persons are not listening in on phone calls. Generally there is no REOP in people overhearing conversations. The court has held that there was not a search where officers stuck their ear to a wall to eavesdrop on conversations overheard in the next apartment over. There would be a search, however, if the officers used sensory enhancing technology, or wiretapping to overhear these conversations. Police may not use electronic methods to eavesdrop on phone calls, however, but that is because there IS an REOP that persons are not listening in on phone calls. Generally there is no REOP in people overhearing conversations.

Here, the government will argue there was no search because the officer merely overheard the defendant making incriminating statements. She had her window open and made them loud enough for passers-by to hear. Even though the statements were made over the phone, the conversations were not overheard via electronic wiretapping. Nor was there sensory enhancing technology used. Thus, the court will find that Dora had no REOP in her conversation that was overheard outside.

Curtilage

Dora will again argue that this was a search because Owen was in the curtilage. However, the court has held that merely being on another's property is not curtilage. The are under the window in the front yard is probably not sufficiently connected to the intimate activities of the home to constitute curtilage (compared to peeping in the back, second-story window, for example). We routinely allow officers to walk around the home.

Here, Owen was merely in the front yard and under an open window. We allow officers to make reasonable inquiries around the home. This will likely not be found to be curtilage. Thus, the court will find that Owen was only in the open fields, not the curtilage.

Warrant Exception?

If the court were to find that a search had occurred, the government would have to argue that a warrant exception applied. No warrant exceptions apply.

Fruit of the Poisonous Tree / Attenuation

Dora will argue this should be suppressed anyway as fruit of the poisonous tree. See rule statement above. The government may argue that even if the earlier search were unconstitutional, this evidence should not be suppressed because it was independently discovered by Owen overhearing in the front lawn. His overhearing had nothing to do with the drug-sniffing dog.

However, if the court finds that the earlier search was unconstitutional, and that Owen would not have been in front of the window but for that illegal search, then the criminality has not been sufficiently attenuated and should be suppressed.

Conclusion

Because there is no reasonable expectation of privacy in one's conversations overheard in public, the court will find that there was no search here and therefore the 4th Amendment was not implicated. Evidence of the conversation should not be suppressed. However, the court may find that it should be suppressed as fruit of the earlier unconstitutional use of the drug-sniffing dog.

Answer B

Dora ("D") was arrested and charged with attempting to sell methamphetamine following several questionable search tactics implemented by police officer, Owen ("O"). D has moved to suppress the evidence under the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Despite Dora's involvement in rather exploratory drugs (meth), it appears she will prevail in the suppression of all evidence obtained against her by Owen.

FOURTH AMENDMENT RULES

The Fourth Amendment protects against unreasonable searches and seizures, and is incorporated against the states pursuant to the 14th Amendment due process clause. Here, the drug dog's reaction, the small box spotted with binoculars, and the conversation heard through the window all trigger issues with respect to unreasonable searches and the exclusionary rule.

Expectation of Privacy in the Home

A "search" occurs anytime that a police officer or state actor invades an area that a person has a reasonable expectation of privacy (e.g. home, automobile, or a bag in one's possession). The Supreme Court has long held that persons retain their expectation of privacy in their home; it is a sacred place. Conversely, the government's authority to conduct searches is at its zenith at the border. Here, the facts indicate that O conducted several searches at D's house in the country. Thus, Dora's expectation of privacy is very high in the areas search.

Unreasonable Searches and Seizures and the Exclusionary Rule

As a general rule, a search is unreasonable absent the existence of a warrant and probable cause. However, several exceptions to the warrant requirement exist (e.g. contraband items in plain view; persons committing a crime in plain view). If an exception applies, a search may be reasonable even absent a warrant. However, where no exception applies, any evidence discovered pursuant to an illegal and unreasonable search should be excluded from evidence under the exclusionary rule. Finally, where an illegal search reveals subsequent incriminating evidence, that subsequent evidence discovered may also be excluded as evidence that is "fruit of the poisonous tree" - i.e., evidence that would not have been discovered but for the initial 4th Amendment violation. The only way such subsequent evidence may be admitted is if there is an independent source for that evidence (independent of the illegal search), or the evidence would have been inevitably discovered (despite the illegal search).

The aforementioned rules are applied below, but not restated.

(1) Suppressing Evidence of the Drug-Detection Dog's Reaction

No Warrant

Unless exigent circumstances arise (hot pursuit of a criminal; destruction of evidence), police need a warrant to conduct a home search. The warrant must clearly state facts on which the requesting officer has made a determination of probable cause, and approved by a neutral magistrate. Here, the facts do not indicate that O obtained a warrant before investigating D's house. Thus, the searches are presumptively unreasonable and violate the fourth amendment.

Probable Cause

The facts indicate that O drove to Dora's on a "hunch" that D might be selling methamphetamine, and further that O brought his drug-detection dog. The Supreme Court has held that probable cause, while need not be definitive, must be "more than a hunch." Instead, probable cause must be based on some "reasonable articulable suspicion" that criminal activity is likely afoot. Since no facts indicate what O's hunch was based on (and none are provided in a warrant application), the requirement for probable cause is not met.

Impermissible Dog Search

As stated above, a search occurs whenever police invade an area where a person has a constitutional expectation of privacy. The use of a drug-detection dog has been found to constitute a search by the Supreme Court, which has held that persons have an expectation of privacy both in their home and the surrounding curtilage. Thus, while dog searches are permissible in the automobile context (assuming no unreasonable delay), such searches are not permissible in the context of a home search without a warrant or probable cause.

Here, O walked the dog "around Dora's house." If O stayed off Dora's property, there is likely no 4th Amendment violation. For instance, O could have the dog sniff Dora's trash that was set out on the curb. Further, since D's house is "in the country," O might even have some leighway to search any open fields surrounding D's property, since such fields do not carry the same privacy interests as a residence. However, the facts indicate that O directed the dog to jump up on the porch, at which point the dog sniffed the front door, and indicated the presence of methamphetamine.

This clearly constitutes a search under the 4th Amendment. O brought the dog in proximity to Dora's actual place of dwelling, and ordered the dog to jump on the porch (technically, a trespass - which the court recently found to be one means of determining a search in the GPS car case). Thus, by violating Dora's privacy interests and property interests, and conducting a search without a warrant or any identifiable probable cause, the drug dog's reaction constituted an unconstitutional search.

Under the exclusionary rule, the drug dog's reaction thus cannot be admitted as evidence.

No Consent or Exceptions

It should be noted that warrant and a probable cause are not required where an officer obtains consent to search an area. Even then, any search is limited in scope by the degree of consent. Here, the facts clearly show that Owen "waited until [Dora] left" before commencing the dog search. Thus, the absence of consent is apparent and does not apply. Similarly nothing in the facts indicates that O was in hot pursuit or that there was a risk of imminent destruction of evidence - to the contrary, it appears nobody was home when D left the house.

(2) Suppressing Evidence of the Small Box

Owen propped a ladder on the back of D's house, climbed to the top, and peered into a second-story bedroom window. After seeing a small box on a bedside table with a label he could not read, O used binoculars to determine that the listed ingredients could be used to make methamphetamine.

Unreasonable Warrantless Search

As discussed above, O had no probable cause or warrant and thus was not legally on the property. His action of using a ladder and placing it against the house is clearly a violation of Dora's property interest in her home (whether the ladder was his or Dora's) and by subsequently looking in her window, from the vantage point offered by the ladder, he effectively conducted a search. Similar to the facts discussed above, the fact that O did not physically enter D's house does not preclude the court finding an unreasonable search. Here, both Dora's property interest (to not have ladders placed against her home) and privacy interests (to not have cop's snooping in her second floor window from ladders they placed on her house) have been violated. Thus, the search was unconstitutional because, as discussed, no warrant or probable cause existed.

Dog's Search Did Not Create Probable Cause or Exigent Circumstances

The Prosecution may argue that following the dog's bark, the officer had probable cause with respect to the house containing methamphetamine. Even so, no exception to the warrant requirement applies and thus the search remains constitutionally impermissible. As noted, Dora was not at the house and the facts do not indicate that anyone else was present in the home. Further still, Dora apparently does not know about officer's presence on her property (otherwise she likely would not be gabbing so loud about a drug deal through an open window). Thus, even if the dog-sniff were not illegal, the absence of a warrant would preclude O from searching D's home, where her expectation of privacy is at its highest.

Binocular Search

As a general rule, law enforcement's use of technology does not inherently transform police action into a search. However, police use of technology not widely available to the public may result in a search even where a person's physical interest in property was not violated (compare: thermal imaging vs. binoculars). Here, the officer used binoculars to look in D's window in order to read the ingredients of a small box on her bedside table. The use of binoculars in and of itself does not appear to be problematic - this is an item generally available to the public.

However, for the reasons stated above, O only got to a point where he could assess the need to look into the box in D's window by conducting an impermissible search (putting a ladder on the back of the house). Thus, O's "search" - vis-a-vis his use of binoculars to read the ingredients in the box - and the subsequent discovery of that information constituted either an illegal search, or the fruit of the initial illegal search. As such, this evidence should also be excluded.

NOTE: If Officer looked through Dora's window from a tree off of her property, police may have an argument that such a search was permissible and within "plain view." However, this is questionable given the reverence with which the Supreme Court has treated a person's expectation of privacy in his home.

(3) Suppressing Evidence of Overheard Conversation through Open Window

Reasonable Expectation of Privacy in Phone Call In House Made While Window Open

After D returned home, O "walked back to the house and crouched under an open window." He subsequently heard D make incriminating statements to a caller that she could sell several ounces of methamphetamine. This is the closest call with respect to the three pieces of evidence offered.

On the one hand, while Dora made the comment in her home, and thus retained an expectation of privacy, the facts also indicate (1) that she made the comment to someone else on the other line and (2) that her window was open. While police may not generally use wiretapping as a means to conduct a search without a warrant, persons are said to assume the risk whenever they disclose information to a third party. Thus, if the overheard conversation is introduced by obtaining the person on the other end as a witness, no constitutional issue would arise (except that O only knew about the call via a potentially illegal search, which would not have been discovered but for that search). In any event, the fact the statement was made to a third party slightly reduces Dora's expectation of privacy.

The second important fact is that Dora's window was open. Officer will argue that the window was open, and Dora likely assumed the risk of her conversation being overheard. Thus, Officer will contend that no impermissible search occurred. However, Dora will argue that she lives "in the country," where houses are presumably far apart and foot traffic is minimal. Thus, she would say her expectation of privacy is not altered by an open window. Further, Dora will argue that the officer intentionally "crouched under an open window" and thus conducted an illegal search by being physically on her property and concealing his presence. Finally, Dora will argue that officer would not have even returned to her house but for the illegal searches discussed in items 2 and 3.

Given the clear violations of the first two illegal searches and subsequent chicanery by officer, it is likely that Dora will once again be able to prevail in the exclusion of this evidence, both as the product of an illegal search or as fruit of the poisonous tree (even if no search occurred - O would not have returned to the window but for the initial illegal searches).

Q4 Community Property

In 2008, Henry and Wendy married in California. Neither had saved any money before marriage. At the time of the marriage, Henry had a monthly child support obligation of $1,000, which was deducted from his salary, for a child from a prior relationship.

In 2010, Wendy accepted a job at Company. At that time, she was told that if she performed well, she would receive stock options in the near future.

In 2011, Henry inherited $100,000. He used $25,000 to buy a necklace that he gave to Wendy as a holiday present. He used the remaining $75,000 to buy a municipal bond that paid him $300 per month.

In 2012, Wendy was granted stock options by Company, which would become exercisable in 2014, in part because she had been a very effective employee. Later in 2012, Wendy was injured in a car accident and made a claim against the person responsible.

In 2013, Henry and Wendy permanently separated and Henry moved away.

In 2014, Wendy settled her accident claim for $30,000. Later in 2014, Wendy exercised her stock options and earned a profit of $80,000.

In 2015, Wendy filed for dissolution.

1. What are Wendy's and Henry's respective rights regarding:

    a. The necklace? Discuss.

    b. The car accident settlement proceeds? Discuss.

    c. The stock option profits? Discuss.

2. Should Henry be required to reimburse the community for his child support payments and, if so, in what amount? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

Answer A

1. Wendy and Henry's Rights at Divorce

General Principles

Henry and Wendy were married in California. California is a community property state. Property acquired during marriage is presumed to community property (CP). Property acquired before marriage or after permanent physical separation is presumed to be separate property (SP). In addition, property acquired by gift, bequest, or devise, is that spouse's SP. The character of property is determined by tracing back to the source of funds used to acquire that property.

At divorce, each CP asset is divided 50/50 in kind, unless a special rule requires deviation from the equal division requirement or if the spouses agree in writing or by oral stipulation in court. Each spouse's SP remains that spouse's SP.

a. The Necklace

Characterization

Property acquired during marriage is presumed to be CP. A spouse can rebut this presumption by tracing back to the source of the property and showing that SP was used to purchase the property.

Here, the necklace was acquired in 2011, while Henry and Wendy were still married. Thus, the necklace is presumed to be CP. However, Henry will be able to rebut this presumption by tracing back to the source of the funds used to purchase the necklace. Henry used $25,000 of his $100,000 inheritance to purchase the necklace. Since an inheritance is SP regardless of when it was acquired, Henry will be able to rebut the CP presumption by tracing his SP funds. The next issue is whether Henry and Wendy changed the character of the property when Henry gave the necklace to Wendy.

Transmutation

Spouses can change the character of any asset from CP to SP, SP to CP, or from one spouse's SP to another spouse's SP. This is called a transmutation. To be valid, there must be an express declaration in writing that is signed or assented to by the spouse whose property interest is adversely affected. The writing must expressly state that a change in the property ownership is being made.

Here, when Henry gave Wendy the necklace, no transmutation occurred because there was no express declaration in writing signed by Henry that stated that a change in the ownership interest in the necklace was being made. However, there is an exception to the transmutation rule for gifts of a personal nature.

Exception - Gift of Personal Nature

A transmutation is not necessary to change the character of an item when there is a gift from one spouse to another of an item of personal nature. For this exception to apply, the item must be of a personal nature, used primarily by the spouse who was gifted, and the item must not be substantial taking into account the circumstances of the marriage.

Here, the necklace is an item of a personal nature because it is jewelry that is worn by a person. Furthermore, Wendy, the spouse who was gifted with the necklace, is presumably the one who primarily uses the necklace. The issue here would be whether the necklace was substantial in value taking into account the circumstances of Henry and Wendy's marriage. The facts do not tell us about Henry's employment but we do know that he has a job. Furthermore, we know that Wendy has a corporate job. Nevertheless, the spouses came into the marriage with no savings and Henry had a monthly child support payment. Considering that the necklace was $25,000, it was most likely substantial taking into account the circumstances of their marriage. Therefore, the necklace would most likely remain Henry's separate property and did not change into Wendy's separate property.

Distribution At Divorce

At divorce, a spouse's SP remains his or her SP.

If the necklace was substantial in value taking into account the circumstances of Henry and Wendy's marriage, then the necklace would remain Henry's SP. If it was not substantial taking into account the circumstances of marriage, then the necklace was changed into Wendy's SP.

b. The Car Accident Settlement

Personal Injury Award

The character of a personal injury award is determined when the cause of action arose, not when the spouse receives a settlement or judgment. If the cause of action arose during marriage, then the personal injury award is CP. If the cause of action arose before marriage or after permanent physical separation, then it is SP.

Here, the car accident settlement arose out of Wendy getting injured in a car accident in 2012. Thus, the cause of action arose in 2012. Although there may be an issue as to whether the economic community ended in 2013 or 2015 (discussed below), the community was certainly continuing in 2012, and thus the personal injury award would be CP.

Division At Divorce

The general rule is that each CP asset is divided 50/50 in kind at divorce. One special rule that requires deviation from the equal division requirement is for personal injury awards. At divorce, a personal injury award will be awarded entirely to the injured spouse unless the interests of justice require otherwise.

Here, the personal injury award will be awarded to Wendy at divorce since she was the injured spouse. We would need more facts to determine whether the interests of justice would require that the community receive part of the award, such as where part of the settlement was reimbursement for medical expenses that were paid from community funds. As it is, the personal injury award of $30,000 will be awarded entirely to Wendy at divorce.

c. The Stock Option Profits

The rents, issues and profits of community property are community property. Stock options get special treatment under the rules when the stock options are granted during the marriage but are not exercisable until after the marital community ends. It first must be determined when the marital community ended.

End of The Marital Community

The marital community ends when there is permanent physical separation and an intention not to resume the marriage. Intention not to resume the marriage by one spouse only is effective so long as it is communicated to the other spouse.

Here, Henry and Wendy permanently separated and Henry moved away in 2013. Thus, we have permanent physical separation. The issue is whether the spouses intended to resume the marriage. Henry moving away permanently is indication of an intention not to resume the marriage, but we would need more facts about intent to make that determination. Wendy filing for dissolution in 2015 is certain evidence of an intention not to resume the marriage. Thus, it is certain that the economic community ended in 2015, but it most likely ended before that, in 2013 when Henry and Wendy permanently separated and Henry moved away.

Stock Options

The community interest in stock options depends on which formula is used. Which formula is used depends on what the intent of the employer was in granting the options. If the employer's intention was to reward the employee for past services, then the formula is: The numerator is the years that the employee was married until the economic community ended and the denominator is the years the employee was married until the options became exercisable. The community gets a larger percent under this formula because community labor is community property. If the employer's intention was to grant the options as an incentive to continue working for the company the formula is: The numerator is the date the option was granted until the economic community ends and the denominator is the date the option was granted until the date the options became exercisable. The fraction represents the community property interest.

Here, Henry would argue that the employer was granting the options as remuneration for past services because when Wendy was granted the options, it was in part because she has been a very effective employee. Wendy would argue that it was an incentive to keep working and doing a good job because she was told when she began working there that she would receive stock options in the near future if she performed well. Since it is a difficult determination on these facts, the stock options will be analyzed using both formulas.

Reward For Past Services

Here, when Wendy was hired in 2010, she was married to Henry. Henry and Wendy permanently separated in 2013, which is when the economic community ended. Thus the numerator is 3. The options became exercisable in 2014, so the denominator is 4 (2010-2014). Thus, the community interest in the stock option profits would be 3/4.

Incentive

Here, the options were granted in 2012 and the economic community ended in 2013. Thus, the numerator is 1. The options were granted in 2012 and became exercisable in 2014, making the denominator 2. Thus, the community interest in the stock option profits would be 1/2.

Division At Divorce

If the employer's primary intent in granting the options was to reward Wendy for past services, then the community interest in the $80,000 stock profits is 3/4, or $60,000. The $60,000 would be divided equally between Henry and Wendy; thus each would receive $30,000 of the profit. Wendy would end up with $50,000 ($30,000 (her half of the CP) and $20,000 (SP interest) and Henry would get $30,000.

If the employer's primary intent in granting the options was to incentivize Wendy to keep working, then the community interest in the $80,000 stock profits is 1/2, or $40,000. The $40,000 would be divided equally between Henry and Wendy; thus each would receive $20,000 of the profit. Wendy would end up with $60,000 ($20,000 (her half of the CP) plus $40,000 (SP interest)) and Henry would end up with $20,000.

2. Should Henry be required to reimburse the community for child support payments and if so, what amount?

Child Support Payments

Child support payments from a previous marriage are treated like a debt incurred before marriage. The CP is liable and the parent spouse's SP is liable. The other spouse's SP is not liable. The community is entitled to reimbursement for child support payments made with community funds to the extent that separate property was available and not used. A spouse's salary during marriage is community property.

Here, the child support payments were for Henry's child from a prior relationship so his SP is liable and the CP is liable. Henry paid $1000 a month for child support payments from his salary. Henry's salary is community property because it is from his labor during marriage. Since CP funds were used to pay the child support payments, the issue is whether there was Henry's separate property available that could have been used instead.

Reimbursement

Here, the spouses had no money saved coming into the marriage in 2008. Henry received an inheritance of $100,000 in 2011. Thus from 2008-2011, the community is not entitled to reimbursement because there was no separate property available. Henry tied up $75,000 of the $100,000 in a municipal bond and used the other $25,000 for Wendy's necklace. Since the bond had profits of $300 per month that went to Henry, that is SP that was available (as stated above, rents issues and profits of SP are SP, and this was SP because it was inherited). Thus, the community is entitled to reimbursement for at least $300 of the $1000 paid in child support until the economic community ended in 2013.

At Divorce

The community is entitled to $300 a month from 2011-2013 (when the economic community ended). So the calculation is 24 months multiplied by $300, which equals $7200. At divorce, the $7,200 will be divided equally between Henry and Wendy. Wendy will get $3,600 and Henry will get $3,600.

Answer B

1. Wendy and Henry's Respective Rights

California is a community property state. Property acquired during a valid marriage is presumptively community property ("CP"). Property acquired before marriage the spouse's separate property ("SP"). Further, property acquired during marriage by gift, devise, or bequest is SP, along with the rents, profits, and increases in value of the SP during marriage. At dissolution of the marriage, the court will divide CP assets equally in kind, absent an agreement to the contrary. At dissolution of the marriage, each spouse's SP will remain SP. The court will trace the asset back to its source to determine its ownership. California has also expanded its community property system to domestic partnerships between same sex couples and elderly couples who are receiving Social Security Benefits. Since Henry and Wendy married in California, community property rules govern.

End of the Economic Community

The community ends upon dissolution of the marriage or at permanent physical separation, with an intent not to resume the marital relation. The intent may be unilateral, provided it is communicated to the other spouse. Here, the facts state that Henry and Wendy permanently separated in 2013, and Henry moved away. While the facts do not state whether there was an express agreement not to resume the relation, Henry's moving away along with the fact that they permanently separated likely means that they intended not to resume the marital relation. Thus, the economic community ended in 2013, not at filing of dissolution in 2015.

1a. The Necklace

The issue is whether the community has an interest in the necklace Henry gave to Wendy. Since the necklace was acquired during the marriage, it is presumptively CP. However, Henry can trace the funds used to purchase the necklace to his inheritance of $100,000 in 2011. Since property acquired by inheritance is SP, the funds used to purchase the necklace are SP.

Spouses may agree to change the character of ownership during the marriage by transmutation. Prior to 1985, oral agreements were sufficient to transmute an asset from SP to CP, or from CP to SP. However, after 1985 the court requires an express agreement in writing, stating that the nature of ownership is changing, and signed by the adversely affected spouse. There is an exception, however, for gifts made to a spouse during marriage that are not substantial taking into account the economic circumstances of the marriage.

Here, Henry gifted Wendy a necklace purchased with $25,000 of his SP. There is no evidence of an express agreement, in writing, signed by Henry to change the ownership of the asset. Wendy may argue that since the necklace was a gift of SP, she owns the necklace as her SP. However, the facts state that neither Henry or Wendy had saved any money prior to marriage, and Wendy had accepted a new job the year before. Therefore, it is likely that $25,000 was substantial in value considering the circumstances of the marriage. Given that the necklace is worth $25,000, Henry and Wendy appear to be just starting out their careers, and there is no express transmutation agreement, the court will likely award the necklace to Henry as his SP, and Wendy does not have an interest in the necklace.

1b. The Car Accident Settlement Proceeds

A judgment obtained by a spouse for a cause of action arising during the marriage is presumptively CP. While Wendy settled the claim for $30,000 in 2014, after the end of the economic community, the accident occurred in 2012, prior to the permanent physical separation. Thus, the community would have an interest in the recovery during marriage.

However, the court will award the judgment to the injured spouse at dissolution of the marriage, absent circumstances which would be inequitable to the other spouse, such as if medical expenses were paid from the community or the noninjured spouse quit her job to care for the injured spouse. Here, however, there is no indication that it would be inequitable to award the settlement to Wendy, though the community may be entitled to reimbursement for any medical expenses. Therefore, the court will award the settlement proceeds to Wendy at dissolution, and Henry has no interest in the proceeds.

1c. The Stock Option Profits

In determining whether stock options are CP or SP, the court will determine whether the options were granted as deferment of wages, or as a future incentive to continue working for the company. As a spouse's labor during marriage, in the form of wages, is CP, the community will have a greater interest in options that are granted as deferred wages. The court will conduct a proration to determine the CP interest in the stock options, dividing the years of employment during marriage over the years for the option to become exercisable. In this case, the court will take the years of employment during the marriage (2010-2013) divided by the years of employment until exercise (2010-2014). The community will have a 3/4 interest in the stock options under this approach, so Henry and Wendy would each have a 1/2 interest in $60,000 of the profits, and Wendy would own $20,000 as her SP. Thus, Henry would take $30,000 at dissolution, and Wendy would take $50,000.

Alternatively, if the options are granted as a future incentive, the court will divide the years of employment during the marriage after the option is granted by the years the option is granted to becoming exercisable. Thus, the court would divide the years of marriage from the grant of the option (2012-2013) divided by the option's grant to its being exercisable (2012-2014). In this case the community would have a 1/2 interest, so Henry and Wendy would each own 1/2 of $40,000, and Wendy would have $40,000 as her SP. Thus, Henry would take $20,000, and Wendy would take $60,000.

Since Wendy was told that "if she performed well" at Company, she would receive stock options in the near future, it appears that the options were granted as deferred wages, earned by Wendy's labor during the marriage. Further, at the time they were granted, Company stated they were because she "had been" an effective employee, pointing to her labor during the marriage as providing the basis for the options. Thus, the court will likely use the first approach, and Henry will take $30,000, and Wendy will take $50,000.

2. Reimbursement for Henry's Child Support Payments

Debt incurred prior to marriage is the spouse's SP, but CP may be used during marriage to fulfill the debt obligations. The nondebtor spouse may choose to keep her earnings in a separate checking account, to which the other spouse does not have access, to avoid her wages from being reached. At dissolution, the debt will be assigned entirely to the debtor spouse. Since Wendy did not appear to isolate her earnings in a separate checking account, the child support obligations could be paid by the CP.

However, the community may be reimbursed at dissolution if the support obligation was paid by the community when separate property was available. Since Henry paid the child support obligation of $1000 per month from his earnings, which are CP, during the marriage, the community paid for the obligation during marriage. As Henry and Wendy did not have SP coming into the marriage, Wendy will be unable to show that SP was available prior to 2011. However, in 2011, Henry inherited 100K, investing 75K to buy a municipal bond paying $300 per month. While the bond was acquired during marriage, and is thus presumptively CP, the court will trace the funds to the 75K inheritance, which was SP. As profits from SP during marriage are also SP, the $300 per month was Henry's SP. Since there was $300 per month of SP available from 2011 to 2013, and Henry paid the obligations from his earnings, or CP, the community is entitled to reimbursement of $300 per month during 2011 and 2012, since the parties separated in 2013. Thus, Henry is to reimburse the community $7,200 for the SP that was available.

Q5 Business Associations / Professional Responsibility

Online, Inc. was duly incorporated as an Internet service provider. Its articles of incorporation authorized issuance of 1,000 shares of stock at $1,000 par value.

Online initially issued only 550 shares to its shareholders as follows: Dick and Sam each received 200 shares and Jane received 150 shares. Online's Board of Directors (composed of Jane, Sam, and Harry) named Jane as the Chief Executive Officer and named Harry as General Counsel.

Online's business grew substantially in the following months. Still, Online was short on cash; as a result, instead of paying Jane $10,000 of her salary in cash, it issued her 50 additional shares with the approval of its Board of Directors.

Looking to expand its operations, Online sought to enter a strategic partnership with LargeCo, Inc. Jane had learned about LargeCo through Harry's wife, who she knew was the majority shareholder of LargeCo. Jane directed Harry to negotiate the terms of the transaction with LargeCo. In the course of Harry's negotiations with LargeCo, LargeCo offered to acquire the assets of Online in exchange for a cash buy-out of $1,000,000. Harry telephoned Jane and Sam; Jane and Sam agreed with Harry that the offer was a good idea; and Harry accepted LargeCo's offer.

Two days after completion of the transaction, LargeCo announced a joint venture with TechCo, which was solely owned by Harry. The joint venture was valued at $10,000,000. In its press release, TechCo described the joint venture as a "remarkable synergy of LargeCo's new technology with TechCo's large consumer base."

The following week, Dick learned of LargeCo's acquisition of Online's assets. An expert in technology matters, he was furious about the price and terms of the acquisition, believing that the value of Online had been seriously underestimated.

1. What are Dick's rights and remedies, if any, against Jane, Sam and/or Harry? Discuss.

2. What ethical violations, if any, has Harry committed? Discuss. Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

1)

Directors of corporations owe fiduciary duties to the corporation. Among these duties are the duties of care and the duties of loyalty. If a director breaches either of these duties, affected shareholders may bring either a direct action or a derivative action against the director, based upon the nature of the injury the shareholder suffered.

Duty of Loyalty.

Directors owe a fiduciary of duty of loyalty to the corporation, which requires the director to act in the best interest of the corporation, to refrain from self-dealing with the corporation, and to refrain from usurping business opportunities from the corporation.

Harry's Breach of the Duty of Loyalty as a Director:

One aspect of the duty of loyalty is that it requires the director to refrain from self-dealing with the corporation. Here, the facts indicate that Harry negotiated the terms of a transaction with LargeCo., of which Harry's wife is the majority shareholder. Self-dealing extends not only to the director or businesses in which the director has a financial interest, but also those of the director's family. Here, because LargeCo is mostly owned by Harry's wife, the acquisition of Online's assets by Online was a self-dealing transaction.

In order not to be liable for a breach of duty regarding a self-dealing transaction, the terms of the deal must be objectively fair to the company, or the decision must be ratified at a meeting by a majority of disinterested directors who are fully informed about the conflicting interest and the terms of the agreement. (Or, by unanimous written consent of disinterested directors, if no meeting). Here, Harry provided no notice for a special meeting of the board of directors. There was no vote by the disinterested investors (Jane and Sam). Harry's telephone call to Jane and Sam, and Jane and Sam's subsequent agreement was insufficient to ratify the transaction.

Furthermore, the facts indicate that the acquisition was not fair to the company. LargeCo. offered $1,000,000 for all of the assets of Online. However, two days after completion of the transaction, LargeCo announced a joint venture with TechCo, valued at $10,000,000. This suggests, but is not conclusive, that the $1,000,000 acquisition offer may have been lower than fair market value for the acquisition.

Harry also arguably breached the duty of loyalty by usurping a corporate opportunity. TechCo, owned solely by Harry, entered into a joint venture with LargeCo two days after the completion of the acquisition of Online by LargeCo. A director may not obtain business opportunities for his own benefit at the expense of the corporation. Whether a business opportunity is one that should first be offered to the corporation is usually determined by the corporation's business, and whether the corporation is in the same general business as the opportunity. It is unclear from the facts whether the joint venture with LargeCo was a business opportunity that TechCo usurped from Online, but, if TechCo and Online conduct similar business, Harry likely violated the duty of loyalty in this aspect as well.

Harry, Jane, and Sam's breaches of the duty of care.

Corporate directors also owe the fiduciary duty of care to the corporation, which requires directors to act as reasonably prudent directors and in good faith when making corporate decisions. Under the business judgment rule, a court will not disturb a director's business decisions, and will find compliance with the duty of care, if a director takes reasonable steps in becoming informed, bases decisions on a reasonably rational basis, acts in good faith, and refrains from self-dealing with a corporation.

Under this standard, Harry, Jane, and Sam have breached the duty of care, and will not be afforded the protection of the business judgment rule. The facts indicate that Jane knew that LargeCo was largely owned by Harry's wife, yet Jane directed Harry, a director she knew to be interested, to negotiate the terms of a transaction with LargeCo. This was likely unreasonable; a reasonable director would have had a disinterested party negotiate the terms of a possible acquisition. Furthermore, Jane and Sam failed to take reasonable steps in becoming informed about the deal. The facts indicate that Harry, again an interested party, telephoned Jane and Sam, and that Jane and Sam agreed that the offer was a good idea. This is not sufficient; Jane and Sam undertook no independent investigation to determine if the terms of the proposed acquisition were fair to the corporation. Sufficient steps would have included, for example, obtaining an independent audit of Online's value as a business. Here, there are no facts Jane and Sam took any steps in becoming informed about the deal. Therefore, they have both breached the duty of care in this respect.

Finally, Harry's negotiations with LargeCo. were not in good faith. Harry's wife was the majority shareholder of LargeCo. Furthermore, mere days after the completion of the transaction, LargeCo entered into a $10,000,000 joint venture with Harry's solely owned company. Both of these facts indicate that Harry was acting not in the best interest of the corporation, but in his own best interests.

Issuance of the Stock For Less Than Par Value.

Dick may also bring a derivative suit on behalf of the corporation to recover for the issuance of the stock to Jane. Par value sets the minimum price for which stock may be issued. Here, Online Inc's stock has a par value of $1,000. This means shares cannot be issued for less than $1,000. The facts indicate that Online, short on cash, issued Jane 50 shares of Online stock, in lieu of $10,000 salary she was owed. This was improper. The board, Jane, Sam, and Harry, are liable to the corporation for the difference between the par value of the 50 shares ($50000) and the price paid ($10000). This is known as the "water." Jane is also personally liable as the party who received the stock, because, as a director with knowledge of the par value, she was aware that the stock was being issued to her below par value.

Failure to provide Notice and Obtain Shareholder Vote for Acquisition of Substantially All of Online's Assets.

Certain major events in a corporation must be put to a shareholder vote. These include a merger or an acquisition of substantially all of the corporation's assets. Before disposing of substantially all of a corporation's assets, there are procedures that must take place. First the board must pass a resolution, either during a meeting or by written consent, agreeing to the acquisition. Appropriate notice must then be given to shareholders, informing them of the terms of the transaction and the date of the shareholder's meeting for purpose of the vote. At the meeting, a quorum must be present, and a majority of shares voted must be in favor of the acquisition.

Here, none of these procedures took place. Dick, as a shareholder, was uninformed of the acquisition, which was agreed to solely by the directors, Harry, Jane and Sam, and accepted solely by Harry.

Derivative Action.

Here, Harry would be able to bring a derivative action on behalf of Online Co against Harry, Jane, and Sam, for the above violations. Normally, a shareholder must make a demand upon the board of directors, before bringing the action on its behalf. Here, however, demand will be excused, because the action would be against all members of the board of directors, who would be defendants in the action. Harry will likely be able to recover, for the corporation, the "water" from the stock issued to Jane, and damages for breaches of the duties of loyalty by Harry, Jane and Sam. Furthermore, Harry, again, on behalf of the corporation, may be able to rescind the acquisition, because the proper procedures for the acquisition of Online's assets were not followed. If he is successful in his derivative action, Harry will be entitled to attorney’s fees and costs of suit.

2) Harry's Ethical Violations

Duty of Loyalty:

Harry has also violated his ethical duty of loyalty. Under both the ABA and CA rules, an attorney must always act in good faith and in the best interest of the client.

An attorney may not represent a client where the attorney's representation creates either a possible or actual conflict of interest. Under the ABA, an attorney may represent a client if the attorney reasonably believes he will be able to represent the client without a conflict, and the client provides informed written consent. In California, there is no reasonableness standard, but the attorney must receive informed written consent in the case of a possible conflict and again if the conflict ripens into an actual conflict.

Here, Harry has a conflict of interest in representing Online Co. with respect to its transaction with LargeCo. LargeCo's majority shareholder is Harry's wife, so Harry has a financial interest that is directly in conflict with Online Co's interest. Harry failed to disclose the conflict to Jane and Sam (it is immaterial that Jane knew this on her own; Harry still has a duty to inform), and Harry failed to obtain written consent from the company. Having violated this duty, Harry is subject to discipline.

Business Deal with the Client:

When entering into a business deal with the client, the deal must meet four specified criteria. First, the deal must be on objectively fair terms to the client. Second, all terms of the deal must be clearly and thoroughly disclosed in writing to the client. Third, the client must be advised that outside counsel is recommended. Fourth, the client must provide written consent.

Here, Harry has failed to meet these requirements. By entering Online into a deal with LargeCo, of which his wife is majority shareholder, Harry is essentially entering into a business deal with Online. The facts suggest the deal is not fair, because 2 days later Harry enters into a joint venture with LargeCo for 10x the price paid to Online. The terms of the deal were not fully disclosed in writing, because the deal was discussed over telephone. Harry did not advise Online that it should have independent counsel. Finally, Harry did not receive written consent by Online for the deal.

Accordingly, Harry has violated his duties regarding this deal, and is subject to discipline.

Duty of Competence

An attorney has a duty of competence in his representation of a client. An attorney must exercise reasonable skill while representing the client. Reasonable skill is determined by a number of factors, including how long the attorney has practiced, the attorney's expertise, the amount of time the attorney put into becoming informed, and the ability to associate with more knowledgeable counsel. Here, the facts indicate that Harry, as general counsel of Online, breached numerous fiduciary duties. Harry approved the issuance of stock for significantly below par value, resulting in liability to himself, the other directors, and Jane, in her role as purchaser. Furthermore, Harry represented Online in a transaction in which he knew he had a personal financial interest. Finally, Harry accepted LargeCo's offer, without proper board approval and approval by shareholders. These actions suggest that Harry did not exercise reasonable skill in his representation of Online Inc.

While each of these may subject Harry to discipline under the ABA, California requires a repeated, reckless, or intentional failure to exercise reasonable skill, in order to be subject to discipline. Even under the California standard, it is likely that Harry could be disciplined, due to both his intentional conduct in violating the duty of loyalty, and in his repeated failure to exercise reasonable skill in the issuance of stock and acceptance of LargeCo's acquisition offer.

Answer B

1. What are Dick's remedies?

Direct Remedies

Dick will likely be unsuccessful in bringing direct action in his own right as a shareholder, as he likely cannot succeed in suing for oppression. In a closely-held corporation, with a small number of shareholders, when one shareholder owns a majority of the shares, that shareholder may not take actions to oppress the minority shareholders and deprive them of their ability to exercise their rights as shareholders, such as voting, or unreasonably deprive them of dividends.

Here, Online Inc. is probably a close corporation, as it has only three shareholders: Dick, Sam, and Jane. However, Dick will probably be unable to argue for oppression because he owns 200 shares, which is equal to Sam's holdings, and after Jane received an additional 50 shares, she is also a holder of 200 shares. Therefore, because the shareholders own equal portions of Online, there is no majority shareholder oppression here, and Dick will need to take action in a shareholder's derivative suit on behalf of the corporation to obtain relief for the acts of Sam, Jane, and Harry.

Derivative Suit

Dick will be able to sue on behalf of Online Inc, in a shareholder's derivative suit. To bring a derivative suit, the shareholder must first petition the board of directors, and be rejected by the board. However, many states now do not require this step if the petition would be futile (i.e. where a majority of the board would be defendants in the derivative suit). Here, because the entire board would be defendants, it would be futile, and Dick would be able to bring his shareholders' derivative suit.

a. Jane

i. Watered Stock

When a corporation is incorporated, it can include a par value for its shares in the articles of incorporation. A par value is the minimum value that the share can be issued for. A share issued for below par is called "watered." A shareholder who takes knowing of the water may be liable for it, and the board of directors will be liable to the corporation for the "water": the difference between the par and the issued value.

The issue here is whether the board issued watered stock to Jane when it gave her 50 shares in the place of a $10,000 salary payment. A corporation may exchange shares for anything of value, including real property and wages, but that exchange must still meet the par value. Here, Online's par value for its shares was $1,000 per share. Thus, 50 shares would be worth $50,000 par. The board of directors voted to issue Jane $50,000 worth of stock for $10,000 worth of labor, creating $40,000 of water. Therefore Dick could sue on behalf of the corporation to recover the value of the water from either Jane, who took the shares with knowledge of the water, and also voted to issue them as a board member, or the other two directors for the water as well.

ii. Breach of Duty of Loyalty

All directors of a corporation owe fiduciary duties of loyalty and care to the corporation. A director must not deal with the corporation as an outsider, and must not engage in transactions where the director is interested in the transaction. Here, Jane breached the duty of loyalty by issuing herself the watered stock. Thus, she took advantage of her position as a board member, and obtained stock at below par in exchange for her services.

iii. Breach of Duty of Care

All directors owe a corporation a duty of care. A director must conduct business as a reasonably prudent director in the same or similar circumstances. A director may rely upon experts when voting on decisions, and may also rely upon other members of the board, but only if they are reasonably qualified to give that advice. A director will not be held liable for good faith business judgment decisions. Here, in voting on the decision to sell Online, Jane "agreed with Harry" that the offer was a good idea, and Harry accepted the offer. This deal was for the sale of the entire company, and Jane did absolutely no due diligence whatsoever to ensure that the deal was in fact a good one. Importantly, she relied only upon Harry, an attorney, and not upon Dick, who was an expert in technology matters, and who would have been a better resource on the value of the company. Jane could argue for the business judgment rule, but because she did so little in the way of due diligence, she will not be able to argue good faith successfully. This is especially true because she knew of Harry's marital relationship with the majority shareholder of LargeCo.

Therefore, Jane will be liable for a breach of the duty of care.

b. Sam

i. Watered Stock

Sam will be liable as a board member for the "water" on the stock issued to Jane, for the same reasons Jane was liable as a board member.

ii. Breach of the duty of Care

Sam will be liable for a breach of the same duty of care as Jane, because he too relied solely upon Harry when agreeing to sell Online to LargeCo.

c. Harry

i. Interested Director/Breach of Loyalty

The same duty of loyalty applies to Harry as a director as applied to Jane. A director is part of an "interested director transaction" where the director is personally part of the opposite side of a deal with the corporation, or is in a close relationship with a majority owner or board member of the other corporation. In this situation, any transaction may be voidable and the director may be held liable for the damages.

Here, Harry was an interested director. He was engaged in negotiations with LargeCo, in which his wife was the majority shareholder. He had a duty to disclose that to the board. He did not, and thus breached his duty. Harry could argue that Jane knew of the relationship, and thus the board was aware of the interest he had. That argument will fail because he had a duty to inform the entire board, not just rely on one member.

Thus, Harry will be liable for the deal between LargeCo and Online.

ii. Duty of Care

Harry also breached his duty of care, by not doing any due diligence on the deal, and by accepting an offer that undervalued the company. The same reasonably prudent director standard applies here. Because Harry alone negotiated the deal, did not do any research into the value of the company, and took a low offer, Harry breached his duty of care.

d. Fundamental Corporate Change

Dick will also have a successful action against all three board members together for a failure to put a fundamental corporate change to a vote of the shareholders. A fundamental corporate change includes the sale of all, or substantially all of the corporation's assets. A fundamental corporate change must be approved by a resolution of the board, at a board meeting, and then submitted to the shareholders, who must approve it by a majority vote.

Here, the board agreed to a fundamental corporate change when it allowed the cash buy-out of all Online assets for $1 million. Thus, they were required to hold a board meeting to approve the change and submit it to the shareholders. They did not. A board meeting must be an in person meeting, and a special meeting requires written notice to all board members. Neither occurred here, only a phone call, without an actual vote. More importantly, the change was not submitted to the shareholders for a vote. In fact, the non-board shareholder Dick was not informed at all.

Therefore, the board will be liable to the shareholders for damages on the fundamental change.

2. Harry's Ethical Violations

Potential Conflicts

Under the California rules, an attorney may not represent a client where the representation would be directly adverse to another client in the same matter, or where there is a significant risk that the representation will be materially limited by the lawyer's representation of another client, or the lawyer's own personal interests. A lawyer may still take on a representation under the California rules if the lawyer believes that he can still competently represent both clients, all affected clients give informed, written consent, and the representation is not prohibited by law or ethical rule. California extends the written notice requirement to potential conflicts, while the ABA does not. The ABA rules also include a "reasonable lawyer standard" where a lawyer must reasonably believe he can competently represent both parties.

Here, a potential conflict existed when Harry sat on the Board and was also General Counsel. He put himself into the position where he may have been interested in taking an action on the board for his own personal financial gain, that may not have been in the corporation's best interest. Thus, in California, he would have had to give Online written disclosure of this potential conflict, and under the ABA and CA rules, would have had to get informed, written consent if the conflict became actual. Harry did not do this, and therefore violated the rules.

Actual Conflicts

Harry also engaged in actual conflicts of interest when he negotiated the deal with LargeCo. Here, under the California rules, Harry's personal interest with his wife, the majority shareholder, was likely enough on its own to trigger a conflict. Because Harry's relationship with his wife would lead him to be more willing to make a deal unfavorable to his client, Online, an actual conflict existed when he began negotiating. Under the ABA, the conflict is a bit more remote, as Harry is not personally interested in the transaction, but it would probably still be enough that his wife is the majority shareholder. Therefore, Harry was in a representation where he had an interest that was probably directly adverse to his client, or at the least posed a significant risk that it would materially limit his ability [to] represent Online. Thus, Harry would have had to obtain informed written consent, and did not. Further, it is possible that this conflict could be non-consentable under the CA and ABA rules, as it seems unlikely that any lawyer would advise a client to allow an attorney to negotiate a deal with a company majority-owned by that attorney's wife. Therefore he violated both the ABA and CA rules.

Duty of Loyalty

An attorney owes the highest duty of loyalty to a client, and may not take any actions directly adverse to the client's interests. An attorney can enter into regular business transactions with client, so long as those transactions are fair and are in the client's usual course of business. Any other business transactions between a lawyer and client where the lawyer is adverse, the lawyer must give the client an opportunity to obtain independent counsel, and get informed consent to the deal in writing.

Here, Harry did not disclose his own company TechCo, which put his interests in the sale directly adverse to Online, as he could then negotiate a deal with LargeCo for a greater sum. TechCo, which was owned by Harry, eventually negotiated with Harry's wife's company for a deal 10x more valuable than the one he negotiated for his client, Online. Because Harry did not inform Online of the opportunity to seek independent counsel, or obtain informed consent, Harry violated both the CA and ABA rules.

Q6 Constitution / Real Property

City Council (City) amended its zoning ordinance to rezone a single block from "commercial" to "residential." City acted after some parents complained about traffic hazards to children walking along the block. The amended ordinance prohibits new commercial uses and requires that existing commercial uses cease within three months.

Several property owners on the block brought an action to challenge the amended ordinance.

In the action, the court ruled:

1. Property Owner A, who owned a large and popular restaurant, had no right to continue that use, and had time to move in an orderly fashion during the three-month grace period.

2. Property Owner B, who had spent $1 million on engineering and marketing studies on his undeveloped lot in good faith prior to the amendment, was not entitled to any relief.

3. Property Owner C, whose lot dropped in value by 65% as a result of the amended ordinance, did not suffer a regulatory taking.

Was each ruling correct? Discuss.

Answer A

Constitutional Protection

The Constitution prohibits wrongful government/state action, not private action. State action allows constitutional protections to arise.

State Action

The state action here is the City Council amending its zoning ordinance.

Takings Clause

The power of the government to take private property for public use is known as eminent domain. The takings clause of the 5th Amendment to the US Constitution provides "no property shall be taken for public use without just compensation." The government must provide just compensation for any property taken for a public use. Since the Kelo decision the US Supreme Court has interpreted a public use broadly and deemed a public use to even include "economic development" as well as the classic highway, military base, etc. The Takings Clause applies to states and local entities through the 14th Amendment. Regulations are not usually considered takings but can be in certain circumstances.

Here there was no physical taking of any land by the government for a 'public use'. The City Council amended the zoning ordinance to change a block from commercial to residential. The property of the block was not actually seized, but rather the activity on the property was regulated. The property owners will argue this regulation constitutes a regulatory taking.

Regulatory Taking

A regulatory taking is that which deprives the owner of the economic use of his property. A regulatory taking is often found when a regulation deprives the owner completely of any substantial economic use. A regulatory taking analysis can be applied to the states and local entities through the 14th Amendment. (See Florida Water District.)

To determine if a regulatory taking has occurred the Court will look at (1) the economic impact of the regulatory taking on the property, (2) the owner's reasonable expectation on the return on investment for the property, (3) and how the burdens of the regulation are distributed across interested community members.

2. Property Owner A

Property Owner A will argue the City Council's amended zoning ordinance constituted a regulatory taking violated the right to a Non-conforming use.

Regulatory Taking of the Restaurant

See Rule above

To determine if a regulatory taking occurred Property Owner A will demonstrate the economic impact of the regulatory taking on the property. Here the Owner operated a popular restaurant on the premises. The impact of the regulation on the land is severe as location is vital for [a] popular restaurant. The actual economic impact of the ordinance on the property value itself would need to be determined if there is value in land that has a restaurant on it and must be remodeled or rebuilt to conform with the residential requirement.

Property Owner's reasonable expectation on the return on investment for the property. If the owner has a popular restaurant and has been there for a long period of time then the economic return expected out of the property to be achieved can be argued to have occurred then the court decision is supported. However if the restaurant is newly open and popular for this reason, the owner has likely not achieved the expected return on investment for the restaurant. Restaurants are capital intensive and it takes time to recoup the capital costs.

Finally the court should have analyzed how the burden of the regulation was applied to owners across the community. Clearly the owners on the block were affected, but there is no indication the new ordinance affected any of the surrounding blocks.

In fact the purpose of the ordinance was to reduce traffic hazards to children, but this is not likely accomplished by re-zoning only one side of the street. The government will argue it only had to show a rational basis for the decision.

Non-Conforming Use

A non-conforming use occurs when a business or residence is in existence and within the proper use of a city ordinance, at which point the ordinance subsequently changes and the current use of the property becomes in violation of the current code. The non-conforming use must be permitted to continue unless substantial threat to public safety/health is at stake. The non-conforming use may continue as long as the business or use does not cease or a change in ownership of the property occurs.

In this case the restaurant business can only operate as a non-conforming use. Owner A should have been permitted to continue using the property as a popular restaurant. There was no significant threat to public safety or health. In fact the restaurant was likely feeding many residents due to its popularity. Traffic hazards are not necessarily related to the commercial uses on the property.

Conclusion: The Court was incorrect in ruling that the property owner had no right to continue that use. There was no emergency or threat to public safety to not permit a non-conforming use.

3. Property Owner B

Property Interest

A party that makes substantial investment and obtains the necessary permits for a development based on the current zoning ordinance is entitled to complete the project within a reasonable amount of time even if the zoning ordinance changed in the meantime. Once the government has granted the permission, and the party has then relied on that permission it may not be taken away arbitrary by new ordinances. If such action occurs the party may rely on the governing zoning and ordinances at the time the project was permitted and began.

In this case Property B substantially relied on commercial zoning ordinance based on his investment of $1 million on engineering and marketing studies. This investment was for the undeveloped land based on the commercial zoning ordinance. This is a significant sum, and the Owner may even claim he detrimentally relied on the previous ordinance, but such an argument would not be upheld.

The courts often require there be some permission granted or approval of a project by a review board before a developer can be found to substantially rely on the zoning ordinance. It is not enough to have a good faith belief that your use will be permitted in [the] future, some certainty must be acquired by permit or council approval. Unfortunately for Property Owner B the facts do not indicate he submitted his plan for the undeveloped property to local official for review. No applications submitted, and unfortunately the owner will be unable to mitigate losses if all the studies were based on commercial use.

Conclusion: The court's ruling was likely correct based on the Property Owner B's failure to obtain government permission for future investment. Owner B is not entitled to any protection as he would have been if permits were granted before the City Council amended the zoning ordinance.

4. Property Owner C

Regulatory Taking

See Rule Above

To determine if a regulatory taking has occurred the Court will look at (1) the economic impact of the regulatory taking on the property, (2) the owner's reasonable expectation on the return on investment for the property, (3) and how the burdens of the regulation are distributed across interested community members.

Economic Impact

The economic impact of the residential zoning ordinance on Owner C's property is significant. There was 65% drop in value because of the new ordinance. This is over half of the value. However, even with a severe economic drop in value the property maintains some viable economic use if it retains 35% of its value. The courts when granting a regulatory taking prefer to see no economic benefit from the property because of the regulation. Based on these facts the economic impact to the ordinance favors the City Council.

Expectation on Investment Return

This analysis depends on Property Owner C's reasonable expectation on the return on investment for the property. This is a fact specific analysis. Given the fact that the property value decreased by 65%, this was not likely an expectation of the Owner. Even in a severe economic recession property losing over half of its value is substantial and not reasonably expected.

This factor supports the lot owner's claim.

Burdens Distributed

Finally the court should have analyzed how the burden of the regulation was applied to owners across the community. Clearly the owners on the block were affected, but there is no indication the new ordinance affected any of the surrounding blocks.

In fact the purpose of the ordinance was to reduce traffic hazards to children, but this is not likely accomplished by re-zoning only one side of the street.

Conclusion: The court should have ruled that the lot owner suffered a regulatory taking if the reduced expectation on investment and distributed burdens were severe enough.

Answer B

Zoning Powers

The Supreme Court has historically granted great deference to municipalities engaged in creating zoning ordinances. (See Euclid v Ambler Realty). Generally, local government has the police power to enact zoning ordinances so long as they are reasonably related to a legitimate government purpose, namely, that they relate to protecting the general welfare, safety, or health of the community.

Here, the city enacted the zoning amendment to change a commercial to residential area in response to traffic that may have endangered children. Clearly, the zoning ordinance is related to a legitimate government interest in protecting children pedestrians. On these grounds, it would most likely be upheld.

However, the facts indicate that the ordinance only applies to "a single block." This raises the specter of spot zoning, which may be impermissible if used to single out landowners or make a handful of landowners bear a disproportionate burden that the public at large should have to bear. In contesting zoning that appears to unlawfully inhibit a landowner's use of his property, a landowner may bring a takings claim challenging the constitutionality of the zoning ordinance on its face or as applied. As demonstrated in Euclid, a facial challenge is bound to fail--zoning has been upheld for decades. But an "as-applied" challenge can be viable, and is discussed below.

Takings

Under the 5th amendment and applied to the states via the 14th amendment, the government may not take private property without just compensation. Typically, a government taking is through eminent domain, where the government must show a valid public purpose for the taking and compensate the landowner for the land the government takes for the public purpose.

Here, the ordinance does not employ eminent domain, and as such is analyzed under takings jurisprudence.

Physical Takings

Any government statute that incurs a physical occupation of a landowner's land or real property (including airspace) must be compensated (Lorretto Teleprompter). Here, however, the ordinance does not install or require imposition of any government presence within any property owner's physical space, so this strict rule is unavailable to the plaintiffs.

Regulatory Takings

Courts have held that an ordinance that is so burdensome, or that unduly burdens a single landowner in order to benefit the public at large, may be a regulatory taking, and must be compensated. Under Lucas, a regulation that incurs a "total economic wipeout", meaning that it deprives a landowner of any economically beneficial use of his land, is a regulatory taking and must be compensated. The one exception to the total wipeout rule is if the ordinance is based on preexisting common law in the state (Lucas).

Here, the ordinance rezones the use of land from commercial to residential, and is thus most likely not based on common law principles. In Lucas, the court recognized an argument that an ordinance restricting beach development could be based on common law principles, if it sought to mitigate nuisance. But the facts here are not analogous. Nonetheless, the ordinance has also not incurred a total economic wipeout. Property owners A, B, and C all may still make use of their property in economically beneficial ways, even though those uses are not the ones they anticipated.

Because Lucas is unavailing, a takings analysis would go to the Penn Central multi-factor balancing test, in which the government determines if an ordinance incurs a taking based upon: the government interest to be advanced, the nature of the government regulation, and the degree of interference with the landowner's "investment back expectations."

Variances and Amortization

Lastly, landowners may also seek relief through variances and amortizations if they do not wish to bring a constitutional claim under Penn Central. A variance can be Area or Use. An area variance allows a nonconforming use to vary by the area used; a Use variance allows a nonconforming use in an area that is not zoned for that purpose. Use variances are typically harder to secure, and the landowner must show an undue burden if the use variance is not granted.

An amortization allows a nonconforming use to persist until ownership of the property changes, and prohibits the owner from expanding or changing his permitted non-conforming use. Amortization works to mitigate the impact of a sudden zoning change, which could deprive the landowner of economic use of their property and also reduce the likelihood of a takings lawsuit.

Application to Property Owners A, B, and C

Property Owner A

Here, the court has granted the property owner a mere 3 month period to move out of the premises or change it. Under Lucas, the property owner most likely does not have a claim. He has not experienced a total economic wipeout because he can still sell the land for residential development.

Under Penn Central, he has a stronger claim. The government interest in protecting children is strong, but it zones a single block, thus making property owner A largely bear this burden rather than the community as a whole. Further, the restaurant is popular, viable, and most likely has significant investment backed expectations--namely, its physical assets and cooking equipment. Although the government does not need to ensure that the new restaurant location is equally as profitable, the strict and narrow application of the zoning amendment gives the restaurant a factual advantage if it chooses to bring a takings claim.

To avoid a takings challenge under Penn Central, the court would have been wise to issue a use variance just for the property or an amortization, allowing the owners to continue operating until they finally closed by their own accord. As is, only allowing 3 months to move and in light of an ordinance that appears to single out the owners, the court risks a viable takings claim.

Conclusion: the court can uphold the ordinance and three-month grace period because the zoning appears to be a valid government action. But these are draconian measures and a three month grace period is very short. It might consider permitting an amortization or use variance to avoid a takings claim under Penn Central. An amortization would reduce the economic impact while allowing the area to gradually conform to the zoning the city enacted.

Property B

Here, the property owner has an undeveloped lot, so his loss is minimal. Under Lucas, he can probably sell the lot and earn a profit, and based on the jurisprudence in Euclid, a zoning ordinance is still viable even if it changes the permissible uses and devalues a property significantly.

But the owner has also invested $1 million in assessing his lot in "good faith" prior to the amendment. Euclid makes it clear that the zoning ordinance can still be upheld. However under Penn Central, this huge investment backed expectation gives serious weight to a takings claim. As mentioned above, the government objective is valid--public safety--but the nature of the government action is targeted and intrusive because it only applies to a single block. By contrast, in Penn Central, the court upheld a development restriction on a historical building because it found that the owner could build elsewhere, and moreover, everyone else in New York was equally burdened by the restriction. Here, only the block is burdened; a handful of landowners are bearing a burden for the whole city, but they are not being compensated. Because Penn Central is a fact-based inquiry, and the investment backed expectations here are so high, the landowner has a fairly strong case.

Nonetheless, the court's decision is valid--the owner is not entitled to relief, despite his investments because he can still sell his land. But in the interest of precluding a subsequent takings claim, the court might permit the owner to submit an area variance to the zoning board. Depending on what he had planned to use the lot for, the traffic impacts of that use, and how that lot would conform with surrounding uses and traffic, an area variance may still achieve the city's goals while avoiding a costly takings lawsuit and providing relief.

Property C

Here, the court properly ruled that the landowner did not suffer a regulatory taking. There has been no total wipeout, so the land is still valuable for residential uses. Further, the facts indicate that there are not investment-backed expectations. As such, the Penn Central analysis merely considers the impact--65% reduction in value--as well as the valid government interest in protecting children. Overall, there is no valid regulatory claim.

Lastly, Euclid is directly on point and confirms the court's holding. A city may enact zoning using its police powers and to further the general safety, welfare, or health of the community, even when the ordinances greatly reduce the value of property owner's land. In Euclid, the owner's land was greatly devalued because he could not use it for industrial purposes, but the supreme court nonetheless upheld the zoning ordinance.
Here, there was no regulatory taking. It is also unclear if a variance of any kind would provide relief, as the facts do not indicate the type of harm the property owner has experienced or his current use of the land.

Q1 Contracts

Marta operated a successful fishing shop. She needed a new bait cooler, which had to be in place by May 1 for the first day of fishing season.

On February 1, Marta entered into a valid written contract with Don to purchase a Bait Mate cooler for $5,500 to be delivered no later than April 15.

On February 15, Don called Marta and told her that he was having trouble procuring a Bait Mate cooler. Marta reminded Don that meeting the April 15 deadline was imperative. “I’ll see what’s possible,” Don responded in a somewhat doubtful tone. Concerned that Don might be unable to perform under the contract, Marta immediately sent him the following fax: “I am worried that you will not deliver a Bait Mate cooler by April 15. Please provide your supplier’s guarantee that the unit will be available by our contract deadline. I want to have plenty of time to set it up.” Believing that Marta’s worries were overblown and not wanting to reveal his supplier’s identity, Don did not respond to her fax.

When Don attempted to deliver a Bait Mate cooler on April 16, Marta refused delivery. Marta had purchased a Bait Mate cooler from another seller on April 14, paying $7,500, which included a $2,000 premium for one-day delivery by April 15.

Have Marta and/or Don breached the contract? If so, what damages might be recovered, if any, by each of them? Discuss.

Answer A

I. Governing Law

The UCC governs contracts for goods. The common law governs all other contracts, including contracts for services and real estate. The UCC has additional rules that apply when both parties are merchants.

Marta and Don entered into a contract to purchase a bait cooler. Because the bait cooler is a good, the UCC rules will govern this contract. Further, Marta is the owner of a successful fishing shop, and Don sells bait coolers. They can both be considered merchants and the UCC's merchant rules should also apply.

II. Contract Formation

A valid contract requires an offer, acceptance, and bargained for consideration. Under the UCC, goods that cost over $500 require that the contract be in writing to satisfy the Statute of Frauds.

The facts state that Marta and Don entered into a “valid written contract" to purchase the Bait Mate cooler. Marta and Don mutually assented for Marta to purchase a Bait Mate cooler for $5,500 to be delivered no later than April 15. Because the contract was for over $500 for a purchase of a good, the contract needed to be in writing to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, which Marta and Don satisfied.

III. Breach of Contract

A. Anticipatory Repudiation

A person who unequivocally states that they will not perform the contract before the time performance is required will have been considered to anticipatorily repudiate the contract. The other party who has not repudiated can treat this as a total breach and sue on the contract prior to the time of performance.

Two weeks after Marta and Don entered into their contract, Don called Marta and expressed his concerns in procuring a Bait Mate cooler. Marta told Don that meeting the April 15 deadline "was imperative" and Don merely responded that he would "see what's possible."

Marta may argue that Don anticipatorily repudiated the contract by telling Marta that he may not be able to perform on the contract before the contract was due. However, his statements were not unequivocal as to his inability to perform. Rather, Don only expressed doubt as to his ability to procure and deliver.

Because Don did not unequivocally state that he would not be able to deliver the Bait Mate cooler, he will not have been considered to have anticipatorily repudiated the contract.

B. Reasonable Assurances for Insecurity

Under the UCC, a buyer who has reasonable concerns or insecurity about the seller's ability to tender a good can request assurances that the seller will tender a good. The seller must offer the assurances within a reasonable period of time (generally no more than 30 days) or else the buyer who requested the assurances can treat the lack of assurances as a contract breach. The buyer has no duty to inform the seller that she is seeking to cover through the breach.

Here, Marta had reasonable concerns that Don would not be able to tender the Bait Mate cooler. Don himself raised his concerns about his possible inability to procure and deliver the good, and when Marta reminded him that she needed the cooler by April 15, Don did not assuage her concerns by stating that he would absolutely perform. Instead, he merely responded that he would see what was possible. Thus, Marta had reasonable concerns and was within her right to ask Don for further assurances.

Don, however, might point out that Marta demanded that he provide the supplier's guarantee that the unit would be made available by the delivery deadline. He did not want to reveal the identity of his cooler supplier and he believed that Marta's demand was unjustified. However, as discussed above, it was reasonable for Marta to have the concerns about Don's inability to deliver the contracted good. Accordingly, Don should have provided assurances and communicated his ability to tender the goods as contracted within a reasonable period of time. Don not only failed to respond to Marta in a reasonable time, he wholly failed to respond to her.

Don may counter that Marta should have informed him that she was treating his failure to respond as a breach of contract. However, Marta is not under any obligation to do so after not receiving assurances for her reasonable insecurity.

Because Marta had reasonable grounds to be insecure about Don's delivery of the bait cooler, Don should have replied to Marta within a reasonable period of time. Don failed to provide Marta any sort of assurance. Accordingly, Marta was justified in treating Don's lack of assurances as a breach.

However, if Marta did not have reasonable grounds to be insecure, and should not have treated the lack of assurances as a breach, then she can point out that Don breached the contract when he failed to deliver on April 15 (discussed below).

C. Failure to Tender the Good on the Contracted Date

The UCC requires that goods be perfectly tendered. This requires that the products have no defects and that they are delivered by the date required.

Marta can argue that even if she couldn't treat Don's failure to provide assurances as a breach, that Don breached the contract because he failed to deliver the cooler on the contracted date. Marta and Don's contract stated that Don would deliver no later than April 15. However, Don delivered on the 16th. By failing to tender delivery of the good by the contracted date, Marta can argue that Don breached and she isn't required to accept the good.

Don may argue that he substantially performed by delivering the day after, and in any case, the contract did not specify that time was of the essence. Further, he might argue that Marta was not harmed by the delay, because he still delivered the cooler before the first day of fishing season on May 1. However, Marta can correctly point out that those defenses such as substantial performance and delivery within a reasonable time frame after the contracted date where time is not of the essence is not applicable to UCC contracts. Perfect tender requires delivery on the contracted date. In any case, Marta may further counter that the contract was specific about the date the cooler needed to have been delivered. Additionally, she had made known through her fax communication in February that she needed the cooler on April 15 because she needed sufficient time to set up the cooler.

Because Don failed to perfectly tender the good, by not delivering the good on the contracted date, Don breached the contract.

D. Purchase of the Replacement Good Prior to Date of Delivery

Don might argue that it was Marta who breached the contract by purchasing a replacement cooler before the affected delivery date. However, as discussed above, if he failed to provide assurances for her reasonable insecurity, then Don was in breach and Marta was entitled to cover. If Don breached on April 15, Marta's cover purchase on the 14th should not be considered a breach of contract because Marta may still have been able to perform had Don delivered on April 15. However, Don did not deliver nor was Don aware of Marta's cover purchase.

IV. Damages for Contract Breach

A. Expectation

Where a contract has been breached, and the buyer is without the good and the seller has the good, the UCC provides that the buyer can receive expectation damages for the breach. This would place the non-breaching party in the position it would have been in had the contract been fulfilled. This can include the cost to cover and purchase the replacement good.

Here, Marta expended $7,500 to purchase a replacement Bait Mate cooler on April 14th. This included a $2,000 premium for the one-day delivery of the cooler by April 15. Marta paid $5,500 for the cooler itself, which is the same price she would have paid to Don for the same cooler. Marta then paid an additional $2,000 to have this cooler delivered within one day.

As to the cooler itself, Marta did not pay additional costs to actually cover for the replacement Bait Mate cooler. Thus, as to the cost of covering for the replacement cooler, Don would not be liable for any additional costs to cover the purchase of the replacement cooler.

Marta might argue that Don should be liable for the additional $2,000 it cost to deliver the Bait Mate cooler because this is the additional cost it required to have the cooler delivered by April 15, and place her in the position she would have been in had Don performed on the contract. Don will counter (as discussed below) that Marta did not mitigate her damages.

Consequential damages

A breaching party can also liable for the foreseeable indirect harm that results from the breach of contract. This might include, for example, economic harm that Marta's shop faced when she didn't have the Bait Mate cooler on the date contracted.

Here, it does not appear that Marta is alleging such losses that relate to Don's breach.

Incidental damages

A breaching party can also be liable for incidental damages, which cover the ordinary expenses the non-breaching party may have incurred in responding to the breach of contract. This includes the costs of inspection, the costs to return the non-conforming good, or the costs of negotiating with a new vendor to cover a good.

Marta does not appear to have additional incidental costs related to negotiating with the new supplier for the replacement cooler.

B. Duty to Mitigate Damages

The non-breaching party still has a duty to mitigate damages and minimize the costs that the breaching party will be liable for.

Here, Don might point out Marta breached her duty to mitigate the damages.

If Marta is correct in arguing that Don breached the contract by failing to provide assurances for her insecurity, Don will point out that the breach would have occurred when he failed to provide the assurances in a reasonable period of time. Marta demanded assurances in mid-February and Don never responded. Don will point out that if Marta is correct that he failed to provide necessary assurances, then he would have breached after that reasonable time period expired. We can assume that 30 days would be a reasonable response period. Accordingly, Don would have breached the contract in mid-March. However, Don can point out that Marta did not seek to replace the Bait Mate cooler until April 14.

Marta may argue that she had been looking for a replacement cooler and it wasn't until April 14 that she was able to enter into the contract. However, the facts do not indicate that Marta took those steps to replace the cooler. If Marta breached her duty to mitigate because she failed to try and cover earlier, then Don has a strong argument as to why he should not be liable for the $2000 premium Marta paid.

Further, Don might argue that if it wasn't reasonable that Marta demanded assurances, then his breach of contract did not occur until April 15, but Marta purchased the cooler on April 14. He might argue that he shouldn't be liable for Marta's premium purchase prior to the breaching date, but he could be liable had she purchased after the breach and paid a premium for the speedy delivery.

Don has a strong argument that Marta breached her duty to mitigate. Accordingly, Don may not be liable for the $2,000 premium Marta paid on her replacement cooler.

Answer B

Governing Law

The UCC governs contracts for the sale of goods. Goods are tangible and moveable items. The common law governs all other contracts. If the UCC governs, certain rules will apply if the parties are merchants. Merchants are those who deal in the type of goods or have specialized knowledge or skill regarding the goods. Implied in every UCC contract is a covenant of good faith and fair dealing.

Here, there is a contract for a bait cooler. A bait cooler is a tangible good, and therefore, the UCC will govern this contract. Marta owns a fishing shop, which means she has specialized knowledge and skill and deals in the type of goods here (fish and fishing supplies), so she is a merchant. It is unclear is Don is a merchant. Marta has contracted with Don to purchase a bait cooler, but nothing in the facts indicate if Don is a commercial seller of bait coolers, or anything else to indicate his status as a merchant. However, because this is a very expensive cooler ($5,500), it is very likely that Don is a merchant seller of bait coolers. Also, because Don is procuring it for Marta, as opposed to having one personally and selling it online or by advertisement, that tends to show he is a merchant seller. Certain rules may apply relating to the parties as merchants. Also, because this is a UCC contract, there is an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing.

Contract Formation

To have a valid contract, there must be mutual assent and consideration. Mutual assent is an offer and acceptance. An offer is a manifestation to presently have the intent to contract, with the terms clearly specified, communicated to the offeree. An acceptance is a manifestation to assent to the terms of the offer. Consideration is a bargained-for exchange, consisting of a legal value to one party and a legal detriment to the other. Consideration usually comes in the form of performance, forbearance, or a promise to perform or forbear.

Here, the facts indicate that a valid written contract was formed on February 1st; therefore, it can be inferred that there was a valid offer and acceptance. The consideration for the contract was the promise by Marta to pay the $5,500, and for Don to procure and sell to Marta a bait cooler.

Statute Of Frauds

Certain contracts must be in writing to be enforceable, signed by the party against who enforcement is sought. One such type of contract is a contract for the sale of goods over $500.

Here, the contract is for a good (cooler) for $5,500, which is over $500. The facts indicate that a valid written contract was entered into. Therefore, it is assumed that the statute of frauds is satisfied.

Anticipatory Repudiation

When one party gives a clear and unequivocal indication that he will not perform his end of the contract, the other party can treat that as an anticipatory repudiation, which is an instant breach of the contract. When this occurs, the non-breaching party may elect to not perform and immediately sue for damages, or to wait until performance is due and then sue for damages.

Here, On Feb 15, Don called Marta and told her that he was having trouble procuring the cooler. Marta reminded Don that there was a strict deadline of April 15, and Tom told her he would "see what is possible", using a doubtful tone. Because these words are not a clear and unequivocal indication that Don would not perform, there is not an anticipatory repudiation. To have an anticipatory repudiation, Don would have had to say something more along the lines of "I will not be able to procure the cooler by April 15". Because Don's words did not amount to an anticipatory repudiation, Marta cannot treat the contract as breached as of Feb 15. However, she can demand assurances.

Reasonable Grounds For Insecurity and Demand for Assurances

When a party has reason to believe the other party may not be able to perform, typically actions by the other party that fall short of an anticipatory repudiation, the party may, in writing, demand assurances of performance by the other party. If commercially reasonable, the demanding party may suspend performance. Additionally, if the party who has given reasonable grounds for insecurity does not provide assurances within 30 days, the other party may treat that as an anticipatory repudiation and immediately treat the contract as breached, even if the time for performance has not come.

Here, Don's words to Marta on the phone did not amount to an anticipatory repudiation (above), but, they certainly gave Marta reasonable grounds for insecurity. At the time the contract was formed, Marta and Don agreed that the cooler would be delivered no later than April 15. On the Feb 15 phone call, Marta again reminded Tom of the strict deadline. When Tom, using a doubtful tone, said he will see what is possible, this gave Marta reasonable grounds for insecurity. Marta was worried that he would miss the deadline and she would not have time to set the cooler up and ready for the first day of the fishing season. Marta faxed Don, which meets the writing requirement, asking him to provide assurances of performance by providing his supplier's guarantee that the unit will be available. Don believed that this was overblown and did not respond. Marta will argue that Don needed to provide assurances within 30 days. Because Don did not respond, Marta can treat the contract as repudiated as of 30 days after the fax, which would be March 15. Don did not want to give up his supplier's identity, and may argue that although Marta's grounds for insecurity are reasonable, that her demanding his suppliers guarantee was unreasonable. Don is assumingly in the business of procuring items for fishing shops, and he will argue that if he gave up his suppliers identity, Martha may go straight to the supplier in the future for her needs and circumvent Don. A court could go either way on deciding this issue. A court will surely find that Marta had reasonable grounds for insecurity, but may find that her demand for assurances (providing the supplier) was not reasonable. However, the court would likely find that Don doing nothing, and not responding at all, was also reasonable and not in good faith.

If Don did not want to give up his supplier, he still could have replied and given Marta assurance that he would perform by the deadline.
It is most likely that a court would find that Don failing to respond to Marta's insecurity within 30 days amounted to an anticipatory repudiation. In that case, Marta could treat the contract as breached immediately and find other options for her cooler, and sue Don for damages. However, even if the court finds that it did not amount to a repudiation, Don will still be in breach of the contract for delivering late.

UCC Perfect Tender

In UCC contracts, there must be a perfect tender of goods; otherwise there is a breach. A perfect tender means every item is delivered as promised, and at the correct time. When there is not a perfect tender, the non-breaching party may take the non-conforming goods and sue for damages, reject some goods and keep some, or reject all the goods and sue for damages. The non-breaching party must notify the seller of the breach and if they are going to accept or reject the goods, and if they reject, must timely return the goods, arrange for the goods to be shipped back, hold the goods for pickup, or re-sell on the breaching party's account.

Here, Don attempted to deliver the cooler on April 16th, one day late of the strict deadline. Because Don did not deliver on the agreed deadline (April 15), he did not make a perfect tender. Therefore, Don has breached, and Marta is under no obligation to accept the cooler. The facts indicate that Marta promptly notified Don that she was refusing delivery, as required by the rules.

Damages

Marta's Damages Claims

When a UCC contract has been breached, the non-breaching party may sue for and receive compensatory damages. The most common compensatory damages are expectation damages, incidental damages, and consequential damages.

Expectation Damages

Expectation Damages put the non-breaching party in the position they would be had the contract not been breached. Expectation damages must be foreseeable, certain, and mitigated. When the seller has breached, the expectation damages would normally be the fair market value of the good minus the contract price, or the cost to cover minus the contract price.

Here, Don and Marta contracted for the sale of the cooler for $5,500. Because Don did not perform by the deadline of April 15, and because he likely repudiated when he did not respond to Marta's request for assurances, Marta was entitled to either sue for the difference in the fair market value of the cooler and the contract price, or to cover and sue for the difference between the cost of cover and the contract price. Here, Marta covered and purchased a different cooler for $7,500. Marta will argue that Don is liable to her for the difference of $2,000. Don may argue that he should not be liable for this difference, because the fair market value (and the price it appears Marta paid) of the cooler was actually only $5,500; the $2000 extra was a one day rush delivery fee. Marta will argue, however, that she had no choice but to pay the $2,000 delivery fee, since she needed it by April 15th. Don may also argue that if the court does find he repudiated as of March 15th, that Marta did not mitigate, because she could have found another cooler between March 15 and April 15th, but instead, she waited until April 14th to purchase the cooler with 1 day rush. Marta may respond that when there is a repudiation, she has the option to wait until performance is due to treat the contract as breached. However, Don will then argue that because she bought the new cooler on April 14, not April 15th, that she was not waiting for performance. Also, Don will likely successfully argue that Marta MUST have been relying on the anticipatory repudiation, and not on the perfect tender breach, since she did not wait until his performance was due on the 15th to purchase the new cooler.

A court could go either way. Don may have to pay Marta the $2000 difference for what she paid and the contract price, but, the court also might find that Marta did not mitigate, and therefore the $2000 rush fee was avoidable. However, if Marta did in fact look around for coolers between March 15 and April 15 and just could not find one until April 14, then she will have met her duty to mitigate and could recover the $2,000.

Incidental Damages

Incidental damages are those damages that are incidental to the breach, and are always expected, such as costs to return or store the goods.

If Marta incurred any incidental costs, such as advertising that she was looking for a cooler, or long distance calls to other suppliers, etc., then she will be able to recover these costs also.

Consequential Damages

Consequential damages are special damages that are unique to the non-breaching party, such as lost profits, and they must be foreseeable at the time of contracting to the breaching party to be recoverable.

It does not appear that Marta suffered any consequential damages as a result of the breach, but if she did, and they were foreseeable, then she could recover these too.

Punitive Damages

Punitive damages in contract cases are not recoverable. Marta will not be able to recover any punitive damages, because they are not available in breach of contract actions.

Don's Damages Claims - Restitution

Restitution is an equitable remedy meant to prevent unjust enrichment. Typically, this type of remedy is used when a contract is unenforceable, and one party received a benefit but did not have to pay for it. In such a circumstance, the other party can usually receive the reasonable value of their services. At common law, the breaching party could not receive restitution. But, modernly, many courts will provide reasonable value of services even to the breaching party to prevent unjust enrichment by the non-breaching party.

Here, Don may argue that he is entitled to something from Marta, since he procured the cooler, and likely had to pay for the cooler from his supplier to get it for Marta. However, Marta will successfully argue that she was not unjustly enriched in any way, because she did not get anything from Don. She did not keep the cooler. Don may then try to argue that the services he provided in spending the last few months procuring the cooler were valuable services, and that he should be compensated for the procurement services. However, a court will likely find this a very weak argument, as Don breached the contract, and Marta received absolutely no benefit from Don.

Q2 Real Property

Amy and Bob owned Blackacre in fee simple as joint tenants with a right of survivorship. Blackacre is located in a jurisdiction with a race-notice recording statute.

Without Bob's knowledge, Amy gifted her interest in Blackacre to Cathy by deed. Amy and Bob then sold all of their interest in Blackacre by a quitclaim deed to David, who recorded the deed. Shortly thereafter, Cathy recorded her deed.

David entered into a valid 15-year lease of Blackacre with Ellen. The lease included a promise by Ellen, on behalf of herself, her assigns, and successors in interest, to (1) obtain hazard insurance that would cover any damage to the property and (2) use any payments for damage to the property only to repair such damage. Ellen recorded the lease.

Five years later, Ellen transferred all of her remaining interest in Blackacre to Fred. Neither Ellen nor Fred ever obtained hazard insurance covering Blackacre. While Fred was in possession of Blackacre, a building on the property was destroyed by fire due to a lightning strike.

David has sued Ellen and Fred for damages for breach of the covenant regarding hazard insurance for Blackacre.

1. What right, title, or interest in Blackacre, if any, is held by Cathy, David, Ellen and/or Fred? Discuss.

2. Is David likely to prevail in his suit against Ellen and Fred? Discuss.

Answer A

1. What right, title, or interest in Blackacre, if any, is held by Cathy, David, Ellen and/or Fred?

At common law, there were no recording statutes and the rule was that the first in time prevailed. Under this jurisdiction, there is a race-notice statute that will govern the facts of this case. If the statute does not apply, then the common law does. A race-notice statute provides that any subsequent purchaser of property will take if they are a bona fide purchaser (BFP) and recorded first. To be a BFP, a party must pay value and take without notice of any prior recordings that may affect their title to the property. Notice can be by: (1) actual notice; (2) constructive notice; or (3) inquiry notice. Actual notice is that the party knew there was another party with a claim on the property. Constructive notice is when a recording in the grantor-grantee index gives notice to a party that there are other parties claiming interest to the land. Lastly, inquiry notice is when the party is given facts that there may be other possessors to the property and that party has a duty to inquire further (i.e., if they see a house built on the land with occupants, that party has a duty to inquire why they are on the land).

A. Cathy

A joint tenancy is created with a right of survivorship when the four unities are met: time, title, instrument and possession. In other words, the parties must acquire their joint tenancy at the same time, with the same amount of title, in the same instrument and each have the right to possess the entire land. The right of survivorship allows that when one of the joint tenants die, the entire estate goes to the surviving joint party. However, if the joint tenancy is severed, the parties become tenants in common and the right of survivorship no longer exists. The joint tenancy can be severed by a unilateral conveyance of one of the joint tenants to another party.

Here, Amy and Bob owned the land in fee simple as joint tenants with the right of survivorship. The facts do not give details as to if the four unities of time, title, instrument and possession were met. However, the facts assume that these elements were met. As such, Amy and Bob owned Blackacre as joint tenants with the right of survivorship to begin with. Amy thereafter gifted her interest to Cathy. This bequest severed the joint tenancy between Amy and Bob. At this point in time, Bob and Cathy were then owners to Blackacre as tenants in common. However, as will be discussed in the following section, because Cathy failed to record her deed, David will take Blackacre under the recording statute and Cathy has no interest in Blackacre.

B. David

As mentioned, under the recording statute in this jurisdiction, a subsequent purchaser will take if they are a BFP and record their interest first. Amy and Bob sold all of Blackacre to David. Although Amy no longer had any interest in Blackacre because she had conveyed her interest to Cathy, David was unaware of that fact. David was a BFP as required under the statute. First, he paid value for the property. And secondly, based on the facts, he did not have knowledge about Cathy's conveyance. There are no facts to indicate that he had actual knowledge of the conveyance to Cathy. Additionally, David did not have constructive notice of the conveyance to Cathy. A BFP only has a duty to check the grantor-grantee index when the conveyance is made to him. He does not have to subsequently check the index for good title. Therefore, when he checked the index before accepting the property, there was no notice of Cathy's deed. Lastly, David did not have inquiry notice. It doesn't appear that Cathy lived on the land or made any assertions of title over the land. As such, David qualified as BFP because he took without notice and paid value for the land. Also, to prevail under a race-notice statute, the subsequent purchaser must record. Here, David recorded his deed promptly. As a result, David's interest in the land is superior to Cathy's.

C. Ellen

David had good title to the property as discussed above and therefore, was free to do what he wanted with the land. He subsequently leased the property to Ellen. Ellen is a BFP under the recording statutes as well. She is paying value for the lease through rent payments and took without notice of Cathy's interest. Similar to David, there is no actual or inquiry notice for the same reasons as stated above. Additionally, she just not have constructive notice. Although Cathy has now recorded the deed, it is not within the chain of title that Ellen would have to search. Even if Ellen did have notice of Cathy's interest, she would be protected by the Shelter Doctrine, which allows subsequent parties to assume BFP status from the prior conveyance, even if that purchaser did not have BFP status. Here, David was a BFP and recorded his deed; thus, Ellen is a BFP under David anyway.

However, David's conveyance to Ellen was not a fee simple, but rather, a lease for a term of 15 years. Thus, by the terms of the lease, Ellen has a possessory interest in the property for the next 15 years. At the time of the lease, she was in privity of contract with David (through the lease) and privity of estate with David (by occupying the land).

D. Fred

Parties are generally free to assign their interests under a contract or lease to another party. An assignment is where a party gives the remaining interest under the lease to a subsequent party. Alternatively, a sublease is where a party gives less than the full interest left on the lease. Thus, the courts are to look at the actual interest conveyed and not what the parties might have labeled it.

The lease between David and Ellen did not contain an anti-assignment clause. Rather, the lease applied to Ellen, her assigns, and successors in land. Thus, an assignment of Ellen's interest was valid under the lease. (Even if it wasn't, David would have likely waived the anti-assignment provision because he continued to accept rent from Fred). Additionally, the facts state that Ellen transferred "all her remaining interest in Blackacre to Fred." Therefore, it was an assignment, since all her interest, the remaining 10 years on the lease, was transferred to Fred. As such, Fred assumed Ellen's interest in the land. As such, Fred is lawful tenant with possessory interest in Blackacre for the next ten years.

E. Conclusion

Because this is a race-notice jurisdiction and the statute applies under the facts of this case, David has superior title to the land. Cathy does not have any interest in the land because she failed to record her interest. David conveyed his possessory interest to Ellen, who assigned her interest to Fred. As such, David holds title in fee simple to Blackacre and Fred has possessory interest in Blackacre for the next ten years under the terms of the lease between David and Ellen.

2. David v. Ellen & Fred

As mentioned above, there was a valid assignment of Ellen's interest to Fred under the lease. Ellen, as the assignor, remains in privity of contract with David. Fred, as the assignee, remains in privity of estate with David. The terms of the lease between David and Ellen contained two covenants: Ellen, on behalf of herself, assigns, and successors was to: (1) obtain hazard insurance that would cover any damage to the property and (2) use any payments for damage to the property only to repair such damage. Neither Ellen nor Fred ever obtained hazard insurance covering Blackacre. Unfortunately, lightning struck the property and destroyed a building on the property. Thus, the issue is whether David can prevail on a damages claim based on these covenants against Ellen and Fred?

A. Ellen

As mentioned, Ellen remains in privity of contract with David under the terms of the lease. A novation occurs when two parties agree that one party will no longer be held liable under the terms of the contract.

Under the facts, Ellen and David entered into a 15-year lease agreement. Five years into the lease, Ellen assigned her interest to Fred. There does not appear to be any agreement between David and Fred relieving Ellen of her liability under the lease. As such, no novation has occurred. Because David and Ellen are still in privity of contract, David can bring claims against Ellen for damages for breach of the covenant regarding hazard insurance for Blackacre.

B. Fred

For a covenant to run with the land and bind successors in interests, certain requirements must be met depending on whether the interest in the burdened (servient) or benefited (dominant) estate is being transferred. The servient estate is the estate that incurs the burden of the covenant, while the dominant estate is the one that benefits from the covenant. If the covenant is on the servient estate, the covenant will run with the land if: (1) the parties intended the covenant to run with the land; (2) the covenant touches and concerns the land; (3) the servient estate has notice of the covenant; (4) there exists horizontal privity; and (5) vertical privity.

Here, the covenant burdens the lessee estate, since Ellen and her successors/assigns are required to maintain hazard insurance and use that insurance to repair the damages. Thus, David will have to show the above five elements in order to be able to collect damages from Fred.

i. Intent

The parties to the original agreement must have intended that the covenant be perpetual and continue to bind successors in interest of the land. Here, the parties specifically included in the written lease agreement that "Ellen, on behalf of herself, assigns, and successors in interest" will maintain hazard insurance and use the proceeds of such insurance to fix any damage caused by any hazards. Therefore, the express language of the parties in the lease provide that they intended the covenant to bind all successors in interest.

ii. Touch and Concern the Land

To bind successors in interest, the covenants must also touch and concern the land. Courts have held that a covenant touches and concerns the land if it conveys a benefit onto the land. For example, the payment of rent is a sufficient covenant that touches and concerns the land. Here, the covenant is to provide insurance to protect the land in case of damage and to repair the land in the event that such hazardous damage does occur. This is for the benefit of the land to maintain the premises and therefore, it touches and concerns the land.

iii. Notice

The successor in interest must have notice of the covenant in order to be bound by the terms of it. As mentioned above, there are three types of notice. Here, Fred had constructive notice because Ellen recorded the deed in the grantor-grantee index.

Therefore, Fred would be able to know the terms of the lease because it was within the chain of title and will be deemed to have constructive notice of the covenants.

iv. Horizontal Privity

Horizontal privity must exist between the original parties to the covenant, such as grantor-grantee or lessor-lessee. A covenant agreement alone is insufficient to establish horizontal privity. Here, David and Ellen have horizontal privity as their relationship was that of lessor-lessee. Thus, horizontal privity exists.

v. Vertical Privity

Lastly, vertical privity must exist between the successor in interest and the previous owner of the servient estate. Here, Ellen conveyed the remainder of her interest on the lease to Fred. Therefore, there is a vertical privity between Ellen and Fred.

Thus, all five elements are met for a covenant to run with the land and David may hold Fred liable for damages for the breach of the covenants.

C. Conclusion

David may hold Ellen liable for damages for breach of the two covenants because she is in privity of estate with David. Additionally, David will be able to hold Fred liable for damages because the two covenants run with the land and Fred had notice of such covenants.

Answer B

1. What right, title, or interest in Blackacre, if any, is held by Cathy, David, Ellen and Fred.

Classify the Interest: Joint Tenants with a Right of Survivorship

A joint tenancy is a concurrent interest in land in which case at least two individuals own an undivided interest in the whole of the property. A joint tenancy is created with express language that the tenancy carry with it the right of survivorship. The right of survivorship means that when one joint tenant dies the other co-tenants take the deceased tenant's interest in the property. A joint tenancy is created when four unities are present at the time of creation. These unities are the unities of time, title, interest, and possession.

Here, facts indicate that Amy and Bob owned Blackacre in fee simple as joint tenants with a right of survivorship. Thus, the original property relationship was that of a joint tenancy because the right of survivorship was expressly provided for.

Severance of the Joint Tenancy

A joint tenancy is severed whenever any one of the four unities of time, title, interest, and possession is disturbed. When one of the four unities of a joint tenancy is disturbed a tenancy in common results and the right of survivorship is extinguished. In this event the tenants in common own a undivided interest in the whole of the property which is then freely alienable.

Here, the facts indicate that Amy gifted her interest in Blackacre to Cathy by deed. By gifting her interest in the joint tenancy, Amy disturbed the four unities, particularly the unity of title. As indicated above, when a joint tenancy is severed a tenancy in common is created. Thus, since the joint tenancy was severed, at this particular point in the facts

Amy held no interest, and Cathy and Bob held the property as tenants in common. The right of survivorship was extinguished and both Cathy and Bob had an undivided interest in the whole of the property.

Amy's Conveyance to David / Recording the Interest / Recording Statute

The facts indicate that after Amy gifted her interest in Blackacre to Cathy by deed she and Bob sold all of their interest in Blackacre to David. These facts implicate the rules for the relevant recording statue.

In a race-notice jurisdiction, a subsequent bona fide purchaser (BFP) is protected by the recording statute provided that he takes without notice and is the first to record his interest in the deed. There are three different kinds of notice. There is actual notice, record notice, and inquiry notice. Actual notice refers to the extent to which a BFP actually knows that someone else claims an interest in the land. Record notice refers to the extent to which the BFP is notified by researching the record of title. And inquiry notice refers to the extent to which a BFP inspects the property and discovers someone else asserting a claim to the property. Additionally, it should be noted that the recording statutes are designed to protect subsequent BFP's and not gratuitous grantees of real property.

Here, the facts indicate that Amy and Bob sold all of their interest in Blackacre to David after Amy gifted her interest to Cathy by deed. The facts also indicate that David recorded his deed before Cathy recorded her deed. Thus, for the recording statute to apply and for David to take title to the property he must be a subsequent BFP who took without notice and who recorded first. The facts indicate that David did in fact record before Cathy recorded. Thus, the "recorded first" element is satisfied. The next question that must be determined is whether David had notice of Amy's interest. There is nothing in the facts which says that David had actual notice of Cathy's interest. Additionally, although the facts do not indicate that David inspected the property, the facts also do not indicate that Cathy occupied the property so as to put David on notice had he inspected the property. The real question is whether David had record notice. Determining record notice is a two-step process. First, the BFP must go to county recorder's office, locate the particular property and construct the chain of title. The chain of title can be constructed by looking first at the grantee index and then building the chain of title back in time. Next, the BFP must adverse each link of the chain. This is done by looking at the Grantor index and following the chain of title until the BFP reaches his interest. Here, David will not discover Cathy's interest in Blackacre. Cathy recorded her deed too late. By recording her deed after David recorded his deed David would not be put on notice as to Cathy's interest in Blackacre. Also, although not directly relevant, it should be noted that Cathy, as a gratuitous grantee, is not likely to receive any protection under the recording statute.

On balance, David obtained lawful title to Blackacre as a subsequent BFP who took without notice and was the first to record his interest.

2. Is David Likely to Prevail in his Suit Against Ellen and Fred

The Lease with Ellen

A tenancy for years is a specific type of tenancy that has a specific start date and a specific end date. A tenancy for years need not be for a terms of actual years but rather only needs a specific starting and ending date. A tenancy for years is terminated upon the end of the specified date.

Here, the facts indicate that David entered into a valid 15-year lease of Blackacre with Ellen. Since the lease has a specific start date, and a specific end date, it is likely considered a tenancy for years.

Ellen's Transfer to Fred

A sublease is a legal relationship in a leased property that arises when the tenant conveys out less than his entire interest under the lease. In this circumstance, sublessor has privity of estate with the lessor. An assignment occurs when the lessor conveys out all of his durational interest under the lease. In the case of an assignment the original lessee is no longer in privity of estate with the lessor but depending on the circumstances may still remain in privity of contract with the lessor. Privity of estate means that two individuals share an interest through their relationship to a leased property and privity of contract is a contract obligation between two contracting parties.

Here, the facts indicate that five years into the lease, Ellen transferred all of her remaining interest in Blackacre to Fred. Thus, because all of the remaining interest was transferred as opposed to only some or part of the interest Ellen executed a valid assignment. The results of this assignment is Fred is not in privity of estate with David. However, because Ellen was the original contracting party with David, she remains in privity of contract with David.

A restrictive covenant is a written promise with respect to land either to take an affirmative action or to refrain from taking action. Liability for the restrictive covenant may attach to parties that are either in privity of contract with the lessor or privity of estate. In the event of privity of contract, the contracting party remains liable under a contract theory of recovery. If an express contract between the lessor and the lessee is breached by failing to satisfy the written covenant then the landlord may sue to evict the tenant and/ or assert a claim of money damages.

Here, as noted above, Ellen is in privity of contract with David. She is the original party under the lease, who signed the lease and who had knowledge of the covenants in the lease. The fact that she assigned her interest to Fred means only that she is not under privity of estate with David, but she is still liable under privity of contract. The lease included a promise by Ellen to obtain hazard insurance and to use any payments for damage to the property to repair such damage. Ellen breached the lease covenant because she never obtained hazard insurance covering Blackacre and because a building on the property was destroyed by fire.

Thus, because Ellen is in privity of contract with David, David can elect to sue Ellen for breach of the express contractual covenant.

Breach of the Covenant: Fred

Restrictive Covenant

A restrictive covenant is a written promise with respect to a particular piece of property to do or to refrain from doing something on that particular property. Restrictive covenants run with the land to successive assignees if the covenant makes the land more beneficial or useful. In order for the burden of a restrictive covenant to apply there must be intent and notice, the covenant must touch and concern the land, there must be vertical privity and horizontal privity. In order for the benefit of a restrictive covenant to apply there need only be the elements of intent, touch and concern and vertical privity. Vertical privity is present when the successor in interest has the entire interest in the property. Horizontal privity refers to the fact that the original parties to the agreement had a mutual interest in the property outside of the covenant agreement.

Here, the facts indicate that the lease expressly stated that the covenant to obtain hazard insurance and to use its proceeds would apply to "Ellen, on behalf of herself, her assigns, and successors' interest." Thus, because there was intent that the covenant apply to subsequent parties, the intent element is met. The facts also indicate that Ellen recorded the lease and that the covenants were expressly written in the lease. Thus, it appears that Fred had notice of the lease provisions. The next element that must be satisfied is the touch and concern element. As discussed above, in order for the covenant to touch and concern the property it must make it more beneficial or more useful. Here, the covenant was that Ellen and her assigns obtain hazard insurance which would cover any damage to the property. If a particular piece of property is covered by insurance, then it is more likely than not to be benefitted and thus, as a result will be more valuable. As noted above, vertical privity must also be satisfied. Here, Ellen conveyed out all of her remaining interest on Blackacre. Additionally, there is nothing in the facts to suggest that anyone else other than Fred not presently occupies the property. Thus, vertical privity is satisfied. Finally, there must be horizontal privity. David owns the property outright. Additionally, David and Ellen had no interest in the property outside of the lease. Thus, horizontal privity is satisfied.

Based on the foregoing analysis, it appears that the burden of the restrictive covenant to obtain hazard insurance does run to Fred, a party in privity of estate with David. Thus, because Fred failed to obtain insurance and because the property was destroyed implicating the need for the insurance, David is likely to prevail in his suit against Fred.

Q3 Civil Procedure

In March, while driving her car, Diana struck and injured Phil.

In April, Phil filed a complaint against Diana in federal district court properly alleging diversity jurisdiction and seeking damages for negligence for physical injury.

In May, Diana filed an answer denying negligence.

In June, during discovery, Diana filed a motion asking the court to order (1) a physical examination and (2) a mental examination of Phil. Over Phil's objection, the court ordered him to submit to both examinations.

In July, Diana served Phil with a notice to depose Laura, a physician who treated him after the accident. Phil objected on the grounds that (1) Laura could not be deposed because she was not a party, and that (2) deposing her would violate the physician-patient privilege. The court overruled Phil's objections.

In September, a few weeks before trial, Phil decided to file a demand for a jury trial. Diana immediately filed a motion to strike the demand. The court granted Diana's motion.

1. Did the court err in granting Diana's motion to order (a) the physical examination and (b) the mental examination of Phil? Discuss.

2. Did the court err in permitting Diana to depose Laura? Discuss.

3. Did the court err in granting Diana's motion to strike Phil's demand for a jury trial? Discuss.

Answer A

Applicable law

Under the Erie doctrine, a federal court sitting in diversity jurisdiction must apply the substantive laws of the state where it sits and the procedural laws of the federal system, generally the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and in most cases the Federal Rules of Evidence. Whether or not a rule is substantive or procedural is a balancing test that depends on whether 1) the rule is outcome determinative, 2) the federal court's interest in applying their own rules, and 3) whether or not application of the federal rule will result in forum shopping.

Whether or not a party may obtain an order for a physical or mental examination is a rule of discovery that is procedural and governed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure which will apply in this case.

a) Diana's motion for a physical examination of Phil

Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, a party may obtain a mental or physical examination of the other party if 1) that party's physical or mental condition is in controversy, and 2) good cause exists for ordering the examination. Good cause will generally be found to exist if the examination in question is not overly intrusive and it is relevant, measured in terms of its logical and legal relevance as well as how relevance is defined under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure with regard to its discoverability. Evidence is logically relevant if it tends to make the existence of a fact of consequence more or less likely. Evidence is legally relevant if its probative value is not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. And evidence is relevant and discoverable if it is reasonably likely to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence.

Phil's suit against Diana is one for personal injury stemming from her alleged negligence. In a negligence suit, the plaintiff must prove duty, breach, cause, and damages. Because damages are a required element, the injury and the extent of the injury suffered by a party will always be in controversy in a personal injury suit. Additionally, good cause exists for ordering the physical examination here. It is not overly intrusive as Phil has already likely sought out and received medical treatment for his injuries of a similar nature in this case. Additionally, it is logically and legally relevant and relevant under the Rules' definition for discovery because it is reasonably likely to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence. The examining physician may have a different opinion as to the nature and extent of injuries suffered by Phil.

For these reasons, the court did not err in granting Diana's request for a physical examination of Phil.

b) Diana's motion for a mental examination of Phil

With regard to Diana's motion for a mental examination of Phil, the rules are the same as for a physical examination. Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, a party may obtain a mental or physical examination of the other party if 1) that party's physical or mental condition is in controversy, and 2) good cause exists for ordering the examination. However, the calculus here for a mental examination is much different.

Phil's suit against Diana is for personal injury. His physical condition is relevant because it is a fact in controversy as damages are an element of negligence. Phil's mental condition, however, does not appear to be in controversy. Phil's suit is not for infliction of emotional distress or any other cause of action where his mental condition would be a fact in controversy. If Phil suffered from some sort of mental disease or defect that made him comparatively or contributorily negligent or that affected his abilities to perceive or recall, such that Diana could impeach his credibility, then Phil's mental condition could theoretically be in issue. However, that does not appear to be the case here. There is nothing to indicate that Phil's mental condition is in controversy. Additionally, a mental examination is an intrusive procedure that should not be granted unless necessary to establish a claim or defense, neither which requirement is met in this case. Good cause for granting Diana's request for a mental examination thus cannot be said to exist.

For these reasons, the court erred in granting Diana's request for a mental examination of Phil.

Whether the physician-patient privilege applies

Under the Federal Rules of Evidence, there is no physician-patient privilege. There are only privileges for spousal communications, spousal immunity in criminal cases, penitent-clergy, and patient-social worker.

However, as discussed above, under the Erie doctrine, a federal court sitting in diversity jurisdiction must apply the substantive laws of the state where it sits and the procedural laws of the federal system. Generally the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and in most cases the Federal Rules of Evidence are procedural. However, whether or not a testimonial privilege applies is a rule of substantive law and a federal court sitting in diversity must apply the law of the state in which it sits regarding testimonial privileges.

The federal court sitting in this case must apply the state law regarding the doctor-patient privilege. Generally the doctor-patient privilege covers confidential communications between a doctor and a patient for the purposes of obtaining medical treatment. If the state in which this federal court sits acknowledged the doctor-patient privilege then Phil's communications to his doctor would generally be privileged.

However, there is generally an exception to the privilege when the patient-plaintiff's physical condition is in controversy. As stated above, this is a personal injury suit and damages are a necessary element of the negligence claim so Phil's physical condition is in actual controversy.

For that reason, even if the doctor-patient privilege applies, Phil's communications to Laura would likely be outside the privilege and would not prevent Diana from deposing Laura.

Whether Laura cannot be deposed because she is not a party

As with the standard for granting a physical or mental examination of a party, whether a party can be deposed is a discovery rule and is thus procedural and governed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure allow a party up to 10 depositions in a case. Each deposition must be no longer than 1 day of 7 hours. A party may depose another party at any time simply by providing reasonable notice. A party may depose a non-party, but it must be done on subpoena to the non-party and must provide reasonable notice and accommodations.

Under the Federal Rules of Evidence, Laura may be deposed even though she is not a party to the litigation. So Phil's objection is not correct.

However, there is no indication in the fact pattern that Diana obtained a subpoena or served it on Laura prior to deposing her. Diana cannot simply serve Phil with a notice of subpoena in order to depose a non-party.

Nonetheless, a party's objection to discovery must be stated accurately and with particularity. Phil may have waived his valid procedural objection to Diana's deposition of Laura by not correctly stating the grounds for his objection.

In sum, Diana may depose Laura under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, even though she is a non-party. However, Diana must do so on subpoena and notice to Laura, which Diana failed to do in this case. However, Phil incorrectly stated the basis for his objection to Diana deposing Laura and in so doing likely waived his otherwise valid procedural objection to the deposition.

Under the 7th Amendment to the Constitution, a party is entitled to a jury trial in all suits for damages at law. Phil's suit against Diana is a personal injury suit for damages at law and not for some form of equitable relief like an injunction so Phil is entitled to a jury trial in his suit against Diana (as is Diana). However, under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, a party must file a demand for a jury trial within 14 days of the filing of the answer to the complaint. A party may file a motion to strike all or a portion of the other party's pleading within 30 days of receiving that party's pleading.

In this case, Diana filed an answer to Phil's complaint denying negligence back in May. Phil did not file his demand for a jury trial until September and only a few weeks before trial. For this reason, Phil's demand is untimely and absent good cause for the delay in this case, which does not seem likely, Phil has waived his right to demand a jury trial. Since Diana immediately filed her motion to strike in response to Phil's demand, it was timely and should be considered and granted by the court.

For this reason, the court did not err in granting Diana's motion to strike Phil's demand for a jury trial.

Answer B

Preliminary matters

Applicable Law

After having been injured by Diana (D), Phil (P), filed a complaint in April against D in federal district court properly alleging diversity jurisdiction and seeking damages for negligence for physical injury. As such, because the complaint was filed in federal court, the Federal Rule of Civil Procedure (FRCP) govern the rules applicable to the proceedings and the actions of the courts and the parties in the suit.

(1) The Court Properly Granted Diana's Motion to Order (a) the physical Examination if she properly established good cause, but erred in granting (b) the mental examination

(b) The Physical Examination

Scope of Discovery

Discovery is the process by which parties obtain information from the other party. The FRCP provides for a broad scope of discovery, and the information needs only to be relevant to the cause of action. In fact, any information that would reasonably lead to the discovery of admissible evidence is discoverable. In other words, the information does not have to be admissible evidence to be produced, but only to reasonably lead t such information. Here, the dispute between P and D involves a car accident where D struck and injured P. As a result, P filed an action against D for negligence for physical injuries. Therefore, any information that would relate to the accident, the physical condition of P, which is at issue here, will be admissible. Here, D has filed a motion, seeking a court order directing the court to order a physical examination of P. Such examination is relevant because here, the physical condition of P is at issue since the lawsuit involves damages for personal injury. As such, this information is discoverable and within the scope of discovery.

Physical Examination Requirements

Physical Condition at Issue

In order for a party to obtain an order for a physical examination, the FRCP requires, first, that the physical condition be at issue. Here, P's condition is at issue because, as explained above, the lawsuit between P and D is about a car accident where D stuck and injured P. P is seeking damages. A physical examination will be useful to determine the extent of the injury cause by the accident to P, and will therefore be useful to determine the extent of damages, if any. Also, such physical examination will also determine if the physical injuries suffered by P were the result of the accident.

Court order and Showing of Good Cause

The FRCP requires that a court grant a motion to order a physical examination only when the moving party establish good cause to do so. Here, the facts are not clear on whether D established such good cause. A showing of good cause will require D to show that there is no other means to obtain the information that the physical examination would provide and establish the reasons to do so. Here, as explained above, a physical examination will be useful to determine the extent of the injury caused by the accident to P, and will therefore be useful to determine the extent of damages, if any, especially if there is no other information available. Also, such physical examination will also determine if the physical injuries suffered by P were the result of the accident. However, if the deposition of D is ordered (see below), then the showing of good cause for a physical examination will harder to establish because there would already be available information related to the physical condition of P after the accident. If ordering the deposition fails, however, this might constitute a good cause to order the examination because no information related to P's physical condition would therefore be available.

(c) The Mental Examination

Scope of Discovery

Discovery is the process by which parties obtain information from the other party. The FRCP provides for a broad scope of discovery, and the information needs only to be relevant to the cause of action. In fact, any information that would reasonably lead to the discovery of admissible evidence is discoverable. In other words, the information does not have to be admissible evidence to be produced, but only to reasonably lead t such information. Here, the dispute between P and D involves a car accident where D struck and injured P. As a result, P filed an action against D for negligence for physical injuries. Therefore, any information that would relate to the accident, the physical condition of P, which is at issue here, will be admissible. Here, a request for a mental examination is not likely to lead to any relevant admissible information. In fact, here, the mental condition of P is not at issue, only his physical condition because he is seeking damages for personal injury as a result of the accident. As such, this demand does not fall within the scope of discovery.

Mental Examination Requirements

Again, a court will issue an order for mental examination, only when this condition is at issue and when the moving party has established good cause to do so. Here, as explained above, the mental condition of P is not at issue and there is no reason why the court would order such examination. Not only does it fails to show good cause but would also be highly prejudicial to P.

(2) The Court Erred in Permitting to Depose Diana only if a Subpoena was not Issued, and P's argument that the Deposition would lead to the discovery of Privileged information fails

Scope of Discovery

Discovery is the process by which parties obtain information from the other party. The FRCP provides for a broad scope of discovery, and the information needs only to be relevant to the cause of action. In fact, any information that would reasonably lead to the discovery of admissible evidence is discoverable. In other words, the information does not have to be admissible evidence to be produced, but only to reasonably lead t such information. Here, the dispute between P and D involves a car accident where D struck and injured P. As a result, P filed an action against D for negligence for physical injuries. Therefore, any information that would relate to the accident, the physical condition of P, which is at issue here, will be admissible. Here Diana (D) is a physician who treated P right after the accident. Her deposition will be useful because it will lead and explain what was the physical condition of P right after the accident and will help in determining the extent of the injury as well as damages, if any.

Deposition of Third Party - Subpoena To The Third Party

The FRCP allows deposition of non-party to the case and provides for a maximum of 10 depositions, no longer than 7 hours each. There can also be only one deposition per person. When the deposition involves a non-party, i.e. someone not named in the lawsuit, then the requesting party must request the court to issue a subpoena in order to depose the third party. Here, D served P with a notice to depose Laura (L), the physician who treated him after the accident. The FRCP allows "notice" only when the discovery tools are used by party against another party. When a third party is involved, a subpoena is required, which D shall have done to properly depose her. In fact, not only did she fail to notice Laura personally, but she also failed by the means she used. As such, P is wrong when he says that a third party cannot be deposed. A third party can be deposed but here the court erred in granting the discovery request because the third party, Laura, was not properly notified.

Limit of The Scope of Discovery = Privileged Communication

The broad scope of discovery is limited by privileged information. In fact the FRCP provides that discovery means: discovery of any "non privileged" information. As such, whenever a privileged communication is involved, the scope of discovery may be limited. Here, P is asserting the Physician-Patient Privilege. As explained in the preliminary considerations, the FRCP apply here. The FRCP, and the Federal Rules of Evidence, do not recognize a Physican-Patient Privilege. As such, whether this argument will fail or prevail depends on which law the Federal District Court will apply.

Diversity Cases - Erie Doctrine - Application of State Law Privilege

The lawsuit filed by P against D was filed in federal district court, and properly alleged diversity jurisdiction. Under the Erie Doctrine, Courts sitting in diversity jurisdiction will apply the federal procedural law, and the substantive law of the state. Whether a law is substantive or procedural depends on whether it is outcome determinative or not. State Law regarding privileges have been held to be outcome determinative and therefore, substantive law for purposes of Erie Doctrine. Here, assuming that the state law of the seat of the federal action recognizes the physician-patient privilege, the federal court will have to apply it and such privilege might limit the scope of discovery.

Physician-Patient Privilege

Privilege

The physician-patient privilege is a privilege usually applied by states specifically recognizing such privilege. Under the physician-patient privilege any communication between a physician and his patient, made for the purpose of diagnosis or treatment, is privileged. The patient is the holder of the privilege and can oppose to the revelation of such information. Here, deposing L will likely lead to revealing privileged information: P saw L for purposes of diagnosis and treatment after the car accident and therefore, such communications are likely privileged.

Exceptions

The Physician-Patient privilege does not apply in several circumstances, and especially when the physical condition of the patient is at issue. Here, as explained, P's physical condition of D is at issue: the lawsuit involves a car accident where D struck and injured P and P is seeking damages for physical injury. As such, the privilege does not apply and P will fail in his argument that the deposition of L will lead to violate the physician-patient privilege because here, the privilege does not apply.

(3) The Court Properly granted Diana's Motion to Strike Phil's demand for a jury trial

In September, a few weeks before trial, P decided to file a demand for jury trial. D immediately filed a motion to strike the demand. The court was absolutely right in granting the motion.

7th Amendment Right to a Jury Trial

The 7th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution provides a right for a jury trial in federal civil case (does not apply to the states through the 14th Amendment) when the damages at law involved exceed $20. Here, P is seeking damages for personal injury under a negligence action. Negligence is an action recognized in common law and the damages required are legal damages and likely to involve more than $20, since they stem from the personal injury suffered after the car accident. Therefore P was entitled to a jury trial, but only as long as the demand was timely filed.

Notice to Opposing Party and Timely Demand

P made his demand for a jury trial about 3 weeks before trial. A demand for jury trial must be noticed to other party and promptly filed. The FRCP requires that a demand for a jury trial be filed by the Plaintiff 14 days after the complaint is filed, at the very latest and be properly notified to the opposing party. Here, P made his demand only 3 weeks before trial, after all the pleadings were closed. As such, this was not a timely demand and the Court was absolutely right to grant D's motion to strike P's demand for a jury trial.

Q4 Remedies

Steve owned two adjoining improved tracts of land, Parcels 1 and 2, near a lake. Parcel 1 bordered the lake; Parcel 2 bordered Parcel 1, and was adjacent to an access road. Steve decided to sell Parcel 1 to Belle. Belle admired five 100-year-old oak trees on Parcel 1 as well as its lakefront location.

On February 1, Steve and Belle executed a contract for the sale of Parcel 1 at a price of $400,000. The contract specified that the conveyance included the five 100-year-old oak trees. In addition, the contract stated that Belle was to have an easement across Parcel 2 so that she could come and go on the access road. Although the access road was named Lake Drive, Steve and Belle mistakenly believed that it was named Top Road, which happened to be the name of another road nearby. The contract referred to the access easement as extending across Parcel 2 to Top Road, which would not have been of any use to Belle. The contract specified a conveyance date of April 1.

Later in February, Steve was approached by Tim, who offered Steve $550,000 for Parcel 1. Steve decided to breach his contract with Belle and agreed to convey Parcel 1 to Tim. Despite Belle's insistence that Steve honor his contract, he told her that he was going ahead with the conveyance to Tim in mid-April, and added, "Besides, our contract is no good because the wrong road was named."

In March, Belle learned that, in April, Steve was going to cut down the five 100-year-old oak trees on Parcel 1 to better the view of the lake from Parcel 2.

1. What equitable remedies can Belle reasonably seek to obtain Parcel 1? Discuss.

2. What legal remedies can Belle reasonably seek if she cannot obtain Parcel 1? Discuss.

Answer A

1. What equitable remedies can Belle reasonably seek to obtain Parcel 1? Discuss.

Equitable Remedies

Remedies are ordinarily split into two categories, equitable remedies and remedies at law. Equitable remedies are only available where a remedy at law is inadequate to repair the harm. Equitable remedies are decided by the judge whereas legal remedies are usually decided by a jury. Unlike legal remedies that usually only declare damages owed from the defendant to the plaintiff, equitable remedies are backed by the contempt power of the court. If a defendant fails to comply with an equitable order, she can be held personally in contempt of court. There are several equitable remedies that Belle may seek to protect her rights with respect to the land sale contract for Parcel 1 with Steve.

Temporary Restraining Order (TRO)

A temporary restraining order is a stop gap measure wherein a court can order a defendant not to act, or occasionally to act affirmatively, in order to preserve the status quo until a hearing on a preliminary restraining order can be heard. A temporary restraining order will only be granted where the plaintiff can demonstrate that (1) she will suffer irreparable harm without the order, (2) the balance of the equities between the plaintiff and defendant favors the order, (3) the plaintiff is likely to prevail on the merits of her claim. A temporary restraining order can be heard ex parte if the plaintiff demonstrates a good faith attempt to give notice or demonstrates good cause for not giving notice. A temporary restraining order is a time-limited measure, typically limited to ten days. In this case, Belle might seek a TRO to stop Steve from cutting down the trees on Parcel 1 and not to sell Parcel 1 to Tim or any other buyer.

Irreparable Harm

First, Belle must demonstrate irreparable harm. In other words, she must show that a remedy at law would be inadequate and, without this order, any further remedy would be inadequate. Belle can demonstrate irreparable harm with respect to the cutting down of trees because her contract specifically protects her right to the 100-year-old oak trees and the trees were important to her decision to purchase the property. If Steve cuts down the trees, they cannot be replaced by damages. It would take another 100 years to grow similar oak trees. Belle likely also can show irreparable harm regarding Steve's selling of the property. Belle seeks to enforce her contract to purchase the property. If Steve sells the property to another bona fide purchaser in the meantime, she will not be able to seek specific performance. Steve may argue that he is not planning to sell to Tim until mid-April; therefore a TRO is not necessary. However, Belle can reasonably argue that Steve is not acting in good faith and there is a possibility that he will expedite the sale in order to deprive Belle of her right to specific performance. Therefore, Belle can demonstrate irreparable harm.

Balance of the Equities

Next, Belle must demonstrate that the balance of equities tips in her favor. In other words, Belle must prove that the hardship on her of not receiving the TRO is greater than the hardship to Steve of the TRO. Belle will argue that if the trees are cut down or the property is sold, she will forever lose the benefit of her contractual bargain. Therefore, there is a strong equitable argument in favor of granting Belle the TRO. Steve will argue that a TRO is inequitable because he will lose the right to an improved view of the lake on his property and might lose his interested buyer. However, a TRO will only interrupt Steve's view for a short time if he is able to prevail later and Steve is unlikely to lose his buyer based on this short time-limited order and if he does, there are likely other buyers available. The court may also disfavor Steve's arguments because he is breaching his contract with Belle and therefore his equitable arguments are not as strong. As such, the balance of the equities tips in favor of Belle.

Likelihood of Success on the Merits

Belle must demonstrate that she is likely to succeed on the merits. Belle will be able to prove a likelihood of success on the merits. A valid contract requires offer, acceptance, and consideration and must not be subject to any valid defenses. The land sale contract signed by both parties demonstrates offer and acceptance and satisfies the Statute of Frauds. The contract provides for the exchange of $400,000 for a parcel of land, which satisfies the bargained-for exchange requirement. The contract requires Steve to transfer the land to Belle and specifically protects Belle's rights to the five oak trees. Nonetheless, Steve has unequivocally plans to cut down the trees and sell to another buyer. As such, he has anticipatorily breached. If Steve receives notice, he may argue that the contract is not valid because of the mistake in the contract with respect to the name of the road. Such a mutual mistake, however, does not invalidate the contract. Therefore, Belle can establish a likelihood of success on the merits.

Preliminary Injunction

A preliminary injunction is a longer lasting pre-judgement equitable remedy. A preliminary injunction is a court order restraining the defendant from action (or more rarely, requiring the defendant to affirmatively act) to preserve the status quo. It lasts until there is a final judgment on the merits. The requirements for a preliminary injunction are identical to those for a temporary restraining order: (1) irreparable harm, (2) balance of the equities and (3) likelihood of success on the merits. However, a preliminary injunction requires notice to the defendant and a hearing.

As discussed above, Belle can demonstrate irreparable harm, balance of the equities, and likelihood of success on the merits. To receive a preliminary injunction, Belle will have to give Steve notice and the court must hold a hearing. Steve will argue that the contract is invalid because of the mistake regarding the name of the road for the easement and therefore, Belle is unlikely to succeed on the merits. But Belle can seek reformation of the contract to correct that error. Even if she could not prevail on reformation, the mistake is only harmful to Belle; therefore Steve cannot void the contract on the basis of this mistake, only Belle can. Therefore, Steve's argument will not be successful. Belle will likely be successful in receiving a preliminary injunction pending the court's determination of Belle and Steve's right to Parcel 1.

Contract Reformation

Contract reformation is an equitable remedy wherein the court will correct an error in a written contract in order to conform the contract with the actual agreement of the parties. Reformation is most often available where there is an error in the contract on the basis of a mutual mistake or scrivener's error. A mutual mistake occurs where both parties intend the contract to reflect an agreement between them but, due to a mistake by both parties, the contract does not properly reflect this agreement.

Belle can argue that the land sale contract should be reformed to include an easement over Parcel 2 to reach Lake Drive rather than Top Road. She can demonstrate to the court that both she and Steve intended the contract to include an easement over Parcel 2 to reach the access road adjacent to Parcel 2, which is Lake Drive. Both Steve and Belle mistakenly thought that the adjacent access road was called Top Road. Therefore, she can demonstrate the proper elements of mutual mistake to justify the reformation.

Steve will argue that the parol evidence rule bars extrinsic evidence related to the contract where there is a written contract. This argument will not be successful because the parol evidence rule does not apply in cases related to contract reformation. Belle can successfully seek reformation of the contract.

Specific Performance

Next, Belle will seek specific performance of the contract. Specific performance requires the defendant to actually perform under the contract rather than pay legal damages for the breach. Specific performance is available where there is (1) a valid contract, (2) that is sufficiently definite in its terms, (3) all conditions have been met for defendant's performance, (4) that there is no adequate remedy at law, (5) enforcement is feasible and (6) it is not subject to any equitable defenses.

As discussed above, Belle has a valid contract for the sale of the land for $400,000. There are no valid defenses as Steve's theory on the basis of mutual mistake fails because Belle can reform the contract and he cannot invalidate the contract on the basis of a mutual mistake that only injures Belle. The contract is sufficiently definite. The contract clearly describes the parcel of land to be sold (with the oak trees intact), the parties, and the price and payment information. Finally, Belle must be prepared to pay the purchase price to satisfy the condition of Steve's performance.

Belle has no adequate remedy at law. Every piece of land is unique. Therefore, land sale contracts are per se unique and damages are per se inadequate for a buyer (and seller under the theory of mutuality of remedies). As such, Belle can easily establish inadequate remedy at law. The enforcement of specific performance here is certainly feasible because it only requires a single transaction. Courts are hesitant to grant specific performance for repeated transactions and will never allow specific performance for personal services. But these concerns are not present; enforcement is feasible.

Finally, there must be no equitable defenses, specifically the defenses of laches and unclean hands. The defense of laches bars specific performance or other equitable remedies where the plaintiff has unjustifiably delayed in bringing the action and the delay prejudices the defendant. There is no indication that Belle has delayed since she will bring this action before the closing of the contract was even due. There is no prejudice to Steve. The defense of unclean hands bars specific performance where the plaintiff is guilty of some wrongdoing, even if not technically a breach or illegal act, in relation to the transaction. In this case, there is no suggestion of any wrongdoing by Belle. The only mistake she made with respect to the contract was entirely unintentional and innocent. This defense does not apply. Belle can seek specific performance of the contract.

If Steve cuts down the trees, Steve may argue that he is excused from specific performance of the contract because it would be impossible for him to perform the contract. However, where complete performance is not possible, a plaintiff seeking specific performance can still seek specific performance of the contract to the extent possible and seek abatement of the purchase price based on the damages from incomplete performance. Therefore, even if Steve cuts down the trees, if Belle still wants the property, she can seek specific performance and request that the court value the trees and abate the price accordingly. Of course, Belle will have to establish the value of the trees with reasonable certainty, which may be difficult given the intangible aesthetic benefit of the trees.

2. What legal remedies can Belle reasonably seek if she cannot obtain Parcel 1?

Expectation Damages

If Belle does not obtain Parcel 1, she can seek legal remedies instead. A land buyer's legal remedy for the seller's breach of contract is ordinarily expectation damages. Expectation damages seek to put a non-breaching party in the same position they would be in but for the breach. In land sale contracts they are calculated by the difference in the fair market value of the land and the contract price for the land. In this case, Belle needs to establish the fair market value of the land. A reasonable estimate for that might be the recent offer from Tim for $550,000. Therefore the difference would be $150,000 ($550,000-$400,000). Belle is entitled to the return of any deposit and $150,000 in damages, that will put her in the same legal position as if the contract was performed.

Belle may also seek consequential damages that arise from the breach if they were reasonably foreseeable. Since it is unclear what Belle bought the property for, it is unclear whether or not she could prove any consequential damages. If she was purchasing for a business purposes, she may seek to prove lost profits from the delay in finding a new property. Any lost profits claim would be limited by a defense of foreseeability and reasonable certainty.

Reliance or Restitution Damages

Where a buyer is unable to prove expectation damages, perhaps because the market price is below the contract price, a buyer can seek reliance damages for the breach. Reliance damages seek to put the buyer in the same place she was before the contract was made. Most often in land sale contracts, the reliance damages are the out-of-pocket expenses including any down payment or earnest money paid to the seller. Where a seller breaches in good faith, for example because he is unable to deliver marketable title due to no fault of his own, a buyer may also be limited to her reliance damages. In this case, expectation damages are appropriate because Belle can prove that the fair market value is greater than the contract price and Steve's breach was not in good faith.

Finally, restitution damages are available where other remedies are inappropriate and inadequate and the defendant has been unjustly enriched by this action. In this case, restitution damages would include the return of her down payment. If Steve actually sells to Tim, they may also include the additional $150,000 in profits that Steve gained from breaching his contract with Belle and selling to Tim.

The most typical defenses available to damages in contract cases are failure to mitigate damages or uncertainty. In this case, neither will apply. There is no evidence that Belle failed to act in any way that ran up her damages and by seeking the difference in fair market value and the contract price, the damages are reasonably foreseeable.

Answer B

1. Equitable Remedies

The issue here is what equitable remedies Belle may seek to obtain Parcel 1.

Temporary Restraining Order

A temporary restraining order ("TRO") is an order from the court requiring, or forbidding, the nonmoving party to take an action, while the nonmoving party seeks a preliminary injunction. The purpose is to preserve the status quo pending a decision on the motion for a preliminary injunction. To obtain a TRO, a plaintiff must show (1) that, without the TRO, she will suffer imminent irreparable harm, as balanced against the hardship that the defendant will suffer from the issuance of the TRO, and (2) a likelihood of success on the merits. A plaintiff may seek a TRO ex parte - that is, without notice to the nonmoving party - if, in addition to showing a likelihood of irreparable harm, the plaintiff shows a strong showing for why notice could not be practically provided, or why it should not have to be provided (for example, if issuing notice would cause the defendant to take the action causing irreparable harm). A TRO is only available for up to 10 days (or 14 days, under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure).

Irreparable Harm

Here, Belle purchased the property from Steve in part because they contained the five 100-year-old oak trees. If Steve cut them down, it would prevent Belle from enjoying their presence on the property. Because they are so old, they could not be readily replaced; instead, should she have to plant new ones, she would need to wait 100 years to have comparable trees on the property. Thus, she would suffer irreparable harm should Steve cut them down.

Moreover, Belle would suffer irreparable harm if Steve sold the property to Tim. If Tim did not know about the prior contract (that is, if he was a bona fide purchaser for value), and Steve sold him the property, the sale would be valid, and Belle would not be able to recover the property. Even though the conveyance to Tim will not occur until mid-April - and thus, is not scheduled to occur until after the 10-day TRO would dissolve - Belle would successfully argue that the TRO is still necessary to prohibit Steve from accelerating the sale in light of the pending litigation.

In contrast, there is no similar risk of harm to Steve. Regardless of the outcome of the litigation, Steve is either going to sell the property to Belle or to Tim in April. Preventing him from cutting down the trees will only obstruct his view of the lake for a period of less than two months, which is a minor inconvenience at most. Moreover, he will not suffer irreparable harm if he cannot convey the property immediately to Steve.

Thus, Belle would show the irreparable harm required for a TRO.

Likelihood of Success on the Merits

Belle would also be able to show a likelihood of success on the merits. Steve and Belle appear to have a valid contract, and Steve has breached the contract. Moreover, Steve's defenses here are limited.

First, under the Statute of Frauds, contracts for the conveyance of land must be in writing and signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought. The facts suggest that the contract was in writing, but they do not say so expressly. To the extent that the contract was not in writing or signed, Steve might raise the Statute of Frauds as a defense. But, because the facts suggest a writing, this is unlikely to be successful.

Second, Steve might argue that the contract is void because of the parties' mutual mistake. A contract is void for mutual mistake if both parties were mistaken to a material fact and the party seeking to invalidate the contract did not bear the risk of mistake. Here, even though the parties made a mistake in the writing, they both subjectively understood which road was meant to be included in the contract; and, in any event, as the property owner with superior knowledge, Steve likely bore the risk of mistake. Thus, Steve's defense would likely fail. Belle would likely succeed on the merits.

Conclusion

Belle can seek a TRO to stop Tim from cutting down the trees and conveying the property to Tim.

Preliminary Injunction

A Preliminary Injunction ("PI") is an order from the court requiring, or forbidding, the nonmoving party to take an action, in order to preserve the status quo pending trial on the merits. The test for a PI is similar to that for a TRO. A plaintiff must show (1) that, without the PI, she will suffer imminent irreparable harm, as balanced against the hardship that the defendant will suffer from the issuance of the PI, and (2) a likelihood of success on the merits. Unlike a TRO, however, a PI may not be issued ex parte.

For the same reasons described above, the court would grant Belle a PI pending trial.

Specific Performance

Specific performance is an equitable remedy that requires the breaching party to perform his or her obligations under the contract. To obtain specific performance, a plaintiff must show (1) that there was a valid contract with sufficiently certain terms, (2) that the plaintiff performed or was able to perform her obligations under the contract, (3) no adequate remedy at law, and (4) feasibility of enforcement. Also, specific performance is not available if the defendant has any equitable defenses.

Valid Contract

To be sufficiently definite, a land sale contract must identify the parcel to be conveyed, the purchase price, and the parties. Here, the contract specified all three. Moreover, as described above, the contract appears to be valid and Steve does not appear to have any defenses to formation. Thus, the first prong is met.

Performance

Even though Belle has not yet paid the purchase price, there is nothing in the facts to suggest that she is not able or willing to fulfill her obligations and pay the contract price. Thus, the second prong is met.

Inadequate Remedy at Law

Under the law, all land is considered unique. Moreover, here, the parcel had unique features - it was near a lake and had 100-year-old oak trees. It would be impossible for Belle to obtain another identical parcel. Thus, simply awarding her monetary damages would not be an adequate remedy. She has no adequate remedy at law.

Feasibility of Enforcement

Requiring specific performance here would be feasible. It is not clear whether the parcel is in the same state as the court but, in any event, the court has personal jurisdiction over Steve and can require him to convey the property to Belle. Thus, enforcement is feasible.

Defenses

In some cases, a court will not award specific performance if it will result in undue hardship to the defendant, resulting from the plaintiff's sharp practices. Here, Steve might argue that he would suffer undue hardship if he cannot obtain the value of his separate bargain. But he has not shown any sharp practices by Belle, and simply forgoing another opportunity is not a sufficient hardship to constitute a defense to specific performance. Thus, Steve does not have any defenses to specific performance.

Conclusion

Belle can obtain specific performance and require Steve to sell her the property.

Reformation

Reformation is an equitable remedy where the court will reform the terms of the agreement to reflect the true understanding of the parties. It requires (1) a showing of the mutually-understood contractual terms and (2) valid grounds, such as a mistake in rendering the contract to writing. Parol evidence may be used to show the existence of such a mistake.

Here, even though the contract identified the easement as giving Belle access to "Top Road," this was plainly not the true understanding of the parties. The parties both believed that the contract was giving Belle an easement to access the road known as "Lake Drive." Thus, there was a true meeting of the minds here and a court would be able to use parol evidence to determine that this was the true intent of the parties. Thus, the court would reform the contract to substitute "Lake Drive" for "Top Road."

2. Legal Remedies

The issue here is what is the appropriate measure of damages, should Belle not be able to obtain equitable relief.

The standard measure of contract damages is the expectancy measure. The purpose of contract damages is to put the non-breaching party into the same position she would have been in had the contract been fully performed. In a land sale contract, the expectation measure is the difference between the contract price and the fair market value of the property at the time of sale.

Here, Tim offered to purchase the property for $550,000. The fact that a buyer was willing to pay this price is strong evidence that it is the fair market value. Accordingly, should Belle not be able to obtain specific performance, she would be able to obtain monetary damages from Tim totaling $150,000 - the difference between the contract price and the fair market value. She would also be able to obtain any incidental damages resulting from the breach (for example, the transaction costs of cancelling the sale).

Q5 Business Associations

Andy, Ruth, and Molly decided to launch a business called The Batting Average (TBA), which would publish a monthly newsletter with stories about major league baseball players. Andy, a freelance journalist, was responsible for writing the stories. Andy conducted all of his business activities via a close corporation called Baseball Stories, Inc., of which he was the only employee. Ruth was responsible for maintaining TBA's computerized subscriber lists, mailing the newsletter every month, and billing TBA subscribers. Molly provided all equipment necessary for TBA. Andy, Ruth, and Molly expressly agreed to the following: Molly would have exclusive authority to buy all equipment necessary for TBA; and TBA's net profits, if any, would be equally divided among Andy, Ruth, and Molly.

Andy subsequently wrote a story in the newsletter stating that Sam, a major league baseball player, had been taking illegal performance-enhancing drugs. Andy knew that the story was not true, but wrote it because he disliked Sam. As a result of the story, Sam's major league contract was terminated. While writing the story, Andy's computer failed. He bought a new one for TBA for $300 from The Computer Store. The Computer Store sent a bill to Molly, but she refused to pay it.

Sam has sued Andy, Ruth, Molly, TBA, and Baseball Stories, Inc. for libel.

The Computer Store has sued Andy, Ruth, Molly, and TBA for breach of contract.

1. How is Sam's suit likely to fare? Discuss.

2. How is The Computer Store's suit likely to fare? Discuss.

Answer A

1. Sam's Suit

1-1. Does Sam have a valid claim for libel against Andy?

The issue is whether Sam has a valid claim for libel for the story Andy wrote. In order to claim a libel, a plaintiff must show that (i) there was a defamatory statement, (ii) of or concerning the plaintiff, (iii) which was published, and (iv) resulted in a harm to the plaintiff's reputation. When the plaintiff is a public official or a public figure, the plaintiff must also show (i) the defendant acted with malice, and (ii) the defendant's statement was false.

Defamatory Statement of or concerning the Plaintiff. For a claim for a libel, the defamatory statement cannot be a mere name calling but in general must allege a specific fact that is harmful to the reputation of the plaintiff. Also, it must identify the plaintiff. Here Andy wrote a story in the newsletter stating that Sam, a major league baseball player, had been taking illegal performance-enhancing drugs. The article specifically identified Sam and it specifically alleged that Sam took illegal performance-enhancing drugs. Therefore, there were allegations of specific acts of wrongdoing that were allegedly committed by Sam. Therefore, Andy's article constitutes a defamatory statement of or concerning the plaintiff.

Publication. Publication requires that the defendant share a defamatory statement at least with one person other than the plaintiff. Here Andy published his article in the newsletter with subscribers. Therefore, there was clearly a publication.

Damages. In a libel case, damages to the reputation can be presumed if the plaintiff meets all the requirements for defamation and also show malice and falsity. A libel is a publication of a defamatory statement in a written form. Here, as will be discussed below, Sam should be able to meet all the requirements so the damages can be assumed. Also, the article constitutes a libel as it is a publication in a written form with subscribers. Even if the damages were not presumed, Sam's major league contract was terminated as a result of Andy's story. Thus, Sam would be able to show he suffered harm to his reputation as shown by his losing the contract. Therefore, Sam can show damages.

Malice. Given the constitutional protection of free speech, a public official or a public figure must meet a higher burden of proof in order to win in a defamation suit. A public official is a government official and a public figure is a figure well known in the society, such as celebrities or professional sportsmen. A public official or a public figure must show, in addition to the 4 requirements of defamation that the defendant acted with malice. In this context, in order to show malice, a plaintiff must show that (i) a defendant had actual knowledge that his statement was false, or (ii) a defendant acted with reckless disregard to the truth of his statement. Here Sam is not a public official but he is a public figure. He is a major league baseball player, not just a local player who plays for a hobby. Thus, Sam must be well known in the society and is a public figure. Thus, he must show that Andy acted with malice when he published his story. Andy published his story knowing that it is false because he disliked Sam. While the fact that he acted out of personal grudge or dislike of Sam does not show that Andy acted with malice, the fact that Andy published a defamatory article about Sam knowing that it was false shows that he acted with malice for purposes of defamation. Thus, if Sam can prove that Andy knew that the story was not true, Sam would be able to show Andy acted with malice.

Falsity. A public official or a public figure must also show that the defendant's story is not true. Here the facts indicate that Andy's story was not true so Sam should be able to meet this burden.

In conclusion, Sam is likely to succeed on his claim on defamation against Andy.

1-2. Is Baseball Stories, Inc. liable to Sam?

The next issue is whether Baseball Stories, Inc. ("BSI") can be held liable for Andy's libel. Andy, a freelance journalist, conducts all of his business activities via a close corporation BSI, of which he was the only employee. Under the theory of respondeat superior, an employer is liable for the employee's tort if the employee committed the tort within the scope of his employment. While an employer is not generally liable for an employee's intentional tort, the employer could still be liable if (i) the employee was motivated by a desire to further the employer's interest, (ii) the tort was authorized or ratified by the employer, or (iii) the tort was part of the nature of the employee's job.

Here Andy and BSI's businesses consist of writing articles for journals. Thus, Andy's publication of the article in the newsletter was within the scope of his employment. Here Andy is likely to be liable for intentional tort because he was not merely negligent in publishing the story but he intentionally published the story knowing that it was false. Sam can argue that Andy was motivated by his desire to increase subscription and popularity of the newsletter and BSI's business of publishing articles. Thus, Sam can argue that BSI should be held liable for the defamation committed by Andy.

A person is always liable for his or her own tort. Thus, Andy should be directly liable for the libel against Sam. Also, a court may pierce the veil and hold a shareholder liable for the tort committed by the corporation if, for example, (i) the shareholder did not treat the corporation as a separate entity and did not observe corporate formalities, or (ii) the corporation was inadequately capitalized. This is most likely in a closely held corporation and even more so when a plaintiff is a tort victim who did not rely on the limited liability of the corporation. Here BSI is a close corporation and Andy is the only employee. Thus, it indicates that Andy had a controlling influence over BSI. While a corporation can have a sole shareholder and only one employee, the corporate formalities must be observed in order to maintain the limited liability status of the shareholder. Thus, if Andy commingled his personal funds with BSI's, used BSI's funds as if they were his own, used BSI's other assets as his own, or he inadequately capitalized BSI, Sam may be able to show that Andy and BSI are alter egos and Sam may be able to pierce the veil to reach Andy's personal assets for tort liabilities. Having said that, Andy should be directly liable to Sam in any case because it was tort committed by him personally.

1-4. Did Andy, Ruth and Molly form a partnership when they launched TBA?

Given that Andy and BSI can be held liable for Andy's libel, the next issue is whether Ruth, Molly and TBA can be held liable for Andy's libel. A partnership is formed when two or more people agree to carry on a business as co-owners for profit. No specific formalities are required to form a general partnership and whether the parties intended to form a partnership does not matter as long as there was an agreement to carry on a business enterprise for profit. Here Andy, Ruth and Molly decided to launch a business called The Batting Average (TBA). It is not clear from the name what type of entity they intended to form. However, it was formed to publish a monthly newsletter with stories about major league baseball players. Also, there is no indication it was intended to be a non-profit organization. In fact, Ruth was responsible for maintaining the subscriber lists and billing the subscribers. Also, they expressly agreed that TBA's net profits, if any, would be equally divided among Andy, Ruth and Molly. Thus, they agreed to form a business venture of publishing articles about major league baseball players for profit. Also, an agreement to share net profits shows that they formed a partnership. It does not matter that they never used the word "partnership" or they never intended to form a partnership.

The next question is what type of partnership Andy, Ruth and Molly formed as a result to determine their and TBA's liability. A default partnership is a general partnership where all partners are liable for their liabilities of the partnership. A creditor of the partnership must first look to the assets of the partnership and if they are insufficient, they can pursue the partners' personal assets. Therefore, in a general partnership, the partners act as guarantors for the partnership liabilities. There are other forms of partnership or business enterprise that provide some form of limited liability for some or all owners, such as a limited partnership, limited liability company, a limited liability partnership or a corporation. However, they all require filing a form of certification with the Secretary of State and they each require that their names indicate a limited liability by including the words such as "limited partnership," "LP", "limited liability company", "LLC" or "Inc." or "Incorporated." There is no indication here that Andy, Ruth and Molly or TBA filed any certificate of limited partnership to form a limited partnership or a certificate of qualification to form a limited liability company, nor did they file articles of incorporation to form a corporation. Also, the name, "The Batting Average" does not have any of the words indicating that they formed a business entity with limited liability. Since no formalities were observed, they would also not be able to argue that they formed a de jure corporation. Therefore, Andy Ruth and Molly formed a generally partnership when they decided to launch their business TBA.

1-5. Can TBA be held liable to Sam for Andy's tort?

Given that TBA is a general partnership, the next issue is whether it or Ruth and Molly can be held liable for Andy's tort. A partnership is liable for tort committed by a partner in the scope of his partnership. Here Andy committed a tort while he was publishing the article for the newsletter published by TBA. Thus, TBA would be liable for the tort and Sam would be able to look to the assets of TBA. In a general partnership, all the partners are liable for the partnership liabilities if the partnership assets are insufficient to meet those liabilities. Thus, if TBA's assets are not sufficient to meet Sam's claim, Ruth and Molly could also be held liable and may be required to pay out of their own personal assets. However, Ruth and Molly may be entitled to indemnification from Andy since Andy was the tortfeasor.

In conclusion, Sam is likely to be successful on his libel claim against Andy. In such event, (i) TBA and BSI would likely be vicariously liable and (ii) if the assets of TBA are insufficient, Ruth and Molly would also likely be liable out of their personal assets.

2. The Computer Store's Suit

The issue is whether (i) Andy, Ruth and Molly formed a partnership, (ii) Andy had an express, implied or apparent authority when he bought a computer for TBA, (iii) TBA can be held liable for Andy's contract liabilities, and (iv) Ruth and Molly can be held liable.

2-1. Did Andy, Ruth and Molly form a partnership?

As discussed above, Andy, Ruth and Molly agreed to carry on a business venture of publishing monthly newsletters for profit and to share any net profits derived therefrom. They did not make any necessary filings with the secretary of state and TBA does not have a name indicating limited liability. Therefore, TBA is a general partnership.

2-2. Did Andy have an Express, Implied or Apparent Authority when he bought a computer for TBA?

The next issue is whether Andy had an express, implied or apparent authority when he bought a new computer for TBA for $300 from The Computer Store. All the partners of a partnership are considered agents of the partnership and they are generally authorized to act on behalf of the partnership relating to the partnership's business, although each partner's authority may be limited by agreement. Under the agency theory, a principal can be held liable under the contract entered into by the agent if the agent had an authority to enter into such contract. An authority can be actual or apparent. An actual authority arises when the principal either expressly grants the authority to the agent either by words or conduct or it is implied from (i) the past course of dealing between the principal and the agent, (ii) the principal's past acquiescence, or (iii) such authority is incidental to other express authority granted to the agent.

Here Andy is a partner of TBA and thus he generally had the ability to act on behalf of TBA. However, Andy, Ruth and Molly expressly agreed that Molly would have exclusive authority to buy all equipment necessary for TBA. Therefore, Molly had the exclusive and express authority to buy all the equipment, including a computer used in the business. Since her authority was exclusive, Andy did not have an express authority to buy computers on behalf of TBA. There is no indication that TBA or Molly acquiesced in the past in Andy buying a computer. The Computer Store may argue that Andy was responsible for writing articles for TBA and thus using and buying a computer was incidental to his authority to write articles for TBA. However, given that buying equipment was Molly's exclusive authority, it is unlikely that Andy had any authority to buy equipment or computers on behalf of TBA.

The next question is whether Andy had an apparent authority to buy computers. An apparent authority arises when the principal holds the agent out to a third party as having certain authorities or powers. Given that TBA is an enterprise with only three owners and Andy was one of them and given that Andy was writing articles on behalf of TBA, The Computer Store is likely to argue that Andy had an apparent authority to buy a computer. On the other hand, TBA can argue that the fact that The Computer Store sent a bill to Molly indicates that they were aware that Molly was responsible for purchasing equipment. Also, the fact that Andy wrote articles for TBA can also only mean that he is an employee of TBA or a freelance writer. Thus, TBA may have a viable argument that Andy had neither actual nor apparent authority when he bought the computer and thus it should not be liable under the contract. However, even when the agent did not act with actual or apparent authority, the principal can be held liable if the principal later ratified the contract, which can be either express or implied if the principal kept the benefits of the bargain. Here, if TBA kept the computer and used it, there is likely to be ratification and thus TBA would be liable for $300 to The Computer Store.

2-3. Can Andy, Ruth and Molly be held liable for breach of contract?

Assuming that Andy acted within the scope of authority on behalf of TBA when he bought the computer or TBA later ratified the contract by keeping the benefits, the next issue is whether TBA's partners, Andy, Ruth and Molly can be held personally liable. As discussed above, they formed a general partnership. In a general partnership, partners are liable for the partnership liabilities. Thus, if TBA's assets are not sufficient to meet the liabilities to The Computer Store, they can each be held liable and required to pay out of their personal assets.

Answer B

General partnership

A general partnership is an association between two or more people to carry on as co-owners a business for profit. There are no formalities required to form a partnership. There is no writing requirement or filing requirement with the Secretary of State. The subjective intent of the parties is immaterial. All that is required is that they intend to carry on as co-owners a business for profit. In other words, a partnership is formed, simply by meeting the definition of a partnership. Here, Andy, Ruth and Molly decided to launch The Batting Average (TBA), a business to publish monthly newsletters with stories about major league baseball players, and agreed to assign responsibilities among themselves for the management of the business. Furthermore, the sharing of gross profits gives rise to a presumption of partnership formation. Here, Andy, Ruth, and Molly expressly agreed to share TBA's net profits equally among themselves.

Andy, Ruth, and Molly formed a general partnership.

Sam v. Andy

General partners are always liable for their own torts. Thus, if Andy is found liable for libel, he will be personally liable for the tort regardless of the liability of TBA.

Libel

A prima face case for libel requires a defamatory statement, of or concerning the plaintiff, publication, and damages. In addition, when the defamatory statement concerns a public figure, such as a major league baseball player, the plaintiff must prove falsity and fault. For the fault requirement, a public figure must prove actual malice. Actual malice exists when the defendant knew that statement was false or recklessly disregarded the truth or falsity of the statement. Here, Andy wrote a newsletter stating that Sam, a major league baseball player, had taken illegal performance-enhancing drugs.

Defamatory statement of or concerning the plaintiff

A statement is defamatory if it adversely reflects on the plaintiff's reputation. Here, the statement that Sam was taking illegal performance-enhancing drugs clearly lowers his reputation in the community and in his profession. In fact, his major league contract was terminated due to Andy's newsletter. Furthermore, while the facts do not present the newsletter, it is safe to assume that Andy at least mentioned Sam by name. As a result of the newsletter, Sam was terminated.

Publication

For publication, the defamatory statement must be made to a third person who understands it. This requirement is clearly satisfied as Andy published the story in a newspaper.

Damages

Sam suffered general and special damages. For libel, damage to reputation may be presumed and as his contract was terminated, Sam has also suffered pecuniary loss.

Falsity and Fault

The facts state that Andy "knew that the story was not true". This would satisfy both additional requirements for constitutional damages as the statement is in fact false and Andy acted with actual malice when he published the newsletter knowing it was not true. The fact that he wrote the story because he disliked Sam would not establish actual malice, but his intentional disregard for the truthfulness of his statement satisfies.

Thus, Sam will be successful in a suit against Andy for libel.

Liability of Baseball Stories

In terms on Baseball Stories' and TBA's liability for Andy's tort, the issue is whether Andy was acting as an agent and whether he was acting within the scope of his employment and/partnership. An employer/partnership will be vicariously liable for torts committed by agents/employees/partners that are within the scope of scope of employment/partnership. Sam would argue that because Andy conducts all of his business via Baseball Stories and is its only employee he was acting within the scope of his employment and Baseball Stories is vicariously liable.

Liability of TBA

A partnership is vicariously liable for torts committed by agents of the partnership that are within the scope of the partnership. General partners are agents of the partnership. Thus, Andy is an agent of TBA and TBA will be liable for Andy's tort if he was acting within the scope of TBA.

Sam could also argue that Andy was working on a computer purchased for TBA, and Andy was responsible for writing stories for TBA; thus he was acting as an agent of TBA and within the scope of his partnership.

Liability of Molly and Ruth

General partnerships are jointly and severally liable for all partnership obligations. Thus, a tort judgment creditor may sue any general partner for his entire loss. However, the creditor must first exhaust partnership resources before seeking payment for partners individually. Thus, Sam could hold Molly and Ruth personally liable for Andy's tort, but Sam must first exhaust TBA's resources. If he fails to do so, Molly and Ruth could look to the partnership for indemnification and/or contribution from the partners.

2. Computer Store's suit

A partnership will be liable for contracts entered into on its behalf by agents who have actual or apparent authority or contracts that have been ratified by the partnership. Partners are agents of the partnership. Thus, Andy, Ruth, and Molly are agents of TBA.

To determine whether the principal (TBA) will be bound if must first be determined whether the agent (Andy) had actual or apparent authority or the TBA ratified Andy's purchase.

Actual express authority

There is actual express authority when such authority is granted in the four corners of the partnership agreement or expressly granted by a requisite vote. Here, Andy, Ruth, and Molly agreed that Molly would have exclusive authority to buy all equipment necessary for TBA. There were no changes made to this agreement by the partners and Andy did not receive permission from Ruth and Molly to purchase a new computer for TBA. Thus, Andy did not have actual express authority.

Actual implied authority

There is actual implied authority, when the agent reasonably believes he has authority based on the manifestations of the principal. As stated above there have been no such manifestations by TBA. Furthermore, it is unreasonable for Andy to believe he has such authority because the partnership agreement between him and Ruth and Molly expressly grants such authority to Molly.

Apparent authority

Apparent authority is based on the reasonable expectations of a third party. Where a principal holds out an agent as possessing authority and a third party reasonably relies on such holding out, there is apparent authority. While TBA has not made direct representations to The Computer Store on behalf of Andy's authority, generally partners have authority to enter into contracts in the ordinary course of partnership business. Furthermore, apparent authority may be created by an agent's title. For example, if Andy told The Computer Store he was a partner of TBA, such an expression would reasonably induce The Computer Store to rely on Andy's authority as a partner. Thus, even though Andy did not have actual authority to purchase the computer for TBA he likely had apparent authority, which would bind TBA for the contract.

Ratification

Ratification occurs where an "agent" purports to act on behalf of the principal when in fact he does not have actual or apparent authority, and the principal subsequently ratifies the action (with full knowledge of its terms). There are no facts to suggest that TBA ratified Andy's purchase and thus ratification is not available to bind TBA.

Liability

As mentioned above, general partners are personally liable for partnership obligations. Thus, if apparent authority is found, The Computer Store will have a claim against TBA, Andy, Ruth, and Molly.

Even though Molly will be personally liable to Computer Store, she may seek indemnification from TBA and may also seek contribution from Andy and Ruth as partners. In addition, Ruth and Molly and likely to have a claim against Andy for violation of the partnership agreement.

Q6 Wills / Trusts

In 2011, Tess, age 85, executed a valid will, leaving all her property in trust for her grandchildren, Greg and Susie. Income from the trust was to be distributed to the grandchild or grandchildren then living each year. At the death of the last grandchild, any remaining assets were to go to Zoo for the care of its elephants.

In 2012, the court appointed Greg as conservator for Tess, because of Tess's failing mental abilities.

In 2013, the court authorized Greg to make a new will for Tess. Greg made a new will for Tess leaving Tess's entire estate to Susie and himself outright. Greg, without consulting Tess, then signed the will, in the presence of two disinterested witnesses, who also signed the will.

In 2014, Tess found a copy of the will drafted by Greg, and became furious. She immediately called her lawyer, described her assets in detail, and instructed him to draft a new will leaving her estate in trust to Susie alone and excluding Greg. Income from the trust was to be distributed to Susie each year. At Susie's death, any remaining assets were to go to Zoo for the care of its elephants. The new will was properly executed and witnessed.

In 2015, Tess died. That same year, Zoo's only remaining elephant died.

Zoo has petitioned the court to modify the trust to provide for the care of its animals generally.

1. Is Zoo's petition likely to be granted? Discuss.

2. What rights, if any, do Greg, Susie, and Zoo have in Tess's estate? Discuss. Answer according to California law.

Answer A

1. Zoo's Petition to Modify the Trust

Trust Creation

The issue is whether Tess's will created a valid charitable trust. A trust may be created either inter vivos or by testamentary trust in a will. A trust is created when there is a present intent to create a trust, a trust beneficiary, a trustee, a trust res, and a valid trust purpose. Here, it appears that Tess intended to create a trust via her will and that her property was the trust res. Although Tess did not name a trustee, a court will ordinarily appoint an appropriate trustee rather than allow a trust to fail for lack of trustee. The trust has appropriate beneficiaries because the portion of the trust intended for the benefit of Tess' grandchildren has identifiable and ascertainable beneficiaries, and the valid trust purpose of supporting the grandchildren from the income.

A charitable trust is a trust for a public charitable purpose, such as health care, education, or religion. A charitable trust may be of perpetual duration and need not identify ascertainable beneficiaries. In addition, the doctrine of cy pres applies to charitable trusts. When a charitable purpose becomes impossible or impracticable, under the doctrine of cy pres the court will determine whether there is an alternative charitable purpose that comes as near as possible to the settlor's charitable intent or whether the settlor would prefer the trust to fail. Here, the remainder of the trust after the death of the grandchildren is a charitable trust because the assets are to go the Zoo for the care of the elephants. Because the elephants died after Tess's death, her express charitable purpose of caring for the elephants is no longer possible. However, it is likely that the court will apply cy pres to direct the trust to the Zoo for the care of other animals or to another zoo with elephants for their care. It is not clear that Tess had a specific connection to this Zoo or to elephants in particular during her lifetime, such that she intended the trust to remain valid only if Zoo took care of elephants with the money. Rather, it appears that she had a general charitable intent, and the court will direct the trust funds to the charitable purpose as near as possible to her intent. Accordingly, Zoo is likely to be able to modify the trust under the cy pres doctrine.

(The gift to the Zoo does not fail under the Rule Against Perpetuities because it vests in the Zoo within 21 years after a life in being at the time of the creation of the trust. Under the Rule Against Perpetuities a gift will fail if it need not vest within the time of a life in being plus 21 years. The grandchildren were lives in being and the trust passes to the Zoo immediately upon the death of the last grandchild. Therefore, the gift over to the Zoo does not violate RAP. The charity-to-charity exception does not apply because the grandchildren are not a charity.)

Conclusion

The court will likely grant Zoo's petition to modify the trust to provide for the care of its animals generally under the doctrine of cy pres.

2. Rights to Tess's Estate

Validity of 2013 Will

The issue is whether the 2013 will validly revoked Tess's 2011 will. Generally, a validly executed will may be revoked by an act of physical revocation or by the execution of a subsequent valid will that either expressly revokes the earlier will or is inconsistent with the terms of the earlier will. If it is inconsistent in terms, the earlier will is revoked only to the extent of the inconsistency. The later will must be validly executed with all of the required formalities. A will is validly executed when there is testamentary capacity, present testamentary intent, the will is in writing, the will is signed by the testator (or signed at her direction and in her presence), there are two witnesses who jointly witness the signature or affirmation of the signature, and the two witnesses sign the will before the death of the testator with knowledge that it is the will they are signing. If the witnessing formalities are not observed, it may nonetheless be considered a valid will if the will proponent provides clear and convincing evidence that the testator intended the document to be her will. Holographic wills are permitted in California if all material terms are in the testator's handwriting.

Here, Tess executed a valid will in 2011 pouring her property into a trust that was created by the terms of the will. In 2013, Greg attempted to revoke the earlier will by making a new will that was inconsistent with the earlier will by making an outright gift of all of the property. Thus, the 2011 will was properly revoked if the formalities were observed by the 2013 will. Because the court appointed Greg as conservator and authorized him to create a new will for Tess, Greg's capacity and present intent to create the will are at issue. No facts indicate that Greg did not have capacity or that he did not presently intend to create the will in 2013. The will was in writing and Greg signed it on behalf of Tess. Although Tess did not direct that he sign the will (and indeed she was not even aware of it), Greg had been appointed conservator and so he was authorized to sign on her behalf. The will was signed in the joint presence of two disinterested witnesses, and they also signed the will before Tess's death. Thus, all of the formalities were observed and the 2013 will became Tess' valid will, revoking the 2011 will by implication.

Undue Influence or Abuse of Relationship

The issue is whether the will or some portion of it was invalid because Greg exerted undue influence or abused his conservatorship in some way. Undue influence occurs when a person exerts influence over a testator to the extent that the testator's free will is overcome. If that happens, the portion of the will that was made because of the undue influence is invalidated. If that portion was made to a person who would take by intestacy, the gift is invalidated only to the extent of the intestate share. Undue influence is presumed where a person is in a confidential relationship with the testator, had a role in procuring the will, and an unnatural gift results. Here, Greg has not exerted undue influence over Tess because he did not need to prevail on her to change her will. Instead, he was appointed conservator and given authority to change the will himself. Thus, the gift will not be invalidated because of undue influence.

However, the court might decide that Greg abused his position as conservator by changing the will in a way that was contrary to Tess's intent, without ever consulting her as to her wishes. A conservator generally has fiduciary-like duties to the individual he is representing, and thus he must act loyally and in her best interests. Greg's change of the will benefitted him directly, in a way directly contrary to Tess's express wishes at a time when she had mental capacity. Thus, the court might find that Greg's conduct violated his duty to loyally represent Tess's interests. In that case, his gift would likely be reduced to his intestate share. However, if Tess's property passed by intestacy, it would go equally to Susie and Greg as Tess's only living heirs. This is exactly the will that Greg made. Therefore, Greg would receive the gift he gave himself when he was abusing his authority. In that case, the court might impose a constructive trust on Greg's property for the benefit of Zoo.

The issue is whether Tess's 2014 will properly revoked the 2013 will created by Greg. As stated above, a will is created when there is present testamentary intent, testamentary capacity, a will in writing, signed by the testator, witnessed by two joint witnesses, and signed by the witnesses before the testator's death.

Testamentary capacity exists when the testator understands the nature and extent of her property and knows the natural objects of her bounty. Here, when Tess called her lawyer in 2014 she was able to describe her assets in detail and provide a reasonable explanation for leaving her assets entirely to Susie. Although Greg will argue that she lacked capacity because he had been appointed conservator in light of Tess's failing mental abilities, testamentary capacity may exist even when the testator lacks capacity to manage his finances and other personal affairs. Under the circumstances, it appears that Tess had capacity to understand her assets and who she wanted to leave them to, and the court will likely find that she had capacity.

Tess also appeared to have present testamentary intent because she instructed her attorney to draft a new will. The facts also state that the will was properly executed and witnessed. Therefore, the 2014 will validly revoked the 2013 will because it was completely inconsistent with that will.

Accordingly, at Tess's death in 2015, the 2014 will leaving her entire estate in trust with income distributed to Susie during her lifetime and remaining assets to the Zoo at the time of Susie's death was Tess's valid will.

Omitted Child

Greg might attempt to argue that he is entitled to an intestate share of Tess's estate as an omitted child. If a child born after the creation of a will (or the testator mistakenly believed the child was dead or did not know he had been born) is unintentionally omitted from the will, the child may take his intestate share and all other gifts are abated. However, Greg is a grandchild not a child, and he was alive at the time the will was made and intentionally omitted because Tess was angry that he had attempted to change her will. Thus, Greg will not be entitled to an intestate share as an omitted child.

Remainder to Zoo

As noted above, the gift to Zoo after Susie's death does not violate the Rule Against Perpetuities. It is a valid charitable trust, and the court will likely apply cy pres to prevent the trust from failing.

Conclusion

Greg has no rights in Tess's estate. Susie has a right to income from the trust during her lifetime and Zoo has a right to distribution of the trust assets upon Susie's death.

Answer B

2. Zoo's Petition.

The Issue here is whether Tess created a valid will and trust that left Zoo any interest in T's property.

2011 - Will

A valid will must be in writing. It must be signed by the testator in the presence of two disinterested witnesses at the same time who also sign the will.

The facts state that T created a valid will, so we can assume she met all elements of the will. Therefore, a valid will was created.

Trust

T left all of her property in trust for her grandchildren. In order for a trust to be valid, there must be a testator, a beneficiary, trustee, trust purpose, and trust property.

Testator

Here, T is the testator.

Beneficiaries

T's grandchildren Greg and Susie are the income beneficiaries b/c they get the income from the trust. The Zoo is also a beneficiary and they hold a future interest in the property. The Zoo will get the remainder of the trust after the last grandchild dies.

Trustee

Although there isn't a named trustee, it doesn't defeat the trust. The court will appoint a trustee if there is no trustee to manage the trust.

Trust Purpose

The purpose of the trust is to provide income to the grandchildren for their lives, then the remainder goes to the zoo.

Trust property

T has left all of her property into the trust.

Therefore, a valid trust was created. Under the 2011 will, Zoo had an interest in T's trust.

2013 - New Will

The issue is whether the new will is valid b/c it was created by a court appointed conservator.

Will Formalities

See rules above.

Here, Greg as the conservator for T and under the court's authorization created a new will for Tess. The will was signed by two disinterested witnesses. However, T did not sign the will. But Greg will argue that as the conservator, he was permitted to sign on her behalf. So, technically, a will was properly created. However, I will discuss below why the will should be void.

Greg as Conservator

A court can appoint a guardian or conservator to act on behalf of a person who lacks the mental capacity to act on their behalf. They have the authority to make legal decisions, such as drafting a new will. However, a conservator still owes the testator a fiduciary duty of care and loyalty. The conservator must act in the best interest of the testator and not make any decisions that are self-serving and are directly adverse to T's interest.

Here, Greg was appointed as a conservator for T b/c of her "failing mental abilities." Although he is authorized to create a new will for T, he must uphold his fiduciary duties. Greg violated his fiduciary duties when he created T's new will without first talking to her about the will and determining whether she was okay with changing the will so that it left the entire estate to Greg and Susie. Instead, Greg disregarded her previous will and left the entire estate himself and his sister Susie, cutting the Zoo completely out of the will. The act of leaving everything to himself and his sister shows self-dealing and he has violated his duty of loyalty. Even though he was legally permitted to create a new will for Tess, he violated his fiduciary duty to T. Any attempt Greg makes to argue that he was within his right to draft the new will will fail b/c he violated his fiduciary duties. T's estate could sue Greg for violating this duties and seek a request to void the 2013 will.

Undue Influence

Additionally, the Zoo and T's estate will argue undue influence per se b/c there was a fiduciary relationship with the person who wrote the will and there was an unnatural devise.

Here, Greg is the conservator and in a fiduciary relationship with T. The devise was also unnatural b/c the original will never intended to leave the entire estate to Susie and Greg. Therefore, the Zoo and T's estate should be successful in voiding the will under undue influence per se.

DRR

Alternatively, the Zoo and T's estate could attempt to revive the original will under DRR.

Under DRR, a previous will can be revived if a most recent will was created under fraud or misrepresentation. Meaning that the testator created the new will because they were misinformed about something (i.e., a beneficiary had died when they were really alive). If that is the case, then the new will can be voided and the old will can be revived.

Here, T's estate and the Zoo will argue that T would have never created the new will that Greg created. Greg fraudulently misrepresented T's wishes for her will and created an unnatural devise. As discussed above, T never intended to leave her entire estate to Greg and Susie. There is nothing in the facts that suggests she had changed her mind since 2011. Therefore, the 2013 will should be voided and the 2011 will should be revived.

2014 Will Drafted by Lawyer

After T discovered that Greg created the 2013 will, T created a new will. The issue here is whether a valid will was created for lack of capacity.

Will Formalities

See rule above. Here, the facts state that the new will was properly executed and witnessed. So, let's assume that will formalities have been met.

Lack of Capacity

Generally, a person lacks capacity if they are unable to understand the nature of their estate, the nature of their relationship with family and friends, and the nature of their act of creating the will.

Here, the biggest problem is that the court appointed a conservator for T b/c of her failing mental abilities. Other than that, we don't know much about her capacity to create a will. We don't know if "failing mental abilities" equates to lack of capacity. Let's look at the elements for capacity.

Nature of the act

This element means that the T must understand the nature of her acts and conduct of creating the will.

Here, T appears to understand the nature of her act of creating the will because she saw the will that Greg drafted and became furious and contacted her lawyer to draft a new will. It appears that T understood the nature of her act b/c she knew that Greg's 2013 will was not what she intended and she knew that she needed to call her lawyer to draft a new will. Therefore, this element is met.

Nature of the estate
This elements means that the testator must understand the extent of and identify his property.

Here, T understand the nature of her estate and property b/c she revised her will describing her assets in detail and left her entire estate to Susie. Thus, this element is likely met.

Nature of relationships with family and friends
This element means that the testator must understand their relationship with family and friends - the people they are leaving their assets to.

Here, T seems to understand the nature of her relationships b/c she was so angry at Greg for what he did that she specifically excluded him from her new will. She left all of estate in trust to Susie with the remainder to the Zoo. Thus, this element is likely met.

Therefore, since T appears to have met all the elements for capacity at the time that she created the will, the 2014 will is probably the valid enforceable will. The 2014 will revokes all prior wills automatically. If the court agrees that T had capacity at the time that she created her will, then T's 2014 will is probably valid and Zoo has an interest in T's estate.

Cy Pres

The next issue is Zoo's ability to use the assets b/c the trust assets were left for the care of its elephants but they have no elephants. Under the Cy Pres doctrine, the court can modify a charitable trust purpose if the trust purpose has been frustrated.

Here, T's trust left anything remaining in the trust to Zoo for the care of its elephants. The facts don't indicate that Susie has died yet, so the Zoo's interest is still a future one. Because the Zoo doesn't have any present interest in the trust, the Zoo will most likely fail in petitioning the court to modify the trust purpose. Although the Zoo doesn't have any elephants at this time, they might have elephants when Susie dies. If at the time that Susie dies, the Zoo doesn't have elephants, then the Zoo might have a better chance at succeeding in modifying the trust purpose. If they are successful in modifying the trust purpose, the new purpose must also be charitable and the court will probably want them to keep the charitable purpose as close as possible to what the original trustor intended the purpose to be. Therefore, Zoo's petition is premature. The court should dismiss it at this time b/c they do not have any present interest and the purpose of the trust is not currently frustrated.

3. Rights of Greg, Susie, and Zoo.

See discussion above regarding the beneficiaries' rights.

Greg

Based on the 2014 will, Greg has no interest in T's assets. Of course, if the court determines that T lacked capacity to create the 2014 will, then Greg might be able to income from the trust from the 2011 will. The 2011 will will only be valid, if the 2013 will that Greg fraudulently created is void and the 2011 will is revived.

Susie

Susie has interest in the trust income for her life under the 2014 will. As discussed above, the 2013 will is likely invalid, so Susie won't get share T's entire estate with Greg. If the court determines that the 2014 will is invalid, then Susie gets trust income for life under the 2011 will.

Zoo

Zoo has a future interest in the remainder of the trust for the care of its elephants under the 2014 will.

Q1 Contracts / Remedies

Percy and Daria entered into a valid written contract for Percy to design and install landscaping for an exclusive housing development that Daria owned. Percy agreed to perform the work for $15,000, payable upon completion. Percy estimated that he would work approximately 100 hours a month on the project and would complete the project in three months. His usual hourly fee was $100, but he agreed to reduce his fee because Daria agreed to let him photograph the entire landscaping project for an article he planned to propose to Beautiful Yards and Gardens magazine. He anticipated that publicity from the article would more than compensate him for his reduced fee.

Percy completed two months' work on the project when Daria unjustifiably repudiated the contract. He secured a different project with Stuart in the third month, which paid him $1,500 and took 15 hours to complete. He could have completed Daria's project at the same time.

At the time Daria unjustifiably repudiated the contract, Percy was negotiating with Tammy to landscape her property for $30,000. Once Tammy learned what had happened, she stopped negotiation.

Percy has sued Daria. Ideally, he would like to finish the project with her.

What remedy or remedies may Percy reasonably seek and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

Answer A

Contract Law - Common Law

In contract law, the common law governs service contracts or land sale contracts, and the UCC governs the sale of goods. This is relevant because there are certain differences in remedies between the two areas of law, and certain remedies that are specific to the UCC.

This was a service contract, because Percy was to perform the service of landscaping the yard. Therefore, the common law and its remedies apply, which will be discussed below.

Breach Of Contract and a Valid Contract

A breach of contract claim requires there be 1) a valid contract, 2) a breach, and 3) damages. The problem says they entered a valid written contract, so there is no issue there.

Breach - Anticipatory Repudiation

Anticipatory repudiation occurs when a party clearly and unequivocally communicates or manifests that it will not perform its duties on the contract. When there is an anticipatory repudiation, the other party may treat the repudiation as a breach or ignore it and demand performance until the original performance was due. When one party has entirely performed before the agreed upon date, and the other party repudiates by refusing to pay - i.e. the only duty remaining is for one party to pay - the non-breaching party may not sue for damages until the original agreed upon date.

Here, Daria clearly manifested that she would not pay, and the problem says it was unjustifiable. Percy can take this as a breach of the contract. Also, Percy had not completed performance and so there are more duties due than simply one party paying.

Therefore, Percy may bring a breach of contract claim for any resulting damages, discussed below.

Monetary Damages

The general and presumed damages in contract law are monetary damages, with seek to compensate the non-breaching party with money. In certain situations, which will be discussed below, equitable remedies such as specific performance will be granted. But the default is damages, so these will be discussed first.

Expectation Damages

The default contract remedy is expectations damages. Expectation damages seek to place the non-breaching party in the same position he or she would have been in had the breaching party performed. Said another way, expectation damages seek to give the non-breaching party the benefit of its initial bargain. The general formula for expectation damages is the difference amount of price or the amount to be paid for a service or good under the contract and the amount of replacing (the market price) it, plus any incidental damages, plus any foreseeable consequential damages, less any amount saved by the non-breaching party.

Here, the general damages to which Percy would be entitled include the amount of money he stood to earn under the contract ($15,000) less the amount he could get paid for replacement work. There is a tricky issue regarding the magazine spread in Beautiful Yards and Gardens, because Percy can possibly argue that the value of that was at least $15,000, and so his total expectation was $30,000, and therefore if the court does not grant specific performance (see below), it should award him expectation damages of $30,000 minus any replacement services he provides and any amount he saves. This is because Percy would have completed 300 total hours of work (100 hours a month X 3 months) and he would normally charge $100 for each hour (300 X 100 = $30,000). Daria might argue that he only expected to make $15,000 and so that should be the amount from which to measure Percy's expectation damages.

Because the initial contract amount was only for $15,000, Daria has a strong argument that that amount was the only amount Percy could reasonably have expected to make. In the event the specific performance is not granted, and therefore Percy does not get the added publicity, it will be difficult for him to claim he expected to earn more than $15,000 and so arguing for his traditional hourly rate will probably fail. If he wants to collect more in the absence of specific performance, he could possibly argue under a restitution theory.

Consequential Damages: Lost Contract with Tammy

Consequential damages are damages that are unique to an individual party (i.e. they are not those that are clearly within the contract, such as the contract price) but that are the natural and foreseeable consequences of a contract breach or are contemplated by the parties when contracting. Importantly, to collect consequential damages, the damages must be proven with reasonable certainty and they must be foreseeable.

Here, Percy will argue that his lost contract with Tammy was a consequence of Daria repudiating their contract, and therefore the consequential damages of that $30,000 contract should be included in his damages with Daria. He will point to the timing, and that he and Tammy were negotiating a deal but Tammy stopped upon learning that Percy's contract with Daria ended. Percy might argue that Tammy stopped negotiating because the broken contract with Daria gave Tammy reservations about contracting with Percy.

Percy's consequential damages argument is subject to many counter-arguments by Daria, which will probably win out.

Causation of Breach

First, there is a causation issue. Daria can convincingly argue there is no proof that her repudiation even caused Tammy to stop negotiating. Therefore, it might not even be a "consequence" of her repudiation and should not be included in Percy's damages claim.

Certainty

Tammy can argue that there is no certain amount of the consequential damages with Tammy. They were negotiating over a price of $30,000, but that was not the final, agreed upon price, which could have been less. Further, there might not have been a contract at all. Therefore, there is no reasonable certainty that but for Daria's repudiation, Percy would have earned $30,000 from Tammy.

Foreseeability

Lastly, even if Daria's repudiation caused Tammy to cease negotiating, Daria can argue it was not a natural and foreseeable consequence of her repudiation, nor did Daria contemplate such a consequence when entering the contract. Daria repudiated the contract unilaterally. She never alleged that Percy was doing a bad job, and she has done nothing further to impugn his business reputation. While it is arguably foreseeable that someone canceling a contract might make the other party look bad, it is likely not a natural consequence of one individual's repudiation to cause another party to back out of a contract.

Disposition

Percy should not be able to collect consequential damages from the lost deal with Tammy in his claims against Daria.

Incidental Damages

Incidental damages are naturally arising damages that a party occurs when trying to fix the situation after another party breaches. Incidental damages include costs such as trying to renegotiate other deals. Here, it is unclear any specific incidental damages Percy may collect, but he will be able to collect any that do exist.

Mitigation and contract with Stuart

A non-breaching party has a duty to mitigate damages by seeking reasonable replacements or substitutes for goods or services. Thus, in his third month on the job, Percy had a duty to mitigate by finding replacement work. Any damages Percy collects from Daria must be reduced by what Percy earns from these mitigating contracts, and if he does not mitigate, the law will treat Percy as if he did and not allow him to collect if there were reasonable replacements for his contract with Daria.

Here, Percy entered into a contract with Stuart to complete 15 hours of work for $1500 in the third month. Daria will argue that this was mitigation and therefore that any damages he collects from her should be reduced by this amount as adequate cover.

Lost-Volume Seller

A party does not need to reduce expectation damages by the cost of cover or replacement performance if the party is a lost-volume seller. Generally, this applies to sellers of goods who have enough supplies to meet the demands of their customers, such that the other party breaching does not just allow the seller to sell to a new party, but the breaching party merely constitutes a lost sale the seller could have met anyways. If a party is a lost volume seller, cover or replacement service will not reduce its damages.

Here, Percy was not a seller of goods, but he could have performed the contract for Daria and the contract for Stuart. Thus, the contract for Stuart makes Percy look like a lost volume seller because he could've performed both and thus could've made the $15,000 from Daria and the $1500 from Stuart. Therefore, the $1500 from Stuart should not count as mitigation and should not reduce any damages he collects from Daria.

Other Mitigation

There are no specific facts about seeking cover, but the fact he negotiated a deal with Stuart and was attempting to enter a deal with Tammy suggests he was looking for adequate replacements. Thus, Percy has met his duty to mitigate and his damages from Daria should not be reduced.

Disposition of Expectation Damages

He is entitled to the $15,000 regardless of specific performance (see below) because he expected to make that, but not the lost contract with Tammy and not reduced by the contract with Stuart. This should be increased by incidental damages and decreased by any amount he saves by not having to further perform. If he does not get specific performance, he might recover extra in restitutionary damages for the benefit conferred on Daria (See below).

Reliance

Reliance damages seek to place the non-breaching party in the position he or she would have been in if the party had never entered into a contract. Thus, reliance damages generally consist of reasonable expenses the non-breaching party has incurred in preparing and partially performing the contract.

Here, there are no clear reliance damages amounts, but Percy could collect any amounts he's spent on tools specifically for Daria or other related expenses.

However, these are likely to be less than the $15,000 expectation damages, and a party may not collect both expectation and reliance damages, so Percy will likely not try and collect these damages.

Restitution

Restitutionary damages seek to compensate the non-breaching party for benefits he has conferred on the breaching party in order to prevent unjust enrichment by the breaching party. In some circumstances a breaching party may even be able to collect restitutionary damages if he has substantially performed and thus conferred a substantial benefit on the other party. Restitutionary damages may take the form of either the amount of improvement the breaching party has enjoyed, or the value of the services provided by the non-breaching party. Courts have equitable power to choose one or the other, and will consider factors such as the blameworthiness of the parties.

Here, Percy has performed 2 months of work at 200 hours total and thus the market value of his benefit conferred upon Daria was $20,000. Percy will argue he should at least get paid this if he cannot finish the contract. This is more than the $15,000 in expectation damages, but it is arguably fairer if he doesn't get specific performance because this is the value he conferred on her. Daria might argue that he did not substantially perform because he only completed 2/3 of the work, but Percy was not a breaching party, and so he is not blameworthy and therefore he needn't substantially perform to seek restitution.

If the amount of increased value of her land is even higher, Percy might argue for that, but such a number is unclear from these facts. Because he's conferred $20,000 worth of services and thus benefited Daria to that amount, Percy can argue for this amount as well instead of expectation damages if he wants. If he gets specific performance and finishes and the original contract is enforced, he would not get restitution damages because the other remedies would suffice.

No Punitive Damages

Even though Daria's breach was intentional and without justification, punitive damages are not award for breach of contract claims, and therefore Percy may not collect any.

Specific Performance

It is within a court's equitable powers to grant specific performance as a remedy in certain circumstances. Specific performance requires that both parties actually complete the contract, rather than compensate each other in money for any breach. Specific performance requires 1) a valid contract, 2) with clear provisions that can be enforced, 3) an inadequate legal remedy (i.e. money damages are insufficient for some reason, such as the good or service is unique), 4) balancing the hardships, performance is equitable, and 5) enforcing the performance is feasible.

Valid contract with clear terms

The contract was valid and the terms were clear as the payment and services were unambiguous.

Inadequate legal remedies

Percy will claim that mere expectation or restitutionary damages are insufficient because he entered the contract thinking he would be able to photograph it and get more publicity to further his business. Specifically, he will claim that it is difficult to value the worth of this increased publicity and therefore it cannot be remedied with mere dollars and can only be remedied by allowing him to finish performance.

Daria can argue that he can be compensated for his time adequately by paying him his normal hourly rate, and that he can always just photograph another project of his. This is a close issue. If Daria's yard would've been particularly nice or a particularly good display of Percy's work, then maybe this performance was unique. If it was any ordinary yard, then absent a showing that Percy needed to place the advertisement now, legal remedies should suffice and Percy could just photograph another project.

Equitable

In terms of balancing the hardships, it is unclear why Daria repudiated the contract or if she has any sort of reason for not wanting performance complete. The question says it was unjustified and so there likely is not. On the other side, Percy has done nothing wrong and appears to have performed adequately. Daria arguably could have to pay more under a restitutionary theory if there is no specific performance (the $20,000 in received benefit as opposed to the initial $15,000 under the contract), so it would not be harder to enforce. However, it may be difficult because of their soured relationship, but that should not be a strong equitable argument considering Daria caused this potential issue.

Feasibility

Lastly, specific performance must be feasible to enforce. Courts consider how long the contract will last, the amount of supervision required, and other related factors. Here, the contract would only take one more month and 100 more hours. This is relatively short for a contract, and the parties could just come back in a month or so to a court to show it was enforced. Daria might argue the court would not want to spend this time, but that could apply to almost any specific performance remedy, and if a 1-month service contract with clear plans/designs already made by Percy is not feasible, then almost any specific performance would not be.

Disposition

While feasibility is not a clear issue, performance would likely be feasible. The biggest issue is whether a court thinks a legal remedy is inadequate. If there is something special about Percy completing this project, then a court will likely order specific performance. If it is just any other landscaping project, it will likely hold that damages (discussed above) will suffice.

Answer B

Applicable Law

It must first be determined what applicable law applies to the contract involved in this dispute between Percy (P) and Daria (D).

Rule: The Uniform Commercial Code applies to contracts for the sale of goods. All other contracts are governed by the common law, such as services contracts and contracts for the sale of land.

The contract between P and D involved the design and installation of landscaping for an exclusive housing development that D owned. As such, this is a contract for services, which makes the common law applicable and governing.

Conclusion: The common law applies.

Contract Formation

A contract is an agreement that is legally enforceable. A valid contract requires an offer, acceptance, and consideration.

The facts state P and D entered into a valid written contract, thus there was a valid contract between them.

Conclusion: There was a valid contract formed between P and D for the design and installation of landscaping.

Anticipatory Repudiation

Did Daria breach the contract by anticipatorily repudiating?

Rule: When one party unequivocally and unambiguously indicates to the other contracting party before the time for performance arrives that they are not going to perform on the contract, this is considered an anticipatory repudiation and a total breach of the contract. The non-breaching party is entitled to all remedies at this time so long as the non-breaching party has not already fully performed their part. If the non-breaching party has in fact fully performed their duties under the contract when the anticipatory repudiation is made, they must then wait until the time for performance to seek remedies.

Two months into the project, Daria "unjustifiably repudiated the contract." This will be regarded as a material and total breach, and at that time P was entitled to all remedies available.

Conclusion: D breached the contract by anticipatorily repudiating, and P is entitled to all remedies at this time.

Remedies

What remedies may P seek from D?

A party may seek legal, restitutionary, and equitable remedies depending on the facts and circumstances of the case.

Legal Remedies

What legal remedies is P entitled to?

Rule: Legal remedies take the form of monetary damages.

Compensatory Damages

Compensatory damages are a common legal remedy in contracts disputes. They can be in the form of expectation damages, consequential damages, and incidental damages, as well as reliance damages.

Expectation damages seek to place the non-breaching party in the position he would have been in had there been no breach. They seek to provide the non-breaching party with his expectations under the contract.

Consequential damages are a form of compensatory damages that are more special in nature and result from the non-breaching party's particular circumstances. These must be known to both parties at the time of contract formation in order for the non-breaching party to be able to recover them.

Reliance damages are used when expectation damages and consequential damages are too speculative and uncertain. They provide the non-breaching party with damages in the amount of how much that party spent in performance and reliance on the contract.

All contract damages must be causal (but for causation), foreseeable at the time of contracting, certain, and unavoidable (non-breaching party's duty to mitigate).

Expectation Damages for the Contract Price

The contract payment price was $15,000. Expectation damages for P would be $15,000 because this is what he expected to receive had the contract been fully performed by both parties.

Consequential Damages for the Photographs

P will also argue that he is owed consequential damages for the loss he incurred due to not being able to photograph the completed gardens and landscaping which he planned to include in his project for an article he planned to propose to Beautiful Yards and Gardens. Since this loss is not a direct expectation damage, P will have to show that the damages are causal, foreseeable, certain, and unavoidable. He will argue that they are causal because D breached the contract only two months into the deal when the work was not yet completely done; he is no longer able to photograph the entire landscaping project and use it in his article which he plans to propose to the magazine. But for the breach, P would be able to have taken the pictures and included them in his article to propose to the magazine. However P will have a hard time arguing that the damages were foreseeable and certain. He may try and argue that these damages were foreseeable to both him and D because he agreed to a reduced fee only because D agreed to let him take the pictures of the completed landscaping project. If P can show that D was aware of the fact that he wanted to use the pictures in a proposal to magazine, he may have an argument this loss was foreseeable to both him and D. Also the fact that he accepted a significantly lower fee might suggest that D was in fact aware that that the photographs were an important "payment" for P. P normally charged $100 per hour for his work and planned to work 100 hours on this project a month for three months. Thus, his normal fee for such a project would have been $30,000, but instead he charged D only $15,000 because she agreed to allow him to photograph the landscaping. He anticipated "that publicity from the article would more than compensate him for his reduced fee." P will argue further that his damages are certain because they amount to $15,000 (the difference between his usual fee of $30,000 for this type of project and what he agreed to with D, $15,000). D will counter that these damages are not certain because they are too speculative. It would be hard to determine and set a monetary amount for how much P would have received in publicity from the article. D can also argue that P only planned to use the pictures in a proposal to propose to the magazine, and that P was not even definitely given an article spot in the magazine.

Regarding the factor of unavoidable, a party is under a duty to mitigate damages. P did in fact mitigate damages by securing a different project with Stuart in the third month that paid him $1, 5000 and took 15 hours to complete. However P will argue that he could have completed this project at the same time as D's, thus is this is in fact the case, then P's damages would not be offset by the $1,500 he earned from the other job because he could have done both projects at the same time, thus he still lost out on the profits from D's breach.

Conclusion: P may have a claim that he is entitled to $15,000 for the loss in being able to photograph the completed project, but there are issues as to the foreseeability and certainty of these damages.

Consequential Damages for the $30,000 Tammy deal

P will also argue that he is owed consequential damages for the $30,000 deal with Tammy. P was negotiating with tammy to landscape her property for $30,000 but once Tammy learned of the unjustifiable repudiation by D she stopped negotiating. P will have to argue that but for D's breach, he would have secured the landscaping job with Tammy for $30,000. The facts do state that "once Tammy learned what happened" she immediately stopped negotiation which suggests that this news caused her to stop negotiating with P. However, P may have some trouble arguing that these damages are foreseeable because D may not have known at all that P was also negotiating with other individuals at the time for similar projects. P will try and make the argument that he is entitled to these damages because D should have known or even did in fact know that by breaching a major landscaping deal for an exclusive housing development news of this would spread and could affect P's reputation in the industry and lead others to refrain from doing business with him under the assumption that he was not an ideal business man since a previous client backed out of a contract with him. This could appear to others to be that P is not skilled and qualified to do landscaping jobs. These damages are likely certain because they were negotiating for an amount of $30,000 for the project and P can also rely on his past business deals to show this amount was accurate. There is no issue as to unavoidability here because there was no way P could have mitigate the loss from the Tammy deal.

Conclusion: P may have a claim for the $30,000 in lost profits from the deal with Tammy, but again these damages likely may be considered too speculative since the parties were only in the negotiations stage.

Incidental Damages

In addition to compensatory and consequential damages a party is always entitled to incidental damages which cover costs directly associated and incidental to the breach. In a contracts case this is usually expenses in negotiating with other parties for completion of the contracted for work.

If P incurred any costs or expenses in finding new work such as with Stuart as well as if he spent any more or time looking for other work to mitigate his losses from D's breach he would be entitled to such damages as well.

Conclusion: If P incurred any damages incidental to D's breach he can recover these in addition to receiving compensatory, expectation, and consequential damages.

Reliance Damages

P has a strong case for expectation damages amounting to $15,000, but he may have some trouble proving lost profits from the photographs and also the deal with Tammy. Instead of recovering such damages, P could elect to recover reliance damages, which would amount to all the costs P incurred thus far in reliance on the contract. Such expenses would include money spent on landscaping tools and items such as bushes and plants and flowers. It seems likely that this amount would be less than the $15,000 and potentially the consequential damages, so P likely would elect to recover those since they would be more money for him.

Conclusion: P could receive reliance damages and incidental damages in lieu of expectation and consequential damages.

Restitutionary Remedies

Restitutionary Remedies can be legal and equitable. Legal restitutionary remedies are applicable here. If a contract is breached or in fact no contract was formed or if a contract later fails for some reason and is no longer enforceable a party can still recover for the value of their services so that the other party will not be unjustly enriched. The value of this is based on the value of the party's services even if this amount is more than they were entitled to under the contract. Restitutionary remedies would be in lieu of legal remedies.

P could also elect to recover restitutionary damages instead of the above legal damages. These would be based on the fact that he completed two months' worth of work on the project at the time of breach. P estimated spending 100 hours of work on the project each month, thus he likely spent 200 hours on the project at the time of breach. P can argue that the value of his services was $100 an hours since this is what he normally charged for his work. As such P would be entitled to $20,000 in restitutionary remedies since D has received the benefits of P's work over the past two months. This would prevent D from being unjustly enriched. The fact that P's hourly rate under the contract was only $50 per hour would not stop P from being able to recover for $100 per hour of work so long as P can demonstrate that the value of his services was $100 an hour, which as discussed above, he likely can do.

Conclusion: P could seek the restitutionary remedy of restitutionary legal damages for $20,000 for the value of his work conferred upon D to prevent unjust enrichment.

Equitable Remedies

Specific Performance

Since P ideally would like to finish the project with D he would most likely argue for the equitable remedy of specific performance. Specific performance is a court order which mandates that a party perform their duties and obligations under the contract. A plaintiff is entitled to specific performance if they can show the following elements:

1. There is a valid and enforceable contract between the parties with terms certain and definite;

2. The non-breaching party has fully performed on the contract, is ready, willing, and able to perform, or their performance has been excused.

3. The legal remedy is in adequate;

4. The remedy is feasible; and

4. There are no defenses to the contract.

Valid, Enforceable Contract with Terms Certain and Definite

P can easily show there was a valid enforceable contract between P and D with terms certain and definite because the parties entered into a "valid written contract." The terms are certain and definite because P was to design and install landscaping for an exclusive housing development for an amount of $15,000 which was to be payable upon completion. He estimated work would take approximately 100 hours a month over the course of three months. All the essential elements such as payment, performance, duration of the contract, and the parties are specified.

Conclusion: P will be able to show there was a valid, enforceable contract with terms certain and definite between the parties.

Fully Performed

P can show he has performed two months' worth of work under the contract, and that he is ready willing and able to finish the project and continue performance if allowed by D. He has also taken other jobs which further indicate his abilities to perform landscaping work and his willingness to do so. Also P has said he ideally would like to finish the project.

Conclusion: P has fully performed.

Inadequate Legal Remedy

An inadequate legal remedy is involved when the sale is for a piece of land since all land is unique or for goods that are unique because they are rare or one of a kind. Also goods may be unique when the circumstances make them so. When the item of the contract is unique then legal damages remedies are inadequate.

P likely will have a hard time arguing that he cannot be compensated by legal damages. Money would be able to make P whole again and compensate him for his losses that resulted from the breach. P may try and argue that he has lost out on a $30,000 contract with Tammy and also much publicity from a proposal and article in magazine and that these damages may be considered too speculative and uncertain as consequential damages for him to prove in court, and thus he cannot be legally compensated by monetary damages for these losses. However, it seems likely this argument would fail.

Conclusion: Legal remedy is likely adequate.

Feasible Remedy

Negative injunctions where a party is prohibited from doing something are easy for a court to enforce. Affirmative mandates are harder to monitor and supervise, thus they pose a problem for the feasibility of ordering specific performance. Also parties are not usually entitled to specific performance when the contract is for personal services.

Here, the contract is for personal services but P seeks to be able to do these services. Usually when the plaintiff seeks for the breaching party to perform services under the contract by specific performance the court will deny this remedy. Because P only has one month left to finish work on the landscaping there is the possibility that the court may make D allow P to finish his project since D only has to pay D.

Conclusion: There may be a feasibility issue.

No Defenses

If there is a defense to the enforcement of a contract, the court will not award specific performance. Such defenses include statute of frauds, statute of limitations as well as equitable defense including unclean hands and laches.

The facts do not implicate any defenses to this contract. The contract was in writing thus there is no statute of frauds issue. Additionally the contract need not be in writing and signed by the party charged since it is not required to be under the Statute of Frauds.

Conclusion: There are likely no defenses to the contract.

Overall Conclusion on Specific Performance: P may be entitled to specific performance, but a court likely would find legal damages to be adequate and also for the remedy to be not feasible, and thus deny this remedy.

Overall Conclusion: As discussed above, P is entitled to the legal remedies of compensatory damages in the form of expectation damages and possibly consequential damages in addition to incidental damages. P could instead elect to recover reliance damages or restitutionary damages.

Q2 Evidence

Pete was a passenger on ABC Airlines (ABC), and was severely injured when the plane in which he was flying crashed because of a fuel line blockage.

Pete sued ABC in federal court, claiming that its negligent maintenance of the plane was the cause of the crash.

At trial, Pete's counsel called Wayne, a delivery person, who testified that he was in the hangar when the plane was being prepared for flight, and heard Mac, an ABC mechanic, say to Sal, an ABC supervisor: "Hey, the fuel feed reads low, Boss, and I just cleared some gunk from the line. Shouldn't we do a complete systems check of the fuel line and fuel valves?" Wayne further testified that Sal replied: "Don't worry, a little stuff is normal for this fuel and doesn't cause any problems."

On cross-examination, ABC's counsel asked Wayne: "Isn't it true that when you applied for a job you claimed that you had graduated from college when, in fact, you never went to college?" Wayne answered, "Yes."

ABC then called Chuck, its custodian of records, who identified a portion of the plane's maintenance record detailing the relevant preflight inspection. Chuck testified that all of ABC's maintenance records are stored in his office. After asking Chuck about the function of the maintenance records and their method of preparation, ABC offered into evidence the following excerpt: "Preflight completed; all okay. Fuel line strained and all valves cleaned and verified by Mac." Chuck properly authenticated Sal's signature next to the entry.

Assuming all appropriate objections and motions were timely made, did the court properly:

1. Admit Wayne's testimony about Mac's question to Sal? Discuss.

2. Admit Wayne's testimony about Sal's answer? Discuss.

3. Permit ABC to ask Wayne about college? Discuss.

4. Admit the excerpt from the maintenance record? Discuss.

Answer according to the Federal Rules of Evidence.

Answer A

1) Wayne's Testimony about Mac's question to Sal

Logical Relevance; in order to be logically relevant, the evidence must make a fact that is of consequence in determination of the action more or less probable than without the evidence.

Here the evidence with regard to Wayne's testimony is highly relevant in that it tends to establish that Mac's (M) supervisor Sal (S) had notice of a potential problem with the aircraft prior to flight. Moreover, the second part of the statement shows, the ABC had the opportunity to do a systems check that was part of the routine operation, but ultimately failed to do so. It thus makes it more probable that ABC's employees were negligent in maintaining the aircraft, because S had notice of a problem and took no corrective action.

Legal Relevance - relevant evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, waste of time, or confusion of the issues. Here ABC will argue that the evidence is highly prejudicial to ABC since it demonstrates that one of its employees noted a problem and stated, that corrective action should be taken. This is unlikely to be well received by the court, since, it is prejudicial, but not unfairly so, since it does not tend to arise the emotions or passions of the jury. Further, the evidence is highly probative in that one of its employees noticed a potential problem and recommended corrective action. As such, the statements about Mac's statements are legally relevant with the probative value not being substantially outweighed by unfair prejudice.

Hearsay: hearsay is defined as an out of court statement offered for the truth of the matter asserted. Here the statement by M was made out of the current proceeding in court, thus it was made out of court. The first part of Mac's statement is an assertion and thus definition be considered a statement. However the second part of the statement with regard to the systems check is actually a question (further explained below), and as such is not an assertion. Accordingly it would fall outside the definition of hearsay as discussed below. Finally, both parts of the statement may be being offered for their truth. That M noticed a problem and cleared out the fuel lines, and that M asked whether they should conduct a full systems check. This would be offered to show that there was actually a problem detected in the aircraft.

Alternatively however, Pete (P) could argue that he is offering this evidence not for its truth, but only for the purpose of showing the effect on the hearer (S). As such, P is only showing that S had notice of a potential problem and failed to take corrective action. If the evidence were offered only for this purpose, it is admissible and not hearsay.

Assuming that P wants to offer the evidence for its truth (that there actually was a problem detected:

a) First part of statement regarding fuel reading and clearing the gunk from the line

Because the first part of the statement is hearsay, it will be inadmissible unless a hearsay exception applies, or the federal rules deem the statement Non-hearsay under an exemption.

Hearsay within Hearsay - when there are multiple levels of hearsay - each independent level of hearsay must be satisfied either by an exception or exemption.

1st Layer - The reading on the fuel gauge. ABC might try to argue that this is an independent level of hearsay, and is an out of court statement being offered for the truth of the matter asserted. This argument would be unavailing however, since gauges which simply provide readout of data (which is not entered by a human) are not considered statements under the traditional hearsay definition. As such the first layer with regard to the fuel indicator would be deemed non-hearsay and would be admissible.

2nd layer - The statement itself

A statement that is made by a party opponent is admissible against that party when introduced by an opposing party. Further, within this exception, an employee's statement related to a matter of employment, while within the scope of employment are exempt from the hearsay definition under this exemption. Similarly, the statements by spokespersons or agents for an individual can be admitted under this exemption. In sum, under the FRE, statements under this exemption are deemed non-hearsay and can be offered for the truth of the matter asserted.

Here the statement made by Mac is was made while he was employed with ABC and related directly to matter of his employment - the mechanical evaluation of the plane before flight. As such it would be deemed non-hearsay and admissible.

Present sense impression - a statement made while contemporaneously perceiving and event and describing that event may be admissible under the present sense impression exception. Here, the statement involves M relaying what he just read and the actions he took on the line. If it was made right after the observations, which it appears to be, it would also be admissible under the present sense impression hearsay exception.

b) Second part of statement with the question regarding the systems check

Here as indicated above, M is actually asking a question, as to whether they should perform a systems check As such it would fall outside the hearsay definition regarding. A statement under the hearsay definition requires an assertion. As such a question cannot be considered hearsay, and would be properly admissible.

In sum, the evidence of Mac's question is properly admissible both for its truth and for the effect on the hearer to show negligence.

2) Wayne's Testimony about Sal's answer

Logical Relevance; in order to be logically relevant, the evidence must make a fact that is of consequence in determination of the action more or less probable than without the evidence.
Here the evidence is clearly logically relevant, it shows that S believed that the gunk wouldn't cause any problems, and more importantly did not take any corrective action upon hearing the findings of Mac.

Legal Relevance - relevant evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, waste of time, or confusion of the issues. Here, there does not seem to be any danger of unfair prejudice, and thus is legally relevant.

Hearsay - an out of court statement offered for the truth of the matter asserted.
Here the statement is made out of court and is likely being offered for the truth of the matter asserted, namely that as the supervisor, S took no corrective action with regard to the plane.

Because it is hearsay it will be inadmissible unless an exception applies.

Non-hearsay, as statement by part opponent (an employee). As defined above, the statement by S will be deemed a statement of party opponent (ABC) since it related to a matter of employment (inspecting the aircraft) and was made while S was employed with ABC. As such, it will be deemed non-hearsay and is properly admitted.

3) ABC inquiry to Wayne about college

Logical Relevance; in order to be logically relevant, the evidence must make a fact that is of consequence in determination of the action more or less probable than without the evidence. Here the evidence is relevant because it tends to impeach the credibility of Mac a testifying witness. As such it logically relevant because it may make the jury not believe his testimony, and impact the outcome of the proceeding.

Legal Relevance - relevant evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, waste of time, or confusion of the issues. Here, the jury may give unfair weight to the evidence, and discredit Wayne's (W)'s testimony. However, it is unlikely a court would find this unfair prejudice, and it probative value is high, since it tends to demonstrate W has been untruthful in the past. As such it would be legally relevant.

Impeachment - prior instances of uncharged conduct - probative of truthfulness - on cross-examination a party is permitted to inquire in specific instances of uncharged prior bad acts if they are probative of truthfulness. It bears noting however, that counsel is bound by the witnesses answer and may not provide extrinsic evidence to prove up the prior bad act.

Here, ABC's counsel is asking W about a specific instance of uncharged conduct - the lying in the course of a job application. Because the lying on a job application with regard to whether W went to college links directly on W's truthfulness as a witness, it is properly admitted. Additionally, since ABC's counsel did not try to introduce extrinsic evidence of the bad act, its form of introduction into evidence was also proper.

4) Excerpt from the maintenance record

Logical Relevance; in order to be logically relevant, the evidence must make a fact that is of consequence in determination of the action more or less probable than without the evidence. Here the evidence is relevant in that it demonstrates that the fuel lines were cleaned and the preflight checks were completed. As such it is relevant, to show that proper care was taken before flight, and less likely ABC was negligent in performing maintenance.

Legal Relevance - relevant evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, waste of time, or confusion of the issues. Here there are no issues with danger of unfair prejudice; the evidence is also legally relevant.

Hearsay - an out of court statement offered for the truth of the matter asserted. Here the maintenance records are made out of court; they are a statement and are being introduced for the truth of the matter asserted. Specifically, that the maintenance was in fact performed. As such they will be inadmissible unless a hearsay exception or exemption applies.

- Hearsay within hearsay: here there are two levels of hearsay. The first is Mac's entries and the second is the business record itself, each must independently satisfy the hearsay exception.

Statement by Party Opponent

Here the entries by Mac would fall not fall under the statement of party opponent exception because they are being offered by ABC and not P. As such an alternate exception must be used.

Business Record Exception - a report that is created within the regular course of business, is recorded contemporaneously or near after the action of the business, and has indications of reliability can be offered under the business record exception. The business records will be inadmissible if they contain entries by a person who is not under a business duty to report, or are completed with anticipation of litigation.

Here, the custodian of records is proffering the business records. The custodian testified how the records were prepared and their method of preparation. Assuming there were no indicators of untrustworthiness the records are properly admitted. It bears mentioning that the custodian can properly authenticate the signature if he was familiar with the handwriting of Sal. Additionally, the hearsay within hearsay problem is alleviated because the business record exception covers all employees who are creating and contributing to the record who fall under the business duty. As such, M's statements would be properly admitted within the business record.

Answer B

1. Ok to Admit Wayne's testimony about Mac's question to Sal

Relevance = The testimony is logically and legally relevant.

For an evidence to be admissible, it must be relevant. To be relevant, the evidence has to have any tendency to make any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more or less probable than without the evidence. Here, Wayne's testimony is most likely logically relevant because Mac's question ("Shouldn't we do a complete systems check of the fuel line and fuel valves?") shows that Mac and Sal, both ABC employees, was on notice that Mac thought they should do a complete systems check of the fuel line and fuel valves. Because Mac has stated that he just cleared some gunk from the line, he probably though more gunk would exist in other parts of the fuel line and valves. If ABC employees thought this way, then this could be relevant to prove that ABC knew that plane had some fuel line blockage problem before operating.

Even if the evidence is relevant, court may not admit the evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by unfair prejudice, waste of time, or confusion. Here, ABC would argue that this was only a question by Mac, and it does not indicate whether Mac actually thought there would be Gunk in other parts in the fuel line and valves. ABC would further argue that this question would confuse the jury (if this is a jury trial) to think that the employees actually thought there would be gunk in other places in the fuel lines and valves. However, Wayne's testimony is relevant, and is not substantially outweighed by any unfair prejudice. Although it would prejudice ABC, it is not unfair since opposing party's evidence would most likely be prejudicial to the other party due to nature of the adversarial setting of the trial.

Hearsay = The testimony is either not hearsay or falls under an exception

Hearsay is an out of court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Statement can be a conduct or question as long as it is intended by the declarant to communicate something. Here, Mac's question was made outside of the court. Pete would argue that Mac's question is not hearsay because it is a question. However, this question appears to be communicating. Mac stated that he just cleared some gunk from the line, and asked Sal if they should do a complete systems check of the fuel line and valves. Because of his previous statement before the question, Mac's question seems to communicate to Sal that they should be doing some systems check to see if other gunk exists elsewhere. Thus, Pete's argument that this is not hearsay because it is a question will not be too good.

It is not hearsay if the purpose of introducing the statement is not to prove the truth of the matter asserted but to show effect on the listener. Here, this is double-edged sword for Pete. Pete can probably get this in if he argues that this question should be admitted to show the effect on Sal. However, he also wants this question admitted for the truth of the matter asserted to show that Mac most likely thought that gunk existed elsewhere in fuel lines and valves. Thus, Pete can use this argument, but probably is not a good one to make.

The most successful argument would be that this statement falls under a hearsay exemption of statement of party opponent. Statement of party opponent can be admissible even if it is an opinion statement. An employee's statement can be admitted against an employer if the statement was made during the employment and statement describes a matter within the scope of their employment. Here, Mac was employed as an ABC mechanic when he made his question. Also, his statement directly related to his scope of employment as a mechanic because he was talking about doing some system check on the plane. Thus, his question would be admissible as a hearsay exemption of statement against party opponent.

Pete can also use a hearsay exception of present sense impression. A statement describing a condition or event while the declarant is perceiving the condition or event or immediately thereafter is admissible under hearsay exception. Here, Mac stated that he just cleared some gunk from the line, and asking a follow up question to his work. Thus, Pete can argue that Pete was asking that question pursuant to his observation of his clearing of some gunk. ABC would argue that the question pertains to some future work that Mac is thinking about doing, so it does not relate to Mac's present sense impression of his past work completed. Even if ABC has a better argument here, this statement will pass the hearsay hurdle as a statement against party opponent.

Ok to Wayne's testimony about Sal's answer

Relevance = Sal's statement is logically and legally relevant
Here, Sal's statement is logically relevant because it can show negligence of ABC. Sal was notified by Mac that the plane had some gunks, but decided not to do system check because "a little stuff" (i.e., gunks) is normal for this fuel. Pete would argue that ABC knew about the gunks and decided not to clean or do any further systems check. Thus, it bolsters Pete's claim of negligent maintenance of the plane by Mac when he was on notice that the gunk was present in the fuel line. Thus, this is logically relevant.

Additionally, this statement is not substantially outweighed by any unfair prejudice. ABC may argue that little gunks in plane is normal, and this evidence may mislead the jury to think that having little gunk would cause problems.

Although this evidence is prejudicial, this is not unfair because jury can weigh the evidence after it is admitted.

Hearsay = this is not a hearsay statement and falls under a hearsay exception
Here, Sal's statement is a hearsay. His statement was made outside of the court; it was intended to communicate to Mac that little gunk is ok and that it would not cause problems; Pete is introducing this statement for the truth that Sal knew about there being some gunk and little gunk would not cause problems. Pete can argue that he is not offering this statement for the truth of the matter asserted but that Sal knew of some gunks and affirmatively decided not to conduct a system check even after being put on notice. In such a case, this statement would be admitted as non-hearsay.

Like Mac's question, Sal's statement would fall under statement against party opponent. Sal made this statement when he was employed by ABC and it was within the scope of his employment as an ABC supervisor. As a supervisor, he would ordinarily make decisions on whether to do a systems check of the fuel line and valves, and his statements regarding decision not to do such check and reasoning behind such decision would be constituted as statement within his scope of employment. Thus, Sal's statement would be not a hearsay statement.

Pete can also argue that Sal's statement is then-existing state of mind hearsay exception. A statement of past mental or physical condition or then existing statement of mind is admissible even if it is a hearsay statement. Here, Sal is telling Mac to not worry because little gunk will not cause any problems. This shows Sal's lack of worry at the time the statement was made with respect to little gunk in the fuel line system. Thus, Sal's statement would also fall under this hearsay exception.

3. Ok to permit ABC to ask Wayne about college

Relevance

This evidence of Wayne's lying on his job application is relevant because it goes to the credibility of the witness testifying in the court. Here, if Wayne is shown as a liar, it is relevant because then his other testimony cannot be fully trusted. Also, it is not outweighed by unfair prejudice. Jury can determine how much weight to give to a witness who has been impeached.

Leading Question ok here

Leading question is permitted on direct examination in certain circumstances, but is generally allowed in cross-examination. Here, Wayne is being cross-examined, so it is ok for ABC's counsel to use leading questions.

Character Evidence vs. Impeachment = Impeachment with prior misconduct related to lying Character evidence is almost never allowed in civil cases except for few exceptions. Character evidence is given to prove that the person has acted in conformity with his character. However, under right circumstances this is ok if the purpose is to impeach the witness. A witness can be impeached with his prior misconduct related to lying. This impeachment can only be done on cross-examination and cannot be done with an extrinsic evidence. Here, Wayne is on cross-examination, so it was ok for ABC to ask Wayne about his lying on his job application about graduating from college.

4. Ok to admit the excerpt from the maintenance record

Relevance

The maintenance record is relevant because it shows that preflight check was completed with all okays. The record also shows that fuel line strained and all valves were cleaned and verified by Mac. This shows proper maintenance on the part of ABC to counter Pete's negligent maintenance claim. Also, it is not substantially outweighed by any unfair prejudice.

Authentication proper

When non-testimonial evidence is being introduced, it must be authenticated (i.e., prove the evidence is what it purports to be). This can be done several ways. One way is for a custodian of the record to testify to the creation or how the record gets maintained. Here, the maintenance record has been properly authenticated by Chuck, ABC's custodian of records. He testified that all ABCs maintenance records are stored in his office and discussed about the function of the maintenance records and their method of preparation. Also, facts indicate Chuck properly authenticated Sal's signature next to the entry.

Best Evidence Rule

When a written document is introduced as an evidence, courts usually allow the original document or its duplicate (photocopy or another method to re-create the original) to be admissible to prove the content of the written document. However, handwritten copy is not admissible in lieu or an original or a duplicate. Although it is not clear whether the original maintenance record is being introduced, but it would be reasonable to assume that either an original or a duplicate is being introduced.

Hearsay

This maintenance record is hearsay. It is made outside of the court. It was a statement intended to communicate that preflight check was completed, fuel line was strained and all valves were cleaned. ABC is offering this written statement for the truth of matter asserted so that proper maintenance has been conducted. To be admitted, it must fall under a hearsay exception.

ABC would argue that it falls under a hearsay exception of business records. To be a business record exception, it must be (1) a statement of diagnosis, opinion, condition, event, (2) kept at a regularly conducted business activity, (3) made at or near the time matter observed, (4) by personnel who had personal knowledge or gotten the information from someone who had duty to report, and (5) it is regular practice for business to make such record. Here, the maintenance records had statement of plane's condition because the maintenance was completed and the fuel line was strained and all valves were cleaned and verified. Also, it was kept at a regularly conducted business activity because it would be safe to assume that such preflight maintenance records are kept. Although it doesn't say when the record was created, it is reasonable to assume that these records are maintained as Sal and Mac do maintenance checks. Also, Sal as a manager probably has duty to report the maintenance record. Chuck also testified that all ABC's maintenance records are kept in his office, so it would be safe to assume that it is regular practice for ABC to make and keep these types of records. In conclusion, the maintenance records probably fall under business records hearsay exception.

Q3 Business Associations / Professional Responsibility

Alice's and Bob's law firm, AB Law, is a limited liability partnership. The firm represents Sid, a computer manufacturer. Sid sued Renco, his chip supplier, for illegal price-fixing.

Renco's lawyer asked Alice for a brief extension of time to respond to Sid's interrogatories because he was going on a long-planned vacation. Sid told Alice not to grant the extension because Renco had gouged him on chip prices. She denied the request for an extension. Sid also told Alice that he'd had enough of Renco setting the case's pace, so he wasn't going to appear at his deposition scheduled by Renco for the next week, and that he'd pay his physician to write a note excusing him from appearing. Alice did nothing in response.

In the course of representing Sid, Alice learned that Sid planned a tender offer for the publicly-traded shares of chipmaker, Chipco. Alice bought 10,000 Chipco shares. By buying the 10,000 Chipco shares, she drove up the price that Sid had to pay by $1 million. When Alice sold the 10,000 Chipco shares, she realized a $200,000 profit.

1. What ethical violations, if any, has Alice committed regarding:

    a. The discovery extension? Discuss.

    b. The physician's note? Discuss.

    c. The Chipco tender offer? Discuss.

    Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

2. What claims, if any, does Sid have against Alice, AB Law, and Bob? Discuss.

Answer A

Governing Law: California is governed by the California Rules of Professional Responsibility as well as certain sections of the business code. The ABA has promulgated its Model Code of Professional Responsibility as well.

(1) What ethical violations, if any, has Alice committed regarding (1) the discovery extension, (2) the physicians' note, or (3) the Chipco tender offer?

Discovery Extension:

Duty of Fairness: An attorney has a duty of fairness to the opposing party to act in good faith. While an attorney has no duty to accept all requests made by opposing counsel if not required, and while an attorney has a competing duty to her client to act in the client's best interests and should advocate for her client's interests zealously, denial of a good faith request for a short extension may be considered a breach of A's duty of fairness to opposing counsel.

Here, Alice ("A") represents Sid ("S") in suing Renco ("R"). R's attorney has requested a brief extension to respond to interrogatories. The reason for R's request is to go on a long-planned vacation. Without a showing that R's counsel has continuously attempted to delay the litigation by asking for continuances and extensions, A's duty of fairness likely requires her to accept such brief extension. Her denial is based on her client's order that it not be granted for no other reason than "because R had gouged him on chip prices". Because if R's counsel requested an extension from the court based on good reason it might well be granted, it is improper for A to require such unnecessary resort to the court. A has likely violated her ethical duties of fairness.

Duty of Loyalty: An attorney has a duty of loyalty to always act in her clients' best interests and not to engage in conflicts of interest or compete with the client.

Here, A will likely argue that her duty of loyalty to S requires that A not fail to acquiesce to her client's requests. However, the duty of loyalty does not extend this far. An attorney must not advocate for her client to the point that it causes her to make other ethical violations.

Scope of Decision-Making: While the client has the right to state which claims he or she wishes to pursue and make major decisions regarding settlement or whether to plea, etc., it is within the attorney's scope of authority to determine the proper strategy for effectuating these goals.

A should not allow S to "order" her to deny the extension based on no substantive reason. This is within A's scope of authority to decide, and A should not acquiesce to a bad-faith denial of a good-faith request. If A and her client cannot agree on the scope of representation, withdrawal from the case may be appropriate to avoid A being pulled into improper conduct.

Physician's Note:

Duty of Candor/Honesty: An attorney must not make any false representations to the court or opposing counsel, and must not allow her client to make any false representations to the court.

Here, A has stated that he is going to bribe his doctor to get a note to excuse him from appearing at his deposition. This will constitute a fraud upon the court because it is not true that D is unavailable. Further, there is no valid reason for S to fail to appear at his deposition. An attorney can breach his or her ethical duties by failing to speak when she has a duty to counsel her client against illegal or fraudulent activity and advise him that he or she cannot be a part of such conduct. Here, when A failed to respond to S's statement, she impliedly acquiesced in his proposal. This is an ethical violation because it will cause A to participate in a fraud upon the court and will violate her duty of candor.

Withdrawal: An attorney must withdraw from a case when she learns of conduct that will constitute a crime or fraud that will necessarily involve the lawyer's services. If it will not involve the lawyer's services, the attorney may but does not need to withdraw.

Here, paying one's doctor to write a false note excusing him from appearing may constitute such improper behavior that reflects poorly upon the profession. Such conduct is clearly in bad faith and relates directly to the representation, directly involving A. Thus, A should have withdrawn from the representation had she not been able to dissuade S from failing to appear at his deposition for a fraudulent reason because she will necessarily be involved.

Duty of Confidentiality: An attorney has a duty of confidentiality not to disclose any information related to the representation of the client. However, there is an exception to this rule which allows disclosure if the attorney learns that the client plans to commit a crime or fraud. Further, California imposes a duty on an attorney who has learned that his client plans to commit a crime or fraud to attempt to dissuade the client from his proposed actions and further, if that fails, to tell the attorney that the attorney plans to disclose the information to the appropriate authorities.

Here, it is unclear the length S plans to go to in order to get him a "note". However, this likely does not constitute an actual crime or fraud, so A likely has no right to breach her duty of confidentiality to her client. Since she has not, she has not violated this rule.

Duty to Diligently Pursue Completion of the Case: An attorney has a duty to diligently pursue a case to completion without allowing it to languish in the court system.

Here, by impliedly acquiescing in S's statement that he plans to fail to appear at his deposition, this will require a further scheduling out of a deposition at a time convenient for the parties and court reporter. This is a bad faith delay of the case that constitutes breach of A's ethical duties.

Chipco Tender Offer:

Duty of Loyalty: As stated above, an attorney has a duty of loyalty to her client to always act in the best interests of the client. This includes not acquiring an interest adverse to the interest of the client. California allows an attorney to obtain an interest adverse to that of her client in certain circumstances.

Here, when A learned of S's plan to make a tender offer for the publicly traded shares of Chipco, she immediately purchased Chipco shares and then sold them for a $200,000 profit. A's acquisition of these funds constitutes a breach of A's duty not to obtain an interest adverse to her client's, because the price S had to pay on the shares was raised by one million dollars. A has caused serious financial injury to S by acquiring an adverse interest and essentially taken a profit that should have gone to S. In doing so, A has breached her ethical duties.

Conflict of Interest: An attorney has a concurrent conflict of interest when there is a substantial likelihood that her ability to represent her client will be materially limited by her own personal interests, her duties to another client, a former client, or a third party. An attorney may take on the representation despite the concurrent conflict of interest if the attorney can believes that she can competently and adequately represent the interests of the parties, and if she obtains written consent from all involved parties. California has no "reasonable lawyer" standard and does not require written consent, only written notice, when the interest is personal to the lawyer.

Here, in gaining a personal interest in Chipco, A may have created a conflict that will materially limit her representation of S. However, A may argue that this is a deal on the side and is unrelated to the subject of the litigation in which she represents S; and further, A may argue that ownership of the shares has no bearing on her representation of S. If the court determines that she has acquired a conflict of interest, A has breached her duty by failing to get written consent. In California, she has further breached her duty by failing to give written notice to S.

Duty of Confidentiality: See above. In using confidential information S provided to her in telling her about the tender offer for her own benefit, A may have breached her duty.

(2) What claims, if any, does S have against A, AB Law, and B?

Limited Liability Partnership: A limited liability partnership is a special type of partnership that affords limited liability to all its partners, created by filing a Statement of Qualification with the Secretary of State. In a limited liability partnership, the individual partners are not personally liable for any damages sustained by the partnership itself.

A: See above.

A will be personally liable for her own torts.

B: See above.

Because B is a partner in an LLP, he has limited liability. Thus, S will have no claim against Bob ("B") A's partner.

AB Law:

Authority: A partnership is liable for its partner's actions if the partners have authority to act for the partnership. Authority may be actual (express or implied), apparent, or ratified. Actual authority exists where a reasonable person in the agent's position would believe he had the right to act on behalf of the business. This may be express, through an agreement, or implied, through actions or conduct. Apparent authority exists where a reasonable person in the shoes of the third party believed that the person had authority to act. Ratification occurs where no authority exists but the business has adopted the contract through action such as accepting its benefits. A partner in a partnership has both apparent and implied authority to act on behalf of the partnership.

Here, as a partner of AB law, A has actual authority to act on behalf of the partnership. Her acts taken in the scope of her law practice will thus subject the partnership to liability. Thus, A will both be personally liable for her own torts, and S will further be able to collect against AB Law for her actions.

Unjust Enrichment:

Here, S will sue A personally and AB Law for likely malpractice for losses caused by her breaches of her duties. Her misconduct has led to a loss by S of 1 million dollars, and has resulted in a gain to A of $200,000. In equity, a court may under unjust enrichment theory disgorge profits made by someone and impose a constructive trust. A constructive trust is not truly a trust but is an equitable remedy imposed by the court which forces the wrongdoer to hold unjustly realized profits in trust for the benefit of the rightful owner. Because she has been unjustly enriched by action taken in breach if her duties to S, the court will likely impose a constructive trust on the profit realized by A and will thus force A as trustee of these funds to distribute them to their proper owner, S.

Intentional Interference with a Business Expectancy: Intentional interference with business expectancy occurs where a person knows of a business expectancy of another party and knowingly interferes with that expectancy, resulting in damages. Here, S had planned a tender offer with C. Her actions in purchasing Chipco shares may constitute an interference with this expectancy with S, although A will argue that this expectancy is not yet an enforceable contract and that she has a valid defense of fair competition. This will be balanced by the court.

Answer B

Discovery Extension

Scope of Representation

A client usually determines the ends (goals) of a representation, whereas the lawyer generally determines the means (legal strategies). If a client is insisting upon actions that the lawyer does not wish to take, the lawyer may limit the scope of employment through informed written consent by the client. Here, it appears that Alice let Sid influence her legal decision-making by telling her to deny the request for an extension to respond to Sid's interrogatories. This type of decision should normally be decided by the lawyer because it falls into legal strategy. Although it is permissible for the lawyer to seek the client's input, the final decision should ultimately be left up to the lawyer. Alice let Sid control the litigation means.

Fairness to Opposing Counsel/Adverse Parties

A lawyer should treat opposing counsel and adverse parties fairly during the representation. A lawyer should not engage in certain actions if it is known to be for the purpose of harassing or making a task unduly burdensome for opposing counsel/adverse party. Here, Sid told Alice to reject the request to extend the time for answering the interrogatories. Renco's lawyer asked for a reasonable "brief extension" to respond since he was going on a long-planned vacation. This seems to be a reasonable request and is not an attempt by Renco's attorney to delay for an improper purpose. Sid's reasons for wanting to deny the extension, however, would be considered improper. He denied the request because Renco had "gouged hi on chip prices," so he was acting out of spite. He told this directly to Alice, so she knew his improper motives. She should have counseled him to allow the extension since it was a reasonable request and made clear that Sid's motives were improper. Because she did not do this, Alice violated her duty of fairness to Renco and its lawyer by furthering her client's improper purpose.

That being said, a lawyer does owe a duty to her client to diligently dispose of the case (work productively and not delay unnecessarily). If for some reason the extension requested was unreasonable, or it had been one of many requests for extensions, then perhaps Alice would be justified in denying the request. She has a duty to her client to make sure that his case is handled efficiently and effectively. The facts do not suggest this was the case, but if it was, then again it is possible she may not be in violation of an ethical duty.

Physician's Note

Duty of Candor

A lawyer owes a duty of candor to opposing counsel, adverse parties, and the court. A lawyer must not submit evidence that she knows to be false or make a false statement of fact or law that she knows to be untrue. If she makes such a statement without knowing it is false and later learns of its true nature, the lawyer has a duty to correct the evidence or testimony.

Sid told Alice he was not going to appear at his deposition for Renco the next week because he'd had enough of Renco setting the case's pace. He also told Alice that he was going to pay his physician to write a note excusing him from appearing at the deposition. Alice did nothing in response. Alice knows that Sid is not sick and that he just does not want to attend the deposition. He is going to get a fake doctor's note written to excuse him, so this would be false "evidence" or a false statement of fact being presented to the opposing side. Alice has a duty not to allow such false information to be presented to the other side. That being said, there is a conflict with her duty of confidentiality to Sid not to disclose his statements to her since they were made during and related to the representation.

A lawyer owes a duty of confidentiality to her client for anything related to the representation, even if not made by the client. Under the ABA, a lawyer may reveal confidences if the client persists in engaging in criminal or fraudulent conduct that will result in death or serious bodily harm, or if the lawyer's services are being used to perpetuate a crime or fraud by client that will result in serious financial harm. California does not have an exception for financial losses. Neither of these exceptions appears to be present. Sid's actions will not cause harm to anyone to the extent of death or serious bodily harm. It may pose a financial burden on Renco because they have to pay the lawyer for time that was spent preparing and now it will be postponed, but the amount spent is not likely to satisfy the requirement of financial harm under the ABA. Therefore, since no exception applies, Alice cannot reveal Sid's confidences.

So Alice cannot reveal the confidences but she must not present false evidence. What she should have done is counseled Sid by trying to get him to show up for the deposition and not pay a doctor to make a false note. If that did not work, then she should have withdrawn from the representation since he was persisting in engaging in fraudulent conduct. If the withdrawal would be harmful to Sid, a court might not let her withdraw and it may request why she is choosing to withdraw. If that is the case, then Alice may reveal Sid's confidences regarding the letter. Because Alice did not take these steps and said nothing when Sid mentioned a fake doctor's note, she breached her duty of candor to Renco and its lawyer.

Duty of Fairness

Again, as mentioned earlier, Sid has improper motives for wanting to submit the doctor's note and not attend the deposition. He wants to regain control of the pace of the litigation and is acting out of spite toward Renco for the price he was charged for the chips. Alice should know based on the comments Sid has made to her that he only wants to delay the case for improper purposes. Because she is aware of this, Alice is violating her duty of fairness to opposing counsel and adverse party.

Chipco Tender Offer

Duty of Loyalty

A lawyer owes a duty of loyalty to her client. If the interests of another client, the lawyer, or a third party materially limit the lawyer's ability to effectively represent the client, then she has a conflict of interest. The lawyer must act in the best interest of the client. Tied with the duty of confidentiality mentioned below, a lawyer also cannot use information learned during the course of the representation to the disadvantage of her client.

Alice used the information she learned from Sid during the representation that Sid was going to make a tender offer to her advantage by purchasing shares of the stock and driving up the price. Alice benefitted by realizing a $200,000 profit while Sid had to pay $1 million more than he would have before she purchased the shares. Alice was looking out for her interests first and negatively impacted her client's interests in the process. Because she subordinated her client's interests to her own, Alice violated the duty of loyalty she owed to Sid.

Duty of Confidentiality

A lawyer owes a duty of confidentiality to her client. She must not reveal any information related to the representation that she learns, and she must not use that information to the disadvantage of her client.

Here, Alice learned while representing Sid that Sid planned to tender offer for the publicly-traded shares of Chipco. She used this information to Sid's disadvantage by purchasing 10,000 Chipco shares, which drove up the price that Sid had to pay. Although this purchase is unrelated to the representation, it involved information learned during the representation. The duty of confidentiality is broad and covers any information related to the representation. Alice may try to argue that this information is unrelated to Sid's illegal price-fixing claim against Renco, but it would likely be found to be covered by the duty of confidentiality. Price-fixing involves the market of that particular industry, and if Sid intends to make a tender offer for a competitor chipmaking company, it would affect the same market involved in the litigation that she is representing Sid for against Renco. Therefore, a court would find that the information is attenuated but still within the realm of the confidences covered by the duty of confidentiality. Since Alice used the information against Sid to his disadvantage, she violated her duty of confidentiality.

Sid v. Alice, AB Law, and Bob

AB Law is a limited liability partnership (LLP). A limited liability partnership operates almost exactly the same as a general partnership except the partners in an LLP are not personally liable for the debts of the partnership like they are in a general partnership. Therefore, the partnership is liable for the negligent acts (but not intentional torts) of its partners but the other partners are not personally liable for different partner's negligent acts or debts of the partnership. A partner always remains liable for her own actions.

Alice

Alice obviously violated several of her ethical duties. The breach of the duty of loyalty that she committed against Sid by purchasing Chipco stock caused actual pecuniary harm to her client. This was an intentional act on Alice's part. Under her breach of the duty of loyalty, since she financially benefitted from her actions, realizing a $200,000 profit from buying and selling her shares of stock, she would be liable to Sid for profits realized as a result of her breach of the duty of loyalty. Therefore, Alice is personally liable for $200,000. She may also be liable for the harm caused to Sid by the breach. Sid had to pay $1 million more than he otherwise would have if Alice had not purchased the shares. But for Alice's purchase of the stock, Sid would not have had to pay $1 million more for the tender offer. It was also foreseeable to Alice that if she purchased the shares, it would drive the price of the stock up for Sid's tender offer. Therefore, she is also liable as the actual and proximate cause of Sid's loss due to her breach. Alice is personally liable for $1,200,000 to Sid.

As for a specific claim, Sid may be able to claim misappropriate. Alice was in a relationship of trust and confidence with him as a fiduciary. Sid had nonpublic information that most people would find material, meaning it was affect whether someone would purchase a stock or not. Sid did not tell this information to Alice for an improper purpose and surely did not anticipate she would use the information to purchase stock. Therefore, Sid would not be a tipper and Alice cannot be a tippee. But she can be a misappropriator since she was in this fiduciary relationship with the source of the non-public material information and she purchased stock in reliance on that information. Therefore, she is liable to Sid for the same amount of damages mentioned above because they were profits that would need to be disgorged and harm caused from her misappropriation.

Bob

Because these actions were taken by Alice, even if the partnership is liable, Bob cannot be personally liable for the harm caused by Alice. It is a limited liability partnership, so partners are not personally liable for the debts of the partnership or torts of other partners. Therefore, Sid does not have any claims against Bob.

AB Law

A partner is an agent of the partnership and thus can bind the partnership to certain obligations. The partnership is also liable for the negligence or non-intentional torts committed by partners while in the scope of employment for the partnership.

Here, Alice was working as Sid's lawyer when she learned the information that she misappropriated from him. Her actions, however, would likely be considered beyond the scope of her employment as a partner. She took the information and used it for personal reasons. If she had, for example, not filed an important document on time resulting in a dismissal with prejudice, then Sid could sue for malpractice and the LLP would be liable because the claim arose from her duties as a lawyer. This harm caused to Sid was not because of Alice's actions as an attorney for Sid. Therefore, a court would likely find that the LLP is not liable for Alice's actions and Sid has no claim against AB Law. If the court did find her actions were within the scope of her duties as a partner, then AB Law would also be liable for the losses Sid incurred.

Q4 Criminal Law and Procedure

One summer afternoon, Officer Prowl saw Dan, wearing a fully buttoned-up heavy winter coat, running down the street. Officer Prowl ordered Dan to stop. Dan complied. As Officer Prowl began to pat down Dan's outer clothing, a car radio fell out from underneath. Officer Prowl arrested Dan and took him to the police station.

At the police station, Officer Query met with Dan and began asking him questions about the radio. Dan stated that he did not want to talk. Officer Query responded that, if Dan chose to remain silent, he could not tell the District Attorney that Dan was cooperative. Dan immediately confessed that he stole the radio.

Dan was charged with larceny. He retained Calvin as his attorney. He told Calvin that he was going to testify falsely at trial that the radio had been given to him as a gift. Calvin informed Dan that he would make sure he never testified.

Calvin filed motions for the following orders: (1) suppressing the radio as evidence; (2) suppressing Dan's confession to Officer Query under Miranda for any use at trial; and (3) prohibiting Dan from testifying at trial.

At a hearing on the motions a week before trial, Dan, in response to Calvin's motion for an order prohibiting him from testifying, stated: "I want to represent myself."

1. How should the court rule on each of Calvin's motions? Discuss.

2. How should the court rule on Dan's request to represent himself? Discuss.

Answer A

1. Ruling on Calvin's Motions

Motion to Suppress the Radio as Evidence

Fourth Amendment Protections

The Fourth Amendment, incorporated to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment, protects individuals against unreasonable searches and seizures of their person, home, and personal effects. A seizure occurs when an individual's freedom of movement is limited by an officer such that the person would not feel free to leave the officer's presence. A search occurs when an officer gathers information in which the individual has a reasonable expectation of privacy, such as a physical search of the person's body, a search of the person's home, or eavesdropping on private conversations through wiretapping. However, if the officer is in a location in which he is entitled to be, he may observe the person's conduct or identify contraband that is within plain view, since people do not have a reasonable expectation of privacy for things they disclose to the public, such as speaking on a public street. The general standard for reasonableness to affect a search or seizure is probable cause, although lesser standards apply in certain circumstances, as discussed below. The Fourth Amendment generally requires that police officers obtain a search warrant before searching a person and an arrest warrant before an arrest to ensure that the probable cause standard is met.

Terry Stop

Under the Supreme Court decision in Terry, an officer may stop and search an individual based on less than probable cause. A "Terry stop" is a reasonable search under the Fourth Amendment when two conditions are satisfied. First, the officer must have reasonable suspicion, based on specific and articulable facts, that the individual is engaged in criminal activity in order to stop the person. The officer may then question the individual. In order to search the person, the officer must have reasonable suspicion, based on specific and articulable facts, that the person is armed. This is reasonable because if the person is armed, the officer is in possible danger.

Seizure

A seizure occurs when an officer restricts the freedom of movement of a suspect such that the individual would not be free to leave the officer's presence. The court will take into account all of the circumstances, including the officer's language and tone and the setting in which the confrontation took place. However, merely being in a physically confined area (such as a bus) will not make the officer's interaction with a person into a seizure. If the officer orders the individual to stop, the seizure does not occur until the person complies with the officer's instructions and his movement is actually restrained.

Here, Officer Prowl ordered Dan to stop while he was running down the street. He did not approach Dan and ask him to voluntarily speak with him. Rather, ordering "stop" would be interpreted by a reasonable person to be a use of police authority to restrain Dan's movement such that Dan could be subject to penalty if he refused. Dan complied with Prowl's order and actually stopped. Thus, a seizure occurred.

Reasonable Suspicion to Stop

The seizure of Dan will be reasonable under the Fourth Amendment, per Terry, if Prowl had reasonable suspicion to stop Dan. In order to satisfy the Fourth Amendment, Officer Prowl must have reasonable suspicion that Dan is engaged in criminal activity. This must be more than a mere hunch or an anonymous tip that the officer has no reason to trust. The officer must be able to identify specific facts that demonstrate objectively the reasonable suspicion to stop the person.

Here, Dan was running down the street wearing a fully buttoned-up heavy winter coat on a summer afternoon. It is objectively unusual to see someone wearing such a coat during the summer, and Prowl's experience would likely indicate to him that people use such coats to conceal contraband, such as stolen property or drugs. Further, Dan was running. Because of the coat, it would seem unlikely that Dan was running for exercise, since he would be overly hot during the summer.

Because these facts, taken together, indicate that Dan was acting objectively suspiciously, Prowl had reasonable suspicion to stop Dan.

Search

A search occurs when an officer infringes upon an individual's reasonable expectation of privacy. The individual's person is always an area in which the person has a reasonable expectation of privacy unless that expectation has been reduced for some reason, such as in prisoners and parolees. We do not have any indication that Dan was a parolee or on probation. Thus, when Officer Prowl patted Dan down, a search occurred.

Reasonable Suspicion to Perform Pat-Down

Under Terry, Prowl's search of Dan will be reasonable if he had reasonable articulable suspicion that Dan was armed. Although Dan's activity was objectively suspicious, he did not do anything and we have no indication that Prowl had prior knowledge that would make it objectively likely that Dan was actually armed. Prowl did not even speak with Dan after ordering him to stop, but immediately began a pat-down. Prowl would argue that Dan's bulky coat could easily have concealed a weapon, and Prowl's search was thus for self-protection. However, a physical search based on no independent facts suggesting that the person is armed is only reasonable following an arrest. Here, Dan was not arrested when Prowl performed the search.

Prowl's search of Dan was not based on reasonable articulable suspicion and was therefore a violation of Dan's Fourth Amendment rights.

Exclusion of Evidence

Evidence seized in violation of an individual's Fourth Amendment rights will generally be excluded in any subsequent criminal prosecution of that individual. The exclusionary rule operates as a deterrence mechanism to discourage police officers from committing constitutional violations. Although there are some circumstances in which the Supreme Court has concluded that the deterrent effect of the exclusionary rule is too inadequate to justify exclusion (such as knock-and-announce violations), the exclusionary rule operates in the Terry stop circumstances. Any contraband that was discovered as a result of an illegal search subject to the exclusionary rule will be excluded from evidence.

Here, Prowl violated Dan's Fourth Amendment rights when he unreasonably searched Dan. Therefore, the court should order that the radio be suppressed.

Motion to Suppress Dan's Confession

Fourth Amendment

First, Dan would argue that the Fourth Amendment violation directly led to his confession, and thus the confession should be excluded under the "fruit of the poisonous tree" doctrine discussed above. However, the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule operates to exclude physical evidence rather than statements. Thus, Dan's confession would not be excluded by the Fourth Amendment.

Fifth Amendment Protections

The Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination protects suspects from being compelled to make statements against their own penal interests. The Supreme Court in Miranda interpreted this protection to require the police to effect certain warnings to individuals who are subject to custodial interrogation at the hands of police to offset the inherently compelling pressures of police interrogation.

Miranda Warnings

Police officers must give each suspect warnings about his rights once he is subject to custodial interrogation. The warnings must inform the suspect of his right to remain silent, his right to an attorney, and that the attorney will be provided for him if he cannot afford to pay.

Custodial

The "custodial" element is satisfied if the person is subject to police custody at the time of questioning. Once the individual is arrested, he is generally understood to be in police custody. Even before an arrest, the suspect may be subject to custody if he is being restrained in a formal setting, such as a police station, and is not told that he is free to leave at any time. The suspect need not have been indicted or charged for the custody element to be satisfied.

Here, Dan had been arrested and taken to the police station, where Query began questioning him. Because Dan was in a formal setting and had actually been arrested, the custodial element is satisfied.

Interrogation

The "interrogation" element requires that the police actually be asking the defendant questions that would be reasonably likely to lead to an incriminating response. A question such as whether the suspect would like a drink of water or whether he was comfortable would not constitute interrogation.

Here, once Dan was in custody, Query began asking him questions specifically about the radio. Thus, Dan was being interrogated.

Because both elements of Miranda are satisfied here, Query violated Dan's Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination by failing to read him Miranda warnings.

Dan's Statement That He Did Not Want to Talk

Once an officer has read the suspect his Miranda rights, any express invocation of those rights must be strictly honored by the officers, who must then stop interrogating the suspect.

Here, Query should have read Dan his rights. Dan's explicit statement that he "did not want to talk" likely qualifies as an invocation of his right to remain silent. Because Query continued to interrogate Dan following Dan's express invocation of his right to remain silent, Query violated Dan's Fifth Amendment rights.

Exclusion of Statement under Fifth Amendment

The remedy for a Fifth Amendment violation is an exclusion of the improperly obtained confession. However, generally speaking, any physical fruits of the confession, such as evidence seized in reliance on statements made in the confession (such as the location of contraband) are not excluded. Further, the statement may still be used to impeach the suspect if he were to testify in the criminal case.

Here, Dan confessed that he stole the radio. Because Dan's Fifth Amendment rights were violated, the statement should be excluded from the prosecution's case-in-chief, although it may still be used to impeach Dan.

Voluntariness

The Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments of the Constitution also protect individuals against compulsory statements. A statement is compulsory if it was made involuntarily. An involuntary statement could be made as a result of legal compulsion (such as a subpoena to testify before a grand jury) or by improper police tactics, such as physical violence, threats, or promises that the suspect will not be prosecuted if he confesses. Although Calvin did not move to suppress the statement on voluntariness grounds, Dan would be wise to do so, since exclusion on voluntariness grounds would prevent the statement from being used against Dan on cross-examination.

Here, Query told Dan that he "could not tell the District Attorney that Dan was cooperative" if he refused to speak. Although this statement does not explicitly promise Dan that he would not be prosecuted based on the statement, Dan would argue that Query suggested that he could guarantee different penal consequences based on whether Dan confessed. Query would say that he merely suggested a statement he could make to the prosecution, not that the prosecution would react in any specific way.

Because Query did not make any actual promise that Dan's penal outcome would be different, the statement was likely voluntarily made.

Exclusion of Statement for Voluntariness

If Dan's statement were involuntarily made, the statement itself would be excluded for all purposes, including impeachment. Further, any physical fruits of the statement would be excluded as well. Thus, because Dan wants to testify at trial, he should still argue that the statement was involuntary, even if this argument is likely to fail.

Motion to Prohibit Dan from Testifying

Defendant's Right to Testify

Each defendant has a constitutional right to testify in his own trial. Although an attorney has a professional ethical obligation to counsel his client not to lie on the stand, the lawyer cannot prevent the client from doing so. Under the ABA authorities, the attorney must seek to withdraw from the representation if he knows that the client intends to perjure himself. The court could then grant leave to withdraw, but may also decide that efficiency and justice require continued representation.

Thus, the court should rule against Calvin's motion to prevent Dan from testifying. However, it would be proper under the ABA rules for Calvin to seek to withdraw from representing Dan.

2. Dan's Request to Represent Himself

Sixth Amendment Protections

The Sixth Amendment right to counsel protects a criminal defendant's right to be represented by an attorney in all critical stages of prosecutory action by the state. The Sixth Amendment right includes the right to counsel of choice or to decline the right of representation if the defendant is competent to refuse.

Right of Self-Representation

The Sixth Amendment includes a right of self-representation. The court must grant the right if the defendant is competent.

Competence to Stand Trial

The general rule is that if the defendant is competent to stand trial, he will be found competent to represent himself. To be competent to stand trial, the defendant must understand the nature of the proceedings against him and be aware of the consequences of the proceedings.

Here, we have no facts suggesting that Dan has a mental defect that would affect his competence. Thus, the competency to stand trial is satisfied.

Competence for Self-Representation

The Supreme Court has stated that competence for the purpose of self-representation does not require the defendant to be legally sophisticated or be able to do an objectively good job representing himself. Although the Court has recognized that most defendants would be better served by counsel than by self-representation, the Sixth Amendment guarantee requires the court to allow the defendant to represent himself, regardless of whether the court finds that his action is in his own best interest.

Thus, although Dan does not appear to have any particular legal knowledge or skills, such knowledge is not required to trigger the constitutional right to self-representation. Therefore, the court must allow Dan to represent himself.

Advisory Counsel

The court may require that the individual be assigned advisory counsel to assist him. The role of advisory counsel is to provide the defendant with legal advice and information, but advisory counsel is not allowed to make the strategic decisions that appointed or retained counsel may, such as choosing to call only certain witnesses (other than the defendant) or present certain evidence. The advisory counsel role serves as a layer of protection for a self-representing defendant in order to protect the integrity and efficiency of the judicial process.

Thus, although the court must allow Dan to represent himself, it could choose to appoint Calvin or another attorney as Dan's advisory counsel.

Answer B

1. HOW SHOULD THE COURT RULE ON EACH OF CALVIN'S MOTIONS

(1) Suppressing the Radio as Evidence

Exclusionary Rule

Where evidence is obtained unlawfully under the Fourth, Fifth, or Sixth Amendments, that evidence is generally inadmissible against the accused. In Mapp v. Ohio, the Supreme Court held that the exclusionary rule is incorporated against the states. Moreover, under the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine, all evidence obtained as a result of an invalid search or confession is also suppressed unless the government can prove (i) an independent basis; (ii) inevitable discovery; or (iii) an intervening act of free will.

Fourth Amendment Search and Seizure

The Fourth Amendment provides that a person be free from unreasonable searches and seizure of their persons, homes, papers, or effects. To that end, Dan (D) should be able to successfully argue that he was unlawfully seized and that the radio must be excluded as the fruit of an invalid seizure.

(1) State Action

The Fourth Amendment is only triggered by state action. Thus, a state or federal police officer or a private officer that has been deputized by the city or state must be the actor in order to render the Amendment applicable. Here, Officer Prowl (OP) appears to be a state police officer and hence the state action requirement is satisfied.

(2) Search / Seizure

A "seizure" occurs under the Fourth Amendment where the circumstances of the encounter are such that a reasonable person would not feel free to decline the encounter. A "search" under the Fourth Amendment only occurs where the D has a reasonable expectation of privacy in the area and thing searched, or where there is a government intrusion into a constitutionally protected area.

Seizure. Here, D was ordered to stop by OP. A police officer may ask a person if they are willing to talk, at which point the person is free to decline and is not seized. However, where an officer commands a person to stop, their authority as a police officer is such that a reasonable person does not feel free to decline the encounter. Thus, D was seized by OP when he was commanded to stop and he did, in fact, stop.

Search. Here, D does not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in his movement on the streets. OP is free to follow him as much as he wants. However, D does have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the things he keeps out of public view, hidden under his coat. Merely stepping out onto the street does not render everything in D's possession "public." In this case, OP also intruded upon a constitutionally protected area, i.e., D's person. By patting down the outer clothing that D was wearing, OP intruded on his person and searched him under the Fourth Amendment.

Thus, if there is not a valid basis under the Constitution for this search and seizure, the evidence was obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment and must be suppressed.

(3) Warrant Requirement

A search or seizure is generally unreasonable unless the police have a warrant, or an exception to the warrant requirement applies. A warrant must be founded on (i) probable cause; (ii) state with particularity the persons and places to be searched; and (i) be executed in a valid manner. Where a warrant that is otherwise invalid is relied upon in good faith by the arresting officers, the search or seizure will be upheld as long as the warrant was not: (i) so lacking in probable cause or particularity as to render reliance unreasonable; (ii) obtained by fraud on the magistrate; or (iii) the magistrate was impartial.

Here, there was no warrant to arrest or search D. Thus, the search and seizure are unconstitutional unless an exception to the warrant requirement applies.

(4) Warrant Exceptions

Terry Stop. An officer may engage in what is known as a temporary "investigative detention" under the Supreme Court's Terry framework, provided the officer has reasonable suspicion of criminality on the part of the D which is based on "articulable facts."

Here, the only facts that are given is that D was running down the street one summer afternoon wearing a fully buttoned, heavy winter coat. The fact that it was summer and D was wearing a fully buttoned up winter coat is certainly suspicious. Indeed, a reasonable person would almost have to assume that the purpose of wearing such a coat would be to hide evidence of contraband. If it is warm outside, as it usually is in the summer, a coat would be unnecessary. On the other hand, D may live somewhere like San Francisco where summers can be quite cold; D may have had a cold or some condition that makes him cold; or D may have been training for a sporting event such as wrestling where people force themselves to sweat more. The Court has held that headlong flight from an officer after seeing the officer is evidence sufficient to help support reasonable suspicion, but merely running has never been held to be reasonable suspicion absent additional facts.

Nevertheless, given that D was running down the street and wearing a coat that was fully buttoned during the winter, a court would likely find that the officer had reasonable suspicion--but certainty not probable cause--to detain D for a short period of time to investigate the potential criminality.

Terry Search. An officer that has reasonable suspicion of criminality based on articulable facts may also conduct a Terry search of the D, provided he has reasonable grounds for believing that the D is armed and dangerous. A Terry search must be limited to a pat-down of the outer clothing of the D, and must be limited to a search for weapons. In order to remove evidence that is not a weapon, the officer must have probable cause to believe the other evidence, e.g., drugs or a car stereo, is illegal.

Here, there is no real evidence that D is armed and dangerous. He was running wearing a coat, which--as discussed above--is sufficient to find reasonable suspicion that D just committed some type of theft offense and is trying to conceal the contraband in his coat. However, D will argue there is really no reason to believe that he was armed at this point. OP cannot simply claim he thinks D is armed because he seemed sketchy. On the other hand, OP might be able to convince a court that many theft offenses are committed with a weapon and hence that D could reasonably have been carrying a weapon. The fact that D was not actually carrying a weapon will not undermine this argument. While this is a close call, a court would likely permit OP to conduct a Terry search here.

The scope of the search seems permissible in this case, as OP merely patted down D's outer clothing. As he did so, a car radio fell out. The car radio is not a weapon, but may be admissible under the plain view doctrine, discussed below. In any event, the search and seizure itself was not unconstitutional.

Plain View. The Plain View doctrine applies where (i) the police have a right to be where they are viewing; and (ii) they see evidence and it is immediately apparent the evidence is contraband. Here, as discussed above, OP had the right to stop D under Terry, and hence he had a right to be where he was viewing the radio as it fell from D's coat. Moreover, it was immediately apparent to OP that the car radio was contraband. Indeed, D was running down the street, in a coat, in the summer, with a car radio hidden inside his coat. The radio was quite apparently stolen and hence admissible under the plain view doctrine.

Consent. While D has a constitutional right not to be searched or seized, the right is subject to waiver, i.e., the search or seizure is not unreasonable if D consents to the search or seizure. Consent must be knowing and voluntary. However, it is not required that one know they have the right to decline the encounter.

Here, D is not likely to be deemed to have consented to either the seizure or the search by OP. Indeed, as discussed above, he was seized. A defendant is not deemed to consent when seized. Moreover, with respect to consent to search, OP just started patting down D's outer clothing. Consenting to questioning is not within the scope of consenting to search. Thus, even if D were deemed to consent to questioning he would not be deemed to consent to the search. In any event, the search and seizure are valid under Terry.

Conclusion
The evidence of the radio is admissible given that the search and seizure were valid under a Terry stop and frisk and the radio fell out of D's coat and was in plain view.

(2) Suppressing Dan's Confession to Officer Query

The Fifth Amendment protects a person from being compelled to be a witness against his or her self. Due to the inherent risks of coercion in police custodial interrogations, the Supreme Court has held that a defendant must be given Miranda warnings before any confessions by the defendant are admissible against the defendant, unless used to impeach.

Miranda Warnings
Miranda is triggered where the D is: (i) in custody; and (ii) interrogated.

Custody. For purposes of Miranda, custody is defined as a place where a reasonable person would not feel free to leave. Moreover, custody is assessed by looking to whether the situation involves the same inherently coercive pressures as stationhouse questioning.

Here, D was arrested and taken to a police station where he was then met by Officer Query (OQ). D had no ability to leave, and no reasonable person would feel free to leave in this situation. Moreover, this is stationhouse questioning, so the inherent pressures that Miranda is meant to protect against are at their pinnacle here. Thus, D is in custody.

Interrogation. Interrogation is defined as any line of questioning that a reasonable officer would find likely to illicit an incriminating response. Here, OQ was asking D questions about the radio. This is clearly questioning that is likely to generate an incriminating response. Thus, D was interrogated.

As both elements of Miranda are met, D was required to receive Miranda warnings. OQ ought to have told him he had the right to remain silent; that anything he said could be used against him in court; that he had the right to an attorney; and that he had the right to have an attorney appointed if he could not afford one. Since D was not warned, his confession is inadmissible against him (unless it is used to impeach him).

Invoking Miranda

D was not warned, but in this case it even seems that he attempted to invoke his Miranda rights. To invoke the right to remain silent, the D must clearly and unequivocally indicate his intent to invoke. Here, D stated to OQ that he "did not want to talk." That may not use the word "remain silent" but no reasonable officer could think that "not want[ing] to talk" means anything other than remain silent. After having said that, OQ tried to coerce him into talking. This is not permitted. OQ must honor D's request and stop talking. By badgering him after he invoked, any later confession is in violation of Miranda. In this case, since D was not even Mirandized, his is irrelevant. However, even if D were Mirandized, the fact that OQ failed to honor his request to remain silent is a separate basis for excluding this statement.

Conclusion

The confession must be suppressed (except for purposes of impeachment). Thus, the court should grant the motion in part, subject to use for impeachment.

(3) Prohibiting Dan From Testifying At Trial

Constitutional Right to Testify in Defense

All defendants have a constitutional right to testify in their defense at a criminal trial. This right trumps any ethical obligation that Calvin (C) has to the court or the profession. Indeed, neither C nor the court can prohibit D from testifying in this situation.

[NOTE: The proper response by C would have been to inform D that he cannot testify falsely and persuade him to testify truthfully. If that failed, C should have tried to withdraw from the representation. If the court failed to allow him to do so, under the ABA C should have then informed the tribunal and allowed the tribunal to take the necessary steps. Under the California rules, no disclosure is permitted. Instead, C should have let D testify and questioned him up until the point he knew he was going to testify falsely, then, at that point, allow D to testify in the narrative and in no way rely upon D's narrative in closing. Under any ethical rule and the Constitution, the prohibition on D testifying is not permitted.]

Conclusion

The court should rule that D be permitted to testify, as a criminal defendant has a constitutional right to testify. The tribunal may take necessary steps to remedy the false testimony, such as requiring narrative testimony.

2. HOW SHOULD THE COURT RULE ON DAN'S MOTION TO REPRESENT HIMSELF

Faretta Motion

The right of a criminal defendant to be represented by counsel was held to require the right of self-representation in Faretta. Where a Faretta motion is timely made, and the court is satisfied that the defendant is competent enough to represent himself, the court is required to respect the dignity of the defendant and allow him to have the right to choose for himself and represent himself. A court may also appoint back-up counsel to assist (but not actually control) the representation, but that is not constitutionally required.

Competence. The Supreme Court recently held that a defendant may be competent to stand trial but nevertheless incompetent to represent himself.

In this case, we have very little information on whether D is capable of representing himself. It appears he was found competent to stand trial, or at least that no such hearing has been conducted to this point. Thus, given no facts indicating that D cannot represent himself, he would likely be deemed competent to stand trial. The judge would have to verify that D was able to understand the charges and the legal issues, but--again--there is nothing in the facts indicating D cannot handle this. The court would also look to the issues between D and C and use this as a further justification for allowing D to represent himself.

Timeliness. A court need not allow a defendant to represent himself if doing so would cause an undue delay in the case. The request must be timely.

Here, D made the request to represent himself after an attorney was appointed and various pretrial motions were made. Indeed, the motion came just a week before trial. To allow D to testify would likely require giving D extra time to prepare the case himself, which would mean that the trial would have to be pushed back. That would interfere with availability of witnesses and with the efficiency of the court and the ability for the prosecution to put on its case. D might also win sympathy from the fact C is not permitting him to put on his case. However, that is more of a reason to substitute counsel than to let D represent himself. In this situation, D would need to show he was immediately prepared to go to trial. Delay of any sort would be sufficient to permit the court to deny his Faretta motion.

Conclusion

Although D is likely competent to represent himself, but the court is likely to deny the motion as untimely, given that the trial date is set for only one week from the date of the motion and given that D would likely need a good amount of time to fully prepare himself for trial.

Q5 Trusts / Community Property

Henry and Wynn married in 2000. During the first ten years of their marriage, Henry and Wynn lived in a non-community property state. Henry worked on writing a novel. Wynn worked as a history professor. Wynn kept all her earnings in a separate account.

Eventually, Henry gave up on the novel, and he and Wynn moved to California. Wynn then set up an irrevocable trust with the $100,000 she had saved from her earnings during the marriage. She named Sis as trustee and Henry as co-trustee. She directed that one-half the trust income was to be paid to her for life, and that the other one-half was to be paid to Charity, to be spent only for disaster relief, and that, at her death, all remaining assets were to go to Charity.

Wynn invested all assets in XYZ stock, which paid substantial dividends, but decreased in value by 10%. Charity spent all the income it received from the trust for administrative expenses, not disaster relief.

Later, Sis sold all the XYZ stock and invested the proceeds in a new house, in which she lived rent-free. The house increased in value by 20%.

Henry has sued Sis for breach of trust, and has sued Charity for return of the income it spent on administrative costs.

1. What is the likely result of Henry's suit against Sis? Discuss.

2. What is the likely result of Henry's suit against Charity? Discuss.

3. What rights, if any, does Henry have in the trust assets? Discuss. Answer according to California law.

Answer A

1. Henry v. Sis

As discussed in #3, Henry does not currently have a personal interest in the trust assets. However, he is the co-trustee of the trust, and this may be sufficient to give him standing as trustee to bring an action against Sis for breach of her fiduciary duty as trustee.

Trust creation

To be valid, an express private trust must have a settlor, an ascertainable beneficiary, res, a valid purpose, and a trustee. However, the court will appoint a trustee if one is not provided for, or the elected trustee declines to serve. Here, Wynn is the settlor, and she has designated herself and Charity as lifetime beneficiaries, and Charity as the remainder beneficiary. Any natural person, entity or government can be a beneficiary of an express private trust. Both are ascertainable beneficiaries because they are either persons or entities expressly named in the trust instrument. The res can be any property or present interest. Here it is the $100,000 from Wynn's separate account. The trust appears to have two purposes: to provide lifetime income to Wynn; and to contribute to disaster relief via Charity. To be valid, a trust purpose must be able to be determined from the trust document, and must not be illegal. Neither of the purposes are illegal and are clear from the trust document. Wynn has designated Sis as trustee and Henry as co-trustee, and from the facts it does not appear that either declined to serve. They must be competent but there is no indication of incompetency in the facts.

Charitable trusts differ in that they must have a charitable purpose: something that contributes to societal good, such as abating hunger, education generally, religion, or the like. The beneficiaries of the trust must be indefinite, not a specific person. Here, because Wynn is a specific person, this could not be a charitable trust.

A valid express private trust was created.

Trustee powers

A trustee has the powers expressly granted in the trust document itself, and those implied in order to effect the purpose of the trust. Here, the trust instrument directed Sis to pay one-half of the income to Wynn, and the other half to Charity. This expressly gave her the power to make these distributions.

Trustee duties

A trustee has the duty of loyalty, to act for the benefit of the beneficiaries solely, and not in her own self-interest or that of third parties. This duty requires the trustee to be impartial as to multiple beneficiaries. Here, Sis has a duty to treat Wynn and Charity impartially. If this were a revocable trust, she would have a primary duty during Wynn's lifetime to Wynn as the settlor, but the trust is irrevocable.

As part of the duty of loyalty, a trustee has a duty not to self deal. Sis is living in the house owned by the trust, rent-free. Thus she is reaping personal benefit from her position as trustee. She has violated her duty of loyalty.

The trustee has a duty of care as well, which requires her to act as a prudent person would in handling their own affairs. This includes the duty to account regularly to the beneficiaries, and not commingle trust assets with her own.

As part of the duty of care, a trustee has a duty to invest the trust res as a reasonably prudent investor would. Under the traditional view, this limited the holdings of the trust to things such as blue chip stock, 1st trust deeds on real estate, government bonds and other conservative and safe investments. Each separate investment was considered separately in determining this. Modernly, the investments are looked at as a whole, and factors such as the need for income, tax consequences, and particular trust purposes are considered. Thus, the court will need to look at how Sis invested the trust res in light of whether the trust was intended more for lifetime income sources, or as a gift to Charity at Wynn's death, at how the income would affect taxes, at what was reasonable as an investment in light of what was available to invest, at what reasonable investors were doing at the time.

Wynn originally invested the trust assets in XYZ stock, which provided substantial dividend income but lost value overall. This would seem to indicate a preference for lifetime income over growth of the principal.

Henry will need to be able to show that a reasonably prudent investor would not have sold the XYZ stock and invested it in a house. The sale of the stock itself may have been prudent given the loss in value. However, a trustee also has a duty to diversify in order to reduce the risk of loss and enhance income/growth opportunity, as would a reasonable investor. While the duty to diversify may have called for Sis to sell some or all of the XYZ stock, that same duty would generally preclude sinking all of the proceeds into one property. The trust res is then subject to any decline in real estate in the market, and will not benefit from any gains in other potential investments. Sis has probably violated her duty of prudent investment, and has certainly violated her duty to diversify.

The duty to make the res productive requires that Sis put the assets to work for the benefit of the beneficiaries. When she lived in the house rent-free, she violated this duty. The rental income from the house is to be distributed to Wynn and Charity, not retained for her benefit.

Sis has a duty to effect the purpose of the trust, by ensuring that income is maximized, based on the express and apparent intent of the settlor. She has not done so by selling the income stock and buying a house that currently provides no income to the trust.

Because Henry is currently subject to these same duties as co-trustee, he is obligated to prevent the wrongdoing of the other trustee. Thus he has standing to bring an action against Sis for her violations of duty, as a trustee of the trust.

Remedies available

The remedies available against a trustee who has violated their duties includes removal, surcharge for lost income/profits, disgorgement of any benefit wrongfully taken by the trustee. This benefit does not run to Henry, who is acting solely for the trust beneficiaries' benefit.

Henry will seek an accounting for the rent that should have been paid by Sis while living in the house owned by the trust. These funds must be paid personally by Sis. Additionally, he will seek surcharge for the lost income from the XYZ stock or similar investment that would have maximized lifetime income. Sis will have to make up the shortfall in income from her own funds.

Finally, Henry will seek removal of Sis as trustee. The court may then allow Henry to act as sole trustee or may appoint someone else.

Given Sis's breach of duty, the apparent purpose of the trust, the court will allow all of these remedies.

2. Charitable trusts are enforced by the attorney general, rather than by private action. If Charity is a charitable trust, Henry will not have standing to bring an action.

Assuming Henry has standing as the co-trustee of Wynn's trust, he can seek a constructive trust by tracing the funds from the trust to Charity as used for admin purposes. This will mean that Charity's sole duty as trustee of the constructive trust is to use the funds as directed.

3. California is a community property (CP) state. All property acquired during marriage while domiciled in CA or another CP state is presumed to be CP. All property acquired prior to marriage, or after separation, is presumed to be separate property. Additionally, all property acquired at any time by gift, descent, devise or bequest is presumed to be CP.

All property acquired during marriage while domiciled in a non-CP state that would be CP if domiciled in CA, is presumed to be quasi-CP (QCP). At termination of the marriage, to determine the character of property, a court will look at the source of the funds used to acquire property, any applicable presumptions, and any actions by the spouses that may change the character of the assets. A mere change in form does not alter the character of the asset.

Source:
Here, the source of the funds for the house, which is the sole trust asset, can be traced back to the XYZ stock and further, back to Wynn's earnings as a history professor. Because all earnings by community labor are CP, these earnings would be CP if the spouses had been domiciled in CA at the time they were earned. Thus, by definition, they are QCP (defined supra). During marriage, QCP remains the SP of the owning spouse. At divorce or death of a spouse, the character as QCP affects the property determination.

Presumptions:
All assets acquired during marriage are presumed to be CP. However, as noted, the source of the house is earnings that are Wynn's SP until termination of the marriage. Spouses can also take title in ways that raise a presumption, such as a gift to the community, which arises on death of a spouse under Lucas. However, Wynn kept the funds in a separate account, and then created an irrevocable trust with the funds, so no alteration in the title is shown in the facts.

Actions of the spouses
Spouses can by transmutation or other actions alter the character of their own SP. Henry may argue that the change from Wynn's separate account to a trust is such a transmutation. However, a transmutation, to be valid, must be in writing, signed by the adversely affected spouse and clearly express the intent to transmute. This is not evident here, so no transmutation has taken place.

Distribution of assets

At divorce, QCP is treated as CP, and this would entitle Henry to half of the QCP. Death also impacts the character, depending on which spouse dies. If the SP owner (Wynn) predeceases the non-owning spouse, the non-owning spouse may choose their forced share (take against the will) in order to get to QCP assets. However if the non-owning spouse dies first, they have no right to devise the QCP that belongs to the other spouse.

As a result, Henry has no immediate right in the trust assets. In the event of divorce or death of Wynn, he would acquire such rights as are discussed above.

Answer B

1. What is the likely result of Henry's suit against Sis

A trustee owes fiduciary duties of loyalty and care to the beneficiaries of a trust. A trustee may bring suit against a co-trustee for breaching the fiduciary duties, and move to have the violating trustee removed from their position.

A. Duty of Care

Generally, a trustee owes a duty of care to the beneficiaries to act as a reasonably prudent person under similar circumstances. This includes the duty to prudently invest trust property in a manner that will create the greatest return for the benefit of the trust.

i. Prudent investment

A trustee has a duty to prudently invest trust funds so as to increase the benefits from investments for the trust beneficiaries. Here, Sis sold all of the XYZ stock in the trust and used the proceeds to pay for a house. Sis will argue that this is a prudent investment because XYZ stock had decreased in value by 10%, whereas the value of the house has appreciated 20%. This increased the value of the trust property. However, Henry will likely argue that to tie up all of the trust assets in one piece of property which potentially can fluctuate wildly in the real estate market is not a prudent investment. Instead he will argue that Sis should have diversified to different stock from other companies other than XYZ in order to keep a more stable and broad base for the trust property.

Based on these arguments, it is likely that Henry will prevail against Sis in arguing that exchanging all of the stock into one parcel of real property is not a prudent investment.

ii. Duty to diversify

A trustee also has a duty to diversify the stock held by the trust. Here, as discussed above, the trust initially only held XYZ stock. Henry will argue that Sis had a duty to diversify the stock to include stocks from other corporations, and that consolidating the trust assets into one piece of property which is less liquid and potentially subject to market fluctuations in price and value violated the duty to diversify.

A. Duty of loyalty

A trustee is a fiduciary and owes a duty of loyalty to the beneficiaries and the trustor of the trust. Therefore, Sis has a fiduciary duty of loyalty to act solely in the best interest for the trust.

i. Duty to avoid self-dealing

A trustee has a duty to avoid self-dealing with respect to trust assets. The trustee must obtain court approval before the sale of any property which benefits the trustee personally. Here, Sis sold all of the trust assets and used the proceeds from the sale to purchase a house in which she lives in rent-free. She is therefore using trust assets for her own personal benefit, which is impermissible absent court authorization. She has a duty to pay fair market rent to the trust for use of the property in order to avoid a claim of self-dealing.

Therefore Sis has arguably violated her duty to avoid self-dealing

ii. Fairness to all beneficiaries

A trustee also has a duty to act impartially and fairly towards both the income and the principal beneficiaries. The trustee cannot favor one beneficiary over another in terms of their investments or distributions. Here, whereas Wynn and Charity are both income beneficiaries of the trust currently, Charity is the only principal beneficiary after Wynn's death.

(a) "Income"

Income beneficiaries are entitled to cash dividends from stocks, and rents from property held by the trust. Initially XYZ stock issued substantial dividends which are considered income to the trust and distributed to the income beneficiaries. Therefore Wynn and Charity were sharing the substantial income beneficiary. However, as noted above, the stock declined in value and therefore was worth 10% less, therefore reducing the future value for the principal beneficiary.

However, upon changing the stocks for the house, the principal beneficiary would obtain a 20% increase in value of the property. However, Sis is not paying any rent for the property, and therefore Wynn is no longer getting an income from the trust as a result of this change. This change, coupled with the lack of rental payments by Sis, means that Henry will likely be successful in arguing that Sis has violated her duty to act fairly and impartially towards both income and principal beneficiaries.

D. Conclusion

Because of the aforementioned breaches in duty, it is likely that Henry will prevail against Sis in claiming a breach of trust. The trust would likely be entitled to a constructive trust for the unpaid rent that was due on the propety, and Henry may have Sis removed as trustee for breaching her duties of care and loyalty.

2. What is the likely result of Henry's suit against Charity for return of the income

A. Purpose of a charitable gift

A trust must have a valid purpose in order to be properly formed. Here, part of the trust's express purpose at the time of formation was for income from the trust to be delivered to Charity but only go towards disaster relief. Charitiable contributions and trusts are considered valid purposes and therefore the trust is permissible.

B. Violation of a condition by a beneficiary

However, a violation by a beneficiary of an express condition of the trust violates the trust purpose. The court will look at the totality of the circumstances to determine whether the language was intended to merely express a wish on the party of the trustor, or rather if it is an express condition for receipt and use of funds. Here, the trust had an express condition that the share of income given from the trust to Charity was only to be used for disaster relief. However, the beneficiary here instead used the funds for administrative expenses, not disaster relief. The Charity will likely argue that it was only a general wish because they would receive the full benefit of the property upon Wynn's death and therefore should be able to use and dispose of trust income in any manner that benefits the charity. However, Henry will likley argue that the express terms of the trust are explicit in requiring that the funds only be spent on disaster relief. Therefore the beneficiary has violated an express term of the trust.

C. Remedy for violation by a beneficiary

If a beneficiary violates an express term of a trust, the trustee can sue for return of the income used in violation of the trust terms. Therefore Henry would likely prevail in a suit against Charity for return of the income.

3. What rights does Henry have in the trust assets?

All property acquired during marriage in CA is presumed community property (CP). However, property acquired by (1) gift or inheritance; (2) expenditure of separate property funds, (3) the rents, profits, or income derived from separate property; or (4) acquired before the marriage are presumed to be separate property (SP) of the acquiring spouse.

B. Quasi-Community Property

If a married couple acquires property in a non-community property state that would have been community property had the couple been residents of a community property state, such items are considered "quasi-community property" (QCP) and are potentially subject to community property laws if the couple later moves to a community property state. During the marriage, the QCP is treated as SP of the acquiring spouse. However, upon divorce or death of the acquiring spouse, the QCP will be treated as CP and divided equally between the spouses. Upon the death of the non-acquiring spouse, the property will remain the SP of the acquiring spouse.

C. Wages earned during marriage

Wages, earnings, and pensions earned during marriage are considered CP, absent an agreement between the spouses agreeing otherwise. Here, Wynn earned a salary working as a history professor while living out of CA. Regardless of whether she kept the earnings in a separate account, in CA the earnings would be considered CP. The facts do not show that Wynn and Henry had any agreements changing the character of the property. Therefore upon moving to CA, Wynn's earnings are presumed to be QCP. However, as noted above, they retain their SP characterization until death or divorce.

D. The trust assets

Wynn and Henry are still married at the time that Wynn sets up the trust fund with $100,000 of her earnings. Even though these funds are earmarked as potential QCP, during the marriage they are still considered the SP of the spouse who earned them. Therefore at this time, Henry does not have any interest in the trust assets because of the ongoing marriage. Henry will not have any possible rights to the trust assets until death or divorce.

Q6 Torts

Owner owned and operated a small diner where Cook and Waiter worked. After closing one day, Cook called in sick for the following day. Owner knew that an acquaintance, Caterer, owned and operated a catering business. Owner asked Caterer to fill in for Cook. Owner told Caterer: “I want you to run the kitchen for one day. I will pay you your standard catering fee. I just need somebody who knows what he’s doing.” Caterer agreed, telling Owner, “I’ll bring my own knife set, but I assume the kitchen is fully equipped.”

Owner did not check Caterer’s references. If he had, he would have learned that Caterer’s business had once been shut down by the health department.

Caterer went to Owner’s diner and started to cook. Patron, a customer, ordered chicken wings from Waiter. Waiter gave the order to Caterer.

A notice posted on the kitchen wall, entitled “Health and Safety Code Section 300 Notification,” stated: “To avoid food poisoning, all poultry products must be cooked at a minimum temperature of 350 degrees.” Upon observing that the oven was set at 250 degrees, Waiter informed Caterer that the oven should be set at 350 degrees. Caterer responded: “Just worry about waiting tables, and leave the cooking to me.” Caterer did not raise the temperature of the oven, and removed the chicken wings shortly thereafter.

Waiter served Patron the chicken wings. Patron ate the chicken wings and suffered food poisoning as a result.

Under what theory or theories, if any, might Patron bring an action for negligence against Caterer, Waiter, and/or Owner, and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

Answer A

In a negligence case, the plaintiff must show duty, breach, causation, and harm. When the defendant's conduct creates an unreasonable risk of harm to others, a duty of due care is owed to all foreseeable plaintiffs; the defendant must act as a reasonable person to protect foreseeable plaintiffs. Under the majority Cardozo view this duty is owed to all foreseeable plaintiffs, while under the minority view it is owed to all plaintiffs. When the defendant's conduct falls below the relevant standard of care, the defendant has breached his duty. To show cause, the plaintiff must show actual cause (that the plaintiff's injury would not have happened but for the defendant's conduct) and proximate or legal cause (that the plaintiff's injury was foreseeable in that it was a result of the increased risk created by the defendant's conduct/within the normal incidents of the defendant's conduct). Finally the plaintiff must prove that they suffered damages. Here, Patron will be able to satisfy this final requirement of harm/damages with respect to all possible defendants because Patron suffered food poisoning as a result of eating the chicken wings.

Patron v. Caterer

Patron can bring a negligence claim against Caterer for negligently serving Patron undercooked chicken wings. First, Patron could establish the first element of a negligence claim by arguing because Caterer was cooking food to serve to customers at a diner, he owed a duty to all customers who would be eating at the diner to exercise due care/act as a reasonably prudent person in the preparation of their food. Because Patron was a customer at the diner, Caterer thus owed a duty of care to Patron. Caterer breached this duty in multiple ways. First, Caterer failed to exercise due care by not reading and heeding the notice on the kitchen wall that to avoid food poisoning, all poultry products must be cooked at a minimum of 350 degrees. This notice was easy to understand and seems to have been conspicuously posted, and thus a reasonable cook in the kitchen would have read and followed the warning. Second, Caterer was unreasonable in ignoring Waiter's warning that the oven was only set at 250 degrees.

As a cook by profession, Caterer should have known the necessary temperature to cook food at to avoid food poisoning, and even if he didn't there was a notice in the kitchen stating what temperature poultry must be cooked at. Furthermore, as a cook Caterer should exercise due care in making sure that the oven is set at the proper temperature, and even if he were for some reason excused for not noticing that the oven was at the wrong temperature, the fact that Waiter explicitly warned Caterer that the oven was at 250 degrees would negate any possible excuse. Thus, Caterer breached the duty of due care he owed to Patron by cooking the chicken wings in an oven which he knew was only set at 250 and when he knew that the Health and Safety Code required poultry to be cooked at a minimum of 350 degrees.

Moreover, the fact that a Health and Safety Code mandated a minimum temperature of 350 degrees gives Patron another theory on which to show duty and breach. In this case of a violation of a regulation such as this Health and Safety Code, a plaintiff can take advantage of the statutory presumption of negligence. If a plaintiff can prove a defendant violated a statute, that the plaintiff was within the class meant to be protected by the statute, and that the harm caused to plaintiff was of the harm meant to be prevented by the statute, then the duty and breach elements of a negligence case will be presumed. In this case, Caterer clearly violated the statute by cooking the chicken at 250 degrees. The statute explicitly states that it is meant to avoid food poisoning, so the harm caused to plaintiff was indeed the harm meant to be prevented by the statute. Finally, the statute is a Health and Safety Code that is posted in restaurant kitchens, indicating that restaurant patrons are the class of people meant to be protected by the statute. Thus, all the elements are satisfied and Patron can use Caterer's breach of this statute to show duty and breach.

Actual causation is easily established because if Patron had not eaten the chicken wings, she would not have gotten sick ("but for" consuming the chicken wings, she would not have suffered harm). Proximate cause is also straightforward in this case; it is very foreseeable that serving someone chicken wings that have been undercooked will cause that person food poisoning, especially if the person cooking the chicken wings is a professional caterer. Finally, as stated in the introductory paragraph, Patron can easily establish damages because she got food poisoning. Thus, Patron is likely to prevail on a negligence claim against Caterer.

Patron v. Waiter

Patron can also bring a negligence claim against Waiter under the theory that he negligently served her undercooked chicken wings or negligently failed to warn her of the possibility that the wings were undercooked.

Patron would argue that as a waiter, Waiter has a duty to his customers to not serve them food that he knows has a substantial likelihood of causing food poisoning, whether or not he himself is responsible for cooking the food. Alternatively, Patron could argue that Waiter had a duty to warn his customers if he was serving them food which he had reason to believe could cause food poisoning. Waiter would counter that because he was not responsible for cooking the food, he did not have a duty to Patron. However, while it is true that Waiter probably didn't have a duty to make sure that the food was cooked property because it was not his job to cook the food, as a professional waiter he did at least have a duty to either not serve food he had reason to believe would cause food poisoning, or to warn Patron that the food might cause food poisoning. This is because a restaurant patron reasonably relies on their waiter to serve them food that the waiter believes to be safe for consumption. If Waiter had no reason to believe that the chicken would cause food poisoning, he would not have breached his duty to act as a reasonable person with respect to his customers. However, here Waiter knew that the oven was only set at 250 and that the cook had ignored his warning to adjust the temperature. Under these circumstances, a reasonable person exercising due care would not have served the chicken wings, at least not without warning their customer. Thus, Waiter breached his duty to Patron by serving her chicken wings when he knew that they were not cooked at the required temperature.

Patron would argue that actual cause is established because if waiter hadn't served her the chicken wings, she would not have eaten them and gotten sick. Waiter would try to argue that if he hadn't served the chicken wings, a different waiter working that day would have brought them to the table, and he is therefore not a "but-for" cause of Patron's injury. However, the most likely interpretation of this situation is that because Waiter knew that the chicken was undercooked, his duty was not simply to refrain from bringing the chicken to the table but rather to make sure that Patron was not served the chicken or was warned about the chicken; because he was employed as a waiter at the restaurant where Patron was eating and knew of the danger, he cannot avoid liability on that argument. Patron would thus be able to establish actual cause: but-for Waiter's failure to prevent Patron from being served or failure to warn her, Patron would not have eaten the wings and gotten sick. Patron would also be able to establish proximate cause: Waiter knew the oven was only set to 250 degrees and that Caterer had ignored Waiter's warning. It was thus foreseeable that the chicken would be undercooked, foreseeable that if Waiter served the chicken to Patron, Patron would eat the chicken, and foreseeable that if Patron ate the chicken she would get sick. Thus, Patron could establish proximate cause. Damages could be established as above.

Therefore, Plaintiff would also likely win in a negligence action against Waiter for negligently serving her chicken wings that he knew were likely to cause food poisoning.

Patron v. Owner

Patron could bring a suit against Owner either for vicarious liability for Caterer's negligence, vicarious liability for Waiter's negligence, or direct negligence for negligently hiring caterer.

An employer is vicariously liable for the negligence of its employees in the course of their duties. An employer will not be liable for negligence of their employees outside of the duties, nor will someone generally be liable for the negligence of an independent contractor (rather than of an employee). However, someone will still be liable for the negligence of a contractor if the negligence involves a non-delegable duty or an ultrahazardous activity.

Thus, the first question is whether Caterer is an employee or an independent contractor. A court will address this issue by analyzing the degree of care and control Owner exercised over Caterer, taking into account factors such as the length of employment, the nature of the duties, the amount of responsibility retained by and amount of discretion exercised by the employee/contractor, and the nature of payment. In this case, the fact that Caterer was only filling in for Owner for one day while Cook called in sick, was asked only to "run the kitchen for one day," brought his own knives, was paid a one time payment of his standard catering fee, independently owns and operates his own catering business, and does not appear to have been supervised in his duties all support a finding that Caterer was an independent contractor. The fact that aside from the knives Caterer relied on Owner's "fully stocked" kitchen supports an argument that Caterer was an employee; so does the nature of the job, as generally a cook in a restaurant is an employee of the restaurant; however, these facts are not sufficient to support a finding that Caterer was an employee. Thus, Caterer would be found to be an independent contractor.

Therefore, if Patron were to pursue a claim that Owner was vicariously liable for Caterer's negligence, Patron would have to argue that Caterer was performing a non-delegable or inherently dangerous/ultrahazardous function. The latter exception does not apply because while cooking food at a restaurant does have some inherent risks regarding kitchen safety and food poisoning issues, these are not sufficient for a finding that it is ultrahazardous. However, Patron has a chance of prevailing on the argument that the duty of ensuring that food cooked and served to restaurant patrons is cooked to health and safety code specifications is a non-delegable duty. Common carriers and store/restaurant owners are held to have a particularly high duty of care to their customers, and as such some duties are non-delegable. One example of a non-delegable duty is the maintenance of taxicabs: even though taxi drivers and mechanics are independent contractors, the taxi company may not escape liability for negligence in the maintenance of their fleet of cars by claiming that they are not liable for negligence of independent contractors on public policy grounds. Another example of a non-delegable duty, and one that is more relevant to this case, is the maintenance of a store to keep it safe for customers. In that case, if for example a store owner hires an independent contractor to repair a dangerous condition in the store that creates a hazard to customers, the store owner can still be found vicariously liable for the independent contractor's negligence under the theory that maintaining the safety of the premises is non-delegable for public policy reasons. By analogy, the owner of a restaurant could still be found liable for the negligence of an independent contractor regarding ensuring that food is cooked according to health and safety code requirements, because restaurant owners owe a particularly high duty of care to their customers and therefore such duty is non-delegable on public policy grounds.

Therefore, Patron has a good chance of prevailing on the argument that Owner is vicariously liable for Caterer's negligence on the grounds that the duty of ensuring that food served at Owner's restaurant is cooked according to health code specifications is non-delegable. Of course, for Owner to be vicariously liable, it must also be established that Caterer himself was negligent. As discussed above, Patron has a strong case that Caterer was indeed negligent; therefore, this will not be a bar to arguing that Owner was vicariously liable.

Next Patron could argue Owner is vicariously liable for Waiter's negligence. Here there are no facts indicating that Waiter is an independent contractor. Owner might try to argue that the fact that waiters generally earn most of their wages in tips supports a finding that Waiter is an independent contractor and not an employee. However, this is not very persuasive and court would probably find Waiter to be an employee. Thus, if Patron did prevail on her claim against Waiter for negligence, she could also prevail on a claim against Owner for vicarious liability; however, if Waiter were found not to be negligent, Patron would have no such claim against Owner.

Finally, Patron could argue that Owner was directly negligent in hiring Caterer because he did not check Caterer's references. First Patron would have to establish duty. Patron could successfully argue that Owner had a duty to his customers to exercise due care in selecting his employees and independent contractors. Patron could also successfully argue that Owner breached that duty by not checking Caterer's references. A reasonable restaurant owner would check the references of a Caterer before hiring him. Owner would argue that here he was only hiring Caterer for one day, that Caterer owned and operated his own catering business which was evidence that he was a competent caterer, and that Caterer was an acquaintance of Owner so perhaps he had independent, circumstantial knowledge of his competence. However, these arguments are not persuasive; it would not have taken long to check Caterer's references, and given the nature of the work he was being hired to do, it was still reasonably prudent to check his references even though he was only being hired for one day.

Patron would argue that Owner's breach of duty in failing to check Caterer's references was the actual cause of her harm because the facts state that if Owner had checked Caterer's references, he would have learned that Caterer's business had once been shut down by the health department. To prove actual cause, however, Patron would still have to argue that had Owner found this out he would have then chosen not to hire Caterer or would have chosen to supervise Caterer more carefully. The court will likely permit this inference in Patron's favor, and she will thus be able to establish actual cause.

Patron would argue that Owner's breach was also the proximate cause of her harm because it was foreseeable that by hiring Caterer without checking his references, Owner was taking the risk that Caterer was incompetent and could cause harm as a result of his incompetence. Patron would probably succeed on this element. It is established practice in the service industry to check references before hiring. Thus, it is foreseeable that a failure to check someone's references could lead to the type of situation at issue. Finally, damages would be established as above. Thus, Patron is likely to prevail on a direct negligence claim against Owner.

Answer B

In all negligence actions, the plaintiff must establish a prima facie case for negligence, which generally is composed of four elements:

(ii)defendant owes a duty to plaintiff,
(iii)that duty is breached,
(iv) the breach is the actual and proximate cause of the injury, and
(v) damages to the person or property.

All four elements must be established to succeed on a negligence claim.

The duty owed to the plaintiff is a general duty to all foreseeable plaintiffs. Further, the majority (Cardozo) is that the duty extends only to plaintiffs within the foreseeable zone of the danger. Conversely, the minority (Andrews) is that the duty extends to all plaintiffs. Also important to the first element is what the duty actually is: the standard of care. There are many different standards of care that will be discussed below.

Whether a duty and standard of care is breached is fact specific, but can look to industry custom, regulations or health codes, and any other relevant information.

For causation, plaintiff must establish both actual and proximate cause. Actual cause is causation in fact; but for the defendant's actions, the plaintiff's injury would not have occurred. Proximate cause is a limitation on liability, and says that the injury must be foreseeable; the defendant is generally liable for all harm that is the normal incident of and within the increased risk of his conduct.

Lastly is damages, which must be to the person or property.

The analysis for these elements in part differs depending on who the action is against; thus, they will be discussed accordingly.

(1) Action for Negligence against the Caterer: The action can be based on negligence or arguably negligence per se; both will be analyzed below.

(i) Duty to Patron: Here, Caterer is working in a restaurant and cooking food that is to be served to customers. Thus, he owes a duty to all customers because they are foreseeable plaintiffs and within the zone of danger of his negligent conduct, meaning they will eat his food and get sick. The standard of care here could be a variety of things, but regardless of which the court chooses, the Caterer will have breached it.

The first possible standard of care is the common law one: a person must act as an ordinary, reasonable, and prudent person would act in the same circumstances as the defendant. Such a standard does not take into account the mental capacity of the defendant, but may take into account any physical incapacities. The court may also take into account any expertise or knowledge that he has, such as being a caterer or chef. This is the most likely standard of care.

The second possible standard of care is that of a professional: which requires that a person act with the knowledge and skill of a professional in good standing in his community. It is arguable that a caterer is a professional, but less likely.

The last standard of care is Negligence Per Se which will be discussed with breach.

(ii) Breach of the Duty:

Looking to the first possible standard of care, Caterer clearly breached it by not checking the temperature on the oven despite the warning from both the clearly present Notification which he observed and from the waiter's comment to him. A reasonable and prudent person would have done so in light of these circumstances, and even without such obvious notifications, it would also be required because it is generally common knowledge that undercooked chicken is dangerous.

The second possible standard of care will have a similar outcome. This is an even higher standard of care, which the Caterer cannot meet. If a caterer or chef is considered a professional, then a reasonable and prudent caterer or chef would surely check the temperature and have the right temperature for cooking meats, especially chicken.

Lastly is negligence per se. Negligence per se is that the generally common law standard of care may be replaced when there is a government regulation, statute, or as is here a health notification, that imposes a criminal penalty, which includes a fine. If negligence per se is established, then it is conclusively presumed that the negligence elements of duty and breach are satisfied. To establish negligence per se, the regulation must be violated without excuse, the plaintiff must have been within the protected class meaning the type of person the regulation sought to protect, and lastly that the plaintiff suffered the type of injury that the regulation sought to avoid. The first issue with negligence per se is whether the Notice constitutes a regulation or statute imposing a criminal penalty. It may not and if it doesn't, then negligence per se does not apply. It is possible it will not because nothing in the facts shows there is a penalty for such a violation. Conversely, usually there are large fines for violating these health code notifications and so it may be ok. Thus, if it does satisfy the first element of negligence per se, it has obviously been violated because caterer cooked the chicken at 250 instead of 350 degrees. Further, there was no evidence of an excuse the 250 degree-cooking. Next plaintiff was clearly in the protected class the notice sought to protect; the notice sought to protect patrons from getting sick. Lastly, plaintiff suffered the type of injury the notification sought to avoid; food poisoning. Thus, it is very possible that the court will determine negligence per se applies. But regardless of the outcome with negligence per se, it will likely be held that Caterer breached his duty under the common law negligence standard of care.

(iii) Causation: actual cause and proximate cause. Looking first to actual cause, defendant's negligent act of undercooking the meat was the cause in fact for plaintiff's injury. But for the undercooking of the meat, plaintiff would not have gotten food poisoning. Secondly, is proximate cause. Defendant's act directly proximately caused plaintiff's injury because it was foreseeable that serving undercooked meat to a patron would make the patron sick. Thus, the causation element is satisfied.

(iv) Damages: damages will be clearly established because plaintiff suffered food poisoning as a result of his negligence.

Thus, it is likely that the Patron would succeed in his action for negligence against the Caterer.

(2) Action for Negligence against the Waiter: The patron may have a claim for negligence against the waiter as well, essentially because the waiter observed the caterer's undercooking and ended up serving the food without confirming with the caterer that his mistake had been remedied. Again, for the waiter to be liable, the patron will have to establish the four elements of negligence.

The first element of duty: The waiter likely owes a duty to the patron because the patron is a foreseeable plaintiff within the zone of danger for his act of possibly negligently serving undercooked meat. Further, the standard of care would likely be the common law standard of care because none of the other standards of care apply to a waiter, which is a non-professional. Thus, the standard of care is that of an ordinary, reasonable, and prudent person in the same circumstances as the waiter.

The second element of breach: It is arguable that the waiter breached his duty to the patron. One the one hand, a reasonable and prudent person, after observing that the oven was set too low and the hearing caterer's defensive response to his inquiry, would likely make sure after the order was completed that the owner had remedied his mistake and changed the temperature of the oven because a reasonable person would be aware of the dangers of serving undercooked chicken to a patron. A reasonable person might also notify the owner of the carelessness to which the caterer is cooking, especially since he will only be working there one day. Conversely, a reasonable and prudent person might assume that after warning the caterer of the oven-temperature error, that he would simply correct his error and that the caterer's snappy response merely derived from his embarrassment at undercooking a chicken. Thus, the court could really go either way in determining whether the duty was breached, but it seems more likely that the court would determine that it was breached.

The third element is causation: The actual cause will be satisfied because but-for the waiter serving the undercooked chicken, the patron would not have gotten sick. However, the proximate cause is more difficult to establish, but still likely will be. Although the waiter did not undercook the meat, his negligence (if it is found) contributed to the patron's injury. The waiter's act is likely said to be an intervening force or negligent act. The waiter's failure to ensure that the chicken was cooked properly contributed to the patron's injury and was within the normal incidents of and the increased risk of his conduct. Thus, while more difficult because it is a more tenuous cause, it is likely the court will determine this element to be satisfied.

The fourth element is damages: this will be satisfied because the patron suffered food poisoning.

Thus, it is likely the patron will succeed against the waiter for a negligence claim.

(3) Action for Negligence against Owner: The patron may have a view actions for negligence against the owner of the restaurant. The first being an ordinary negligence claim under vicarious liability. The second being direct negligence for the negligent hiring and or supervision of the employee. All will be discussed.

The owner can be liable for the negligence of his employees, and even possibly the acts of independent contractors, under vicarious liability. Vicarious liability says that the master may be liable if the acts of his servant were within the course of employment. Generally, an owner or master will not be liable for the intentional torts of his servants or employees, unless the intentional tort was natural in the nature of the job, performed at the request of the master, or for the master's benefit. Here, there is nothing to suggest an intentional tort, but rather negligence.

Above, it has been established that the caterer was negligent, and thus, his negligence may be attributed to the owner. The first important determination is whether or not the caterer is an employee or an independent contractor. This is important because the vicarious liability of the owner differs depending on this. Generally, to determine whether someone is an employee or independent contractor, the courts look to several factors: degree of skill required in the job, who provided the tools and facilities, duration of the relationship, did principal control the means of performing the task, was there a distinct business, etc. Applying those facts to this case, it would appear that the Caterer was more likely an independent contractor. The reason being that the employment was only for one day, it was because the owner's normal cook was out for the day, the owner did not operate that much control over the caterer, the caterer had his own distinct business, and the caterer brought his own knives. Thus, if the caterer is determined to be an independent contractor of the owner, the owner generally is not liable unless one of the two exceptions apply.

An owner is liable for the acts of his independent contractor in two situations: (i) when the independent contractor is performing an inherently dangerous task and (ii) when because of public policy, the principal's duties are non-delegable. The latter of the two exceptions likely applies here. Public policy requires that an owner of an establishment that invites and charges members of the public for certain services must reasonably maintain their premises and ensure they are safe. Thus, just because the caterer was an independent contractor, does not mean that the owner could delegate the duty to maintain his restaurant and make it safe. Thus, the owner will likely be vicariously liable for the negligence of the caterer.

It should be noted, that if for some reason the court finds that the caterer was actually an employee of the owner because he was using the owner's kitchen and cooking the owner's menu items, then the owner would also be liable because the negligence occurred within the scope of his employment: it occurred while cooking on the job for a patron of the restaurant.

The owner may also be vicariously liable for the negligence of the waiter (if the waiter is found to have been negligent), because the waiter is an employee and the negligence occurred while acting within the scope of his employment.

The patron could also sue the owner for his Direct Negligence. Even if the owner is not vicariously liable, he can be directly liable for his own negligence. All persons are generally personally liable for their own negligence. Here, the direct negligence would arise from the owner's negligent hiring and arguably negligent supervision of the caterer. The owner owes a duty to his patrons to employ persons that are qualified and will perform the job responsibly. The patron will argue that the owner negligently hired the caterer because he gave him the job when the caterer was only an acquaintance. Further, the owner did not check the Caterer's references or ask around, which a reasonable person would have done; and if such acts had been done, he would have learned that the Caterer's business had once been shut down by the health department for violations. It was the owner's negligent hiring that was the actual, and very likely, the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries. Thus, the patron will likely succeed in this direct negligence claim against the owner.

The patron could also sue the owner for his Direct Negligence for negligent supervision of his employees. This is less probable because although the facts do not state that the owner inspected the caterer's work and watched him perform, it is not unreasonable for an owner to not check the every move of a caterer or chef. That being especially true when the caterer is performing such a standard task as cooking chicken. Thus, while the owner owed a duty to supervise, it was likely not breached. The duty here takes on the standard of care required for invitees: which is that the owner must make reasonable inspections to discover all non-obvious and dangerous artificial and natural conditions. That standard of care does not cleanly apply here, and even if it does, it is not apparent that it has been breached. Further, his failure to supervise may not be the proximate cause, because of the caterer's intervening act that was likely not the normal incidents of a failure to adequately supervise. Thus, it is likely the patron will lose on this claim.

ESSAY EXAMINATION INSTRUCTIONS

Your answer should demonstrate your ability to analyze the facts in the question, to tell the difference between material facts and immaterial facts, and to discern the points of law and fact upon which the case turns. Your answer should show that you know and understand the pertinent principles and theories of law, their qualifications and limitations, and their relationships to each other.

Your answer should evidence your ability to apply the law to the given facts and to reason in a logical, lawyer-like manner from the premises you adopt to a sound conclusion. Do not merely show that you remember legal principles. Instead, try to demonstrate your proficiency in using and applying them.

If your answer contains only a statement of your conclusions, you will receive little credit. State fully the reasons that support your conclusions, and discuss all points thoroughly.

Your answer should be complete, but you should not volunteer information or discuss legal doctrines that are not pertinent to the solution of the problem.

Unless a question expressly asks you to use California law, you should answer according to legal theories and principles of general application.

Q1 Professional Responsibility

Three months ago, Dave was arrested for the burglary of a shoe store after a forensic investigation by the police department identified him as the burglar. Patty, a prosecutor, brought burglary charges against him.

A week ago, Patty saw a press release that the police chief was planning to issue to the media. It stated that Dave was a "transient" and had been "arrested for burglary by Inspector Ing, who is known for his ability to apprehend guilty criminals."

Four days ago, Patty received a report from a federal agency stating that the police department's forensic investigation identifying Dave as the burglar was unreliable.

Three days ago, Patty announced "ready for trial" at a pretrial conference.

Yesterday, Patty learned that two eyewitnesses had identified Dave as the burglar. Because she did not intend to use evidence from the forensic investigation, she did not disclose the federal agency report to Dave's attorney. Dave's attorney has never asked her to provide discovery.

This morning, Patty called the judge who will be presiding over Dave's trial to reassure him that there is ample non-forensic evidence to convict Dave.

What ethical violations, if any, has Patty committed? Discuss.

Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

Answer A

Prosecutors have numerous unique ethical duties as a consequence of their role as public representatives and their power to interfere in the liberty of private persons. In general, a prosecutor has a duty to seek justice, not to secure a conviction at any cost.

Press Release Suggesting That the Accused Is Guilty

A lawyer has a duty not to make any statements that she should reasonably expect to be publicly disseminated and that are substantially likely to prejudice a judicial proceeding. A prosecutor in particular must not broadcast or allow to be broadcast a statement that expresses an opinion regarding the guilt or innocence of a criminal defendant. If a prosecutor knows that an attorney or law enforcement agent under her oversight plans to make such a statement, the prosecutor must make reasonable efforts to prevent the statement from being issued.

Here, the chief of police planned to issue a statement declaring that Dave had been apprehended by a detective "who is known for his ability to apprehend guilty criminals." Patty saw this press release before it was issued and knew that the chief planned to issue it. She therefore should reasonably have expected that it would be publicly disseminated. Patty will likely argue that the statement does not pose any problems, because in it the police chief does not directly express an opinion that Dave is guilty (or innocent). This argument will likely fail. The police chief's statement announces that Detective Ing has a reputation for apprehending guilty parties, which suggests strongly that the chief believes that Dave in particular is guilty. Patty may also argue that she has no duty to prevent the statement because it is attributable to the chief, not to her. This argument will likely also fail. As a prosecutor, Patty has a duty to make reasonable efforts to prevent law enforcement from making public statements that will prejudice a proceeding in which she is counsel. The chief's planned statement suggests strongly that the chief believes that Dave is guilty. This statement would likely prejudice the public against Dave, perhaps making it more difficult to select an unbiased jury. Patty therefore had a duty to make reasonable efforts to prevent the statement from being made.

Patty may argue that the other portions of the press release are not objectionable. For instance, a prosecutor generally may announce the name of a criminal defendant, the fact of an arrest, and the nature of the charges. That the police chief planned to announce that a person named Dave was arrested for burglary is therefore consistent with Patty's duties with regard to trial publicity, as is the chief's statement that Dave is a "transient." However, the statement that Dave was arrested by a detective who is known for apprehending "guilty criminals" suggests an opinion as to Dave's guilt, and amounts to a violation.

Patty's failure to prevent the chief's statement that Dave was arrested by a detective known for apprehending "guilty criminals" after learning that he planned to make it was a violation of her duty to avoid public statements that may prejudice a proceeding.

Prosecution Despite Lack of Probable Cause

A prosecutor's duty to seek justice requires that she never pursue a charge that she knows is unsupported by probable cause. Probable cause exists when the facts known to the prosecutor are sufficient to allow a person of reasonable prudence and caution in the prosecutor's position to seriously entertain the possibility that the defendant is guilty of the crime charged.

Here, Patty will argue that she has probable cause to pursue Dave's burglary charge to trial. She will note that two eyewitnesses have identified Dave as the burglar, and eyewitness testimony is usually sufficient to make out a prima facie case against an accused. The State Bar would likely point out that Patty did not learn of the eyewitness testimony until yesterday. Before that time, the sole evidence on which the charge was based was the police department's investigation. Four days ago, however, before Patty learned of the eyewitnesses, a federal report revealed that the forensic investigation was unreliable. The State Bar will argue that, as of this time, Patty lacked probable cause because the sole evidence on which the charge was based had been revealed to be suspect. The State Bar would be correct. In the two days between receiving the federal report and learning of the eyewitnesses, Patty lacked sufficient facts as would justify a reasonable person in believing that Dave was guilty. Instead of continuing to pursue the charge, she should have conducted further investigation to learn whether Dave was likely to be responsible for the burglary charged. Patty may argue that the mere existence of a report calling into question the police department's investigation does not alone establish that the investigation was faulty. This is true, but it does not excuse her conduct. At minimum, the report called the investigation into question. Patty should have pursued that question rather than continuing to rely blindly on the forensic evidence.

Patty's continued pursuit of the burglary charge after receiving the federal report was likely a breach of her duty not to pursue a charge in the absence of probable cause.

Lack of Candor Before the Tribunal

A lawyer's duties to uphold the integrity of the profession and to avoid prejudicing the administration of justice require that she make no false statements to a court in the course of a proceeding. This duty applies to prosecutors as well as to all other lawyers.

Here, Patty announced ready for trial three days ago at a pretrial conference. The day before the conference, she had learned that the sole evidence on which the burglary charge was then based, the police department's forensic report, was unreliable. Rather than announce this fact to the court, however, she told the court that she was ready for trial. Patty may argue that this statement was not a misrepresentation. She may assert that she intended to proceed to trial on the forensic evidence despite the federal report, perhaps in the belief that the report was mistaken. Other facts in this case belie that assertion. After the pretrial conference, as soon as Patty learned that there were eyewitnesses to the charged crime, she abandoned the forensic evidence. This indicates that she understood that the forensic evidence had limited value, and suggests that Patty did not truly believe that she was "ready for trial" when this evidence was all that was available. On the other hand, if Patty did believe that the forensic evidence was sufficient to proceed to trial, this fact reinforces the conclusion above that Patty breached her duty not to pursue a charge in the absence of probable cause.

Patty likely did not believe that she was ready for trial when she announced as much to the court, a breach of her duty of candor. If she did believe that she was ready when the only evidence available was the unreliable forensic evidence, her announcement of readiness for trial is a breach of her duty not to pursue a charge in the absence of probable cause.

Failure To Disclose Exculpatory Evidence to the Defense

The Due Process Clause of the United States Constitution imposes a duty on every prosecutor to disclose to the defense material evidence favorable on the issues of guilt or punishment. Evidence is "material" if the prosecutor's timely disclosure raises a reasonable possibility that the outcome of the trial would be different than if the evidence had been withheld. The duty to disclose exists even if the defense makes no discovery requests. A prosecutor is responsible for violating this duty even if she did not act in bad faith.

Here, Patty received a report from a federal agency suggesting that the police department's forensic investigation was unreliable. This evidence is favorable to Dave because he can use it to show that the forensic evidence deserves little weight. Patty will argue that the report is not material because she intends to rely on eyewitnesses, and does not plan to introduce the forensic evidence at all. She will assert accordingly that the defense will not be able to use the report to affect the outcome because it does not address the reliability of the eyewitnesses' testimony. This argument will fail. The report allows the defense to attack the reliability of the police department's entire investigation. By demonstrating that the forensic investigation was inept, the defense will be able to suggest that the police handled the eyewitnesses ineptly as well. Because the defense can use the report to undermine the police department's investigation, a reasonable possibility exists that it could influence at least one juror to vote not guilty, calling for a mistrial. This is sufficient to give rise to a reasonable possibility that disclosure of the report could lead to a different outcome. Patty may also argue that she has no duty to disclose the report because the defense never asked for it. This argument will also fail. A prosecutor has a duty to disclose exculpatory evidence in her possession whether the defense asks for it or not.

Patty's failure to disclose the federal report is a breach of her duty to disclose exculpatory evidence to the defense.

Improper Ex Parte Contact with the Presiding Judge

A lawyer's duty of fair play to her opposing counsel requires that she not engage in any ex parte contact with a judge in order to influence the outcome of a proceeding.

Here, Patty called the presiding judge in Dave's trial to assure him that she has sufficient non-forensic evidence to prove the burglary charge. There is no indication that she announced to Dave's counsel that she intended to make this contact or that she invited Dave to speak with the judge at the same time. This was an improper ex parte contact. Moreover, it was likely intended to influence the judge in the proceedings. That Patty felt the need to reassure the judge that she need not rely on the forensic evidence suggests that she knew or suspected that the judge had misgivings about the forensic evidence. Her reassurance was likely intended to assuage those misgivings. Making this communication in the absence of opposing counsel was a violation of Patty's duty of fair play.

By contacting the presiding judge ex parte in an attempt to influence him regarding the strength of her case, Patty violated her duty of fair play to opposing counsel.

Answer B

Patty's Ethical Violations

Attorneys have a duty to represent their clients with diligence, competence and zealous representation. The attorney must conform their conduct with their client, courts, opposing counsel and other parties within the rules under the Business and Professions code and Ethical codes of conduct. Generally, the ABA and California are the same but I will note when they are different.

Here, Patty as prosecuting attorney has a duty to zealously represent the state and conform her conduct with the professional rules and uphold the integrity of our legal system. Patty has potentially violated some of these rules which will each be discussed in turn below.

Statements to the Public/Media

Patty likely committed an ethical violation when she knew the police chief was planning to issue a press release to the media containing prejudicial statements about Dave that would adversely affect his right to a fair trial and impartial jury.

An attorney may not make extrajudicial statements that would inhibit a defendant's right to a fair trial. An attorney cannot make statements about a trial that would prevent the selection of an impartial jury or prejudice the defendant. It is important public policy that the community not be tainted by these statements to the media; otherwise a defendant will be unable to obtain a fair trial with an impartial jury. However, there are a few matters where an attorney may make a statement to the public such as any defenses to the crime charged and an attorney may respond to accusations by another attorney. In other words, the attorney can make statements in rebuttal of any prejudicial statements made by opposing counsel. Without allowing statements of rebuttal the jury selection would be tainted and prevent a fair trial for the defendant. Statements may also be made when the police are still conducting an investigation and are seeking help from the public. For instance, looking for witnesses or information regarding persons of interest or whereabouts.

Here, Patty is a prosecutor bringing burglary charges against Dave. Patty is arguably responsible for statements by the police chief as he is the head of the department leading the investigation of the crime for which she is prosecuting. Patty knew of extrajudicial statements before they were made by the police chief because she saw the press release a week ago. As such, Patty has a duty to prevent any extrajudicial statements to the press by the police chief that would adversely affect Dave's right to a fair trial. Furthermore, Patty had knowledge of these statements and she knew of their potential prejudicial effect on Dave the defendant. Dave's attorney may argue Patty knew the police chief's statement contained prejudicial statements about his client because she knew the police chief was going to call Dave a "transient". Dave's Attorney will argue by telling the public Dave is a transient will have a prejudicial effect on the public. The public may infer guilt upon Dave because traditionally in our society being a transient indicates a lack of money and provides motive to rob a shoe store. Patty will counter argue statements as to the potential motive of the criminal act is a permissible statement. Patty cannot argue as a defense these statements were not made in an ongoing effort to solve a crime or gain information from the public and are thus permissible. It is possible the disciplinary boards or the court may not find the "transient" statement to have been so prejudicial as to be an ethical violation by Patty.

The second statement made by the police chief was that Dave was "arrested for burglary by Inspector Ing, who is known for his ability to apprehend guilty criminals." While the first part of the statement announcing Dave was arrested for burglary by Inspector Ing does not appear prejudicial, the police chief crossed the line with the statement "known for his ability to apprehend guilty criminals." This statement would have an extremely prejudicial effect on the public at large because he is stating Detective Ing only arrests those who are guilty criminals. Dave's right to a fair trial and impartial jury are tainted by such statements because it is telling the public by inference of his arrest he is guilty. Again, as prosecuting attorney Patty had a duty to prevent the police chief from making prejudicial statements about Dave to the public because she had knowledge of his press release he was planning to issue.

In conclusion, it is likely Patty will be found in violation of the ethical code of conduct because she knew of the police chief's press release stating Dave was arrested by Detective known for apprehending guilty criminals.

Malicious Prosecution: Bringing Charges Without Probable Cause

Patty committed an ethical violation by bringing charges against a defendant without sufficient probable cause.

A prosecuting attorney has a duty to not bring malicious actions and may only bring charges supported by probable cause. If a prosecutor initially has probable cause to bring charges but later finds out there is no probable cause (lack of evidence, etc.) then the charges against the Defendant must be dropped. In order to have probable cause there must be facts sufficient to indicate the defendant committed a criminal act. The policy behind this rule is to uphold the integrity of our justice system by only prosecuting individuals when there are sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action. This rule also prevents undue costs and waste of the court’s time.

Here, Patty has made an ethical violation because she proceeded with the charges against Dave even after she learned the forensic investigation identifying Dave as the burglar was unreliable. Patty only initially brought the charges against Dave because of the forensic investigation identifying him as the burglar. This was sufficient probable cause because there was evidence indicating Dave committed a criminal act of burglary upon the shoe store. Thus far Patty has not committed a violation for filing charges against Dave for the burglary. However, four days ago, Patty received a report from a federal agency stating that the police department's forensic investigation identifying Dave as the burglar was unreliable. This negates probable cause to arrest Dave because there does not appear to be any other evidence linking him to the shoe store burglary. Furthermore, it was a federal agency reporting to Patty that the investigation was unreliable. This should have been a clear indication to Patty that she did not have probable cause and thus charges against Dave should have been dropped. Patty committed a violation when three days later she announced "ready for trial" at a pretrial conference. There are no other facts to indicate Patty had any probable cause to link Dave to the burglary and thus she committed an ethical violation by bringing charges without probable cause.

In conclusion, Patty will be in violation of bringing charges against a defendant with lack of probable cause because she did not have any evidence linking Dave to the burglary and otherwise announced she was ready for trial.

Duty of Diligence and Competent Representation

Patty potentially committed a violation of diligent and competent representation when she knowingly carried out charges against Dave for burglary after learning she no longer had sufficient probable cause.

An attorney has a duty to competently and diligently represent a client with the required skill, knowledge and experience required for the matter.

Patty potentially violated her duty to represent the state diligently and competently because she did not drop the charges against Dave after a lack of probable cause. It can be argued it would have been diligent for Patty to drop the charges against Dave because once the jury is sworn in Dave cannot be charged again due to double jeopardy. If there was a lack of evidence it would have been prudent of Patty to drop the charges and await discovery of further evidence sufficient to support probable cause. This indicates a violation of her diligent and competent representation of the state (and essentially the shoe store) because she is prosecuting a defendant who may have committed the crime but will not be convicted due to a lack of evidence.

False Statement to the Court

Patty made a false statement to the court when she stated she was ready for trial at a pretrial conference but had insufficient probable cause to carry out the charges against Dave for burglary.

However, Patty will argue she did not commit a violation because she had probable cause when she learned that two eyewitnesses had identified Dave as the burglar. Patty will still be in violation because this information was obtained after she told the court she was "ready for trial" at a pre-trial conference. This may be considered a false statement to the court which is another violation of ethical conduct. By falsely telling the court she was ready for trial indicates she still had probable cause to charge Dave. However, Patty did not have sufficient probable cause at the pretrial conference because she received a report from a federal agency stating the forensic investigation identifying Dave as the burglar was unreliable. Again, no other evidence was apparent linking Dave to the shoe store burglary. Furthermore, Patty did not attempt to alert the court to this false statement and it was made knowingly because she knew the report made her forensic evidence unreliable. Thus, Patty made a false statement to the court when she told them she was ready for trial although she had lack of probable cause. By continuing trial this would result in a waste of the court's time and expenses of attorney fees upon the defendant not to mention the stress of facing criminal charges.

Although Patty will argue she had sufficient probable cause because she had two eyewitnesses to identify Dave as the burglar this evidence did not arise until after the statement was made to the court. Patty will not be able to retroactively rectify the fact she made a false statement to the court.

In conclusion, Patty made an ethical violation by giving the court a false statement that she announced she was ready for trial at a pretrial conference.

Disclosure of Evidence to Opposing Counsel

Patty will be in violation of providing exculpatory evidence when she did not disclose the federal agency's report to Dave's attorney.

A prosecuting attorney has a duty to turn over any evidence that is helpful to the defense even outside of discovery requests. This goes towards the policy of providing a defendant with a fair trial giving both parties the same evidence to use in arguing their case. A prosecutor has access to evidence and resources a defense attorney may not have, such as federal agency reports. An attorney who does not disclose such evidence will be found in violation of the codes of ethical conduct.

Here, Patty did not disclose the federal agency report to Dave's attorney. Dave's attorney is likely a public defender since Dave is a transient. The public defender's office may not have access to the federal agency report stating that the police department's forensic investigation identifying Dave as the burglar was unreliable. This evidence is beneficial and essential to Dave's case because it shows the prosecution has no probable cause to bring charges. Essentially the federal agency report making the evidence unreliable is a strong piece of evidence to argue Dave's innocence. Thus, as prosecutor Patty should have disclosed the evidence to Dave's attorney within a reasonable time of its discovery.

Patty will argue that she was not intending to use evidence from the forensic investigation so she did not disclose it to Dave's attorney. She will further argue that Dave's attorney has never asked her to provide discovery so she was not required to disclose the report and could not have committed an ethical violation where there was no duty to disclose. This defense will not stand because Patty as prosecutor had a duty to disclose the beneficial evidence to Dave's attorney of her own accord. Furthermore, Dave's attorney had no indication of knowledge of the report’s existence so he would not have known to ask for it. Thus, Patty remains in violation although Dave's attorney never specifically asked for the document.

In conclusion, Patty committed an ethical violation when she did not disclose the federal agency report which was of benefit to Dave's attorney.

Attorney Work Product Doctrine

Patty will argue the federal agency report is attorney work product doctrine and thus cannot not be turned over to Dave's attorney because of privilege. However, it is likely Dave's attorney can show undue hardship without the production of the federal agency report and thus Patty must turn over the report or will be in violation.

An attorney's work product of their thoughts, opinions, legal conclusions, labor or investigation by an agent falls under privileged information and is not discoverable by opposing counsel. However, when an attorney can show (i) a substantial need for the information or document and (ii) an undue hardship (such as excessive costs) and inability to reproduce the same document the court may grant an exception this rule. In California, the attorney needs to show a reasonable and compelling reason for the need to disclose the evidence. However, the information must be redacted (blacked out, crossed out) of any conclusions, opinions, thoughts about the case made by the attorney to whom the document belongs. This ensures the attorney's thoughts and any privileged information between themself and a client remains undisclosed to the opposing counsel.

Here, Dave's attorney will argue there was a substantial need for the information because it is proof his client is being wrongly accused for the shoe store burglary. Furthermore, Dave's attorney will have to show an undue hardship in obtaining the federal agency report and show he does not have access or it would be a great expense to duplicate the report. If the court were to grant the request then Patty's opinions, thoughts or legal conclusions about the case must be redacted or crossed out, thus keeping Patty's privilege intact and preventing inadvertent disclosures of client communications or her own legal conclusions.

In conclusion, it is likely Dave will have access to the federal agency document and Patty cannot use it in defense of her ethical violation of non-disclosure.

Extrajudicial Statements to a Judge

Patty committed an ethical violation when she made an out-of-court statement without the presence of counsel regarding the trial to the presiding judge.

An attorney may not make extrajudicial statements to the presiding judge regarding the case matter (outside of logistical issues) without the presence of other counsel or their knowledge. This prevents a prejudicial effect on the judge who will be presiding over the case and protects the defendant's sixth amendment right to a fair trial.

Here, Patty called the judge who will be presiding over Dave's trial to reassure him that there is ample non-forensic evidence to convict Dave. This is a statement out of court because Patty called the judge by telephone. Furthermore, Patty's statement was made to the judge without the presence of Dave's attorney. Patty's statement to the judge was regarding a matter for trial when she was telling the judge about evidence not yet admitted or presented at trial. Patty also "reassured" the judge there was ample non-forensic evidence to "convict" Dave. This statement puts in the mind of the judge Dave is guilty. Dave may waive his right to a jury trial and have a bench trial where the judge decides whether or not he is convicted. Thus Patty has given the judge information about the evidence not yet presented at trial. This was a clear ethical violation by making a prejudicial statement to the judge presiding over the burglary case and outside the presence of Dave's attorney.

In conclusion, Patty committed an ethical violation when she gave prejudicial information outside of trial to the judge that there was ample non-forensic evidence to convict Dave.

Q2 Community Property

Hank and Wendy are residents of California. Hank is a teacher and Wendy is an accountant.

In 2008, Hank and Wendy married. After their wedding, Wendy's mother deeded them a house as joint tenants. They moved into the house and used their earnings to furnish it in a lavish style, including an antique mirror in the entryway. One day, Hank gave the mirror to a friend who had admired it on a visit to the house.

In 2012, Wendy purchased a small office building where she established her own accounting practice. She paid for the building with funds saved from her earnings during her marriage and took title in her name alone.

In 2013, Hank and Wendy separated. Hank told Wendy that the house was henceforth her separate property and she said, "O.K."

After the separation, Wendy's income from the accounting practice tripled and she remodeled the office building with her increased earnings. Without Hank's knowledge, she then sold the building to Bob, who did not know that she was married.

In 2014, Wendy initiated dissolution proceedings.

1. What are Wendy's rights, if any, as to the antique mirror? Discuss.

2. What are Hank's and Wendy's rights, if any, as to the following:

    a) The house? Discuss.

    b) The accounting practice? Discuss.

    c) The office building? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

Answer A

Community Property Generally

Since Hank and Wendy are residents of California, the law of California will be applied in their divorce proceeding. California is a community property (CP) state. The general presumption is that all property acquired by either spouse during the marriage, real or personal, is CP. On the other hand, all property that is acquired by gift, bequest, devise or descent is considered separate property (SP) of the spouse who received it. In this case, the ownership of each of the assets will depend on whether the CP presumption controls, or the actions of the parties or some other presumptions have changed the character of the property. Each asset will be discussed separately below.

The Mirror

The first issue is whether Wendy has any rights in the antique mirror that Hank gave away to his friend. In this case the mirror was acquired during the marriage, and was purchased using the earnings of both parties; therefore the mirror is considered CP. There are no facts to indicate that the parties changed the character of the mirror and therefore the CP presumption is controlling.

Gift To the Friend

The issue here is whether Hank has fully disposed of the mirror by giving it away to his friend. After 1-1-1975, both spouses to the marriage acquired the rights to equal management and control of the marital assets. Under the rules regarding the rights of equal management and control, one spouse may not make a gift of CP without the consent of the other spouse.

Here, Hank gave the friend the mirror, and there is no indication that he asked for Wendy's permission before doing so. Hank may argue that although spouses may not make gifts of CP without the other spouse's permission, the general rule is that the parties can dispose of personal property. On the other hand, the general rule is that spouses may not dispose of personal property without the consent of the other spouse, for less than fair market value. Here, the facts indicate that the parties decorated their house in a "lavish style" and that the mirror was an antique; therefore it is reasonable to assume that this antique mirror was fairly valuable. Since Hank merely gave the mirror to a friend, and received no consideration for the gift, he has breached his spousal fiduciary duty owed to Wendy. The gift to the friend was improper.

When one spouse makes an improper gift, the other spouse has a right to set aside the gift. In this case, if Wendy were trying to contest the gift during the marriage, she could set aside the entire gift. However, at divorce, a spouse only has a right to set aside one-half of the gift, because the parties each have a one-half interest in all CP. In this case, Wendy would be able to set aside one-half of the gift at divorce. Since the gift was of personal property and a mirror cannot be physically divided, the court will probably value the mirror and award Wendy one-half of its value through another source of money during the dissolution.

The House

Next, the court must determine how to characterize the house that was given to Wendy and Hank sometime after 2008. Since the parties were married in 2008 and the house was acquired afterwards, it is presumed to be CP. However, in this case, the house was received as a gift. The facts indicate that Wendy's mother deeded it to them as joint tenants. As discussed above, gifts during the marriage are considered to be SP of the spouse receiving the gift. In addition, when parties own property in Joint Tenancy, during the marriage it is classified as two SP halves. Therefore, during the marriage, this house would be considered two SP halves owned by each spouse.

Actions By the Parties

The issue here is whether the discussion between Hank and Wendy in 2013 changed the character of the house. Here, the facts indicate that Hank told Wendy that the house was "henceforth her SP" and that Wendy said "ok." This is an attempt at a transmutation. A transmutation is an action by the spouses to change the character of the property that the spouses already own.

Prior to 1985, transmutations could be of the most informal character, including orally. Here, there was an oral agreement to transfer the house to Wendy's SP at the couple's separation in 2013. If this was prior to 1985, this would be valid. However, modernly a transmutation is not valid unless it is in writing, indicates that there is a change in the character of the property, and is signed by the adversely affected party. In this case, Hank would be the adversely affected party because he would be abandoning his one-half interest in the property and giving it to Wendy. However, since there was no signed writing, this oral promise to change the character of the property to Wendy's SP is unenforceable.

Anti-Lucas Legislation

Since the transmutation was ineffective, the court must now determine how to divide the property at dissolution. Here, the property is held in joint tenancy, which is inconsistent with the basic CP presumption that all property acquired during the marriage is CP. However, under the Anti-Lucas Legislation, for purposes of dissolution only, all property held jointly is treated as CP. This presumption can only be overcome by a statement in the deed that the parties intend to hold title differently or a written companion agreement. In this case, the mother merely deeded the property to the spouses as a gift. It is unlikely that they literally intended for the property to be owned one-half by each of them as their SP. In addition, there is no written agreement indicating otherwise. Therefore, the house will be treated as CP. Since the house is treated as CP at dissolution, both Hank and Wendy have a one-half interest in the property.

The general rule is that at divorce, CP should be divided equally in kind. However, the court can fashion other relief if necessary. In this case, since Hank evidenced an intent to give the house to Wendy, the court may allow Wendy to keep the house, and just award Hank the value of one-half of the house.

The Accounting Practice

Next, the court will address the accounting practice of Wendy's. Although Wendy was an accountant prior to the marriage, the facts indicate that she established her own practice in 2012 during the marriage. Since the work of a spouse is considered CP labor, the earnings a spouse earns from work are CP funds.

Calculating the Value Of the Business

When there is a spouse that has a SP business, the court must determine how to allocate the business and the earnings from the business. The court does this by applying one of two formulas, each of which will be discussed below.

Pereira

Under the Pereira formula, the court takes the initial investment of the spouse, multiplies it by a simple and arbitrary interest rate (typically 10%) and then multiplies that by the number of years the spouse worked in the business during the marriage. That figure is considered to be a rate of return on the initial investment, and is awarded to the spouse who started the business with her SP, the remaining amount is considered CP.

Van Camp

Under the Van Camp formula, the court will calculate a reasonable rate of earnings for the working spouse, and multiply that by the number of years the spouse worked during the marriage. This figure would then be awarded to the community as CP. The remaining funds would be considered SP of the spouse, and attributable to standard increases in value to the business due to the market.

In general, the court will use the Pereira formula when the increased value of the business was attributable to the work of the spouse in the business. In contrast, the courts will use Van Camp when the increase in value of the business is due to the overall market economy.

In this case, however, it does not appear that the court would use either approach. The facts indicate that the business was opened during the marriage, using money that Wendy had earned during the marriage. Because the money was earned during the marriage, the business itself is considered CP and not Wendy's SP. Therefore, the accounting business as of 2013 should be considered CP and should be divided equally between the parties at dissolution.

Post-Separation Earnings

In this case, the facts indicate that the earnings of the accounting practice tripled after the separation. The general rule is that marital community ends when there is physical separation of the parties with no intent to rekindle the relationship. Here, the facts indicate that the parties separated in 2013. It is unclear whether there was physical separation, but since Hank told Wendy that the house was her SP, it is likely that he moved out of the house at that time. If the court finds that 2013 was the date the marital community ended, then no CP could be established after that time, and all of the increased earnings in the accounting practice would be Wendy's SP. If the court finds that there was no true separation until 2014 when Wendy filed for divorce, then the accounting practice value as of 2014 would be divided equally between the parties as CP earned during the marriage. But, under these facts, it is most likely that the court will find that 2013 was the date that the marital community ended, and award the increased profits to Wendy as her SP.

The Office Building

Last, the court must determine the character of the office building in order to determine if Hank has any interest in it, notwithstanding the fact that Wendy sold it to Bob.

The property was acquired during the marriage using funds from Wendy's earnings; therefore the office building is initially characterized as CP.

Actions Of the Parties

The issue here is whether the general CP presumption can be rebutted since Wendy took title to the property in her name alone. Under California law, there is a form of the title presumption, which holds that the holder of record title to a property is presumed to be the true owner. In this case, Wendy will argue that the property is hers because she took title in her name alone, and therefore the form of the title prevails.

However, in order for the form of the title presumption to apply, the title must itself have evidentiary value. In this case, the title may not prevail, because there are no facts to indicate that Hank agreed to her taking title in her name alone. Wendy may argue that since the office was purchased with CP earnings, the community made a gift to her and she could take the property as her SP. However, there are no facts to support this. There is no evidence to show that Hank knew that she took title in her name alone, let alone that he agreed for her to do so. Therefore, the title will not be controlling. Since the property was acquired with CP funds, the property will be considered CP.

Post 2013 Actions

Although the property will be classified as CP, the court must determine how to handle the fact that Wendy remodeled the business with her increased earnings after the date of separation. As discussed above, all property that is acquired after the date of separation is considered to be SP of the acquiring spouse. In this case, Wendy's earnings from her accounting practice post 2013 are characterized as her SP.

SP Improvements To CP

Since the money used in the remodel was Wendy's SP, the court will treat this as a SP improvement to a CP asset. Historically, if a spouse contributed SP to a CP asset, it was considered a gift. However, modernly the general rule is that if a spouse contributes SP to a CP asset, he can be reimbursed for SP down payments, loan reductions, and improvements. Here, Wendy remodeled the office building and therefore this will be characterized as an improvement. Wendy will then be entitled to reimbursement to her SP for either the cost of the improvement, or the increased value to the building because of the improvement.

The Sale to Bob

In this case, the classification of the office building is slightly complicated by the fact that Wendy sold the property to Bob. The general rule is that when disposing of CP real property, both spouses must participate in the sale and sign the appropriate documents. However, in this case, the facts indicate that Wendy sold the house without Hank's knowledge, which means he clearly did not participate in the sale. Here, it was easier for Wendy to do this, because the house was titled in her name alone and therefore Bob was unaware that she was married.

When a spouse disposes of real property without the consent of the other spouse, the injured spouse can set aside the sale if it is done within one-year of the sale. In this case, the facts are not clear when exactly the sale took place, but it was sometime between 2013 when they separated and 2014 when Wendy initiated divorce proceedings; therefore one year has not passed. Hank may be able to set aside the sale once the court makes the determination that the office building was in fact CP. On the other hand, since Bob did not know that Wendy was married and he bought the building for consideration, he is considered a bona fide purchaser. The court may not want to injure Bob by voiding the sale, so the court may instead award Hank the value of one-half of the building.

Spouse's Obligations to Each Other

As discussed above, spouses have equal management and control of the CP assets. In addition, spouses are in a reciprocal fiduciary relationship with each other, and therefore owe each other a duty to act fairly and honestly with each other. If the court finds that Wendy acted fraudulently when she took title in her name alone and when she sold the property to Bob without Hank's knowledge, then the court could penalize her for this fraudulent behavior for breaching her fiduciary duty to Hank. Since the fiduciary duty continues until the assets have been fully divided in dissolution proceedings, Wendy still owed Hank this duty as of the date that she sold the property. However, absent a showing of fraud, the court will divide all of the assets as discussed in detail above.

Answer B

California is a community property state and all property acquired during a marriage and before permanent separation is presumed to be community property ("CP"). Any property acquired by either spouse before marriage or after permanent separation is presumed to be separate property ("SP"), as is any property acquired by either spouse by gift, devise or bequest. At divorce, a court generally will award each spouse one-half of the CP in kind.

1. What are Wendy's rights, if any, as to the antique mirror?

The issue to be considered in determining Wendy's rights, if any, in the antique mirror, is whether the antique mirror is CP and whether Hank had a right to give the mirror to his friend.

The mirror is CP. Any property acquired during Hank and Wendy's marriage with CP is presumed CP. Earnings of either spouse are considered CP. Because the mirror was purchased with Hank and Wendy's earnings, it will be CP.

Under California law, both spouses have equal rights to manage and control CP. Thus, one spouse may not dispose of a piece of CP without the permission of the other spouse. Because Hank did not seek Wendy's permission in making a gift of the mirror, the gift is invalid and Wendy may try to rescind the gift and reclaim the mirror as CP. In the alternative, if the mirror is not recoverable, Hank may be required by the court to reimburse the community for the value of the mirror. Thus, in any event, unless Wendy consented to the gift, Wendy will retain her one-half interest in the antique mirror.

2. What are Hank's and Wendy's rights, if any, as to the following:

a) The house?

To determine Hank's and Wendy's rights, if any, in the house, we must determine whether the house is CP and whether any subsequent action altered that characterization.

The house was deeded to Hank and Wendy after their marriage as joint tenants. Under California law, any property held by husband and wife as joint tenants is presumed to be CP as holding in joint tenancy is antithetical to SP status; however, if the property is purchased or improved with SP, the SP is entitled to reimbursement from the community on divorce. (In contrast, on death, Lucas holds that any contribution by SP to property held in joint tenancy is a gift and there is no right to reimbursement.) The fact that Wendy's mother deeded the house to Hank and Wendy will not overcome the presumption that property held in joint tenancy will be considered to be CP. Although property given as a gift to one spouse (as one might have assumed Wendy's mother would have done) will be presumed to be SP, here Wendy's mother explicitly deeded them the house as joint tenants. Hence, it will be presumed to be CP as discussed above. Thus, prior to separation, each of Hank and Wendy had a one-half in kind interest in the house.

After the separation (which I presume for purposes of this question is a permanent separation as there are no facts to the contrary indicated in the question), Hank told Wendy that the house was henceforth her separate property and she said "O.K." In order to effectively transmute property that is CP to SP, and vice versa, under California law a valid transmutation agreement is required. Prior to 1985, an oral agreement could be effective to transmute property. However, after 1985, a transmutation must be in writing to be valid. As the purported agreement to cause the house to be SP occurred in 2013, it will be invalid. Thus, the house will remain CP and each of Hank and Wendy have a one-half in kind interest in it.

b) The accounting practice?

To determine Hank's and Wendy's rights, if any, in the accounting practice, we must determine whether the accounting practice is CP and whether any subsequent action altered that characterization.

Wendy established her accounting practice during the marriage with her labor. Any property acquired during Hank and Wendy's marriage with CP is presumed CP. Labor and earnings of either spouse are considered CP, and any goodwill created during the marriage and before permanent separation is CP. Although California allows the value of a business to be divided between SP and CP where the business was originally SP and appreciated during marriage, those rules (e.g., Pereira and Van Camp) will not apply here as the practice was established during the marriage. Thus, the value of the accounting practice that accrued until permanent separation is CP, and each of Hank and Wendy will be entitled to a one-half in kind interest therein.

However, here the facts state that Wendy's income from the accounting practice tripled after the separation. All property acquired after permanent separation is SP, including labor and wages of each spouse. Thus, Wendy's increased income post-separation and the post-separation increase in value to the accounting practice (because attributable to Wendy's labor) will be Wendy's SP and Hank will not have any interest therein.

c) The office building?

To determine Hank's and Wendy's rights, if any, in the office building, we must determine whether the office building is CP and whether any subsequent action altered that characterization.

The office building was purchased by Wendy in 2012 with funds from her earnings during marriage and she took title in her name. Under California law, all property acquired during marriage is presumed to be CP even if titled in one spouse's name. Here, we know that Wendy purchased the office building with her earnings during the marriage. Under California law, such earnings are CP. Thus, because the office building was purchased with CP it will be CP notwithstanding that title is in Wendy's name alone, the presumption that the office building is CP will not be overcome, and as of separation each of Hank and Wendy have a one-half in kind interest in it.

After separation, there are two issues to consider to establish Hank and Wendy's respective rights with respect to the office building.

After permanent separation, Wendy's earnings become SP. The issue is whether Wendy's. Under California law, when CP is improved with SP, the property remains CP but the SP is entitled to a right of reimbursement from the community. Here, after separation when Wendy remodeled the office building with her increased earnings, she was entitled to reimbursement from the community for any increased value to the office building that resulted.

Wendy subsequently sold the office building to Bob, who did not know she was married. The issue is whether that sale is valid or whether it can be rescinded. Under California law, both spouses have equal rights to manage and control CP. Thus, one spouse may not dispose of a piece of CP without the permission of the other spouse. Where, as here, one spouse sells CP without the consent of the other, the sale may generally be rescinded within the first year, unless the sale is made to a bona fide purchaser. A bona fide purchaser ("BFP") is a purchaser for value who takes without notice of the claims of any other person. In the context of community property, to be a BFP a purchaser must not know that a seller is married. Here, we know that Bob did not know Wendy was married and the deed was in her name alone. Thus, he did not have notice of Hank's interest in the property and will be a BFP. Because Bob is a BFP, the sale cannot be rescinded. Even so, Wendy will be required to reimburse the community for the purchase price (although, as noted before, she will herself be reimbursed for the value of her SP improvements).

Thus, although neither Hank or Wendy will have an interest in the office building itself, Hank will have a one-half interest in the purchase price of the office building (less the value of the remodeling, if any) and Wendy will have a one-half interest in the purchase price of the office building and a right to be reimbursed for the costs of the remodeling.

Q3 Civil Procedure

Paul, a resident of State A, had worked as a manager at the only hotel in State A owned and operated by Hotel, Inc. (Hotel), a large national chain. Paul's compensation was $100,000 per year. Hotel was incorporated in State B, where the majority of its hotels are located. Hotel's main corporate offices are located in State C.

Hotel terminated Paul's five-year employment contract when it had two years remaining. Paul immediately found new employment with compensation of $90,000 per year.

Paul timely sued Hotel in state court in State B, alleging wrongful termination of his employment contract. In his complaint, he sought reinstatement or, in the alternative, damages of $200,000 for the two years remaining on his employment contract at the time of termination. In State B, the measure of damages for wrongful termination of an employment contract is the amount a plaintiff would have earned absent the termination, less what the plaintiff actually earned during the post-termination contract period.

After the complaint was served on Hotel at its main corporate offices in State C, Hotel timely removed the case to federal district court in State B. Paul then filed a motion in federal district court to remand to state court. The federal district court denied the motion. Paul appealed the denial to the federal court of appeals.

Paul meanwhile filed a motion in the federal district court for an injunction requiring Hotel to reinstate him to his job. The federal district court granted Paul's motion and issued the injunction. A month and a half later, Hotel appealed the injunction to the federal court of appeals.

1. Did the federal district court correctly deny Paul's motion to remand the case to state court? Discuss.
2. How should the federal court of appeals rule on Paul's appeal? Discuss.
3. How should the federal court of appeals rule on Hotel's appeal? Discuss.

Answer A

1. Did the Federal Court properly deny Paul's Motion to Remand?

The answer to this question is no. The remand should have been granted.

(a) Diversity Jurisdiction

The issue is the nature of the federal court's jurisdiction in this case. Article III of the Constitution limits the jurisdiction of the federal courts to specific types of jurisdiction, that is, jurisdiction based on diversity of citizenship and jurisdiction based upon questions of Federal law. There are no Federal laws raised in this fact pattern, so the basis for jurisdiction must be diversity of citizenship. The other areas of justiciability will not be discussed here as they appear to be satisfied (i.e. Paul has standing to bring a claim that ripe for resolution, satisfying standing, mootness, ripeness, and a case or controversy, because he was terminated, harmed and the harm is complete).

To establish diversity jurisdiction, every plaintiff must be diverse from every defendant, based upon a party's domicile if it is an individual person, or a corporation's state of incorporation and/or principal place of business, if it is a corporation. An individual may only have one domicile; a corporation may have up to two: its state of incorporation and where it conducts its principal place of business.

Here, Paul is a resident of State A. Hotel, Inc. is incorporated in State B, so Hotel is a resident of State B. Hotel's "main corporate offices" are located in State C. If we assume that "main corporate offices" is equivalent to the corporation's "nerve center" or locus of operations, then Hotel is also a resident of State C.

Hence, it is a citizen of State A v. a citizen of State B and State C, even though there is only one defendant.

The Federal diversity statute (28 USC 1332) not only has a citizenship test; it also has an amount in controversy test. This means that the amount in controversy for a cause of action (or aggregated causes of action) must be greater than $75,000, exclusive of interest and costs. If a plaintiff alleges such an amount, the court will generally not look behind that amount, unless it amounts to a legal certainty that plaintiff cannot recover it.

Here, Paul has asserted a claim for damages as a result of the breach of employment contract for $200,000 for the two years remaining on his employment contract or, in the alternative, he seeks reinstatement, which means he wants his old job back.

We are told that the law in State B is that the measure of damages for wrongful termination of an employment contract is the amount a plaintiff would have earned absent the termination, less what the plaintiff actually earned. Here, Paul has mitigated as he was contractually required to do and found new employment for $90,000 per year. But this will not defeat the amount in controversy for several reasons. First, Paul seeks as one of his remedies reinstatement to a job valued at $100,000 per year for two years — thus readily satisfying the "value of his complaint" in excess of $75,000. In addition, we do not know to a "legal certainty" that Paul will actually be employed by the new employer at $90,000 per year for the next two years. He might be fired again or he may not like the job and quit — perhaps it isn't a truly comparable position. And finally, it isn't even abundantly clear that State B law will apply. Paul was working in State A and he is a resident of State A. Generally speaking, the law of the state in which an employee performs services governs employment contract disputes (unless provided otherwise in the employment agreement). Accordingly, the amount in controversy is satisfied.

(b) Removal

A party is permitted to remove an action to federal court from state court pursuant to 28 USC 1441 if federal jurisdiction exists and the party acts to effectuate removal within thirty days after receiving notice (not service) of a state court action upon which removal may be based. A removal is effective upon the filing of the notice of removal in state court. The action will then proceed as an originally filed federal action thereafter, except certain pleading timing rules are modified. But there is one other requirement not met here: only nonresident defendants may remove.

Hotel is a resident of both State B (where it is incorporated) and State C (its principle place of business). The case was filed in state B state court. Because Hotel is a resident of State B, Hotel cannot remove a case from State B court to a Federal court in State B, and the court should have granted Paul's motion to remand.

2. Paul's Appeal of the Denial of Remand

The Federal court of appeals should dismiss Paul's appeal because a denial of remand is not a final judgment from which an appeal may be taken to the Federal Circuit Court of Appeals ("CTA"). It would rather be deemed to be an interlocutory appeal. With a few limited circumstances, one of which is discussed below, a litigant may only prosecute an appeal to the CTA upon the issuance of a final judgment by the district court (i.e., final judgment after trial, a dismissal of a case pursuant to Fed R. Civ P 12b6 or a Fed. R. Civ. P. 56 summary judgment motion). Exceptions may exist, i.e., the district court may give permission to a litigant to file an appeal prior to a final judgment if it appears that it would be more efficient to proceed in that manner, i.e., the CTA may upon ruling, direct the district court to proceed in a particular manner that might impact the trial of the case. A denial of a motion to remand, however, is not an immediately appealable order and absent permission from the district court, it will not be entertained by the CTA. Paul otherwise must wait until the matter is concluded.

3. Hotel's Appeal of the Injunction

The CTA will deny Hotel's appeal as untimely. But it otherwise would have likely sustained Hotel's appeal on substantive grounds.

A party has thirty days to appeal from a district court's judgment or appealable order to the CTA. Here, we are told that Hotel did not appeal the injunction until a month and a half after its issuance. Hotel was late. Injunctions are an exception to the final judgment rule — if a party is mandated by a federal court to do something, that party may immediately (or within thirty days) appeal that order. This order is in the nature of a mandatory injunction.

A mandatory injunction differs from a prohibitory injunction in that the federal court mandates or orders a party to act. A prohibitory injunction is an injunction based upon a directive to a party to cease doing something. In this case, the court has ordered Hotel to reinstate Paul to his position as manager at Hotel A. This effectively requires Hotel to reinstate an employee it has just fired.

Courts typically do not grant mandatory injunctions for personal services contracts, like the one at issue here. There are several reasons for this view. It is simply not feasible to enforce these orders: requiring an employer to have an employee on the premises who may or may not discharge his work obligations may impact the employer's business. This is particularly apt here where the employee is a manager at a hotel — he may well come into contact with the public and may be in a very sensitive position. Second, a mandatory injunction in this context inserts the court directly into the business of the employer — it just isn't feasible for a court to determine whether the employee is being treated well, paid right, advanced, compensated, managed properly, carrying out the Hotel's instructions, etc. Setting those policy issues aside, however, there is an adequate money damages remedy here — a written employment contract with two years remaining, and clearly sets compensation for those two years (regardless of mitigation issues or which state's law applies). And there is no irreparable harm — again, even on balance of all the interests here, this a simple breach of employment contract case, remedied easily through money damages. Balancing the harms, as the court would do on an injunction, clearly favors Hotel: it is far more burdensome to require Hotel to take back Paul and supervise him where Paul can ultimately recover a money judgment against a presumably solvent defendant, a large national hotel chain.

Answer B

Denial of Motion to Remand

The federal court erred in denying Paul's motion to remand to state court.

In order for a case to be removed to federal court, the federal court to which the case is removed (the district court for the district in which the state court is located) must be a court in which the case originally could have been filed. This requires that the court have subject matter jurisdiction, personal jurisdiction over the defendant, and that venue be appropriate in that court.

Subject matter jurisdiction can be based either on diversity jurisdiction or federal question jurisdiction. Federal question jurisdiction exists when, from the face of a well-pleaded complaint, plaintiff's claim "arises under" federal law. Here, there is no basis for federal question jurisdiction. Paul's claim is one purely in contract, based on a state law cause of action for wrongful termination. There is no indication whatsoever from the facts that his claim arises under federal law or that he is enforcing any federal right. Accordingly, there is no federal question jurisdiction.

Accordingly, the federal court can have jurisdiction only if there is diversity jurisdiction. Diversity jurisdiction is present in a suit between citizens of different states where the amount in controversy is at least $75,000. First, it does appear that Paul and Hotel, Inc. are citizens of different states. An individual is a citizen of the state in which he is domiciled, i.e., where he resides and intends to remain permanently. Here, the facts indicate that Paul is a resident of State A, and there is nothing to indicate that he resides in any other state or does not intend to remain permanently in State A; thus, he is a citizen of State A for purposes of diversity jurisdiction. A corporation, by contrast, is a citizen of both (1) the state in which it is incorporated and (2) the state in which it has its principal place of business, i.e., its "nerve center" from which responsible managers control the corporation's affairs. Here, Hotel is incorporated in State B, and its main corporate offices are in State C. There is no indication from the facts that Hotel has its principal place of business in another state, and it thus appears that its principal place of business would be its corporate offices in State C. (It is certainly clear that Hotel does not have its principal place of business in State A, in which it has only a single hotel.) Thus, Hotel appears to be a citizen of both State B and State C for purposes of diversity jurisdiction. Therefore, Paul and Hotel are citizens of different states, and there is the requisite "complete diversity" for purposes of diversity jurisdiction.

However, it is unclear that the requisite $75,000 amount in controversy is satisfied on these facts. Paul's complaint advances claims for both damages and injunctive relief. When damages are at issue, the plaintiff's good faith assessment of damages will govern the amount-in-controversy analysis, unless it appears clear to a legal certainty that those damages are unobtainable. With respect to injunctive relief, the monetary value of the relief can be based on the greater of either (1) the benefit to the plaintiff or (2) the harm to the defendant.

Here, Paul's claim for damages does not appear to satisfy the amount-in-controversy. A plaintiff seeking damages is entitled only to his expectation damages (as well as incidental damages). Every plaintiff has a duty to mitigate damages, which Paul did here by obtaining another job at a rate of $90,000 per year. Accordingly, expectation damages — which are designed to return the plaintiff to the position he would have occupied absent the breach of contract — would be only $10,000 per year, or $20,000 total. It appears that State B has adopted this measure of damages and, under the Erie doctrine, State B's substantive law should apply to this case, since a federal case sitting in diversity is obligated to apply a state's substantive law. There is no federal law in direct conflict with State B's rule of damages; accordingly, it is necessary to consider whether applying State B's damages computation methodology would be outcome determinative, whether it would lead to forum shopping (causing plaintiffs to flock to federal court), and whether the state has a particular interest in having its law applied. It is clear based on these factors that the damages methodology is substantive in nature and should be applied — the amount of damages that a plaintiff can recover in a matter are certainly outcome determinative, are highly likely to affect a plaintiff's choice of forum, and reflect the state's policy determination as to the matter at issue. In any event, the value of Paul's monetary damages claim is the same — and short of the amount in controversy requirement — whether one applies general contract law principles or State B's damages rule.

However, the injunctive relief Paul seeks does satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement. If the injunction were granted, the benefit to Paul would only be the additional $20,000 in income over the next two years; but if granted, the harm to Hotel would be in the amount of $200,000, i.e., the two years of additional salary that it would be required to pay to Paul. Accordingly, the $75,000 amount in controversy is satisfied.

Nevertheless, although both requirements for diversity jurisdiction are met here, the federal district court erred in denying Paul's motion to remand. A defendant (or defendants) may not remove a case from state court to federal court if any defendant is a citizen of the forum state. Here, as discussed above, Hotel is a citizen of State B. Thus, Hotel was not entitled to remove the case, removal was procedurally improper, and the district court should have granted Paul's motion to remand.

Paul's Appeal

The Court of Appeals should refuse to hear Paul's appeal.

As an initial matter, a grant of a motion to remand is never appealable. Here, by contrast, the district court denied Paul's motion. However, under the final judgment rule, one has a right to appeal as of right only from a final judgment of the district court. A final judgment is one that is final as to all claims at issue and all parties involved, i.e., one that leaves nothing more for the trial court to do. A denial of a motion to remand is not such a final judgment, and is thus not appealable as of right.

Moreover, there is no indication in the facts that any of the exceptions to the final judgment rule apply here. For example, the Court of Appeals may choose to hear an appeal based on the "collateral order doctrine" where a decision of the district court is collateral to the merits of the case, involves an important issue of law that has been finally decided, and the party appealing would be effectively precluded from achieving review of the decision absent an immediate appeal. Here, however, while the district court's denial of Paul's motion to remand is collateral to the merits of the case and final, Paul will have the opportunity to obtain appellate review of that decision through a normal appeal at the conclusion of the matter. Accordingly, the collateral order doctrine does not apply. Nor is there any indication from the facts that the district court has certified this ruling for immediate appeal under the Interlocutory Appeals Act (or that the Court of Appeals has accepted such an appeal), or that any statutory exception to the final judgment rule applies.

Hotel's Appeal

The Court of Appeals should dismiss Hotel's appeal, because it is untimely.

As an initial matter, the order granting Paul's requested injunction is an appealable order. Although the grant of this motion would otherwise not be a final judgment under the final judgment rule, there is an exception for orders granting, modifying, or dissolving injunctions. Accordingly, though the case remains pending, the district court's order granting Paul's motion for an injunction was an appealable order.

However, Hotel, Inc. did not timely appeal from the district court's order granting Paul's injunction. A party must appeal within 30 days of an appealable order. Here, the facts indicate that Hotel, Inc. noticed its appeal "[a] month and a half later." The facts do not contain any indication of excusable neglect on Hotel's part, and Hotel's appeal should thus be dismissed as untimely.

Q4 Real Property

Jane owned a machine shop. It had one slightly buckled wall. It had been built years prior to Town's adoption of a zoning ordinance that permits office buildings and retail stores, but not manufacturing facilities.

Ira purchased the machine shop from Jane for $500,000. He gave her $50,000 in cash and a promissory note for an additional $50,000 secured by a deed of trust. He borrowed the other $400,000 from Acme Bank (Acme), which recorded a mortgage. Acme was aware of Jane's promissory note and deed of trust prior to the close of escrow.

Donna owns a parcel adjoining Ira's machine shop. She recently began excavation for construction of an office building. Ira complained to Donna that the excavation was causing the shop's wall to buckle further, but she did nothing in response.

Shortly thereafter, Ira's machine shop collapsed. Ira applied to Town for a building permit to rebuild the shop, but Town refused. He then defaulted on his obligations to Jane and Acme.

Ira has sued Donna seeking damages, and he has sued Town seeking issuance of a building permit. Acme has filed a foreclosure suit against Ira, and Jane has demanded a proportionate share of the proceeds from any foreclosure sale.

1. How is the court likely to rule on Ira's claim for damages against Donna? Discuss.

2. How is the court likely to rule on Ira's request that Town issue a building permit? Discuss.

3. How is the court likely to rule on Jane's claim for a proportionate share of the proceeds from any foreclosure sale? Discuss.

Answer A

1. Ira's Claim for Damages against Donna

Ira owned the machine shop that adjoined Donna's parcel of land. When Donna excavated her parcel it caused Ira's machine shop to collapse. Ira has many multiple causes of action that he may pursue against Donna in attempt to recover from the collapse of his machine shop. They include a strict liability claim based on lateral support principles, or based on negligence.

Strict Liability and Lateral Support:

Landowners have a right to the support of the surface of their property. When an adjoining landowner engages in action that causes the adjoining property to subside, the owner who caused the subsidence may be strictly liable for the damage caused. In order for strict liability to apply, the injured party whose property has subsided must show that the actions of the adjoining landowner caused the subsidence, and that the subsidence would have occurred even if no structures were built on the injured party's land. If the subsidence would not have occurred but for the weight of the structure built on the land, then strict liability will not attach and the injured party will have to pursue another cause of action to recover.

Here, Donna began excavation for construction of an office building on her parcel that was adjacent to Ira's machine shop. Despite complaints from Ira, Donna continued her planned excavation. Based on Ira's statements that the excavation was causing the wall of his machine shop to "buckle further," which eventually led to the collapse of the machine shop, it seems clear that the excavation is what actually caused the structure to fall. Ira can recover for strict liability as long as the subsidence would have occurred even if the machine shop were not built on the land. This is likely where Ira's cause of action will fail. Facts stipulate that the wall of the machine shop was slightly buckled, and the excavation caused the wall to "further buckle." Facts do not indicate that the land on which Ira's shop actually subsided, only that the action caused the machine shop to collapse. It does not appear that the land would have been damaged or lost lateral support if the machine shop was not built on the land.

In conclusion, Ira cannot recover based on his right to lateral support in strict liability because the collapse of the structure and the land likely would not have occurred if the structure was not built. No facts indicate the land would have subsided despite the shop. Ira must look to another cause of action.

Negligence:

Ira may attempt to assert a negligence claim against Donna. Negligence occurs when a party breaches a duty owed to another and the breach is the actual and proximate cause of damages suffered by another party.

Duty:

Donna has a duty to act as a reasonably prudent landowner who adjoins other parcels with structure on them. Ira is an owner of an adjoining parcel, she had a duty to act as a reasonably prudent landowner to the adjacent owners.

Foreseeable plaintiff:

Under the majority view of Cardozo, a party only owes a duty to foreseeable plaintiffs. Foreseeable plaintiffs are those that reside within the zone of danger of the defendant's actions. Here, Ira was the adjacent landowner to Donna. When Donna began excavation all adjacent landowners were foreseeable plaintiffs because it is foreseeable that construction could cause injury to the adjacent land or landowners. Ira was a foreseeable plaintiff.

Breach:

Donna possibly breached her duty to act as a reasonably prudent landowner when she continued excavation despite the fact that she was informed it was causing a wall of Ira's to buckle and was likely going to cause damage. Facts do not indicate whether or not the excavation was executed with reasonable care or not, but the fact that Donna continued after being informed that her actions were causing damage may mean that she breached her duty of care to Ira.

Actual Cause:

Actual cause is also termed the "but for" cause. The issue is whether but for Donna's actions the building would have collapsed. Ira informed Donna that the construction was causing the wall to buckle further, and the continued excavation led to the collapse of the building. Donna's actions were the but for cause of the collapse.

Proximate Cause:

Proximate cause is called the legal cause and the issue is foreseeability. Here, it is foreseeable that a person doing excavation may end up causing damage to the structures of adjoining parcels. Ira will argue that Donna's actions were completely foreseeable. Donna on the other hand will argue that the proximate cause was not her excavation, but rather the fact that the machine shop already had a "slightly buckled wall." Donna will argue that it is not foreseeable that adjacent landowners have improperly supported structures that will collapse during excavation of adjoining parcels. Donna's argument that the buckled wall makes the collapse unforeseeable probably will not work, but it may be effective as a defense (discussed below.) Moreover, Donna knew that her actions were causing the wall to buckle more after Ira told her, so ultimately her actions were foreseeable because she was informed of them.

Damages: Damages must be causal, foreseeable, certain, and unavoidable.

Here, Donna's actions caused the entire shop to collapse, and it is very possible that a court will find that she breached her duty to Ira and that her actions were the actual and proximate cause of Ira's damages. Absent any defenses, Donna will be required to pay Ira for either the cost of repair of the building (which is substantial), or the reduced value of Ira's property now that the shop has collapsed.

Defenses: Comparative Negligence

Donna has a good argument that Ira was himself negligent and she should be absolved of liability or that her liability should be substantially reduced. Ira knew that the machine shop had a slightly buckled wall that would likely reduce its structural soundness. Ira had a duty to investigate the structural integrity of the building, and insure that it was not at risk for collapsing easily. This is a very strong argument and Donna will likely have her damages reduced by the amount of Ira's negligence, which is significant.

In conclusion, Ira may recover from Donna under a negligence theory but Donna's damages will be offset by the amount of Ira's own negligence.

2. Ira's Request to have Town Issue a Building Permit.

Here, Ira's machine shop has been destroyed, and he wishes to rebuild it. Because of the current zoning ordinance, Ira's machine shop is not permitted in the area where he wants to build it. The issue is whether Ira should be granted a permit to operate the machine shop.

Zoning Ordinances:

Zoning ordinances are an effective way for states and localities to regulate the land use of their jurisdiction. However, a person who seeks to violate a zoning ordinance may seek a variance that will be granted or denied in the form of a permit.

Variance:

A variance is an individual exception to a zoning ordinance. There are two types, area variances and use variances. Area variances are more likely to be granted because it is simply an exception given to allow a building to exist in dimensions that slightly violate the zoning ordinance. Use ordinances are less likely to be granted — a use variance is a permit allowing a person to operate a structure for a purpose that is not permitted by the zoning ordinance. Here, Ira wishes to get a permit to allow him to use his property for manufacturing, which is a use that is not permitted. In order to get a use permit, Ira must show that he will (1) suffer a hardship without the ordinance, (2) that the variance would not damage or harm the neighborhood, and (3) that he is not at fault or a bad actor in his request.

(1) Suffer a hardship

Here, Ira has paid a substantial amount of money in order to purchase the machine shop and operate it at the location where it currently resides. But for the fact that the machine shop collapsed, Ira would still be able to operate it most likely as a nonconforming use (discussed below). Preventing Ira from being able to rebuild and operate the shop as he had previously would cause him significant injury and he will surely suffer an economic hardship if not allowed to resume his business.

(2) Won't Harm the Neighborhood

Here, the neighborhood permits office buildings and retail stores, just not manufacturing. If the neighborhood were zoned only for residential use by families, it is likely that granting such a variance would cause harm to the neighborhood because families would have to deal with the constant manufacturing noise. But, because the area allows offices and retail stores, it is unlikely that the manufacturing would likely cause significant harm to the neighborhood, unless the manufacturing involved toxic materials or chemicals. This factor weighs in favor of Ira.

(3) Ira is not at Fault

Here, Ira was operating the machine shop until Donna's excavation caused the shop to collapse. Ira did not buy the property knowing about the ordinance and now seeks a variance to benefit knowing all along such action would be in violation. And, but for the collapse of the structure, Ira likely would have been able to continue to run the business as a nonconforming use. Ira is not at fault in seeking the variance.

Conclusion:

In conclusion, the court should rule that the Town should issue a building permit because all of the elements required for a proper use variance are satisfied, and Ira is not a bad actor.

Nonconforming Use:

The other argument that Ira may present is that his operation of the machine shop is a nonconforming use because it was in existence prior to the change of the ordinance. Nonconforming uses that are in effect prior to an ordinance change are allowed to continue unless they cause harm to residents or adjoining property. Even then, an amortization period is generally allowed to allow the owner to find a new location for the activity. Here, Ira was properly operating the manufacturing business prior to the ordinance, and the fact that the building collapsed should not deprive him of being able to rebuild a similar structure and continue with the nonconforming operation he had prior to the collapse. There is no evidence the manufacturing is causing harm to other residents.

In conclusion, the court also should have the Town issue a building permit because Ira's prior nonconforming use should still be considered in effect.

3. Jane's Claim for Proportionate Share of the Proceeds from Foreclosure.

Deed of Trust and Mortgage:

When Ira purchased the property from Jane, he gave her a 50K promissory note secured by a deed of trust. He borrowed the other 400K from Acme which recorded a mortgage. Mortgages and Deeds of Trust operate similarly.

A Deed of Trust is an arrangement where a third party holds a deed in a trust to stand as collateral for a debt owed. With a deed a trust, if the debtor (Ira) fails to make payments and ends up in default on the loan, the party that made the loan, Jane, can initiate foreclosure and execute a private sale of the property.

A Mortgage is an arrangement where a party who has or is buying property gets a loan and has the property itself stand as security for the debt. If a debtor fails to make the loan payments and ends up in default, then the holder of the mortgage, the mortgagee, may initiate public foreclosure proceedings against the property.

Here, Ira failed to make payments on the loan and was thus in default. Acme was within its right to initiate foreclosing proceedings against the property to recover for the debt owed. The order of payment from a foreclosure sale is determined by a number of factors, including whether the loan was a purchase money security interest.

Priority:

Upon a foreclosure sale, how proceeds from the sale are distributed is determined by the priority of the creditor's interest. Priority is determined by (1) whether or not the loan was a purchase money security interest and (2) when the interest or mortgage was recorded. All purchase money security interests have priority over other creditor interests executed at the same time.

Here, Jane executed a valid deed of trust, and Acme executed a valid mortgage. The mortgage was recorded and had notice of the deed of trust secured by Jane. Because both loans were provided in order for Ira to obtain the purchase of the property, both interests should be considered purchase money security interests. If Acme had recorded the mortgage on the property without notice of the deed of trust secured by Jane, Acme would have had priority over all other creditors. However, because Acme had notice of the deed of trust, and because both loans will be considered purchase money security interests, Jane's Deed of Trust will have priority.

Order of Payment:

Foreclosure proceeds are not distributed in proportion. So, the court will not rule that a proportionate share of the foreclosure proceeds should be given to her. However, that does not mean that Jane's interest will necessarily be adversely affected. When a creditor forecloses on a property and provides notice to any junior interest, at the sale of the property the junior interest is extinguished. Here, Acme initiated the public foreclosure sale, and had Jane's deed of trust been a junior interest, then Jane was required to notice, but her interest would be extinguished at the end of the sale, whether or not she received proceeds. A senior interest remains intact on the property when a junior interest initiates the foreclosure. When a foreclosure is executed, the priority of payment is that (1) all fees are paid for the foreclosure, (2) Senior creditor interests are paid first and in order to the junior interests, and (3) anything left over is given the debtor, or owner of the property.

Here, Jane's interest in the property has priority to Acme's because her deed of trust was executed first, Acme was aware of the deed of trust, and both interests are purchase money security interest. Accordingly, Jane's interest will not be extinguished by the foreclosure sale by Acme. If the proceeds from the sale produce enough to pay both the debts of Acme and Jane, then both will be paid, and any remainder will be given to Ira. If not, Acme's foreclosure sale will be subject to Jane's deed of trust, and the sale will not extinguish that interest. Jane will be able to foreclose on the property regardless of who purchases the shop during the public foreclosure sale.

CONCLUSION:

In conclusion, though the court will not order Acme to split the proceeds from the foreclosure sale with Jane proportionally, Jane's deed of trust is superior to Acme's mortgage, and the public foreclosure would not extinguish her interest in the machine shop.

Answer B

1. Ira v. Donna

The first issue is establishing what obligations, if any, Donna owes to Ira as a neighboring property owner.

Ira is claiming damages against Donna for the damage caused by Donna's excavation for the construction of an office building. Duties between neighboring property owners can arise in several ways, namely, through contract or tort law. Under contract law, if parties enter into covenants with each other to do something or refrain from doing something on their land, they may be obligated under contract law to fulfill those obligations. Another way in which neighboring property owners may owe each other a duty is through tort law. If Donna and Jane (Ira's predecessor) or Donna and Ira had created a covenant not to interfere with one another's sublateral support, Ira may have a claim for damages under that theory. However, it does not appear that they have an explicit agreement.

Tort law will also impose duties on neighboring property owners in some instances. For example, if one property owner's use of the property is in a way that causes a nuisance, that may give rise to liability under tort law. Likewise, neighbors have a general obligation to refrain from engaging in hazardous or inherently dangerous activities on their property that may interfere with others outside of their property. Additionally, property owners may have a duty under either a strict liability or negligence theory for interfering with a property owner's sublateral support.

Inherently Dangerous Activities

Ira may argue that Donna's use of the neighboring property (using an excavator) constitutes an inherently dangerous activity. When a property owner engages in an inherently dangerous activity she will be held strictly liable for injuries resulting as a consequence of that activity's inherently dangerous propensities. In order to be considered inherently dangerous, an activity must be: 1) unusual for the community; 2) one that cannot be made safer by safety measures; 3) one whose utility is outweighed by the danger it is likely to cause.

In this case, Donna is excavating her property to build an office building. Donna is doing so in a zone that specifically permits office buildings. One may assume that if office buildings are allowed in the zone, their construction is also a usual activity for that area. Further, there is utility in developing a community for business and thus, there is utility in building office buildings. Further, the construction of office buildings can be made safer by taking safety precautions, by having licensed contractors, putting up warning signs, etc. Therefore, using an excavator will likely not constitute an inherently dangerous activity and Ira does not have a cause of action under this theory.

Interference with Sublateral Supports

An alternative theory will arise by asserting that Donna has interfered with Ira's subadjacent property rights. In cases where a neighbor excavates and causes a disturbance in their neighbor’s sublateral support for their property, the neighbor whose property was damaged may have a cause of action under either a negligence theory or a strict liability theory. Which theory applies depends on whether or not the neighbor (Ira) can show by clear and convincing evidence that her property and the weight of his buildings did not contribute to the damage. That is, there would have been damage regardless of whether or not the buildings were constructed. If the plaintiff (Ira) cannot show that his buildings did not contribute to the ultimate injury, then he must make out a case in negligence. If he can, then he may make out a case in strict liability.

In this case, when Jane owned the machine shop it already had a slightly buckled wall. Therefore, when Ira took the building, the wall was likely still buckled or even made worse with the passing of time. Because of this, the unsecured nature of the construction likely contributed in some way to the building’s ultimate destruction.

Therefore, strict liability is not available to Ira because he cannot demonstrate that the buildings on his property in no way contributed to the damage.

Therefore, Ira must make out a case in negligence. In order to make out a case in negligence, a plaintiff must show that: 1) defendant had a duty to the plaintiff; 2) defendant breached that duty; 3) the breach was the actual and proximate cause of the damage; 4) there were damages.

In this case, a duty has already been established under the sublateral support doctrine. The standard of care is an objective, reasonable person standard. Negligence causes of action incentivize individuals to act in a reasonable way in their interactions with others. The standard of care in this case would be what a reasonable person excavating property next to a neighbor's property would do.

The next issue is whether or not the defendant breached that duty. In this case, it appears as though Donna initially was acting as a reasonable person; as discussed, she was excavating property to build an office building in an area zoned for that use. However, Ira complained to Donna that the excavation was causing the shop's wall to buckle further. After Donna was put on notice of creating this damage, the question becomes whether a reasonable person would have done something to attempt to avoid the damage. In this case, Donna did nothing at all. It seems that a reasonable person would have assessed whether it was possible to move the location of the excavation or adjust construction in some other way to avoid the damage. Because there is no evidence that Donna did this, a court may find that she breached her duty toward Ira.

The next issue is whether her breach was the actual cause and proximate cause of the damage. Actual cause is but-for cause: but for the breach, would the damage have occurred? Actual cause may also be substantial cause if there are two or more contributing causes, either one of which may have been sufficient to cause the damage. In this case, it appears as though Donna's actions were the but for cause of the building's collapse. Ira complained to Donna that the excavation was causing the building to further buckle. While it may ultimately be an issue of fact regarding whether it was the buckling of the wall or the excavation, for the purposes of getting the question to a jury a court would likely assume this element was met.

The next question is whether the excavation was the proximate cause of the injury. Proximate cause is the philosophical nexus between the act taken and the damage done -- it requires more than just actual cause and requires that the cause be something foreseeable from the defendant's actions such that it comports with notions of common sense and justice to hold the defendant liable for his actions. Under Palsgraf, the relevant question is whether the injury was foreseeable to the actor. A minority view would hold any damage is foreseeable if it resulted from the action. In this case, because Donna had notice of the damage the excavation was causing, and the excavation was occurring right under the building, it seems foreseeable the damage to the building was likely. Therefore, the proximate cause element is likely met.

Finally, Ira must show there was damage resulting from the breach. In this case, there was actual destruction of his building, resulting in substantial damage, so this element is also met.

Note, most jurisdictions would reduce the amount of damages that Ira receives based on a pure comparative negligence standard, which reduces the amount of recovery that plaintiff receives by her amount of fault. In a traditional comparative negligence state, the recovery would be reduced entirely if the plaintiff was at all at fault. In this case, it does seem as though Ira was partially to blame for not strengthening his wall or doing anything to avoid the damage. Therefore, his damage award will likely be reduced based on the findings of a jury.

2. Ira v. Town

Is the ordinance valid under the Constitution?

Ira's case against the town arises from the Town's refusal to permit him to rebuild a machine shop in a zone that permits office buildings and retail stores, but not manufacturing facilities.

The first issue is whether or not the town's adoption of a zoning ordinance is permissible under the Constitution. The Constitution permits state actors to take or incur on a private citizen's property rights for the public good provided they are given just compensation, measured by the value to the property owner, not the benefit conferred to the government. Generally, zoning ordinances, although they are not complete takings under the Constitution, are analyzed under this framed work.

The general rule is that if the government possesses a private actor's property, no matter in what degree, it will constitute a taking under the Constitution and the property owner will be entitled to compensation. In this case, because the Town has not physically possessed Ira's property, this does not constitute a complete taking.

However, a regulatory regime that destroys all economic viability will also constitute a complete taking under the Constitution and will require the property owner be justly compensated. In this case, the zoning ordinance is a regulation. However, it does not completely destroy the value of Ira's property because he could still build an office building, retail store, sell the property, etc. Therefore, it is not a complete taking under this theory either.

Finally, a partial taking may also require compensation under the Penn Central balancing test if a property owner's property interests are interfered with and his property value decreased. Courts look at: 1) the investment-backed expectations of the property owner; 2) the nature of the government action; 3) the benefit to the public and harm to the individual property owner and what the owner should rightfully have to bear for the benefit of the public. In this case, it is unclear whether Ira's property rights decreased. Clearly, he cannot do what he wants with the property, but that does not mean it does not have other values. Therefore, a court would likely find the Town's refusal to issue a building permit proper under the Constitution.

Is a variance warranted?

The question becomes then, whether or not Ira is entitled to continue using the facility pursuant to a zoning variance for prior use. A zoning variance may be granted if the owner of property can show that the use of their property in the manner previously used will cause undue hardship to the owner and would not cause significant harm to the community if the variance was granted. Notably, when the zoning ordinance is valid, as this one is (see previous discussion), a Town has some discretion in balancing the harms to the application and to the community.

In this case, the zoning ordinance permits office buildings and retail stores, but not manufacturing facilities. The reasoning behind this ordinance seems apparent: manufacturing facilities are generally larger, more disruptive, more likely to emit noise, debris, etc. A town has a reasonable basis for preferring to have a community comprised of stores and office buildings, were people can shop and work without distraction and interference. Therefore, the harm to the community if the variance were granted seems great.

However, Ira does have an argument that because of the pre-existing use of the machine shop by Jane, he is entitled to a variance under the theory that he was grandfathered into the ordinance. However, there are three problems with this argument. First, as previously discussed, the Town has good reason for not wanting manufacturing facilities in the retail/office area of town and variances are discretionary. Second, there are privity issues between Jane and Ira and the Town. It was Jane, not Ira that had been using the building as a machine shop (presumably a manufacturing facility, though Ira might raise a classification argument), when the ordinance was passed. Third, the pre-existing use generally must be consistent if a variance is granted for pre-existing use. When the machine shop collapsed, it was no longer used as a manufacturing facility and Ira likely lost his ability to claim any sort of entitlement to use the property as a manufacturing facility under the pre-existing use doctrine.

In conclusion, a court will likely deny Ira's request that the Town issue a building permit.

3. Jane v. Bank (re: proportionate share of the foreclosure proceeds)

The issue this question raises is how to be characterize the security interests that Jane and Acme have in the machine shop property and what the priority of those interests are.

Generally, mortgages are security interests in property, used by a mortgagee to secure a debt that she has issued to a mortgagor. In this case, Ira purchased the machine shop from Jane for $500,000, but as he clearly did not have that much money, he took out loans. A loan may be either secured or unsecured. An unsecured loan is one that does not have any collateral that a lender may use as compensation in the event of default. A secured loan is one that has property of some sort as collateral for the repayment of a loan. Unsecured loans take a second seat to secured loans when property is foreclosed upon.

Generally, mortgages are prioritized in the order they were made. A bank that loans money to a home purchaser will take a first mortgage on that home. If the purchaser later borrows more money, that lender may also secure the repayment with a mortgage on the home, but it will be subject to the first lender. Once the first lender is paid in full, the second lender will be entitled to proceeds. This is why second mortgages often have higher interest rates or are otherwise on less favorable terms -- they are less secure because they are subordinate to another's interests in the property. The proceeds come from a foreclosure sale, which occurs when the property securing the debt is sold to pay off the lenders.

Finally, there are special types of loans/mortgages called "purchase money mortgages". The mortgages occur when the money lent to a mortgagee is used for the purchase of the item itself. This typically occurs with owner financing -- if a homeowner sells her home and loans money to the purchaser to buy it, there is a purchase money mortgage in the house. These types of mortgages will take priority, even if there is a primary lender that attached prior to the purchase money mortgage being issued.

In this case, Ira purchased the machine shop from Jane for $500,000. Obviously Ira did not have that cash up front. Instead, he paid $50,000 in cash to Jane, which is hers to keep and is not up for grabs at the foreclosure sale. Next, he gave her a promissory note for an additional $50,000 secured by a deed of trust. Then he borrowed another $400,000 from Acme Bank, which recorded a mortgage.

If the $50,000 from Jane was secured by an interest in the machine shop, the very property the loan was made to purchase, this loan will take priority and Jane will be entitled to the first $50,000 received in the foreclosure sale.

Acme will argue that it is the primary lender and that it is entitled to all the money from the foreclosure sale, until it exceeds its $400,000 loan, at which case it may spill over to secondary lenders. There are two problems with this argument: 1) First, as discussed above, Jane's loan to Ira was a purchase money mortgage and takes priority over the Bank's loan. Even if it were not a purchase money mortgage, Jane was still the first lender. 2) Second, Acme knew of Jane's promissory note and deed of trust prior to the close of escrow. Notably, although Jane did not appear to record her mortgage, a recording is not required to secure an interest. Rather, a recording system serves to give subsequent mortgagees and purchasers notice, something Acme already had.

The issue then becomes, what is the effect of Acme's knowledge on its mortgage in the property? Generally, in order to take priority, a mortgagee must be a holder in due course, or a bona fide mortgagee, who takes without knowledge of any other interests in the property. In this case, because Acme knew about Jane's deed of trust, Acme was not a bona fide mortgagee or holder in due course; therefore, Acme's mortgage could be subordinated on this ground.

Note: Generally the holder in due course requirements are intended to protect a subsequent mortgagee who takes from a first mortgagee. A holder in due course will be protected if he takes a negotiable instrument, made out to the holder, without notice of impediments, for valuable consideration and in good faith. A holder in due course will be free from personal defenses raised by the mortgagor (e.g., lack of consideration, waiver), but will take subject to non-personal defenses (e.g., duress). In this case, Acme did not take the mortgage from another mortgagee, but rather was the first mortgagee. Therefore, this doctrine does not apply, but its principles still do. Generally, courts do not reward mortgagees or other property holders who take knowing of another’s interest in land.

In sum, Acme, although it was the first to record, under either a notice or race-notice jurisdiction, Acme is not entitled to bona fide purchaser/mortgagee status because it took knowing of Jane's mortgage. Further, Jane is protected by her status as a purchase money mortgagee. Therefore, a court will likely rule that she is entitled to $50,000 from a foreclosure sale.

Q5 Constitution

For many years, the Old Ways Fellowship, a neopagan religious organization, received permission from the City's Building Authority to display a five-foot diameter symbol of the sun in the lobby of City's Municipal Government Building during the week surrounding the Winter Solstice. The display was accompanied by a sign stating "Old Ways Fellowship wishes you a happy Winter Solstice."

Last year the Building Authority adopted a new "Policy on Seasonal Displays," which states:

> Religious displays and symbols are not permitted in any government building. Such displays and symbols impermissibly convey the appearance of government endorsement of religion.

Previously, the Building Authority had allowed access to a wide variety of public and private speakers and displays in the lobby of the Municipal Government Building. Based on the new policy, however, it denied the Old Ways Fellowship a permit for the sun display.

After it was informed by counsel that courts treat Christmas trees as secular symbols, rather than religious symbols, the Building Authority decided to erect a Christmas tree in the lobby of the Municipal Government Building, while continuing to prohibit the Old Ways Fellowship sun display.

The Old Ways Fellowship contests the Building Authority's policy and its decision regarding the Christmas tree. It has offered to put up a disclaimer sign explaining that the Winter Solstice greeting is not endorsed by City. The Building Authority has turned down this offer.

The Old Ways Fellowship has filed suit claiming violation of the First Amendment to the United States Constitution.

What arguments may the Old Ways Fellowship reasonably raise in support of its claim and how are they likely to fare? Discuss.

Answer A

OLD WAYS FELLOWSHIP'S FIRST AMENDMENT CLAIMS

The Old Ways Fellowship ("Old Ways") has several arguments to support its First Amendment Claims. The threshold question for all of its claims is whether there is government action. Government action occurs when the government acts, when a private entity takes on a public function, or when the government is entangled (encourages, participates in, or enables) in private conduct.

Here, Old Ways' claim is against the City Building Authority, which is a part of the City's Municipal Government. Thus, the First Amendment applies because state action is involved.

First Amendment Right to Freedom of Speech

Old Ways has several arguments related to its first amendment right to freedom of speech.

Content-Based Restrictions. Old Ways may also argue that the Policy is an invalid restriction of speech in a public forum. Here, the speech is occurring in the City's Municipal Government Building, which is open to the public, and has permitted public use for speech purposes for many years.

All content-based restrictions on speech conducted in a public or designated public forum are subject to strict scrutiny. Under the strict scrutiny standard, the government has the burden to show that a law is narrowly tailored, using the least restrictive means, to reach a compelling governmental interest. Content-based restrictions on speech arise when the government regulates either subject-matter based speech, or viewpoint based speech. Content-neutral speech conducted in a public or designated public forum must further an important government interest, be narrowly tailored, leave alternatives for speech open, but need not be the least restrictive means available.

Here, Old Ways would first argue that its five-foot diameter symbol of the sun constitutes symbolic speech, as it symbolizes the religion organization's beliefs. It would then argue that the Building Authority's Policy on Seasonal Displays ("Policy") is a content-based regulation because it bars the use of "religious displays and symbols" rather than all symbols and/or displays. If it successfully shows that the Policy is content-based, the city has the burden to establish a compelling interest, and that the Policy is narrowly tailored to reach that interest.

The City will likely argue that the purpose of the policy is not to stop symbolic speech, but to avoid the appearance of government endorsement of religion, which likely qualifies as a compelling interest. It would then argue that completely barring religious symbols and displays is the least restrictive means of accomplishing this goal. Although such an argument may be persuasive in a vacuum, these facts do not indicate that the Policy is the least restrictive means available. Old Ways offered to put up a disclaimer along with its symbol, stating that the sun is not endorsed by the City, but the Building Authority rejected this offer. Such an option restricts Old Ways' speech less, while arguably avoiding government endorsement of religion, but the Building Authority will not allow it. The City's refusal to adopt a less restrictive alternative is a failure to meet the requirements of strict scrutiny.

Prior Restraint. Old Ways can also argue that the Policy is an impermissible prior restraint on speech. Prior restraints are subject to strict scrutiny because they put a barrier on speech before the speech can occur. One such type of prior restraint is a permit that permits speech. To be valid, a permit must further an important government interest, involve little to no discretion by the person or group issuing the permit, there must be clear criteria to obtain the permit, and there must be a procedure in place for timely resolution of the permit and/or an immediate appeal of a decision.

Here, the fact that Old Ways needs a permit to display its sun arguably constitutes a prior restraint. Old Ways would argue that the permit requirement is impermissible because the Building Authority does not have a clear description of what items are and are not permitted to be displayed, beyond a bar on the religious symbols. Because the Building Authority decided to put up a Christmas tree, Old Ways can argue that the standards are not applied in an equal way because certain religious symbols are permitted (the Christmas tree), while other symbols (the sun) are not permitted. Also, Old Ways can point out that the Building Authority uses discretion in determining what to erect in the government building, and that there is no set policy in place for review of a decision rejecting a display. The City may, again, argue that its interest in avoiding the appearance of government endorsement of religion permits the permit requirement, and that there is no discretion involved in the policy because the City completely bars the use of any religious displays and symbols. It will also argue that the Christmas tree does not constitute a religious symbol. However, it is unlikely that the City will prevail in these arguments because there is no set procedure in place for determining who gets a permit, nor an appeals process for rejection of the permit.

Overbreadth. A government regulation of speech is overbroad and invalid where it regulates more speech than intended.

Old Ways may also argue that the Policy is an overbroad regulation of speech. It is unlikely that it will succeed in this argument, however, as the Policy clearly applies to "religious displays and symbols" and there are no facts indicating that the Policy has extended to restrict speech beyond religious speech.

Vagueness. A regulation of speech is vague and invalid where it is unclear what speech is prohibited and what speech is not prohibited.

Old Ways could argue that the Policy is vague because it does not define exactly what constitutes a religious display and symbol. It can argue that because the Christmas tree is not considered a religious symbol, the Policy is vague because Christmas trees are often interpreted to be religious symbols. Such an argument might succeed here. The Building Authority's position is that "courts treat Christmas trees as secular symbols," but the Policy itself does not include a description of what does and does not constitute religious displays or symbols. The lack of specificity in the Policy results in confusion, and thus Old Ways likely will succeed in challenging the Policy on vagueness grounds.

First Amendment Right to Freedom of Religious Expression

Old Ways can also contend that the new policy on seasonal displays unjustifiably infringes upon its freedom to exercise its religion. The general rule regarding freedom of expression is that neutral laws of general applicability that have the effect of infringing on freedom of expression do not violate the right to freedom of expression. However, when a law is not neutral, strict scrutiny applies, requiring the government to show that the law is necessary to further a compelling government interest, and that the law is the least restrictive means possible.

Here, Old Ways would argue that the Policy is not neutral because it bars religious displays and symbols specifically, not just any displays and symbols. Old Ways would also point out that the policy interferes with its ability to spread its Winter Greeting, which is an important aspect of its religion. Thus, strict scrutiny likely applies. As explained above, although the City may have a compelling interest in avoiding government endorsement of religion, the policy is not the least restrictive means available. Thus, Old Ways will likely succeed in challenging the Policy on freedom of expression grounds.

First Amendment Right That the Government Will Not Establish Religion

Old Ways can also contend that the Policy, in practice, establishes religion.

Establishment Clause. The government may not establish a particular religion under the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment. To determine whether government action violates the establishment clause, the court applies what is called the Lemon test, which analyzes the government action under 3 prongs: (1) whether the government action has a secular purpose, (2) whether the action has the effect of promoting or inhibiting a particular religion or religion in general, and (3) whether the action results in excessive entanglement between the government and religion.

Secular Purpose. Here, Old Ways may concede that the purpose of the Policy is secular, and a court would likely agree. The Policy states outright that it is meant to avoid the appearance of government endorsement of religion, and so the first prong does not indicate a violation of the establishment clause.

Effect. Old Ways will argue that the effect of the Policy actually inhibits its religion and promotes a certain religion -- Christianity -- because the Building Authority permitted erection of a Christmas tree but no other religious symbols. The court would likely agree that the effect does promote Christianity and not other religions because the Christmas tree -- and only the Christmas tree -- is displayed. Had the Building Authority permitted other types of symbols along with the Christmas tree, the effect may not be to promote Christianity, but the winter season generally. Thus, this factor supports a finding that the Policy establishes religion.

Entanglement. Finally, Old Ways would argue that the Policy results in excessive entanglement between the government and religion. The City would argue that the Policy seeks to avoid religious involvement completely. Although the Policy appears on its face to attempt to avoid entanglement with religion, because the Building Authority erected the Christmas tree, the City's position is weaker, and the court may find that entanglement has occurred because the Building Authority has permitted an arguably religious symbol, but not others.

Balancing the three factors, it is likely that Old Ways' argument would succeed, and that the court would find that the Policy, as applied by the Building Authority, establishes religion, and is unconstitutional.

Answer B

First Amendment: Freedom of Speech

Old Ways Fellowship will argue that the Building Authority's (BA) "Policy on Seasonal Displays" violates its right to free speech under the First Amendment.

State Action

In order for Old Ways to challenge the Policy under the Constitution there must be state action. Here, BA is the City's agency that issued the policy restricting religious displays and symbols from government property. Thus, since BA is a branch of the City, there is state action.

Content-Based vs. Content-Neutral

Old Ways' success under the First Amendment Free speech clause will depend on whether the Policy is found to be content-based or content-neutral. Here, BA adopted the Policy on Seasonal Displays which expressly prohibits "religious" displays and symbols on government property but does not appear to apply to non-religious displays. Old Ways will argue that the policy does not restrict groups or organizations from displaying other forms of artwork or paintings but directly is singling out religious displays and other secular symbols. Thus, the policy will likely be found to be content-based.

City may try and argue that the Policy does not single out a particular religion and thus it should be found to be content neutral but this is a weaker argument since religious content, by itself, is a category of speech and thus the policy will likely be found to focus on this content.

Strict Scrutiny

Laws that are content-based and restrict speech must pass strict scrutiny. The government bears the burden of showing that the law or statute is necessary to achieve a compelling state interest with no less discriminatory alternatives.

City/BA will claim that the policy is designed to prohibit the appearance of government endorsement of religion. City will further attempt to show that certain symbols are clearly religiously oriented and that simply by their presence in the Municipal building, this gives off the impression that the City endorses the religions associated with those symbols or displays. The prevention of endorsement of religion is likely a compelling interest since the First Amendment does not permit the government to favor one religion over another.

The weakness in City's arguments is that the law does not appear to be necessary, even if the City has a compelling interest in preventing the appearance of religious endorsement. Old Ways will argue that the City has a long history of allowing it to display its Winter Solstice display along with a variety of other public and private speakers and displays in the lobby. Old Ways will claim that the city is randomly choosing to single out religious displays by completely preventing them in government buildings via its new Policy. The law is likely not necessary to achieve the City's interest here.

As Old Ways will point out, there are less discriminatory alternatives in achieving the City's desired purpose. Old Ways offered to put up a disclaimer sign explaining that the Winter Solstice greeting is not endorsed by City. Presumably people that take the time to observe the displays in the Municipal building would also notice the disclaimer assuming it was prominently displayed beside the various displays. This would be sufficient to allow Old Ways to continue its time-honored tradition of wishing people a Happy Winter Solstice through its display while not suggesting that City endorses Old Ways religious beliefs. City could also hand out pamphlets at the entrances to government buildings describing its policy of allowing the displays and putting the disclaimer there as well.

Thus, as strict scrutiny is a difficult standard to meet, it appears that BA will have a difficult time showing the policy is necessary when there are less discriminatory alternatives present. The law should be struck down as unconstitutional.

Time, Manner, Place

Even if the court were to find that the BA Policy is not content-based but rather is content-neutral because it does not single out any particular religion and appears to apply to all religions equally, Old Ways will argue that it is still an invalid time, place and manner regulation.

Time, manner and place regulations are permitted for content neutral and viewpoint neutral regulations depending on the type of location where the speech is being regulated. Traditionally, public forums are those that have historically been open to the public such as sidewalks and parks, while designated or limited public forums are those that the government has chosen to hold open to public speech but can close at any time. Public forums and designated/limited public forums must meet intermediate scrutiny, such that the law is substantially related to an important government and there must be other nondiscriminatory alternatives available.

Here, the Policy is affecting government buildings, including the lobby of the Municipal building. A lobby of a government building would not be a public forum but rather a designated public forum since it appears that City has for some time chosen to allow various organizations to put their displays and speakers in the lobby of the Municipal building. City could certainly close off the lobby to such displays if it wanted to.

Old Ways will argue that, while City may have an important interest, even a compelling interest as discussed above, in preventing the appearance of government endorsed religion, the Policy is simply not substantially related to this interest. Furthermore City will have the burden of demonstrating the substantial relation. City will likely claim that the law is substantially related because it singles out displays from buildings that are government owned and that the Policy only focuses on the interior of government buildings. City will claim that there are other nondiscriminatory alternatives such as Old Ways displaying its displays outside the buildings or on the plazas in front of the building. This argument will likely fail however, because while Old Ways may indeed have other options for displaying its Winter Solstice display, it cannot join the other displays that are permitted to be inside the Municipal building and this particular location is where people have come to expect to see the Winter Solstice display each year.

Therefore, because the Policy still singles out only religious displays from government buildings, the City may have a difficult time prevailing on a time manner place argument since there are other less discriminatory options that would allow Old Ways to actually continue to display the displays inside the building while notifying viewers that there is no endorsement by City of any particular religion.

Symbolic Speech

Old Ways will argue that the policy impermissibly regulates symbolic speech. Symbolic speech can be regulated if it is done in a way that is unrelated to the suppression of speech and if there are other less discriminatory alternatives.

City will argue that by adopting the Policy it was not attempting to regulate Old Ways' right to free speech through the Winter Solstice displays. While there may be other alternatives, as previously mentioned, for Old Ways to continue this form of symbolic expression, City will likely lose on the ground that the Policy was related to the suppression of speech. The Policy directly bans symbols and displays with religious content. Thus, it would appear that the BA, in considering the adoption of the Policy, had a direct motive to regulate what types of displays would and would not be allowed.

Furthermore, Old Ways will argue that City continues to allow the display of Christmas trees in the buildings and that Christmas trees are typically associated with a religious holiday. Thus the policy may be found to impermissibly regulate only certain religious symbolic speech while other groups attempting to display Christmas displays will be allowed.

Since Old Ways' displays are not permitted in the buildings and the policy directly and expressly provides for this, the law will likely be found to be an unconstitutional restriction of symbolic speech.

Vagueness and Overbreadth

Old Ways may bring a vagueness or overbreadth challenge to the Policy. Laws are vague if one cannot tell what speech is banned and what is permitted. Overbreadth laws are those that impermissibly burden more speech than is allowed.

Here, the Policy could be struck down as vague because it does not define what exactly constitutes religious displays; thus it is insufficient to put one on notice as to whether its display is or is not affected by the policy. Furthermore, the policy may be overbroad in that it bans all symbols and displays, even if they do not have any religious meaning associated with them. Old Ways may or may not succeed on these grounds.

Free Exercise of Religion

The free exercise clause of the Constitution prohibits the government from preventing one's free exercise of his or her religion. Laws of general applicability are permissible while laws that target a specific religion must meet strict scrutiny.

Here, the Policy, while it does apply to all religious displays and symbols, does not appear to single out any particular religion. Nor is there any evidence of BA singling out Old Ways' particular religious beliefs as a motive for adopting the law. Thus, Old Ways would have a better likelihood of success challenging the policy under the Establishment clause.

Establishment Clause

Old Ways will argue that the Policy respects an establishment of religion since the City is allowed to display Christmas trees while other religious displays and symbols are banned. The Establishment clause prohibits the government from respecting the establishment of a religion. If a law has a secular purpose on its face, it must meet strict scrutiny. Laws that are not secular on their face must pass the three part lemon test.

First the law must have a nonsecular purpose. Here, the law bans all religious displays and symbols. If the court finds that this is a secular purpose because it specifically targets religious displays, then this requirement will fail.

Second, the law must neither advance nor inhibit religion. The law appears not to advance religion since it bans displays to prevent government endorsement of religion so this requirement is satisfied.

Third, the law must lead to no excessive government entanglement with religion. Here, the problem is that the City policy is banning Old Ways displays while allowing the erection of a Christmas tree in the same space as where Old Ways displays were permitted. Thus, the court may find that the policy impermissibly entangles the government with religion if it finds that the City is really making space for its own preferred religious displays while forcing out other displays such as Old Ways that it finds unattractive or not interesting.

Thus, Old Ways may have a colorable claim under the Establishment Clause.

Q6 Remedies

Angela hired Mark, a real estate broker, to help her find a house to buy.

A week later, Mark contacted Angela and told her that he had found the perfect house for her. She asked him what he knew about the house. He said that the house had been owned for some years by Carol, who had kept it in pristine condition. When she visited the house, Angela noticed what appeared to be animal droppings on the deck. Carol assured her that they were only bird droppings, had never appeared previously, and would be removed before closing. Carol added that she never had any problem with any kind of "pests." Angela made an offer of $500,000 for the house, and Carol accepted.

After closing, Angela spent $10,000 to move her household goods to the house. A few weeks after moving into the house, Angela made several discoveries. First, the house suffered from a seasonal infestation of bats, which urinated and defecated on the deck. Second, Carol was in fact Mark's cousin, had owned the house for about a year, and had been desperate to sell it because of the bats. Mark was aware of all of these facts.

After the sale, Mark evenly split the proceeds with Carol and invested his $250,000 in stocks that are now worth $750,000.

At trial, Angela has established that Mark and Carol are liable to her in tort and contract.

1. What remedy or remedies may Angela obtain against Carol? Discuss.

2. What remedy or remedies may Angela obtain against Mark? Discuss.

Answer A

1. Angela v. Carol

Rescission

Angela (A) may seek to have the contract with Carol (C) for the sale of the house rescinded. There must be grounds for the rescission and no defenses preventing it. A asked C about animal droppings she saw on the back deck and C assured A that they were only bird droppings and had never appeared previously. C then added, on her own, that she never had any problem with pests. These statements amount to a material misrepresentation of fact by C to A. A material misrepresentation is grounds for rescission if the seller made a misrepresentation of a fact that a reasonable buyer would have relied on and the buyer did in fact rely on the statements. While generally the doctrine of caveat emptor applies to omissions, there is implied in every land contract a duty not to make material misrepresentations. Generally the failure to mention a material fact is not actionable, though in some instances a court may hold the seller liable for known latent defects. However, here, C affirmatively represented, of her own accord, the fact that there were no problems with pests. And C also misrepresented the fact that the droppings were from bats that seasonally infest the house. These assurances made by C to A are of the type reasonably relied on by a buyer, since a buyer can't inspect a house for a whole year, she must rely on the seller's representation regarding seasonal conditions. Here, A did in fact rely on the misrepresentation. Thus, A has grounds for rescission.

C may try to bring the defenses of laches or unclean hands, however, A did nothing wrong to make her hands unclean and she discovered the infestation within weeks of the sale. This short period of time did not unfairly prejudice C so laches does not apply either.

Compensatory Damages

Compensatory damages aim to make the plaintiff whole, to put them in the position they would have been in had the contract been fully and properly performed. Here, A expected to own a house free of infestation. With the contract rescission, A has a right to the return of the price paid for the house plus any consequential and incidental damages. Consequential damages are those damages specific to the plaintiff that were foreseeable at the time the contract was entered. Incidental costs are those associated with dealing with the breach. Here, A is entitled to a return of the purchase price ($500,000) plus the costs associated with moving her household goods into the house since it was foreseeable at the time of contract that she would need to move her items ($10,000) plus any other incidental damages incurred in dealing with the breach (for instance, moving out costs or protecting her personal property from damage from the bats).

Punitive Damages

Punitive damages are not awarded in contracts claims. However, C's misrepresentations likely raise to the level of fraud and are thus actionable under tort law. In that case, C may be liable for penal damages for fraud. See discussion below regarding Mark's liability for penal damages.

Restitutionary Damages

Alternatively, A may recover restitutionary damages from C. Restitutionary damages seek to prevent the defendant from being unjustly enriched. The plaintiff may recover the reasonable value of the benefit received by the defendant. Here, C was unjustly enriched when she received the full contract price of $500,000 for a house she knew to be seasonally infested with bats. A could recover the benefit to C of the contract price. However, the house was likely worth something, just not the full contract price. So any restitutionary recovery will likely look at the fair market value of the house as is (with infestation) and award A the difference between the contract price and the fair market value.

Note that A may not recover both compensatory and restitutionary damages and thus will likely elect compensatory as the larger amount of damages.

Constructive Trust / Equitable Lien

A may get a constructive trust or an equitable lien over the compensatory or restitutionary money damages due to her. (See rules below)

2. Angela v. Mark

Angela may have entered into a contract with Mark (M) for his brokerage services but more likely he was held liable in tort for fraud. Fraud is the intentional misrepresentation of a past or present fact, made with the intent that the other rely on it and the other does reasonably rely. M was C's cousin, he knew of the bat infestation and that C was desperate to sell the house. He told A that the house was in pristine condition and he stood by while C represented that the house was free of any infestation. M also received half the proceeds from the house.

Compensatory Damages

See rule above. A may recover the full cost of the house as well as the cost of moving in ($510,000), which represents the position she would have been in if the tort had not occurred. If M had not committed a fraud and induced A to purchase the house, she would not have spent the money to purchase and move in to the bat infested house.

Punitive Damages

If a defendant acts wantonly, willfully or maliciously, the plaintiff may also recover punitive damages as long as she recovers either compensatory or nominal damages as well (and sometimes restitutionary). Punitive damages seek to punish the defendant for his willful wrongdoing. Here, M was related to C and knew of the poor condition of the house. He knew that the house was infested and that C was desperate to sell because of the bats. This knowledge made M's actions in showing the house to A, representing that it was in pristine condition and not warning A of the bats willful. Thus, A will likely recover punitive damages for M's willful conduct.

Note: As mentioned above, C may also be liable for fraud and her active misrepresentations could also be found to be willful and malicious. Thus, A may also recover punitive damages from C in connection with the compensatory or restitutionary damages owed by C.

Restitutionary Damages

See rule above. M has been unjustly enriched since he received half the proceeds from the sale to A which was based on his fraud. He may have also received a broker’s fee, also an unjust enrichment. A is entitled to the reasonable value of this benefit. Here, M received a $250,000 benefit. Thus, A may recover $250,000.

Constructive Trust / Equitable Lien

A constructive trust is a court order that the defendant hold the property in trust for the benefit of the plaintiff and return the property to the plaintiff, along with any enhanced value. If the property is no longer available but may be traced to another form, as long as it can be traced with certainty, the plaintiff may still recover the value of the property by tracing. Here, A may seek a constructive trust on M's $250,000. M invested the money in stocks that are now worth $750,000. Because the original $250,000 can be clearly traced to the stocks, A may recover the full, enhanced value of the property. Thus A is entitled to the stocks which are now worth $750,000.

An equitable lien is a court-imposed security interest in the property which must be sold and the proceeds returned to the plaintiff. If the sale results in less money than is owed, the plaintiff may get a deficiency judgment and a lien on the defendant's other property to secure that judgment. However, the plaintiff may not recover any enhanced value in the property. Tracing may also be used to ensure return of the property. Here, A could get an equitable lien on the stocks (traceable from the money M received) and force a sale of the stocks in order to receive the $250,000 of restitutionary damages she is owed. She would not be entitled to the full $750,000 under an equitable lien.

Thus, A will seem a constructive trust in order to recover the restitutionary damages owed to her.

Answer B

2. Angela's remedies against Carol.

The issue is to what remedies Angela is entitled to obtain against Carol for Carol's liability in tort and contract.

In contract

Damages for breach of contract can either be legal or equitable.

Legal Remedies

Damages

The typical measure of damages in contract is the expectation measure. That is, the non-breaching party to a contract is entitled to be put in the same position that she would have been in had the other party not breached the contract. Here, at the end of the contract, Angela expected to be in possession of a house that was in "pristine condition" that did not have a bat infestation.

Presumably, the seasonal bat infestation reduced the market value of the house and Angela would not have paid $500,000 for the house had she known of it. Therefore, in order to protect Angela's expectation, she is entitled to receive the difference between $500,000 contract price and the market value of the house at the time of closing.

Angela is not entitled to her $10,000 of moving expenses as damages because she would have had to spend that amount if the house was in the condition she expected it to be, regardless of the bats.

Finally, Angela has not suffered any consequential damages from the purchase of the house (losses that are foreseeable at the time of contract) and punitive damages are not recoverable in contract.

Restitution

Angela may also recover on a restitution theory. Restitution is a remedy that is used to avoid unjust enrichment from a party's wrongdoing. Here, due to Carol's misrepresentations, she was able to sell the house at a price above its market value. Therefore, Angela may recover the difference in the contract price and the fair market value of the house at the time of closing.

Again, Angela is not entitled to the $10,000 in moving expenses in restitution because those moving expenses were paid to a mover, not to Carol.

Equitable Remedies

Rescission

Rescission of a contract is an equitable remedy whereby the contract is rescinded as if it never happened. Essentially, the party seeking rescission must argue that the contract was never formed because there was no meeting of the minds. If the contract here is rescinded, Angela would receive her $500,000 purchase price while Carol would be put back in possession of the house. Grounds for rescission include: mistake and misrepresentation.

There are two types of mistake: Mutual Mistake and Unilateral Mistake. Mutual mistake exists where both parties to a contract are mistaken as to a fact that substantially affects the basis of their bargain. Here, Carol was not mistaken about any facts with regard to the contract--she knew of the bat infestation and its effects.

Angela will be able to successfully argue unilateral mistake. Unilateral mistake is not typically a grounds for rescission. However, when the non-mistaken party knows of the mistake of the other party and proceeds with knowledge in the face of that mistake, the mistaken party may rescind the contract. Here, because Angela did not know of the bat infestation, and Carol both knew of the infestation and knew that Angela did not know of it, unilateral mistake is applicable and Angela may rescind on that ground.

In addition to the ground of unilateral mistake, Angela may rescind on grounds of misrepresentation. Misrepresentation occurs when a party makes a material misrepresentation, with the intent that the other party rely on the statement, the reliance is justified, the other party does indeed rely on the statement and that party suffers damage. Here, Carol misrepresented that she had never seen the droppings before and that they were bird droppings. She intended for Angela to rely on the statement and Angela did indeed rely on the statement and suffer damages. The only issue is whether Angela's reliance was justified. Considering that Mark said that Carol kept the home pristine and Angela was assured by Carol, the homeowner, regarding the condition of the house, Angela's reliance was likely justified. Carol may be able to argue that Angela should have hired an independent appraiser of the house instead of relying on her statement, but this argument will fail because Angela's reliance was justified given Mark's corroboration of the condition of the house.

Therefore, the equitable remedy of rescission is warranted on grounds of unilateral mistake and misrepresentation and Angela should be entitled to her $500,000, and the house will be returned to Carol.

In Tort

Legal Remedies

Damages

Angela may sue Carol for damages in the amount that Carol's misrepresentation cost her. Therefore, she should be able to recover the amount that will be required to fix the bat infestation and any damage already caused by the bats.

In addition, Angela may be able to recover punitive damages from Carol because of Carol's outrageous lies and conduct. Not only did Carol lie about the droppings and that she had never seen them before, she had been desperate to sell the house and was Mark's cousin, with whom she perpetrated a fraud on Angela. Typically, punitive damages are limited to a cap of less than ten times the actual damages.

Equitable Remedies

Constructive Trust

A constructive trust is a restitutionary equitable remedy. If a constructive trust is imposed, the defendant must return the property to the plaintiff. A constructive trust will be imposed when 1) the defendant holds title to property, 2) title was acquired by the defendant's wrongful conduct, and 3) retention of the property would result in the unjust enrichment of the defendant. Typically, the plaintiff will pursue a constructive trust when the value of the property increases while the defendant has held the property.

Here, Carol holds the proceeds from the sale, she acquired it with wrongful conduct as discussed above, and retention of the proceeds would result in unjust enrichment. However, the legal remedies described above are adequate to remedy Angela's harm. Therefore, the court should not grant this remedy.

Equitable Lien

An equitable lien is also a restitutionary equitable remedy. If an equitable lien is imposed, the plaintiff will acquire a security interest in the property and the property will be subject to an immediate court ordered sale, and the plaintiff will be entitled to the proceeds. An equitable lien will be granted upon the same conditions as a constructive trust.

Angela will be able to show the conditions for imposition of an equitable lien have been met. However, the legal remedies described above are adequate to remedy Angela's harm. Therefore, the court should not grant this remedy.

3. Angela's remedies against Mark.

Equitable Remedies

Constructive Trust

The requirements of a constructive trust are listed above. Because the source of the funds used to purchase the stock is directly traceable to his unjust enrichment from the transaction, Angela will be able to force Mark to turn over the stock to her in a constructive trust. She will be entitled to keep the entire value of the stock.

Equitable Lien

Angela will be able to show she is entitled to an equitable lien. The court will trace the proceeds that Mark used to purchase the stock to his unjust enrichment from his involvement in the transaction, and Angela will be granted a security interest in the property. Then, the stock will be subject to sale and Angela will be entitled to receive Mark's $250,000.

Q1 Professional Responsibility

Patty was hit by a car, whose driver did not notice her because he was texting. Joe, a journalist, wrote a story about Patty's "texting" accident. Patty contacted Tom, a real estate attorney, and asked him to represent her in a claim against the driver. Tom agreed, and entered into a valid and proper contingency fee agreement. Tom later told Patty that he had referred her case to Alan, an experienced personal injury attorney, and she did not object. Unknown to Patty, Alan agreed to give one-third of his contingency fee to Tom.

Thereafter, Alan sent a $200 gift certificate to Joe with a note stating: "In your future coverage of the 'texting' case, you might mention that I represent Patty."

Patty met with Alan and told him that Walter, a homeless man, had seen the driver texting just before the accident. Alan then met with Walter, who was living in a homeless shelter, and said to him: "Look, if you will testify truthfully about what you saw, I'll put you up in a hotel until you can get back on your feet."

1. What ethical violation(s), if any, has Tom committed? Discuss.

2. What ethical violation(s), if any, has Alan committed? Discuss.

Answer according to both California and ABA authorities.

Answer A

(1) What ethical violations, if any, has Tom (T) committed?

Lawyer/Client relationship

A lawyer owes duties to his client as soon as the relationship is formed. The relationship is formed even if the client never retains the lawyer but approaches him regarding legal representation.

Here, the relationship between P and T began as soon as she contacted him and asked him to represent her in a claim against the driver who hit her. Even though P never retained or ultimately 'hired' T, he owes her duties as his client from this point forward.

Duty of Competence

Under ABA and CA, a lawyer (L) owes his client the duty of competence, which requires using the requisite skill, preparation, thoroughness, and knowledge to adequately represent his client's interests. If an L is not competent in an area of law, he must become competent without undue expense or delay upon the client; otherwise, he should associate with an L who is competent in that area.

Here, T is a real estate attorney who was contacted by P regarding an injury she suffered after a car hit her. P's cause of action is a tort, likely negligence or battery, which is entirely unrelated to real estate. T should not have taken the case if he had no knowledge in this area of law. In fact, T 'later' told P that he referred the case to Alan. This is not 'associating' with an attorney to help with an area of law, nor is it becoming up to speed on the requisite area of law.

T has breached his duty of competence to P because he was not able to represent her interests in a tort claim and did not adequately respond by not taking the case or by the steps noted above.

Referring P's Case to Alan

Duty of Confidentiality

ABA: A lawyer has the duty to maintain all confidential communications acquired in the course of representation. In CA, there is no delineated duty of communication; however, the Attorney's Oath requires lawyers to maintain the client's secrets and confidences.

Here, T has contacted another attorney regarding information he has obtained from P in the course of representation – specifically that she was hit by a car and needs a lawyer, as well as her personal information. T has breached his duty of confidentiality by revealing this information to Alan.

Exceptions to duty of confidentiality – consent

If a client consents, a lawyer may reveal her confidences.

Here, T told P only afterwards that he was referring her case to Alan, an experienced personal injury attorney. While she 'did not object' she certainly did not consent to the disclosure in the first place because she was entirely unaware of it. Second, a non-response will not be considered affirmative consent to disclose. T will not be able to use P's failure to object as evidence of consent.

Duty of Communication

A lawyer has the duty to communicate with his client regarding all stages of representation, to return phone calls and inquiries promptly, and to communicate the ultimate strategy decisions to the client for her decision.

Here, T failed to communicate to P that he did not have the requisite experience to represent her and that he had referred her case to Alan. This is an important juncture for communication that T owed to P; he should have let her know he was unable to take the case but would be able to refer her to someone else.

Referrals & Referral Fees

Under the ABA and CA, a lawyer may refer a client to another lawyer with the informed consent of the client and as long as the referral agreement is 'non-exclusive.' Under the ABA, referral fees are prohibited; under CA, they are permitted as long as the client gives informed consent and the total fees are not increased due to the referral agreement.

Here, T has referred P to A but failed to tell P about the referral, beaching his duty to obtain her consent. Further, it appears T has obtained a referral fee for this referral paid by 1/3 of the contingency fees in this case (see below) which is absolutely prohibited under the ABA. In CA, fees are permitted if the total fees to P did not increase; however, without P's consent this was an improper referral. Further, if A and T have an 'exclusive agreement' to refer to each other, the referral agreement also breaches their duties.

Fee splitting among lawyers

Fee splitting is prohibited by both the ABA and CA with non-lawyers. However, under the ABA, a lawyer may split fees with another lawyer if (i) it is in proportion to the services rendered or both L's are jointly and severally liable, (ii) the total fee is reasonable, (iii) the client gives informed consent, and (iv) the total fee is not increased. In CA, an L may split fees with a non-lawyer if (i) the total fee is not unconscionable, and (ii) the client gives written consent.

Here, T has entered into a fee sharing agreement with A to give 1/3 of a contingency fee to T. Under the ABA, this is not going to be 'in proportion' to the services rendered by T because it is likely he will not be engaging in the litigation that is outside of his practice area. However, if T remains jointly and severally liable, he may rebut this requirement. However, there was no consent given by P per this fee splitting arrangement so the agreement violates the rules under the ABA regarding splitting. The total 'fee' will be determined reasonable because it is not 'increased' as a contingency fee.

This arrangement under the ABA is a violation of fee splitting because it was not consented to in writing by P and it is not in proportion to the efforts to be made by T.

In CA, lawyers may split fees in the fashion A and T did as long as the total fee is not unconscionable and there is written disclosure to P. While the total fee will be determined as a percentage of the contingency, it is clear that P did not consent to this arrangement because "unknown to P" A agreed to give 1/3 of the fee to T. T has breached the fee splitting rules under CA as well.

Contingency Fees

Contingency fees are fees to be paid as a percentage of a successful judgment. Under the ABA and in CA, contingency fee agreements must be (i) in writing, (ii) signed by the client, (iii) describing the duties of the lawyer and client, (iv) the percentage of fees to be taken for the lawyer, and (v) whether these fees are before or after legal fees have been paid. CA additionally requires the L to note that the fees are negotiable and to indicate how legal fees not covered by the contingency will be paid.

Here, T has entered into a contingency fee agreement with A, the subsequent attorney, not P, the client. P has not signed any agreements, no agreement in writing has been made, there is no description of duties and a percentage has not been indicated. This is a violation of a lawyer's duties regarding fees.

(2) What ethical violations, if any, has Alan (A) committed?

Attorney-Client Relationship

See above.

Here, A has obtained P's information from T regarding representing her in his capacity as a personal injury attorney. Therefore, because this is related to legal representation, A owes P duties as his client.

A and T's fee arrangement

Unknown to P, A agreed to give T 1/3 of the contingency fee to T, violating many of the same rules as T under this agreement.

Referral fees

See above.

A breached his duty related to referral fees under the ABA in relation to giving part of the contingency to T which is likely a 'fee' and under CA because this was without the consent of P.

Fee splitting

See above.

For the same reasons noted above, the fee splitting arrangement between A and T is prohibited by both CA and ABA.

Fees Generally

Under the ABA, fees must be reasonable and agreed upon by the client (consented to) in writing. In CA, the fees must be 'not unconscionable' and agreed upon (consented to) by the client in writing.

Here, it is unclear whether the contingency fee that A will be taking for this case is either reasonable or 'not unconscionable' under the ABA and CA respectively; however, because the fee was likely determined in advance of A ever meeting with P, A breached his duty to P regarding fees because they were not consented to by P.

Contingency Fees

See above.

For the reasons noted above, A also breached his duty regarding contingency fees to P for failure to get them in writing, with the required terms under both ABA and CA.

$200 gift from A to Joe

Duty of Fairness

A lawyer owes the duty to the legal profession to maintain the public confidence, dignity, and efficiency of the legal system and the profession. Additionally, even those actions by an attorney that are not specifically prohibited by the ABA or CA professional conduct rules, or the law, may still be prohibited if they reflect poorly on the profession.

Here, A sent money to a journalist asking him to write in his newspaper coverage of the 'texting case' that A represents P. While it is generally public information as soon as a case is filed who is being represented by whom, this is an improper action by A to have a news organization write something in his favor so he gets public notoriety or even advertisement for his services. This reflects poorly on the profession because not only did A ask to be mentioned, he seems to have 'bribed' the journalist by sending a $200 gift certificate. This is an unethical move that will be looked down upon as not maintaining the public confidence in the profession.

Advertisements

Solicitation

Out-of-court statements regarding a case

A lawyer may not make public statements that are substantially likely to materially prejudice the case. He may comment on those topics that are generally public knowledge (who the parties are, what the cause of action is) and he may conduct 'damage control' if his client has been prejudiced.

Here, A is looking to have information publically noted about his case in Joe's news organization. He has requested only the fact that he represents P to be printed; therefore, this will not be considered an improper public statement if published because it is public knowledge and does not risk prejudicing the case.

A's meeting with Walter (W)

Meeting with unrepresented persons

A lawyer, if meeting with a person who is not represented by an attorney, must not make any indications that he represents that person's interests or is impartial.

Here, A met with W after finding out he is a potential witness in the P's personal injury case. Upon meeting him, he must indicate that he does not represent W and is not impartial in the case, but rather represents the best interests of his client. It is not clear whether A clearly indicated his position, but by offering W a hotel until he gets back on his feet, W may feel his interests are being represented by A, in which case A has breached his duty to express partiality.

Duty of Fairness

See above.

A lawyer has the duty to refrain from altering or obstructing access to legally discoverable evidence.

Here, A has contacted a witness with personal knowledge of the accident and indicated he would put him up in a hotel. This may make W harder to find for the opposing party and unfairly influence his testimony, in effect, altering the evidence. A's actions also reflect poorly on the legal profession because it is not an honest or ethical action to pay homeless individuals to testify by baiting them with a hotel room until they are back on their feet – something that A may not ultimately do for W and creating a significant risk of biased testimony.

Improperly influencing a witness

A lawyer may not pay a witness for their testimony. If it is an expert witness, the expert witness's expenses for travel and time away from work may be paid for.

Here, A has effectively 'paid' a witness in this case by offering to pay W's hotel until he 'gets on his feet.' W is living in a homeless shelter, so moving to a hotel is a very serious and significant 'bribe' for W to do as A wants and W will be regarded as being paid to testify for P because he is receiving a direct benefit for his testimony. This is a violation of A's duty of fairness to opposing counsel and the legal profession by improperly influencing a witness and paying a non-expert witness to testify.

Perjury

ABA and CA: In a civil case, a lawyer must not call a witness whom he knows will perjure himself. An L may not encourage perjury as this violates both his ethical duty and the law.

Here, it is not clear that W will 'perjure' himself, as A has indicated that he wants him to "testify truthfully." However, A has made it seem that if W gives him the testimony that A desires, he will have a hotel until he gets back on his feet – a very big incentive for the witness to do as A desires. By A calling W as a witness whom he has in effect bribed, even with the caveat he told him to testify truthfully, A may be regarded as having suborned perjury should W state anything that is untruthful but bodes well for P and A.

Answer B

TOM'S ETHICAL VIOLATIONS (Real Estate Attorney)

Agreement to Represent Patty

An attorney owes a duty of competence to his clients. An attorney should not agree to represent a client where the subject matter of the case is outside his area of knowledge, unless he can learn the relevant law without undue delay or expense to his client, or he can affiliate himself with an attorney who is experienced in that area of law. Here, Tom is a real estate attorney and he agrees to represent Patty in a personal injury suit. The suit is based on a personal injury claim because Patty was hit by a car whose driver was texting and thus did not notice her. Tom's experience in the area of real estate law does not relate at all to the area of personal injury. Thus, Tom must decline to take the case, learn about the relevant law, or affiliate himself with a knowledgeable personal injury attorney.

Here, Tom will argue that he referred the case to Alan, who is an experienced personal injury attorney, and thus did not violate the duty of competence. However, Tom did not merely affiliate himself with Alan and work with Alan on the case; rather, he referred the entire case to Alan, after entering into a valid representation agreement with Patty. Tom will argue that this may be deemed appropriate because Tom has no experience in the area of personal injury and thus is not competent to represent Patty in a personal injury suit. However, it would have been more appropriate for Tom to decline to take the case in the first place because, as a real estate attorney, he has no experience in personal injury law.

Tom acted appropriately in referring the case to a personal injury attorney, and thus did not violate the duty of competence; however, it would have been more appropriate for him to decline to take a case in the first place where the case necessarily requires knowledge of an area of law in which Tom has no experience.

Referral of Case to Alan for a fee

Under the ABA, an attorney may not refer a case to another attorney for a fee. Under California law, an attorney may refer a client to another attorney for a fee as long as the client is informed. Here, Tom referred Patty to Alan and accepted one-third of the contingency fee as a possible referral fee. Here, Tom did refer Patty's case to Alan, in breach of ABA rules. He also breached California rules because he failed to tell Patty that he made a referral to Alan until after the fact, and did not tell her at the time of the referral. Thus, he violated rules regarding referral of a client for a fee under both ABA and California.

Failure to Communicate to Patty that the case was referred to Alan

An attorney has a duty to communicate with is clients regarding the representation. Here, Tom referred the case to Alan without consulting with Patty first. Because Tom had agreed to represent Patty and had entered into a contingency fee agreement with her, and thus Patty was expecting Tom to be her attorney, Tom should have consulted with Patty and obtained her permission before referring the case to Alan. Because Tom failed to communicate with Patty when he failed to acquire her permission to transfer the case to Alan, Tom violated his duty to communicate with his client.

Contingency Fee Arrangement

A valid contingency fee agreement must be in writing, signed by the client, include the lawyer's percentage, the expenses to be deducted, and whether the lawyer's percentage will be paid prior to or after the expenses are deducted from the award. In California, the agreement must also include a statement as to how services not provided for under the contingency fee agreement will be provided, and that the lawyer's percentage is negotiable. As it appears that a valid and proper contingency agreement was entered into, no ethical violations arise from this agreement.

ALAN'S ETHICAL VIOLATIONS (Personal Injury Attorney)

Fee Splitting with Tom

An attorney may split fees with other attorneys outside of his firm, subject to certain restrictions. Under the ABA, the total fee must be reasonable; under California law, the fee may not be unconscionably high. Further, the client must be informed about the fee splitting and must consent to it. Finally, the fee must be split proportionately in accordance with the relative amount of work that each attorney performs.

Total Fee

Here, we do not know what the total amount of the fee was, but it appears that the total amount was the same amount agreed to under the original contingency fee agreement. We know this because Alan agreed to give one-third of his contingency fee to Tom, and thus Tom's share comes out of the original amount agreed on. Thus, if the original contingency agreement included a valid fee, then there should be no violation regarding the total fee due to the attorneys.

Informing the client

Here, Patty was not informed of the agreement between Tom and Alan. Because Patty should have been informed about the fee-splitting arrangement between Tom and Alan, the failure to notify her of the agreement constitutes a violation of fee-splitting rules under both the ABA and California law.

Proportionately splitting the fee

Here, Tom appears to be doing none of the work and Alan is doing all of the work in the representation of Patty's case. Under the rules on fee splitting, Tom should thus receive none of the fee and Alan should receive the entire fee. Because Alan has actually promised to give Tom one-third of his contingency fee, where Tom is not performing any of the work, Alan has violated the rules on fee splitting.

Alan has violated the rules on splitting fees with attorneys outside his firm, because he did not inform Patty that he was giving Tom one-third of the contingency fee, and because the fee is not split in proportion to the amount of work that each attorney is actually performing in the representation.

Gift to Joe and Request that Joe Report Alan's Representation of Patty

An attorney has a duty of candor to the public. An attorney may not attempt to influence the press by granting gifts to journalists. Because a journalist has a duty to report fairly and in a manner that is not unduly affected by outside influences, an attorney's attempt to interfere with a journalist's duty of fair reporting constitutes a violation of the duty of candor. Here, Alan gave Joe a $200 gift certificate with a note stating that Joe might include the fact that Alan is representing Patty when Joe is covering the case. The gift certificate would appear to be a means of attempting to influence the journalist's coverage, in that Joe might feel compelled to actually include information favorable to Alan when reporting the case. The gift certificate might be seen as a gift, but it might also be seen as payment. Alan will argue that he is simply requesting that Joe include truthful information in his coverage, such as the fact of Alan's representation, and that the information does not influence the case in any way. However, because Alan made a gift and is attempting to influence the journalist's coverage of the case, he has violated a duty of candor to the public.

Advertising

Attorney advertising must abide by certain rules. An attorney cannot engage in real-time phone or live contact with prospective clients with whom he has no prior personal or business relationship. Any advertising must be labeled attorney advertising, it cannot make any misrepresentations or be misleading, and it must state the name of at least one attorney responsible for the material. In California, making any guarantees or warranties as to results is considered presumptively improper and constitutes a misrepresentation.

Here, Alan is essentially attempting to purchase advertising from Joe, by "paying" Joe with a gift certificate and asking Joe to essentially include Alan's name in coverage of the texting accident. This appears to constitute advertising, but in a way that makes it appear that it is not advertising. The news article will be read by the public as impartial news, and will not be labeled advertising, even though Alan "purchased" the coverage regarding his relationship to the case. Alan will argue that the coverage merely states his representation of Patty, and the article does include his name as a responsible party.

However, if the coverage later states that Alan won the case for Patty, that may constitute a misrepresentation under California law, as the outcome may imply to the public that a certain result is guaranteed, even if it is the case that Patty's success is an anomaly and not indicative of typical results. Thus, depending on how Joe writes the coverage, including the information about Alan could pose an improper misrepresentation or otherwise be misleading to the public in violation of California rules.

Thus, because the coverage of Alan's representation of Patty in the case could be misleading in the message that it sends to the public, and because there would be no express indication in a news article that Alan is essentially advertising his services, Alan is violating the rules regarding proper attorney advertising by asking Joe to include Alan's name in Joe's coverage of the case.

Solicitation

An attorney has a duty not to solicit prospective clients. Solicitation is live or phone contact with potential clients with whom the attorney has no preexisting personal or business relationship. Alan has not violated any solicitation rules because newspaper articles and advertising do not constitute solicitation.

Offering to Put Walter Up in a Hotel

An attorney may pay reasonable expenses for a witness in connection with testimony at trial; however, any payment cannot be made in connection with the witness' testimony at trial. Here, Alan violated both of these rules.

Reasonable expenses

Reasonable expenses in connection with a witness' testimony could include travel expenses, a place to stay and meals during the time that the witness is required to be present at trial. However, here, Walter lives in a homeless shelter and Alan offered Walter a place to stay "until you can get back on your feet." This implies an indefinite period of time, and not just the time necessary for Walter to testify at trial. Because Alan is offering Walter a place to stay for a period of time that potentially exceeds the time of the trial, Alan has violated the rule that he may not pay expenses other than those that are reasonable in connection with a witness' attendance at trial.

Payment in connection with testimony

An attorney may not make the payment of reasonable expenses contingent on a witness' testimony at trial. Here, Alan stated that if Walter will testify truthfully at trial about what he saw, then Alan would put Walter up in a hotel until he can get back on his feet. It appears that Alan is making his offer to pay for a hotel contingent on Walter's truthful testimony at trial. Alan will argue that he simply wants to assure that Walter will testify truthfully, and that he is fulfilling his duty of candor to the court by ensuring truthful witnesses. However, because Alan conditioned his "payment" of a hotel stay to Walter on the nature of Walter's testimony, he violated an ethical rule, nonetheless.

Alan violated the rules regarding the payment of a witness' expenses in connection with testimony at trial because he offered to pay expenses that exceeded a reasonable limit, because he offered to pay for a hotel for an indefinite period of time, and because he conditioned the payment of expenses on the nature of Walter's testimony.

Q2 Constitution

The Legislature of State X recently completed a study on the behavior of teenagers residing in the state that revealed a connection between an increase in the school dropout rate and an increase in the level of criminal activity. The study indicated that the connection was most pronounced among boys ages 15 to 18 years old.

Troubled by what it perceived as a breakdown in personal responsibility and social order among its teenagers, State X's Legislature has enacted a statute creating the State Forestry Corps ("Corps"). The Corps drafts boys ages 15 to 18 who have dropped out of school. It sends them to camps located on public lands administered by the State Forest Service. It also provides them with a comprehensive education leading to a high school diploma. To defray a portion of the costs, the Corps requires the boys to work on reforestation projects for a few hours each day.

Pete, age 15, has dropped out of school and, consequently, has been drafted into the Corps. Pete and his parents have filed a declaratory relief action attacking the validity of the statute under three provisions of the United States Constitution: (1) the Thirteenth Amendment's Involuntary Servitude Clause; (2) the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause; and (3) the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause.

What arguments could Pete or his parents reasonably make in support of their action, and how should the court rule on each? Discuss.

Answer A

State Action

In order to prevail in their constitutional declaratory action under the 13th Amendment, 14th Amendment due process, and 14th Amendment equal protection against State X, Pete and his parents will need to show state action by State X in passing and enforcing the law against them.

The law in question regarding the compulsory forestry school was enacted by State X law and is applicable to Pete. Because the law was passed by State X, its procuring the law and enforcing it will constitute state action against Pete because he stands to be injured as well as Pete's parents so long as they can prove standing.

Standing

The constitution requires that each plaintiff have standing to seek any type of relief under its provisions. It requires (1) actual or certainly imminent injury in fact, (2) causation, and (3) redressability through judicial remedies.

Here, it appears that Pete has been actually drafted by the Corps against his will. Pete stands to face injury in fact because he is compelled against his will to enlist and it is certain that he will enlist if he takes no action. State X law caused the law to be passed and enforced; thus causation is clear. Further, a declaratory judgment deeming the law facially invalid as to Pete will save him from the injury of entering the Corps.

Pete's parents have standing, in their argument, because they are losing their son and being discriminated against in the fundamental right to parent and make choices for their minor child. By compelling Pete to work at the Corps, their fundamental right is arguably undermined and infringed as they cannot choose a school for their son. Thus, they can likely show injury in fact. The State X law caused injury, as above. Also, a declaratory judgment would save the parents from injury as it would give them the fundamental power to make parenting decisions for their child and not be compelled by the State.

11th Amendment Sovereign Immunity

States are protected from being sued in federal court (and in some state courts where states retain traditional sovereign immunity in their own courts) where the action seeks money damages from its treasury. However, declaratory judgments do not seek money damages and may be adjudicated.

Here, the 11th Amendment is not implicated because no plaintiffs seek money damages; rather, they seek declaratory relief and thus the action is not preempted by sovereign immunity concerns.

A. 13th Amendment

The 13th Amendment of the Constitution abolished involuntary servitude in all of the United States. It applies directly to states like State X. Further, it was construed to allow Congress to pass laws which abolish the badges of slavery, which continue to linger, and which allows Congress to make prophylactic legislation to correct existing badges of slavery in the several states. Laws which force servitude to other individuals or the state are invalid absent an exception in federal case law or other federal authority.

Here, Pete will challenge that the law violates the 13th Amendment because the law purports to require three hours of compulsory labor at the Corps per day and that it threatens to infringe on the constitutional mandate against involuntary servitude. The strongest argument against Pete is that, absent a narrow exception for the Amish, the Supreme Court has ruled that states have the right to mandate that all children under the age of 16 be enrolled in compulsory education. This embraces the states' rights to oversee education and welfare of its citizens guaranteed to the states under the 10th Amendment, which states that all states retain power not otherwise usurped by the federal government in the constitution. Thus, the state will argue that since the Corps is educational, and that the forestry work on projects is part of that education, and that because Pete is merely 15 years old, that the requirement is akin to that of requiring students to attend regular public school in a compulsory manner absent special circumstances. The state will argue that Pete is not Amish or that he has a special disability to set him apart from other participants and that he should be required to attend school at the Corps. The goal of the program is educational, just like regular school.

Pete will argue that the Corps's education labor is not aimed at education, but rather at reducing state costs, and thus since the state gains pecuniary benefit the program's work mandate is akin more to slavery than it is akin to formal education. Pete will argue that the program is an alter ego of the state's goal of saving money at the hands of slave labor by him and similarly situated individuals.

Because of the prior Supreme Court mandates regarding the 13th Amendment, and because there is no prophylactic federal legislation to pre-empt education of this kind, Pete will have difficulty showing that the law, as applied to him, infringes on the 13th Amendment's mandates. This is because prior case law allows states to require school attendance under the age of 16. Since Pete is 15, he would need to show special circumstances and argue those to show that he should be an exception to the rule. While the cost-saving goal of the state brings some questions regarding slavery intent, ultimately it prepares Pete for the real world of jobs, which is likely reason enough. Also, the goal of the program is to avoid criminal activity through education for this critical class of young men.

Thus, on balance, Pete would likely fail under a 13th Amendment argument.

B. Due Process

Substantive Due Process

The Constitution guarantees certain fundamental rights to individuals that they will not be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The Supreme Court has interpreted the 5th Amendment, applied to the states via the 14th Amendment, to extend other fundamental privacy rights to individuals as well, which give them rights to procreate, have children, and to raise those children as they please without interference from the state as to that right. When a state infringes on fundamental rights of individuals, such as the right to liberty or the right to privacy, the state must show that the law is narrowly tailored to serve a compelling government interest, the highest judicial scrutiny under constitutional law. This is substantive due process and applies here to State X's Corps law. The burden is on the state to meet the strict scrutiny.

Pete

Pete has a fundamental right to liberty in his person. This includes the right to free movement and not to be compelled in movement of his body by the state without due process of law. Pete has not been adjudicated a criminal or otherwise, and thus the compelled requirement that he attend Corps infringes on his fundamental right to move freely as he pleases has been infringed upon by the law. Because the right of liberty in movement is a fundamental right, the state must show that the Corps law is necessary to further a compelling government interest. Pete will also argue that he has a privacy interest in his body and personal choices.

Pete will argue that the law violates his liberty interest because it compels his movement and participation in the Corps program. He will argue that he is not a criminal and that his rights have not been sacrificed merely because he dropped out.

The state will argue that it has a compelling interest in educating its young men and women below the age of 16. The state will likely prevail on that point. The state will further argue that its concerns regarding criminality avoidance and preserving future peace is compelling. This is also correct as it is part of the state's interest in welfare to protect its citizens. The state will argue that it has rights to dictate the education of its youngsters under the age of 16 under Supreme Court decisions. The state will likely prevail on that point, because of the above rules.

However, Pete will argue that while the purpose of the law is compelling, the means are not narrowly tailored because the program reaches too far in undermining his rights of freedom. The program is at a remote camp, far from a regular school, and subjects students to daily labor that appears to be more physical than other students. Pete will argue that the school would do better to have a day program that is supplemented by the required work and not mandated daily, which is more like prison over the students.

Pete will have the most success on this argument. The state will argue that the means are narrowly tailored because of the woes of young men 15-18 through the study. However, the study does not show that compulsory physical labor is the answer to the problems facing State X teen boys; it is but one idea, and a relatively extreme one at that. The state could have employed its goals in a less infringing fashion on the liberty of its students.

While schools are entitled to more deferential invasions of students' freedoms, such as to discipline as a parent, and to search the student upon reasonable suspicion, the compulsory work mandate does not fall within those categories because of its extreme nature. Because the state's means are not narrowly tailored, the law will be unconstitutional as applied to Pete.

Parents

Parents have a fundamental right in making decisions about how to raise their child. Laws that infringe on parents' right to choose and raise their children are subject to strict scrutiny above. Parents also have a fundamental right to keep a family together.

Here, the law infringes on the parents' rights to choose which school Pete attends because the decision is mandatorily imposed by the state. While the state may require attendance to school under 16, parents' fundamental interest in choice is still fundamental and must generally be deferred to by the state. Here, because the parents could have forced their child to go to school under state law at a different school or done homeschool, for example, the school's infringement by making the parental choice for them infringes on their fundamental right.

The State will argue that their rationale is compelling because of the study indicating criminality with dropout rates. However, as above, the means that it carries out is likely too broad. The parents will show that the concerns could have been met by allowing the parents to choose the schooling forum, rather than the state, and that it hurts their right to decide as parents. Thus, the law is not narrowly tailored.

Further, the parents will argue that they have a fundamental right to keep their family together. The law undermines that right by taking their boy away from them for months at a time. The state's broadly applied law could also apply to children who drop out for good cause, another basis for being too broad. Stripping families apart requires strict scrutiny and narrow laws that fit the purpose well. Here, the action is simply too broad for its extremity on hurting family relations.

Thus, because the parents' fundamental rights to parent and to keep the family together exist, the state failed to show that its law is narrowly tailored and the parents will be successful.

Procedural Due Process

Whenever a fundamental right is infringed upon, generally a plaintiff is entitled to a notice and pre-deprivation hearing prior to the state intentionally depriving that individual of life, liberty, or property. This is procedural due process. Once a fundamental right/liberty is identified, there is a three part balancing required to know whether additional process is necessary.

Here, both Pete and his parents are deprived intentionally of their rights to liberty and privacy (respectively). These are fundamental rights and under the 14th Amendment, State presumptively was required to give notice and hearing with fact finding by a neutral fact finder in determining the rights of the individuals prior to deprivation of those rights. Here, no such process was given to either Pete or his family and the law does not provide for one. In balancing, the court considers (1) weight of interest, (2) interest in additional procedures based on the interest, and (3) efficiency and cost to the government.

Here, the weight of interests is great. Pete faces compulsory servitude to the state as a student and the parents lost their right to parent and choose what is right for their son. A process should have been in place to avoid prejudice.

Further, society has a great interest in liberty of their movement, even for young students, and privacy right of parents is compelling. Without those choices, parents are stripped of their ability to raise their children and protect them.

On balance, an additional process would not be costly to employ by the state; they would simply need to give notice to Pete and his parents, allow for facts to be presented, and make sure that Corps was in Pete's interest and/or that he qualifies for the program. Safeguards should have been in place.

Thus, because fundamental rights were at issue, both Pete and his parents were entitled to due process of law.

Equal Protection

Where a state discriminates based on class either facially or actually and with intent to do so, this triggers equal protection. Laws that discriminate based on fundamental rights trigger strict scrutiny. Laws that discriminate based on sex must be narrowly tailored to serve an important interest with exceedingly persuasive justification. The burden is on the state. Other laws need only further legitimate state reasons and be rationally based and burden is on the challenger.

Pete

Pete will first argue that the law discriminates against him in his exercise of a fundamental right of liberty without adequate justification. Just as under the above arguments, the state will have to show a compelling interest. Here, because of lack of narrowly defined means and the broad requirement of all boys to attend between 15-18 who drop out, the discrimination as to the fundamental right is on the face of the law (boys are clearly required to join the Corps who qualify) and thus the law is unconstitutional as applied to Pete because it infringes on his assertion of his liberty rights. State will argue that it can do so and that it is justified under the above arguments, but it will likely fail.

Pete will then argue that the law is facially discriminatory against him and others based on their sex, males. Pete will argue that State's study and criminal reasoning are not exceedingly persuasive based on the fact that many girls drop out, yet are not included and that State's law is under inclusive, discriminatory, and lacks sufficient rationale.

The State will argue that its basis is important because it is aimed at lowering crime. This is likely sufficient. It will also argue that the study specifically showed that boys were the prime offenders who needed the Corps program specifically. However, the state fails to point to facts showing why girls are not treated alike. It appears no equal program exists for delinquent girls, but just for the boys. Also, manual labor is often a stereotype attached to boys, that they can handle it and girls cannot. The State's law leaves many questions as to its unequal treatment of the boys over the girls, which may rest on stereotypes based on sex which the Supreme Court has clearly stated it does not support. Also, not all dropout boys offend. The State lacks some hard numbers showing recidivism and actual offender likelihood to justify its one-sided measures that are discriminatory. Only boys are impacted, not girls.

Thus, because there lacks an exceeding persuasive justification and because the law is under inclusive, it will fail equal protection and Pete will be successful in his action on these grounds.

Pete will also argue that because the law targets only boys between 15-18 that it discriminates based on age. He would be correct. However, the court only applies rational basis review for discrimination based on age and experience.

Here, the State's interest in protecting young men and the community through the Corps is a rational basis because it makes sense; saving boys from dropping out and avoiding the statistics of offending is legitimate and it is rational that a special school may help. Pete has the burden to prove otherwise, and it is unlikely that he can do so. This is because logic shows that boys who get through school will not offend as much.

Parents.

Like Pete, the parents will be successful in showing discrimination based on their assertion of the fundamental right to privacy. The law is too overbroad in its infringement and offends equal protection of the parents' fundamental right to choose Pete's school and parent him and keep the family physically together.

Answer B

1. Thirteenth Amendment Involuntary Servitude Clause

The Thirteenth Amendment is one of the broadest amendments to the Constitution, applying not only to government actions, but also private actors. A regulation is unconstitutional under the Thirteenth Amendment if it compels one person to work for another, even if compensation is paid. Here, Pete will argue that he is being forced into indentured servitude because the Corps requires the boys to work on reforestation projects for a few hours each day. On the other hand, State X will argue that the work on reforestation projects are part of the education process for the boys. State X will argue that the work is only to defray a portion of the costs, and that it is only for a few hours per day. State X will try to compare the project to community service, where people are compelled to work on a community service project on a daily basis. Nevertheless, the boys have not committed a crime. The Corps and the work is not a punishment for the boys, but rather an attempt by State X to reduce criminal activity. It is therefore improper to compare the work to community service. Thus, the statute compels the boys into involuntary servitude and should be found unconstitutional under the Thirteenth Amendment.

2. Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause

There are two prongs to the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The procedural due process prong strikes down any law that deprives a citizen of a fundamental right without proper procedural safeguards. On the other hand, the substantive due process prong strikes down any law that denies a citizen a fundamental right. Here, Pete and his parents can challenge the State X statute under both the procedural and substantive due process prong.

Procedural Due Process – Deprivation of a Fundamental Right without a Hearing

Procedural due process requires the government to provide the proper procedural safeguards to prevent the erroneous deprivation of a fundamental right. Typically, procedural safeguards include notice, a hearing, and/or the right to have an attorney. When evaluating whether a particular law requires these procedural safeguards courts look at the person's interest in the right, the court's interest inefficiency, fairness and accuracy. Here, the State X statute compels boys 15 to 18 years old to attend camps run by the Corps. Pete is 15 years old and was drafted by the Corps. By being forced to join the Corps and live on the camps in the State Forest lands, Pete has been deprived of his fundamental right of liberty. The right of liberty is the most tantamount of the fundamental rights, and Pete therefore has a very strong interest in receiving proper procedural due process.

State X will argue that with a high number of dropouts, it would be impossible to administer hearings for each student efficiently. State X would also argue that the hearings would not create a fairer or more accurate outcome as its study already linked school dropouts with criminal activity. Pete and his parents will argue that the statute is too broad, and a hearing should be held to determine whether Pete has a propensity to commit criminal activity, and therefore needs to join the Corps. Ultimately, because State X is essentially creating an educational juvenile detention system, at least a hearing is required before State X can deprive Pete of his liberty. Therefore, Pete could successfully challenge the statute under the procedural due process prong of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Substantive Due Process – Right of Liberty

As previously discussed, the statute violated Pete's right of liberty because it forces him to live on the State forest land, to receive their comprehensive education and to work on reforestation projects a few hours each day. There is no indication that Pete is free to come and go as he pleases. Instead, the facts tend to indicate that the boys must remain at the camp at all times until they reach the age of majority. Because this statute denies Pete his fundamental right of liberty, it must meet strict scrutiny. Strict scrutiny requires State X to prove that the statute is necessary to achieve an important government interest. Courts use the least restrictive alternative test – if there is a lesser restrictive alternative to the statute, then the court will strike the statute down.

Here, the state's interest is preventing criminal activity. This is a compelling state interest and State X may enact laws to further this interest. The statute creating the Corps, however, is not necessary to achieve this interest. State X will argue that it has linked an increase in criminal activity with the dropout of boys aged 15 to 18. It will further argue that in order to prevent these boys from entering into illegal activities, it had to create the Corps to remove the boys as a threat to society. However, there are many other less restrictive alternatives State X could have used to decrease criminal activity. State X could invest more in its educational system, providing better education to boys at an earlier age to prevent them from dropping out. State X could provide the Corps as an option for parents that were having difficulty dealing with children. State X could set up a scholarship fund for graduating boys to encourage them to stay in school. All of these actions could decrease the dropout rate and thus criminal activity without depriving the boys of their fundamental right of liberty. The law therefore is not necessary and would most likely be found unconstitutional.

Substantive Due Process – Right of Privacy

Pete's parents can argue that the law unconstitutionally violates their rights to privacy. The Supreme Court has held that the "penumbra" of the Bill of Rights, incorporated and applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment, has created a fundamental right to privacy. Moreover, the Supreme Court has found that included in the fundamental right of privacy is the right of parents to control the upbringing of their children. Here, the State X law drafts boys who are aged 15 to 18. These boys are still in the minority, and their parents therefore still have a legitimate interest in their upbringing. In addition, the law compels these boys to attend camps on public lands administered by the State Forest Service. On its face, the law does not appear to give parents a choice once their boy drops out of school. The parents cannot refuse to send him to the Corps, nor can they take their own remedial actions – hiring a tutor, homeschooling, sending the boy to private or military school, etc. Control is taken away from the parents.

Because the law takes away the ability of the parents to control the upbringing of their children by compelling the boys to enter the Corps when they drop out of school, the law is unconstitutional unless it passes strict scrutiny. That is, the law must be necessary to achieve a compelling state interest. As discussed previously, while reducing criminal activity is a compelling state interest, the Corps is not necessary to achieve this purpose. This statute therefore could also be successfully challenged by the parents under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

3. Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause

A regulation that has a classification on its face is subject to constitutional attack under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Equal Protection Clause provides that no state shall enact a law favoring one citizen over another. Here, State X has two classifications on its face: an age-based classification and a gender-based classification.

Age-Based Classification

The Supreme Court has ruled that age-based classifications are non-suspect classifications that are subject to the rational basis test. Under the rational basis test, the law will be upheld unless Pete or his parents can prove that the law is not rationally related to a legitimate government purpose. Here, State X completed a study on the behavior of teenagers, which indicated a positive correlation between school dropout rate and criminal activity. Moreover, the connection was most pronounced among boys 15 to 18 years old. The reduction of criminal activity is a legitimate government purpose. Because of the link between criminal activity and school dropout rate, State X decided to send boys aged 15 to 18 to camps in order to provide them with a comprehensive education, and to remove them as a threat for criminal activity elsewhere in the state. State X's law creating the Corps to draft boys aged 15 to 18 is therefore rationally related to the government's purpose of reducing criminal activity. If most 15 to 18 year-old male school dropouts become involved in criminal activity, sending them to the Corps should reduce criminal activity. Thus, the law will be upheld as constitutional if it is attacked as an age-based classification.

Gender-Based Classification

While age-based classifications are subject to the rational basis test, gender-based classifications required heightened scrutiny. In order to withstand a constitutional challenge, a gender-based law must be substantially related to an important government interest. Unlike the rational basis test, here the government bears the burden of proving that the law is constitutional. As previously discussed, the statute aims to reduce the amount of criminal activity within State X by confining male dropouts to the Corps. Reducing criminal activity is an important government interest. The dispositive question is therefore whether the Corps is substantially related to State X's interest in reducing criminal activity.

As already discussed, the law is not necessary as it is not the least restrictive means of achieving the government's objective. The law also does appear not to be substantially related to the government's purpose. A study linked the dropout of boys ages 15 to 18 years old with an increase in criminal activity. There is no evidence, however, that this is a strong causal connection. For example, a 50% increase in dropout rate could only lead to a 1% increase in crime. State X must positively demonstrate a strong correlation between the Corps law and its purpose of reducing criminal activity. Without more evidence, it is unlikely a court would find that the law is substantially related to State X's interest and thus the law will likely be found unconstitutional.

Q3 Community Property

In 2007, while married to Hank and residing in California, Wendy inherited $150,000. Wendy used the money to purchase $50,000 worth of Chex Oil stock and a restaurant that cost $100,000. Hank managed the restaurant and, solely through his own efforts, it prospered and is now worth $300,000.

In 2008, Hank inherited an unimproved lot in California worth $75,000. Hank and Wendy obtained a construction loan from a bank for the purpose of building a rental house on the lot. In making the loan, the bank relied upon the salaries earned by both Hank and Wendy and, in addition, required that Wendy pledge the Chex Oil stock. A rental house was constructed on the lot. The present market value of the property, as improved, is $500,000.

In 2011, Cathy, a customer at the restaurant, tripped and fell over a box carelessly placed in the entryway by Hank. She obtained a judgment against Hank for injuries suffered in the fall.

Hank and Wendy have now decided to dissolve their marriage.

1. What are Wendy's and Hank's respective rights in:

    a. The Chex Oil stock? Discuss.

    b. The restaurant? Discuss.

    c. The rental property? Discuss.

2. To satisfy her judgment, may Cathy reach the community property, Hank's separate property, and/or Wendy's separate property? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

Answer A

Community Property

California is a community property (CP) state. All property acquired during marriage is community property. Separate property (SP) includes property owned before marriage, property acquired by gift, will, or inheritance during marriage, rents, issues, and profits from SP, and earnings after separation.

Characterization of property as either CP or SP depends on: (1) the source of the property; (2) any legal presumption affecting the property; and (3) any actions of the parties that may have changed the character of the property.

With these principles in mind, each item of property will be analyzed.

The Chex Oil Stock

Source

In 2007, while married to Hank (H), Wendy (W) inherited $150,000. Wendy used the $150,000 inheritance to purchase $50,000 of Chex Oil stock and a $100,000 restaurant. Thus, the source of the Chex Oil stock was W's inheritance, which is W's SP.

Presumptions

All property acquired during marriage is presumed CP. This presumption can be rebutted by tracing to a SP source or by an agreement to the writing to the contrary. Here, W can trace the $50,000 used for acquisition of the Chex stock to her $150,000 inheritance. W's inheritance is her SP. Thus, the general CP presumption is rebutted by tracing the funds used to purchase the stock to a SP source, the inheritance.

Actions

The only action taken by the parties with respect to the Chex stock was to pledge it as collateral for the loan to build the rental property.

Parties may transmute property from SP to CP and vice versa, which is a change in character of the property. After 1/1/1985, any transmutation must be in writing, clearly state the change in character of the property, and be signed by the spouse whose interest is adversely affected.

Here, there was no agreement between H and W that the Chex stock be transmuted from W's SP to CP. The fact that the bank required H and W to pledge the Chex stock as collateral for the bank loan to build the rental property is not sufficient evidence of a transmutation because it does not state any intent that W is transmuting her SP to CP.

Thus, the pledging of the Chex stock as collateral does not change the character of the stock.

Disposition

Because the stock can be traced to a SP source, the general CP presumption is rebutted, and has had no change in character; the Chex stock is W's SP. Now that H and W are seeking dissolution of their marriage, the Chex stock will be awarded solely to W as her SP.

The Restaurant

Source

In 2007, while married to H, W inherited $150,000. Wendy used the $150,000 inheritance to purchase $50,000 of Chex Oil stock and a $100,000 restaurant. Thus, the source of the restaurant was W's inheritance, which is W's SP.

Presumptions

All property acquired during marriage is presumed CP. This presumption can be rebutted by tracing to a SP source or by an agreement in writing to the contrary.

Here, W can trace the $100,000 used for acquisition of the restaurant to her $150,000 inheritance. W's inheritance is her SP. Thus, the general CP presumption is rebutted by tracing the funds used to purchase the restaurant to a SP source, the inheritance.

Actions

Hank managed the restaurant during the marriage.

CP Contribution to SP Business

A spouse's effort, skill, and industry during marriage is a CP asset. Where a spouse contributed his or her effort, skill, and industry during marriage to his or the other spouse's SP asset, and the asset increases in value, the community receives an interest in the asset. There are two different accounting methods to determine the value of the respective SP and CP interests in the business at dissolution.

Here, H contributed his effort, skill, and industry, which is a CP asset, to the restaurant, which is W's SP asset, during marriage.

The court is not required to use either formula and may choose, or may use whichever formal the parties provide evidence in support of.

Pereira

The Pereira formula is used where the major factor contributing to the increase in value is the spouse's personal effort. Under Pereira, the value of the SP portion of the asset is equal to the value of the SP asset at the time of marriage or the time of acquisition during marriage, plus a reasonable rate of return, usually 10% per annum. The residual value belongs to the community.

Here, managing a restaurant takes personal effort and industry. The facts state that "solely through [H's] own efforts, it prospered." Thus, it appears that Pereira would be the more appropriate formula to use in this circumstance.

Here, the restaurant was purchased in 2007 for $100,000. Now, in 2013, H and W seek dissolution of marriage. Assuming that the purchase price was the fair market value of the restaurant at the time, the SP portion of the restaurant will be equal to $100,000 plus $10,000 per year for six years, or $160,000. The residual value, of $140,000 ($300,000 - $$160,000) is the community's interest in the restaurant.

Thus, under the Pereira formula, the restaurant will be $160,000 CP and $140,000 SP.

Van Camp

The Van Camp formula is typically used where the SP business is valuable and increases in value due to the existence of the business and market forces, and not the personal effort or industry of the spouse. Under Van Camp, the community receives a reasonable salary in return for the spouse's contribution of time and effort, reduced by the amount of community expenses paid by the returns from the business. The residual is the owning spouse's SP.

Here, as explained above, the restaurant in value because of H's contribution of effort and industry, not because of market forces. Thus, the Van Camp formula is probably not the more appropriate formula.

Under Van camp, the community would be credited with a reasonable salary for the 6 years that H spent managing the restaurant, less any community expenses paid by the returns from the restaurant. The balance will be W's SP.

Disposition

Since Pereira is probably the better formula, the restaurant will be $160,000 CP and $140,000 SP.

The Rental Property

Source

In 2008, H inherited an unimproved lot worth $75,000. Inheritance during marriage is the inheriting spouse's SP. Thus, the source of the lot is H's SP.

Regarding the construction loan, the personal credit of either spouse during marriage is a community asset. Here, a loan was obtained from the bank for the construction of the rental property. The loan was obtained in both spouses' names and the bank relied upon the salaries earned by both H and W. The bank also required W's Chex stock as collateral.

Since the bank relied on the personal credit of both spouses, the bank loan is CP.

Presumptions

All property acquired during marriage is presumed CP. The presumption can be rebutted by tracing to a SP source or a written agreement to the contrary. Here, the lot was acquired in 2008, during the marriage. However, the lot can be traced to H's inheritance, which is SP. The bank loan is presumed CP because it was acquired during marriage. There are no facts that can rebut this presumption. W may argue that her pledge of collateral of the Chex stock makes the bank loan her SP, but this argument will be rejected because the bank specifically relied on the salaries earned by both H and W.

Actions

Improvement of Separate Real Property with CP

Here, the bank loan (CP) was used to improve an SP asset (H's lot).

Where CP is used to improve a SP asset, the community is entitled to an interest. The formula used for calculating such an interest is from In re Marriage of Moore. The community is entitled to reimbursement for the value of the contributions for down payment, improvements, and payment of principal, plus a pro rata share of the appreciation.

Here, the community will receive reimbursement of the principal payments made on the bank loan, plus a pro rata share of the appreciation calculated by dividing the CP contribution by the total contribution of SP and CP. The facts do not give enough details to make such a calculation, but it will be some portion of the $500,000 present market value.

Disposition

The rental property is part CP and part SP as discussed above. The CP portion will be divided equally upon dissolution.

What Can Cathy Reach to Satisfy Her Judgment?

Liability of CP and SP for Tort Judgment

CP is liable for all debts incurred by either spouse before or during marriage. Where a judgment results from a tort committed by one spouse, the order of satisfaction of the judgment depends on whether the tortfeasor spouse was acting for the benefit of the community at the time the act giving rise to the judgment was committed. If the tortfeasor spouse was acting for the benefit of the community, the judgment may be satisfied first by CP and then by the tortfeasor spouse's SP. The non-tortfeasor spouse's SP is not liable. If the tortfeasor spouse was not acting for the benefit of the community, the judgment may be satisfied first from the tortfeasor spouse's SP and then from CP. The non-tortfeasor spouse's SP is not liable.

Here, H placed a box in the entryway of the restaurant, presumably while working at the restaurant. Cathy, the customer, obtained a judgment against Hank. If Hank was working at the restaurant and placed the box in the entryway negligently, in the course of his work, he was acting for the benefit of the community because the community had an interest in the restaurant and H's wages from the restaurant were CP. Alternatively, if H placed the box there and injured Cathy intentionally, or did not place the box there as part of his work at the restaurant, he was not acting for the community. Here, it is probably more likely he was acting for the benefit of the community.

As such, Cathy must first satisfy her judgment from CP, which includes a portion of the restaurant and a portion of the rental property. Once CP is exhausted, and if it is, Cathy must satisfy the balance of her judgment from H's SP, which includes a portion of the rental property. Cathy cannot reach the portion of the restaurant that is W's SP and cannot reach the Chex Oil stock, which is also W's SP.

Answer B

California is a community property state. In California, there is a community presumption. Under the community presumption, property obtained during marriage by the spouses is presumed community property. There are also areas of separate property. Property obtained by either spouse before or after the marriage is typically separate property. Additionally, any property obtained by gift, will, or inheritance by either spouse is that spouse's separate property. Property that is obtained using separate property also remains separate property. With these considerations, Hank and Wendy's respective rights will now be considered.

1. Hank and Wendy's Rights in Property

Chex Oil Stock

While married to Hank and residing in CA, Wendy inherited $150,000. As described above, an inheritance by a spouse is separate property of that spouse despite the community presumption. Wendy used $50,000 of this money to buy the Chex Oil stock. The use of separate property to obtain other property results in that other property remaining separate property. Therefore, the Chex Oil stock was separate property when it was bought by Wendy.

Hank may argue that Wendy intended to make the stock a gift to the community when she used it as part of the collateral for the loan obtained by the couple in 2008. Since 1985, however, a transmutation of property from separate property to community property must be in writing and show the intent of the separate property holder to effectuate a gift to the community. Because Hank would not be able to produce such a writing, he will not be able to show that Wendy made a gift to the community.

The Chex Oil stock is Wendy's separate property.

Restaurant

While married to Hank and residing in CA, Wendy inherited $150,000. As described above, an inheritance by a spouse is separate property of that spouse despite the community presumption. Wendy used $100,000 of this money to buy the restaurant.

As described above, the use of separate property to purchase other property results in that property remaining separate property. Therefore, the restaurant was separate property when it was bought by Wendy.

The restaurant has increased in value because of Hank's efforts. Hank's labor is considered community property. The use of community property to enhance the value of a spouse's separate property is analyzed by the court in different ways.

When the separate property is the separate property of one spouse and then other spouse uses community property to enhance the value of the first spouse's separate property, courts in CA may sometimes consider this a gift by the second spouse to the first spouse. Here, hank used community property assets (his labor) to increase the value of the separate property owned by Wendy (her restaurant). Some courts may interpret this as a gift by Hank to Wendy.

The gift interpretation, however, is more likely to be used when a monetary or similar transfer of community property is made to enhance the separate property's value. Here, Hank worked for at least 4 years (depending on when they seek dissolution of the marriage – it could be 6 years) at the restaurant. It is unlikely he intended these years of work to be a gift to Wendy's separate property. Some courts will refute the presumption that the community property going to the other spouse's separate property was a gift and instead hold that the portion is community property.

In determining what portion is community property, courts will apply analysis either from the Pereira case or the Van Camp case.

The Pereira formula is often applied when the labor of the spouse has resulted in the increase in the value of the business. This is the case here, where the facts state that the restaurant has prospered "solely through his own efforts" as manager of the restaurant. The Pereira formula considers the value of the property at the time it was acquired (or time of the marriage if that comes after), and gives the spouse owning the separate property a fair return on the investment, which would be 10% per annum. Based on this analysis, and assuming 6 years have passed, Wendy would get 10% of the restaurant's initial value, or $10,000, each year. This would result in $60,000 of increase. So $160,000 of the property remains Wendy's separate property and the other $140,000 is community property.

The fact that Hank was working instead of Wendy does not change this analysis. Typically the owning spouse may work on her own separate property. Regardless, community property (Hank's labor) was put towards the business to make it grow, and so the Pereira formula would view the fair investment return to be community property.

The Van Camp formula applies when the property increases in value because of its inherent worth. This does not apply here because the property increased due to Hank's efforts, not the restaurant existing itself. This formula would look at the reasonable rate of compensation for the spouse and deduct the expenses of the couple. The remaining value of the salary would be community property, and the remaining value of the business would be separate property of the spouse. As mentioned above, it does not apply here because the restaurant increased in value due to Hank's efforts and because it was Hank working on the property rather than Wendy.

Their respective rights in the property should be $160,000 separate property of Wendy and $140,000 community property, which the couple would split upon divorce.

Rental Property

While married to Wendy and residing in CA, Hank inherited an unimproved lot worth $75,000. As described above, an inheritance by a spouse is separate property of that spouse despite the community presumption. The unimproved lot, therefore, was separate property of Hank.

The community then obtained a loan to improve the property into a rental property. Whether a loan is considered community property or separate property depends on what the creditor looked at for satisfaction of the loan.

Here, the creditor looked at the salaries of each and the value of the Chex Oil stock. Because of the inclusion of the Chex Oil stock, Wendy may argue that the loan should be considered her separate property that then went into the rental property. The value of the stock, however, was only $50,000. In order to go from an unimproved lot to a rental property worth $500,000, the creditor likely made a substantial loan and relied primarily on the salaries of each spouse. The salaries of each spouse at that time, and therefore their creditworthiness, is a community asset. The loan, therefore, should be considered a community asset.

As above, this involves the use of community property to enhance the value of separate property of a spouse. Hank may argue that Wendy intended her use of community property to enhance the value of his separate property to be a gift. Courts have analyzed this in different ways, as described above. Here, it is unlikely that a court would determine this to be a gift and instead hold that the community has some interest in the property.

Wendy may argue that Hank intended a gift to the community by using the community loan to build up his property. As explained above, however, a transmutation requires a clear writing by the party giving the gift. Here, there is no writing showing that Hank intended a gift. The court would determine that Hank did not gift the entire property to the community.

Instead, the court must then determine what percentage of the property is community property. The land went from unimproved and worth $75,000 to improved and worth $500,000.

Wendy may argue that the increase should all be considered community property, potentially subject to a reasonable increase in the original investment. This would essentially be like an argument that Pereira should apply because it is now a business and community assets went into it to increase its value. If this were used, the property would receive a fair 10% increase per annum and the community would receive the remaining value of the property.

Alternatively, the court looks at the amount of the loan that was received. The court could then compare this amount to the original value of the land to do a proration analysis. Under this theory, the court would look at the original $75,000 value of the land and compare it to the value of the loan (I'll assume $125,000 for basic calculation and demonstration purposes). If the loan were $125,000, then the total value going into the property would be $200,000 (75,000 + 125,000). The court would then prorate the proportion of separate property and community property to the value of the property today, which is $500,000. The proportions of the separate property (3/8 in assumption) and the community property (5/8 in assumption) would be prorated to the $500,000 value to determine amounts of separate property and community property.

The court may also alternatively look at the amount of the loan and view this as the community property and merely require a reimbursement for the amount of money that went into the undeveloped land.

Because of the increase in the property value due to the improvements, some form of proration would likely be better for the court to apply to afford a more fair split of the property value.

2. Cathy's Judgment

Cathy, a patron at the restaurant, has received a judgment against Hank for his negligence. Based on the facts, it appears that the judgment is only against Hank individually and not against the restaurant itself. The analysis below will assume that Hank is individually liable and the restaurant is not vicariously liable for the judgment.

Because Hank is personally liable for the judgment, his separate property is subject to Cathy's judgment. Cathy may therefore go after Hank's portion of the rental property that is his separate property. She may also go after any other separate property owned by Hank.

The tort liability of one spouse can affect the community assets. Cathy would be allowed to go after the community assets to satisfy her judgment. The order in which she obtains her judgment, however, depends on whether the spouse was acting for the benefit of the community at that time or for his own separate benefit. Here, Hank was working at the restaurant for the benefit of the community when the tort liability was incurred. Because Hank was acting for the betterment of the community, Cathy may go after the community property before she is forced to go after Hank's separate property for the judgment. To the extent that Wendy's community property interest is infringed by Cathy's judgment, she may be able to seek reimbursement from Hank at the divorce because she is not personally liable for the tort.

Wendy's separate property is not subject to the tort liability of Hank. Wendy is not individually liable for the tort (again, assuming that the restaurant is not vicariously liable). Additionally, community property of Wendy, such as wages, kept in a separate account that the other spouse cannot access could not be reached by a creditor unless for the necessaries of the other spouse. Here, Hank is liable for a tort, not a contract for necessities, so the necessaries exception would not apply. Additionally, Cathy's Chex Oil stock that she keeps separate is separate property rather than community property that she keeps separate, so it could not be reached by Cathy.

Therefore, Cathy may go after Hank's separate property and the community property to satisfy her judgment. She may not go after Wendy's separate property.

Q4 Contracts

On March 1, Ben, a property owner, and Carl, a licensed contractor, executed a written agreement containing the following provisions:

1. Carl agrees to construct a residence using solar panels and related electrical equipment manufactured by Sun Company ("Sun") and to complete construction before Thanksgiving.

2. Ben agrees to pay Carl $200,000 upon completion of construction.

3. Ben and Carl agree that this written agreement contains the full statement of their agreement.

4. Ben and Carl agree that this written agreement may not be modified except upon written consent of both of them.

Prior to execution of the written agreement, Ben told Carl that Carl had to use Sun solar panels and related electrical equipment because Sun was owned by Ben's brother, and that Carl had to complete construction prior to Thanksgiving. Carl assured Ben that he would comply.

In August, Ben began to doubt whether Carl would complete construction prior to Thanksgiving; Ben offered Carl a $25,000 bonus if Carl would assure completion, and Carl accepted and gave his assurance.

To complete construction prior to Thanksgiving, Carl had to use solar panels and related electrical equipment of equal grade manufactured by one of Sun's competitors because Sun was temporarily out of stock.

Carl completed construction prior to Thanksgiving. Ben, however, has refused to pay Carl anything.

What are Carl's rights and remedies against Ben? Discuss.

Answer A

Governing Law

Contracts are governed by either the UCC or Common Law. The UCC relates only to contracts for the sale of goods. Here, the contract is for the construction of a residence, using certain products manufactured by Sun. Although this involves the goods manufactured by Sun, it is primarily for the purpose of having Carl build a residence for Ben. Therefore, common law controls.

Valid Contract

To have a valid and enforceable contract there needs to be (1) an offer, (2) acceptance, and (3) consideration. Here, the facts indicate that Ben and Carl reached an agreement related to the terms. Thus, the first two elements are present. Additionally, the contract calls for Carl to construct a residence to Ben's specifications and for Ben to pay Carl $200,000 in return. Thus, there is a bargained-for exchange of legal detriment by the parties because they are both doing something that they have no legal obligation to do, in exchange for a benefit.

Therefore, there is a valid contract formed between Ben and Carl.

Terms of the Contract

Generally, the terms of the contract are determined by the written agreement itself. Here, the written agreement indicates certain terms, including that Carl will construct a residence using solar panels and related electrical equipment manufactured by Sun and that Ben will pay Carl the $200,000 upon completion.

However, these promises contained in the agreement are not the only terms that the parties may claim exist.

Parol Evidence Rule

The parol evidence rule bars the introduction of an oral or written agreement which was made prior or contemporaneous to the execution of the contract and which contradicts or varies the terms of the integrated contract.

Here, Ben may argue that prior to the execution, Ben and Carl agreed that the use of Sun products and completion prior to Thanksgiving were conditions, not promises. A condition precedent to performance is a term in the agreement that must be satisfied strictly in order for the party's performance to be due. If the condition never occurs, the party never has a duty to perform. A promise, on the other hand, only needs to be substantially performed under the common law in order for the other party's performance to become due. In the contract, the use of Sun products and completion by Thanksgiving are merely promises because they do not indicate any mandatory language or language to show that Ben's performance is not due unless they are strictly followed.

Carl will argue that introducing the evidence of Ben and Carl's oral agreement prior to the execution of the contract regarding the mandatory nature of the Sun product and completion terms is barred by the parol evidence rule.

Although this does constitute a prior oral agreement, the parol evidence rule does not bar the introduction of evidence to show that there was a condition precedent to performance. This is one of the rule's exceptions. Therefore, if this agreement did make those terms conditions, rather than promises, then the argument can be used to show that.

Here, the agreement between Carl and Ben does show that Ben told Carl that he "had to use Sun" products and that he "had to complete construction prior to Thanksgiving." Although these do indicate more definiteness, there is no express language stating that unless Carl does so, Ben will not have to perform. Thus, Carl will argue that this agreement only enforced the terms of the written agreement, not changed them into conditions.

Ultimately, because there is no express language and because the courts do favor promises over conditions because of the strict compliance requirement of conditions, this will likely be found to be an enforcement of the promise in the agreement and therefore not parol evidence to contradict the terms.

Bonus Agreement

Ben began to doubt whether Carl would complete construction prior to Thanksgiving, so he offered Carl a $25,000 bonus if Carl would assure completion. Carl accepted and gave such assurances. Carl will argue that this was a new contract or a modification to their existing contract.

Modification in Writing

If Carl argues that this agreement modified the written agreement that Carl and Ben had, Ben will point to the term in the agreement which states that “this written agreement may not be modified except upon written consent of both of them.” These modifications in writing terms are generally not enforced under common law.

Statute of Frauds

A writing is only required to modify an existing agreement under common law if the modification places the contract within the statute of frauds. The statute of frauds generally does not apply to services contracts unless they are not capable of being performed within one year. Here, the agreement that attempts to modify the existing agreement states that performance must be completed by Thanksgiving (late November). The original contract was made on March 1, and the modification in August. Therefore, this is requiring that performance be completed under a year from the time of the contract or the modification. Therefore, the statute of frauds does not require a writing.

Therefore, Ben cannot challenge this modification on the basis of a lack of a writing.

Enforceable Agreement

Although it is permissible for the parties to orally modify their agreement, a modification or subsequent contract requires the three elements required in every contract: (1) offer, (2) acceptance, (3) consideration. Here, there was an offer from Ben to Carl for $25,000 extra if Carl finished construction prior to Thanksgiving. There was an acceptance because Carl accepted these terms as they were, without condition. There also must be, however, consideration.

Pre-Existing Duty Rule

The pre-existing duty rule holds that a promise to do what a party is already contractually or otherwise obligated to do is not consideration for a new agreement. The exceptions to this agreement are for (1) if a third party will perform the obligation, (2) if unforeseen circumstances have made it such that the performance would otherwise be excused, or (3) there is a change in the amount or type of performance.

Here, the performance between Ben and Carl was set in the agreement to be completed before Thanksgiving. Thus, Carl was under a pre-existing contractual duty to perform by Thanksgiving. As such, there is no consideration given by Carl in the agreement, only by Ben in offering to pay more money.

Carl might argue that because Ben began to doubt Carl's ability to perform, this rule is excused. However, that is not the law. Common law, unlike the UCC, strictly requires adequate consideration for a modification or a creation of a new agreement. Here, there was not an excuse of Carl's performance under the circumstances, nor did he promise to do more than he was already obligated to do under the agreement, and he did not assign his duties to a third party.

Therefore, there is no consideration to support the agreement between Ben and Carl made in August. Thus, Ben has no obligation to pay Carl $25,000.

Thus, the terms of the agreement are unmodified and remain just as they were in the original written integration.

Performance of the Contract Terms

Carl's Performance

Under common law, a breach of contract occurs if a party fails to fully perform its obligations under an existing contract. However, in order to discharge the other party's obligation to perform its obligations, there must be a material breach. Therefore, in order for Carl to have sufficiently performed to give Ben an obligation to perform, Carl must have substantially performed his obligations under the contract.

Under this contract, Carl constructed a house for Ben. That was his primary obligation and he completed it. Additionally, he completed it on time: by Thanksgiving. Therefore, Carl fully and completely performed two of his three obligations under the contract.

Carl did not, however, perform his obligation to use Sun manufactured solar panels and related electrical equipment in constructing the house. Carl knew he was supposed to do this, but he failed in this because in order to get it done on time, he had to use solar panels manufactured by one of Sun's competitors. Therefore, by not complying with the contract terms as to this requirement, Carl did commit a breach of contract.

This breach, however, is minor. Carl substantially performed his obligation under the contract because he built an entire house for Ben and got done on time. Therefore, the failure to use Sun products was a minor breach for which Carl is liable, but it does not discharge Ben's obligation to perform.

Ben's Performance

Ben flatly refused to perform at the time that his performance was due: upon completion of the construction. Therefore, because his performance was due, he is in material breach of the contract.

Excuses for Non-Performance

Carl's Non-Performance

Waiver of Promise

Carl will argue that his performance was discharged by Ben's waiver of the promise to use material made by Sun when he mandated and offered more money for Carl to complete performance by Thanksgiving.

Generally, a party may waive a condition precedent to performance if the condition is in the contract to protect them, but it is not permissible to waive performance of a promise under a contract unless there has been a modification of the agreement.

Here, as shown above, the offer to give Carl an extra $25,000 was not supported by consideration. Therefore, it is not enforceable as a modification. Further, even if it was enforceable as a modification, it does not indicate that Ben "waived" the right to have Sun products used in his home. Carl never informed him that it would not be possible to use those products and perform on time.

Therefore, the promise is not waived.

Impossibility/Impracticability

Carl will also argue that impossibility or impracticability discharged him of the obligation to use Sun products. Impossibility discharges performance if it would be objectively impossible to perform due to unforeseen circumstances. Impracticability discharges a party's performance if the performance has become extremely and unreasonably difficult and expensive as a result of unforeseen circumstances.

Here, although Carl may claim that it was objectively impossible to get Sun products in time to construct the house before Thanksgiving, Ben will counter that difficulty in obtaining Sun products was not an "unforeseen circumstance."
To be unforeseen, the circumstance must be one that the parties did not, or could not, contemplate at the time of the agreement. Here, the possibility that it would be challenging to get Sun products specifically, is a condition that the parties, particularly Carl, should have contemplated at the time of the agreement since the agreement was specific as to their use. Further, it is unknown exactly what the hardship or difficulty was in obtaining those products on time. If it was a totally unforeseen circumstance which led to the hardship, then Carl would have a stronger argument.

However, in the absence of information showing that an unforeseen event caused the inability to obtain these products on time, Carl's performance on that term will not be excused.

Ben's Non-Performance

Non-Occurrence of a Condition Precedent

Ben will argue that the condition precedent that the house be built using Sun products discharges him of any liability for payment. However, as discussed above, it is most likely that the court will construe the written term and the oral agreement as creating a promise, not a condition.

Therefore, his obligation is not discharged since Carl substantially performed his obligation under the contract (see above).

Conclusion

Therefore, Ben is liable to Carl for a material breach of the agreement. Ben is not responsible to pay the extra $25,000. But Carl is responsible for the damages caused by his minor breach of the agreement.

Carl's Remedies

Compensatory Damages

Compensatory damages in contract are aimed to place the plaintiff in the position that he expected to be in but for the breach. This is the general measure of contract compensatory damages.

In order to recover compensatory damages, the damages must be shown to be (1) caused by the defendant, (2) foreseeable, (3) unavoidable, and (4) certain.

Here, the damages were caused by Ben's refusal to pay. They were foreseeable because it was foreseeable that Ben would simply refuse to pay; this is not an attenuated or unexpected event. The damages were unavoidable to the extent that Carl could not have done anything else to mitigate his loss. He built the house and has not received payment; he is not in the type of contract where he can seek cover or performance from another.

Finally, the damages must be certain. In a construction contract, the damages for a party who completes a performance but is not paid is the contract price. Here, the contract price is $200,000. Therefore, Carl's damages are certain in sum based on the contract.

Therefore, he can recover $200,000 in compensatory damages from Ben.

Offsetting Damages

Carl's compensatory damages award will be offset by the damages that he caused Ben as a result of his failure to use Sun products. Since the products used by Carl were of equal grade to those used by Sun, the damages will be fairly nominal.

Ben will try to retrieve consequential damages arising from his brother's lost profits. However, although Ben's brother owns Sun and would have benefitted from the contract, it was only incidentally. Thus, Ben's brother is not entitled to anything on a third party beneficiary theory since only intended beneficiaries have such rights.

Consequential damages here would not be available for loss to the brother's business unless Ben can show that those are his own personal damages. However, if he can show a personal loss stemming from this failure, he can recover consequential damages since the ownership of Sun was known to Carl at the time of making the contract.

Therefore, Ben's $200,000 will be offset by Ben's damages.

Specific Performance

Specific performance is an equitable remedy which requires the contract to be performed. To be granted, it must be shown that (1) there is a valid, certain, and definite contract, (2) the plaintiff's conditions for performance were met, (3) there is not an adequate remedy at law, (4) enforcement is feasible, and (5) there are no defenses.

Here, the contract is valid, and definite in the terms of the integrated writing (see above). Carl (the plaintiff's) conditions for performance were met. But there is an adequate remedy at law. Since the payment of money is not unique, unless there is an indication that Ben is insolvent, there is a perfectly adequate legal remedy in compensatory damages. Finally, feasibility would be enforceable.

Unclean Hands

Further, even if there was not an adequate remedy at law, Ben might raise the defense of unclean hands. Unclean hands is an equitable defense which says that the contract should not be enforced in equity if the plaintiff committed wrongdoing in the transaction. Here, Ben will argue that Carl breached the agreement by not using Sun products and therefore comes to the court with unclean hands. This will likely not prevail since Carl's breach was minor.

Regardless, Carl's best remedy is legal. Specific performance will not be granted.

Answer B

Carl's rights and remedies against Ben will be determined by principles of contract law.

Applicable Law

The common law of contracts will govern the contract that Carl and Ben made. The common law governs all contracts except for contracts regarding the sale of goods, which are governed by the UCC. The common law governs services contracts, and therefore covers construction contracts. Here, Carl is a licensed contractor, and he has agreed to construct a residence for Ben. Therefore, Carl has entered into a services contract, which will be governed by the common law. One may argue that Carl has agreed to provide a house, which is a good, but this argument will fail. Carl was hired for his services in constructing a house.

Formation

The facts show that a validly executed contract was formed. A contract requires mutual assent and consideration. Here, Ben and Carl entered into a written agreement, whereby both manifested consent to be bound by the terms of the contract.

Moreover, there is adequate consideration. Consideration is a bargained-for legal detriment. Here, Carl agreed to build a house and Ben agreed to pay $200,000 in consideration.

Terms of the Contract and Ben's Alleged Breach

The written contract states that Carl agreed to construct a residence using solar panels and related electrical equipment manufactured by Sun Company. In addition, Carl agreed to complete construction before Thanksgiving. Ben agreed to pay Carl $200,000 upon completion of the contract.

Carl constructed the home before Thanksgiving. Now, Ben refuses to pay Carl anything. Carl's rights and remedies under the contract will be determined by the court's interpretation of the contractual terms and whether the parties modified the terms of the contract.

Promise or Condition to Use Panels from Sun Company

A condition precedent is a condition that must be fulfilled in order to require the party with the benefit of the condition to render full performance under the contract. If a condition precedent is not fulfilled, the party with the benefit of the condition is not required to perform. Here, Ben will argue that the contract includes a condition precedent that Carl had to use Sun Company solar panels in construction of the house. Ben will argue that Carl did not use Sun Company solar panels and related electrical equipment, and that Carl therefore did not satisfy the condition. Therefore, Ben will argue that he was not required to render performance under the contract and pay Carl the $200,000 for the house.

In contrast, the non-occurrence of a promise or the failure to fully satisfy a promise contained in a contract does not relieve the other party of liability. If a party promises to render performance of a contract, the other party will not be relieved of performance unless the party who made the promise materially breached the contract. A material breach occurs when the party does not render substantial performance. A minor breach does not relieve the non-breaching party of their duty to perform, although they can sue for damages. In order to determine whether a breach is minor or material, a court will consider the extent of performance, the hardship to the breaching party, the adequacy of compensation, and the additional work needed to fulfill the promise.

A court will consider the intent of the parties in order to determine whether a clause at issue is a condition or a promise. As explained above, Ben will argue that the use of Sun Company products in construction of the house was a condition while Carl will argue that he merely promised to use the products. Here, the court will likely hold that, under the terms of the written contract, the agreement to use Sun Company products was a promise. The language of the contract does not expressly condition Ben's performance on the use of Sun Company products. In a large construction project like this, a court will likely require unambiguous language that the parties intended to create a condition and not a promise. Solar panels and electrical equipment are relatively minor elements of an overall house. Therefore, based on the terms of the contract, the court likely will not find that the clause requiring Sun Company products was so important that the parties intended for it to be a condition. Here, Carl used solar panels of equal grade and otherwise constructed the house per the terms of the contract.

Parol Evidence

However, Ben will argue that the court should consider the parties' discussions prior to entering into the contract when interpreting the terms of the contract. Ben will argue that he explicitly told Carl that he had to use Sun Solar panels and related electrical equipment, because Sun was owned by Ben's brother. Therefore, Ben will argue that the use of the Sun Company products was a very important part of the contract. Ben will argue that he would not have made the contract with Carl unless Carl agreed to use Ben's brother's products.

Carl will argue that the Parol Evidence rule bars the court from considering evidence of these discussions. The parol evidence rule applies when a contract has been fully integrated. Integration occurs when the parties intend the contract to integrate all prior discussions and that all terms be included in the final written agreement. A merger clause in a contract is probative of the parties' intent to integrate but it is not conclusive.

If a contract is integrated, prior communications between the parties cannot be used to contradict the terms of the contract. However, the parol evidence rule does not bar the use of prior communications to show the non-occurrence of a condition, to challenge the validity of the contract, or to construe ambiguous terms.

Here, the court will likely find that the contract was integrated. The contract contains a merger clause, which shows that it is likely that the parties intended to reduce their agreement to a final written agreement. Moreover, the written contract is complete and includes all material terms.

Therefore, the use of parol evidence to contradict the terms of the contract will be prohibited. Carl will argue that Ben's statement that Carl "had to use Sun Solar Panels . . . because Sun was owned by Ben's brother" cannot be considered by the court, because it contradicts the terms of the written contract. Carl will argue that the contract language is clear, and it does not state that the use of Sun Company products was a condition. Carl will argue that such an important provision of the contract would have been included in the final written agreement. However, Ben will likely prevail in arguing that this statement can be used by the court to consider whether clause 1 of the contract is condition. As explained above, prior communications can be used to show the non-occurrence of a condition. Moreover, the parol evidence does not directly contradict clause 1 of the contract. Instead, whether clause 1 is a condition or promise is unambiguous and will need to be determined by the court. Therefore, the court will likely consider this evidence in order to determine the parties' intent. Here, the oral communication shows that Ben told Carl that he "had to use" Sun Company products and Carl assured him that he would comply. However, even if the court does use the parol evidence, it still may not conclude that the parties intended the use of Sun Company products to be a condition. As explained above, a court usually will presume that a clause is a promise and not a condition.

Material v. Minor Breach

If the court determines that the clause was a promise and not a condition, then Carl will argue that Ben must pay him for constructing the house. However, Ben will argue that Carl still breached the promise by not using Sun Company products. Therefore, Carl will be liable for some damages. Whether Ben will be required to pay Carl for the house will be determined by whether Carl committed a material or minor breach.

As explained above, the court will consider several factors in determining whether a breach is minor or material. Here, the court will likely conclude that the breach was minor. Carl substantially performed under the contract. He built a house for Ben and he did so within the time limit that Ben wanted. Moreover, solar panels are a minor component of the house, and not a very important part of the overall construction. Finally, the solar panels and products used were similar in quality and design to the Sun

Company products. Therefore, the hardship to Ben here is minimal. Carl has provided Ben with a sufficient home, and Ben should not be allowed to escape payment by arguing that Carl materially breached for the mere failure to use Sun Company products.

Impossibility

Even if Ben is successful in arguing that Carl materially breached, Carl will argue that his breach is excused by impossibility. Impossibility occurs where the nonoccurrence of an event was a basic assumption of the parties, and neither party assumed the risk of the occurrence of the event. Impossibility must be objective. Here, Carl will argue that Sun was temporarily out of stock of solar panels and products. Therefore, it was impossible for him to use Sun Company products in the home.

Carl will likely succeed in this argument. Ben will argue that the impossibility was not objective, because Sun Company was only out of stock temporarily.

However, Carl was limited by the term in the contract requiring construction to be finished by Thanksgiving. Therefore, under the terms of the contract it was impossible for him to use both Sun Company products and complete the construction prior to Thanksgiving.

Frustration of Purpose

Carl may also argue that the purpose of the contract was frustrated. This occurs when an event occurs that was not foreseeable, the non-occurrence of which was a basic assumption of the contract, and the occurrence of which frustrates a purpose of the contract that both parties intended. Carl will argue that Sun Company's inability to provide product was a supervening event which frustrated the purpose of his contract with Ben. Therefore, he will argue that his performance of his promise to use Sun Company products was excused.

Carl's Liability and Damages

Therefore, Carl likely committed a minor breach of the contract. Ben can sue Carl for damages caused by the breach. But, Ben must perform under the contract and pay Carl for his work. Therefore, Ben will be required to pay the $200,000 less any damages caused by Carl's breach. Here, the damages are likely minimal. The purpose of damages is to compensate the damaged party. Carl may ask for expectation damages, which is measured by the damaged party's expectations. The purpose is to put the party in a position they would have been in but for the breach. Here, Ben expected a home constructed with Sun Company products. However, he received a home constructed with products of equal grade. Therefore, he has not suffered any economic damages, for which he can be compensated. He may argue that he is personally dissatisfied with the home, but the court will be unlikely to recognize these damages as legitimate or be able to quantify these damages.

Ben may also argue for specific performance. Here, the court will be unwilling to grant specific performance. Requiring Carl to deconstruct and then reconstruct the home using Sun Company products would place an extreme hardship on him and be difficult to supervise by the court.

Even if Carl is found to have materially breached the contract or failed to perform a condition under the contract, he will likely be compensated under a quasi-contract restitution theory. Ben will not be allowed to be unjustly enriched by Carl's work. Under this theory, Ben will have to pay Carl for the value of the benefit that Ben received less any damages that Ben suffered.

Modification

Carl will argue that he is also owed the $25,000 bonus that Ben offered him in order to complete the home by Thanksgiving. A modification to a contract under the common law must be supported by consideration. Under the UCC, modifications in good faith without consideration are permitted. Here, Ben will argue that the modification is not valid or binding, because it was not supported by any consideration. Consideration is a bargained-for legal detriment. Ben offered to pay $25,000; however, Carl merely agreed to assure completion by Thanksgiving. Ben will argue that under the terms of the contract, Carl was already required to complete the construction by Thanksgiving. Therefore, consideration does not exist.

Carl may argue that the contract pre-modification was not a “time is of the essence” contract. Therefore, pre-modification Carl did not agree to forfeit his pay if the contract was not fully performed by the specific date (Thanksgiving). He may argue that the modification made performance by Thanksgiving mandatory, because time is of the essence. Therefore, Carl will argue that there was consideration. This argument will likely fail. Regardless, under the terms of the contract Carl agreed to perform by Thanksgiving. Even though he might not have committed a material breach by performing later, his agreement to perform an obligation he already has is not consideration.

Second, Ben will argue that the modification was invalid, because it was not made in writing. The parties’ contract in clause 4 states that the agreement may not be modified except upon written consent of the parties. This argument will fail. Under the common law, a clause requiring modifications to be in writing is not enforceable, although such a clause is enforceable under the UCC.

Q5 Wills / Trusts

In 2000, Ted was married to Wilma, with whom he had a child, Cindy. Wilma had a young son, Sam, from a prior marriage. Ted typed a document entitled "Will of Ted," then dated and signed it. Ted's will provided as follows: "I give $10,000 to my stepson. I give $10,000 to my friend, Dot. I leave my share of all my community property to my wife. I leave the residue consisting of my separate property to my daughter, Cindy. I hereby appoint Jane as executor of this will."

Ted showed his signature on the document to Jane and Dot, and said, "This is my signature on my will. Would you both be witnesses?" Jane signed her name. Dot was about to sign when her cell phone rang, alerting her to an emergency, and she left immediately. The next day, Ted saw Dot. He had his will with him and asked Dot to sign. She did.

In 2010, Wilma died, leaving her entire estate to Ted.

In 2011, Ted married Bertha.

In 2012, Ted wrote in his own hand, "I am married to Bertha and all references to 'my wife' in my will are to Bertha." He dated and signed the document.

Recently, Ted died with an estate of $600,000, consisting of his one-half community property share of $300,000 in the $600,000 home he owned with Bertha plus $300,000 in a separate property bank account.

What rights, if any, do Bertha, Sam, Dot, and Cindy have in Ted's estate? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

Answer A

The issue is whether Bertha, Sam, Dot, and Cindy have rights, if any, in Ted's estate. In determining this, it is first critical to consider the validity of any of the testamentary documents executed by Ted.

Ted's 2000 Will

First, it is critical to consider whether Ted's executed will in 2000 is valid. To determine this we must consider whether there is (i) testamentary capacity, (ii) testamentary intent, and (iii) formalities have been met.

Testamentary Capacity

A testator must have legal and mental capacity.

First, legal capacity requires for the testator to be above the age of 18 at the time of executing the will. Here, Ted was married and had a child; therefore, presumably Ted was over the age of 18.

Second, mental capacity requires for minimum mental capacity test to be met. That is, the testator must (i) understand the nature of his bounty (his relationships), (ii) understand the nature of his assets, and (iii) understand the nature of his actions.

First, here, Ted likely understood the nature of his relationships, given that he described in the will his stepson, friend Dot, daughter Cindy, and his wife. Second, Ted likely understood the nature of his assets given that he gives $10,000 to his stepson and friend and leaves the shares of his community property to his wife. Third, Ted likely understands the nature of his actions given that he entitled the document that he typed "Will of Ted."

In short, the minimum mental capacity test is likely met.

Further consider whether Ted suffers from an insane delusion. Under this doctrine, a testator does not have capacity if suffering from a mental defect that causes the testator to suffer from an insane delusion, and but for such a delusion the document or provision of the testamentary document would not have been produced. Here, the facts do not indicate that Ted suffered from any mental defect or insane delusion.

In short, Ted has testamentary capacity.

Testamentary Intent

A testator must have present testamentary intent, which can be inferred from the document having material provisions and appointing an executory.

Here, Ted typed a document called “Will of Ted” and he set forth provisions distributing his property as well as appointing an executor. In short, Ted has testamentary intent.

It is critical to note whether there is any fraud, undue influence, mistake, or whether the will is a conditional or sham will. The occurrence of any of these instances may negate testamentary intent. The facts here do not suggest or reflect any incidence of fraud, undue influence, mistake, or the will being a conditional or sham will.

Thus, Ted has testamentary intent in executing the document.

Formalities

A will can either be a holographic or attested will.

For an attested will to be valid it must be in writing, signed by the testator, and also signed by at least two witnesses. Note, that the two witnesses must be in the presence of the testator (presence includes sight, hearing, etc.) when the testator signs the will or acknowledges his signature on a will; the witnesses must also understand that they are signing as witnesses to a will. Note, that witnesses need not sign the will in the presence of the testator or in the presence of each other. Witnesses need only sign the will prior to the death of the testator.

Here, Ted typed the will, dated and signed it. Next, he showed his signature on the document to Jane and Dot and said, “This is my signature on my will. Would you both be witnesses?”

Jane signed her name, and Dot was about to sign when her cell phone rang, alerting her to an emergency, and she left. However, the next day, Ted saw Dot and asked Dot to sign the will and she did.

Given the facts above, here both witnesses were in the presence of the testator when he acknowledged his signature on the will and both witnesses signed the will prior to the death of Ted.

Thus, since the will is in writing, signed by the testator as well as at least two witnesses the will is valid.

Interested Witnesses

Witnesses who sign a will and are receiving a gift under the will are interested witnesses. Signing of a will by interested witnesses does not invalidate the will. Instead, a rebuttable presumption of undue influence/fraud applies to the interested witnesses; if the witnesses are not able to rebut the presumption then the gift fails and the witnesses would only get the amount from the testator that they would be entitled to under intestate succession. Note, however, that a person in the will given a fiduciary title or executory title is not an interested witness.

Here, Jane and Dot are the witnesses. Jane is appointed as the executor of the will and is, thus, not an interested witness as discussed above. Dot is a friend of Ted’s and is granted $10,000 in the will and is an interested witness. As a result, the rebuttable presumption of undue influence/fraud applies to Dot. If Dot is unable to rebut the presumption, then the gift is invalidated and goes into the residue and Dot would only take what she would receive under intestate succession, which would be nothing as Dot is only a friend of Ted and would not receive anything under intestate succession. If Dot was able to rebut the presumption then Dot will be entitled to the gift.

The facts here do not indicate whether there was any undue influence or fraud on behalf of Dot. Regardless, note that the interested witness problem may be cured by a republication by codicil (see below). If there is a valid codicil (see below), republication by codicil will apply and will cure the interested witness problem, which means that Dot will then be entitled to the $10,000.

Now that the 2000 will is valid, it is also critical to consider whether the 2012 note by Ted is a valid codicil.

2012 Note by Ted

The issue is whether the 2012 note by Ted is a valid codicil. A codicil is any writing that can accompany a will; note that an invalid codicil does not invalidate a will. Further note that a codicil must meet the same validity requirements as discussed above with respect to a will. That is, a codicil is valid if (i) testator has capacity, (ii) testator has intent, (iii) all formalities have been met.

Testamentary Capacity

See rule above.

First, regarding legal capacity, see above.

Second, regarding mental capacity, in 2012, Ted wrote “I am married to Bertha and all references to my wife in my will are to Bertha.” Such writing reflects that Ted understood the nature of his action, relationship, and assets as he refers to his will and clarifies the term “to my wife” to be Bertha, the woman he married after Wilma’s 2010 death.

In short, the facts support that Ted had testamentary capacity.

Testamentary Intent

See rule above.

Here based on the statements in the writing there appears to be testamentary intent. Furthermore, the facts do not indicate any fraud, undue influence, or mistake.

Formalities

A holographic codicil must be in writing and signed by the testator. Note that the writing may occur on any paper or surface.

Here, Ted wrote in his own handwriting “I am married to Bertha and all references to ‘my wife’ in my will are to Bertha.”

Given that the codicil was signed and in Ted’s handwriting, the codicil is valid.

In summary, the 2000 will and the 2012 codicil are both valid.

Integration

Integration entails that all documents in physical and legal connection will be read together at the testator’s death.

Here, the 2000 will and the 2012 codicil are valid and have a legal connection to one another. Therefore, both will be read together.

Distribution of Ted’s Estate

Upon Ted’s death, his estate consisted of his one-half community property share of $300,000 in the $600,000 home he owned with Bertha plus $300,000 in a separate property bank account. Ted's estate should be distributed as follows.

$10,000 to Stepson

Ted's 2000 will states, "I give $10,000 to my stepson." This is a general gift; a general gift is a gift that can be satisfied by the general estate.

Here, Ted's stepson is presumably Wilma's young son Sam. Note that if there are any ambiguities in a will, the court will consider extrinsic evidence clarifying any ambiguities (whether latent or patent ambiguities). Here, the court will likely consider that Ted's prior marriage to Wilma, who had a young son Sam from a prior marriage. Therefore, even if any opposing arguments are made to contest this interpretation, it is likely that the court will find that Sam was Ted's stepson, as there is no evidence to the contrary.

Given that the 2000 will is valid and the 2012 codicil has not revoked or amended the will with respect to the general gift to the stepson, the stepson is entitled to $10,000 from the $300,000 separate property bank account.

$10,000 to Dot

As discussed above, at the time of execution of the 2000 will Dot was an interested witness. However, as discussed above, the 2012 codicil was valid and therefore republication by codicil took into effect. When republication of codicil occurs, it cures any interested witness problems; this means that the court will only consider now whether there was any interested witness at the time of the 2012 codicil instead of the 2000 will.

As a result, the republication by codicil cures any interested witness issues and Dot will be entitled to receive the $10,000 gifted to her in Ted's will. This $10,000 is a general gift for the same reasons as discussed with regards to the gift to the step-son. Thus, the $10,000 will be satisfied from the $300,000 separate property bank account.

Community Property to “My Wife”

Here, the 2000 will devises all of Ted’s “community property to his wife.” Furthermore, in the 2012 codicil Ted wrote “I am married to Bertha and all references to my wife in my will are to Bertha.”

Note that the court will likely consider the 2012 reference of “my will” as an act of incorporation by reference. A testator may incorporate by reference any document so long as that document is existing and it is described sufficiently and the testator so intends. Here, by referring to his “will” Ted is incorporating his will by reference. Since the will existed at the time of the codicil and the codicil was specific in referencing the will, the court will likely presume that Ted intended to incorporate the will.

Furthermore, as discussed above, the court will consider extrinsic evidence if there is any ambiguity in any testamentary document. Thus, the court will consider the codicil as well as the fact that in 2011 Ted married Bertha after Wilma had died in 2010.

In short, whether by incorporation by reference or by considering extrinsic evidence, the court will find that the statement “to my wife” is intended to identify “Bertha.”

As a result, the codicil and the will together, Bertha is entitled to Ted’s one-half community property share of $300,000 in the $600,000 home Ted owned with Bertha.

Residual Estate to Cindy

A residual gift is a gift of anything remaining after the distribution of the estate.

Here, Ted’s 2000 will states “I leave my residue consisting of my separate property to my daughter Cindy.”

As this is a residual gift, Cindy gets whatever remains in the residual estate. That is, after deducting the $20,000 paid to Sam and Dot, Cindy, Ted’s daughter, is entitled to $280,000 of the separate property bank account.

In conclusion, Bertha, Sam, Dot and Cindy have rights in Ted’s estate as described above.

Answer B

For convenience: Ted = T, Wilma = W, Sam = S, Dot = D, Jane = J, Bertha = B

a. Is T's 2000 Will Valid?

The rights of the respective parties will depend on whether T's 2000 will is valid.

Capacity

In order to make a valid will, a testator must have the capacity to do so. A testator has capacity when he is over the age of 18, understands the nature and extent of his property, understands the natural objects of his bounty (his relationships), and understands the nature of the testamentary act.

Here, T is married, and is thus presumably over 18. Additionally, he drew up a document purporting to be his will, entitling it "Will of Ted," and made dispositions of his property, mentioning cash and community property. He left gifts to his friend, his stepson, his wife and his daughter. Therefore, it can be said that he knew the extent of his property, his relations with others, and the nature of the testamentary act. Therefore, T had capacity to make this will.

Present Testamentary Intent

A testator must also have the present intent to make the will effective upon his death. Here, because of the reasons above, and the fact that he had Dot and Jane sign it as witnesses, likely satisfies T's intent to make this will effective. Therefore, present testamentary intent is satisfied.

Attested Will Validity

An attested will is a witnessed will. In order to be valid, the will needs to be in a writing, signed by the testator, the signature was either done in the joint presence of 2+ witnesses or acknowledged in the joint presence of those witnesses, the witnesses both sign during the testator's lifetime, and the witnesses understand that they are witnessing a will.

Here, T drafted an instrument purporting to be his will, dated and signed it. Additionally, he approached Jane and Dot, while they were both together, and said “This is my signature on my will. Would you both be witnesses?” Therefore, he acknowledged his signature on his will written within the joint presence of 2+ witnesses.

However, after he acknowledged the signature, only Jane signed immediately. Dot did not sign until the next day. However, for attested wills the witnesses do not need to both be present when one another sign; they just both need to be present when T acknowledges his will. Therefore, this requirement was satisfied, and Dot validly signed it as a witness the next day.

Because both witnesses signed in T’s lifetime, both witnesses were present when T acknowledged his signature, and they both understood they were witnessing his will by T’s statement and identification of the instrument.

Therefore, this was a valid attested will.

Interested Witness Problem

A witness is deemed to be interested if they are a witness to the will and also take under the will. However, this does not affect the validity of the will for lack of witnesses but has an impact on the interested witnesses’ gift. Therefore, even though D takes under the will, she can still be a witness. Her gift will be discussed below.

Additionally, while J is also a witness and named in the will, she is not an interested witness since she is only named in an executor capacity.

Holographic Will

A will can be valid as a holographic will if all material terms are in the testator’s handwriting, and the testator signs the will. All material terms refer to the naming of gifts and beneficiaries. Here, this writing was all typed and not in T’s own handwriting. Therefore, this would not be a valid holographic will.

Terms of Will

Since the 2000 will is valid, the disposition of T’s estate will be pursuant to it unless it is otherwise altered or revoked. The terms are as follows:

$10,000 to his stepson

$10,000 to D

All of my share in community property to T's "wife"

Residue to J.

b. Rights of Bertha

Under the will, all of T's interest in community property was to go to "his wife." T has $300,000 of a community property interest in the house he owned with Bertha. Bertha will argue that this allows her to take his share of the community property for two reasons:

Is the reference to "my wife" an act of independent significance

A will can allow the completion of a gift to be made based on an event to be happening in the future. This is called an act of independent significance. The requirements for a valid act of independent significance are that the event has an independent significance outside of the wills making process.

Here, T stated that his share of community property would go to "his wife." Therefore, this gift is conditional on T having a wife at his death. Because marriage is separately significant from the wills making process, this is a valid gift conditioned on an act of independent significance, and will allow B to take the $300,000 community property interest.

Valid Codicil

A codicil is an instrument that amends, alters, or revokes a will. In order for it to be valid, it needs to comply with the formalities required for wills.

Here, B will argue that T's 2012 handwritten note that identifies B as T's wife under the 2000 will is a valid codicil allowing her to take the community property share in the house. Thus, the validity of this instrument depends on its compliance with formalities.

Attested Will

See the rules for attested wills above. This instrument would not qualify as an attested will because it is not witnessed. Therefore, it cannot be a valid testamentary instrument on this basis.

Holographic Will

See the rules regarding holographic wills above. Here, this was signed by T and was in his own handwriting. It describes that all references in his will are to B. Therefore, all material terms are set out, and in T's own handwriting. Therefore, this is a valid holographic codicil.

Incorporation by Reference

A testamentary instrument is allowed to refer to an instrument to complete the gifts if the instrument clearly refers to a written document, that document is in existence at the time of execution of the instrument, and it was the testator's intent for the document to be incorporated into his will.

Here, in the 2012 instrument, T clearly identified his prior will, that will was already in existence, and it was T's intent to incorporate the will into this current instrument as he uses the instrument to explain that all references are to B. Therefore, his prior will was validly incorporated to complete the gift in the 2012 instrument.

Therefore, B will take T's $300,000 community property interest in the home.

c. Rights of Sam

The 2000 will makes a gift to T's "stepson," of $10,000. However, T's stepson is not identified by the instrument.

Ambiguities

At common law, parol evidence (evidence outside of the will) was not allowed to correct a patent defect under the will. Parol evidence was only allowed to cure latent ambiguities. A will was patently defective if the identity of a beneficiary cannot be ascertained.

Here, the gift only mentions T's stepson, which would seem to be S, but since T is no longer married to Wilma from her death, and it does not appear B has any son of her own from a prior marriage, it is unclear if there is a stepson any more. Therefore, under common law, this gift would fail for lack of an identifiable beneficiary.

However, CA allows all parol evidence in to clear up any ambiguities, whether latent or patent, in order to more closely effectuate the intent of the testator.

Therefore, S will be able to introduce evidence that he was, when the 2000 will was drafted, T's stepson, and it was T's intent that the gift should go to S. This evidence will likely be properly admitted by the court to allow the gift to pass to S.

Therefore, S will likely take the $10,000.

d. Rights of D

Under the 2000 will, D will claim a gift of $10,000.

Interested Witness Problem

The issue presented is that D was a witness to the 2000 will as well as a beneficiary. If a witness to the will is also a beneficiary, there is a rebuttable presumption that the witness exercised undue influence in the drafting process. If the witness is a relative, they are still allowed to take the gift up to what their intestate share would have been; however, non-relatives, who would not have an intestate share, do not take at all.

Here, D is a non-relative since she is specifically listed as T's friend. Therefore, if she is unable to rebut the presumption, she would take nothing under the will. She can rebut this presumption by showing with clear and convincing evidence that there was no undue influence. Here, there are no facts suggesting that D procured her gift improperly: T typed up the will on his own, later executed a codicil as discussed above without validating the gift to D, and there was nothing said by D regarding her gift when T asked her to sign. Therefore, the presumption is likely rebuttable, and D can take her $10,000 gift even as an interested witness.

Republication by Codicil

When a valid codicil is executed, it updates the date of execution of the will to the date that the codicil was executed. Here, as discussed above, T had executed a valid codicil in 2012. Thus, the will has been republished by codicil. Additionally, because it was deemed to be a re-execution of the will, any prior interested witness problems with the will are cured unless the interested witness was also a witness to the codicil who takes a new gift under the codicil.

Here, as discussed above, T executed a valid codicil in 2012, and this codicil was holographic. D did not witness this instrument, nor was she named in it. Therefore, this has been a republication which cured the interested witness problem posed by D being a witness and a beneficiary under the 2000 will.

Therefore, even if D could not rebut the presumption of undue influence, she will take her $10,000 gift because of republication by codicil.

e. Rights of C

As discussed above, S will get $10,000, D will get $10,000, and B will get T's $300,000 community property interest. Therefore, there is $280,000 left undisposed in T's estate.

The leftover of an estate that is disposed of by will is referred to as the residue. Unless there is a direction of disposition, the residue is distributed by intestate succession. However, a testator can include a residue clause which leaves the residue of his estate to an identified beneficiary.

Here, T set out that the residue of his estate was to go to his daughter C. Therefore, C is a residuary beneficiary, and thus will be able to take the $280,000 not specifically disposed of under the will.

Therefore, C gets $280,000 out of T's $300,000 separate property.

Q6 Remedies

Paul owns a 50-acre lot in the country. Doug owns a smaller unimproved lot to the north. A stream runs through Paul's lot near the boundary line with Doug's lot. Paul has a house at the south end of his lot and uses it for summer vacations. He plans to build a larger house in the future.

Doug began to clear his land to build a house. To do so, he had to fell trees and haul them to a nearby lumber mill. He asked Paul if he could take a short cut across Paul's lot to the mill, and Paul agreed.

On his first trip, Doug dumped the trees on Paul's lot near the stream, in a wooded area Paul was unlikely to see, much less use. Several of the trees rolled in the stream, blocking its natural flow.

Paul left for the winter. As a result of the winter's normal rainfall, the stream overflowed, causing water to rush down to Paul's house at the other end of the lot, flooding his garage and damaging a 3-year-old motorcycle.

Paul returned in the summer and learned what had happened. It will cost $30,000 to remove the trees. The trees' presence on the lot has depressed its market value from $50,000 to $40,000. It will cost $5,000 to repair the motorcycle, and $4,000 to buy a new one.

What intentional tort claims can Paul reasonably bring against Doug and what remedies can he reasonably seek? Discuss.

Answer A

License

Doug may first claim that there have been no intentional torts committed against Paul. He may argue that he had permission to do what he did. Paul will admit that he did give Doug a license. A license is a permission to use another's land in a particular way. A license need not be in writing or evidence any of the formalities of an easement. However, a license is freely revocable.

Scope of the license.
Importantly, a licensee may only act within the scope of the license. Here, Paul gave Doug permission to cut across his land with his lumber. Doug had represented to Paul that he intended to bring the trees to a lumber mill. As such, the license only involved temporarily passing through the land with the lumber. It did not include Doug dumping the trees. Where a licensee exceeds the scope of his license, he trespasses on the land.

Trespass to Land

Trespass to land occurs when an individual intentionally invades the real property of another. The trespasser need not know the land is not his own – he need only intend to go where he goes or do what he does. Another important aspect of the rule is that trespass can occur with more than just the trespasser's body. When a trespasser causes a physical object to go onto the land of another, he has trespassed, even if his body does not actually break the relevant plane.

Trespass to land also occurs when a licensee (or any other guest) goes to a part of the land where he does not have permission to go. Here, Paul can reasonably claim that Doug did exactly that – he caused a physical object (the trees) to go exceed the scope of the license (being dumped into the forest). Doug may claim that he had permission to have the trees in this area – however, this permission was for transitory passing through – by allowing the trees to stay, Doug trespassed. Moreover, Doug likely further trespassed by allowing the trees to go into the stream. It is not clear what caused the trees to roll away – however, it seems quite foreseeable that dumping a bunch of trees close to a stream might end up in a few of the trees going into the stream. Assuming this is a reasonably foreseeable consequence of Doug's actions, the trees in the stream would be a further trespass.

Remedies for the Trespass to Land

Legal Remedies

Law prefers money damages. As such, the first question will be whether Paul can recover any legal damages for the trespass to land that Doug has committed. Damages will be accorded to a plaintiff if four conditions are met: the tort was the actual cause of the damages, it was the proximate cause of the damage, the damages are certain and ascertainable, and there was no failure to mitigate.

Actual cause.
A tort is an actual cause of damages when the damage would not have caused but for the tort. This element is fairly easily satisfied here. We are told that the rainfall was normal, suggesting that the flooding would not have normally occurred. Since the rainfall was normal, the best explanation for the actual cause of the flooding was the blocked river, which would not have happened but for the trespassory dumping of the trees. As such, this element is met.

Proximate cause.
A tortfeasor is only liable for those damages that are proximately caused by his tort. Proximate cause is a question of foreseeability – where the result is a foreseeable result of the actions of the tortfeasor. At the point where the damages become unforeseeable, law is willing to cut off liability and let the damages fall on the victim.

Here, Paul will plausibly be able to argue that all of the damages were reasonably foreseeable. The first step is that the blocking of the river was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of dumping the trees. This is discussed above – the trees going in the river is certainly foreseeable.

The next step is whether the flooding was reasonably foreseeable. Doug may argue that the rain was an "Act of God" that should cut off his tort liability. He will lose this argument though – critically, there was only normal rainfall during the winter season. Normal rainfall is practically by definition not an Act of God, and as such should be reasonably foreseeable.

The next step is whether the flooding of the house was reasonably foreseeable. We are not given many facts here. Doug may argue that it was odd that the water would flow across a large, 50-acre plot of land and flood the house. However, this is likely foreseeable. Doug knew about Paul's house, and he knew where the stream was. A reasonable person should have been alert to the possibility that flooding over the course of an entire season should cause flood damage.

The final step is whether the damage to the garage and motorcycle are foreseeable. This comes closer to the eggshell skull doctrine that you take your victim as you find him – once you flood someone's garage, you are arguably liable for all the damage to the valuables therein. However, even sticking with merely proximate cause, the damage to the motorcycle is foreseeable. The motorcycle is not especially valuable or special. It is a normal vehicle and it suffered a normal amount of damage given flooding. As such, Paul would likely be able to recover damage to his motorcycle via the trespass to land theory (the precise amount is discussed below).

Additionally, it is fairly easy to see that the decrease in the market value of the property is reasonably foreseeable. Having your river backed up and your property flooded will tend to make the land worth less. As such, Paul would likely be able to recover, at least, for the decrease in property value (whether he will get this amount or the amount to remove the trees is discussed below).

Certainty.

Certainty does not seem to be an issue here. We know precisely how much it will cost to repair the bike or buy a new one, and how much the property value has been decreased. The only issue is if there is other damage to the garage that has not been accounted for. Any damages would need to be certain and ascertainable.

Mitigation.

A plaintiff has a duty to mitigate the damages wherever possible. There are several reasons to think this won't bar damage. First, he was gone for the winter, so he would not have been able to mitigate. Second and more importantly, the trees were dumped in an area where Paul was unlikely to see them. As such, mitigation would not have been reasonable. Paul is not under any duty to mitigate damages he should not ordinarily be aware of.

Mitigation may also play a role in deciding on the damage given for the motorcycle. Doug will reasonably argue that Paul could mitigate the damages by simply buying a new motorcycle instead of repairing his old one, since the price is $1000 less. This is a good argument. Unless there is some special value that should give Paul a right to repair his own motorcycle, Paul is likely only entitled to the $4000 cost to replace the bike as a form of mitigation. Indeed even this might be too much. Doug need only put Paul in the place where he found him, with a three-year old motorcycle. The value of this may well be less than $4000. This is discussed more in the conversation section below.

Trees or property value.

One of the most difficult questions the court will face will be whether to award Paul the $30,000 to actually remove the trees or only the $10,000 for the decrease in the property value. Giving both amounts is likely inappropriate, since it seems that the decrease in property value is attributable to the presence of the trees.

On the one hand, Doug will argue that it would be wasteful to spend $30,000 to remove the trees when the decrease in property value is only $10,000. He will argue that if Paul didn't like the trees, he would be better off to simply sell the land and buy new land.

However, Paul has a strong counter: law recognizes that land is unique. Paul has a right to have trespassory items taken off the land, since, to Paul, the land is implied to have special value. Since the land is unique, and since Paul is entitled to be put into the condition he would have been on had the trespass not occurred, Paul is entitled to have the trees actually removed, despite the higher cost. As such, Paul should be able to recover the $30,000 and not the $10,000.

Restitutionary remedies

Paul might alternatively be able to recover restitutionary remedies. Restitution is appropriate where the tortfeasor has been unjustly enriched by his activities. Here, Paul might be able to argue that Doug effectively used his land as a tree storage space instead of taking the trees to the lumber mill. Paul might even argue that the value of this storage is $30,000, since that is how much it costs a person to move the trees away, or $10,000, since that may be equivalent to the amount of property value diminution Doug avoided by moving the trees. However, these values are not particularly certain, and we'd probably need more evidence to know the proper value that was conferred on Doug by simply leaving the trees on Paul's land.

Injunction

Paul might also ask for an injunction. Specifically, he may request that Doug actually remove the trees. For an injunction to be appropriate, there the legal remedy must be inadequate, the injunction must be enforceable, and we must balance the hardships. There must also not be any defenses.

Inadequate Legal Remedy.

Doug's best argument here is that there is an adequate legal remedy. To wit: since we know that it would cost $30,000, the court could simply give that amount of damages if it concluded that the trees needed to be moved. Moreover, it seems that Doug could also make Paul whole by giving him $10,000 to correct the decrease in property value of his land. As such, since it is not clear why a legal remedy would be inadequate, an injunction is probably inappropriate.

Enforceable.

Even if an injunction would be appropriate, here it would be questionable whether it would be enforceable. Affirmative injunctions are disfavored since they require supervision. Perhaps it would not require much time to move the logs. Nevertheless, making sure that Doug has actually performed would be troublesome, although not impossible.

Balancing hardships.

Since the conduct was willful, most courts would not balance the hardships. Nevertheless, it is doubtful whether forcing Doug to remover the trees would cause any significant hardships.

Defenses.

There are no valid defenses. Doug might point to laches (the failure to bring an action in a reasonable amount of time), but this argument fails because Paul was not on his land for the winter and could not have known about it sooner.

Ejectment

Another possible remedy is ejectment. Ejectment allows a person in rightful possession of land to eject a trespasser who is present on his land. This action is only appropriate where the trespasser is still on the land. Here, the ejectment action would be equivalent to an action to have Doug remove the trees, since the trees are the only item or person which remains as an invasion of Paul's property. For this, see the earlier section on the injunction.

Trespass to Chattel and Conversion

Trespass to chattel occurs when someone intentionally interferes with the possessory right to another's chattel. This can occur in two ways: the trespasser can actually deprive the owner of the chattel temporarily or permanently, or the trespasser can cause damage to the chattel. Here, the latter has occurred. The motorcycle is chattel of Paul. Because of Doug's trespass, the chattel has been harmed, thus interfered with Paul's possessory rights.

Doug may argue that he did not intentionally interfere with the chattel. However, intentionality here only refers to the intention to do the actions that eventually gave rise to the trespass, a general intent. The question would be whether the actions that Doug engaged in reasonably foreseeably caused the damage to Paul's motorcycle. Please see the discussion above related to foreseeability. Paul has a strong claim that the dumping of the trees foreseeably caused the flooding, which foreseeably caused the damage to Paul's garage and bike. Since all these steps are foreseeable, Paul would likely be able to recover from Doug via a trespass to chattel theory.

The remedies to this theory of tort liability turn on the distinction between trespass to chattel and conversion. These torts are largely overlapping – the main difference is one of degree. Conversion consists of the trespass to another's chattel that so interferes with his right to possession that the owner is entitled to a replacement of the chattel. Essentially this is a "forced sale," where the tortfeasor has to pay the reasonable market price of the chattel.

A court would most likely find that the trespass consisted of conversion. The key fact is that the repair cost of the motorcycle is more than the cost to purchase a new one. This suggests that the damage is quite extensive, and that Paul should have the right to force a sale of the motorcycle on Doug for its reasonable fair market value.

Damages.
As stated above, the damages for conversion is the fair market value of the chattel. Here, we are only told that it would cost $4000 to buy a new motorcycle. But Doug will argue that this is actually an overcompensation: Paul should be entitled to the fair market value of his motorcycle. The motorcycle is three years old, while it costs $4000 to buy a brand new motorcycle. As such, Paul can reasonably argue that the appropriate damages are actually somewhat less than $4000 and should be whatever it costs to buy a 3-year-old bike.

Punitive Damages

Paul may well try to seek punitives. Punitive damages have three requirements: there must be actual damages awarded, the punitives must be proportional to the actual damages, and the conduct must be more than negligent. Here, Doug's conduct seems intentional, at least at the outset. He may argue that he did not actually intend any harm, which would diminish any argument for punitives. However, since he did indeed intentionally trespass, and since the damages were reasonably foreseeable, he may well be able to get punitive damages.

Nominal Damages

Even if none of the above damages hold up, Paul would likely be able to get nominal damages, which are awarded when there is a violation of someone's rights but there are no actual damages.

Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress

This tort requires outrageous conduct that causes severe emotional distress in the plaintiff. The conduct here is probably not so transgressive of all bounds of human decency. And, most importantly, we are not told anything about the emotional consequences that Paul suffered.

Battery

Battery requires an intentional conduct with another's person that would be considered harmful or objectionable to the ordinary person. Here, Doug's actions did not so contact Paul.

Answer B

Paul (P) v. Doug (D)

Trespass to land.

Trespass to land is an intentional interference with one's possession of his land. The only interference necessary to constitute a trespass is the entry onto one's land because a person has a right to possess their land, free from others. The entry need not be by a person, but can be by a chattel caused to enter by the defendant.

Here, there are several instances in which D might have trespassed on P's land.

Doug's first trip.

Doug entered Paul's land initially with intent to cross it in order to bring the trees to the lumber mill. This was an intentional entry. Further, this interfered with P's possession because P was no longer in exclusive possession of his land. Therefore, D's entry was potentially a trespass to land.

Defenses: consent.

Where one has consent to commit an intentional tort, this will generally function as a complete defense.

Here D "asked Paul if he could cut across Paul's lot to the mill, and Paul agreed," thereby affecting his consent. Therefore, D has a defense of Paul's consent to part of the trespass, to the extent that it was to "cut across Paul's lot to the mill" this trespass will be excused. To the extent that D's actions exceeded the scope of this consent, D will be liable to P for trespass.

Leaving the trees on Paul's land

A trespass can also be a "continuing trespass," by leaving of chattels that the defendant caused to be present on the plaintiff's land, on the plaintiff's land.

Here, D likely is responsible for his continuing trespass by "dumping trees on Paul's lot near the stream in a wooded area [where] Paul was unlikely to see [them]." Note that D's dump[ing]" was likely done intentionally, and not negligently, satisfying the intent requirement for trespass to land. It makes no difference whether or not P was aware (except in his actual awareness to bring this action in tort) in order to constitute trespass. The interference with possession need not affect Paul's use and enjoyment— it is an interference with possession. Placing these trees on P's lot is sufficient trespass to constitute a continuing trespass, and Doug will be liable for this, as well.

Defenses: consent.

D will argue consent, for the same reasons above. It will fail, as the scope of the consent granted was very narrow - to cross P's land, not to dump trees on P's land.

Defenses: necessity.

D may argue that he had a necessity to dump the trees on P's land, thereby alleviating him from responsibility for all but the actual damage caused by his trespass. This will not work, as there is nothing in the record to suggest that D had any private necessity.

Trees rolling down and blocking the stream.

Transferred intent.

When a defendant acts with the requisite intent to commit a tort, the fact that another intentional tort is committed in a different manner will still have the original intent, even if the exact ends are not what the defendant foresaw.

Here, D will argue that he did not intend for the trees to roll down the hill and block the stream. P will counter that as D had the intent to "dump the trees," that this intent should be transferred to the unintentional consequence of blocking the river. A court is likely to accept P's argument as courts are more willing to hold tortfeasors liable than innocent plaintiffs.

Proximate cause.

Proximate cause is not generally at issue in intentional torts, but it merits addressing here. In order to determine if D is liable for the following, it must be clear that he was the proximate cause of the damages. This requires determining whether it would be foreseeable at the time D committed his tort that this harm might occur.

Here, it is very foreseeable that intentionally blocking the stream would be foreseeable. The amount of rain that caused the flood was the "winter's normal rainfall." D may argue that he did not foresee it because his only experience with the area was as the owner of a "small unimproved lot." Apparently, D was not a resident of the area. However, blocking a stream with trees and leaving for winter, it would be foreseeable that it might flood and cause damage to the nearby property. Accordingly, on this theory alone, D will be liable to P for the damage issues that follow. However, in an attempt to hold D liable for as many torts as possible, potential intentional tort theories are also discussed.

Paul's motorcycle

Trespass to chattels.

There is a possible argument that D's original trespass's intent transfers sufficiently to constitute a trespass to the chattel that was P's three-year-old motorcycle. A trespass to chattel is an intentional interference with the use and enjoyment of the chattel.

Here, D intentionally set into motion the events that caused P's motorcycle to be damaged. Provided that this causal chain is sufficiently clear for the court, the court will find that this constituted a trespass to chattel, relying on the doctrine of transferred intent.

Conversion.

A severe interference with P's chattel so significant as to justify the Defendant being forced to pay the market value of the good at the time of the interference is known as conversion. Importantly, transferred intent does not apply to conversion.

Here, as the intent to harm P's motorcycle likely came from the transfer of intent from D's dumping of trees, there is likely not basis to find that D intentionally interfered with P's motorcycle in a sufficient manner to constitute conversion.

P's garage.

Trespass to land: garage.

For all of the reasons noted above, D will be liable to P's land for damage done to the garage, under a trespass to land theory.

Remedies.

Damages.

The underlying theory of damages in Tort is to place the plaintiff in the position as if the tort had never been committed. Further, under the doctrine of "thin shell plaintiffs," the D is liable for all harm proximately caused (as discussed above) whether economic, noneconomic, or property.

Trespass to land.

Nominal damages.

Nominal damages are recoverable where there is no harm to the land.

Accordingly, P will be able to recover the essentially declaratory relief of D's fault, in a nominal damage claim for the exceeding of P's consent in trespass to land.

Actual damages.

Actual damages are also recoverable in a trespass to land tort, where they occur. The calculation is either diminution in value of the property or cost to repair the property. As courts abhor waste, they tend to award the lowest dollar amount, but on a factual consideration may award one or the other.

Diminution in value.

The diminution in value is the decrease in value of the property. Here, D will argue that this is the appropriate amount that should be awarded.

The trees' presence on the land (as caused by D), has decreased the value of the land $10,000, from $50,000 to $40,000. D will argue, and some courts will agree, that as this is the lower cost (cost of repair is $30,000), this should be awarded to avoid waste and forfeiture. However, many courts will award against D as he is the more wrongful party.

Cost of repair: removal of the trees.

The cost of repair is the cost to bring the land back to how it was before the tort was committed.

In this case, the tort caused trees to be present on the land and to remove them would cost $30,000. The fact that Paul has owned this 50-acre lot for a significant amount of time (potentially) and uses it for summer vacations will go in favor of the court awarding cost of repair. That P was "unlikely to see, much less use" the area where the trees were is not as important as the fact that P "plans to build a larger house [on the lot] in the future." Courts will be likely to award the diminution in value as P intended to continue using the land and to build a bigger house on the land.

Punitive damages.

Punitive damages are available in cases where the tort was committed willfully. Here, there is nothing to suggest that D dumped the trees willfully and with intent to harm P, so punitive damages are unlikely to be awarded.

Special damages.

If the court views the garage and the motorcycle not as separate torts, but as special damages caused by D's trespass to land, damage to repair those costs (or potentially to replace the motorcycle—discussed below) will be awarded.

Defenses: avoidable consequences.

P will not be able to recover for damages that he could have reasonably avoided.

Here, there is nothing in the record to show that P could have avoided any of the damages caused by D's tort. D may attempt to argue that P's recovery should be reduced because P "left for the winter," thereby increasing the amount of damages. D may, unpersuasively, argue that had P been present, he could have stopped the flood and prevented the damage to his garage and his motorcycle. This is, as indicated, unpersuasive because P's duty to avoid consequences is a reasonable one, and it is unreasonable to assume that someone will stay at their house, avoiding floods.

Trespass to land: garage.

The same damage discussion as above would apply if the court determines that the garage was a separate trespass to land.

Trespass to chattel or conversion.

Conversion.

Despite the doctrinal limitations of transferred intent, as noted above, there is an interesting remedy issue with conversion. If the court were willing to consider the motorcycle as being damaged so significantly as to constitute a conversion, the remedy is the fair market value at the time of conversion, and the tortfeasor gets title to the converted chattel. It is a forced sale.

Here, oddly, D may argue that this should be considered a conversion so that he need not pay the $4,000 for a “new one” (assuming that “new one” means the fair market value of a three-year old motorcycle). P may well be happy with this, depending on the extent of the damage to his motorcycle.

Trespass to chattel.

The proper remedy for trespass to chattels is cost of repair. Here, there is a $5,000 dollar cost to repair, so it is possible that P will argue that this is the appropriate measure of damages. D will argue, as noted above, that the damages should be limited at the replacement value of 4,000 and this may well be persuasive.

Restitution.

Restitutionary damages.

Restitutionary damages seek to disgorge any unjust enrichment from the defendant by making the defendant pay the plaintiff any ill-gotten gain.

Here, P will argue that D received an unjust benefit because he did not have to pay (do you have to pay?) to have the lumber taken to the lumber mill, and rather was able to avoid that cost by dumping the trees on P’s land. There is nothing in the record to indicate the value of this, so no further discussion will be had as to valuation.

Ejectment.

Ejectment is a legal restitutionary remedy that removes trespassers from land.

Here, P may argue that an ejectment action may be a proper means for placing the entire burden on D to remove the trespassing logs. This is not a typical use of an action in ejectment, but perhaps. . .

Injunction.

P may seek an injunction.

A permanent injunction is an equitable remedy. It requires that there be no adequate remedy at law, that there be a feasible enforcement of the injunction, that the hardships balance in favor of granting of the injunction, and that there are no defenses.

Here, P will argue that the remedies discussed above are not adequate because he wanted to maintain the property as it had been before the trespass. P will rely on the fact that courts are particularly sensitive to the nature of real property as unique and may well consider the legal remedy inadequate.

Feasibility may well work too. While the courts are generally reluctant to order a mandatory injunction requiring the D to do some affirmative act (here—removing the trees) they may well do that here. It would be a one-time enforcement and would not require supervision over a long period of time.

Hardships.

Hardships balance in favor of the plaintiff. He was entirely innocent in this case, according to the record. D wanted to not have to take the trees to the lumber mill but wanted the benefit of having his lot clear so that he could build a house. D was almost lazy and avoiding costs whereas P was innocent. There is nothing to place on P's scale and, therefore, the injunction should grant.

CALIFORNIA BAR EXAMINATION

This publication contains the six essay questions from the February 2013 California Bar Examination and two selected answers to each question.

The answers received good grades and were written by applicants who passed the examination. The answers were prepared by their authors, and were transcribed as submitted, except that minor corrections in spelling and punctuation were made for ease in reading. The answers are reproduced here with the consent of their authors.

California Bar Examination

Answer all three questions.

Your answer should demonstrate your ability to analyze the facts in the question, to tell the difference between material facts and immaterial facts, and to discern the points of law and facts upon which the case turns. Your answer should show that you know and understand the pertinent principles and theories of law, their qualifications and limitations, and their relationships to each other.

Your answer should evidence your ability to apply the law to the given facts and to reason in a logical, lawyer-like manner from the premises you adopt to a sound conclusion. Do not merely show that you remember legal principles; instead try to demonstrate your proficiency in using and applying them.

If your answer contains only a statement of your conclusions, you will receive little credit. State fully the reasons that support your conclusions, and discuss all points thoroughly. Your answer should be complete, but you should not volunteer information or discuss legal doctrines that are not pertinent to the solution of the problem.

Unless a question expressly asks you to use California law, you should answer according to legal theories and principles of general application.

Q1 Criminal Law and Procedure

Max imports paintings. For years, he has knowingly bought and resold paintings stolen from small museums in Europe. He operates a gallery in State X in partnership with his three sons, Allen, Burt, and Carl, but he has never told them about his criminal activities. Each of his sons, however, has suspected that many of the paintings were stolen.

One day, Max and his sons picked up a painting sent from London. Max had arranged to buy a painting recently stolen by Ted, one of his criminal sources, from a small British museum.

Max believed the painting that they picked up was the stolen one, but he did not share his belief with the others.

Having read an article about the theft, Allen also believed the painting was the stolen one but also did not share his belief.

Burt knew about the theft of the painting. Without Max's knowledge, however, he had arranged for Ted to send Max a copy of the stolen painting and to retain the stolen painting itself for sale later.

Carl regularly sold information about Max's transactions to law enforcement agencies and continued to participate in the business for the sole purpose of continuing to deal with them.

Are Max, Allen, Burt, and/or Carl guilty of:

(a) conspiracy to receive stolen property,

(b) receipt of stolen property with respect to the copy of the stolen painting, and/or,

(c) attempt to receive stolen property with respect to the copy of the stolen painting?

Discuss.

Answer A

(a) Max, Allen, Burt, and Carl's liability for conspiracy to receive stolen property

Max

The issue is whether Max is liable for conspiracy to receive stolen property.

Conspiracy requires (i) an agreement, express or implied, to accomplish an unlawful objective or to accomplish a lawful objective with unlawful means, (ii) an intent to agree to commit conspiracy, (iii) an intent to achieve the unlawful objective, (iv) an overt act in furtherance of the objective of the conspiracy.

(i) Agreement

There was no express agreement among Max and any of his sons, Allen, Burt, and Carl that the paintings were stolen. Max has knowingly bought and resold paintings stolen from small museums in Europe, and operates a gallery in State X with his sons. Max never told them about his criminal activities; thus there was no way they could have expressly agreed to commit the conspiracy. However, Max and Ted have an agreement, because Max had arranged to buy a painting recently stolen by Ted, one of his criminal sources.

There was no implied agreement among Max and his sons because there is no circumstance or conduct to indicate that they were in agreement. Max never affirmatively ensured that his sons were additionally compensated for keeping it a secret that they were undergoing criminal acts, nor had any of them given Max an indication confirming their understanding even if no explicit words were exchanged regarding the conspiracy. Here, each of his sons suspected that many of the paintings were stolen. However, Max had no idea that his sons might be aware. When Max picked up the painting that he thought was stolen, he did not share this belief with the others.

(ii) Intent to agree to the conspiracy

There must be at least two guilty minds to be liable for conspiracy. Under the minority jurisdictions, unilateral intent is sufficient if the guilty mind genuinely believed that the other non-guilty mind had the intent to agree to the conspiracy. There was no intent to agree to commit the conspiracy because Max never shared his beliefs with the others that he was dealing with stolen paintings. Here, Burt did not share his knowledge about the theft of the painting. Nor did Carl have an intent to agree, because he was solely continuing to participate in the business for the sole purpose of selling the information to the police. Thus, there could not have been an intent to agree to the conspiracy with either Burt nor Carl based on the majority rule. Under the minority approach, there is still no intent to agree because the facts indicate that Max did not tell Carl about his illegal activities and nothing suggests Carl shared his information with Max. Because there was no agreement in the first place among Max and any of his sons, Max did not have the intent to agree to commit the conspiracy.

Max and Ted have the intent to agree to the conspiracy, as evidenced by Max's arrangement to pick up the painting that Ted stole.

(iii) Intent to achieve the unlawful objective

There must be an intent to achieve the objective, which here is the intent to receive stolen goods. Max had the intent to receive the stolen goods because he has knowingly bought the paintings stolen from small museums in Europe.

(iv) Overt act in furtherance of the objective

There must be an overt act in furtherance of the objective, which is anything including mere preparation. Here, Max committed an overt act when he picked up the painting which he thought was the stolen painting.

Max is guilty of conspiracy with Ted.

Allen

See rule above.

(i) Agreement

Allen did not enter into an agreement to commit the conspiracy because even though he suspected that many of the paintings were stolen, and that he believed the one stolen by Ted was stolen, he did not share his belief with others.

(ii) Intent to agree

Allen did not intend to agree to the conspiracy because he did not share his belief that the painting may have been stolen with others. He only learned that the painting was stolen from reading an article and not from the other members.

(iii) Intent to achieve the objective

Allen may have had the intent to achieve the objective because he did nothing to stop the receipt of the stolen paintings.

(iv) Overt act

An overt act was the picking up of the painting sent from London.

Thus, Allen is not liable for conspiracy.

Burt

See rule above.

(i) Agreement

Burt made no agreement to enter into the conspiracy, because even though he suspected that they were stolen, and knew about the painting, he did not share his knowledge with the others. However, Burt has an agreement to enter into the conspiracy with Ted, because he arranged for Ted to send Max a copy of the stolen property and to retain the stolen painting itself for sale later.

(ii) Intent to agree

Burt had no intent to agree with the others, because he did not tell Max, and he arranged for Ted to send Max a copy of the stolen painting and to retain the stolen painting itself for sale later. However, Burt had the intent to agree with Ted, given that Ted was the other end of the deal and he arranged for Max to receive the stolen painting.

(iii) Intent to achieve the objective

Burt had the intent to achieve the objective because he knew the painting was stolen, and was going to sell it later at a more convenient time to gain a personal benefit.

(iv) Overt act

Overt act was committed when they picked up the painting from London.

Thus, Burt is liable for conspiracy with Ted.

Carl

See rule above.

(i) Agreement

Carl made no agreement to enter into the conspiracy.

(ii) Intent to agree

As discussed under Max's discussion, in the majority jurisdiction, because two guilty minds are necessary, there is no intent to agree since Carl was acting solely to sell the information to the police, and not to actually engage in the unlawful conduct. However, under the unilateral approach, one guilty mind, Max's guilty mind, would be sufficient for Max to be guilty of conspiracy. However, Carl would not be liable because he has no intent to agree himself.

(iii) Intent to achieve the objective

Carl has no intent to steal property, but is only participating to sell the information to the police.

(i) Overt act

Overt act was committed when the painting was received from London.

Conclusion

Because there is no agreement to conspire, neither are liable for conspiracy with each other, but Burt and Max are liable for conspiracy as a result of their individual agreements with Ted.

(b) Max, Allen, Burt, and Carl's liability for receipt of stolen property with respect to the copy of the stolen painting

Co-conspirators are liable for the target crime and any crimes committed in furtherance of the conspiracy. As above, anyone who was liable for the conspiracy would be liable for the crime of receipt of stolen goods. However, the target crime of receipt of stolen goods did not occur because it was a copy of the stolen painting. Thus, no liability for the target crime at this point.

Receipt of stolen property requires (i) receipt or control of stolen property, (ii) of personal property by another, (iii) with the knowledge that the property was obtained in a way that constitutes a criminal offense, (iv) with the intent to permanently deprive.

Max

Max knew the property was obtained in a way that constituted a criminal offense, because he arranged to buy the painting recently stolen by Ted, one of his criminal sources. A painting is personal property, and it was stolen by another, Ted. He had the intent to permanently deprive because his motivation was to resell the stolen paintings. However, he did not actually receive or come into control of the property because the one he received was actually not stolen. Thus, he is not liable.

Allen

For the same reasons as Max, Allen is not liable because he did not actually receive the stolen painting.

Burt

For the same reasons as Max, Allen is not liable because he did not actually receive the stolen painting.

Carl

For the same reasons as Max, Allen is not liable because he did not actually receive the stolen painting. Further, Carl did not have the intent to permanently deprive because he was only working with the police so that the police could regain the stolen property and return it to its rightful owner.

Conclusion

Because no one actually came into receipt or control of the stolen property, they cannot be liable for the copy of the stolen painting.

(c) Max, Allen, Burt, and Carl's liability for attempt to receive stolen property with respect to the copy of the stolen property

Attempt requires the specific intent to achieve the criminal act and a substantial step in the direction of the commission of the act or dangerously close to the commission of the act.

Max

Max had the specific intent to receive stolen property. He believed that the painting was the stolen one. Even an unreasonable mistake would negate specific intent. However, if the facts were as he believed them to be, it would have been a crime, and thus, his intent cannot be negated. Mistake of fact is no defense. He committed a substantial step when he picked up the painting from Ted.

Allen

Allen also believed the painting was stolen because he read an article about the theft. Even if the stolen painting was not actually stolen, mistake of fact is no defense, and the act would have been criminal had the facts been as he believed them to be, and thus, he is also liable for attempt.

Burt

Burt knew about the theft of the painting. He had specific intent to receive the stolen painting. But as to this copy, he had arranged for it to be simply a copy, and had told Max to retain the stolen painting for sale later. Thus, he had no specific intent to receive stolen property when he picked up the copy of the painting. Thus, he is not liable for attempt.

Carl

Carl suspected that many of the paintings were stolen. However, he did not have the specific intent to receive stolen property. He did not intend to permanently deprive because he was merely working with the police.

Conclusion

Max and Allen are liable for attempt, but Burt and Carl are not.

Answer B

A. Conspiracy to Receive Stolen Property

The crime of conspiracy requires: (1) an agreement between two or more people to accomplish an unlawful or fraudulent purpose, and (2) an overt act taken in furtherance of the conspiracy. Under the majority rule, all parties to the conspiracy must agree to pursue the unlawful or fraudulent purpose; however, under the minority rule, the agreement of only one participant is sufficient to establish the conspiracy (for instance, in circumstances where one participant conspires in an effort to commit a crime and the other is an undercover law enforcement officer). Regarding the overt act requirement, nearly any act taken by any co-conspirators in furtherance of the unlawful objective will suffice.

Co-conspirators are liable for both conspiracy as a separate crime, for and all foreseeable crimes committed by any co-conspirators in furtherance of the unlawful objective. There is no doctrine of merger applied to conspiracy, and thus one may be convicted of both conspiracy and the underlying crime(s) committed in furtherance of it. A co-conspirator need not personally participate in an underlying crime committed by a co-conspirator in furtherance of the conspiracy, so long as the crime was a foreseeable result of the unlawful objective.

In this case, there was no express or implied agreement between M, A, B, and C to receive the painting stolen by and acquired from T. Agreement among co-conspirators need not be in writing and need not even be expressed orally, but rather can be implied from conduct and knowledge under the circumstances. However, there must be some evidence of an understanding and meeting of the minds among the parties of the conspiracy that they will pursue an unlawful objective for conspiracy liability to occur. Here, while M certainly had the requisite knowledge and intent to receive stolen property, he did not do anything to obtain the agreement of A, B, or C to do anything in furtherance of that objective. In fact, M never told any of his sons that he regularly bought stolen paintings from Europe, nor did he share his belief as to the specific painting in question being the stolen one. Far from agreeing with them to receive stolen property, he was trying to shield them from that fact. Moreover, the mere fact that A. B, and C suspected their father's nefarious activities does not suffice to create an implied agreement between any or all of them and him to pursue that common unlawful objective, as they neither shared those suspicions and/or knowledge with M or with each other. Nor does it matter that A believed the painting was stolen (and that the one they picked up was the stolen one), as he never did anything, through words or conduct, to share that belief. The same is true for B and C -- though each independently suspected or knew of their father's activities, there is nothing to suggest that through words or conduct, an agreement was reached between M, A, B, and C (or any subcombination of them) to receive stolen property. Thus, there is no conspiracy liability for M, A, B, and C here.

Moreover, if evidence of an agreement existed, there would also be a question as to whether C's role sufficed to show an agreement among the co-conspirators. As noted above, under the majority rule, all co-conspirators must agree to pursue an unlawful objective. Thus, C's status as informant to law enforcement and participation for the sole purpose of continuing to deal with law enforcement would destroy his agreement to further the objective in question. As a result, under the majority rule there would be no conspiracy for this reason as well. Under the minority rule, however, the agreement of only one participant will do, and thus there would be an agreement, if evidence of it existed, notwithstanding C's status.

If evidence of such an agreement did exist, however, the overt act requirement would be satisfied. The four of them going to pick up the painting that T had sent from London would qualify as an overt act in furtherance of a conspiracy, as nearly any conduct that is in furtherance of the objective in question will qualify.

Further, if an agreement existed, the defense of impossibility would not be available to M and his sons. While a defense of legal impossibility would work (i.e., if the objective of the conspiracy is not actually illegal, there can be no conspiracy liability for agreeing to commit a lawful act), here the defense would be factual impossibility (i.e., that though they had hoped to receive a stolen painting, it was not in fact the stolen one but rather a copy). Factual impossibility is not a defense to crimes in general, nor is it to the crime of conspiracy, and thus if evidence of an agreement had existed it would not prevent their guilt.

Lastly, M and T may well be guilty of conspiracy to steal and/or receive the stolen painting. M and T agreed for T to sell the stolen painting to M, and T took the act of sending the copy and arranging for payment in furtherance of the conspiracy. Similarly, B has conspired with T, and if he receives the stolen painting from T, he may face conspiracy liability for the theft and/or receipt or sale of the painting as well.

B. Receipt of Stolen Property

The crime of receiving stolen property requires that the defendant: (1) receive property that has been wrongfully taken from the rightful owner with the intent not to return it to its true owner, and (2) know that the property in question was wrongfully taken from its rightful owner. A defendant's knowledge may be express or implied under the circumstances, and, furthermore, the knowledge requirement may be met if the defendant under the circumstances is "willfully blind" to the fact that the property has been stolen.

In this case, however, the painting that M, A, B, and C received was not in fact stolen. Thus, they will not be guilty of having received stolen property based on their receipt of the copy. However, if B later does receive the true stolen painting from T, he would be guilty of this crime. With regard to receipt of the copy, however, B is not guilty for the reason that the copy was not stolen and for the additional reason that he knew that it was not the stolen item in question, and thus could not be found to have known or be willfully blind to the fact that it was stolen.

M, A, B, and C might also argue factual impossibility, as discussed above. However, since one of the prima facie elements of this crime is that the property is in fact stolen and that element is not met under these facts, there is no need to apply this defense here.

If M and his sons had received the authentic stolen painting, even in the absence of a conspiracy agreement among them, each of M, A, B, and C would be guilty of this crime. M and B plainly knew it was stolen, and A believed it was from the article, making his knowing receipt of the true article a crime (absent his immediately returning it to the authorities). C regularly sold information about M to the authorities, and thus also likely knew the painting was stolen. Thus, if they had received the true painting, each would be guilty of receipt of stolen property.

C. Attempt to Receive Stolen Property

Attempt is a specific intent crime. It requires: (1) that the defendant take sufficient action toward the completion of a crime, and (2) specifically intend to commit that crime. There is a split of authority as to the appropriate test to use for determining whether a defendant has done enough to constitute an attempt. While all courts agree that "mere preparation" for the crime is not sufficient to impose criminal attempt liability, some courts require that the defendant take a substantial step toward the commission of the crime. Other courts require instead that the defendant come dangerously close to succeeding in committing the underlying crime in question. Unlike conspiracy, the crime of attempt is subject to the doctrine of merger, meaning that if a defendant actually does commit the underlying crime, the attempt merges into the completed crime, and the defendant thus cannot be liable both for attempt and for the completed crime.

M and A: In this case, M knew the painting had been stolen and believed the copy was the real thing, and A also knew it had been stolen and believed that this one was the real thing. Thus, M and A each specifically intended to commit the crime of receiving stolen property. Moreover, each took a substantial step toward doing so, and came dangerously close, by picking up the copy of the painting. But for B's dirty double-crossing of his father and brothers, M and A would have succeeded in committing this crime. Thus, each of M and A is guilty of attempt to receive stolen property, regardless of the fact that the painting they picked up was a copy.

M and A will argue factual impossibility, as discussed above. However, this defense will fail, as factual impossibility is not a defense in general, nor is it a defense to attempt. After all, if M had tried to pickpocket someone's wallet but that person had left their wallet at home, M would nonetheless be liable for attempted larceny. So it is here with regard to attempt liability.

B: B presents a different case. Clearly he took a substantial step toward and came dangerously close to committing the crime, but he did not specifically intend to commit the crime of receiving stolen property by taking the copy of the painting. He in fact knew that the painting they picked up was a copy, and had not been stolen, and thus lacked specific intent. Thus, B would not be guilty under these circumstances for attempted receipt of stolen property by taking the copy of the painting sent from London. As noted above, he may be guilty for other conduct -- such as actually receiving the true stolen painting if T sends it to him, or for receiving proceeds of the sale of the true stolen painting under his agreement with T.

C: C, however, did believe that the painting that he picked up with the others was in fact stolen, and thus, like M and A, would be guilty for attempt. The fact that he was participating with law enforcement would not change this fact. C might be able to obtain immunity from prosecution as a result of his assistance, but absent a grant of immunity, he would be guilty along with M and A of attempted receipt of stolen property.

Q2 Professional Responsibility

Carol, a woman with young children, applied to rent an apartment owned and managed by Landlords, Inc. Landlords, Inc. rejected her application.

Believing that Landlords, Inc. had rejected her application because she had young children, Carol retained Abel to represent her to sue Landlords, Inc. for violation of state anti-discrimination laws, which prohibit refusal to rent to individuals with children.

Landlords, Inc. retained Barbara to represent it in the lawsuit. Barbara notified Abel that she represented Landlords, Inc.

Abel invited Ford, the former manager of rental properties for Landlords, Inc., to lunch. Ford had participated in the decision on Carol's application, but left his employment shortly afterwards. Abel questioned Ford about Landlords, Inc.'s rental practices and about certain conversations Ford had had with Barbara regarding the rental practices and Carol's application.

During a deposition by Barbara, Carol testified falsely about her sources of income. Abel, who attended the deposition, suspected that Carol was not being truthful, but did nothing.

After the deposition ended and Carol had left, Barbara told Abel that Landlords, Inc. would settle the dispute for $5,000. Abel accepted the offer, signed the settlement papers that day, and told Carol about the settlement that night. Carol was unhappy with the amount of the settlement.

What, if any, ethical violations has Abel committed? Discuss.

Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

Answer A

Any ethical violations Abel may have committed will have arisen out of his representation of Carol. Carol's rental application was denied by Landlords, Inc. (Landlord). Carol retained Abel as her attorney because she believed Landlords rejected her application because she has young children, which would be a violation of the state's anti-discrimination laws.

Abel's Lunch with Ford

Duty of Fairness

An attorney owes a duty of fairness to his opponent. In this case, Abel owes a duty of fairness to Barbara, Landlords' attorney.

An attorney may not communicate with the opposing party or its employees without the opposing party's attorney's consent or presence. While it may be permissible for an attorney to communicate with low level employees, communication with a high level employee requires the opposing party's attorney's consent. In this case, Abel invited Ford, Landlords' former manager of rental properties, to lunch. Abel knew Barbara was Landlords' attorney because she had notified him of her representation. Nonetheless, Abel did not ask Barbara's permission before he invited Ford to lunch. However, Ford had left his employment with Landlords shortly after Carol's application had been denied, so he was no longer an employee of the opposing party. On this other hand, he participated in the decision to deny Carol's application. Abel would argue he did not act unethically because a former employee may speak with whomever he or she wishes. Barbara would counter that Ford had just recently been a high level employee and Abel should have obtained her consent before speaking with Ford one-on-one. However, Abel likely did not commit an ethical violation because Ford was no longer an employee of Landlord.

Attorney-Client Privilege

The attorney-client privilege is an exclusionary rule of evidence. It is held by the client and may be invoked to prevent the attorney from disclosing information that arose out of the client seeking professional advice from the attorney during their relationship. A corporation is also protected by the privilege. Conversations between high level employees and the corporation's attorney are privileged. In this case, it is again important that Ford was no longer an employee of Landlord. By the time Barbara was retained by Landlords, Ford had apparently already left his job at Landlords. Thus, his conversations with Barbara would not be protected by the privilege because he was no longer a high-level employee such as a manager.

Carol's Deposition Testimony

Duty of Confidentiality

An attorney owes a duty of confidentiality to his client. Under the ABA Model Rules (ABA), an attorney may not disclose anything related to the representation without the client's consent. California does not have such a rule, but the Attorney's Oath requires a lawyer to "maintain inviolate" the secrets of his client. Abel owes a duty of confidentiality to Carol. In response to any ethical questions about not revealing his suspicions that Carol testified falsely at the deposition, Abel would likely claim that he could not say anything without violating his duty of confidentiality.

Exceptions

Under the ABA, there are exceptions to the duty of confidentiality to prevent substantial harm or death or great financial loss. California law limits the exception to substantial harm or death. Carol's false testimony related only to her sources of income which does not implicate substantial bodily harm or death. Likewise, even if she was trying to recover more from Landlord by lying about her income this probably does not rise to the level of the serious financial loss exception recognized by the ABA. Further, these exceptions are permissive so they would not require Abel to disclose anything.

False Testimony

Under ABA, when a lawyer knows his client will give or has given false testimony the lawyer must counsel the client not to do so, attempt to withdraw from the case, and finally tell the judge if the attempt to draw is unsuccessful. In California, an attorney may not tell the judge but must allow his client to testify in a narrative fashion. Further, the attorney must counsel the client not to lie. Even though Carol's testimony was given during a deposition and not a trial, it was still given under oath and thus Abel should have counseled Carol not to lie (and attempted to withdraw and if he could not then have gone to the judge if ABA controls). However, Able will argue that he only suspected Carol was lying, he did not actually know. While Abel probably should have done further investigation to determine if his client was being truthful, he has not acted unethically by doing nothing because he did not know if Carol was lying.

Settlement

After the deposition Abel accepted Barbara's offer to settle with Landlords for $5,000 by signing it that day without telling his client. Abel did not inform Carol of the settlement until that night and Carol was unhappy with the amount.

Duty of Competence

A lawyer has a duty to competently represent his client. A lawyer must use the knowledge, skill, thoroughness, and preparation required to do so. Included in the duty of competence is a duty to communicate with the client.

Duty to Communicate

An attorney must keep his client up to date on the case. The attorney must give the client enough information so that she can make intelligent decisions going forward. In this case, Abel did not inform Carol of Landlord's offer to settle for $5,000. All settlement offers must be related to the client. While the attorney may make strategic decisions during the representation, whether to accept or reject a settlement offer is a substantive decision that must be made by the client. Thus, Abel acted unethically when he first did not tell Carol about the offer and second when he accepted it without her consent.

Answer B

Abel's Ethical Violations

Abel's Lunch with Ford

Under both the ABA and CA rules, a lawyer cannot speak to a represented party. Abel was notified that Landlords, Inc. was represented by Barbara. A lawyer cannot speak to the employees of a represented person or corporation in the absence of opposing counsel. Here, Abel invited Ford, Landlord, Inc.'s former manager of rental properties, to lunch with him. Since Ford was a former employee and no longer employed by Landlord, it was not improper for Abel to speak with Ford to investigate the facts of his client, Carol's, case. A lawyer owes his client a duty to diligently advocate his client's case to completion and thoroughly investigate all facts and locate relevant witnesses who will support his client's case. However, in diligently advocating for one's client, the lawyer must conduct himself with integrity, honesty, fairness and good faith in respect to the public, his adversary, the court and to the legal profession.

Here, although Abel's lunch meeting with Ford was not a violation of any ethical duty, Abel crossed the line into unethical territory when he asked Ford about certain conversations Ford had with Barbara regarding the rental practices and Carol's application. Abel was aware that the information he was inquiring about was covered by Barbara's duty of confidentiality to Landlord, Inc. and would also be privileged and inadmissible in court or at a deposition under the evidentiary attorney-client privilege, if that privilege was invoked by Landlord, Inc. Although Ford was currently a former employee, at the time Ford had the conversations with Barbara, he was an employee of the corporation and was speaking within the scope of his employment relationship and those conversations were made in confidence to the corporation's attorney. By asking these questions to Ford without advising him that such information was covered by the attorney-client privilege, Abel violated his duty of fairness and honesty to his adversary and his actions reflected negatively on his integrity and respect for the legal profession.

Carol's Deposition

During Carol's deposition by Barbara, Abel suspected that Carol had testified falsely about her sources of income but Abel did not do anything to correct Carol.

Duty of Honesty and Candor to Tribunal and Adversary

A lawyer owes the court and his adversary a duty of candor, fairness and honesty. A lawyer cannot knowingly offer a false statement of law or fact to the court and upon learning of the falsity, the lawyer owes a duty to the court to correct the false statement. Here, Abel suspected that Carol testified falsely at her deposition. Deposition testimony is taken under oath under penalty of perjury and thus if Abel knew Carol had falsely testified or intended to testify falsely, then he would have allowed her to commit perjury which he has an ethical duty to try to avoid without prejudicing his client. Here, the facts do not indicate that Abel knew for certain that his client had testified falsely, nor do the facts show that Abel had knowledge that Carol had planned to testify falsely. Upon becoming suspicious of Carol's false testimony, Abel owed the court a duty to investigate whether or not the statement was false and to persuade his client to correct the false statement on her own. During the deposition, Abel should have asked to stop the deposition briefly to speak to his client in private, and should have persuaded her that if she was not being truthful, to go back into the deposition and correct herself and restate accurate information. Abel should have advised his client that she was under oath and that the deposition transcript could later be used against her and could ultimately harm her case if not corrected as soon as possible. If at that point Carol refused to correct her false testimony, and Abel was certain that she had committed perjury, he should have sought to withdraw as her counsel, as long as his withdrawal would not severely prejudice her case, because not doing so would continue to confer a falsity upon the court.

Duty of Confidentiality

Under the ABA and under CA, Abel would not be able to disclose the false statement to the court or to Barbara because doing so would breach his duty of confidentiality to Carol. A lawyer owes his client a duty to keep all confidential information related to the representation confidential and not to disclose such information without the client's consent. There are some exceptions where a lawyer is permitted to reveal confidential information, such as where a dispute arises between the lawyer and the client which allows the lawyer to reveal confidential information to the extent necessary to defend himself, or under the ABA and CA where disclosure of confidential information is necessary to prevent certain death or risk of substantial bodily injury or under the ABA where disclosure is necessary to prevent or mitigate fraud or substantial financial loss where the lawyer's services were used in furthering the fraud or financial injury. Here, no exceptions apply to allow Abel to disclose Carol's perjury so Abel's only option if she will not correct the false statement is to withdraw.

Settlement

Abel violated several ethical duties to his client by settling the case without his client's input and consent.

Duty to Communicate

A lawyer owes his client a duty to communicate by informing his client of all developments in the case and by informing his client of all settlement offers. The lawyer is free to make tactical decisions, such as trial strategy, but the client must make all decisions about the case, including whether or not to accept a settlement offer. A lawyer cannot accept a settlement offer without his client's approval and consent. Here, Abel accepted Barbara's settlement offer of $5,000 without informing Carol of the offer and obtaining her approval and consent to settle at that amount. By accepting the offer, signing the agreement and telling Carol after the fact, Abel breached his duty to communicate to Carol.

Duty of Diligence and Duty of Competence

By accepting and signing the settlement offer without Carol's input and approval, Abel also violated his duty to diligently represent Carol to the case's completion as well as breached his duty of competence. A lawyer owes a client a duty to diligently see the case to completion and zealously advocate for the client. Here, Abel breached that duty by terminating the case right after his client's deposition, by accepting a settlement offer without his client's input. The facts do not indicate whether Abel had previously deposed Barbara's client, but if not, accepting the settlement before having the opportunity to do so, prevented Abel from learning more information that could have potentially increased the value of his client's case. Furthermore, since Carol was not happy with the settlement and probably would not have approved it, Abel did not zealously represent his client's interests.

A lawyer also owes his client a duty of competence, which requires the lawyer to represent his client with the knowledge, skill, preparation, experience and thoroughness that a competent lawyer would exercise under the same circumstances. A competent lawyer would not have accepted the settlement offer without consulting his client and without negotiating a larger amount and without being confident that his client was receiving a fair amount under the circumstances. Since Abel did not consult with his client nor try to get her a better offer, Abel breached his duty of competence as well as his duty of care.

Q3 Remedies

In 2004, Mary and Frank orally agreed to jointly purchase a small storefront space in City for $80,000. Mary contributed $40,000 of her own money. Frank contributed $40,000 he had embezzled from his employer, Tanner. Mary and Frank agreed to put the property in Frank's name alone because Mary had creditors seeking to enforce debts against her. They further agreed that Frank would occupy the property, which he planned to use as an art studio and gallery. They also agreed that, if and when he vacated the property, he would sell it and give her one half of the net proceeds. He then occupied the property.

In 2005, Tanner discovered Frank's embezzlement and fired him.

In 2012, Frank sold the property, obtaining $300,000 in net proceeds. Frank offered to repay Mary her $40,000 contribution, but Mary demanded $150,000.

Mary and Tanner each sued Frank for conversion.

At trial, the court found Frank liable to both Mary and Tanner for conversion.

1. What remedy or remedies can Mary reasonably obtain against Frank for conversion, what defenses (if any) can Frank reasonably raise, and who is likely to prevail? Discuss.

2. What remedy or remedies can Tanner reasonably obtain against Frank for conversion, what defenses (if any) can Frank reasonably raise, and who is likely to prevail? Discuss.

Answer A

(1) Mary v. Frank

Mary's Remedies. There are several possible remedies Mary can obtain for the tort of conversion.

Tort of Conversion. The tort of trespass to chattels or conversion occurs when the defendant wrongfully interferes with the plaintiff's right to possess property. This tort constitutes the trespass of chattels when the interference is not so severe as to constitute conversion. The damages for trespass to chattel are the cost of repairing the property. The tort of conversion occurs when the interference with the plaintiff's personal property is substantial and severe. The damages for conversion are the fair market value of the property at the time and place of conversion.

In this case, Frank is guilty of converting Mary's 1/2 interest in the storefront space as his own. He is liable for conversion, and the damages would be 1/2 of the fair market value of the storefront space at the time of conversion. In this case, the conversion occurred when Frank failed to give Mary her 1/2 of the net proceeds. Thus, under tort law, her damages would be 1/2 of the fair market value of the storefront space when Frank failed to give Mary her 1/2 of the proceeds. If the sale of the storefront space for $300,000 was close enough in time to the conversion, then a court can find that Mary is owed $150,000 for the conversion.

Purchase Money Resulting Trust. A purchase money resulting trust occurs when one party purchases property, but another party supplies the consideration. The other party must have supplied consideration before the purchasing party obtains title. In such a situation, the court imposes a resulting trust on the purchasing party, construing her as a trustee holding the property in trust for the beneficiary, which is the party who supplied consideration. Because the resulting trust is a remedy implied at law, the requirements to create a valid trust are not required.

In this case, there is a purchase money resulting trust between Mary and Frank. They orally agreed to purchase a storefront space for $80,000, and each agreed to contribute $40,000. The title was placed in Frank's name alone, but Mary supplied one-half of the consideration required to purchase the storefront space. If Mary can show that she contributed the $40,000 before Frank took tile, then she is entitled to a purchase money resulting trust as a remedy. Mary can likely show that she contributed money before Frank took title, since the full purchase price of real property is usually conveyed before the deed to title is transferred.

Pro Rata Resulting Trust. Where the party who supplied consideration for the purchase of real property did not provide the total consideration, but only partial consideration, the court will construe a resulting trust in an interest pro rata to the amount of consideration supplied by the party.

In this case, Mary only supplied one-half of the consideration for the storefront space. Thus, she will be construed as having a 1/2 interest in the storefront space. However, the storefront space itself has been sold. Equitable rights to property are cut off by a sale to a bona fide purchaser who pays value and has no notice of prior wrongdoing. There is no indication in this case that Frank did not sell the property to a bona fide purchaser. Thus, because Frank already sold the storefront space, Mary will be deemed as having a 1/2 interest in the net proceeds from the sale. Under a pro rata share of a purchase money resulting trust, her remedy would be $150,000, which is 1/2 of the $300,000 in net proceeds that Frank obtained for selling the property.

Constructive Trust. Similar to the resulting trust, a court can impose a constructive trust on the defendant, which construes the defendant as holding property in trust for the plaintiffs. This remedy applies where the defendant has wrongfully obtained title to the plaintiff's property, and the defendant's retention of such property would result in unjust enrichment. The plaintiff can trace the property to another form, as long as the trust res can be identified. Additionally, the plaintiff is entitled to any increase in value in the property to avoid unjust enrichment to the defendant. Where the property has been commingled with other funds and withdrawals have reduced the account's balance below the plaintiff's claim, the plaintiff is entitled to the next lowest intermediate balance.

In this case, Mary would argue that she obtained a 1/2 interest in the storefront property when she contributed $40,000 for its purchase. This 1/2 interest was wrongfully appropriated by Frank when he sold the house and retained all proceeds except for the $40,000 he was willing to give Mary. Additionally, Frank's retention of the 1/2 interest would amount to unjust enrichment because he only contributed 1/2 of the purchase price himself (and those funds were embezzled). Furthermore, Mary can trace her 1/2 interest to $300,000 in net proceeds that Frank obtained from selling the property, she is entitled to the increase in value under the remedy of constructive trust, and there is no indication that the funds have been commingled with other funds or withdrawn to a balance lower than $150,000. Frank would argue that he is entitled to a greater interest because he did more work by occupying the property, improving it, and selling it. However, Frank is likely to lose this argument because of the oral agreement he had with Mary. Mary is likely entitled to a constructive trust, compelling Frank to pay her $150,000.

Equitable Lien. Similar to a constructive trust, a court can impose an equitable lien on the defendant's property in favor of the plaintiff. This remedy is appropriate where the defendant misappropriated the plaintiff's property under circumstances giving rise to a debt or obligation owed to the plaintiff, the property can be traced to the defendant, and the defendant's retention of the property would result in unjust enrichment. Like the constructive trust, the defendant can trace the property to another form as long as the res can be identified. However, unlike the constructive trust, the plaintiffs are not entitled to any increase in value in the property under an equitable lien. Where the property has been commingled with other funds and withdrawals have reduced the account's balance below the plaintiff's claim, the plaintiff is entitled to the next lowest intermediate balance.

The analysis for whether Mary would be entitled to an equitable lien is the same as the analysis conducted above for a constructive trust because Frank's misappropriation of Mary's 1/2 interest in the property gave rise to a debt owed to Mary for that amount. However, under the remedy of equitable lien, the court would impose an equitable lien in the amount of $150,000 in Mary's favor on the net proceeds that Frank received.

Specific Performance & Replevin. Specific performance and replevin are remedies where the defendant retains possession of the property in question. They do not apply here since Frank no longer owns the storefront property.

Damages. When a plaintiff also sues for conversion, she may be able to obtain damages for lost use of the property during the time it is wrongfully appropriated by the defendant. Mary here may be able to obtain additional damages if a substantial amount of time has passed between the conversion and her ability to obtain a remedy in court.

Frank's Defenses.

Statute of Frauds. The statute of frauds requires that any interest in real property, other than a lease for one year or less, be in a writing, signed by the party to be bound and identifying the related material terms and conditions. In this case, Mary and Frank's oral agreement pertained to an interest in real property; thus, it must be in writing in order to be enforced. Frank will most likely be able to raise the defense of statute of frauds to defeat Mary's remedies. If this is this case, Mary may be able to argue that she is entitled to restitutionary damages instead of the remedies above. Restitutionary damages grant damages in the amount that the defendant is unjustly enriched by.

Unclean Hands. Unclean hands are a defense where the plaintiff has engaged in misconduct related to the transaction sued upon. In this case, Frank would likely argue that Mary had unclean hands in the transaction because she agreed to put the title in Frank's name alone to avoid creditors who were seeking to enforce debts against her. He would argue that her avoidance of her creditors is misconduct, is related to their agreement to purchase the storefront space, and thus, bars Mary from obtaining a remedy. However, Frank's argument is likely to fail because Mary's decision to put the title in Frank's name alone was unlawful, and her motivation to avoid creditors was not illegal. Thus, Mary's right to remedies would not be barred by unclean hands.

(2) Tanner v. Frank

Tanner's Remedies.

Tort of Conversion. See rule above. In this case, Frank committed conversion when he wrongfully appropriated $40,000 from Tanner, rendering him liable for damages to Tanner.

Purchase Money Resulting Trust. See rule above. In this case, although Tanner was unaware of it at the time, it contributed $40,000 to the purchase of a small storefront space in City, which was then titled to Frank. If it can show that it contributed this $40,000 before Frank obtained title, then Tanner is entitled to a purchase money resulting trust as a remedy. It is likely that Tanner can show this, since title to property is usually transferred to the buyer after the buyer conveys the full purchase price.

Pro Rata Resulting Trust. See rule above. Since Tanner contributed only 1/2 of the consideration for the property, it is entitled to a 1/2 interest in the property. As noted above, a sale to a bona fide purchaser cuts of equitable rights to title, and there is no indication that Frank did not sell the property to a bona fide purchaser. Because Frank already sold the property, Tanner has a 1/2 interest in the $300,000 in net proceeds from the sale.

Constructive Trust. See rule above. In this case, Tanner would argue that it obtained a 1/2 interest in the storefront property when it unknowingly contributed $40,000 to its purchase. The 1/2 interest was wrongfully appropriated by Frank when he embezzled it from Tanner in 2004. Frank's retention of the 1/2 interest contributed by Tanner would result in unjust enrichment because the $40,000 did not belong to Frank, and Frank supplied no consideration from his own funds to the purchase of the property.

Furthermore, Tanner can trace its 1/2 interest to the $300,000 in net proceeds that Frank obtained from selling the property, it is entitled to the increase in value under the remedy of constructive trust, and there is no indication that the funds have been commingled with other funds or withdrawn to a balance lower than $150,000. Thus, Tanner is likely entitled to a constructive trust in 1/2 of the $300,000 in net proceeds, which is $150,000.

Equitable Lien. See rule above. The analysis for whether Tanner would be entitled to an equitable lien is the same as the analysis conducted above for a constructive trust because Frank's embezzlement of $40,000 from Tanner gave rise to an obligation to repay Tanner. However, under the remedy of equitable lien, the court would impose an equitable lien in the amount of $150,000 in Tanner's favor on the net proceeds that Frank received.

Frank's Defenses.

Laches. Laches applies where the plaintiff has unreasonably delayed in bringing a lawsuit, and that unreasonable delay prejudices the defendant. The time for laches begins running when the plaintiff first learns of the injury. In this case, Frank would argue that he initially embezzled the $40,000 in 2004, and Tanner discovered the embezzlement in 2005, but that Tanner did not bring suit until 2012, which prejudiced Frank. While the seven years that Tanner waited between learning of its injury and filing suit amounts to an unreasonable delay, there is no evidence that Frank's ability to defend himself has been prejudiced. Thus, Tanner cannot successfully raise this defense, unless he can show that he has been prejudiced in his ability to defend himself.

Answer B

What remedy or remedies can Mary reasonably obtain against Frank for conversion, what defenses (if any) can Frank reasonably raise, and who is likely to prevail?

Mary's Remedies

Mary has several avenues she can pursue to try and recover damages from Frank.

Constructive Trust

The most promising remedy Mary can pursue against Frank is a constructive trust. A constructive trust is an equitable remedy whereby a court requires a person who wrongfully acquired title to property to hold that property as a forced trustee and to return it to its rightful owner. Although it will not defeat a bona fide purchaser, it does allow tracing. Moreover, a constructive trust will allow a person to recover any increase in value of the property. This remedy is generally only allowed when money damages would be inadequate.

Here, Mary will argue that she and Frank both owned the property and that he converted the property they owned when he sold it to another person. Because it appears that a bona fide purchaser bought the property, Mary will not be able to recover the house.

Tracing

However, a constructive trust allows a party to trace their converted property. Here, Mary gave Frank $40,000, this went into a home, and then the home was sold for $300,000. Mary will be able to argue that the money she put into the home can be traced to the home and then to the sale and that a constructive trust of one-half of the sale price should be placed on the $300,000 proceeds that Frank gained from selling the property. This is likely Mary's best argument because a constructive trust will make Frank the trustee and require him to pay the increased money over Mary's $40,000.

Money Damages Inadequate

Mary will likely also be able to show that general tort damages are inadequate. Under general tort recovery from conversion, the individual is entitled to receive the market value of the item that was converted at the time it was converted. It could be argued that the $40,000 was converted when Frank took the property, leaving Mary entitled to only $40,000. Accordingly, damages would not be sufficient. Moreover, there is the risk, that without forcing Frank to be the trustee, he could spend the money, become insolvent, and leave Mary without any remedy.

Equitable Lien

Mary could also argue that an equitable lien should be placed on Frank's bank account. An equitable lien is also an equitable remedy whereby a person who acquires the personal property of another can have a court put a lien on that property. It is generally most useful when the property of another has been used to improve some other property or where the property has decreased in value and the owner of the property is seeking a deficiency judgment.

Here, Mary may argue that she should be entitled to an equitable lien, but this would be substantially less attractive than a constructive trust. For one thing, the value of the property, which can be traced, has increased significantly and can be secured through a constructive trust. For another thing, under the equitable lien theory tracing is not allowed. Thus, Mary would not be able to trace her money to the value of the increased value of the property that is now in the form of cash proceeds. Accordingly, this theory is less attractive to Mary.

Damages

As mentioned previously, Mary could be entitled to damages for conversion. But traditional tort damages for conversion allow recovery for the value of the property at the time it was converted. Here, it could be argued that the property was converted at the time that Frank took possession of the home. This would potentially limit Mary's recovery to $40,000.

Restitution

Mary could also argue that she is entitled to restitution. Restitution is a remedy that is available to prevent a party from being unjustly enriched at the expense of another. Here, it could be argued that a court should split the $300,000 that Frank received from the sale in half because if it was not for the contribution that Mary made, he would not have purchased the property and would not have later sold it at an enormous profit. For these reasons, restitution for the $150,000 that Frank made in the subsequent sale may also be a viable option.

Frank's Defenses

Frank is likely to assert several defenses.

Adverse Possession

Frank may argue that he adversely possessed the property after occupying it for 8 years by himself and thus gained title to the full share. This will fail because he had Mary's permission to occupy the property.

Laches

Laches is a defense that arises because a party takes such a long time to bring a cause of action that it materially prejudices the opposing party. This defense will likely fail. There is no indication that Mary waited an exceedingly long time to sell the property.

Statute of Frauds

Frank may also argue that Mary's agreement is barred by the statute of frauds. The statute of frauds is a defense that a party cannot assert to prevent a claim that a contract existed. It is applicable to an alleged contract to purchase or sell land, which must be in writing, signed by the grantor and include a purchase price. But this defense will likely not apply here. While the underlying issue involves an agreement regarding land, Mary is not suing to force the sale or purchase of property; rather, she is suing for money that was converted. Accordingly, this defense will likely not stand.

Unclean Hands

Frank's best argument will probably be unclean hands. The doctrine of unclean hands applies, especially in the equity context, to prevent a party from recovering where that party was involved in bad behavior relating to the underlying transaction. Here, Mary entered the agreement with Frank and put the property in his name for the purpose of avoiding creditors who were seeking to enforce debts against her. Accordingly, Frank could argue that Mary cannot recover in equity here because her own bad conduct was involved.

Who will likely prevail?

Under these facts, unless the court deems that Mary's conduct of trying to avoid creditors will bar her under the doctrine of unclean hands, she is likely to prevail. She will most likely seek a constructive trust or restitution for the additional money gained from the sale.

What remedy or remedies can Tanner reasonably obtain against Frank for conversion, what defenses, if any can Frank reasonably raise, and who is likely to prevail?

Tanner's Remedies

Tanner, like Mary, has several remedies it can seek against Frank.

Constructive Trust

See above definition. Tanner will argue that a constructive trust should be imposed because the money that Frank embezzled from them was used to purchase the property. Embezzlement consists of unlawfully obtaining title to the property of another by a person in lawful possession. Based on the facts here, Frank embezzled the $40,000 from Tanner and thus obtained title to it.

Tracing

Under a constructive trust, tracing is allowed. Here, Tanner will argue that the $40,000 was spent to purchase the property so title can be traced to the property, and when the property was sold, $150,000 of the $300,000 sale price can be traced to the original $40,000. While it may be argued that a constructive trust does not apply here because this is an instance where the property of another was used to improve other property, that is likely not the case. The $40,000 was used to purchase property that was kept in Frank's name and then sold with the proceeds going to Frank.

No adequate damages remedy

A problem may arise for Tanner in this instance if Frank can show that an adequate damages remedy would just be forcing him to pay back the $40,000 that he had converted. This problem may prevent Tanner from successfully having a constructive trust set up to recover the $150,000.

Equitable Lien

See above definition. An equitable lien may also be an option, but as mentioned previously, funds cannot be traced using an equitable lien. As a consequence, the money that was taken from Tanner would not be able to be traced to the home and then to the bank account. Accordingly, this option is not viable.

Damages

Tanner may just argue that it is entitled to damages for the money take. As mentioned, damages for conversion are the market value of the property at the time it was converted. Here, Tanner will be able to show that it is entitled to the $40,000 that was taken from it.

Restitution

Tanner may also argue that it is entitled to either the $40,000 or the $150,000 under a theory of unjust enrichment. It would be clearly entitled to $40,000 under this theory, but it may be able to argue that Frank would be unjustly enriched as a result of his fraudulent action if he is able to keep the money he made in addition to the $40,000 that he stole.

Frank's Defenses

Laches

Frank's best defense against Tanner is Laches. See above definition. Here, Frank may be able to argue that Tanner found out about the embezzlement in 2005, but did nothing until 2012. On the other hand, Tanner may argue that it was not aware that Frank had any money to make a lawsuit worthwhile until it found out that the house was sold for a significant profit. Because this is an equitable defense, a court will likely side with Tanner and not the wrongdoers.

Who will likely prevail?

Tanner will likely prevail on a theory of damages for the conversion limiting recovery to $40,000 or restitution under which the recovery for unjust enrichment of Frank could be up to $150,000. Either way, Frank's laches defense will likely not work.

ESSAY QUESTIONS 4, 5 AND 6

California Bar Examination

Answer all three questions.

Your answer should demonstrate your ability to analyze the facts in the question, to tell the difference between material facts and immaterial facts, and to discern the points of law and facts upon which the case turns. Your answer should show that you know and understand the pertinent principles and theories of law, their qualifications and limitations, and their relationships to each other.

Your answer should evidence your ability to apply the law to the given facts and to reason in a logical, lawyer-like manner from the premises you adopt to a sound conclusion. Do not merely show that you remember legal principles; instead try to demonstrate your proficiency in using and applying them.

If your answer contains only a statement of your conclusions, you will receive little credit. State fully the reasons that support your conclusions, and discuss all points thoroughly.

Your answer should be complete, but you should not volunteer information or discuss legal doctrines that are not pertinent to the solution of the problem.

Unless a question expressly asks you to use California law, you should answer according to legal theories and principles of general application.

Q4 Torts

Darla is in the pest control business. She develops and produces fumigation gas for her own use. She also sells the gas to consumers. Some of her competitors do not sell gas to consumers because consumers sometimes do not follow safety instructions.

Darla sold a container of fumigation gas to Albert for use in ridding his apartment of insects. Although she had intended to produce gas of standard toxicity, she had unknowingly produced gas of unduly high toxicity. Albert used the gas and succeeded in killing all the insects in his apartment. Because he used the gas carelessly, some made its way into the apartment of his neighbor, Paul. The gas caused Paul to suffer serious lung damage and to fear that he would contract cancer as a result.

1. Is Darla liable to Paul? Discuss.

2. If so, may Paul obtain damages from Darla for fear of contracting cancer? Discuss.

Answer A

Darla is in the pest control business and produces fumigation gas for her own use, and sells it to consumers. She unknowingly produced gas of unduly high toxicity which ended up causing Paul, a neighbor of the user Albert that bought gas from her, lung damage and fear of contracting cancer. Although Albert, who was in privity with Darla as he purchased the gas from her, was negligent in his use, there are several theories that Paul can employ to hold Darla liable for her personal injuries.

Paul can potentially sue Darla on theories of an abnormally dangerous activity that caused Paul harm, strict products liability, negligent products liability, implied warranty and express warranty and misrepresentation theories, as well as intentional tort theories.

Abnormally Dangerous Activity

A defendant will owe a plaintiff a strict duty of care, regardless of the conduct of the particular defendant, when the defendant undertakes an abnormally dangerous activity. An abnormally dangerous activity is one with a high risk of harm, that is not commonly found in the community, which has a risk that cannot be eliminated with due care. The utility is usually lower than the risk of harm. The defendant is liable if the dangerous character actually and proximately causes the plaintiff damages.

Here, Darla is in the business of developing and producing fumigation gas, which she sells to consumers. Fumigation gas contains toxins that carry a risk of harm inherently. Darla will argue this is not an inherently dangerous activity, because fumigation gas is safe in normal amounts of toxicity, and is commonly used to control pests. She will argue it is "common in the community." Paul can counter that toxic gas always carries with it a high risk of harm, and unduly high levels of gas is not common in the community. Paul will argue that the gas is so dangerous that D's competitors will not sell it to consumers for fear that warnings are not enough to abate the danger.

Darla can point out that the risk can be eliminated with due care, as people call pest control and have fumigation all of the time, and this is safe. Paul will argue that no matter the due care, chemicals always carry risk of harm to people.

Causation

Paul will argue that the dangerous character was the but-for cause of his harm, because but for the dangerous toxins, he would not have suffered lung damage and fear of contracting cancer. However, in terms of proximate cause, Darla will argue that Albert, the user of the gas, used it carelessly and the fact that the gas made its way to Paul's apartment was a supervening cause. Paul will counter that while this may have been a supervening cause, only unforeseeable intervening acts will break the chain of causation, and Albert's negligence was foreseeable, since Darla herself knew that "consumers sometimes do not follow safety instructions." It is likely that Albert's negligence does not absolve Darla here. Thus, the dangerous character of the chemicals can be said to be the actual and proximate cause of Paul's harm. If Darla's production of the fumigation gas is an "abnormally dangerous activity" then Darla is liable to Paul on this theory.

The issues of proximate cause and causation will be detailed below under the other theories of liability.

Strict Products Liability

A defendant is strictly liable in tort when the defendant manufactures, distributes, and/or sells a product that is unreasonably dangerous and thus "defective" and the dangerous character actually and proximately causes harm to a plaintiff.

Duty and Standard of Care

A defendant owes a strict duty of care to all foreseeable plaintiffs. The focus in necessarily on the character of the product, and not the actions or due care of the defendant, in a strict liability analysis.

First, it is necessary to see if P and D are proper parties. A proper defendant for strict products liability is a commercial seller of a product. This includes all parties in the chain of distribution. Here, Darla is in the pest control business. She develops and produces fumigation gas for her own use and sells it to consumers. She will argue that since she produces it for her own use, she is not a "commercial" seller and falls outside of the strict liability framework. However, Paul will rightly point out that since she "sells the gas to consumers" she is a property defendant here.

Proper plaintiff-- Strict products liability does not require privity, or a contractual relationship between the defendant and the injured party. A proper plaintiff is thus a buyer, a user, or even a bystander that is harmed. Here, Paul was not a user or purchaser of the gas; his neighbor Albert was. Albert's careless use of the gas resulted in the gas making its way into Paul's apartment and causing him lung damage from breathing the fumes. Since Paul is a "bystander" harmed by the dangerous character of the product, Paul is a proper plaintiff and has standing to sue Darla.

Defect

The defendant, Darla, is liable for a defect in the product that is unreasonably dangerous. There are three types of defects in products liability: a manufacturing defect, a design defect, and a failure to warn defect which is a subset of a design defect.

Manufacturing Defect

A manufacturing defect is a defect caused during the manufacture of the product, whereby the product becomes unreasonable dangerous as a result of a problem during the manufacturing process. The defect is a result of a "one off" problem where the product emerges more dangerous than the other products that are manufactured with it.

Here, Darla may be liable for a manufacturing defect. She intended to produce fumigation gas of standard toxicity, which is presumably safe for human use when properly manufactured, as she is in the pest control business and sells to consumers. However, Darla unknowingly produced gas that was of unduly high toxicity, and sold it to Albert. Since this gas was "unduly toxic" this can demonstrate a product that was made to be unreasonably dangerous, as a result of the production process, and is different than the normal gas.

A manufacturing defect is demonstrated by the "Consumer Expectations Test" which essentially asks, would an ordinary consumer find the product to be more dangerous than they would anticipate? Here, while adult consumers are likely aware of the attendant dangers of toxic pest control fumes, Paul can argue that consumers do not expect that they will suffer serious lung damage as a result of someone spraying to kill some bugs in their apartment. This is likely a good argument for Paul. However, Darla can argue that consumers DO expect that fumigating can cause damage if they breathe in the fumes, and it is common sense that someone should not use too much gas. Darla will point out that the same is true for other items, such as household bleach. Paul likely has the better argument here, as consumers that spray for insects would probably not expect that the gas has "unduly high toxicity." Therefore, Paul has enough facts to prove a manufacturing defect here.

Design Defect

A design defect occurs when a product as designed is unreasonably dangerous, and is measured in terms of whether there is a "reasonable alternative design" for the product that makes it more safe without impairing its utility and function and without making it unduly expensive so as to price the defendant out of the market. It may be the case that Darla's product of the gas was a design defect in terms of the way the chemicals were used. If she used a different chemical combination, she may have been able to avoid the problem of accidentally making it too toxic. However, there are no facts to show this, and it appears that Darla simply made one batch of gas too toxic. There does not appear to be a reasonable alternative design, because pest control fumigation gas is inherently toxic.

Failure to Warn Defect

If there are either no warnings or inappropriate warnings on a dangerous product, this is a type of design defect. Here, it is not clear if there were warnings and what they were. However, because Darla's competitors do not sell the gas to consumers because they don’t always heed instructions, there is some evidence that the gas does come with instructions. However, more facts would be needed to show that there were inadequate warnings here.

Causation

Actual Cause

There must be a showing not only that the product was dangerous but that the dangerous property actually caused the harm to the Plaintiff. The defect must have been present while the product was in Darla's control.

Here, but for the high toxicity levels, Albert's overuse of the product would not have caused the harm to Paul, or so Paul will argue. It is not clear if overuse of the normal gas would have caused the same problem. However, it is likely that the unduly high levels of toxicity caused the harm to Paul, when the fumes from Albert's apartment from Albert's spraying for bugs wafted into Paul's apartment. Therefore, Paul can likely argue that the dangerous defect was the actual, but-for cause of his harm.
It appears that Darla did have control of the product while it was defective, because it can be inferred that when she produced the gas with such high levels of toxicity this was the gas she sold to Albert, who used it and injured Peter.

Proximate Cause

The harm must also have been proximately caused, meaning that it was foreseeable that the harm would occur, and that the defendant created the scope of risks. A strict products liability defendant is liable for all foreseeable misuses of a product, so a misuse that is foreseeable will NOT cut off the chain of liability because it is not an unforeseeable independent or abnormal dependent event such as would break the chain.

Darla will argue that Albert's negligence was an independent intervening cause and she should not be liable for Albert's negligent use of the gas. However, it is foreseeable that users may accidentally use too much gas, or do this purposefully without understanding the true harm. In fact, this was so foreseeable that Darla's competitors have in fact refused to sell gas to customers, because customers sometimes do not follow directions. This demonstrates the danger of the product and the fact that consumers are likely to misuse the gas, and harm themselves or others. Thus, Paul will be able to show that Darla's product was the proximate cause of his harm, despite the fact that Albert was negligent.

Damages

Paul suffered serious lung damage as a result of ingesting the gas fumes. He also worried that he would contract cancer as a result. Typically, products liability actions will only allow a recovery of personal injury or property damage but Paul's emotional distress may also be parasitic to this. This will be addressed below. However, Paul did suffer his requisite damage to recover.

In sum, Paul can likely recover on a strict products liability theory.

Defenses: Assumption of the Risk?

Darla can invoke this defense, which means that one knows of a risk and voluntarily proceeds in spite of it. Paul did not know of the risks, and was an innocent bystander. Therefore, there is no defense.

Contributory Negligence

The plaintiff's conduct is not an issue and cannot be a defense in strict liability, because the focus is on the character of the property, not the parties' conduct.

Negligent Products Liability

Negligence focus on the conduct of the defendant, and not just the character of the property.

Duty

A commercial producer owes a duty of reasonable care to foreseeable plaintiffs, who are plaintiffs in the "zone of danger" per Cardozo in Palsgraf. Here, Paul was arguably in the zone of danger. Even though he was not a user, it is foreseeable that the fumes could leak out and harm people that are nearby, including neighbors. Darla will argue it is not foreseeable that someone in a different apartment would be harmed; however it is foreseeable that the toxic gas can waft.

Standard of Care

Darla owed a duty to act as a reasonably prudent producer of fumigation gas would act under the circumstances. Since others in the pest control business do not sell gas to consumers, this is evidence of a lack of prudence on her part. She unknowingly produced high levels of toxins in her gas, and should have had safety controls, monitoring, and someone to check the gas before it went out. She likely breached her standard of care here.

The analysis of causation and damages is the same as above; therefore, Darla is likely liable for strict liability as well.

Contributory Negligence

Paul was not negligent here, and thus this will not reduce a potential recovery.

Paul can recover for negligent products liability.

Implied Warranties of Merchantability

A product is deemed merchantable for its intended purpose. Therefore, Paul may be able to argue a breach here, if the product was not fit for its intended purpose and was too dangerous. However, this is likely not the issue; the spray worked well and as intended, because it killed all of the bugs in Albert's apartment here. Therefore, Paul cannot recover on this theory.

Express Warranties/Intentional Torts/Misrepresentation

Here, it does not appear that Darla made any representations to Paul at all, since she did not interact with him. Therefore, he cannot recover on express warranty or misrep theory.

Darla may be liable for battery if she knew to a substantial certainty that she would cause Paul harm but there does not appear to be evidence of this.

(2) Can Paul obtain damages for fear of contracting cancer?

Proper damages for products liability in strict liability or tort involve personal injury and property damage only. Emotional distress can constitute a personal injury, but even if it did not, it is 'parasitic' to Paul's actual physical injury of lung damage so it would likely be awarded on this theory. If fear of contracting cancer is "emotional distress" which it likely is, then it is a proper measure of damages.

Damages must be foreseeable, certain, definite, and unavoidable.

Paul can recover if his emotional distress is reasonable and foreseeable. Here, it is foreseeable that Paul would fear contacting cancer after ingesting toxic gas and suffering severe lung damage. An average person would have this fear especially since it is certain that he developed severe lung damage.

Paul could face problems proving his damages with definiteness/certainty. It is difficult to quantify this measure, and Darla will argue as such. However, a jury would weigh his suffering, and the credibility and likelihood of his distress, and award a number. Juries award damages for pain and suffering routinely, and could award damages based on "fear."

Paul did not need to mitigate here, since he was not a wrongdoer, and he cannot easily mitigate fear, unless he sees a therapist to reduce his fear, which would also cost money and be a measure of damages.

Therefore, it is likely that Paul would also recover damages for fear of contracting cancer, if this constitutes "emotional distress."

Answer B

1) Is Darla liable to Paul?

Paul may bring a variety of claims against Darla including a claim based on strict liability, products liability, and negligence.

Strict Liability

A claim for strict liability may be made when the defendant is engaged in an abnormally dangerous activity, in which case he/she owes a strict duty of care to the plaintiff, and that activity causes harm to the plaintiff. Whether an activity is considered an abnormally dangerous one requires a determination of whether the activity is common in the community and whether the defendant, taking all reasonable and proper measures to ensure safety of the activty, the risks involved in the dangerous activity cannot be completely protected against.

In this case, Darla is engaged in the business of developing and producing fumigation gas which she uses for her own purposes in addition to selling to consumers. While some of her competitors do not sell the gas to consumers because consumers sometimes do not follow the safety instructions, the use of fumigation gas to rid one's home or business of pests may arguably be considered a matter common in the community. In this case, Albert did in fact use Darla's gas to rid his house of pests and thus an argument can be made that while the risk danger of using the gas cannot entirely be protected against, it likely is a matter common in the community, thus, a claim for strict liability will likely fail if P brings one against D.

Strict Products Liabilty (SPL)

For a claim of SPL, a defendant must be a commercial supplier of a good who supplies a dangerously defective product into the stream of commerce that causes, both actually and proximately, the harm to the plaintiff that results in damages.

Commercial Supplier

In this case, D is in the pest control business in which she manufactures and distributes fumigation gas. While she does use it for her own use, she also sells the gas to consumers. In this case, she sold the gas to Albert who used it to kill the insects in his apartment. Thus, Darla would owe a strict duty to Albert, but also to Paul. The fact that the gas injured Albert's neighbor Paul, who was not in privity of contract with Darla for the sale of the gas is of no consequence because a commercial supplier owes a strict duty to all foreseeable consumers/users or people who may come into contact with the product. Here, despite the fact that Paul did not purchase and use the gas himself from Darla, this will not prevent him from pursuing a SPL claim against her. Because D may be considered a commercial supplier, this element is met.

Defective Product

A consumer may attempt to show that a commercial supplier supplied a dangerously defective product by claiming that the product contained either a manufacturing defect (using the consumer expectation test), a design defect (feasible alternative tests), or an inadequate warning defect (information defect, which is a subset of a design defect.). In this case, Paul should argue that there was a manufacturing defect in the fumigation gas because Darla had produced gas of unduly high toxicity, and the ordinary consumer would have expected the gas produced to be of standard toxicity.

Manufacturing Defect

As discussed above, using the ordinary consumer expectation test, Paul will argue that a reasonable consumer would not have expected Darla to supply the market (and here Albert) with fumigation gas that had an unduly high toxicity level as compared to the standard toxicity levels that are generally supplied. The fact that Darla produced the higher toxic gas unknowingly and unintentionally is of no consequence in a SPL suit because the supplier owes a strict duty of care to the reasonably foreseeable consumer (here Paul), and breach of that duty (by supplying the dangerously defective product) is enough to make out the prima facie case for duty and breach of the standard of care.

Inadequate Warning

Alternatively, because the facts indicate that some of D's competitors do not sell gas to consumers because the consumers sometimes do not follow safety instructions, there may also be an issue of inadequate warning here; however, there is no evidence that D did in fact fail to supply a warning against the dangers of using the gas, so P's best argument would be to argue that the product was dangerously defective on account of the manufacturing defect.

Causation-actual cause

The injury sustained by P must also be the actual cause of the supply of the defective product. In this case, D's supply of the product to Albert (A) actually caused the harm to P because but for the sale and use of the product in A's apartment, P would not have been harmed. Rather, the issue that D will argue here is that she is not the proximate cause (or legal cause) of P's injuries on account of A's misuse of the product.

Legal Cause (Proximate cause)

Proximate cause is a legal limit on a D's liability, whereby courts will only cut off a D's liability to P's when it exceeds the foreseeable scope of liability. In this case, D will argue that A's misuse of the product in that A carelessly allowed the gas to seep into his neighbor P's apartment, should absolve her of liability because a reasonable person using the product would ensure that it would not injure others. However, this argument will likely fail because a commercial supplier must take into account a user's foreseeable misuse of the product, and such a misuse occurred in this case. It is foreseeable that a user of highly toxic pest control gas may injure other individuals on account of his negligent use of it. Thus, because a court would reject the argument that A's negligent misuse was an intervening and superceding cause that should cut off D's liability to P, this element will also be met.

Damages

Finally, a P must have suffered some form of cognizable damages in order to affect a recovery. Because Paul suffered serious lung damage, a personal harm to his body, he will meet this requirement and his claim against D based on SPL will likely succeed.

Defenses--assumption of risk and contributory negligence

D might try and argue that P assumed the risk of being injured by A's use of the pesticide; however, for an assumption of the risk defense to work, the individual must have knowingly and voluntarily assumed the risk of the activity involved. Here, there are no facts to suggest that P assumed any risk whatsoever, let alone voluntarily accepted such risks. Thus, this defense will fail.

Alternatively, D will argue that A was contributorily negligent in allowing the gas to injure his neighbor; however, as discussed above, this defense will not work in a SPL case because the negligence of the user is not taken into account when there was foreseeable misuse of the product by the user.

Negligence claim against D

The prima facie case for negligence includes duty, breach of that duty by falling below the requisite standard of care, causation (actual and proximate) and damages.

Duty

Under the Andrews minority view, a person owes a duty to everyone; thus D would owe a duty to P in this case. However, under the Cardozo majority view, a person only owes a duty to all those foreseeable persons within the zone of danger. Under this view, D would also owe a duty to P because the fact that P's apartment was located next to A's apartment (from which the gas leaked out of and into P's apartment), it is likely that P was within the zone of danger as to the use of the toxic chemicals and also was a foreseeable plaintiff because D would reasonably foresee that someone's neighbor may be injured by use of the toxic chemicals, especially in the context of apartment homes which are generally separated by walls and hallways from each other. Thus D owed a duty of care to P in this case.

Breach-Standard of Care

D owed a duty to P and the standard of the duty would be to act as a reasonably prudent manufacturer and supplier of toxic chemicals used for pest control. Here, P will argue that D's actions fell below the requisite standard of care because D negligently produced a much higher toxic gas than she had intended to produce, and a reasonably prudent supplier of such gas would either test the levels of the gas before placing them in the market and selling them or, at the very least, having certain safeguards available to ensure that the gas level of the product produced would not exceed certain specifications. Because P can argue that D likely breached its standard of care in this case, P will have to show that his injuries were also the cause of his damages as well.

Actual Cause

P will argue that but for D's supply of the negligently manufactured product to A, P would not have been injured. Because as discussed above this element is met, P must show that D is also the legal cause of his injuries.

Proximate cause

D will argue, again, that A was in fact the legal cause of P's injuries because of his misuse of the product, and that such misuse was an unforeseeable intervening and superceding cause of P's injuries and should thus absolve D of any liability to P. However, for the reasons discussed above, this argument will likely fail because it is entirely foreseeable that an apartment owner who shares his residency in close proximity to other tenants might injure those tenants by misusing a toxic substance in an attempt to kill the pests in his apartment. Thus, P will be able to succeed on this element as well.

Damages

Again, P must prove that he suffered damages that the law recognizes as compensable. Here, P suffered lung damage and because this is a form of personal injury for which the law provides a remedy, P will be able to easily meet this element.

Thus, P has also made out a prima facie case for negligence against D as well.

Defenses

Contributory negligence

A P's contributory negligence traditionally barred his claim for recovery against the D; however, many courts have adopted a form of comparative negligence to lessen the harshness of the result with regard to the complete bar on P's claim. In this case, D might try and argue that P was contributorily negligent because he should have been able to recognize the smell of the gas or that something was causing him discomfort in his apartment, and should have sought fresh air by going outside or moving out temporarily. However, there aren't any facts to suggest that the gas had an odor; for all intents and purposes, it might have been an odorless gas. Moreover, P might have been asleep while A used the gas and would not have noticed its effects on him. Because there is very little in the facts to suggest that P was contributorily negligent, this defense will likely fail for D to assert. Similarly, an assumption of the risk defense will also fail for reasons discussed above.

2) May P obtain damages for Darla for fear of contracting cancer?

The issue is whether P can recover damages against D for his emotional distress. The claim that P would bring against D is one for negligent infliction of emotional distress, since the elements of an intentional infliction of emotional distress are not applicable here.

Negligent infliction of emotional distress (NIED)

The elements for an NIED claim occur when a defendant negligently causes emotional distress to a plaintiff on account of the D's actions. Traditionally, an NIED claim required the P to suffer some form of physical harm, and not merely some intangible emotional harm out of fear that the courts would receive a large influx of junk cases for unsubstantiated claims. Here, P will likely be able to recover his emotional distress, i.e. fear that he will contract cancer from the exposure to the gas, because he has in fact suffered a physical manifestation of the harm in the form of the lung damage that he has seriously suffered. Thus, because P can show that he has suffered physical harm to his body, he will also be entitled to recover for his emotional distress as well.

Q5 Civil Procedure

In March 2008, Pat, a citizen of State A, learned that Devon Corp. ("Devon"), a citizen of State B, may have been illegally releasing toxic chemicals into the air near her home.

In February 2011, Pat sued Devon in federal court, alleging a cause of action for negligence and seeking damages for a persistent cough. The court had subject matter jurisdiction over Pat's lawsuit.

During discovery, Pat requested Devon to produce all documents relating to reports by local residents about foul odors coming from its plant. Devon objected to Pat's discovery request, contending that the plant's odors came from legally produced and harmless chemicals, and that therefore the request sought irrelevant information. In further response, Devon provided a privilege log that listed a document described as a summary of all communications with local residents concerning odors that emanated from the plant. As a basis for refusing to disclose the document, Devon claimed the summary was protected from disclosure under the work product doctrine because it had been created by its counsel, who therein described the underlying facts of the residents' comments as well as counsel's thoughts about them. Pat filed a motion to compel Devon's production of the documents she requested. The court denied Pat's motion.

In October 2012, while the lawsuit was still pending, Pat learned from a scientific report in a newspaper that the chemicals Devon released cause lung cancer.

In November 2012, Pat amended her complaint to add a cause of action for strict liability and sought to require Devon to pay for preventive medical monitoring of her lungs.

Devon moved to dismiss Pat's strict liability cause of action on the basis that the applicable three-year statute of limitations had run.

1. Did the court correctly deny Pat's motion to compel? Discuss.

2. How should the court rule on Devon's motion to dismiss? Discuss.

Answer A

1. The trial court incorrectly denied Pat's motion to compel. The scope of discovery is whether the request is reasonably calculated to lead the discovery of admissible evidence. As a general matter and absent any other exceptions, evidence is admissible if it is relevant. Relevance means it has any tendency to make the existence of any fact, that is of consequence to the determination of the action, more or less probable than it would be without the evidence.

Here, Pat requested Devon to produce all documents relating to reports by local residents about foul odors from its plant. Devon objected to the discovery request on the grounds that the plant's odors came from legally produced and harmless chemicals. Pat's lawsuit against Devon is brought under negligence theory and concerns Devon's release of toxic chemicals into the air. Pat's request is within the permissible scope of discovery. Although Devon contends that the odors are legal and harmless, that is not conclusive. During litigation, Pat may gather evidence to support her belief that Devon has been illegally releasing toxic chemicals. She is not required to merely accept Devon's assertion that it is not acting illegally. The reports by local residents may lead to relevant, admissible evidence. If Pat learns that other residents have likewise experienced a persistent cough or other symptoms, or developed cancer, she can use their testimony to rebut Devon's contention that the odors are harmless. Additionally, the reports of local residents are relevant to show that Devon had notice of the harmful effects of the chemical/odors on local residents. Moreover, the evidence could support Pat's assertion that her persistent cough was a reasonably foreseeable result of the chemicals/odors because Devon knew that it the chemicals had similar effects on other residents. Therefore, Pat's document request should be granted unless a privilege applies.

In response to Pat's discovery request, Devon produced a privilege log listing a document described as "a summary of all its communications with local residents concerning odors that emanated from the plant," claiming it was privileged under the work product doctrine. When a discovery request is within the permissible scope of discovery, but it seeks protected or privileged information, the responding party must provide a privilege log describing the privileged document with particularity and asserting why it is privileged. If the summary is in fact privileged, then Devon properly complied with the discovery rules by responding with a privilege log identifying its existence and explaining why it is not required to disclose it.

The work product privilege applies to all materials prepared by an attorney, or a client at the attorney's request, in anticipation of litigation. As the summary was prepared by Devon's counsel, the first requirement is satisfied. However, the facts do not state whether it was prepared in anticipation of litigation. If Devon's counsel prepared the summary before any litigation concerning the toxic chemicals began, then it may not be covered. Pat learned that Devon may be illegally releasing toxic chemicals in 2008, and did not sue until 2011. If there had been previous complaints, Devon very well may have prepared the summary in anticipation of future litigation, even if not specifically for Pat's case. In those circumstances, the work product privilege would nonetheless apply even if it was made before Pat's lawsuit was initiated.

Not all aspects of the work product privilege are absolute. Any mental impressions, opinions, theories of the case, and related information is absolutely privileged and is never discoverable. However, the remaining aspects of a document may be disclosed if the requesting party establishes: (1) there is a substantial need for the information; and (2) he or she cannot obtain the information from any other source. First, Pat can likely establish that she has a substantial need for the information. As explained above, this information will help support her claim that Devon acted negligently, and rebut Devon's contention that the chemicals/odors are harmless. However, Pat may have more difficulty meeting the second requirement. Devon could argue that Pat could simply interview local residents to determine whether they complained to Devon. However, the court will likely find that this would be an undue hardship because Devon could provide Pat with the names of residents who complained and what their complaints were, without requiring Pat to undergo all that effort. Based on the above analysis, the underlying information in the summary is discoverable. The communications between local residents and Devon do not fall under the work product privilege because they were not made in anticipation of litigation. Rather, they were likely routine business records. Therefore, if the actual reports of communications that were used to compile the summary are separately available, the court should have ordered that the separate reports be produced to Pat. Then, Pat would receive the information she needed and no privileged information would be disclosed. Conversely, if there are no such separate individual reports in existence, then the court may order Devon to produce the summary with counsel's thoughts redacted from the document.

In sum, the court incorrectly denied Pat's motion to compel. First, the documents requested are within the permissible scope of discovery. Second, although the summary of the communications with residents may be privileged under the work product doctrine, the individual separate reports would not be and could have been produced. Finally, if there are no individual separate reports for each resident, then the court should have ordered that Devon produced the summary with counsel's mental impressions redacted because Pat has a demonstrated a substantial need for the information and that she is unable to obtain the information from another source.

2. The court should deny Devon's motion to dismiss. Civil Rule 15 allows a plaintiff to amend her complaint once before the answer is filed or anytime thereafter with leave of court. Rule 15 requires a court to freely grant leave to amend a complaint as justice requires. When a complaint is amended to include a new claim, it relates back to the date of the original filing as long as the claim arises out of the same transaction or occurrence. Here, Pat seeks to amend her complaint to add a cause of action for strict liability. Her strict liability claim arises out of the same occurrence -- Devon's alleged illegal release of toxic chemicals into the air -- as her negligence claim. Accordingly, her cause of action will relate back to the date of the filing of her complaint in February 2011. Pat discovered Devon's illegal release in March 2008, so her strict liability claim accrued, at the earliest, in March 2008. Accordingly, her strict liability claim was timely filed within the 3-year statute of limitations.

Further, Pat's additional request for relief -- that Devon pay for preventative monitoring of her lungs -- is valid. A party may amend his or her request for damages in the complaint. This new claim for damages relates to Pat's new strict liability claim.

Therefore, the court should deny the motion to dismiss and allow Pat to amend her complaint in the interest of justice because she just discovered the scientific report regarding lung cancer.

Answer B

Denial of Pat's Motion to Compel

The Scope of Discovery

The scope of discovery under the federal rules includes all materials that are 1) relevant and 2) not privileged.

As to relevance, an item is relevant if it has a tendency to make the existence or nonexistence of a fact of consequence to the action more or less probable than it would be without the item.

As to privilege, the most commonly asserted privilege objections in discovery are attorney-client privilege and work product privilege. The attorney client privilege protects confidential communications between an attorney and her client from disclosure in discovery, and the work product privilege protects materials prepared by a party in anticipation of litigation. Materials protected by the attorney client privilege are absolutely privileged from disclosure in discovery.

Materials, for which the work product privilege is claimed, however, may sometimes be required to be disclosed. If the party seeking discovery can show that 1) the claimed work product materials contain information which is not reasonably available to him by any other means, and 2) his interests would be substantially prejudiced if he were not allowed access to those materials, the court may order disclosure. However, even if the disclosure of work product is ordered pursuant to this standard, the court may not order the disclosure of an attorney's mental impressions or legal theories, because such items are absolutely protected.

Devon's Relevance Objection

In response to Pat's request for Devon to produce documents relating to reports by local residents about foul odors from Devon's plant, Devon objected and refused to produce such documents on the basis that the odors came from legally produced and harmless chemicals and therefore the request sought irrelevant information. Such documents are properly discoverable because they are relevant and not privileged. Information about reports of odors from the plant by local residents are relevant to Pat's claim that the plant was illegally releasing toxic chemicals into the air, because it is more probable that the plant was in fact releasing chemicals if local residents reported that they smelled odors. Such reports may also be relevant to the issue of the quantities, types, and times the chemicals were released into the air, which is relevant to Pat's claim that she had sufficient exposure to the chemicals to cause her persistent cough.

Devon's claim that the documents are not relevant because the odors were "legally produced" and "harmless" should have been rejected by the court. A party may not avoid discovery by self-serving claims as to what its documents would show. Moreover, the issues at the heart of this claim are precisely whether 1) the odors were legally produced, as Devon claims, or illegally produced, as Pat claims, and 2) the chemicals are toxic, as Pat claims, or harmless, as Devon claims. Devon must produce documents that show what chemicals were released and how they were being produced so that Pat and her experts can evaluate for themselves the nature of the chemicals.

Therefore, to the extent Devon claimed a relevance objection to Pat's request, the Court should have overruled that objection and ordered Devon to respond in full to the request.

Devon's Work Product Privilege Objection

Devon has also produced a privilege log indicating that it has a summary of all communications with local residents concerning odors emanating from the plant, and has claimed that the summary is protected by the work product privilege because it was created by Devon's counsel. The mere fact that a document was created by counsel does not mean that it is protected by the work product privilege. Devon must also show that the document was prepared in anticipation of litigation. If Devon's counsel prepared the document, for example, as part of a report that was required to be given to the EPA on a routine basis, it would not be protected by work product. Devon bears the burden of showing that the document is entitled to work product protection.

In addition, even if the document is work product, Pat may be able to discover it if she can show that she cannot get the information by any other means, and she would be substantially prejudiced without it. This is a very fact specific showing. Pat's alternative means of finding out what residents have complained to the plant about regarding odors would be to walk the streets and interview the neighborhood, hire an investigator, place an ad seeking responses with such information, etc. Depending on the size of the area at issue, that may not be reasonably feasible or particularly productive. Moreover, it is possible that some residents who have been extremely bothered have moved out of the area entirely and would not be accessible through such an investigation. The best source of the information is likely what is contained in the plant's summary of complaints, and it would be very difficult for Pat to collect that information otherwise.

To the extent that the document contains verbatim reports of residents' complaints, the court should compel Devon to release it. To address Devon's claim that the document also contains counsel's thoughts about the residents' complaints, that information is mental impressions, and is absolutely protected against disclosure. The court should order Devon to produce the document for in camera review, so that the court can determine to what extent it does in fact contain such information. The court could also order Devon to disclose the document with the work product material redacted.

Ruling on Devon's Motion to Dismiss

The issue here is whether the court should grant Devon's motion to dismiss the amendment to Pat's complaint adding a claim for strict liability and medical monitoring as barred by the statute of limitations, or whether the complaint relates back to the timely filed original complaint.

Relation Back Standard

An amended complaint filed after the statute of limitations has run "relates back" to the original complaint, and therefore is not time-barred, if: 1) the original complaint was timely filed; and 2) the new claims in the amended complaint arise out of the "same transaction or occurrence" as the claims in the original complaint.

Was the original complaint timely filed?

Here, it appears the original complaint was timely filed because Pat discovered her injury in March of 2008 and filed the complaint in February of 2008 for negligence. If the three year statute applies to personal injury complaints whether asserted under negligence or strict liability claims, the original complaint was timely filed within 3 years, and the first part of the relation back test is satisfied.

Do the new claims arise out of the same transaction or occurrence?

As to the question of whether the claims arise from the same transaction or occurrence, the answer is likely yes. Pat's negligence claim relates to the occurrence of Devon's release of chemicals into the air near her home. Her strict liability and medical monitoring claims arise from the same event - Devon's release of chemicals. She is simply pleading a new theory of liability and requesting an additional remedy for the same conduct by Devon that was at issue in her original complaint.

Devon may argue that, even if the strict liability claim relates back, to the extent that Pat is making a claim for medical monitoring in her amended complaint, it does not arise out of the same transaction or occurrence because it concerns Pat's fear of lung cancer, not her persistent cough. However, a court would likely reject this argument, especially because Pat only recently learned of the potential for the chemicals to cause lung cancer by the Nov. 2012 news article, and filed her amended complaint within a month of learning that information.

Prejudice to Devon

Devon may argue its interests would be prejudiced by permitting the late amendment because it has been engaging in discovery for nearly two years on the basis of the allegations in the original complaint. However, a court would also likely reject this argument because Pat's allegations against Devon in both the original and the amended complaint concern the health effects of the released chemicals, and therefore the scope of the discovery and the preparation Devon must do to defend is not significantly changed by the amended complaint.

In sum, because the original complaint was timely filed, the amended complaint arises out of the same transaction or occurrence as the original complaint, and Devon would not be prejudiced in having to defend against the new claims, the court should deny Devon's motion to dismiss the amendment as time-barred.

Q6 Business Associations

In 2011, Molly and Lenny started a computer software business. Molly prepared marketing materials and Lenny made sales calls. During the first year, Lenny sold 10 copies of certain software programs for $50,000 each. The business had a net profit of $480,000 and Molly and Lenny each received $240,000.

In January 2012, Molly and Lenny hired an attorney to incorporate their business under the name “Software Inc.” The attorney properly prepared all necessary documents to incorporate the business but carelessly failed to file them with the Secretary of State.

Lenny continued to make sales calls to sell the software. He also sold a five-year service contract developed by Molly. Due to brisk sales, Software Inc. projected income of about $300,000 per year for the next five years from the service contracts alone. Software Inc. obtained a $100,000 business loan from National Bank secured by the accounts receivable for the service contracts.

In May 2012, Lenny had an automobile accident, caused solely by his own negligence, on the way to visit a prospective buyer. The accident injured a pedestrian. As a result of the accident, Lenny stopped working and sales collapsed.

In July 2012, Software Inc. went out of business, leaving negligible assets and the unpaid loan to National Bank.

1. Is Software Inc., Molly, and/or Lenny liable to the pedestrian for the injury? Discuss.

2. Is Software Inc., Molly, and/or Lenny liable to National Bank for the loan? Discuss.

Answer A

I. Liability to the Pedestrian

A. Lenny's Liability

This issue is whether Lenny is liable to the pedestrian for the automobile accident.

Generally, persons are liable for their own negligent conduct. While employers can be vicariously liable (discussed below) for an employee's tortuous conduct, this liability is in addition to the employee's liability. However, if an employee was acting within the scope of their employment, to further the goals of the business, they could seek indemnification from the business.

Here, Lenny had an automobile accident, caused solely by his own negligence, on his way to visit a prospective buyer. The accident injured a pedestrian. Lenny will most likely be liable for the damages he caused. However, because he was on his way to visit a prospective buyer, Lenny could seek indemnification from Software Inc., because he was driving solely for the purpose of furthering Software's business by attracting a new buyer. In addition, his conduct was negligent, rather than intentional, which would prohibit indemnification. If, because of a failure to incorporate (as discussed below), Software Inc. is not actually a valid corporation, Lenny could still seek indemnification from the partnership between him and Molly, since he was still acting in furtherance of Software, the partnership (also discussed below). However, given Software's negligible assets, and its debt to National Bank, there may not be much to seek indemnification from.

Therefore, Lenny is liable to the pedestrian, but may be able to seek indemnification from Software, Inc.

B. Software Inc.'s, Vicarious Liability

This issue is whether Software Inc. is vicariously liable for Lenny's tortuous conduct.
A corporation/partnership/principal can be vicariously liable for the tortuous conduct of its agents if those agents act in furtherance of the principal, under the principal's control, and with the principal's express, implied, or apparent authority.

Here, Lenny had an automobile accident, caused solely by his own negligence, on the way to visit a prospective buyer. By driving to visit a buyer, it appears clear that Lenny was acting in furtherance of Software Inc. While Software Inc.'s corporation or partnership status will be discussed below, it is clear that Lenny was functioning as both a principal and as an agent. He was a principal in the sense that he was expressly authorized to make sales calls and presumable visit prospective buyers given that he started the computer software business and that he and Molly agreed to divide the work as such. He was an agent acting for the benefit of Software Inc. in driving to meet the buyer and further Software Inc.'s goals of collecting buyers.

Therefore, regardless of Software Inc.'s status, Software Inc. is probably vicariously liable for Lenny's tortuous conduct.

C. Molly's Liability

1. De Facto Corporation

This issue is whether Software Inc. had a de facto corporation status, such as to shield Molly from personal liability for Lenny's tortuous conduct.

A corporation is a unique organizational framework for a business, in which management is centralized, and shareholders enjoy limited liability. A corporation must file its articles of incorporation with the Secretary of Interior in order to be a valid corporation, and thus to enjoy this limited liability. However, a corporation that does not file its articles of incorporation may nevertheless enjoy limited liability via de facto corporation. A de facto corporation 1) attempted to incorporate in good faith, 2) is otherwise eligible to incorporate, and 3) subsequently acted like a corporation in good faith.

In January 2012, Molly and Lenny hired an attorney to incorporate their business under the name "Software Inc." However, while the attorney properly prepared all necessary documents to incorporate the business, he carelessly failed to file them with the Secretary of State. It does not appear that Molly or Lenny knew that the attorney had failed to file the documents. Instead, Molly and Lenny continued to make sales and sell the software. In fact, they obtained a business loan from National Bank secured by its accounts receivable, thereby acting like a corporation in which corporation debts are secured by corporation profits. By hiring an attorney, and subsequently acting like a corporation, it appears that Molly and Lenny attempted to incorporate in good faith, and later acted as if they were a corporation in good faith, with no knowledge (or should have had the knowledge) that they were not actually a corporation. In addition, Software Inc. appears otherwise eligible to incorporate, but-for the failure to file the documents with the Secretary of State.

Therefore, it is possible that Molly will be shielded from liability if Software Inc. has de facto corporation status.

2. Piercing the Corporate Veil

This issue is whether Molly can be personally liable if the pedestrian pierces Software Inc.'s corporate veil.

Shareholders of a valid corporation may nevertheless be personally liable for corporation debts if the corporate veil is pierced. Courts allow a corporation's veil to be pierced when it is clear that there is such a commonality between the corporation and the shareholders, that the shareholders are actually the "alter ego" of the corporation, and to not permit piercing would sanction a grave injustice. Failing to comply with corporate formalities and insufficient capitalization are common reasons courts have pierced a corporation's veil.

Here, if Software Inc. has de facto corporation status, Molly can be shielded from liability, unless Software Inc.'s corporate veil is pierced. There is no evidence that Molly and Lenny intentionally aimed for Software Inc. to act as their corporate alter ego. However, there is evidence that Software Inc. was severely under-capitalized. In 2011, Molly and Lenny made a net profit of $480,000. However, instead of investing any of that profit back into the business, they instead each received $240,000. In 2012, Software Inc. sold a five-year contract, and projected an income of $300,000/year based just on service contracts. In addition it took out a $100,000 loan. However, in July 2012, after Lenny stopped working for just two months, Software Inc. had only negligible assets AND its unpaid loan. It appears that either Molly and Lenny were taking dividends when the corporation could not pay its debts, or that Software Inc. was otherwise severely under-capitalized. Further, there are no facts to suggest that Molly and Lenny abided by any corporate formalities, such as holding a general meeting, issuing bylaws, or keeping accounting books. However, there is no information that they did not do these things either.

Therefore, it is possible that the pedestrian can pierce Software Inc.'s corporate veil and hold Molly personally liable.

3. General Partnership

This issue is whether if Software Inc. does not have a corporation status, they are instead a general partnership, and Molly can be held personally liable thereby.

A general partnership is a partnership between two or more people to go into business together. The formation of a general partnership only requires the intent to form a partnership. No documents need to be filed with the Secretary of State, unlike a limited partnership, a limited liability corporation, and a corporation. A general partnership only includes general partners who are personally liable for the debts and obligations of the partnership. The equal sharing of profits is presumptive evidence that parties intended to form a general partnership.

In 2011, Molly and Lenny started a computer software business. Molly prepared marketing materials and Lenny made sales calls. At the end of the year, the business had a net profit of $480,000, and Molly and Lenny each received $240,000. In 2012, Lenny and Molly continued to operate their software business in apparently the same way, with the same division of labor, as they had in 2011. They attempted to form a corporation, but their attorney negligently failed to properly file the forms. By sharing the profits equally in 2011, Molly and Lenny appeared to have presumptively formed a general partnership. In 2011, it appears that they operated as a general partnership, with an equal, but distinct division of labor. By sharing the profits, they implicitly agreed to also equally share the business's obligations, should there be any. When the attorney failed to incorporate Software, and assuming that Software is unsuccessful in obtaining de facto corporation status, Molly and Lenny continued to have a general partnership. It does not matter that they never formally agreed to form a partnership. Their sharing of the profits equally makes their relationship a general partnership until they agree otherwise. Thus, if Software Inc. does not have de facto status, Molly will be liable as a general partner. However, she will only be liable to the extent the business is without funds.

Therefore, Molly can be liable as a general partner.

II. Liability to National Bank

A. Software Inc.'s Liability for the Loan

This issue is whether Software Inc. is liable for the loan to National Bank.

Generally, corporations and partnerships are liable for the debts incurred during the normal course of business.

Here, National Bank issued a $100,000 business loan to Software Inc., secured by Software Inc.'s accounts receivable. If Software Inc. has de facto status, then the loan was authorized by the corporation. If Software Inc. is a partnership, the loan was similarly taken during the course of business, for the purpose of the partnership, and was authorized by the partners. Regardless of Software Inc.'s status, the loan was received by Software, which subsequently enjoyed the benefits of the loan, and will thereby be held to have at least ratified the loan by accepting the loan.

Therefore, Software Inc. is liable for the loan, regardless of its status.

B. Lenny and Molly's Liability for the Loan

1. De Facto Corporation

This issue is whether Lenny and Molly can escape personal liability through de facto corporation.

This rule is discussed above, in section I.C.1.

Because Lenny and Molly made a good faith attempt to incorporate, and acted in good faith as if they were incorporated, they potentially could receive de facto corporation status, and thereby its included limited liability.

Therefore, Lenny and Molly could escape liability through de facto status.

2. Corporation by Estoppel

This issue is whether Lenny and Molly can escape personal liability through corporation by estoppel.

Even if a corporation fails to properly file its articles of incorporation with the Secretary of State, and even if a corporation fails to receive de facto corporation, a creditor may nevertheless be estopped from denying the existence of a corporation. If a creditor treated a corporation as such, and looked to corporate assets in making a loan, a corporation can be protected though corporation by estoppel.

Here, Software Inc. projected income of about $300,000/year for the next five years from its service contracts. National Bank provided Software Inc. a $100,000 business loan secured by the accounts receivable for the service contracts. National Bank believed Software, Inc. was a valid corporation. They could have done their due diligence to verify their corporation status. Further, National Bank only looked to Software Inc.'s assets, not Molly or Lenny's, in determining whether to issue the loan. Finally, they issued a business loan, underpinning National Bank's focus upon Software as a corporation. Because they treated Software as corporation in issuing the loan, they will be estopped from denying Software's corporation status in attempting to collect on the loan.

Therefore, Molly and Lenny could escape personal liability through corporation by estoppel.

3. Piercing the Corporation Veil

This issue is whether even if Software Inc. has de facto or corporation by estoppel, National Bank can go after Molly and Lenny personally by piercing the corporate veil.

This issue is discussed above, in section I.C.2.

Because Lenny and Molly failed to properly capitalize Software Inc., it is possible that National Bank could similarly seek to pierce Software's corporate veil.

Therefore, Molly and Lenny could be personally liable for the loan thru piercing the corporate veil.

4. Liable as General Partners

This issue is whether if there is corporate status, Lenny and Molly are liable as general partners.

This issue is discussed above in section I.C.3. General partners are personally liable for the remaining debts of the business.

Because Lenny and Molly originally functioned as a general partnership, if Software Inc. does not have corporate status, Lenny and Molly will be held to be general partners. Just as general partners get to share profits equally, they also must share the obligations equally.

Therefore, Molly and Lenny will each be liable for one half of the remaining obligation on the loan to National Bank.

Answer B

Liability towards Injured Pedestrian:

Software Inc. v. Pedestrian

De Jure Corporation:

A de jure corporation is one that is properly formed. To form a de jure corporation the parties have to prepare the necessary documents required by the state for incorporation. Here, Molly and Lenny did not create a de jure corporation due to the fact that their attorney carelessly failed to file the documents. The fact that the corporation was not created does not mean that there are not other corporate like entities that could have arisen.

De Facto Corporation;

Molly and Lenny's strongest argument would be that they created a de facto corporation. A de facto corporation is where the parties take all the necessary steps to incorporate, but for some reason their attempt to incorporate was unsuccessful. If the parties have a good faith belief that a corporation was formed a court can find that a de facto corporation was created, which gives the parties all the same benefits and obligations that would arise under a normally created corporation. Based upon these facts a court would most likely find that a de facto corporation was created, Lenny and Molly took all the necessary steps to create a corporation and held themselves out to be a corporation and if it were not for the carelessness of their attorney in filing the paperwork they would be considered a corporation.

Liability of Shareholders in a De Facto Corporation:

Now that it is found that a de facto corporation was created we look to see if it is liable towards the pedestrian for the injuries suffered. The bonus of a corporation is that it protects its shareholders from liability, and therefore if a de facto corporation was formed Software Inc. might be liable for the injury, and possibly Lenny as it was caused by his negligence but Molly would be shielded from liability beyond what she had invested in the company.

Liability of a Corporation for Damages Caused by its Agents

A corporation can be liable for damages caused by its agents during the scope of their employment. In a corporation directors and officers are considered agents of the corporation and this is further demonstrated by the fact that they had the ability to bind Software Inc. to contracts and that they seemed to be the only two people working for the corporation. If the damages were created completely outside of the scope of their employment then a corporation will not be found to be liable for the damages but here based upon the facts Lenny was going to visit a prospective buyer and his driving to the meeting was within the scope of his employment.

What the corporation would have to argue is that while the accident occurred on his way to the meeting it did not benefit from Lenny's reckless driving and therefore the corporation would not be liable because the accident was caused by Lenny's negligence. This argument would most likely fail because a corporation can be held liable for negligent acts by their employees if they are not wandering too far from the scope of their employment and since Lenny was on the way to the meeting he was not wandering outside of the scope of employment and therefore the corporation can be held liable for the injuries caused to the pedestrian.

Lenny v. Pedestrian

The question would be whether Lenny could also be held liable due to his negligent acts. The Pedestrian would argue that Lenny negligently caused the injuries that he suffered and while as a SH of the corporation he might not be held liable he could still be held liable for negligently driving and causing the accident. The fact that Lenny was working in furtherance of the business interests of the corporation does not mean that he could not be held liable separately. Due to the fact that the accident was caused solely by his negligence Lenny could be found liable for the injuries to the plaintiff along with the corporation.

Molly v. Pedestrian

If a de facto corporation is formed then Molly cannot be held personally liable for the actions of the agents of the corporation. The only time a shareholder can be liable is if the plaintiff is able to pierce the corporate veil by showing that the corporation was merely an alter ego of the party or that it was underfunded. This is not the case here and therefore Molly would not be liable if a de facto corporation was formed.

General Partnership:

If the courts find that no de facto corporation was formed then Molly and Lenny would be in a general partnership with one another. A general partnership arises when two people agree to enter into a business venture for profit. That is demonstrated by the fact that previous to their attempted incorporation Molly and Lenny worked together selling software equipment and that they equally split their profits between each other. Under a general partnership the partners are not protected from liability like a shareholder of a corporation is. Therefore, if a general partnership is formed and a party brings a suit against one partner for damages arising out of their work for the partnership then all partners are personally liable for any award against the partnership. Therefore, unless Molly was able to argue successfully that Lenny's actions were outside of the scope of the partnership then she would be held personally liable for any damages that are caused by the actions of Lenny. Because it does not seem likely Molly would be able to successfully argue that his actions were outside of the scope of employment, both Molly and Lenny would be personally liable for any injury suffered by the other party due to Lenny's accident.

Liability towards National Bank for Loan:

Corporation by Estoppel:

Even if a de facto or de jure corporation is not formed Molly and Lenny could argue that a corporation by estoppel was formed. Their argument would be that even if they were not a corporation the fact that National Bank dealt with them as if they were a corporation would estop them from denying that they were a corporation and holding the shareholders personally liable.

Software Inc. would be Liable

Software Inc. would be liable for the loan obtained from National Bank. The loan was taken out by them as a corporation and there does not seem to be any evidence to demonstrate that it was taken out for anything other than proper purposes. National Bank would try to argue most likely that Software Inc. is not liable for the loan because at this time Software Inc. only has negligible assets and therefore this would not provide much capital to repay the loan to National Bank.

Most likely Software Inc. would not be attempting to escape liability as they are already out of business and only have negligible assets so a recovery against them would not harm the corporation. This could lead National to make an argument to pierce the corporate veil because of undercapitalization but this argument would fail because the business was not undercapitalized; instead it was not able to fulfill the contract which was the basis on which National Bank loaned the money to them.

Because Software Inc. took out the loan and there is no evidence that it was used for any purposes other than to help the company they will be found liable to the bank for the loan and therefore National Bank will be able to bring an action against Software Inc., even though there is little for them to recover.

Molly would not be Liable

Unless a general partnership was formed as discussed above Molly will not be liable for the National Bank loan. The fact that National Bank acted as if it was dealing with a corporation would stop it from then asserting that it was in actuality a partnership and so therefore Molly would not be liable under a theory that it was merely a partnership.

As a shareholder in a corporation she is protected and there is no evidence to show that she did anything that would cause her to not be protected. National Bank might try to argue that it based its loan based upon the accounts receivable from the service contract developed by Molly but this argument would fail. She created the service contract within the scope of her employment and there is no evidence to show that she was at fault in any way for the failure of the business. Due to the fact that National Bank would not be able to show that Molly did anything that would make her liable for the losses suffered by Software Inc., a court would not find her liable to National Bank and she would therefore be safe.

Lenny would not be Liable

Due to the fact that Software inc. left negligible assets when it went out of business for National Bank to collect on they would most likely go after Lenny for the damages. Their argument would be the fact that the reason for the failure of the corporation was the fact that Lenny stopped working due to the car accident. They would argue that he was the person that created the revenue for the corporation through his sales calls and once he stopped working Molly did not have the experience to continue running the business profitably and therefore by Lenny's actions the corporation went out of business. They would argue that his quitting was not in the scope of his employment and that it was in no way beneficial to the business and they would therefore argue that Lenny should be liable because their loss is due to Lenny's decision to not return to work.

Lenny would argue that even if his failure to go to work was the cause of the business to fail that does not make him liable for the debts entered into by the business. There is nothing here showing that Lenny or Molly did anything improper in obtaining the loan and that the loan was made with the corporation based upon the assets of the corporation and therefore Lenny should not be held liable.

Even though it seems like National Bank has an argument based upon the fact that the sole reason that the business failed was the fact that Lenny stopped going to work, this would not be sufficient to create liability on Lenny's behalf because the bank loan was entered into by Software Inc. and not with Lenny. Additionally, Lenny could argue that the loan was based solely upon the service contracts and not the sale of products, which was his main area of involvement. Alternatively, National Bank will argue that while it might have been prepared by Molly, Lenny was the one that sold the service contract and therefore it was his area of involvement. Even if the court found this they still would not find that Lenny had acted sufficiently in bad faith to find that he was liable to National for the loan.

Q1 Civil Procedure

Pam and Patrick are residents of State A. While visiting State B, they were hit by a truck owned and operated by Corporation, a freight business.

Corporation is incorporated under the laws of Canada and has its headquarters there, where its President and Secretary are located. State B is the only state in which Corporation conducts its business. Corporation's drivers and other employees work out of its warehouse in State B.

Pam and Patrick jointly filed a lawsuit against Corporation in federal district court in State A. In their complaint, Pam demanded damages for personal injury in the amount of $70,000 and for property damage in the amount of $10,000; Patrick demanded damages in the amount of $6,000.

Corporation filed a motion to dismiss the complaint for lack of personal jurisdiction. The federal district court denied the motion. After trial, it entered judgment for Pam in the amount of $60,000 and for Patrick in the amount of $4,000.

Corporation has appealed on the grounds of lack of subject matter jurisdiction and lack of personal jurisdiction.

How should the court of appeals rule on each ground? Discuss.

Answer A

1. Did the Federal District Court of State A have Personal Jurisdiction over Corporation?

Waiver?

Personal Jurisdiction is waived if not challenged. Here, Corporation ("Corp") filed a motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction ("PJ") at trial. Therefore, Corp did not waive its right to appeal based on lack of PJ.

Personal Jurisdiction

Personal jurisdiction is the power of a court to have jurisdiction over an individual or entity. Here, a corporation. The exercise of personal jurisdiction must comport with the requirements of Due Process.

TRADITIONAL BASIS

Traditionally, PJ could only be exercised if the defendant consented to suit in the forum, was served in the forum, or was domiciled in the forum. Here, there are no facts to indicate that Corp consented to jurisdiction ("JDX") because they did not make a general appearance, or in any way consent. Further, Corp is not domiciled in the forum. A corp is domiciled where it has its principal place of business, based on nerve center, and where it is incorporated. Both of those are in Canada for Corp. Finally, facts do not state where Corp was served or if they had an agent for service of process in State A, but assuming that they were not served in state A, there is no traditional basis in state A.

LONG ARM STATUTE

If there is no traditional basis for the exercise of Personal jurisdiction, the court will next look to the state's long-arm statute to determine whether the court has jurisdiction to reach out to another state, or country to exercise jdx over the defendant. Here, there are no facts to indicate that state A has a long-arm. If it did, the federal district court would have jdx to the same extent as the state.

CONSTITUTIONAL ANALYSIS

To comport with due process, personal jurisdiction is only proper if the defendant has such minimum contacts with the forum state that the exercise of jdx comports with traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.

MINIMUM CONTACTS

Minimum contacts requires a showing of purposeful availment and foreseeability.

PURPOSEFUL AVAILMENT

A party purposefully avails itself of the forum state if it has taken advantage of the benefits and protections of that state's laws. Here, Corporation is incorporated in Canada and has its headquarters there. Further, its warehouse is in state B. Further, Corp oprates a freight business and was driving in state B when the Accident occurred, and state B is the only state in which Corp conducts its business. There are no facts to show that Corporation had any contact at all with state A. Therefore Corp will argue it did not purposefully avail itself of the privileges and benefits of State A.

Foreseeability.

Because State B is the only state in which corp does business, it will argue that it was not foreseeable that it would be haled into court in state A. P and P could argue that a trucking company should foresee being sued anywhere, but if the trucks are only on the road in state B, this argument will not likely prevail. It was not foreseeable that Corp would be sued in state A.

Relatedness of the claim to the contact

The court will look at the quality and nature of the contacts. There is general jurisdiction if the defendant's contact is so systematic and continuous that he is essentially at home in the forum. There is specific jurisdiction if the contact is less than systematic and continuous, but the claim arises out of the defendant's contact with the forum.

Here, there is neither general or specific jdx because the claim neither arises out of the contact with the forum nor is Corp "essentially at home" in the state A because its contact there is not systematic and continuous.

Specifically, the accident occurred while Pam and Patrick were visiting in State B, not state A, and therefore the claim does not arise out of contact with State A, and there can be no Specific Jdx as a result.

Additionally, Corp only does business in State B, has its warehouse in state B and is incorporated and has its president, secretary and headquarters in Canada. Therefore there is no general jdx because there is no contact with State, and certainly not systematic and continuous contact.

Therefore, there is neither specific nor general Jurisdiction.

Fairness

The fairness factors include the convenience of the parties and witnesses as well as the forum state's interest. The court will also look at the interstate judicial system's interest. Although state A has an interest in providing a forum for redress for its citizens, and Pam and Patrick are State A citizens, State B has a stronger interest because that is where the accident occurred, on its roads. Further, because Corp operates in State B only, state B has a strong interest in adjudicating the claims against its citizens for their conduct while in the state. As to convenience, any and all witnesses and evidence would be located in State B, rather than the forum, state A.

Therefore, the fairness factors are in favor of not finding PJ over Corp.

RULING:

Therefore, Under a Due Process Analysis, The court of appeals should rule that there was no personal Jurisdiction over Corp.

2. Did the Federal District Court have Subject Matter Jurisdiction over the matter?

Federal courts are courts of limited jdx and must have jurisdiction under arising under/federal question jurisdiction or diversity jurisdiction.

In some cases, the court may be able to exercise supplemental jurisdiction.

Federal District Court must have had jurisdiction over each and every claim in the matter. Here, both Pam and Patrick brought claims. Therefore, each claim is considered separately below.

WAIVER?

Here, it does not appear that Corporation contested subject matter at trial. However, subject matter is not waived if the party fails to raise it at trial, and may be raised at any time, even on appeal. Therefore, Corporation could appeal based on this ground.

SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION OVER PAM'S CLAIM

May have SMJ under either federal question or diversity. Here, the claim arises from personal injury, a tort claim, which is a state claim. Therefore, Pam must show diversity jurisdiction.

Diversity jurisdiction requires complete diversity between the parties (Strawbridge v. Curtiss) and an amount in controversy in excess of $75,000.

COMPLETE DIVERSITY

Complete diversity requires that all plaintiffs are citizens of different states than all defendants. Or, as in the case here, that the suit be between a citizen of a state, and a foreign citizen.

A natural person is a citizen of the state in which she is domiciled. Domicile is physical presence plus intent to remain indefinitely. Here, facts state that Pam is Resident of State A. Therefore, Pam will be domiciled in state A.

A corporation is a dual citizen of every state in which it is incorporated and the state which is its principal place of business. ("PPB") PPB is determined by the "nerve center," or the place from which corporate managers run the corporation. (Hertz v. Friend).

Here, Corp is incorporated under the laws of Canada and thus is a citizen of Canada. Further, Corp has its "nerve center" in Canada because that is where its headquarters is located and where its President and Secretary are located. Although Corp keeps a warehouse in state B and its drivers and other employees work out of the warehouse in state B, no facts indicate that any direction of corporate activity occurs here. Therefore, this is the muscle center, not the nerve center, and the Supreme Court ruled that the Nerve center is the PPB.

Therefore, Corp will be deemed a citizen of Canada, meaning that it is a foreign citizen. Because Pam is a citizen of State A and Corp is a Foreign Citizen of Canada, there is complete diversity between the parties.

AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY

The amount in controversy must exceed $75,000 exclusive of interests and cost. The plaintiff's good faith claim will control, unless it is clear to a legal certainty that plaintiff cannot recover the required amount (in excess of $75,000).
Here, Pam demanded damages of $70,00 for personal injury and $10,000 for property damages. Neither amount alone satisfies the amount in controversy.

AGGREGATION

Generally, aggregating claims is not required. However, a single plaintiff may aggregate all claims against a single defendant. This means that Pam can add together her claims against Corp. Therefore, adding Pam's claims together, her good faith claim was for $80,000. Because there are no facts to indicate this amount was not in good faith, or that there is a legal certainty prohibiting Pam from this recovery (such as a statutory damages cap), Pam has met the amount in controversy.

RESULT IF PLAINTIFF RECOVERS LESS THAN THE AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY:

If the plaintiff recovers less than the amount in controversy, that will not defeat diversity jdx, because the good faith claim controls. However, in such a case, the plaintiff may be required to pay the defendant's fees in the litigation. Therefore, because Pam recovered on $60,000 that will not defeat diversity, but she may be liable for costs.

RULING:

The federal district court had subject matter jurisdiction over Pam's claim by virtue of diversity jurisdiction. Therefore, the court should deny the appeal based on lack of SMJ over Pam's claim.

SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION OVER PATRICK'S CLAIM

As above, this is a tort claim, not arising under federal law, and therefore the court will not have "federal question" jurisdiction. Therefore, Patrick will have to meet the requirements of diversity jurisdiction for the federal district court to have had SMJ.

COMPLETE DIVERSITY

Like Pam above, Patrick is domiciled in state A and will therefore be a citizen of state A. Under the analysis above, Corp is a foreign citizen of Canada. Therefore, as above, there is complete diversity.

AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY

Patrick requested only $6000 in damages. This is less than $75,000 and therefore does not meet the amount in controversy. Patrick may not aggregate his claim together with Pam, because plaintiffs may not aggregate claims with other plaintiffs.

Therefore, the court did not have diversity jdx over Patrick's claim.

SUPPLEMENTAL JDX

Where the court has jurisdiction over one claim in a matter, it may exercise supplemental jurisdiction over other claims that arise from a Common Nucleus of Operative Fact. The common nucleus test is generally considered broader than the same transaction or occurrence test, and therefore any party that would meet the Same Tran. and Occ. test will meet the Common Nucleus of Operative Fact test.

Here, Pam and Patrick are both suing for injuries and damages arising from the same car accident. While visiting State B, they were hit by a truck owned by Corp, the same truck, in the same accident. The witnesses to both will be the same, as will the evidence. Therefore, Patrick's claim arises from a Common nucleus of operative fact with Pam's claim, and the federal district court could exercise supplemental jdx over Patrick's claim.

DIVERSITY LIMITATIONS ON SUPPLEMENTAL JDX

However, where the underlying claim is in diversity, the court cannot exercise supplemental jdx over a claim by a plaintiff that would defeat complete diversity. Here, Patrick is a plaintiff. However, if supplemental jdx is exercised over Patrick’s claim it will not defeat complete diversity because all Plaintiffs will still be citizens of State A, and all Defendants of Canada.

Where the supplemental claim does not meet the amount in controversy, but will not destroy complete diversity, the court may exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the claim. Here, Patrick's claim did not meet the amount in controversy, but will not destroy complete diversity and therefore the court may exercise supplemental jdx over the claim.

DISCRETION

In some cases, a federal district court should exercise discretion not to exercise supplemental jdx, such as where there is a novel or complex issue of state law, or state claims predominate, or all federal questions have been dismissed. On these facts, this is a tort claim for personal injury and therefore not novel or complex. Further, the claim is in diversity and not federal question, and thus there is no concern about the federal claims being dropped out.

This is not a claim over which the court should decline supplemental based on the discretionary factors.

RULING

The Federal district court had subject matter jurisdiction over Patrick's claim based on supplemental jurisdiction. Therefore, the appeals court should deny the motion on the basis of lack of subject matter jurisdiction.

Answer B

Pam and Patrick v. Corporation

Pam and Patrick have raised a claim against Corporation (C) in federal district court in State A. Corporation attempted to dismiss the case based on lack of personal jurisdiction (PJ) and subject matter jurisdiction (SMJ). These motions were denied, Pam and Patrick were awarded damages in the case, and Corporation has appealed the case on the grounds listed above. The following considers how the court of appeal should rule on these claims.

Subject Matter Jurisdiction

Subject matter jurisdiction (SMJ) considers whether the court has the power to hear the particular case. This case was brought in federal court; federal courts are courts of limited power, unlike state courts, which can generally hear any case save for several exclusively federal categories. In order for federal courts to have proper SMJ over a case, the case must either be based on a federal question, or meet the requirements for diversity of citizenship jurisdiction. Each of these will be examined in turn to see if the federal courts have jurisdiction over this matter.

Federal Question

A case may properly be held in federal court when the case is based on a federal question. This requires that the plaintiff assert a claim arising under the federal constitution or a federal law. The "well pleaded complaint rule" dictates that the claim be asserted in plaintiff's complaint. It is not enough that a federal issue generally be raised by the case, nor that the defendant will defend on the grounds of a federal law.

Here, the case involves personal injury damages for the injuries that Pam and Patrick suffered when they were hit by a truck owned and operated by Corporation. Thus, it appears that the case is just a simple tort case, which would be based on state law, and not on the constitution or federal law.

Thus, there is no federal question here.

Diversity in Citizenship

However, the federal courts have another means of jurisdiction available, in the form of diversity of citizenship. To be valid, all plaintiffs must be "diverse" in citizenship from all defendants, and the amount in controversy must exceed $75,000.

Diversity

There is an absolute diversity requirement, wherein each plaintiff must be entirely diverse in citizenship from each defendant. The federal rules allow for diversity between citizens of different states, or citizens of a state and a foreign country. Citizenship for individuals is based on their domicile, which is evidenced by physical presence and intent to remain. For corporations, citizenship is determined by place of incorporation, and principal place of business, which is where the owners, directors, and management manage and direct the company's affairs.

Here, Pam and Patrick are residents of State A. Though the facts do not give us any hints into whether they have the intent to remain there, it is reasonable to presume that they did have that intent. Thus, their citizenship is State A.

C is incorporated under the laws of Canada and has its headquarters there, where its President and Secretary are located. Thus, the place of incorporation and the principal place of business is in Canada. Of note, Corporation's drivers and other employees work out of its warehouse in State B. Several years ago, this may have met the "muscle" test, and thus demonstrated citizenship in State B for C; however, this test has been done away with. Nonetheless, there still would be diversity in citizenship even if C was a citizen of State B.

Thus, there is diversity in citizenship, because Pam and Patrick are citizens of State A, and C is a citizen of Canada. Because the rules of civil procedure allow for diversity between residents of a state and a foreign country, there is proper diversity.

Amount in Controversy

Next, the amount in controversy must exceed $75,000 excluding interest and attorney's fees. The court will examine this based off of a good faith pleading of damages by the plaintiff. To reach this amount in controversy, any single plaintiff may aggregate as many claims together to meet the minimum requirement. However, multiple plaintiffs may not aggregate claims in order to reach the minimum requirement.

Here, Pam demanded damages for personal injury in the amount of $70,000, and for property damage in the amount of $10,000. This is an example of aggregation by one plaintiff against one defendant. This is proper. Further, because $70,000 plus $10,000 equals $80,000, it exceeds the amount in controversy requirement.

Patrick demanded damages in the amount of $6,000. This would not be able to be aggregated with Pam's claims in order to reach the amount in controversy; however, because Pam has reached the amount all on the basis of her own claims, this does not impact Patrick's claim. We will need to examine whether Patrick's claim can be joined, however. I will do this later under supplemental jurisdiction (see below).

The conclusion is that the amount in controversy is met, as Pam's claims exceed the required $75,000 minimum amount.

The Effect of Receiving Less Than $75,000 At End Of Trial

C may argue that SMJ was invalid because Pam and Patrick ended up receiving less than $75,000 in damages at the end of the trial. This is incorrect. The mere fact that the parties recovered less than $75,000 at the end of the trial does not mean that the court loses jurisdiction, or never had it in the first place. All that is required is a good faith claim exceeding $75,000. Thus, this will have no effect on the question of SMJ.

Supplemental Jurisdiction: Pat's Claim of $6,000

As discussed above, Pat's claim alone did not meet the amount in controversy requirement. Each and every claim must meet the requirement in order to satisfy SMJ. When the amount in controversy is not met, we can look to supplemental jurisdiction to see if the claim can nonetheless get into federal court.

Supplemental jurisdiction requires that the claim contain a common nucleus of fact with the other claims asserted. If the claim arises out of the same transaction or occurrence, then this test is always met. Supplemental jurisdiction cannot be invoked when it would defeat complete diversity in a diversity case. Here, Pat's claim is based on the exact same incident as Pam - the accident with C's truck. Thus, it is the same transaction or occurrence, and will be able to be heard. The federal courts do have discretion to not hear these claims, but it is likely that they would hear this to get the whole case out of the way at the same time. Further, adding Pat's claim does not defeat diversity, because he is a citizen of State A.

Thus, Pat's claim can properly be heard in federal court.

When Can SMJ Be Asserted?

Finally, we must consider at what point can SMJ be raised as an issue. Some claims must be asserted before certain stages of the trial in order to be preserved, and if not raised, then they are waived. SMJ, however, is never waived, as it is a strict requirement that the federal courts have subject matter jurisdiction. Thus, it is of no concern that C apparently has not raised the SMJ issue prior to the appeal; they can still properly raise it.

Conclusion: The federal court system has proper SMJ over Pam and Patrick's claim.

Personal Jurisdiction

Personal jurisdiction (PJ) considers whether this state can properly hear this claim against this defendant. It asks whether the state has the power to force the defendant to come into the state to defend the claim. To examine whether PJ exists over C in State A, we must look to the traditional bases of exercising jurisdiction, the state long-arm statute, and to the constitutional limitations on exercising PJ.

Traditional Bases of Exercising Jurisdiction

Traditionally, PJ can be asserted over a defendant if the defendant (1) is domiciled in the state; (2) consents to jurisdiction; or (3) is served with process while in the state. As discussed above, C is not domiciled in State A, but is rather domiciled in Canada. Further, it does not appear that C has consented to jurisdiction in State A in any way (though we will later talk about the need to timely raise the argument of lack of personal jurisdiction). And finally, there is no indication that C was served in State A.

Thus, the traditional bases of exercising jurisdiction seem to not be present.

Long-Arm Statute

A long-arm statute is a state statute that states when the state can reach and "grab" an out-of-state defendant, and force the defendant to defend in the state court. Some of these long-arm statutes require that the defendant commit a tortuous act in the state, or break a contract in the state, while others simply grant the state the ability to reach out to grab defendants to the full extent as allowed by the U.S. Constitution.

Here, the facts do not mention the reach of State A's long-arm statute. It is reasonable to assume that it reaches the constitutional limits. Thus, we must examine the constitutional limits of PJ.

Constitutional Limitations

To exert PJ over an out-of-state defendant, the constitution requires certain minimum contacts with the forum state such that maintenance of the suit there does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. To determine if this is true in this case, we can break the above test down into three sections: minimum contacts, relatedness of the claim to the contact, and fairness.

Minimum Contacts

The constitutional requires the defendant to have some minimum contacts with the forum state in order for the state to exert jurisdiction. The defendant must have purposefully availed himself in the state, such that being subject to a claim in that state would be foreseeable.

Purposeful Availment

Purposeful availment requires that the defendant commit a voluntary act in the forum state. Defendant must avail himself in some way to the state, whether it be by using the state's roads, or attempting to make money in the state.

Here, C is incorporated in Canada, and has its principal place of business there. It conducts business solely in State B, which is also where it has a warehouse. Further, the accident occurred in State B. It is possible that C drives on State A roads from time to time, but the facts do not give this information. Also, there are no facts which say that C ships goods to State A, or otherwise tries to make money there. Simply put, on these facts, there seem to be no contacts whatsoever with State A, other than that Pam and Patrick are residents of State A.

The court of appeal should find that there was no purposeful availment.

Foreseeability

The minimum contacts must be sufficient enough to make it foreseeable that defendant would be "haled into court" in the forum state. Here, as discussed, there appears to be nothing that C did that would make it foreseeable that they would end up in State A. The mere fact of driving on State B's roads does not make it foreseeable that they would end up in State A's court. I suppose if State A were located directly adjacent to State B that it would perhaps be more foreseeable, but again, the facts do not share that information. A case against C in State A court was not foreseeable.

Relatedness of the Claim to the Contact

The more related the claim is to the contact with the forum state, the more likely the court will be to allow for jurisdiction over the defendant.

If the claim arises directly out of the contact with the forum state, this gives rise to specific personal jurisdiction. Here, there was no contact with State A, and so there cannot be specific jurisdiction.

Next, general personal jurisdiction may exist if the defendant consistently and regularly conducts activity in the forum state, such that he is "essentially at home there." Merely selling goods in a state does not give rise to general PJ, there must be an actual physical presence. Here, C is not in State A whatsoever, or so it seems. Thus, it is not essentially at home in State A. It may essentially be at home in State B, where it has a warehouse, but this does not affect the discussion of whether State A has jurisdiction.
The claim is not related to C's contact with State A, as C has no contact with State A.

Fairness

Finally, the court will look to see if holding the suit in the state meets general standards of fairness. Under this, the court considers convenience to the parties and the witnesses, the forum state's interests, and the plaintiff's interests.

Convenience

Under the convenience factor, the court will look to see how convenient it is to hold the case in the forum state, based on a variety of factors including where the parties are, where the witnesses are, where the evidence is, etc. If the inconvenience to the defendant grossly impacts his ability to defend against the case, the court will likely dismiss for lack of PJ.

Here, the accident occurred in State B, so any witnesses are likely in State B. It is unknown where the wreckage is located, but the vehicles are likely also in State B. Thus, a good portion of the pertinent materials needed would be in State B. Further, C has no connection with State A, and will have to travel there to defend against the suit. This is likely not entirely burdensome, because they are a corporation, and likely would have the resources to get there.

However, it was likely entirely inconvenient to have the case in State A, based on where the evidence, witnesses, and the defendant was located.

State's Interests

Next, the court will look to see if the forum state has a strong interest in providing a forum for the claim. Here, State A is interested in providing a forum for its residents; it wants to be sure that they are compensated for their injuries. However, the accident occurred on State B's roads, and so State B would have more of an interest, because it wants to be sure that dangerous drivers are kept off of their roads.

In the end, a court would likely find that State A has a limited interest in holding this case.

Plaintiff's Interests

Finally, the court looks to the plaintiff's interests in having the case in the forum state. It is likely that Pam and Patrick have suffered some injuries and thus would prefer to not have to travel. However, they had already been in State B on vacation, and could likely travel there again if needed. The court generally will be deferential to the plaintiff's choice of forum, however.

In the end, it is likely that it is simply not fair to have C defend in State A court.

When Can PJ Be Asserted?

On a final note, PJ must be asserted either in a 12b motion prior to the answer, or along with the answer. If not, it is waived. Here, it appears that C raised the PJ motion at some point early on, and thus likely did not waive it, so that it can be heard on appeal. Some courts require that a party immediately appeal a decision on PJ by way of an extraordinary writ.

Conclusion:

The Court of Appeal should hold the court had SMJ over the matter, but not PJ. Thus, provided that PJ has not been waived, it should dismiss the case. If it has been waived, the court should reject the PJ argument as well.

Q2 Community Property / Professional Responsibility

Wendy and Hal are married and live in California.

A year ago, Wendy told Hal that she would not tolerate his drinking any longer. She insisted that he move out of the family home and not return until he completed an alcohol treatment program. He moved out but did not obtain treatment.

Last month, Hal went on a drinking spree, started driving, and struck a pedestrian. When Wendy learned of the accident, she told Hal that she wanted a divorce.

Hal has consulted Lawyer about defending him in a civil action filed by the pedestrian. He is currently unemployed. His only asset is his interest in the family home, which he and Wendy purchased during their marriage. Lawyer offered to represent Hal if Hal were to give him a promissory note, secured by a lien on the family home, for his fees. Hal immediately accepted.

1. Is Wendy's interest in the family home subject to damages recovered for injuries to the pedestrian? Discuss. Answer according to California law.

2. Is Wendy's interest in the family home subject to payment of Hal's legal fees? Discuss. Answer according to California Law.

3. What, if any, ethical violations has Lawyer committed? Discuss. Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

Answer A

1. Is Wendy's Interest in the Family Home Subject to Damages Recovered for Injuries to the Pedestrian?

California is a Community Property State

California is a community property (CP) jurisdiction. Thus, any property acquired by either spouse during the course of the marriage by either spouse's labor is presumptively community property. Property acquired before or after the marriage by either spouse, or during the marriage by gift, inheritance, or devise, is presumptively separate property (SP). In determining the character of a particular asset, it is helpful to look at (1) the source of the asset or the source of the funds used to purchase the asset, (2) any actions by the spouses changing the character of the property, and (3) any relevant presumptions.

The House

Source

The facts tell us that Wendy (W) and Hal (H) purchased the family house during their marriage. However, we don't know what funds were used to purchase the house. If W's or H's earnings were used (or a combination thereof), and those earnings were earned during the course of the marriage, then the house would be CP because spousal earnings are CP to the extent they're earned during the marriage.

However, if one spouse partially used inheritance money or other SP acquired before the marriage, then that spouse would likely have a SP interest in the home to the extent SP was used to purchase it.

However, without more, the best assumption is that spousal earnings were used to purchase the house. The facts say H is currently unemployed, but he may have been employed in the past (and thus had earnings). Further, we can assume W earned money somehow, likely from a job.

Actions

There is no evidence that the house was put in only one spouse's name, suggesting that the house was the separate property of that spouse. Pre-1975, if the house was in W's name, the married woman's special presumption would operate to render the house (or the share of the house in W's name) W's SP.

Modernly, if title was taken in only one spouse's name, a court would not likely hold that to be conclusive evidence that the house was that spouse's SP absent some manifestation by the other spouse that the house was intended as a gift.
If H and W took title to the house as joint tenants with a right of survivorship, each would have a 1/2 SP undivided interest in the whole during life. On death, the form of title would control. On divorce, under CA's anti-Lucas statute, the house would be treated as CP, with a right to reimbursement for any SP used by either spouse to improve the home.

Finally, there's no evidence of a transmutation changing the character of the house, which, after 1985, would have to be in writing.
Thus, absent any of these actions, it appears the house is still CP.

Presumption

All property acquired during the course of marriage is presumptively CP. Here, nothing rebuts that presumption.

Community Responsibility for Debts of One Spouse

All debts incurred by either spouse prior to or during the course of marriage are community debts. Tort obligations are "incurred" when the tort occurs, not when judgment is handed down. Thus, any obligations arising out of H striking the pedestrian were "incurred" when he hit the pedestrian.

W will argue that the marital economic community was not in existence when H hit the pedestrian because she had kicked him out of the house. The marital economic community begins at marriage and terminates upon permanent physical separation when at least one spouse has no intent of continuing the marriage.

Here, W kicked H out of the house. However, she told him that he could return when he completed an alcohol abuse program. Thus, the marital economic community had not yet ended when H got in the accident because W was still open to the possibility of him returning. W will argue that H manifested an intent to never continue the marriage because he refused to go to treatment. In other words, W will argue that by rejecting the pre-condition to the continuation of the marriage--i.e. getting treatment--H effectively terminated the marital economic community. Indeed, W can point to the fact that 11 months after she kicked H out, he hadn't obtained treatment. Given this length of time, W can argue, it's clear that the community had ended.

However, the stronger argument is that the marital economic community continued until W told H that she wanted a divorce. If W viewed the marital community as over prior to the accident, she would have likely filed for divorce then. Instead, it appears the accident was the "last straw." Thus, the request for a divorce was the clearest signal by either party that the physical separation was permanent and there was no intent to continue the marriage.

Thus, the marital economic community had not ended when H struck the pedestrian, any obligation incurred because of the accident is a community debt.

Order of Payment

When a tort is committed during an activity for the benefit of the community, the debt will be satisfied first by CP, then by the tortfeasor's SP. The non-tortfeasor spouse's SP is not subject to the debt.

When a tort is not committed during an activity for the benefit of the community, the debt will be satisfied first by the tortfeasor's SP, then by CP. Again, the other spouse's SP is safe.

Here, H committed the tort against the pedestrian while driving drunk. This was not an activity for the benefit of the community--to the contrary, H was supposed to be seeking alcohol abuse treatment while he was living away from the family home. Thus, recovery would be taken out of H's SP before the CP.

However, on the facts, it doesn't seem as though H has any SP to satisfy the debt. Thus, any recovery will likely be against the H and W's CP.

Reimbursement to the Community

To the extent any CP--i.e. the house--is used to pay any obligation arising out of H's accident with the pedestrian, the community may be entitled to reimbursement from H. Where CP is used to pay an obligation arising out of spouse's tort that was committed not during an activity for the benefit of the community, the community is entitled to reimbursement for that payment if the tortfeasor's SP was available to pay (or if the order of payment was not followed). However, as mentioned, it doesn't appear H has any SP available to pay the debt and, thus, reimbursement may be unlikely.

Distribution of Debts on Divorce

At divorce, community assets are generally divided under the "equal division rule"--i.e. each spouse gets 1/2 of each community asset in kind.

However, a judge has more discretion as to the allocation of debts at divorce. Typically, a judge will allocate a tort debt to the tortfeasor spouse if the tort was incurred not during an activity for the benefit of the community. However, a judge may take into account ability to pay to effect a more just allocation of debts.

Here, on divorce, the judge would likely allocate any judgment based on H striking the pedestrian to H. H will argue that he's unemployed and can't pay, but it's highly unlikely a judge would saddle W with an obligation to pay H's tort liability post-divorce.

Conclusion

Thus, during the marriage, H and W's CP will be liable for damages recovered for injuries to the pedestrian. Even though H and W have filed for divorce, until community assets and debts are distributed, the community estate continues and the pedestrian can recover against it. However, as mentioned, on divorce, the debt will be allocated to H. Further, W may be entitled to reimbursement for CP used to pay the debt.

*Note: If the court decided that the marital community was terminated when H struck the pedestrian, then CP--i.e. the house--would not be liable for the debt because the debt would be H's SP.

2. Is Wendy's Interest in the Family Home Subject to Payment of H's Legal Fees

Equal Management

Each spouse generally has equal rights to manage community property. This includes the right to sell and encumber community property. However, with respect to real property, one spouse may not encumber community owned real property without the other spouse's consent. If one spouse, without consent, sells or encumbers community real estate, the non-consenting spouse has the power to void that transaction within 1 year.

Lien on the House

Here, H has given Lawyer a lien on the family home without W's consent. Thus, W has the power within 1 year to void the encumbrance.

H will argue that because he gave the lien on the house after W told him she wanted a divorce, he was only granting a lien on his 1/2 SP interest in the family home. However, there's no evidence that W actually filed for divorce or that divorce proceedings were held during which a judge divided the community estate. While the marital economic community may no longer exist because there has been permanent physical separation, the community estate lives on until it has been distributed.

Thus, a court would likely allow W to void the encumbrance on the community real property due to her lack of consent in making the encumbrance.

Timing of the Attorney's Fees

Furthermore, H sought legal advice after W told him she wanted a divorce. Because W asking for divorce terminated the marital economic community, CP--i.e. the family home--is not liable for the debts incurred by H after such separation.

Thus, any obligation owed to Lawyer based on legal services rendered to H cannot be satisfied out of CP because such an obligation would not be a community debt.

He would argue that payment of attorney's fees is an obligation arising out of the accident of the pedestrian, when the marital economic community still existed. However, the attorney's fees represent an entirely different event. Furthermore, contractual obligations arise when the contract was made. Here, any contract and/or agreement with Lawyer was made after the economic community ended. Therefore, W's interest in the family home is not subject to payment for the additional reason that CP is not liable for H's separate post-marriage debts.

Necessaries

Post-separation, a spouse can still be liable for obligations relating to necessaries that the other spouse incurred during the marriage. Necessaries generally refer to food, shelter, and medical expenses. Here, H's legal fees don't likely constitute necessaries and, as such, this theory cannot be invoked to hold W's interest in the family home subject to payment.

3. Lawyer's Ethical Violations

Obtaining Pecuniary Interest in Outcome of Case

Under the ABA, a lawyer cannot obtain a pecuniary interest in the subject matter of a case other than in the case of a contingency fee arrangement or an attorney's lien. However, in CA, attorneys' liens are impermissible.

Here, Lawyer effectively acquired an attorney's lien on H's family home. Thus, Lawyer will argue that this was permissible because the only purpose here was to secure payment. In CA, this would constitute an ethical violation. Under the ABA, it's less clear.

While under the ABA, an attorney's lien is permissible, if Lawyer knew that H couldn't rightfully encumber the family home, then it's possible that Lawyer committed an ethical violation because accepting the attorney's lien would constitute a violation of a third party's (W's) rights in the course of representing H.

Entering into Business Transactions with Clients

An attorney can only enter a business transaction with a client if (1) the terms are fair and reasonable, (2) the terms are communicated to the client in an easily understandable manner, (3) the client is advised to get independent counsel to represent him in the transaction and is given a chance to do so, and (4) the client consents.

Here, by taking a lien on H's family home, Lawyer entered into a business transaction with H. However, it's not clear that Lawyer ever advised H to seek independent counsel or that he adequately informed him of the material terms of the lien. Although H immediately accepted, he did so without knowing what would trigger enforcement of the lien (1 missed payment? total failure to pay? late payment? H's insolvency?). Thus, by failing to adequately inform H and encouraging him to seek independent advice, Lawyer likely violated the ethics rules.

Fees

Under the ABA, a fee must be reasonable. In CA, fees can't be unconscionable. Further, in CA, a fee agreement must be in writing unless it's (1) less than $1k, (2) with a corporation, or (3) for a routine matter involving an existing client.

Here, the lien agreement was essentially a fee agreement. However, the terms were not adequately disclosed to H. Further, there was no written fee agreement. Because a writing was likely required--there's no evidence H was an existing client or that Lawyer's services were valued at under $1k--this is a violation of CA rules.

Further, the lien was likely unreasonable and unconscionable. Because H was unemployed, it was extremely unlikely that he was going to be able to pay Lawyer's fees. If Lawyer knew that H was unemployed--which he likely did, considering he conditioned representing H on having a lien on the house--then Lawyer must have known that H wouldn't be able to pay. Thus, the fee agreement was unconscionable because it was akin to a mortgagee lending to a mortgagor knowing that the mortgagor was going to default and the foreclosure was inevitable. Lawyer must have known (a) that H wasn't going to be able to pay and (b) that the value of the lien on the home was worth more than the value of the services to be provided.

Thus, the fee arrangement likely constituted an ethical violation.

Violating Rights of Third Parties

Lawyers cannot violate the rights of third parties in the course of representing a client. To the extent the lien violates W's rights and Lawyer knew of this, he likely acted unethically. Furthermore, if Lawyer knew that H could not rightfully encumber the family house, then Lawyer arguably breached his duty of competent and candid representation by not informing H that he couldn't offer a lien on his house without W's consent.

Answer B

1. Is Wendy's interest in the family home subject to damages recovered for injuries to the pedestrian hit by Hal under California law?

The parties were married and live in California. Thus, their property rights as a couple, specifically with regard to the property acquired during the marriage, are governed by California community property law. Whether the house was community or separate property can be determined by the source of the asset, whether any presumptions apply, and the actions of the parties during the marriage.

Community Presumption

There is a community presumption regarding property acquired during the marriage that it is community property. This would apply to the family home given, as the facts state, it was acquired during the marriage. The presumption can be rebutted by a showing that the house was not actually acquired during the marriage, it was acquired during the marriage but with separate property funds, the house was a gift/devise/inheritance, or the house was the rent/issue/profit derived from separate property.

Their house was purchased during the marriage so it was not a gift or devise. Although it is possible that the house was purchased with separate property funds, there are no facts to indicate this was the case. Because it was purchased during the marriage, and there are no facts to rebut the presumption, the house is considered community property.

Judgments Against Spouses

A tort judgment against a spouse will subject both the community property and the separate property of the tortfeasor to the judgment. But once the community property is divided, debt cannot be recovered from the spouse who received her half of the community property from what she received under the divorce decree unless she was the spouse that incurred the debt or the debt was assigned to her. Thus, for a judgment against Hal for drinking and driving, the community will be liable for this debt, and it can be satisfied from the community property.

For the Benefit of the Community

Although the community property is liable for the judgment by the pedestrian, the judgment must be satisfied first from the separate property of the tortfeasor spouse if the tort was not committed by conduct that was being performed for the benefit of the community. For example, if Hal was on his way to drop the kids off at school or to pay the mortgage on the house, this would be for the benefit of the community. In that case, the judgment would be satisfied first from community property, and if there was any deficiency, then from the separate property of the tortfeasor.

Here, Hal had been kicked out [of] the house for his drinking problem at the time of the accident. Wendy had clearly communicated her disapproval for Hal's drinking. The drinking, including drinking and driving, would actually harm, not benefit, the community. Although we do not know where Hal was headed, he had already been kicked out of the house and was, generally, involved in a drinking binge at the time. Therefore, his actions were not to the benefit of the community and can be satisfied first from his separate property assets.

But the facts state that his only asset, at the present time, is his interest in the family home. Because it appears he has no separate property from which to satisfy the judgment, the judgment will be satisfied from the community property home.

End of the Economic Community

The accident in which the pedestrian was hit occurred after Hal had been kicked out of the house but before Wendy told Hal she wanted a divorce. As stated above, the source of property or debt, whether it was incurred before, during or after the marriage, can indicate whether it is community or separate debt. The pedestrian's claim is a form of debt because, once rendered, the plaintiff can reduce it to a judgment and attach liens to the tortfeasor's property. Thus, the question arises whether the economic community ended when Wendy kicked Hal out of the house, because if so, the injury and judgment would have occurred after the economic community ended and would be the separate debt of Hal. In this case, the judgment could not be satisfied from community property, including the house.

In California, end of the economic community occurs when there is physical separation and an intent not to carry on the marital relationship anymore. If the parties maintain the facade or marriage, although physically separated, the economic community will not be considered to be at an end. The economic community will certainly result, if the above elements are not satisfied, when the divorce decree is entered.

Here, Wendy kicked Hal out of the house one year ago. She did not say anything about ending the marriage or never wanting to see him again. She did tell him he could not return until he completed alcohol treatment. Thus, Hal being kicked out was not indicative of an intent to permanently end the marriage relationship, it was indicative of a temporary physical separation by Wendy for the limited purpose of motivating Hal to get treatment and save the marriage. Thus the economic community would not have ended simply when he left the house.

But, after having moved out and hitting the pedestrian while drinking, Wendy learned of the accident and told Hal she wanted a divorce. At this point, both elements would be met. Hal and Wendy would have been physically separated, and one spouse has indicated an intention not to resume the marital relation by telling the other she wants a divorce.

Because the economic community did not end until that time, when Wendy told Hal she wanted a divorce, and the accident and/or the cause of action that is the basis for any judgment accrued before that time, the judgment resulting would be a community debt because it was essentially incurred before the end of the economic community.

Debt

Debt incurred before or during the marriage can be satisfied from the community or from the tortfeasor's separate property. Debt incurred by a spouse for necessaries, including medical care, can be satisfied from community property or the separate property of either spouse, although indemnity may be available. Here, the debt is for tort judgment and, as stated above, can be satisfied from either community property or separate property of Hal, first from his separate property and then from the community property.

In California, for the purpose of debt for necessaries or medical services, end of the economic community can only occur on divorce. Judgment may not be able to be satisfied from Wendy's earnings if she kept them in a separate (versus joint) account from which Hal had no right of withdrawal.

CONCLUSION--Because the debt was incurred before end of the economic community, it is a community debt. Therefore, it can be satisfied from community property or separate property of Hal. Because the tort that is the basis of the judgment was not conducted for the benefit of the community, the judgment must be satisfied first from Hal's separate property. But because Hal has no separate property, his only asset is the house, it will be reduced to judgment and recovery sought from the asset that is the community home, which as above is classified as community property. Wendy may be able to seek indemnity.

2. Is Wendy's interest in the family home subject to payment of Hal's legal fees under California law?

As stated above, the economic community ended when Wendy kicked Hal out of the house and told him she wanted a divorce. Hal appears from the facts to have consulted the lawyer after that time. Debt incurred after the end of the economic community will belong to the debtor spouse.

Attorney Fees for Divorce Lawyer

Generally, a spouse may not unilaterally encumber community real property without a joint action on behalf of both spouses. Additionally, the spouse may not separately encumber her half interest in the property. The one exception to this rule is for the spouse to satisfy attorney fees in the divorce proceeding between the spouses.

Here, because the lawyer is not representing Hal as a family attorney in his anticipated divorce proceeding with Wendy, this rule would not apply. The lawyer fees incurred by Hal after the economic community ended for the purpose of defending against the tort suit could only be satisfied from Hal's separate property.

Division of Assets on Divorce

Generally, assets are divided pro rata at divorce, 50-50, no cashing out one spouse to give the other an entire asset. The only general exceptions to this rule are: for a closely held corporation whose shares are community assets where one spouse is the CEO and division would destroy the business; a pension plan from which one spouse can take a cashout instead of receiving payments from the pension so the spouse, who no longer wish to have any connection can go their separate ways; or, for the family home when selling it and dividing the proceeds will uproot the children and cause them harm.

While this is the family home, there appear to be no children and no reason not to apply the binding pro rata division, 50-50, by sale of the house and splitting the assets.

This means that on divorce, the assets of the house will be split evenly between the parties. Once the divorce decree is entered, the proceeds from the house that Hal receives are going to be his separate property. Upon divorce, the legal fees of Hal's lawyer can be paid by his share of the proceeds.

But the question asks whether the payment of Hal's legal fees will be satisfied from Wendy’s interest in the home. Wendy has no interest in Hal's proceeds after divorce from sale of the community property house, and thus the proceeds subject Hal's interest, not hers, to liability.

CONCLUSION--because the attorney fee debt will have been incurred after end of the economic community, it will be separate debt of Hal, and does not subject any of Wendy's interest in the family home to liability for those fees. The exception for divorce attorney fees does not apply.

3. What ethical violations has the lawyer committed according to both the ABA and California law?

A lawyer is a fiduciary of the client. She has a duty of confidentiality (not to communicate information relating to representation), a duty of loyalty not to act on behalf of her own, a client's, or a third party's best interests that are adverse to her client's, financial duties, and duties of competence which are all owed to the client.

Duty of Loyalty

Under the duty of loyalty, the lawyer must not develop an interest or maintain an interest that is adverse to the client, whether it is the interest of the lawyer herself, an interest of one of the lawyer's other clients, or an interest of a third party with whom the lawyer is closely related.

Loyalty--Financial Assistance to Clients

Under the ABA rules, a lawyer is not permitted to lend the client money for the representation, with the exception of forwarding costs of litigation to indigent clients and forwarding costs associated with a contingent fee arrangement. Under the California rules, the lawyer can lend the client any amount for any reason, as long as she does not promise to satisfy the existing debts of the client in order to buy the client's business.

Therefore, from this perspective, the loan would be considered acceptable under the California rules but unacceptable under the ABA rules. Under the ABA rules, once the client becomes indebted to the attorney, the attorney's personal interest against the client in collecting the money and receiving payment for the debt may conflict with his duty to act for the sole benefit of the client. Under the California rules, because this is not a promise to satisfy pre-existing debt for the prospective client, this is acceptable.

Loyalty--Transacting Business or Developing Adverse Interest to Client

Whenever the lawyer enters into business with the client, the terms must be fair, the lawyer must disclose the terms (effect of the transaction) to the client in writing, allow for an opportunity for the client to consult with independent counsel and probably should suggest she do so if the lawyer's interest will be adverse to the client's in the litigation, and obtain consent from the client in writing.

This loan would essentially be such a transaction. The facts do not indicate the above elements are met. Additionally, there is a question whether it would be fair to encumber a client's sole asset in order to receive payment. But the above rules that specifically address lending a client money are going to govern whether the transaction is permissible. Regardless, even though the loan is permissible under California law, the attorney should ethically consider whether the terms of the loan are fair and suggest receiving independent legal advice if the client wishes to fund the representation in this manner.

Financial Duties

The reason the nature of the fee arrangement is important is to judge whether it is permissible for the lawyer to charge the client in this way. Under the ABA, the fee must be reasonable considering the experience of the lawyer, novelty of the case, difficulty of legal issues, time and effort required, etc. In California, it simply must not be unconscionable. The question is whether the lawyer has complied with the requirements for charging a fee, and whether the amount is justified.

Contingent Fee

A lawyer can enter into either an hourly fee arrangement or a contingent fee arrangement with a client, or potentially a flat fee arrangement. Under the ABA rules, contingent fee arrangements (lawyer forwards fees and sometimes costs in order for a stake in the recovery, if there happens to be one) are not available in criminal or domestic cases. They must include the percentage of recovery taken, the costs deducted from recovery, and whether they are deducted before or after. In California, the agreement must also indicate that it is subject to negotiation with the lawyer and what costs will not be covered by the contingent fee arrangement.

Under ABA rules, this may be a criminal case, but considering the question implies a money judgment that could subject the house to liability, brought by a private party pedestrian; using contingent fee arrangement in this case would be permissible. But here, if the mortgage is being used as payment, and thus this is more likely to be considered an hourly fee arrangement.

Hourly Fee

The agreement, under ABA rules, must disclose the rate at which the fee is charged, the services it covers, and the respective duties of lawyer and client. In California, it must also be in writing unless it is for less than $1,000, with a corporate client, routine matter for regular client, or emergency renders this impossible.

CONCLUSION--There is nothing in the facts to indicate the lawyer has complied with any of the above requirements regarding the fee arrangement. He made the offer to encumber the property without explaining the calculation of the rate, providing a writing, explaining what services it would cover, etc. Additionally, the case appears to be a simple one, involving culpability for drunk driving. Depending on how much the house was worth, a lien on the home could be unreasonable or unconscionable under either California or ABA approach.

Duty of Competence

A lawyer has a duty of competence, to represent the client with the skill, knowledge, thoroughness and preparation necessary to carry out the representation effectively.

As stated above, the home is community property. It cannot be encumbered unless both spouses jointly enter into the transaction. The non-consenting spouse can recover the house even from a BFP, and set aside the transaction, if she has not agreed to it.

There is a one year statute of limitations, but if the buyer knew the seller was married and failed to seek consent from the other spouse, there is no statute of limitations.

Here, an attempt to encumber the community property house to satisfy the separate debt of Hal would be a failure of competence on the part of the lawyer. A lawyer of reasonable skill, knowledge, thoroughness and preparation would be aware of this and would not attempt to encumber property to pay his debts knowing it was community property not subject to this type of transaction without consent of Wendy. This would ineffectively carry out the representation.

CONCLUSION--Under ABA rules only, the lawyer has breached his duty of loyalty to the client by lending him money in regard to the transaction. Although, he may argue he is permitted to do so because he is permitted to forward costs of litigation to indigent clients and Hal is indigent because he is unemployed and has no assets but the house. But because the house cannot be encumbered this way without the consent of Wendy, and a lawyer of reasonable skill and knowledge would know this, the attempt to encumber the house without Wendy's permission may also be a breach of duty of competence, subjecting the lawyer to discipline, sanctions, and malpractice liability. There is also a question of whether the amount of the fee is reasonable or unconscionable in light of the nature of the litigation and employment of the lawyer.

Q3 Evidence

Vicky was killed on a rainy night. The prosecution charged Dean, a business rival, with her murder. It alleged that, on the night in question, he hid in the bushes outside her home and shot her when she returned from work.

At Dean's trial in a California court, the prosecution called Whitney, Dean's wife, to testify. One week after the murder, Whitney had found out that Dean had been dating another woman and had moved out, stating the marriage was over. Still angry, Whitney was willing to testify against Dean. After Whitney was called to the stand, the court took a recess. During the recess, Dean and Whitney reconciled. Whitney decided not to testify against Dean. The trial recommenced and the prosecutor asked Whitney if she saw anything on Dean's shoes the night of the murder. When Whitney refused to answer, the court threatened to hold her in contempt. Reluctantly, Whitney testified that she saw mud on Dean's shoes.

The prosecution then called Ella, Dean's next-door neighbor. Ella testified that, on the night Vicky was killed, she was standing by an open window in her kitchen, which was about 20 feet from an open window in Dean's kitchen. She also testified that she saw Dean and Whitney and she heard Dean tell Whitney, "I just killed the gal who stole my biggest account." Dean and Whitney did not know that Ella overheard their conversation.

Dean called Fred, a friend, to testify. Fred testified that, on the day after Vicky was killed, he was having lunch in a coffee shop when he saw Hit, a well-known gangster, conversing at the next table with another gangster, Gus. Fred testified that he heard Gus ask Hit if he had "taken care of the assignment concerning Vicky," and that Hit then drew his index finger across his own throat.

Assuming all appropriate objections and motions were timely made, did the court properly:

1. Allow the prosecution to call Whitney? Discuss.

2. Admit the testimony of:
    (a) Whitney? Discuss.
    (b) Ella? Discuss.
    (c) Fred? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

Answer A

California Proposition 8: Truth in Evidence Rule

Under Proposition 8 in California, all non-privileged, relevant evidence is admissible in a criminal prosecution brought in California unless it falls within one of the specified exceptions to the rule. Evidence that is admissible under Proposition 8 is still subject to CEC 352 balancing.

Here, as this case involves the prosecution charging Dean with murder, Proposition 8 will apply to admit any evidence that is relevant and is not excluded for CEC 352 balancing.

1. Allow the Prosecution to call Whitney

The first issue is whether the prosecution should be allowed to call Whitney. This depends on whether Whitney ("W") can claim one of the spousal privileges: spousal communications privilege or spousal testimonial privilege.

Spousal Communications Privilege

The spousal communications privilege protects all confidential communications between spouses that are made in the course of an existing marriage and in reliance on the intimacy of the marriage. This privilege belongs to both spouses and may be claimed by either to prevent the other spouse from testifying. Moreover, the privilege exists regardless of whether the marriage has ended in divorce, so long as the communication itself was made during a period when the marriage existed. For purposes of the privilege, marriage does not end until there is a valid divorce.

Here, Whitney was called by the prosecution to testify that she saw mud on Dean's shoes. This observation occurred when Dean and W were still married as Dean and W have yet to obtain a divorce and reconciled prior to W providing any testimony. Although W and D had separated because W had discovered that D was dating another woman and W had moved out, for the purpose of this privilege, it extends for any communication made prior to divorce. Finally, as W was called to testify to an observation, rather than a communication between W and Dean, it would not be protected under the communications privilege.

Thus, this privilege would not apply to prevent W from testifying as she did or to prevent her from taking the stand.

Spousal Testimonial Privilege

The spousal testimonial privilege allows one spouse to refuse to testify against another spouse in any action. For this privilege to apply, a valid marriage must still exist. The privilege belongs to the testifying spouse, as the privilege is designed to protect the harmony of the marriage, which is not salvageable if the testifying spouse wishes to testify. Moreover, in California, the privilege allows the testifying spouse to avoid taking the stand entirely.

Here, W was called to the stand to testify that she saw mud on D's shoes during the night of the murder. Although W and D had been separated, because W moved out and stated the marriage was over when she discovered that D had been dating another woman and moved out, the marriage had not ended for the purposes of the privilege, which requires a valid divorce. As such, W was privileged to choose not to take the stand.

In this case, W initially was angry and was willing to testify against D and thus agreed to take the stand and testify. W actually took the stand and was sworn in, prior to the recess in which W and D reconciled and W decided not to offer testimony. Thus, the prosecution will argue that W waived the privilege because she took the stand and was sworn under oath.

By contrast, W will assert that she did not waive the privilege because, although she took the stand, she asserted the privilege the first time that she was asked a question by the prosecution. W refused to answer when court resumed and the prosecutor asked W if she saw anything on D's shoes at the night of the murder.

As W asserted the privilege prior to answering any questions, the court will find that she had a spousal testimonial privilege and could not be forced to testify against D. However, W took the stand voluntarily and thus it was proper to allow the prosecution to call W because she was the holder of the privilege and had not yet claimed it. Proposition 8 does not allow privileged information to be admitted and thus will not change the outcome.

2. Admit the Testimony

(a) Whitney

The first issue is whether the court should have admitted the testimony of Whitney.

Logical Relevance

Under California law, evidence is relevant if it makes a fact of consequence that is actually in dispute more or less probable then it would be without the evidence.
Here, W testified that she saw mud on D's shoes. As V was killed on a rainy night, and the prosecution was arguing that D hid in the bushes outside her home and shot her when she returned from work, this evidence would make it more likely that D was present in a muddy flowerbed and committed the murder.
Thus, it is relevant.

Legal Relevance

Evidence is legally relevant if its probative value is not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, misleading the jury, waste, or undue delay.

Here, D will argue that the testimony about mud on his shoes is likely to confuse and mislead the jury, particularly if the prosecution has failed to establish that the mud came from a flowerbed near Vicky's home. However, as this evidence has high probative value in that it shows that D was standing outside in mud on a rainy night, it will likely be admitted. Thus, this objection will fail.

Personal Knowledge

In order to be competent to testify, a witness must have personal knowledge of the facts to which she is testifying based upon her percipient observations.

Here, W saw mud on D's shoes in the night in question and thus testimony about the state of the shoes is within her perception and personal knowledge.

Spousal Communications Privilege

As discussed above, this will not protect W's testimony about the mud on D's shoes as it was not a communication, but was an observation.

Spousal Testimonial Privilege

As discussed above, this will protect W's testimony because she is still married to D and therefore cannot be compelled to offer evidence against him in the criminal action. Prop 8 does not change the outcome as privileged information is excluded.

Conclusion

W's testimony will be excluded as a result of the spousal testimonial privilege.

(b) Ella

The second issue is the admissibility of Ella's testimony.

Logical Relevance

See rule above.

Ella's testimony that she overheard D tell W that he "just killed the gal who stole my biggest account" is highly relevant to the case. D is charged with murder and his alleged motivation for killing Vicky is that they were business rivals. The statement thus indicates that D committed V's murder, particularly because it was made on the night that V was killed. This fact is in dispute as it relates to whether or not D is guilty of the crime with which he is charged. Thus, this testimony is logically relevant.

Legal Relevance

See rule above.

Although D will argue that this statement is highly prejudicial and should be excluded because it could be misinterpreted and it fails to identify V specifically, the court will likely find that its probative value in showing that D committed the murder and that he had a motivation to commit the murder far outweighs the risk of prejudice. Moreover, the information goes to the heart of D's guilt or innocence.

Thus, the evidence will not be excluded on this ground.

Personal Knowledge

See rule above.

Here, Ella was standing by an open window in her kitchen, which was about 20 feet from an open window in D's kitchen. Ella could both see D and W and could hear D tell W that "I just killed the gal who stole my biggest account." Thus, Ella's testimony was based on her percipient observations as she could personally see and hear what was happening in D and W's house.

Thus, this objection will be overruled.

Hearsay

Hearsay is an out-of-court statement that is offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Hearsay is inadmissible unless it falls within an exception or is being used for a non-hearsay purpose. Proposition 8 will not apply to admit otherwise inadmissible hearsay as hearsay is an exception to Proposition 8.

Here, Ella's testimony that D told W, "I just killed the gal who stole my biggest account" is offered to show that D was in fact the person who killed V. Thus, it is an out-of-court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted and is only admissible if it falls within an exception.

Party-Opponent Admission

A statement by a party-opponent regarding a relevant fact of the case is admissible over a hearsay objection as it is a California exception from the hearsay prohibition.

Here, the statement that Ella testified about was a statement by D, who is the defendant in the criminal action. This statement is highly relevant to the issues involved in the case because it indicates whether or not D actually committed a murder of V, for which he is being charged.

Thus, this exception would allow the statement to be admitted.

Statement Against Interest

A statement is admissible under an exception if it qualifies as a statement against interest. A statement against interest is a statement of a now unavailable witness that was against the person's proprietary, pecuniary, penal, or social interest when made and that the declarant knew was against his interest when made.

Here, D made the statement to W that "I just killed the gal who stole my biggest account." This statement would be against D's penal interest, because it could subject him to prosecution for murder. Moreover, it could subject him to social ridicule, ostracism and humiliation because he would be labeled as a murderer. D will argue that the statement was not against his interest because it was made to his spouse in reliance on the confidentiality of their marital relationship and thus he did not think that it could be used against him. Moreover, he did not believe at the time it was made that it would subject him to social disgrace as he expected his spouse to maintain the confidentiality of the statement. As D likely did not know that the statement could be used against his interest when it was made, this exception likely would not apply.

A declarant is unavailable if he can claim a privilege against testifying. As D can claim the privilege against self-incrimination under the Fifth Amendment, he would be considered unavailable for the purposes of this exception.

Thus, this exception would not apply because D likely did not know it was against his interest when made.

Spontaneous Statement

A spontaneous statement is a statement made shortly after witnessing a startling event and while the declarant was still under the stress of excitement.

Here, D made his statement to W and said "I just killed the gal..." indicating that he may still have been under the stress of excitement from the murder. Moreover, a murder is likely a startling event, especially when it involved hiding in the bushes and shooting someone at their home and then seeking to avoid detection.

Thus, D's statement might be a spontaneous statement if he was still experiencing the stress of excitement.

Contemporaneous Statement

A contemporaneous statement is a statement made at or near the time of an event that explains or describes the defendant's actions.

Here, D told W, "I just killed the gal who stole my biggest account." Because D specified that he "just" killed a gal, the statement may have been made near the time of the event. Moreover, the statement describes D's own conduct in killing the gal and explains his reasons for that conduct--she "stole my biggest account."

Therefore, provided it was made sufficiently close in time, it may qualify as a contemporaneous statement.

Spousal Communications Privilege

See rule above. In addition, the spousal communications privilege is waived if the privilege is not made in reliance on the intimacy of the marriage. A statement is not made in this reliance, if it is made in the presence of a third person who does not fall within the privilege. If the spouses could not have reasonably foreseen that the communication would be overheard by a third party, then the privilege is not waived and D may prevent Ella from testifying on the basis of the privilege. However, if the spouses made the statement negligently when it could be overheard by a third party, then the privilege has been waived as no reasonable efforts were made to maintain its confidentiality.

Here, D and W had a conversation in their kitchen. No one else was present in the home and D and W were having an intimate conversation as spouses, thus suggesting that the conversation was made in reliance on the intimacy of the marriage. However, D and W had this conversation while the window to their kitchen was open. This window was only 20 feet from a neighbor's window which was also open and D was talking in a sufficiently loud voice such that Ella could overhear the conversation. But, because D and W engaged in a private communication between themselves and they did not know that Ella overheard the communication, they likely were not so negligent as to waive the confidentiality of the communications. D and W could rely on the privacy of their home, even with an open window.

Thus, the spousal communication privilege will prevent this testimony.

(c) Fred

Logical Relevance

Fred's testimony that the day after Vicky was killed he was having lunch and heard that two gangsters had "taken care of the assignment concerning Vicky" is relevant to establish that Dean was not the person who killed Vicky. As whether or not D killed Vicky is the primary issue in the murder trial, this is both highly relevant and in dispute. This objection will be overruled.

Personal Knowledge

Here, Fred was having lunch at a coffee shop when he saw Hit and Gus conversing and overheard the conversation. Thus, Fred had personal knowledge regarding the statements that were made.

This objection will be overruled.

Hearsay

See rule above.

Here, F is offering testimony regarding the statements of both H and G, and both of these statements must fall within a hearsay exception in order to be admitted. These statements are offered to show that F and G committed the murder of Vicky.

G's Statement

Effect on Hearer

D will argue that G's statement asking whether H had "taken care of the assignment concerning Vicky" is not offered to show the truth of that statement, as it was a question, but instead to show its effect on H, who answered the question.

A statement offered to show the effect on the hearer is not hearsay and is admissible over a hearsay objection.

Here, as this question is offered to show the effect on H in answering, it will be admissible.

H's Statement

Although H merely made a gesture by drawing an index finger across his throat, such an action can qualify as hearsay if it is intended to communicate.

Here, H's conduct was done in order to answer G's question regarding whether or not H had "taken care of the assignment concerning Vicky." As this was intended to communicate that H had in fact gotten rid of Vicky, it will qualify as hearsay.

Statement Against Interest

Here, this statement is against H's penal interest as he would be subject to prosecution for murder if he killed Vicky. As H made this statement while at a coffee shop where other people like F were around, H would know that he could be subject to punishment for making it at the time it was made. It is unclear whether H is unavailable and the admissibility will depend on this.

Thus, this is likely admissible testimony.

Answer B

People v. Dean

1. Did the court properly allow the prosecution to call Whitney?

Spousal Testimonial Privilege

The California Evidence Code (CEC) contains a spousal privilege. The spousal privilege allows a defendant's spouse to refuse to take the witness stand and testify against his or her spouse. Although Dean's trial is a criminal trial, the CEC makes no distinction between criminal and civil trials--the spouse may refuse to testify against his or her spouse in either civil or criminal trials.

The spouse and defendant must be married during the time of trial. Here, although Whitney had moved out of the house prior to Dean's trial and said the "marriage was over," there is nothing to indicate that Whitney and Dean's marriage was legally dissolved. Thus, Whitney was married to Dean at the time of trial, and therefore can invoke the spousal testimonial privilege.

The spouse--not the defendant--is the holder of the privilege. Thus, even if Dean did not want Whitney to testify against him, Whitney could if she so chose, and so long as the matter she testified to was not otherwise privileged.

Under the CEC, the witness spouse may refuse to take the witness stand completely. Here, although Whitney initially took the stand, intending to testify against Dean, she could have refused to take the stand altogether. The issue is whether Whitney could later invoke the privilege after voluntarily waiving the spousal testimonial privilege.

The CEC does not dictate that a spouse has waived the spousal testimonial privilege once he or she takes the witness stand. Here, Whitney has testified to nothing yet. Thus, although she has taken the witness stand, she is still not otherwise prohibited from invoking the spousal testimonial privilege. Thus, her testimony should not have been compelled.

However, the court did not err in allowing the prosecution to call Whitney to the witness stand because Whitney initially wanted to testify against Dean. Thus, error, if any, was on the court's compelling Whitney to testify, not on the court allowing the prosecution to call Whitney to the witness stand.

2. Did the court properly admit the testimony of Whitney, Ella, and Fred?

Whitney

Logical Relevance

To be admissible, evidence must be relevant. Under the CEC, evidence is relevant if it has any tendency to make the existence of some fact of consequence to the action more or less probable than the absence of such evidence. The CEC further requires that to be relevant, the fact must be in dispute.

Here, Whitney's testimony that she saw mud on Dean's shoes is relevant because it makes a disputed fact--whether Dean was hiding in the bushes outside Vicky's home that rainy night--more probable than the absence of the evidence.

Legal Relevance

Even if logically relevant, the court may exclude evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice, confusing the issues, or misleading the jury. Here, the probative value of Whitney's testimony is relatively high. Because Whitney is Dean's wife, her testimony tending to inculpate Dean is especially probative. That Dean had mud on his shoes the night of the murder tends to show that Dean might have been hiding in the bushes that night. There is little risk of unfair prejudice because there is nothing to indicate that Whitney's testimony that she saw mud on Dean's shoes will cause the jury to have prejudice against Dean.

Spousal Testimonial Privilege

As discussed above, Whitney should have been able to invoke the spousal testimonial privilege because she is married to Dean at the time of trial and thus may refuse to testify against him. Although she took the stand--which California allows a spouse to refuse to do--Whitney still had the privilege to not testify against Dean.

Confidential Marital Communications Privilege

Whitney may attempt to alternatively invoke the confidential marital communications privilege. Any confidential communication between spouses is privileged and inadmissible. Here, however, Whitney testified as to an observation, not a communication. Whitney merely saw mud on Dean's shoes. Whitney did not testify as to any communication Dean made to her. Thus, the confidential marital communications privilege does not apply.

In conclusion, Whitney's testimony--although relevant--should have been excluded because of the spousal testimonial privilege.

Ella

Logical and Legal Relevance

Ella's testimony that Dean told Whitney "I just killed the gal who stole my biggest account" is extremely relevant. If Dean told Whitney this, it tends to make it more probable that Dean in fact did kill Vicky. The probative value is high, and there is little risk of unfair prejudice as a result of Dean's statement to Whitney.

Hearsay

Ella's testimony may be objected to on the grounds that it is hearsay. Hearsay is an out of court statement being offered to prove the truth of the matter contained therein. Here, Dean's statement is out of court because it was made in his home to his wife. If offered to prove that Dean did kill Vicky, it would be being offered for its truth. Thus, the statement is hearsay by definition.

Nonhearsay: Declarant's state of mind

Dean's statement may be offered for the nonhearsay purpose of showing his state of mind. It could be offered to show Dean's intent to kill, rather than the fact that he did kill Vicky. However, if offered only for this purpose, it would be highly prejudicial because it would be very difficult for a jury to not consider the statement as evidence that Dean actually killed Vicky. Thus, it should not likely be admissible solely for this purpose.

Admission of a party/opponent

Alternatively, Dean's statement to Whitney could be offered for its truth if it comes under a hearsay exception. The CEC provides an exception to the hearsay rule for admissions made by parties and offered by an opponent. Here, Dean's statement to Whitney is a statement made by Dean--a party--and offered by the prosecution--an opponent. Thus, although hearsay, Dean's statement may be admissible as an admission--an exception to the CEC's rule against hearsay.

Confidential Marital Communications

However, Dean may seek to exclude his statement to Whitney on the grounds that the statement was a confidential communication between spouses and thus is privileged. Both spouses are holders of the privilege. Here there is a twist because a third person is attempting to testify as to a confidential communication between spouses. Both Dean and Whitney did not know that Ella overheard their conversation. Thus, Dean and Whitney believed Dean's statement to be in confidence. Ella was standing 20 feet away and in the house next door when the statement was made. If Dean and Whitney's belief that the communication was confidential was reasonable, such communication was privileged. Here, it appears that Dean and Whitney's belief that their communication was in confidence was reasonable--notwithstanding the fact that Ella overheard the communication 20 feet away.

The purpose of the confidential marital communications privilege is to foster the confidence of the marital relationship, and to encourage open and honest communication. Here, if Ella is permitted to testify as to Dean's statement if Dean and Whitney reasonably believed their communication was made in confidence, such an allowance would seem to go against the grain of the purpose of the confidential marital communications privilege. Spouses should not have to take every measure to ensure their communications are confidential so as to invoke the benefit of the confidential marital communications privilege. A reasonable belief that the communication is made in confidence should be sufficient. Here, the court should not allow Ella's testimony for this reason.

Logical and Legal Relevance

Fred's testimony that Hit implicitly admitted to killing Vicky is relevant because it makes it more probable that Dean did not kill Vicky. Assuming that the Vicky that Gus was talking about was the same Vicky who died the day before, such evidence would be extremely probative to show that Dean was not the killer, but Hit was.

Hearsay

Hearsay is an out-of-court statement. To be a statement, there must be some assertive words or conduct. Although Gus's question to hit was out of court, it was not a statement because it was not assertive. A question is not an assertion. Thus, Gus's question to Hit whether Hit had taken care of the assignment concerning Vicky was not hearsay.

The issue becomes whether Hit's drawing his index finger across his throat was assertive conduct. Taken in light of the surrounding circumstances, Hit's conduct seems to indicate that Hit acknowledged to Gus that he in fact killed Vicky. To be hearsay, the declarant need not utter actual words. Here, the judge would use his or her discretion in deciding whether Hit's conduct was assertive. The court should hold that the conduct was assertive when taken in context with Gus's immediately preceding question.

Because Hit's assertive conduct was made out of court, and if offered to prove the truth--that Hit did kill Vicky--it is hearsay by definition. Hearsay is inadmissible absent any exception.

Statement against Interest

Dean may argue that Hit's statement was a statement against interest. However, for a statement against interest to be admissible, it must be shown that the declarant is "unavailable" to testify. No such showing has been made, and therefore Hit's statement may not be admitted as a statement against interest.

Admission

Hit's statement cannot come in as an admission because Hit is not a party to the action.

Present Sense Impression/Contemporaneous Statement

Hit's statement may not be admitted under the present sense impression/contemporaneous statement exception because Hit's statement was not made either while killing Vicky or immediately thereafter. Also, Hit was not describing his conduct, he merely made a motion tending to indicate that he killed Vicky. Thus, this exception does not apply.

Confrontation Clause

The Sixth Amendment right to confrontation applies to the states, including California, and provides that criminal defendants shall have the right to be confronted with the witnesses against them. Here, because Dean is offering the out-of-court statement made by Hit, the Sixth Amendment right of confrontation does not apply.

Conclusion

Because Hit's conduct was assertive, given the surrounding circumstances, and because it is only relevant to prove the truth of his statement--that he killed Vicky, and thus inferentially, Dean did not kill Vicky--Hit's statement was hearsay. Because no exception to the rule against hearsay applies, Hit's statement should not have been admitted.

Q4 Contracts

Peter responded to an advertisement placed by Della, a dentist, seeking a dental hygienist. After an interview, Della offered Peter the job and said she would either: (1) pay him $50,000 per year; or (2) pay him $40,000 per year and agree to convey to him a parcel of land, worth about $50,000, if he would agree to work for her for three consecutive years. Peter accepted the offer and said, “I’d like to go with the second option, but I would like a commitment for an additional three years after the first three.” Della said, “Good, I’d like you to start next week.”

After Peter started work, Della handed him a letter she had signed which stated only that he had agreed to work as a dental hygienist at a salary of $40,000 per year.

After Peter had worked for two years and nine months, Della decided that she would sell the parcel of land and not convey it to him. Even though she had always been satisfied with his work, she fired him.

What rights does Peter have and what remedies might he obtain as to employment and the parcel of land? Discuss.

Answer A

What rights does Peter have?

The first issue is what law should apply. The UCC applies if the contract is for sale of goods. The common law applies if in all other circumstances, including a contract for services or land. In this case, there is an employment contract that contemplates the payment of a salary and a land conveyance in exchange for services. Thus, the common law applies to this contract.

The second issue is whether there is a valid contract. A valid contract requires offer, acceptance, and consideration. An offer exists if the offeror offers the offeree a deal and signals that acceptance will conclude the deal. An acceptance occurs if the offeree agrees to the terms of the offeror and gives the offeree notice of his assent. Consideration exists if there is a bargained-for exchange and legal detriment (which involves perform [SIC] in a way that one is not legally required to perform). Acceptance only exists if the offeree consents to the exact terms of the offeror, also known as the mirror image rule. If the offeree attempts to change any terms of the offer, then there is an effective rejection and counteroffer. Della advertised for a dental hygienist. Advertisements are not usually considered offers and Della's advertisement did not indicate that anyone who responded would be hired. The need to conduct an interview suggests that Della's advertisement was an invitation to make an offer, not an actually offer. Della interviewed Peter and offered him a job. She gave him a choice of being paid $50,000 per year, or being paid $40,000 per year and the conveyance of a $50,000 parcel of land at the completion of three years of work. This might have been an offer because it signaled to Peter that the deal would be complete if he chose either option. However, it would more likely be considered preliminary negotiations since Peter could still choose which option he preferred. Peter said, "I'd like to go with the second option..." If there was an offer, and he had left his statement at this, then this would constitute acceptance because it gave Della notice that he was accepting her offer. However, Peter attempted to modify the terms of the deal by adding a commitment for an additional three years after the first three years. Thus, Peter's attempted acceptance was ineffective because it altered the terms of Della's offer and does not meet the mirror image rule. Rather, Peter effectively made a counteroffer to Della (or an offer if Della's original options were considered preliminary negotiations). Della accepted Peter's counteroffer when she said, "Good, I'd like you to start next week." The exchange of six years of dental hygienist services for a $50,000 parcel of land and a $40,000 per year salary constitutes consideration. Because there was an offer, an acceptance, and consideration, there is a valid contract.

The third issue is whether the statute of frauds makes the service or land contract unenforceable. The statute of frauds requires some contracts to be in a writing signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought. Contracts for land and contracts that cannot be completed within a year are both included within the statute of frauds. Contracts for land must adequately identify the parties and the parcel of land to be conveyed. The contract between Della and Peter was for six years of employment. Peter could not complete his performance of six years of services within one year, thus this contract falls within the statute of frauds. The contract between Della and Peter also contemplated the conveyance of an interest in land. Della did sign a contract with Peter, but the contract only specified that Peter agreed to work as a dental hygienist for a salary of $40,000 per year. The conveyance of land was not considered within the signed contract, nor was the length of the term of employment. Thus, the contract Della signed cannot be used to overcome the statute of frauds. The employment contract for a term of years and the land conveyance are both unenforceable under the statute of frauds.

The fourth issue is whether Peter can overcome the Statute of Frauds defense via the doctrine of part performance or equitable estoppel. Part performance in a land conveyance requires that the party who seeks to enforce the contract must have engaged in partial performance, which is usually evidenced by possession or payment of the purchase price. Equitable estoppel requires that the party who seeks to enforce the contract show that there was a promise and that the party reasonably relied upon that promise to their detriment. It will probably be difficult for Peter to show partial performance since he has not taken possession of the land or paid the full purchase price. He might be able to argue that he has "paid" a substantial portion of the purchase price since he worked for two years and nine months, which is the equivalent of 75% of the service he was to perform before receiving the land. However, equitable estoppel is probably a better argument for him to make. The fact that Della offered Peter two options suggests that $40,000 was less than the market rate for dental hygienists. Peter chose the option that gave him less yearly salary in reliance on Della's promise that he would be employed for six years and would receive a $50,000 parcel of land. He received less salary than he otherwise would have, so his reliance was detrimental. Peter may be able to overcome Della's Statute of Frauds defense under the doctrine of equitable estoppel.

The fifth issue is whether there was a breach of contract. A breach occurs when one party fails to perform as obligated under the express and implied conditions in the contract. Assuming that the court finds a valid and enforceable contract, then Della committed a breach when she fired Peter before the six years were complete. She also committed an anticipatory repudiation when she decided to sell the land instead of convey the land to him. She also potentially breached her implied duty of good faith by firing Peter when she was satisfied with his work.

What remedies might Peter obtain?

The first issue is whether Peter can receive expectation damages. The general measure of damages in a contracts case attempts to put the plaintiff into the position he would have been in if the contract had been fully performed. A plaintiff does have a duty to mitigate, which requires that he make a reasonable effort to find similar employment. He does not have to settle for lesser employment or move to a distant location to find employment. Assuming that the court finds there was an employment contract for six years, the court would award three years and three months worth of the $40,000 per year salary if Peter cannot find similar employment. If Peter can find similar employment, the reward will be reduced based on whatever his new salary is. Assuming that the court finds there was a contract to convey land, Peter could sue for the value of the land, which was $50,000. If the court finds that there was an employment contract, but no contract to convey land, then Peter might be able to receive more than the $40,000 per year salary award if he can show that he took a reduced salary in reliance on the promise that he would receive a land conveyance.

The second issue is whether Peter can receive restitutionary damages. Restitutionary damages are only awarded when a benefit has been bestowed and it would unjustly enrich the other party if they are not required to pay for that benefit. A plaintiff cannot receive restitutionary remedies if they receive expectation damages. Restitutionary damages would probably not be Peter's best option. However, Peter might be able to receive the difference between his salary and the market rate salary for a dental hygienist if he can show that he took the lower salary in reliance on the promise to receive land.

The third issue is whether Peter can receive specific performance. Specific performance is awarded when there is a definite and certain contract, an inadequate legal remedy, enforcement of specific performance is feasible for the court, and there is mutuality. The party attempting to avoid specific performance can do so by raising various defenses, such as laches or unclean hands. Assuming Peter overcomes the statute of fraud objections, Peter will not be able to seek specific performance for the employment contract. Attempting to enforce an employment contract, which is a contract for personal services, is not feasible for the court. Personal service and employment contracts require individuals to work together in a cooperative environment; it is not feasible for the court to monitor the relationship between the parties. Peter probably will not be able to seek specific performance for the land contract. There was a definite and certain contract to convey a parcel of land worth $50,000, though there may be some issues with this element if it is not clear which parcel of land Della intended to convey. Land is considered unique, so a legal remedy of $50,000 would be inadequate. It would be feasible for the court to enforce the specific performance. Under the common law doctrine of mutuality, both parties must have been able to request specific performance. In this case, Della could not have sought specific performance if Peter breached. However, under the modern theory, the requirement for mutuality is met if one party can sufficiently assure performance. The court would have to decide if the two years and nine months was enough to constitute full performance, but this is only 75% of the total performance required. Peter may be willing to work the remaining three months, but the court cannot require him to do it. Thus, there is no mutuality and Peter cannot successfully obtain specific performance.

Answer B

What Rights Does Peter Have as to Employment and the Parcel of Land

I. The Contract, if Valid, Is Governed By Common Law

The issue is what law governs the contract, if valid, between Peter (P) and Della (D). The UCC governs contracts involving the sale of goods. Contracts which are for services or are land contracts are governed by the common law. Here, P and D are contracting for employment and possibly land. This is a contract for services and land and therefore the contract is governed by common law principles.

II. There is Likely a Valid Contract Between Peter and Della

The issue is whether Peter and Della actually entered into a valid contract. For a contract to be valid, it must contain offer, acceptance, and consideration. An offer is an outward manifestation by the offeror that creates the power of acceptance in the offeree. An advertisement can be a valid offer is it is made to a particular person, outlines the specific details of the offer, and presents the recipient of the advertisement with instructions as to how acceptance can be made. Acceptance is an outward manifestation by the offeree that he accepts the terms of the offeror. Acceptance must mirror the terms of the offer. If acceptance does not mirror the terms of the offer or, in itself, alters the terms of the offer, it is a counteroffer and effectively rejects the original offer. However, a mere inquiry is not a counteroffer. Consideration is a bargained-for legal detriment. (i.e., A works for B in exchange for a salary).

Here, P responded to an advertisement from D, a dentist, who was seeking a dental hygienist. The advertisement was not a valid offer because there are no facts that it was sent directly to P, there are no facts that it contained the details of any potential employment contract, and there are not facts that it told P how he could accept. However, when D interviewed P, she presented him with a valid offer to be her hygienist for three years in exchange for either (1) working for $50,000 per year; or (2) working for $40,000 per year and she would agree to convey to him a parcel of land, worth about $50,000. When P accepted, he said "I'd like to go with the second option, but I would like a commitment for an additional three years after the first three." This acceptance by P does not mirror the terms of the offer by D and therefore acts as both a rejection of the offer and a counteroffer. Della said, "Good, I'd like you to start next week."

Peter will argue that Della's comment of "Good, I'd like you to start next week," is her acceptance of his counteroffer. He will argue that the terms of the deal are that he works for Della for 6 years at $40,000 per year and is conveyed the parcel of land after the first three years. When P started to work and D handed him the letter stating only that he had agreed to work as a hygienist for $40,000 per year, P will argue that this letter is merely a documentation of the salary he is to receive and nothing more.

In conclusion, Peter's counteroffer is the controlling offer and D accepted it by saying, "Good, I'd like you to start next week." The consideration is that Peter work for 6 years at $40,000 and will receive the parcel of land at the completion of the first three years. The consideration is valid. There is likely a valid contract between P and D.

III. The Letter D Presented to P Is An Invalid Modification

The issue is whether the letter D presented to P is an invalid modification. Under the Common Law, a modification to a contract must be supported by consideration. The pre-existing duty rule prohibits the modification of any contractual duties which have been agreed to absent consideration because the party is attempting to modify something that he/she is currently obligated to do.

Here, D attempted to modify the existing when she presented P with a letter, which she signed, documenting P would work as a dental hygienist for $40,000 and no other elements of the deal between P and D were documented. There was no consideration paid by D to P to enforce this modification and it is invalid.

In conclusion, the modification is invalid because D is obligated to have P work for 6 years at $40,000 and convey a piece of land to him after 3 years of work. To reduce her obligations to only paying him $40,000 per year without consideration is in violation of the pre-existing duty rule.

IV. Della Can Assert the Defense of Statute of Frauds (SOF)

The issue is whether D can assert a SOF defense. The SOF requires that certain contracts be in writing. The categories are contracts regarding marriage, contracts which cannot be performed within one year, land sale contracts, executor agreements, guarantees or suretyships, and contracts for the sale of goods for over $500. A contract which cannot be performed within one year is determined at the time of the contract execution and is measured by whether there is any possibility performance can be completed within one year. The writing that will satisfy the SOF must contain the essential terms of the contract and be signed by the party to be charged.

Here, P's contract is for 6 years, or, at the least, 3 years, and is clearly not performable within one year. This contract is subject to the statute of frauds. The parties did not sign a written contract for P's services to D. Further, part of the deal is a land conveyance which is also subject to the SOF. Neither of those terms were ever written down and D can assert that the contract fails under the SOF. Peter will argue that the letter D gave to him after he started working is a writing confirming their contract because it says he gets paid $40,000 and it is signed by D. However, this is not the same contract to which they agreed.

In conclusion, it is likely that D can assert a valid SOF defense because the ` contract was not in a writing which comports with the requirements of the SOF.

V. P Can Assert The Defense of Estoppel and Likely Partial Performance to the SOF Requirements.

The issue is whether P can assert the defenses of estoppel or part performance to the SOF requirements. As stated above certain writings are subject to the SOF. There are four defenses to the enforcement of the SOF: (1) Partial or Full Performance, (2) Estoppel, (3) Judicial Acknowledgement of Contract, and (4) Merchant's Confirmation Memo. There has been no acknowledgement in a judicial proceeding and the merchant's confirmatory memo is only for UCC contracts with a merchant, so neither apply. However, Partial or Full Performance and Estoppel may apply.

Partial or Full Performance

A party may not comply with the requirements of the SOF if he partially or fully performs his contract and the other party accepts the benefits of the performance. Here, P worked for D for 2 years and 9 months. At the very least, D was under the impression that P was going to be working for her for 3 years, even though the final accepted offer was likely for 6. There are no facts which say she failed to pay him so she very likely was performing her obligations under the contract. She was accepting his benefit of being a hygienist in exchange for her payment. Therefore, under the doctrine of part performance, P has a meritorious defense to the requirments of the SOF.

Equitable Estoppel

A party may not comply with the requirements of the SOF if he can assert a defense of estoppel. Equitable estoppel occurs when a party says or does something that foreseeably creates action in another person, the other person relies on the party's previous statement or action, and it would be unjustly prejudicial to the relying party. Here, P has fully relied on Ds statement of acceptance to his counteroffer. He began working for her and has been working for her for almost 3 years. D has reason to know that he was working for her based on their discussions of the $40,000 and land conveyance. P may not have started working for D without the provisions agreed to in his counteroffer and therefore it would be unfairly prejudicial not to enforce his contract.

In conclusion, P has a likely defense of partial or full performance ot the SOF and may have a mertitorious defense of Estoppel.

VI. If A Valid Contract Exists, It is A Contract For Term and Not an At-Will Contract

The issue is whether the contract is a contract for term or an at-will contract. In a contract for term, an employee has a property right in the job and may not be terminated without cause. Conversely, an at-will contract allows the employer or employee to terminate employment for good cause, bad cause, or no cause.

Here, P will argue that this is a contract for terms because the terms of his counteroffer were that he worked for D for 6 years. Further, he will argue that even if her original job offer is controlling, that offer was for a 3 year term. Either way, it is not an at-will employment. Since it was not at will, she was not able to fire him because she had always been happy with his work. Della will argue that her letter modifying the contract has no language regarding term and therefore it is an at-will employment and she can fire him for any reason.

In conclusion, this is a contract for term and P may not be fired absent cause.

In conclusion, P and D have a valid contract for 6 years at $40,000 per year. Further, D is obligated by the contract to convey P the parcel of land upon completion of his 3rd year. Peter has a right to seek remedies for breach of contract.

What Remedies Can Peter Seek

VII. Peter May Seek Expectation Damages and Reliance Damages

The issue is whether Peter may seek expectation damages and reliance damages for his contract with Della. Legal remedies are available if the plaintiff can clearly estimate the damages incurred with specificity. Legal damages are in three categories, expectation, reliance, and restitution. Expectation damages place the plaintiff in the position he would have been in had the breaching party performed the contract in full. Reliance damages place the plaintiff in the place he would have been had the contract not existed. Restitution damages reimburse the plaintiff for any benefit conferred on the defendant. A plaintiff always has the duty to mitigate damages and, in the employment context, the duty to to find other employment. The plaintiff is not required to find any job, but rather a job comparable to the job that has been taken. If a plaintiff cannot find replacement employment, a good faith effort must take place to find employment.

Here, P will argue that he should get his expectation, or benefit of the bargain damages, from the contract including any incidental and consequential damages that are reasonably foreseeable from D's breach.. He can easily estimate them because he was due 3 years and 3 months salary and the parcel of land. He had a right to those damages because he was under a contract for which he was improperly fired. These damages will place him in the position he would have been in had he not been fired and the contract been performed. However, he has a duty to find alternative employment and there are no facts which say he has looked for or obtained any further employment. Also, there are no facts that say he has acted in bad faith which would negate the award of damages. If and when he does, his salary from that employment can be applied against his damages from D. There are no facts indicating any incidental and consequential damages.

Also, if P spent any money in reliance on his contract with D, he may recover those costs that are reasonable and foreseeable. Any money that he spent in reliance on the contract with D is obtainable.

In conclusion, he can obtain expectation and reliance damages from D less his duty to mitigate by finding other, comparable employment.

VIII. Peter May Seek Specific Performance of the Land Contract, But Not the Services Contract

The issue is whether Peter can seek specific performance of the land contract. Specific performance is available when the contract has definite and certain terms, there is an inadequate legal remedy, the court can correctly adjudicate, there is mutuality between the parties and there are no defenses. Inadequate legal remedy applies when you are dealing with land or unique items. Mutuality has been relaxed and no longer requires that the parties must each be able to get specific performance. Just that the party is ready and willing to perform. Specific performance will not be applied to a services contract because it is difficult to enforce and can abridge certain constitutional provisions against servitude.

Here, the land at issue is unique and is a definite term of the contract. Money damages will not suffice. Peter contracted and performed for the piece of land. The judge can properly adjudicate the matter. However, Peter likely may not seek specific performance of the services contract.

In conclusion, P may seek specific performance of the land contract but not the services contract.

Q5 Wills

In 2004, Mae, a widow, executed a valid will, intentionally leaving out her daughter, Dot, and giving 50 per cent of her estate to her son, Sam, and 50 per cent to Church.

In 2008, after a serious disagreement with Sam, Mae announced that she was revoking her will, and then tore it in half in the presence of both Sam and Dot.

In 2010, after repeated requests by Sam, Mae handwrote and signed a document declaring that she was thereby reviving her will. She attached all of the torn pages of the will to the document. At the time she signed the document, she was entirely dependent on Sam for food and shelter and companionship, and had not been allowed by Sam to see or speak to anyone for months. By this time, Church had gone out of existence.

In 2011, Mae died. Her sole survivors are Dot and Sam.

What rights, if any, do Dot and Sam have in Mae's estate? Discuss.

Answer according to California law

Answer A

Sam's Rights

In 2004, Mae executed a valid will that left 50% of her estate to her son, Sam, and 50% of her estate to Church.

Revocation of 2004 Will

A will can be revoked by physical act. This requires that the testator tear, cancel, obliterate, or destroy the will with the contemporaneous intent to revoke it. Here, in 2008, Mae had a disagreement with Sam and announced that she was revoking her will as she tore the will in half, in the presence of both Sam and Dot. Because she announced that she was revoking the will, that shows that she had an intent to revoke it. Additionally, she got into a fight with Sam prior to this, and Sam was to take 50% of her estate under that will. That further evidences that she intended to revoke the will. She tore the will in half, which is a sufficient physical act. Thus, her actions in 2008 are sufficient to count as a revocation by physical act. At this point in 2008, because Mae revoked her only will, she does not have a testamentary instrument.

Revival in 2010

Holograph

A holographic will is one that is signed by the testator and all of the material terms are in the testator's handwriting. Material terms are the beneficiaries and the gifts. In 2010, Mae handwrote and signed a document that stated she was reviving her will. Although it is signed by Mae and in her handwriting, the material terms are not in her handwriting because they are referenced. Thus, this will only be a valid holograph if the 2004 will can be incorporated into the 2010 handwritten note because the 2004 will contains the material terms.

Incorporation of the 2004 Will

A document will be incorporated as part of the will if it was physically present at the time the will was executed and there was a simultaneous intent that the document be a part of the will. Here, it seems that the torn pieces of the 2004 will were physically present when Mae wrote the holograph because there are no facts suggesting she had to go anywhere to get it; rather the facts seem to suggest that she wrote the holograph and attached the torn pages in one sitting. Thus, it can be presumed that the prior will was physically present when she wrote the holograph.

Furthermore, Mae had intent to incorporate the prior will because she physically attached the torn pages of the will to the holograph document. This is sufficient to prove her intent to incorporate.

Because the prior will was physically present and was intended to be a part of the holograph, it will be revived in accordance with Mae's intent.

Incorporation by Reference

A writing can be incorporated by reference into a will if (1) there is a writing, (2) it existed at the time of the will's execution, (3) it is specifically referenced in the will, and (4) the testator had the intent to incorporate the writing.

Here, the 2004 will was in writing because it was valid at the time it was executed, so it must have been in writing to be valid. It existed at the time of the will's execution because Mae still had the torn pages. It is irrelevant that at that time it was not a valid testamentary document, so long as it physically existed. It was specifically referenced within the 2010 will because she stated that she wanted to revive her will, and she only had one prior will that had been revoked. Furthermore, she attached the torn pages to the 2010 will, so it is evident that she is talking about the 2004 will. Because the first three elements are satisfied, there is a presumption that Mae had the intent to incorporate the 2004 will into the 2010 holograph.

Independently Significant Fact

A fact is independently significant if it would have existed regardless of the testamentary document being executed. Here, the 2004 will would have existed regardless of the 2010 holograph because it was written prior to the 2010 holograph. Even if Mae had never written the 2010 will, the 2004 will would have existed, regardless of the fact that she revoked it. The torn pieces still remained. Thus, the 2004 will is independently significant.

Validity of 2010 Will: Undue Influence

Dot, who takes nothing under the revived will, will argue that the 2010 will was the product of undue influence, and is therefore invalid, leaving Mae without a testamentary instrument. There are three types of undue influence recognized in California: the prima facie case, case law undue influence, or statutory undue influence.

Prima Facie Case

Under the prima facie case, undue influence can be shown if the testator was susceptible to undue influence, if there was an opportunity to influence her, if there was action taken to cause undue influence, and there was an unnatural disposition of the estate because of the undue influence.

Here, Dot will argue that Mae was susceptible to undue influence by Sam because she was entirely dependent on Sam for food, shelter, and companionship. Thus, she was susceptible to doing what Sam wanted her to do. Dot will argue that Sam had the opportunity to influence Mae because she was so dependent on him, Mae felt that if she did not do what he wanted, she would have been left without food, shelter, or companionship. There was active participation by Sam because he had repeatedly requested that Mae revive the 2004 [will] and would not allow Mae to see or speak to anyone for months. Finally, Dot will argue that the gift in the 2004 will was unnatural because it did not provide for her, Dot, Mae's own daughter. Sam will argue, on the other hand, that the gift revived by the 2010 will was not unnatural because it was a will that was validly executed in 2004. There was nothing unnatural about it in 2004, and there is nothing unnatural about it now. Furthermore, Mae intentionally left Dot out of the will in 2004, so it was not unnatural to be left out now. Finally, Sam will argue that Mae was not susceptible to any undue influence by him; rather he was just taking care of his aging mother.

Ultimately, the court will probably side with Sam, that there was not an unnatural disposition of Mae's property in the 2010 instrument because it was merely the revival of a valid gift that she had already devised, despite the fact that she later revoked it. Thus, the will will not be found invalid because of prima facie undue influence.

Case Law Undue Influence

Under case law undue influence, a gift or a will is invalid if there was a confidential relationship between the testator and the person accused of having undue influence, if there was active participation by the person causing the undue influence, and if there was an unnatural gift because of the undue influence. Here, there is a confidential relationship between Sam and Mae because Sam is Mae's son and he is solely responsible for taking care of her. Mae is entirely dependent on Sam, so there is a confidential relationship.

See above for arguments regarding active participation by Sam and the fact that the gift was not an unnatural disposition of property.

Because the revival of the 2004 will by the 2010 will was not an unnatural disposition of property, discussed above, there will be no undue influence.

Statutory Undue Influence

Under the California Probate Code, undue influence is presumed if the drafter of the will is also the beneficiary of the will. Here, Mae handwrote the 2010 holograph and attached the torn pages to that will herself. Thus, no one else drafted the will. The fact that she did so at the repeated requests of Sam does not change the fact that he did not draft the will leaving a gift to himself. Even if he did, there is an exception to this general rule that if the drafter is also a relative of the testator, there is not going to be a presumption of undue influence. Thus, there is no statutory undue influence.

Disposition re: Sam

If the court finds that there is no undue influence, the court will dispose of Mae's estate in accordance with the 2010 will, which incorporates the 2004 will. Under that document, Sam is entitled to 50% of Mae's estate, and Church is entitled to the other 50%.

Church: Lapse of Gift

Church was no longer in existence in 2010, when Mae executed her will. Thus, her gift of 50% of the estate will lapse because Church does not exist and is not there to take its gift.

Anti-Lapse?

California has an anti-lapse statute, which allows for the issue of a kindred beneficiary to take, despite the fact that he or she may have predeceased the testator. Here, however, Church is not kindred, or blood-related, to Mae, nor does it leave issue because it is an entity. Thus, anti-lapse will not apply to Church's gift of 50%.

Remaining 50%: Intestacy

Because the gift of 50% of Mae's estate to Church will lapse, the will does not provide for the distribution of that property. Thus, the remaining 50% of Mae's estate will pass through intestacy.

Mae was a widow when she died, so she did not leave a surviving spouse. She was survived solely by Dot and Sam, her children. Under the rules of intestacy, if a decedent dies without a will or without full disposition of property by a will, the property will go to the surviving issue, per capita. Under California Probate Code section 240, you go to the first generation with living issue and divide the estate equally among bloodlines with someone living. Here, Sam and Dot are both living, and they are in the first generation. Thus, they will each take 50% of the remaining estate - in other words, they will get 25% of Mae's estate each.

Dot's Rights

Dot was intentionally left out of the 2004 will, which later was revoked and then incorporated into the 2010 will. Thus, under Mae's will, Dot stands to take nothing (with the exception of her 25% intestate share due to the lapse of Church's gift).

Pretermitted Child

Dot will argue that she is a pretermitted child. A pretermitted child is one that was not born or known about at the time the testamentary instrument was executed. Pretermitted children are entitled to their intestate share of the entire estate. Thus, if Dot is pretermitted, she will be entitled to 50% of Mae's estate because Mae's estate would be split 50/50 between her two children in intestacy.

Here, Dot is not a pretermitted child because she was alive in 2004 when Mae executed the will. Furthermore, Mae intentionally left her out of the 2004 will and she revived that will, with the intent that it go back into effect. Therefore, Dot will not be construed as a pretermitted child.

Distribution of Mae's Estate

If Dot is able to persuade the court that there was undue influence by Sam, his gift will be invalidated because of the undue influence. If Sam's gift is invalid and Church's gift lapse, that would mean Mae's entire estate would be distributed through intestacy. In this case, Dot and Sam, as the sole surviving children, would be entitled to 50% each.

However, as discussed above, the court is unlikely to find that undue influence will invalidate Sam's gift because it was not unnatural. Therefore, Sam will still be entitled to his 50% under the will. Because Church's gift lapsed, however, the remaining 50% will be distributed under intestacy, with 25% going to each Sam and Dot. Thus, the most likely distribution of Mae's estate results with Sam taking 75% of the estate, and Dot taking 25%.

Answer B

2004 - Valid Will

The facts here indicate that Mae executed a valid will in 2004 in which she intentionally omitted D, and split her estate 50/50 between S and the Church.

2008 - Revocation

A will can be revoked by physical act or subsequent testamentary documents. When revoking by physical act, testator, or someone under testator's direction must burn, tear, destroy, or cancel the will. The testator must have the intent to revoke at the same time. Here, in 2008, after a disagreement with S, M announced that she was revoking her will, thereby indicating an intent to revoke, and then she tore it in half, fulfilling the necessary physical act to revoke. Because she tore the entire will in half, there is an indication that she intended to revoke the entire will, not just a part of it.

As such, Mae effectively revoked her 2008 will.

2010 - Revival

A will can only be revived if it was revoked by a subsequent testamentary instrument, which was then later revoked by physical act or another testamentary instrument. Revival re-effectuates an earlier will. Here, Mae's 2004 will was revoked by physical act, not by testamentary instrument, so it cannot be revived by a document. Had this will been revoked by a later instrument, S could argue that the first will was revived because his mother executed a holographic codicil that explicitly stated that she intended the earlier will be back in effect, and it would have been effective as of the date of the codicil.

However, a will revoked by physical act cannot be revived.

2010 - Holographic Will

S could argue that in 2010, his mother executed a holographic will. A valid holographic will requires that all material terms of the will be in the testator's handwriting, and it be signed by her. Here, Mae wrote that she was reviving her will and she signed the document. He could argue that even though this was not a valid revival, as discussed above, it was a new will because testamentary intent can be inferred from her statement that she wished to revive the earlier will, and she had signed and handwritten this new will. Therefore, Sam may be able to argue that this was a new, valid holographic will.

To establish the terms of the will, he could look to integration, and incorporation.

Integration

A writing that is present at the time of the execution of a will, and is intended to be a part of that will, is deemed to have been integrated into the will and is probated. An intent to make it a part of the will can be established by it being attached to the will. Here, S could argue that even though the previous will had been revoked, the pieces of it were attached to the holographic will that his mother executed, and therefore, it was integrated into the new will and should be probated. There is no requirement that the attached documents be valid on their own. Therefore, Sam may be successful in arguing that his mother's former will was integrated into the holographic will.

Incorporation by reference

A writing, whether valid or not, can also be incorporated by reference if it is in existence at the time of the execution of the will, it is identified in the will, and there is an intent to incorporate it. Sam could again argue that if his mother's will was not integrated, it was incorporated by reference because she states in the new will that she is reviving her former will, which indicates that she intended to incorporate it, and it is clearly referenced in the new will. He can also argue that even though it was in two pieces, it was still in existence at the time of the execution of this will. Thus, it was incorporated by reference.

Undue Influence

Courts are unwilling to probate wills or terms of a will that are procured by undue influence. Undue influence is when the testator's freewill is overcome. There are two types of undue influence that the court may find were at play when Mae wrote the document attempting to revive her former will: prima facie undue influence and undue influence based on case law.

Prima facie

To establish a prima facie case of undue influence, a party contesting the will, which in this case could be D because she receives nothing under her mother's initial will, would have to show her mother's susceptibility to be influenced, her brother's opportunity to influence Mae, S's active participation in influence, and an unnatural result.

Susceptibility

Mae must have been in a vulnerable position in which her freewill could have been overcome. In this case, she was completely dependent on S for her basic necessities in life, such as food, shelter and companionship. Therefore, she was very likely susceptible to having her freewill overcome by Sam.

Opportunity

S must also have had the opportunity to overcome Mae's freewill. In this case, Sam did not allow Mae to see or speak to anyone for months, and his mother completely relied upon him. Therefore, because he was her only source of companionship, he had the opportunity to influence her.

Active participation

S must have actively influenced his mother. Here, he made repeated requests to her to revive her former will, and it was only after these repeated requests that she did so. Therefore, he actively participated.

An unnatural disposition

Proving an unnatural disposition may be difficult for D because the original will devised half of Mae's property to S and that's also what the new will would do. Furthermore, if Mae died intestate, he would still receive half of her property because she only left behind two issues. However, because it is clear that Mae intended to tear up her old will, and that this second document was only the result of S's pressure on her, it may be possible for find undue influence.

Case law

Under the case law method of proving undue influence, there has to be a special relationship between the influencer and the testator, active participation and an unnatural result. Here, the special relationship can be established through the familial bond, as S was Mae's son, and she was completely dependent on him to take care of her. See above for the other two elements.

As a result, if the court were to find that there was undue influence, it would likely refuse to probate the second will because the entire thing was obtained by such an influence. On the other hand, because the disposition wasn't entirely unnatural, it may not find undue influence, in which case it would be a valid will that could be probated.

Gift to the Church

In order to obtain a gift under the will, one must be in existence at the time of testator's death. The church here was no longer in existence when Mae died. Under California's lapse provisions, the gift to the church would lapse and fall into the either the residuary clause of the testator's will, and if there wasn't one, then it would pass under intestacy. The gift cannot be saved under the antilapse provisions because only kindred who leave behind issue can benefit from that provision.

As such, if there was a valid will, the gift to the church would lapse, and as there is no residuary clause, it would pass under intestacy.

Dot's Rights

Omitted Child

Dot could claim that she was an omitted child because she was not provided for in any of Mae's wills. However, to be an omitted child, all testamentary documents must have been executed prior to the birth of the child. Here, the facts clearly indicate that D was alive when Mae executed her will in 2004, and then also again in 2010 if that is deemed to be a valid will, and thus she was not an omitted child. Furthermore, Mae intentionally left D out.

Intestacy Share

D's intestacy share will depend on whether the holographic will by Mae is considered valid or invalid.

If the will is valid, 50% of her estate would pass under the will to S. The other 50% that was to go to the church would have lapsed, as would pass under intestate distribution as there is no document governing the disposition of that property.

Under the default rules for intestate distribution, when there is no surviving spouse, which there isn't here because Mae was a widow, distribution to issue is on a "per capita" basis. Each of Mae's children would get an equal share of the intestate property. As Mae has two children, and 50% of her estate is passing by intestacy, D would get 25% of the total estate.

If on the other hand, the will is invalid, then all of Mae's estate would pass by intestacy. Just as above, the property would be distributed equally between her two children, and D would therefore get 50% of the estate.

Sam's Rights

Sam's rights to distribution will depend on whether the will is deemed invalid because of his undue influence or because it was not a proper holographic will.

If the will is valid, S is entitled to receive 50% of Mae's estate under the will. The other 50% that would not pass to the church because it is no longer in existence would pass through intestacy because of a lack of a residuary clause. Under intestacy, as discussed above for D, Sam would receive 50% of the property that passes in such a manner, which would result in a 25% share of the total estate. Overall, if the will is deemed valid, Sam would receive 75% of Mae's estate.

If the will is not valid, then all of Mae's property would pass under intestacy, and S would receive half just the same as D above. Therefore, he would get 50% of Mae's estate.

Overall

Overall, the rights of D and S depend on whether the court finds that Mae had a valid will at the time of her death. If there was a valid will, S would receive 75% of his mother's estate, and D would receive 25%. If there was no valid will, then each S and D would receive a 50% share.

Q6 Criminal Law and Procedure

Dan worked at a church. One day a woman came to the church, told Dan she wanted to donate some property to the church, and handed him an old book and a handgun.

Dan had originally intended to deliver both the book and the gun to the church's administrators, but he changed his mind and delivered only the book. He put the gun on the front seat of his car.

The next day, as he was driving, Dan was stopped by a police officer at a sobriety checkpoint at which officers stopped all cars and asked their drivers to exit briefly before going on their way. The police officer explained the procedure and asked, "Would you please exit the vehicle?"

Believing he had no choice, Dan said, "Okay."

After Dan got out of his car, the police officer observed the gun on the front seat and asked Dan if he was the owner. Dan answered, "No. I stole the gun. But I was planning to give it back."

Dan is charged with theft and moves to suppress the gun and his statement to the police officer under the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Miranda v. Arizona.

1. Is Dan likely to prevail on his motion? Discuss.

2. If Dan does not prevail on his motion, is he likely to be convicted at trial? Discuss.

Answer A

1. Is Dan ("D") likely to prevail on his motion?

A. On Fourth Amendment Grounds. The Fourth Amendment protects the citizenry from unreasonable searches and seizures by the government. Thus violations require government action. They also require that the search or seizure be unreasonable, something that may be an issue for D. A search is a violation of a reasonable expectation of property; a seizure is an instance in which a person does not feel "free to leave" based on governmental presence. Generally, for a search to be reasonable, there must be a warrant. A warrant is granted by a neutral judge and must be based on articulable facts shown in an affidavit and must be reasonable and particular in terms of scope and time. In this case, there was no warrant to search D's car or to seize D. Thus, the search and seizure is presumptively unreasonable, subject to certain exceptions. One important exception is the checkpoint search; another such exception is consent. As an initial matter, a person must have standing to challenge the search. Because Dan was driving his own car, he will have standing.

i) The Checkpoint Search: Warrantless, even suspicionless, road checkpoints have been upheld by the Supreme Court under certain circumstances. First, the search must be supported by the justification of highway safety - including prevention of DUI, etc. Second, the checkpoints must be administered in such a way that officer discretion is very limited. This means that an officer must go through a protocol driven method of stopping the cars - i.e., either every car, or one of every ten cars, etc. The officer may not stop whatever car he subjectively thinks looks criminal. Third, the search must be reasonable in scope - it must not exceed the degree necessary to check for whatever the search is aimed at.

Here, it does appear that the checkpoint search is aimed at a valid justification - a sobriety checkpoint. This has been expressly held as constitutional by the Supreme Court. However, there are some other issues. For one, all cars are being stopped. While this is not presumptively unreasonable, it will be an issue, as it basically allows a policeman to stop and seize every single person driving down the expressway. Secondly, the police required D to step out of his car. Under Supreme Court precedent, police only have been allowed to stop people. If sobriety or another criminal violation seem likely, then the people can be asked to exit their car. Because of the stopping of every car, and the demand that the drivers exit the car, this may be found to be an unreasonably long stop than what is necessary to meet the highway safety justification.

Conclusion: There is a chance that this checkpoint too far exceeds permissible protocol based on Supreme Court precedent. However, it is a close call. I will consider this to be a reasonable and permissible warrantless search, though the court may be convinced otherwise.

ii) Consent to Search: A person may validly waive his right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure by giving consent. Because it is likely that the stop and seizure was permissible up until the time that D was removed from his car, his consent to get out of the car would completely remove any potential objection to the search and seizure. The question will be whether the consent was freely and voluntarily given. Courts have found that when police attempt to search a person's house on the basis of consent, they do not have to tell that person that he or she has the right to refuse consent. This does not remove the "voluntary" aspect of consent. Here, Dan subjectively thought that he had no choice, but he still consented to getting out of the car. Assuming that the court would apply the consent rule used in home searches to a car search, this consent should be found to be voluntarily given.

Conclusion: Thus, the search for the gun was likely reasonable based on consent, regardless of whether or not it was legitimate based on checkpoint rules for the cops to remove him from his car.

iii) The Plain-View Doctrine: It appears, either because the entire checkpoint process was constitutional, or because D gave his consent to be moved from the car after a constitutionally permissible checkpoint stop, that the stop and seizure was constitutional at the time Dan got out of the car. Thus, the police were constitutionally on solid ground when Dan was out of the car. The plain-view doctrine allows police who are legitimately in a place and see something criminal in plain-view to use that plain-view finding in court. The justification is that a person does not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in something the person lets the public see. Here, the gun will qualify under the plain-view doctrine. The police need not rely on any Terry type frisks of automobiles, or the automobile exception, because they do not apply. The gun was in plain-view, and to the extent that the officer "searched" the car by looking in the window, the plain-view exception applies.

iv) CONCLUSION: The search and seizure was reasonable and the gun should be admissible. The checkpoint rule may validate the entire process, but even if it doesn't then the checkpoint rule was at least legitimate up until the time D was asked to exit the car. Because he consented, there is no violation of the 4th amendment. The gun is admissible based on the plain-view doctrine.

B. Will D prevail on 5th Amendment Miranda Grounds? The 5th Amendment protects the right against self-incrimination. Miranda v. Arizona, a case based on this right, holds that a person's statements made cannot be used against him in court if the Miranda warning is not given. However, Miranda applies only to custodial interrogations, and not when a person is not in custody or voluntarily offers information. Miranda warnings include the right to remain silent, the right to counsel, the knowledge that counsel will be provided to a person, and the knowledge that anything said while in custody may be used against that person in court.

i) No Miranda Warnings were given. Here, the cops gave no warnings. Thus, D's statement is protected if it was made during a custodial interrogation.

a. Custodial. Custodial situations are those in which a reasonable, innocent person does not feel free to terminate the encounter and leave at will. Here, D was out of his car being asked in the company of some police. It seems up to this point to have been a pretty friendly encounter, with the cops not showing much force or intimidation. Still, it's hard to say whether someone would reasonably feel at this point justified and correct in telling the police that this interview has to stop, and that the person is just going to drive away; especially before the sobriety check is performed. Thus, it's a close call. However, as D is out of his car, speaking to police, and about to be subject to a sobriety test, I would conclude that this is a custodial situation as a reasonable person would not feel free to terminate the questioning and leave.

b. Interrogation: An interrogative question is one that is reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response. This is a pretty close call as well. On one hand, the officers had no indication that the gun was criminally possessed, and thus a mere question about it may not be enough to reasonably expect an incriminating response. On the other hand, if the gun was criminally possessed, then a truthful response would be incriminating. However, because the officer questioned D about the gun without any suspicion at all of it being stolen, I would find this to be a non-interrogative question. I.e., if they knew that there was a stolen gun around, and then they asked, that would be more likely to be an incriminating response. Here, this just seems like the officers inquiring about a gun in the car without any suspicion whatsoever. Thus, Dan's statement should be admissible. It also appears that even if he had denied the ownership of the gun, the bit about him admitting to the crime was completely volunteered. I.e., the cops did not ask him whether he stole the gun. They asked him if he owned it. Thus, D's answer could have been "No." Instead, and completely unprompted, D volunteered that he stole the gun.

ii) CONCLUSION: This was likely a custodial situation. The situation probably not interrogative, but it may have been. Even if it was not an interrogative scenario, D's statement that "I stole the gun" was not in response to any questioning by the police, and is voluntary and admissible. If it is found to be an custodial interrogative situation, the only part of the statement that will be inadmissible will be the answer to the policeman's question: "No."

2. Which theft crime will D be convicted of?

A. Theft crimes are specific intent crimes. This means that the thief must specifically intend the proscribed conduct - i.e., the thief must have the mens rea to permanently deprive the true owner of the object possession. Theft crimes include larceny (trespassory taking and carrying away of the personal property of another with intent to permanently deprive); larceny by false pretenses (larceny, plus getting actual title to the property by intentional and legitimate fraud); larceny by trick (larceny, but obtaining mere possession of the property by trick or deception); and embezzlement (the fraudulent conversion of the personal property of another by one legally in possession of that property).

B. No larceny crime lies: This will be an embezzlement, if it's anything. The reason is because the larceny crimes all require an intent to steal the item at the moment of possession. Here, Dan did not form the intent to keep the gun until he had already been in legitimate and lawful possession - as a courier for the church, and holding it for the church. The continuing trespass doctrine will not apply, because that applies to scenarios where a person has borrowed something against the owner's intent, but doesn't plan to steal it until later. That person is never in lawful possession. Because Dan's specific intent mens rea was not formed at the moment of possession of the gun, no larceny crime will lie.

C. Embezzlement: Embezzlement is:

i) Fraudulent: I.e., wrongful. Here, D was supposed to deliver the gun to the church, but has kept the gun. Thus, he is in wrongful possession of the gun at the time the gun was found on him.

ii) Conversion: This means the intent to permanently deprive the owner (Church) of possession. This will be the major issue. Dan tells the cops he wanted to give the gun back; further we have no indication that he ever meant to keep the gun forever - maybe he just wanted to drive around with it for a little bit. Because this is a specific intent crime, the prosecution will have a tough job proving that Dan subjectively and specifically intended to keep the gun forever when he decided to not turn it in. It is important to note that once he kept the gun with intent to steal it, the crime was complete - it doesn't matter if he later developed the intent to return it. The prosecution could point to the fact that he was driving around with it and didn't turn it in when he was supposed to, which may help; so will the statement that "I stole it." This will be the issue at trial, right now it looks only probably proven at best.

iii) Of the personal property of another: The woman gave the gun to the church. As such, the gun was the property of the church.

iv) By someone in legal possession: Dan worked for the church, and it was his job in this instance to deliver the gun to the church. Thus, he has legal possession of the gun when the woman gave it to him. She gave it to him thinking he was going to give it to the church, because he was an employee of the church. The church charged him with the duty of taking donations and delivering them to it. Thus, this possession was legal. It is akin to a bank manager stealing money that he or she is supposed to be counting.

D. CONCLUSION: Embezzlement may lie, but only if the prosecution can prove specific intent to steal the gun, which will be tough.

3. General conclusion: Gun and statement ("I stole it.") admissible. Embezzlement if there is specific intent, which there likely is.

Answer B

1. Motion to suppress

The fourth amendment prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures by the state. Miranda v. Arizona requires that warnings be given to an individual subject to "custodial interrogation" in order to protect the individual's right to be protected from self-incrimination. This is clearly state action, so the issues here are whether the gun was seized pursuant to an unreasonable search or seizure, or whether the statement was obtained in the context of custodial interrogation.

Exclusionary Rule and Fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine

The exclusionary rule requires that a court exclude evidence seized pursuant to an unlawful search or seizure. The fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine also provides that evidence that is obtained as a result of an lawful search must also be excluded, subject to certain exceptions. The exclusionary rule also requires the suppression of statements obtained in violation of Miranda, although the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine does not apply to Miranda. Here, if the gun was seized during an unlawful search or seizure, or if the statement was obtained in violation of Miranda, this evidence must be suppressed.

Gun

Expectation of privacy

An individual has standing to challenge a search or seizure when they have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the place or property being searched. When an individual knowingly exposes something to the public, he no longer has standing to challenge a search of it. In this case, Dan placed the gun on the front seat of his car. It is not clear if his windows were tinted, or if someone could see easily into the car and see the gun. However, typically an individual has an expectation of privacy as to the inside and contents of their car, so Dan probably has standing to challenge the search. He certainly has standing to challenge any detention of his person, which would constitute a seizure if a reasonable person would not feel free to leave.

Routine checkpoint

Routine sobriety checkpoints are not considered seizures under the 4th amendment, so long as they are administered in a nondiscretionary manner and do not detain individuals for an unreasonable period of time. In this case, the officers at the checkpoint were stopping all cars, and were asking all drivers to briefly exit before going on their way. As a result, this checkpoint was not a seizure of Dan or his car, and did not implicate the 4th amendment.

Consent

In addition, a search or seizure is not unreasonable if an individual consents to the search. Valid consent must be knowingly and voluntarily given. Whether an individual validly consented is determined objectively, and the court considers whether a reasonable police officer would believe that the individual consented to the search or seizure. In this case, the police officer explained the procedure and asked if Dan would exit the vehicle. As a result, Dan appears to be informed about the procedure and his consent was knowing. His consent was also voluntary because he said okay, and stepped out of the car. A reasonable police officer would consider this to be valid consent.

Plain-View

The plain-view doctrine provides that where a police officer has a right to be in the place that he is, any objects in plain view may be validly searched or seized if there is probable cause to believe that the objects are products or instrumentalities of a crime. In this case, the officer had the right to be in the place that he was, as discussed above, because he had the right to stop Dan pursuant to the nature of the checkpoint and Dan's consent. At this time, the gun was in plain-view. The officer then asked Dan if the gun was his, and he responded that it was stolen. At that time, the police officer had not yet searched or seized the gun because he had not touched it or moved it in any way. However, when Dan confessed that it was stolen, probable cause arose for the officer to seize it, and the seizure was therefore lawful under the plain view doctrine.

Even if the statements were elicited in the context of a Miranda violation (to be discussed below), because the poisonous tree doctrine does not apply to Miranda, and because the gun was in plain view, the seizure of the gun was still lawful.

Dan's motion to suppress the gun is likely to fail.

Statement

A statement is obtained in violation of Miranda where an individual is in custody, and an officer is interrogating the individual without first providing the appropriate Miranda warnings. Here, it is clear that the officer did not provide Miranda warnings, so the question is whether Dan was in custody and whether the police officers question as to whether Dan owned the gun constituted interrogation.

Custody

An individual is in custody for the purposes of Miranda where a reasonable person in his position would not feel free to leave and end the detention. However, the supreme court has specifically held that routine traffic stops did not constitute custody for the purposes of Miranda. In this case, therefore, the routine security checkpoint would not be considered custody for Miranda purposes. It does not matter that Dan thought that he had no choice, because the test is objective, and not subjective. When the police officer asked Dan if he would consent, it is also possible that a reasonable person in Dan's position would have interpreted this question as indicating that he was free to not consent.

Because Dan was not in custody at the time that he made the statement, it was not illicit in violation of Miranda and is admissible.

Interrogation

A police officer is considered to be interrogating an individual where his questions are reasonably likely to illicit incriminating statements. Here, the officer asked Dan if he was the owner of the gun. This question does not seem designed to lead to an incriminating statement, only to determine who was the owner of the gun. In responding to the question, Dan would have been expected to give a simple yes or no. In the event of a non, probably a statement about who it belonged to would be expected. From the perspective of the officer, it probably seemed unlikely that this question would illicit a confession to the theft of the gun.

Because Dan was not being interrogated at the time he made the statement, it was not obtained in violation of Miranda for this reason as well. Dan's motion to suppress the statement is likely to fail.

2. Likelihood of conviction

Elements of theft

Larceny, or theft, is the taking or concealing of the property of another with the intent to permanently deprive the owner or rightful possessor of that property of the property. The issue here is whether Dan took property that belonged to the church, and whether he intended to permanently deprive the church of the gun.

Taking

A taking of the property of another occurs where the defendant physically moves the property of another, or conceals it on his person. In this case, although Dan may have had a right to possess the gun at the time that the woman handed it to him, it belonged to the Church as soon as the woman handed it over and told Dan that she wanted the Church to have it. Although Dan may have intended to give the gun to the church, a taking of the gun occurred when he did not give it to the church and instead placed it in his car. When he turned over the book and mislead the church as to the donation, his right of possession did not continue to exist and his action met the first element of larceny.

Intent to permanently deprive

A defendant need not have had the intent to permanently deprive the owner or rightful possessor at the time that the taking of the property occurred. It is enough that the intent to permanently deprive arose after the taking. In this case, it is not clear if Dan had the intent to permanently deprive. It would appear that he did not intend to ever give the gun to the church when he gave them only the book and placed the gun in his car. This is circumstantial evidence of an intent to permanently deprive and may be sufficient to meet the requirements for this element. On the other hand, he also told the officer that he was planning on giving it back. If he merely later changed his mind about the gun, this would be irrelevant, because if he had the requisite intent even this would be enough. However, this statement could also be circumstantial evidence indicating that he never had the required intent. This is a question for the jury to decide, depending on whether they believe the defendant's statements.

Mistake of law

Dan appears to believe that he "stole the gun." His beliefs about the illegality of his actions are immaterial however. His statement would be relevant only to determine whether he had an intent to permanently deprive. This is because belief that one completed an unlawful act that is actually lawful does not render the act unlawful.

Embezzlement

Embezzlement is a type of theft, and is the taking of a piece of property that the defendant had a right to possess at the time of the taking. Therefore, even if Dan had a right to possess the gun at the time, Dan could still be convicted of embezzlement, as opposed to basic theft. This conviction would turn on whether the jury found that placing the gun in the car was sufficient to indicate that Dan intended to convert the Church's property into his own and permanently deprive the church of it.

Because Dan took a gun that he did not have a right to possess, and because circumstantial evidence indicates he intended to permanently deprive the church of the gun, he is likely to be convicted at trial for theft.

ESSAY QUESTIONS AND SELECTED ANSWERS
FEBRUARY 2012
CALIFORNIA BAR EXAMINATION

This publication contains the six essay questions from the February 2012 California Bar Examination and two answers to each question that were written by actual applicants who passed the examination after one read.

The selected answers were assigned good grades and were transcribed for publication as submitted, except that minor corrections in spelling and punctuation were made for ease in reading. The answers are reproduced here with the consent of their authors.

ESSAY QUESTIONS 1, 2 and 3

California Bar Examination

Your answer should demonstrate your ability to analyze the facts in question, to tell the difference between material and immaterial facts, and to discern the points of law and fact upon which the case turns. Your answer should show that you know and understand the pertinent principles and theories of law, their qualifications and limitations, and their relationships to each other.

Your answer should evidence your ability to apply law to the given facts and to reason in a logical, lawyer-like manner from the premises you adopt to a sound conclusion. Do not merely show that you remember legal principles. Instead, try to demonstrate your proficiency in using and applying them.

If your answer contains only a statement of your conclusions, you will receive little credit. State fully the reasons that support your conclusions, and discuss all points thoroughly.

Your answer should be complete, but you should not volunteer information or discuss legal doctrines which are not pertinent to the solution of the problem. Unless a question expressly asks you to use California law, you should answer according to legal theories and principles of general application.

Q1

Q1 Trusts

Sam, a widower, set up a valid, revocable inter vivos trust, naming himself as trustee, and providing that upon his death or incapacity his cousin, Tara, should be successor trustee. He did not name any additional trustee. He directed the trustee to distribute the income from the trust annually, in equal shares, to each of his three children, Ann, Beth, and Carol. He specified that, at the death of the last of the three named children, the trust was to terminate, and the remaining assets were to be distributed to his then living descendants, by representation.

When he established the trust, he also executed a valid will pouring over all his additional assets into the trust.

Two years later, Sam died. He was survived by Ann, Beth, and Carol. Within two months, Dave, age 25, began litigation to prove that he was also a child of Sam's, although Sam had never known of his existence.

For three years after Sam's death, Tara administered the trust as trustee. Because Ann had very serious medical problems and could not work, and because Beth and Carol had sufficient assets of their own, Tara distributed nearly all of the trust income to Ann and little to Beth and Carol.

After the court determined that Dave was in fact Sam's child, Dave claimed a share of the trust. Beth and Carol have filed suit against Tara, claiming breach of fiduciary duties. Tara has submitted her resignation, and Beth and Carol have sought termination of the trust so that all assets may now be distributed outright to the beneficiaries now living.

1) What interests, if any, does Dave have in the trust assets? Discuss. Answer according to California law.

2) Are Beth and Carol likely to be successful in terminating the trust? Discuss.

3) Are Beth and Carol likely to be successful in suing Tara? Discuss.

Q1

Answer A

1) Will Substitute

Where an inter vivos trust is created, and where the settlor gives a vested future possessory interest in the trust to a grantee, it will be considered a will substitute. Where the settlor has included a clause whereby all of the settlor's assets at the time of his death pour in to the trust for the benefit of the beneficiaries a pourover will is created. The Will requirements must be established to make this valid.

Here, Sam (S) created a valid inter vivos trust, with himself as Trustee and Tara (T) as the successor Trustee for the benefit of his three children Ann (A), Beth (B), and Carol (C). S also provided that at his death all of his other assets should be poured over into the trust for the benefit of A, B, and C.

Therefore, a valid pourover will was created, with each A, B, and C receiving equal shares of all of the assets.

Dave's (D) right as an omitted child

In general, a child may be disinherited if the child is left out of a will or other testamentary document created by a parent. However, where a child is unknown to the parent at the time the testamentary document is created, and the parent had no reason to know of the child, that unknown child will not be disinherited, and will be able to recover his intestate share of the parent's estate. A child's intestate share in a modern per stirpes system, which is the majority view taken, will be an equal share split at the first level of inheritance, in this case among the children.

Here Sam (S) set up the trust only 2 years ago. D was 25 years old at the time of S's death. Because S was born before the execution of the trust and pourover will, he would generally be treated as disinherited and unable to recover. Here, however, S was unaware that D was alive or that D was his child at the time the testamentary documents were created. D would be considered an omitted child and have a right to his intestate share. Because A, B, and C were all alive, D would be entitled to 1/4 of S's estate. Because the trust contained all of the assets of S due to the pourover will, this will be where the assets are taken from. Notwithstanding the clause in the trust that requires the assets to be distributed to living descendants, by representation after A, B, and C die, D will not be required to wait for A, B, and C to die before recovering.

Therefore, D will be entitled as an omitted child to 1/4 of the Trust assets.

2) Termination by B and C

The power of termination depends on whether or not a trust is revocable or irrevocable. An irrevocable trust is created where the intent of the settlor is to make it as such. Here S expressly stated that the trust is to last until the death of the last of the three named children. The majority view is to find in favor of irrevocable trust, so it is likely that this language will be sufficient to establish an irrevocable trust.

Therefore, an irrevocable trust has been established, and the rules of termination, discussed below, will regard such.

Termination of irrevocable trust

Termination of an irrevocable trust can be done, either when the settlor and all of the beneficiaries agree while the settlor is still alive, or if all of the beneficiaries agree and it will not frustrate the purpose of the trust, or a merger where the trustee has become the sole beneficiary. An irrevocable trust is created when the express language of the settlor states as such.

Here, although T has not acted according to the will, and has distributed nearly all of the trust income to A and little to B and C, there must still be a mutual agreement between the beneficiaries to terminate that doesn't frustrate the purpose of the trust. The trust specifically stated that the trust was to be terminated only at the death of the last of the three named children. Just because B and C are unhappy with the way the trust is being distributed does not give them the right to terminate the trust, either without the consent of A, or in the face of clearly stated terms of the trust made by the settlor.

Therefore, B and C will likely not be successful in terminating the trust, but as discussed below may have damages due from T.

3) Type of trust established

To a certain extent a trustee's ability to use discretion varies depending on the type of trust that is established. The greatest deference is given to the trustee in two situations, either a support trust or a discretionary trust. Both of these types of trusts, generally, must expressly state that this is the type of trust being established. The purpose of the trust, which is a necessary requirement of a valid trust should determine what type of trust is created.

Here, the T was instructed to distribute in equal shares annually. There was no express statement of purpose that the trust was being set up for distributions based on the discretion of T, nor based on the need for support of A, B, and C. One of these things would have to be established in order to create a special kind of trust that would give T additional discretionary power.

Therefore, the trust is an express trust, neither discretionary nor support, and T will be bound to the fiduciary duties of a trustee discussed below.

Fiduciary duties of trustee breached by T.

A trustee has a number of duties to the beneficiaries of the trust. Among those duties are a) a duty of care, b) a duty to distribute benefits in accordance with the trust, c) a duty to treat beneficiaries equally, d) and a duty to follow the settlor's instructions. Only in certain circumstances is the trustee allowed to use discretion in how to distribute the income of the trust, namely a discretionary trust or a support trust. The trust duties to the beneficiary are triggered by a trustee accepting their position as such. Where a trustee has breached their fiduciary duties, they may be held personally liable, and/or may be removed from their position by the court. There are additional remedies not pertinent to this case.

Here, S was the original trustee of the trust and named T as the successor trustee. T either expressly, or at the least by conduct, accepted the position as trustee, and therefore was bound by the duties of a trustee to the beneficiaries of the trust.

Therefore, T owed the duties discussed below to A, B, and C, and any breach of such could result in personal liability and/or expulsion from the trustee position.

a) Duty of care

A trustee has the duty to act as a reasonably prudent person in her dealings as trustee. This includes investing reasonably, making reasonable distribution, and all other activities that a trustee conducts in her role as trustee.

Here, T was distributing nearly all of the trust income to A and very little to B and C. A, however, had a very serious medical problem and could not work, while B and C had sufficient assets of their own. The trust however expressly stated that distribution of the income from the trust annually should be in equal shares to each of A, B, and C.

Notwithstanding the express direction given to T as to distribution it is possible that T may have reasoned that S was not aware nor could he foresee the circumstances of A, B, and C and his real purpose was to ensure that the children were taken care of during their lives.

Therefore, T may have been reasonable in her actions as trustee, but it may be a close call because of the express direction given in the trust. T would likely have to use extrinsic evidence to show that she was acting in accordance with S's real purpose.

b) Duty to distribute in accordance with the trust

A trustee has a duty to distribute in accordance with directions given in the trust instrument. This duty is breached when the trustee acts in a way inconsistent with the specific instruction set forth by the settlor.

Here the trust expressly stated to distribute the trust in equal shares annually to A, B, and C. T, however, decided unilaterally to distribute the majority of the trust income to A and very little to B and C. This was clearly inconsistent with the directions given by S in the trust instrument.

Therefore, T breached her duty to act in accordance with the trust, and will be liable to B and C for the difference between what they were distributed and what they were entitled to under the trust.

c) Duty to treat beneficiaries equal

A trustee should give the same care and deference to each beneficiary of the trust, in accordance with the trust purpose.

Here, T gave sympathy to A because of her medical condition, and was less concerned with B and C because they had "sufficient assets of their own." It is not a fair and equal treatment to penalize a beneficiary because they have assets available to them outside of the trust. To hold that such action by a trustee is allowed, would be to disgorge the settlor of the trust of his ability to leave trust assets to whomever he might choose. A trust is not only set up for individuals who are in need (as discussed above this is not a support trust), but rather for the benefit of whomever the settlor feels he would like to distribute benefit to.

Therefore, T has not treated B and C the same as A and will be liable for a breach of duty, again with the remedies as described above.

d) Duty to follow settlor's instructions

A trustee has a duty to follow the instructions given to him be the settlor.

Here, the instruction was to distribute the shares equally to A, B, and C. T did not, as discussed above, do so.

Therefore, T breached his duty to follow instructions of the settlor.

Answer B

1) Dave's Interest in the Trust Assets

Pretermitted Children

Dave was not specifically provided for in the trust instrument set up by Sam. This is because the trust only mentioned Ann, Beth, and Carol. As such, Dave would normally not have any interests in the trust. However, a pretermitted child may be entitled to a stake in the trust if he can show that he is a pretermitted child. A pretermitted child is one who is born or discovered after the execution of a will. In this case, Dave was presumably not born after the execution of the trust and will as he was 25 years old at the time of Sam's death, and Sam executed the trust and will only two years before his death. However, [he] had never known of Dave's existence. Therefore, Dave is a pretermitted child of Sam's, and may be entitled to some of Sam's estate.

A pretermitted child is entitled to what would be his intestacy's share of the deceased's estate. A pretermitted will not be entitled to this share of the estate, however, if the deceased specifically excluded all children from his will, and the intent to do so is shown on the face of the document. That is not the case here, though, as Sam created the trust to distribute income to his three children that he knew about. Additionally, a pretermitted child will not be entitled to any interest in the estate if the deceased provides for the child in another manner, such as an inter vivos trust, that is intended to take the place of the child's intestatacy share. Again, this did not happen here because the inter vivos trust did not provide for Dave. Therefore, because Dave is a pretermitted child, and because none of the exceptions apply that would exclude him from having an interest in the deceased's estate, he is entitled to receive what would have been his intestate share of the estate.

Dave's intestate share of the estate would be equal to 25% of the estate. This is because when Sam died, he had four children and was a widower. Also, there is no mention that Sam had any living siblings or parents. All four of Sam's children survived him, and therefore if Sam had died intestate, each child would receive his share based on a per capita calculation. Therefore, each of Sam's four children would be entitled to 25% of his estate if he had died intestate. The calculation of what Dave is entitled to receive will include the value of the trust. This is because the estate is considered to include assets held by the deceased in a revocable inter vivos trust. Here, the trust that Sam created was revocable and inter vivos declaration in trust. Dave will be able to receive his interest in the estate by abating what was given to the other children. This abatement will occur by operation of law, and would mean that Ann, Beth, and Carol would each have their interest reduced from 1/3 of the estate to 25%.

2) Termination of the Trust

There are several manners in which a trust can be terminated. A trust will be terminated when a specific condition in the writing calls for the termination of the trust and is satisfied. In this case, the trust stated that it would terminate at the death of the last of the three named children. Here, all three of the named children are still alive, and therefore the trust will not terminate.

Further, a trust can be terminated when the stated purpose of the trust has been satisfied and all beneficiaries and trustees agree to end the trust. In this case, this option does not appear to be available. Although there was no stated purpose to the trust, it provided for equal payments to each of Sam's children. Therefore, the purpose of the trust appears to be to provide for Sam's children as long as they are living. This purpose is not satisfied as all three children are still living, and can still be provided for. Also, it is not clear that all the beneficiaries would agree to terminate the trust. Only Beth and Carol are suing to terminate the trust, and there is no indication that Ann or Dave would agree to the termination.

In addition, a trust may also be terminated when all beneficiaries agree to terminate the trust. As stated above, it is not clear that all beneficiaries would agree to terminate the trust because there is no indication that Ann or Dave would agree. Also, the trust has further beneficiaries besides the three named children. The trust provides that after the death of the last of the three named children, the remaining assets of the trust were to be distributed to Sam's then living descendants. This is a vested remainder subject to an open class. The class is vested because it is not subject to any conditions precedent, and it is created in an ascertainable group of people (Sam's living descendants). The interest does not violate the rule against perpetuities, which states that for an interest to be valid, it must vest within 21 years of some life in being at the creation of the interest. Here, the interest will vest when the last of the three named children dies. Therefore the interest must and will vest within 21 years of a life in being at the creation of the interest. Because this class has an interest in the trust, they are beneficiaries of the trust. If the trust is to be terminated due to consent of all the beneficiaries of the trust, they must also consent. There is nothing to indicate that they would consent to the termination of the trust, and therefore Beth and Carol will not be successful in terminating the trust.

Beth and Carol may additionally claim that the trust should be terminated because Tara, the sole trustee, resigned from her position, and because the trust itself does not name any additional trustees. However, this argument will be unsuccessful. Courts will not allow a private express trust to fail for lack of trustee. Instead, a court will merely appoint a new trustee. Here, even though the trust itself does not provide for any additional trustees, the court will appoint someone else to serve as trustee rather than letting it fail.

3) Fiduciary Duties of a Trustee

Beth and Carol will likely be successful in suing Tara, as she has breached several of her duties as the trustee. A trust creates a fiduciary type relationship with respect to property that is held by the trustee for the benefit of beneficiaries. The trustee must satisfy those fiduciary duties, and if she fails to, may be personally liable for all losses or damages that result to the trust.

Duty of Loyalty

A trustee must satisfy the duty of loyalty by acting in good faith and in the best interests of the trust and beneficiaries. A trustee must not act for her own benefit. Further, a trustee must not favor certain beneficiaries over others. Here, Tara did nothing to show that she was acting for her own benefit. However, Tara was favoring Ann over the other beneficiaries. Tara was doing this because Ann had serious medical problems and could not work, and because Beth and Carol had sufficient assets of their own. Despite her good motives for acting such, though, Tara still violated her duty of loyalty. Her actions specifically favored Ann over the other two beneficiaries. Further, her actions violated the explicit instructions that were contained in the trust and required her to distribute the income from the trust annually and in equal shares to each of the children. Therefore, Beth and Clara could successfully show that Tara breached her fiduciary duty with respect to the trust.

Duty of Care

Additionally, a trustee must satisfy a duty of care by acting in good faith as a reasonably prudent person would with respect to the trust. Here, Tara failed to follow the explicit instructions contained in the trust that required she distribute the income in equal shares to each of the children by providing nearly all the income to Ann. This failure to follow explicit instructions shows that Tara was not acting as a reasonably prudent person would act with respect to the trust. Rather, a reasonably prudent person would follow the instructions contained in the trust. Therefore, Beth and Carol could show that Tara had also breached her fiduciary duty of care.

Other Duties

It is possible that Tara violated other fiduciary duties, such as the duty to invest, the duty to provide accountings to the beneficiaries, the duty to label trust funds, and the duty to keep trust funds separate from other funds. However, the facts do not indicate that Tara breached any other fiduciary duties she had with respect to the trust.

Remedies

Having violated her fiduciary duties, Tara may be personably liable to the beneficiaries. Beth and Carol could sue Tara for damages of the amount of income that they should have been receiving under the trust. In the alternative, Beth and Carol could sue to have a constructive trust created from the excess income that Ann received over what she was entitled to receive from the trust. In such a scenario, Ann would hold the excess income as a constructive trustee, and would be required to return it to Beth and Carol.

Q2 Constitution

City recently opened a new central bus station.

Within the central bus station, City has provided a large bulletin board that is available for free posting of documents. City requires that all free-posted documents be in both English and Spanish because City's population is about equally divided between English- and Spanish-speaking people.

City refused to allow the America for Americans Organization (AAO) to use the bulletin board because AAO sought to post a flyer describing itself in English only. The flyer stated that AAO's primary goal is the restriction of immigration. The flyer also advised of the time and place of meetings and solicited memberships at $10 each.

Does City's refusal to allow AAO to use the bulletin board violate the rights of AAO's members under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution? Discuss.

Answer A

Free Speech

Under the 1st Amendment as applied to the states via the 14th A, all persons have the right to free speech. While this right is not absolute, there are only certain instances when the government may infringe upon this right.

Strict Scrutiny

America for Americans Organization (AAO) will argue that strict scrutiny should apply. Normally when a government actor limits or regulates speech based on its content, it will have to survive strict scrutiny analysis. Under this, a law will only upheld if it is necessary to achieve a compelling government interest.

AAO will claim that the city is a government actor so the protections of the 1st A will apply. Further, they will say that the law regulates the content of their speech—that it must include parts in Spanish. The court will probably not agree because it is not regulating what they say, rather how they say it. Therefore, it will take it out of strict scrutiny analysis.

Time, Place, & Manner Restrictions

One way a government may validly regulate speech is by controlling the time, place, and manner of the speech. These regulations are put under less scrutiny because they are not limiting what the people can say but rather how and where they can say it.

Public Forum

A public form is a place that is traditionally open to the public and allows somewhat unrestricted speech. These include parks, sidewalks, open fields. The bus station bulletin boards are likely not considered a public forum.

Limited Public Forum

Limited public forums are not traditionally open to public speech, but the government opens them up to the public. Therefore, they receive the treatment of a public forum while open.

AAO will claim this is a limited forum because the boards, while not traditionally open to public speech, are open here to post documents for free. The court will likely agree.

While open to public speech, a limited public forum may only regulate the time, place, and manner of speech if:

1. Content neutral
2. Alternative channels of communication are available, and
3. Regulations are narrowly tailored to achieve a significant government interest.

1. Content Neutral

As mentioned, AAO will claim that the requirement that all posted documents be in both English and Spanish is a regulation based on the content of the speech. The city will claim it is content neutral because it doesn't matter exactly what you say, just how you say it. City will claim this regulates the manner of the speech.

AAO may counter by saying that since the organization has a primary goal of restricting immigration, the regulation goes to the content of their speech because they're speaking out and trying to make it clear that everyone in America should speak/read English. The court may agree with this point but will likely side with the city because the overall requirement that docs be in English and Spanish is not regulating content of the docs but rather the manner in which their speech is conveyed.

Therefore, the regulation is likely content neutral.

2. Alternative Channels

City will also likely show that AAO has other channels of communication available. They can post on other boards or directly hand out fliers. The English/Spanish requirement appears to only apply to this bus station's bulletin board.

3. Narrowly Tailored to Further Significant Interest

City will also argue that this final element is satisfied. They will say they have a significant interest in communicating with and including the Spanish speaking population, which make up about ½ of the people.

Because it is necessary to communicate with your residents, the court may agree with City that this is a significant interest. AAO may argue that City may have a significant interest in relaying government communications, but its interest shouldn't expand to private communications. Further, the burden it would impose on everyone to translate communications into Spanish would be immense, AAO will say.

Even if the court finds the interest in communicating significant, AAO will say this regulation is not narrowly tailored to it. They'll say they could achieve this in other , less restrictive ways, like making communications around heavily populated Spanish speaking areas be in both English/Spanish.

Narrowly tailored means a tight fit. However, because this is a central bus station, it is likely that many Spanish speaking people use it and therefore need the translation.

Therefore, so long as the court finds this regulation is content neutral and is narrowly tailored to a significant gov interest, it will likely be able to refuse to post AAO's flyer for not being in Spanish.

NonPublic Forum

The city may also try to argue this is a nonpublic forum, where speech has traditionally been able to be severely limited. Such places include military bases, airports, and gov buildings. The court has also found a bus advertising signs to be nonpublic.

City will argue this isn't like the inside of a bus where people cannot escape looking at the ads because this is at the station where they could just leave. Court will agree.

Gov can regulate speech in nonpublic forums [as] long as it is reasonable and viewpoint neutral.

Here, the law is likely reasonable due to the ½ Spanish speaking population. Also it is viewpoint neutral because it doesn't discrim on only one side of a viewpoint. It applies to all communications.

Commercial

City may also try to argue this is commercial speech so they can regulate more. That speech can be regulated if not false/misleading, directly advances substantial gov interest, and narrowly tailored into it.

However, even though it seeks membership, City denied it because not in Spanish too.

Q2

Answer B

Justiciability: In order for a matter to be justiciable there must be standing, the case must be ripe, and not moot. Here, AAO has not filed suit yet, however, it must have standing to raise any objections to the city's requirements.

Standing: standing requires that there be an injury in fact, causation and redressability. Here, AAO is injured as it cannot post its flyers in English only, without potential reprimand. Moreover, the city requirement directly causes its injury, and a court decision in favor of AAO would remedy it. However, an organization will not have standing unless 1) its members have individual standing 2) the interest is germane to the purpose of the organization, and 3) neither the remedy nor the claim would require individual member participation. Here, an individual member who would want to post only flyers in English would have standing, the interest is germane to the purpose of the organization as its primary goal is to restrict immigration and therefore, posting flyers in Spanish would be against its interest and finally, neither a claim or remedy by AAO would require individual member participation.

Ripeness: a court will not award pre-enforcement review for purposes of an advisory opinion. Here, the city has already implemented these requirements. It is unclear whether it is an actual ordinance, regulation or law, but assuming that there are reprimands for violating the city requirements, then the issue is ripe, as AAO would be violating the city requirements if it only posted the flyer in English.

Mootness: there must be a dispute at all times of the litigation. Here, if the city removed its requirement during the litigation the matter would be moot. However, because the city would be free to apply the restriction again whenever it wants there [sic] matter is not moot.

Government conduct: in order for there to be a constitutional violation, there must be government conduct. Here, the city is implementing the requirement; therefore there is government conduct.

First Amendment: the government may not restrict an individual's or organization's freedom of speech unless the speech is not protected or less protected.

Content-Based Restrictions: if a law restricts speech based on its content, whereby it is based on the subject matter or viewpoint of the speech, strict scrutiny review applies. The government must show that the law is necessary to achieve a compelling state interest and it must be the least restrictive means of accomplishing its purpose. Here, AAO will argue that the law is content-based, because it is only allowing flyers that are posted in Spanish and English, and therefore, it is restricting the AAO's message against immigration which would require only posting flyers in English, as posting flyers in Spanish would communicate to the Hispanic community, which is an immigrant population. This is a very far stretched argument. It does not appear that the restriction is based on the subject matter or viewpoint of the speech. AAO could post the same flyer in Spanish stating that its primary purpose is to restrict immigration and advise of the time and place of meetings. Therefore, this argument will fail.

Content-Neutral Restrictions: if a law is content-neutral, then the government must show that the law is substantially related to an important government purpose and is narrowly tailored. As discussed above, the restriction is not content-based, rather, it is content-neutral. The city will argue that the restriction is substantially related to the purpose of communicating to all individuals in its population. The city's population is about equally divided between English and Spanish speaking people, and therefore it is has an important purpose of making sure that messages posted on the board for free will be communicated to all its population. Moreover, the city has narrowly tailored the restriction by not requiring that people post the flyers in multiple languages, but only in two. A court will likely uphold the restriction.

Prior Restraint: if a law restricts speech prior to its communication there is a prior restraint and strict scrutiny applies. The law must be reasonably, narrowly tailored, and definite. Moreover, the government must seek a prompt injunction, and there must be a prompt determination of the validity of the law. Here, AAO will argue that this restriction is a prior restraint on speech. It will argue that because it is required to post flyers in two different languages and expend the money to have the English flyer translated into Spanish it is a prior restraint on speech. As discussed above, however, the restriction is not a prior restraint on speech. The restriction is allowing speech; however, it is requiring that it be posted in two different languages. This is not a prior restraint because it is not prohibiting speech.

Vagueness: a restriction is unconstitutional if it is vague and a reasonable person could not understand the type of speech that is being regulated. Here, the restriction is not vague; it is requiring that all free-posted documents be in both English and Spanish. Therefore, the restriction is valid.

Overbroad: the restriction is unconstitutional if it restricts more speech than is constitutionally allowed. Here, the restriction is not overbroad because it is only requiring free-posted documents to be in both English and Spanish; therefore, it is valid.

Symbolic Speech: the government may restrict symbolic speech when it is narrowly tailored to achieve an important state interest, and it is not directed at the suppression of speech. The burden of proof is on the government. Here, posting flyers will be deemed symbolic speech as they communicate a message. As discussed above, the government will argue that it has an important state interest because it want its entire population to understand the flyers that are posted. The restriction is narrowly tailored as it is only requiring the flyers to be in the languages that are dominant in the population, and the restriction is not directed at the suppression of speech. Rather, it provides the opportunity of communicating to the entire population. AAO will argue that the speech is directed at the suppression of speech, because it is directed at the suppression of AAO'S message against immigration. However, this argument will likely fail as AAO can communicate this same message of its purpose in restricting immigration in Spanish; therefore, the restriction would not suppress AAO's message.

Public Forum: public forums are areas which the constitution requires that the government open to speech. These areas typically includes [sic] parks and sidewalks. Here, the restriction is taking place within the central bus station, wherein the city has provided a large bulletin board that is available for free posting of documents. Because the bulletin board is within the central bus station which is likely government owned this forum will not be deemed a public forum, as it is not a constitutionally required forum for the government to open up to speech. Nevertheless, if it were to be considered a public forum the following analysis would apply:

When there is a content-based restriction the government, strict scrutiny applies, and the government must show that the restriction is necessary to achieve a compelling state interest and it is the least restrictive means of accomplishing its interest. Here, as discussed above it is unlikely that the court will rule this restriction to be content-based, because it is not regulating the subject matter or viewpoint of the language.

When the restriction is content-neutral and is a time, place and manner restriction, the government has to show that the restriction is narrowly tailored to achieve an important state interest and leaves open alternative channels of communication. Here the city will argue that it is only regulating free-posted documents and it is only regulating the manner in which it is posted by requiring it to be in English and Spanish. The city will argue that it has an important purpose in making sure that all its population can understand the message on the board, and it is narrowly tailored to achieve that purpose by only requiring that the free-posted documents be in Spanish and English. Furthermore, it leaves open alternative methods of communications because it is not restricting any speech, but rather it is requiring more speech.

Designated/Limited Public Forum: this is a forum which the government is not required to open up to speech, but it has chosen to open up to speech regardless. The same analysis as the public forum applies as to designated public forums. Content-based speech must pass strict scrutiny, while in content-neutral speech the government has to show that the restriction is narrowly tailored to achieve an important state interest and leaves open alternative channels of communication.

It is likely that the bulletin board within the central bus station will be considered a designated public forum. The government is not required to place a bulletin board in the bus station for organizations and individuals to post flyers, nor is it required to open the central bus station to speech at all; nevertheless it has chosen to do so.

When there is a content-based restriction the government, strict scrutiny applies, and the government must show that the restriction is necessary to achieve a compelling state interest and it is the least restrictive means of accomplishing its interest. Here, as discussed above it is unlikely that the court will rule this restriction to be content-based, because it is not regulating the subject matter or viewpoint of the speech. AAO can get the same message across in both languages.

When the restriction is content-neutral and is a time, place and manner restriction, the government has to show that the restriction is narrowly tailored to achieve an important state interest and leaves open alternative channels of communication. Here the city will argue that it is only regulating free-posted documents and it is only regulating the manner in which it is posted by requiring it to be in English and Spanish. The city will argue that it has an important purpose in making sure that all its population can understand the message on the board, and it is narrowly tailored to achieve that purpose by only requiring that the free-posted documents be in Spanish and English. Furthermore, it leaves open alternative methods of communications because it is not restricting any speech, but rather it is requiring more speech.

Nonpublic forum: A nonpublic forum is a forum wherein the government may constitutionally restrict speech. These include military bases, sidewalks next to a post office, ad space on buses, and solicitation for money in airports. The restriction, however, must be viewpoint neutral and must pass the rational basis test. Here, AAO would have to argue that the restriction is not rationally related to a legitimate government interest.

The city will argue that the central bus station is a nonpublic forum and that the government must not open it to speech. Although the central bus station is likely to be deemed a nonpublic forum, the city has changed the status of the forum by providing a large bulletin board and making it available for people to post their flyers and messages. By doing so the city transformed the public forum to a nonpublic forum. However, the city may also argue that because AAO is soliciting money ($10 for its membership) that it is a nonpublic forum as it can restrict speech of solicitation for money in bus stations as it can in airport. However, this argument is unlikely to apply since AAO is not directly soliciting money by standing at the central bus station and asking for money, rather, only if individuals show up at the time and place of the meeting would it ask for membership fees. At that point, the government would be unable to regulated [sic] the speech. Nevertheless, assuming that the court would deem that this is a nonpublic forum, which it will not, the following analysis would apply.

AAO would argue that the law is not rationally related to a legitimate purpose. However, the city can easily counter this by arguing that its purpose is to have its entire population be able to read the flyers. Therefore, AAO's argument will fail. AAO will then argue that the restriction is not viewpoint neutral as it restricts only anti-immigration speech and not pro-immigration speech. This argument will again fail, as AAO can post the same message of anti-immigration in both languages and it would not deter its purpose. Therefore, AAO would not prevail under this argument.

Freedom of Association: the government may not punish individuals for joining any association unless the individuals knows of the 1) unlawful purpose of the association, 2) the individual actively participates, and 3) the individual intends to advance the illegal purpose. Here, AAO's primary goal is the restriction of immigration. This is not an unlawful purpose; therefore, the government may not punish anyone for their freedom to associate with the AAO. AAO will argue that it is violating its freedom of association by restricting its message. It will argue that the requirement is unconstitutional because the AAO is an intimate association and it would chill its expressive activities. However, this argument is unlikely to prevail as argued above, because AAO's message of anti-immigration can be communicated in multiple languages and would not violate its freedom of association rights.

Equal Protection/Substantive Due Process: AAO would also have potential argument under the equal protection and substantive due process clause of the 14th Amendment. The equal protection requires that the government afford its citizens and organization equal protections of the law. If the law does not discriminate against a suspect or quasi-suspect.

Q3 Evidence

Paul sued David in federal court for damages for injuries arising from an automobile accident.

At trial, in his case-in-chief, Paul testified that he was driving westbound, under the speed limit, in the right-hand lane of a highway having two westbound lanes. He further testified that his passenger, Vera, calmly told him she saw a black SUV behind them weaving recklessly through the traffic. He also testified that, about 30 seconds later, he saw David driving a black SUV, which appeared in the left lane and swerved in front of him. He testified that David's black SUV hit the front of his car, seriously injuring him and killing Vera. He rested his case.

In his case-in-chief, David testified that Paul was speeding, lost control of his car, and ran into him. David called Molly, who testified that, on the day of the accident, she had been driving on the highway, saw the aftermath of the accident, stopped to help, and spoke with Paul about the accident. She testified further that, as soon as Paul was taken away in an ambulance, she carefully wrote down notes of what Paul had said to her. She testified that she had no recollection of the conversation. David showed her a photocopy of her notes and she identified them as the ones she wrote down immediately after the accident. The photocopy of the notes was admitted into evidence. The photocopy of the notes stated that Paul told Molly that he was at fault because he was driving too fast and that he offered to pay medical expenses for anyone injured. David rested his case.

Assuming that all appropriate objections and motions were timely made, should the court have admitted:

1. Vera's statement? Discuss.

2. The photocopy of Molly's notes? Discuss.

Answer according to the Federal Rules of Evidence.

Q3

Answer A

I. VERA'S STATEMENT

The first issue is whether or not Vera's statement to Paul claiming that the black SUV behind them was weaving recklessly through the traffic. Evidence is admissible if it is logically and legally relevant and not subject to any restrictions in the federal rules of evidence.

A. Relevance:

Logical Relevance: Evidence is logically relevant if it tends to prove any fact of consequence in the trial more or less probable. Here, Paul is suing David for injuries arising from an automobile accident. A central issue in this case will be who was at fault for the automobile accident that caused the injuries. The fact that David drives a black SUV and the fact that Vera observed a black SUV weaving recklessly through traffic tends to prove that David was driving recklessly and therefore was at fault for the accident. This evidence is logically relevant.

Legal Relevance: If evidence is logically relevant than [sic] it also must be legally relevant. Legal relevance is determined by whether the evidence is more prejudicial than probative. This requires a balancing test. Here, the evidence is probative because as mentioned it illustrates how one of the parties in this case was driving before the accident. David will argue that it is prejudicial because Vera called him "reckless" and that this statement might cause a jury to cast judgment on his driving. A judge will determine that the probative value outweighs any slight prejudice this evidence may include and is therefore legally relevant.

A court may also exclude evidence that is not legally relevant because it would waste time or confuse the jury. However, this evidence does not require any additional time to be spent to prove additional elements and is not confusing to a jury.

B. Lay Opinion:

David will argue that the statement should be inadmissible because it contains a lay opinion as to the nature in which he was driving his vehicle. Lay opinions are admissible evidence if they are (1) helpful to the jury and (2) do not require any special analysis. Here, if Paul is suing on a negligence theory, David might argue that Vera stating that he was driving recklessly is allowing the witness to testify as to an element of the cause of action. However, David will be successfully [sic] in arguing that Vera could easily see the car driving and that her expression that the car is driving recklessly is merely her opinion on how the driver was swerving through lanes. This evidence will be rendered inadmissible because it is a lay opinion.

C. Hearsay

Paul will argue that Vera's statement is inadmissible because it is hearsay. Hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. As a general rule, hearsay is inadmissible because the validity of out-of-court statements is questionable and unreliable. Hearsay is inadmissible unless a valid exception applies. David will argue that the following exceptions apply:

(1) Present Sense Impression: A present sense impression is when someone makes a statement about an event they are perceiving at the moment. Present sense impressions are exceptions to the hearsay rule, because they are presumed to be reliable. When someone makes a present sense impression, they have no motivation to lie or misstate what is actually occurring. The facts state that just 30 seconds after Vera made this statement that a black SUV hit Here [sic], Vera simply stated at the time of observing the black SUV that she saw that SUV weaving recklessly through traffic. Therefore, it will be admissible as a present sense impression.

(2) Present State of Mind: Another hearsay exception are statements made by individuals that express their current state of mind. Here, Paul will argue that when Vera made the comments about the SUV, she was expressing what she thought and felt at the time. This statement would also be admissible under the Present State of Mind exception.

(3) Excited Utterance: Paul may argue that the excited utterance exception applies as well. An excited utterances [sic] is a statement made at the time of a shocking or exciting event that is made before the shock or excitement as [sic] worn off. Here, David will argue that the swerving of an SUV was not a shocking or exciting event. Further, the facts state that Vera calmly told Paul about the SUV which illustrates that she was not under the shock or excitement of any event. Therefore, the excited utterance exception does not apply.

(4) Prior Statement: Prior statements made by individuals that are unavailable to testify sometimes qualify as an exception to the hearsay rule. However, the federal rules of evidence require that the prior statement be made under oath in the course of some type of previous testimony. This statement was made in the car to Paul and is therefore not a valid exception under the prior statement rule.

(5) Dying Declaration: Paul may attempt to argue that Vera's statement qualifies under the Dying Declaration exception. This exception states that under some circumstances, statements made under the impression of impeding death are valid exceptions to the hearsay rule. However, the federal rules of evidence state that these statements are only admissible in criminal homicide cases. Moreover, the statement was not made with the knowledge of impending death because the car had not been hit yet and Vera did not know that she might be dying soon. Therefore, it would not qualify under this hearsay exception.

(6) Federal Catchall Exception: The federal rules of evidence also allow a catchall exception for statements that are made under circumstances of trustworthiness. Paul will argue that Vera did not have any motivation to lie or to make this information up because it happened at the time of the accident. He will also argue that because Vera is dead there is no other way for this evidence to be admitted for trial. The judge would likely not apply the federal catchall exception because the Present Sense Impression exception is a stronger argument, and you only need one valid exception to admit the evidence.

In conclusion, Vera's statement would be admissible evidence as a present sense impression.

II. PHOTOCOPY OF MOLLY'S NOTES

The issue here is whether or not the photocopy of Molly's notes that state that Paul told her he was at fault because he was driving too fast and that he offered to pay medical expenses can be admitted into evidence.

A. Capacity to Testify:

A witness may testify if she has personal knowledge of the event in question, she recalls the event in question, she has the ability to communication [sic] these perceptions, and she takes an oath to tell the truth. Here, Molly has personal knowledge of the facts perceived because she was there the day of the accident, saw what happened, and remembers that she took notes describing the day's events. While she does not recall the events at this moment, this can be satisfied in other ways that are discussed below. She has the ability to communicate and presumably took an oath prior to testimony.

B. Authentication of Document

Before any documents or other types of recordings are entered into evidence, they must be authenticated and the proper foundation must be laid. Here, Molly has testified that she was there on the day of the accident and they [sic] she remembers that she carefully wrote down notes of what Paul had said to her. Therefore, there is a foundation for the photocopy of the notes. Moreover, David showed Molly the copy of the notes while she was on the stand and she identified them as the ones that she took that day. This would suffice as authentication.

Documents being admitted into evidence are also subject to the Best Evidence Rule. The Best Evidence Rule states that if a document is going to be admitted into evidence, then the original must be produced or the party must account for why the original cannot be produced. The federal rules of evidence have accepted photocopies of documents as satisfying the best evidence rule.

Therefore, the document has been properly authenticated and a photocopy will suffice as a representation of the original.

C. Relevance

Logical Relevance: (See rule statement above.) Here, Paul's statements are logically relevant. They tend to prove whether or not Paul was at fault in the accident more probable than not. Whether or not Paul was at fault or not is a fact of consequence to this case since a central issue is who was at fault to the accident.

Legal Relevance: (See rule statement above.) These statements are more probative than prejudicial. There are not statements that might prejudice Paul because they are statements that Paul himself stated.

Offer to Pay Medical Expenses: However, there are some types of evidence that are not admissible for public policy reasons under the rule of legal significance. For example, evidence of insurance, subsequent remedial repairs, and offers to settle are inadmissible because as a society we want to promote people to carry insurance, rectify dangerous situations, and settle cases as not to clog the courts. Another such category is when one party offers to pay the medical expenses of the other party. Here, there are two statements that Paul made. The first is that he was at fault because he was driving too fast. The second is his offer to pay medical expenses for anyone injured. The ferenda rules of evidence will sever these two statements. Because the offer to pay medical expenses is inadmissible but the other statements made in connection with the offer are admissible.

D. Dual Hearsay:

(See rule statement above.) The issue with the photocopy of Molly's notes is that there are two levels of hearsay. In order for a document that contains two levels of hearsay to be admissible evidence, there must be valid exceptions for both statements.

a. First Level of Hearsay: Paul's Statements.

The first level of hearsay is Paul's statements that he made to Molly. These statements were made at the scene of the accident presumably and thus are out of court statements. David will argue that the following exceptions apply:

(1) Party Admission: An admission made by a party to the case is admissible because under the federal rules, it constitutes non-hearsay. Here, Paul admitted fault to the accident. He stated that he was driving too fast and explicitly said that he was at fault. Thus, this is a valid party admission and would be admitted as non-hearsay.

(2) Statement Against Interest: Another category of non-hearsay is when a party makes a statement against interest. Statements against interest are any statements that an individual makes that are against his pecuniary interest. Here, stating that one is at fault for an auto accident would be a statement against his interest. Therefore, this exception would apply.

b. Second Level of Hearsay: Molly's notes

The second level of hearsay is the notes that Molly wrote down on the paper. Molly wrote those notes on the day of the accident and not while in the courtroom. Therefore, the notes are Molly's out-of-court statements. David will argue that the evidence should be admitted because of the following two exceptions:

(1) Prior Recollection Recorded: Courts will admit prior recollection recorded if four elements are met. First, the witness must currently not be able to recall the facts that are in the writing. The facts state here that Molly testified that she has no recollection of the conversation. The second is that the writing be created by the witness or adopted by the witness. Here, Molly herself wrote down the notes. Third, the writing must have been made when her memory was still fresh. Here, Molly created the writing as soon as Paul was taken away in the ambulance; therefore, we can assume that her memory was still fresh. Fourth, the writing must have been made under reliable conditions. Here, there is no evidence of an alternative purpose that Molly created the writing except for the document [sic] the events as they occurred. If all of these elements are satisfied, the recollection may be read into evidence; however, the photocopy should not be admitted into evidence.

(2) Present Recollection Refreshed: A party can refresh a witness' memory with virtually any document. Therefore, if Molly did not recall the events, David could have shown Molly the document and allowed her to look over the writing. If this refreshed her memory, then she could testify as to her knowledge of the events. In this situation, the writing would normally not be entered into evidence unless the opposing party suggested that it be admitted. However, this does not apply because Molly was shown the document, but then did not review it or subsequently answer questions based off of her review.

In conclusion, the photocopy should not have been entered into evidence because even though there were valid hearsay exceptions applied, the appropriate way to admit the evidence would have been to read the evidence into the record as opposed to giving the jury the photocopy.

Answer B

The case between Paul in [sic] David is a civil case, which means there are a few different rules than when you are in a criminal case. This case is about injuries arising out of an automobile accident in which Paul is suing David. At issue is going to be who is at fault for the injuries and the accident.

1. Did the court err in admitting Vera's statement?

Vera's statement was made while she was a passenger in the car with Paul on the day of the accident. She stated in a calm manner that she saw a black SUV behind them weaving recklessly through the traffic.

Logical Relevance

All evidence must be relevant to be admissible. This includes tending to prove or disprove a fact that is of consequence. Even if evidence is relevant it may be inadmissible if it is not legally relevant.

Here, Vera's statement is being offered to prove the identity of a vehicle that she observed driving recklessly, which is the same vehicle that David drives. It is also relevant to prove that Paul had notice/was aware of the black SUV driving radically. Additionally, it is relevant to prove that David was at fault and was driving recklessly.

So although Vera's statement has logical relevance its probative value must be determined.

Legal Relevance

Evidence that is logically relevant may be excluded if it will create an unfair prejudice. The court has discretion as to whether or not to exclude the evidence. The test to determine whether the evidence should be excluded on a legal relevancy ground is whether the unfair prejudicial effect substantially outweighs the probative value.

Here, the prejudicial effect will be that David will be determined to have driven recklessly by weaving in and out of traffic. However, this is highly probative and is what is at issue and being determined in the case, so Vera's statement will not be excluded on grounds of legal relevance.

Even relevant evidence that is otherwise admissible can be inadmissible when it is in violation of one of the federal rules of evidence.

One of the objections that David could make regarding the admissibility of this evidence, besides relevancy, would be hearsay.

Hearsay

Hearsay is a rule which prevents out-of-court statements from being admitted into evidence, if the statement is being offered for the trust of the matter asserted. The reason hearsay evidence is prohibited is because it was not subject to cross-examination and cannot be determined if the statement was fabricated or reliable. Since the information in Vera's statement about a black SUV driving recklessly would be helpful to a jury or trier of fact and is being offered to prove that the reckless driving of the SUV did in fact take place it is being offered for its truth and should be excluded unless a hearsay exception or exemption applies.

Hearsay Exceptions

Hearsay exceptions are statements that are made out of court and are admitted for their truth but we allow them in for other reasons. Here, Paul will try and argue that Vera's statement should get in under several different exceptions.

Present Sense Impression

A present since impression is an exception to hearsay because it is considered to have reliability given the fact that the statement is made while or immediately after perceiving an event. There seems to be little time to fabricate a statement when it is made while you are perceiving it.

Here, Paul is going to argue that Vera made the statement while still in the car when she saw the black SUV weaving recklessly through traffic. She was currently perceiving the SUV driving in such a manner and made the statement while making the observation. It is of no matter that she made the statement calmly because this does not negate that she had just observed the SUV driving recklessly.

David might try and counter that Vera did not make the statement immediately when she observed the car driving recklessly, but there are no facts to support that she didn't make the statement while she was observing. Also statements are allowed to be made immediately after observation, because there is still the indication that there is not time to fabricate. Absent any facts showing that Vera waited any amount of time after observing the SUV driving recklessly and telling Paul this statement could come in under the present sense impression.

Excited Utterance

Excited utterance allows hearsay evidence to come in if the statement was made while under the stress or effect of an exciting or startling event. Here, Paul might try and claim that Vera commented on the SUV's reckless driving while she was still under the stress of the observation. However, David will have a valid argument against this contention because Vera calmly told Paul about the SUV and did not seem to be effected by it in a manner to justify an excited utterance.

Former Statement

Former statements can be admitted as long as the declaring is unavailable. Unavailability of a declaring can be because of death, not able to locate after reasonable attempts, and/or incapacity. Here, Vera is dead so she is unavailable. Former statements that are made under oath at a previous proceeding can be admitted for impeachment purposes and to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Here, Vera's statement was not made under oath at a formal proceeding and could only be used for impeachment. However, since there is no one to impeach because Paul is offering his case and chief [sic] as a plaintiff, thus going first, this statement cannot be admitted as a former statement even though Vera is unavailable.

Dying Declaration

Dying declarations are allowed in criminal homicide cases as well [as] civil. Here, we are in a civil case so a dying declaration is allowed as long as the declaring is unavailable, they do not have to actually die, they made a statement regarding the cause of their death, and they made the statement under the belief that death was impeding or imminent. Here, there is no valid argument to support that Vera's statement was a dying declaration since she made the statement prior to Paul's car being struck by the black SUV and prior to her death. Even though Vera is now unavailable she did not make a statement thinking she was going to die or describing the cause of her death and this exception is not available for Paul to get Vera's statement admitted.

Personal Knowledge

Personal knowledge is required for a witness to be able to testify as to an event. While Paul did not personally observe the black SUV driving recklessly as Vera did, he did perceive Vera's statement with one of his 5 senses and thus has personal knowledge that the statement was made and the manner in which it was made.

Hearsay Exemptions

These statements are not hearsay because they are not admitted to prove the truth of the matter and are admitted for a different purpose. Here, Paul is going to argue that Vera's statement should come in as non-hearsay under several different grounds.

Effect on the hearer

Effect on the hearer is not being offered to prove the truth of the matter and thus is not hearsay. This is offered to show the effect the statement had on the person hearing the statement. Here, Paul could assert this statement is being offered to show that Paul was aware of a black SUV that was driving recklessly. Since Paul's driving is also being put at issue by David this is important for Paul to prove that he was on alert of the black SUV driving recklessly that struck him 30 seconds after hearing the statement from Vera.

Conclusion

Because this statement could fall under the present sense impression exception and effect on the hearer exemption to hearsay this statement cannot be excluded on hearsay grounds and the court properly admitted Vera's statement.

2. Did the court err in admitting the photocopy of Molly's notes?

Logical/Legal Relevancy

Molly's notes are relevant to prove that Paul made a statement accepting fault and offering to pay medical bills. They are being offered by David for this matter and to prove that it is true as well. Although relevant to determine fault the evidence must also not be unfairly prejudicial.

Policy reasons to exclude relevant evidence

Certain evidence although relevant will be excluded because of public policy reasons. Courts want to encourage parties to fix wrongs, settle cases, and help each other out. Here, Paul will argue that the notes should be excluded because they were an offer to pay medical bills. Offers to pay medical bills cannot be offered to show fault of a party.

Although offers to pay medical bills of the injured [sic] is not allowed into evidence under the federal rules of evidence, the FRE severs statements made in connection with the offers and allows them into evidence. Here, Paul made the statement that he was driving too fast, was at fault, and offering to pay medical expenses of anyone injured.

The statements regarding Paul driving too fast and being at fault will not be excluded under this policy reason but may be excluded on other grounds (see discussion below).

Error in allowing an offer to pay medical expenses

So in regards to the court allowing in a photocopy of a document that included the offer to pay medical expenses there is an error because public policy seeks to keep these sorts of statements excluded.

The statement regarding Paul driving too fast and being at fault

The photocopy of Molly's notes being admitted constituted a recorded recollection and is actual evidence being admitted. All tangible, physical, non-testimonial evidence that is being admitted must be authenticated in order to be admitted.

Authentification

Here, Molly is on the stand claiming that she wrote the notes immediately after the accident and that the notes are hers. This is sufficient to authenticate the notes because Molly is claiming they are what David purports them to be and she is on the stand and capable of being questioned as to the notes' authenticity.

Refreshing Recollection

Anything can be used to refresh a witness's recollection. Here, David is attempting to use notes to refresh Molly's recollection. Witnesses must be shown whatever is attempting to refresh their recollection in order to see if the item is successful in helping them recall. Whatever is used to refresh a witness's recollection may be offered into evidence by the opposing party.

Here, it is not Paul offering the notes used to refresh Molly's recollection into evidence; it is David, which means he is attempting to offer the notes as a recorded recollection.

Paul may argue that Molly was not given the notes before claiming that her memory failed and thus the rules regarding admitting record recollection evidence were not followed. Generally a witness should be given the document to review silently and then if they still cannot remember the document may be admitted into evidence. Paul may have a valid argument here since the facts do not say that this was done. It appears from the facts that Molly before even reviewing the document said she couldn't remember, then it was moved into evidence.

Record Recollection

Documents offered into evidence that were used to refresh a witness's recollection are permitted so long as the witness's memory has failed to be refreshed, the witness is on the stand and able to be crossed and authenticate the document, the witness accurately prepared the document close in time to perceiving the events, and had personal knowledge of the thing to which they recorded information about.

Here, Molly did testify that she was unable to recall the conversation. She is on the stand and subject to cross and questioning. And she testified that she carefully wrote down the notes as soon as Paul was taken away in the ambulance; additionally she had personal knowledge of the conversation with Paul since she heard the conversation herself. Given these facts David would be able to properly admit the evidence as record recollection as long as no other restrictions exist permitting the admissibility of the evidence.

Best Evidence Rule

The Best evidence rule is a rule which calls for the document itself to be admitted when someone is on the stand trying to testify as to the contents of the document. Here, Molly is trying to recall a conversation and the notes contain information about the conversation. Since the notes are her own memory and not of legal significance the best evidence rule does not apply.

However, Paul will try and assert that there is a problem with the best evidence rule as well as authentification because the actual note itself was not admitted and a photocopy was admitted. Paul will try and argue that unless David can show a justifiable reason why a photocopy of the note and not the actual note was admitted there is a problem/violation with the best evidence rule. David will successfully counter that argument by claiming that a photocopy, properly authenticated, is an acceptable document to satisfy the best evidence rule.

Hearsay/ Multiple Hearsay

See rule above and discussion above. Here we also have a case of multiple hearsay since there is a statement within a document both made/prepared out of court and being offered for the truth of the matter asserted. So both the statement and the document must meet their own separate hearsay exception or exemption. As discussed above the document itself can get in under the record recollection rule but there needs to be an exception for the actual statements.

Party Admission-

Party admissions are considered non-hearsay and are statements offered by a party opponent made by the other party. These statements do not have to be against interest necessarily but they must be made by one party and offered by the other. Here David is attempting to offer statements that Paul made, and although not required, are against his interest and regard his fault in the accident. This could be a valid ground for admitting the statements made by Paul.

Statement against interest

David may try and assert that the statements made by Paul can come in under a statement against interest exception to hearsay. However, this exception requires that the declaring be unavailable which is not the case here, since Paul is the plaintiff in the matter and is available in court.

Conclusion

The court was likely proper in admitting the evidence because the document can come in under the record recollection and the statement is admissible as a party admission.

Your answer should demonstrate your ability to analyze the facts in question, to tell the difference between material and immaterial facts, and to discern the points of law and fact upon which the case turns. Your answer should show that you know and understand the pertinent principles and theories of law, their qualifications and limitations, and their relationships to each other.

Your answer should evidence your ability to apply law to the given facts and to reason in a logical, lawyer-like manner from the premises you adopt to a sound conclusion. Do not merely show that you remember legal principles; instead, try to demonstrate your proficiency in using and applying them.

If your answer contains only a statement of your conclusions, you will receive little credit. State fully the reasons that support your conclusions, and discuss all points thoroughly.

Your answer should be complete, but you should not volunteer information or discuss legal doctrines that are not pertinent to the solution of the problem.

Unless a question expressly asks you to use California law, you should answer according to legal theories and principles of general application.

Q4

Q4 Business Associations

Testco, Inc. conducts market surveys, and is solely owned by Amy, Ben, and Carl. Each paid $50 for one-third of Testco's no-par shares. Amy and Ben, respectively, are Testco's president and secretary and its only two directors. Carl holds no office and is not involved in any aspect of Testco's business. Amy and Ben are scrupulous about holding directors' meetings to conduct corporate business and to make monthly distributions to the shareholders of almost all cash on hand. As a result of the latter practice, Testco has little cash on hand and frequently finds itself in the position of negotiating extensions for payment of its debt.

While Ben was on vacation, Examco called Amy, asking to enter into a one-year contract with Testco. Amy said that if Examco would agree to a ten-year contract, Testco would grant its standard fifty-percent discount. Examco agreed, and Amy signed the contract in the following manner: "Testco, by Amy, President." When Ben returned, he said that he had thought for some time that Testco's standard fifty-percent discount was unwise, and convinced Amy to revoke the contract with Examco.

Examco wants to sue Testco, Amy, Ben, and Carl for damages. If found liable, Testco will not be able to pay.

On what theory or theories may Examco bring an action for recovery of damages against:

1. Testco? Discuss.

2. Amy, Ben, and Carl as individuals? Discuss.

Q4

Answer A

Examco v. Testco

Breach of Contract

If Testco is to be found liable to Examco, it will be on a breach of contract theory. Breach of contract occurs where there is a valid contract, a breach, and then damages as a result of the breach. A valid contract exists when there is an offer, acceptance, consideration, and no defenses to contract formation.

Here, Examco asked Amy to enter into a ten-year contract, which Amy then signed on behalf of Testco. Amy agreed that in consideration for the length of time of the contract, that she would give Examco a fifty percent discount. Thus there was a valid contract between both Examco and Amy on behalf of Testco.

A breach of the contract occurred when Amy anticipatorily repudiated the contract between the two companies. It is likely that Examco will receive damages as a result of not getting the benefit of their bargain with Testco; thus there is a valid action for breach of contract. However, Testco will only be bound to this contract if Amy had authority to enter into the agreement with Examco (see below).

Agency

Agency is where a principal with capacity manifests assent that an agent act on behalf of the principal for its benefit and subject to its control followed by the agent manifesting assent to do the same. Here, Amy as president of Testco was an agent of the company since she was appointed to the position of president (assent), working for the benefit of the company, and subject to the control of the board of directors. Thus

Amy was an agent of Testco and Testco will be liable on the contract with Examco if she had some form of authority to enter into the contract.

Amy's Authority

A principal is liable on the contracts entered into by their agent on their behalf so long as the agent has authority. Authority can come in three forms: actual authority, apparent authority, and ratification.

Actual Authority

Actual authority is the authority that the agent reasonably believes that they have based upon the manifestations of the principal. Actual authority can be express or implied.

Express Actual Authority

Express actual authority is the authority given from the four corners of the agency agreement.

Here, there is no agency agreement between Amy and Testco; however, there is probably some sort of express manifestation of assent in the bylaws or articles of incorporation of Testco. Usually in the corporate setting, when a contract such as this is entered into, the board of directors will usually vote to pass a resolution to give the president of the company the authority to enter into the contract. However, there was no such board resolution here since Amy did not consult with Ben prior to signing the contract. Since there are no facts going to express authority, a different form of authority must be found to bind Testco to the contract with Examco.

Implied Actual Authority

Implied actual authority is the authority that the agent reasonably believes that they have based upon necessity in order to carry out their express authority, customs of the position held by the agent, and by prior dealings with the principal.

Here, Amy, as president of Testco, would likely have implied actual authority to enter into the Examco contract by virtue of her position as president of the company. Presidents of corporation[s] customarily have the authority to enter into binding contracts with other companies. Additionally, it is necessary for a president to enter into contracts with other companies in order to make the corporation profitable. Making the corporation profitable is a duty of the president of the company and thus it is necessary that Amy entered into this contract in order to fulfill that duty.

Testco will argue that, although Amy was president and had authority to enter into smaller contracts, this contract was different in the fact that it went ten years into the future and that Amy was giving such a huge discount. Testco will argue that this sort of contract required express board resolution and thus Amy could not have reasonably believed to have authority to enter into it. However, the facts state that Amy gave the "standard fifty-percent discount;" thus it seems like this was a regular occurrence of the corporation to enter into contracts of this nature. As such there was implied actual authority.

Apparent Authority

In the event that the court finds that there was no actual authority, they could find apparent authority to bind Testco to the contract. Apparent authority is the authority that a third party reasonably believes that the agent possesses based upon the manifestations of the principal. One form of manifestation by the principal would be the position that the principal has placed the agent in is a position that is usually associate[d] with the grant of authority.

Here, Examco can successfully argue that Amy had apparent authority do [sic] to her title of president of Testco. When they were entering into the contract they dealt directly with the president of the company. Additionally when the contract was signed, it was signed "Testco, by Amy, President". As such, it would have been reasonable for Examco to believe that Amy had apparent authority to enter into the contract.

Ratification

Another form of authority is ratification. Ratification occurs where after the agent has entered into a contract, the principal has knowledge of it and accepts its benefits. Here, when Amy told Ben about the contract, he told her to immediately revoke it. Thus there was no board resolution ratifying the contract with Examco and there will be no finding of authority based upon ratification.

Conclusion

Since there is at least the finding of apparent authority on behalf of Amy for Testco, Testco is bound to the contract with Examco and will be liable to them on a theory of breach of contract.

Examco v. Amy, Ben, and Carl as Individuals

Liability of Shareholders

Shareholders of a corporation are only personally liable for the cost of their shares of stock in the corporation. They are not personally liable for the corporation's debts, liabilities, or obligations. Thus, Amy, Ben, and Carl will not be liable to Examco personally unless the corporate veil can be pierced (see below).

Piercing the Corporate Veil

In order to recover from the personal assets of the shareholders of Testco, Examco will have to make a sufficient showing to pierce the corporate veil. The corporate veil is pierced based upon a variety of factors. These factors include whether there was fraudulent conduct by the shareholders, whether the corporation is undercapitalized, whether the corporation is simply an alter ego of the shareholders, and whether the creditor of the corporation is an involuntary creditor.

Fraud

Fraud is the misrepresentation of a material fact known to be false with the intent to induce some action upon another where the other suffers damages. Here, the facts do not suggest that Amy made any misrepresentations when entering into the contract with Testco; thus a pierce of the corporate veil will not be achieved on the ground of fraud.

Alter-Ego

A corporation acting as the alter ego of the shareholders will be found where the shareholders forgo the usual formalities of corporate status. Here, Testco has officers and a board of directors; however, the facts state that Amy and Ben are "scrupulous" about holding director's meetings to conduct business. Thus it could be seen that they have foregone the formalities of a usual corporation. Thus this factor weighs in favor of a pierce of the veil.

Undercapitalization

Undercapitalization of a corporation occurs where the corporation does not keep enough surplus cash on hand in order to pay the foreseeable liabilities of the corporation. Here this factor weighs heavily on favor of piercing the veil since all of the extra cash on hand was distributed to the shareholders. It was foreseeable that eventually a contract would be breached or some mistake would be made causing liability on behalf of Testco. Thus since there was not enough cash on hand to pay the liability to Examco, the veil may be pierced.

Involuntary Creditor

An involuntary creditor is usually a tort victim or tort judgment holder. Here, Examco had every opportunity to inspect records and the financial security of Testco prior to entering into the contract. Thus they were not an involuntary creditor.

Carl's Liability

Usually a shareholder that is uninvolved with the daily operations of the company will not be held liable as a result of veil piercing. Here, Carl did not participate in any of the activities of Testco except to receive distributions from the company. Thus he may or may not be held liable to Examco.

Conclusion

The factors presented above weigh in favor of piercing the corporate veil; thus Examco may go after the shareholders of Testco, with the possible exception of Carl.

Q4

Answer B

The remedies that are available to Examco for Testco revocating their agreement depend on the legal status of the agreement and whether Amy had the authority under agency principles to bind Testco to the agreement if it can be legally enforced. The agreement concerns money which is proper consideration from Examco to Testco for providing its market survey services. There were negotiations between both parties regarding the price and discount that would be offered as well as the length of the contract. Both parties agreed on the 10 year terms and the 50% discount. Amy signed the contract. This is enough to create a legally enforceable contract if Amy had the authority to enter into contracts on behalf of the corporation — this is determined by principles of agency which I now analyze.

Amy as Agent of Testco

An agent is a person or entity that acts on behalf of another, the principal. For an agency relationship to exist there must be assent by the agent to the existence of the relationship and its duties, the agent must act for the benefit of the principal, and the principal must control the agent's actions on its behalf.

Here Amy is the President of the corporation. She has assented to the relationship by accepting this employment and the duties and privileges (e.g., salary, benefits) that come along with it. She acts for the benefit of the corporation in this capacity. This is because by virtue of her position in the management of the corporation as an officer she has a Duty of Care to the corporation and must act in good faith and as a reasonably prudent person would with his or her own business. Further, in addition to this Duty of Care she also has a Duty of Loyalty whereby she must act in the best interest of the corporation before all others including herself. These duties insure that Amy's actions should be for the benefit of the corporation in all actions she does on its behalf. Third, the corporation itself has control over Amy. This is because Amy is an employee of the corporation and serves at the will of the board of directors and at its direction. Her employment can be terminated at any time by the board or shareholders (by majority vote at a meeting or special meeting).

Because the three prongs of agency have been satisfied, Amy is an agent of the corporation. As such, she may be able to bind the corporation to agreements depending on whether she has the appropriate authority to do so.

Actual Express Authority

Actual express authority is the authority that is expressly given to an agent by a principal for some particular task. This authority can be orally conveyed or it can be in writing. According to the equal dignity rule, if a writing would be required for the transaction or action at issue if the principal were to act directly for himself instead of through his agent, the principal is required to expressly give the agent express written authorization to undertake the action on the principal's behalf.

There is no factual information to suggest that Amy had either oral or written actual express authority to enter into contracts on behalf of the corporation. Further, even if the board or shareholders expressly passed a resolution stating that Amy had such authority, or that the President of the corporation has such authority, the resolution and authorization it granted must be in writing. This is due to the equal dignity rule. Because the contract that was actually signed by Amy called for her firm's services to be rendered over the course of 10 years, the Statute of Frauds requires a signed writing (because performance necessarily will take longer than one year by the terms of the contract). Amy herself signed such a writing. However, there is no evidence to suggest that the board gave her such written authorization.

Thus, Amy did not have actual express authority to enter into the contract on behalf of Testco on the basis of the factual information given. However, she may have had implied authority to do so.

Actual Implied Authority

Actual implied authority is that authority which is necessary for it to carry out its expressly authorized actions and in fact was implied from that authorization, or authority that comes with virtue of the position the agent has with respect to the principal and the duties associated with this position.

Here if Amy had received express authority from the board to manage all sales regarding Testco's service contracts, she would have the implied authority to enter into a contract with Examco at terms that she determined because such authority is necessary to manage all sales of service contracts. However, since there is no evidence of an express authorization this prong of implied authority will not suffice.

The second possibility that will give rise to implied authority is if the agent by virtue of his or [her] position and the duties associated with such a position has authority to enter into a contract. Here Amy has been appointed by the board of directors of Testco as its president. As such, she is the chief executive officer of the corporation and is responsible for overseeing all day-to-day operations of the corporation. By virtue of this position and the duty that comes with it — to manage the corporation — Amy has the implied authority to act on the corporation’s behalf in her management of the corporation.

Thus, when she signed the contract with Examco she was acting with the implied authority granted to her by virtue of her position as president charged with management of the company. On this basis, Testco can be held liable for a breach of contract.

Apparent Authority

Apparent authority is the authority that arises when a third party reasonably believes that the agent has such authority because the principal "cloaked" the agent with the appearance of such authority.

Here Amy is the president of the corporation. She holds herself out as such when she entered into the contract with Examco. By virtue of permitting Amy to negotiate such service agreements, which appears to be the case given Ben's objection to the usual 50% reduction, Testco was holding her out to third parties as having the authority to enter into such agreements. Further, Amy signed the contract with Examco as "Testco, by Amy, President." Acting in the cloak of authority given to her by Examco by virtue of her ability to negotiate sales service agreements with customers and by virtue of the apparent authority she has as Testco's president, she had the apparent authority to bind the corporation when contracting with a third party, here Examco, who reasonably believed she had such authority.

Thus, because Amy had the implied authority and apparent authority to enter into this contract on Testco's behalf and she did so, Testco is liable for breach of the contract by its revocation. Examco can seek damages directly against Testco.

2) The determination of whether there is liability for Amy, Ben, and Carl will depend on whether there is director liability for Amy and Ben in their capacities as directors and officers of the corporation. And for all three, Amy, Ben, and Carl based on whether the veil can be pierced for purposes of their limited liability.

Piercing the Veil

Directors, managers, and shareholders are generally not liable for their actions to a third party that is suing the corporation. That is true, unless the corporate veil that insulates them from liability can be pierced. Piercing of the corporate veil is an extraordinary remedy that is only awarded when the directors, officers, and shareholders do not provide for sufficient capital or insurance for the corporation's debts and where the corporation is but an alter ego of the shareholders. The latter can be established in part by the officers and managers not observing sufficient corporate formalities.

Undercapitalization

Directors are not permitted to make a dividend distribution that puts the corporation at risk for insolvency. In fact, the prohibition against this is so strong that the directors will be personally liable for such a distribution unless they believed the corporation was not at risk of insolvency based on the financial officer's report which they are allowed to reasonably rely upon.

Amy and Ben

Here Amy and Ben voted in favor of making monthly distributions that put little cash on hand and leading to the corporation needing to negotiate extensions for payment of its debt. This put the corporation at risk for insolvency because if a large judgment came through or one of its creditors was unwilling to renegotiate its payment terms. Amy and Ben as shareholders and directors did this to benefit themselves at the expense of the corporation. This violated their duty of loyalty to act in the best interests of the corporation above even their own. They did not do this because they held 2/3 of the shares and put the corporation at risk of insolvency merely to line their own pockets with distributions. This would also violate their duty of care to the corporation because they would not put themselves at such risk of insolvency in the management of their personal business. This undercapitalization will lead to Examco likely not being able to recover its damages for breach of its contract. It should be permitted to recover its expectation damage measure, the amount it reasonably expected to profit from the agreement at the time it was entered into.

Courts are more likely to pierce the veil for a tort action than they are for a contract dispute.

Here we have a contract dispute between a corporation and another corporation. It is due to the fact that Amy and Ben determined that the contract would not be profitable. While normally this would not be such an egregious breach, because it may lead to an overall benefit if the breach was efficient, here it is especially so because Amy and Ben have undercapitalized the corporation and there are likely no assets which Examco can reach when it successfully sues. As such, the court should pierce the corporate veil to allow Examco to recover the impermissible cash distributions that Amy and Ben had been awarding themselves and would otherwise be available.

Carl

While Carl is also a shareholder and normally his 1/3 interest in the corporation would be sufficient to raise him to the status of a controlling shareholder, here he does not have such control. Amy and Ben are the only two officers, the only two directors, and when combined they hold a 2/3 interest in the corporation as shareholders. Carl is merely a passive investor that is not involved in any aspect of Testco's business. He merely invested $50 in no-par stock in a venture run by Amy and Ben. As such, while the veil should be pierced for Amy and Ben as to their shareholders' limited liability but should not be for Carl because he committed no improper acts and was merely a passive investor.

Q5 Professional Responsibility

Attorney mailed a professional announcement to several local physicians, listing his name and address and his area of law practice as personal injury. Doctor received Attorney's announcement and recommended that her patient, Peter, call Attorney. Peter had become very ill; he thought the cause was breathing fumes from a chemical company near his home.

Attorney agreed to represent Peter in a lawsuit against the chemical company. At Attorney's request, Doctor agreed to testify as an expert witness on Peter's behalf at the trial. Attorney advanced Doctor expert witness fees of $200 an hour for her time attending depositions, preparing for trial, and testifying.

Attorney learned in discovery that numerous scientific studies had failed to find any medical risks from the chemical company's fumes. Doctor was nevertheless willing to testify, on the basis of her clinical experience, that the fumes had harmed Peter. Attorney did not know whether Doctor's testimony was true or false. He offered Doctor's testimony at trial, and Peter won a judgment.

After the trial, Attorney sent a $500 gift certificate to Doctor, with a note thanking her for recommending that Peter call him.

What, if any, ethical violations has Attorney committed? Discuss.

Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

Q5

Answer A

What, if any, ethical violations has Attorney committed?

The attorney may be liable for ethical violations for: 1) mailing a professional announcement to physicians in the area, 2) paying an expert witness fee, 3) allowing the doctor to testify, and 4) sending the doctor a gift.

Mailing a Professional Announcement to Physicians in the Area

Both the ABA and California prohibit in person, live solicitation to individuals who the attorney does not have a familial or professional relationship with. However, attorneys are allowed to send professional announcements, letters, cards, etc. to people in the area. Moreover, the document must have certain information contained in it, such as the attorney's name or if it is a firm, a name of one attorney in the firm. It must also have an address listed for the attorney and/or any other relatable contact information. However, the document must be accurate and fair, the attorney is not allowed to guarantee success rates or hold himself out as a specialist unless he is certified by the proper authorities in the state.

Here, the attorney is not soliciting in person and is rather sending professional announcements to physicians in the area. This is not prohibited by the ABA or California rules. Furthermore, the attorney has included his name and address as well as his practice of law. The announcement is not misleading and is the accurate reflection of the attorney's information. Moreover, it is of no consequence that the doctor referred her client to the attorney. The attorney and the doctor have not set up a referral service and are not sharing in any of the fee. The doctor simply referred her injured client to the attorney based on the announcement she received. Therefore, the attorney will not be in violation of any ethical rules for sending out professional announcements.

Paying an Expert Witness Fee

Both the ABA and California rules permit attorneys to compensate expert witnesses for their time exerted on the case. However, the compensation cannot be hinged on favorable testimony from the witness. The compensation must also be reasonable in light of factors such as the expert's familiarity with the subject, his experience in the field and other similar factors.

Here, the attorney is advancing the doctor an expert witness fee of $200 an hour for her time attending depositions, preparing for trial, and testifying. These are all ethical reasons for the attorney to compensate the expert witness for. There are no facts to indicate that the attorney is paying for favorable testimony or that the fee being paid is unreasonable. Therefore, the attorney has not violated any ethical rules by compensating his expert witness.

Allowing the Doctor to Testify

An attorney is allowed to call witnesses to testify on his client’s behalf. However, there are some exceptions to this rule. One major exception to this rule is if the attorney knows that the witness will perjure him or herself. This is also a place where the ABA and California rules differ.

ABA

Under the ABA, an attorney shall not call a witness to testify if the attorney knows the witness will commit perjury. However, if the witness is the defendant in a criminal case he has a constitutional right to testify on behalf of himself. The ABA states that if her client insists on testifying and perjuring herself the attorney must attempt to persuade her not to. If the client still insists on testifying, then the attorney should attempt to withdraw as counsel if the court will allow it depending on how damaging it will be to the client. Finally, if the attorney is unable to withdraw he must carefully weigh the balance of his duty of confidentiality with his duty of candor to the court. If the client persists on testifying then the attorney may advise the court about the perjury.

California Rules

Under California, the rule regarding witnesses who are not the clients are the same. An attorney is prohibited from calling a witness who he knows will perjure himself. However, the California rules differ from the ABA regarding a client who wishes to testify on behalf of himself and who wishes to perjure himself as well. In California, an attorney must make the same effort to attempt to persuade the client to not perjure himself. Furthermore, the attorney must try to withdraw as counsel if the court permits it. The big distinction is that in California an attorney is allowed to let his client testify in narrative fashion regarding the false information. He also is not required to breach is [sic] duty of confidentiality and warn the court of the perjury.

In this Case

Here, the doctor who is testifying is not the client and therefore the attorney under both the ABA and California rules is not permitted to call the doctor if he knows he will perjure himself. The facts state that the attorney learned in discovery that numerous scientific studies had failed to find any medical risks from the chemical company's fumes. Nevertheless, the doctor was willing to testify, on the basis of her clinical experience, that the fumes had harmed Peter. Although the scientific studies failed to find any risks of the fumes, this does not mean that the doctor is necessarily lying. An attorney has a duty to represent his client zealously and just because there is some evidence that states the fumes may not be dangerous there are no facts to indicate that the doctor is lying. The doctor is testifying based on her clinical experience and is allowed to testify even if it contradicts some of the scientific studies. The only way the attorney will not be allowed to call the doctor as a witness is if he knows that she will be committing perjury when she goes on the stand. In light of all the facts, the attorney has not breached any ethical duties by allowing the doctor to testify.

Sending the Doctor a Gift

Both the ABA and the California rules prohibit sending gifts to witnesses who testify on their behalf. The attorney is only allowed to compensate the expert witness for her services in the case such as depositions, preparing for trial and testifying. Moreover, a gift to an expert witness may compromise the witness's ability to be fair and not to give favorable testimony in anticipation of a gift. If the gift was intended for the doctor as a thank you for testifying it will not be allowed.

Referral Fee

Also, an attorney is not allowed to send a gift to a person whether they are a witness or not for referring someone to him. This would be a kickback or a referral service fee. These are explicitly prohibited unless the attorney satisfies certain criteria such as: 1) getting informed consent from the client, 2) having in the contract how the referral is to be split up, and 3) the referral must not be exclusive between the attorney and the referring party.

Here, the attorney has sent a $500 gift certificate to the doctor with a note thanking her for recommending that Peter call him. This violates both the referral arrangement stated above and also violates the ethical rules for compensating an expert witness. Thus, the attorney will be in violation for sending the doctor the $500 gift certificate.

Conclusion

In light of all the facts, the attorney has not violated any rules by his conduct except sending the $500 gift certificate to the doctor, of which he will be found to be in violation of the ethical rules both under the ABA and California.

Q5

Answer B

Ethical violations committed by Attorney in the representation of Peter (P).

A. Attorney advertising

i The applicable rules

The issue is what limits there are on an attorney's right to send out advertising for her services. The Supreme Court has held that attorney advertising is protected by the First Amendment as commercial speech. While states may prohibit in-person and over-the-phone solicitation entirely, states may only proscribe attorney advertising sent by mail, as it was here if it is either false or misleading. States may impose other regulations as well. For example, in California, all attorney advertisements by mail must announce on the cover of the envelope and on the ad within that this is attorney advertising. It must name an attorney responsible for the ad, as well as the attorney's address. It must list the attorney's area of law practice, and may include information about past results if the attorney makes clear that such results are not typical and that they are not a prediction of future results. A copy of the advertisement must also be held for two years.

ii. Rules applied to A's conduct

In this case, Attorney (A) mailed an advertisement for his services to local physicians. His mailing has First Amendment protection. There is nothing to suggest that the ad was false or misleading. Also, while it is true that the ad will be presumed false/misleading if it is sent to a hospital or some other place where prospective clients may be under undue pressure or distress, there is no indication that A sent the mailing to clients; rather, he sent it to their physicians, who would in such a vulnerable condition [sic]. Thus, A does not have a false or misleading ad, and he will not be liable on that count.

Further, we are told that the ad listed his name and address. However, we are not told whether the advertisement stated on the envelope and on the letter that this was an advertisement. If not, A may have committed an ethical violation.

Therefore, it appears that the mailing does not violate any rules of professional conduct under either ABA or California authorities.

B. Solicitation of prospective clients

i. The applicable rules

As noted, the ABA and California rules of professional conduct prohibit attorneys from soliciting clients for pecuniary gain in person or over the phone. There is an exception where the client and the attorney have an established relationship, are family members, or the client is a corporation.

ii. Rules applied to A's conduct

While none of these exceptions apply in this case, the attorney has not committed any ethical violation because he did not solicit clients over the phone or in person. Rather, he sent a broad mailing. This type of advertising is acceptable and does not constitute a violation of the rules.

C. Paying an expert witness's fees

i. The applicable rules

Under ABA Professional Rules, an attorney may not make any advance payments to a client in anticipation of litigation. Nor may an attorney give loans to the client, even if the client promises to repay. The only exception under the ABA rules is that an attorney may advance the costs of litigation to a client in order to facilitate the client's commencement of a claim. However, under the California Rules of Professional Conduct (CRPC), attorneys may make loans to clients in anticipation of litigation, as well as fronting any legal costs associated with bringing the claim.

Additionally, clients/attorneys pay compensate an expert witness for his testimony/work so long as the payment is not given in exchange for specific testimony, such as testimony that is favorable to the client's case.

ii. Rules applied to A's conduct

In this case, A has advanced to Doctor (D) an amount of money intended to compensate him for his work as an expert witness. Under the ABA Rules, this probably [does] not constitute a violation of the ethical rules. The costs of hiring an expert witness are high, and many prospective clients would be unable to hire one. However, without the ability to hire an expert witness, the client might not know if he has a colorable claim against the defendant. Thus, advancing the costs of hiring an expert, as A has done here, probably would not violate the ABA Ethical Rules. These are the costs of litigation, and are probably covered under the exception under these rules.

With respect to the CRPC, it is even more likely that advancing D's fees will not constitute an ethical violation. The CPRC makes clear that attorneys may make loans to a client so long as the client has an obligation to pay the attorney back. Here, when Peter (P) wins on his claim, he will have to either pay A for the costs of hiring D as a witness, or the costs will be taken out of any contingency fee awarded to A from P's judgment against the chemical company.

Thus, under both the ABA and California rules, advancing costs to D is not a violation of the ethical rules.

D. Offering D's testimony at trial

i. The applicable rules

There are two sets of conflicting ethical rules that make resolution of this issue somewhat complex. First, A has an obligation to represent his client zealously, in good faith, and to make all colorable claims that support his client's case. This means that A has an ethical obligation to make every argument on P's behalf that A thinks is supported by the record. He should do so only in good faith, but he must be a zealous advocate at all times.

In contrast, all attorneys also have a duty of candor to the court. This means that attorneys should not offer false evidence into the record. Where there is authority that is controlling and on point, the attorney must bring such authority to the court's attention, even if the authority is detrimental to the attorney's position. Attorneys must conduct themselves honestly in court, and may not make any malicious, unfounded claims that the attorney knows have no support in the record.

As noted, these two duties often conflict, and may put attorneys in a precarious position.

ii. The rules applied to A's conduct

In this case, A learned during discovery that numerous scientific studies had failed to find any medical risk from the defendant's fumes. Nevertheless, D, the expert witness who has treated P and was hired by A to prove A's case, believes otherwise. D is willing to testify, on the basis of her experience and knowledge, that the fumes had harmed P. A has offered D's testimony at trial without knowing whether it is true or false. The question is whether this is a violation of A's duty of candor to the court.

In answering this question, it is important to analyze what A knew and didn't know at the time he offered D's testimony into evidence. First, it should be noted that only the studies A found in discovery were able to find no link between the chemicals and P's injury. We are not told whether there may be other studies out there that support such a connection that A has yet to find. In fact, if the list of studies reviewed by A is not exhaustive, there very well may be a study out there that supports such a connection. Second, it is not clear who funded these studies, or whether the authors had some sort of bias that might discredit their findings. Further, we are not told whether this is a field of science that has been closed to further research, or whether it is a relatively new field that is still developing. It is possible that the chemical in question is relatively new, and therefore its consequences are only recently being analyzed/discovered. There might be other scientists (like D) that are using new techniques to study the connection between the chemicals and injuries, but the results just haven't been published yet. In sum, we can conclude that A has very little information that should convince him, one way or another, that D's testimony is false. There are many open questions about the chemical and a possible link between the chemical and P's injuries.

As noted, attorneys have a duty to represent their clients zealously and to make all colorable claims. The facts tell us that A did not know whether D's testimony was false or true, and this makes sense because D was the expert in the field. While it is unethical for an attorney to offer testimony that she knows to be false, there is no ethical problem under either the ABA rules or the CRPC if the attorney merely has doubts. This is especially true in light of the attorney's obligation to her client. The attorney has an obligation to represent her client vigorously. Thus, it would likely be an ethical violation of A's duty to her client were she to not offer D's testimony into evidence. Since A did offer the testimony on P's behalf, and A did not knowingly offer any false evidence in the process, A did not violate any ethical rules with respect to offering D's testimony.

E. Sharing fees with non-attorneys

i. Applicable Rule

Under the ABA rules, an attorney may not share legal fees with a non-attorney. In California, the attorney may share a fee if the attorney discloses the fee-sharing arrangement to the client and the client consents.

ii. The rules applied

In this case, we are told that A contacted D, a non-attorney, with a mailing advertisement, seeking potential clients. At first, there was no arrangement to share any resulting fees with D. However, after A won a judgment for P, he sent D a $500 gift certificate (the certificate). This is arguably an offer from A to D to share the fees from P's case. A was compensated for his work representing P, and presumably the money that paid for the certificate came from these funds. Thus, A has arguably violated the ethical rule against sharing attorney's fees with a non-attorney. However, A will argue that he gave D the money not for D's work at trial, but for D's recommending P to A as a client. While this may free him from a violation under the "sharing-of-fees" rule, it will support an argument that he violated another ethical rule, as discussed immediately below.

Note that had A disclosed the arrangement to P ahead of time, and had P consented, this would not have been an ethical violation under California's ethical rules. However, because A failed to do so, his conduct is a violation of both the ABA and the California rules of professional conduct.

F. Paying for Referrals

i. Applicable Rule

Under the ABA ethical rules, attorneys may not offer money or services in exchange for getting referrals for prospective clients for pecuniary gain. However, in California, the attorney may pay for a referral if the attorney discloses the referral to the client at the outset of contacting the client, and the client consents to the representation despite having this knowledge.

ii. Rule Applied

The same facts discussed above in section "E" (compensation for referral) are applicable here. However, as noted above, it is also significant that A included a note with the certificate, thanking D for recommending that Peter call him. This sounds like a tit-for-tat situation, in which A is compensating D for making a referral. Thus, one would argue that A gave the certificate to D as compensation for referring P's case to A. Holding A liable under this rule is just another way of characterizing the gift certificate that was given to D after P won his case. In this scenario, the money was given to D for D's work efore the case began, rather than for D's work during the trial that contributed to P's judgment and A's resulting compensation (as suggested in section "E", supra). As mentioned above, A's note to D supports the argument that the certificate was intended to compensate D for making the referral, which is a direct violation of the ABA and California rules.

Under the California rules, an attorney may compensate [a] third party who referred a client so long as the compensation is disclosed to the client and the client consents to being represented by the attorney. Because A did not get P's consent before sending the certificate, A's conduct violated the ABA and California ethical rules.

Q6 Real Property

Donna was looking for a place to live. Perry owned a two-story home, with the second story available to lease.

Donna and Perry signed a two-year lease that provided, in part: “Lessee may assign the leased premises only with the prior written consent of Lessor.”

Upon moving in, Donna discovered that the water in her shower became very hot if Perry ran water downstairs. When Donna complained to Perry about the shower and asked him to make repairs, Perry refused, saying, “I’ll just make sure not to run the water when you are in the shower.”

Perry soon adopted a new diet featuring strong-smelling cheese. Donna told Perry that the smell of the cheese annoyed and nauseated her. Perry replied: “Too bad; that’s my diet now.”

After constantly smelling the cheese for three weeks, Donna decided to move out and to assign the lease to a friend who was a wealthy historian.

Donna sought Perry’s consent to assign the lease to her friend. Perry refused to consent, saying, “I’ve had bad experiences with historians, especially wealthy ones.” Thereafter, every time Donna took a shower, Perry deliberately ran the water downstairs.

After two weeks of worrying about taking a shower for fear of being scalded and with the odor of cheese still pervasive, Donna stopped paying rent, returned the key, and moved out. At that time, there were twenty-two months remaining on the lease.

Perry has sued Donna for breach of the lease, seeking damages for past due rent and for prospective rent through the end of the lease term.

What defenses may Donna reasonably raise and how are they likely to fare? Discuss.

Q6

Answer A

As set forth below, Donna can raise the following defenses (1) material breach of lease, (2) constructive eviction, (3) breach of the warranty of habitability, and (4) failure to mitigate damages. Donna is likely to succeed on all four defenses.

1. Material Breach of Lease.

Tenancy for Fixed Term.

A fixed term tenancy is a pre-agreed term by the landlord and tenant.

Here, Donna and Perry signed a "two-year lease." As such, the term of the lease is fixed at two years.

Therefore, Donna is obligated to pay rent for the full two years of the lease, unless otherwise excused.

Duty to Repair.

Generally, a tenant has a duty to keep the premises in good order and repair, unless otherwise agreed to by the parties. The landlord, however, has a duty to repair common areas of use.

Here, there was something wrong with the plumbing in Perry's home. Each time Donna took a shower, she was scalded if Perry was taking a shower at the same time. She notified Perry of the problem, but her [sic] refused to fix it — stating only that he would not take a shower while she did. The leased premises is [sic] part of Perry's home. It is not a separate apartment, did not have separate plumbing or other utilities. Even if Donna wanted to fix the problem herself, she would have not have the ability to do so since she did not lease or control the areas of the home that were the source of the problem. Perry controlled these items. The plumbing was, in essence, a common area under Perry's control.

Therefore, Perry, as landlord, had the duty to repair the plumbing issue and breached his duty to Donna by failing to repair it.

Duty re Nuisance.

A landlord owes a duty of quiet enjoyment to his tenant, including the abatement of nuisances to the extent within his control. A nuisance is something that would be offensive to a person of ordinary sensibilities.

Here, Donna was "annoyed" and became "nauseated" at the smell of Perry's new diet of strong-smelling cheese. However, this appears to be something unique to Donna. She was perfectly willing to assign the lease to her friend the wealthy historian - who would have been subjected to the same smell. A friend would not do this to a friend, unless she knew that the problem with the smell was due to her being ultra-sensitive to that particular cheese. As such, this ultra sensitivity does not arise to the level of being a nuisance.

Therefore, Perry did not breach his duty to Donna by failing to stop eating the cheese.

On the other hand, however, Perry began intentionally annoying Donna. After their dispute regarding the cheese and the possible lease assignment, he began to deliberately turn on the water whenever Donna tried to take a shower. This meant that Donna was not able to take a shower for nearly two weeks. Most anyone of normal sensibilities would be annoyed by this behavior.

Therefore, Perry did breach his duty to Donna by deliberately running the water while she took a shower.

Duty to Pay Rent Despite Material Breach.

At common law, a tenant's duty to pay rent is not relieved by the landlord's material breach of lease. Modernly, a material breach of lease that goes to habitability relieves the tenant's obligation to pay rent.

Here, Perry breached the lease by failing to repair the plumbing. He further breached it by deliberately running the water each time she took a shower. Nevertheless, Donna still owed a duty to pay rent to Perry, despite the breach. Under modern statutes, however, Donna will likely be relieved of the obligation to pay rent because the breach went to her use, enjoyment, and habitability of the leased premises.

Conclusion re #1 Breach of Lease.

As such, Perry breached the lease by failing to repair the plumbing. Therefore, Donna can reasonably raise this as a defense and is likely to succeed.

2. Constructive Eviction.

A landlord owes a duty of quiet enjoyment to his tenant. In the event of (a) a substantial interference with the use and enjoyment of the premises, the tenant may (b) give notice to the landlord, and (c) leave the premises, thereby being excused from any further obligations under the lease.

Here, re (a) there was something wrong with the plumbing in Perry's home. Each time Donna took a shower, she was scalded if Perry was taking a shower at the same time. She notified Perry of the problem, but her [sic] refused to fix it — stating only that he would not take a shower while she did. What's more, Perry began intentionally annoying Donna. After their dispute regarding the cheese and the possible lease assignment, he began to deliberately turn on the water whenever Donna tried to take a shower. This meant that Donna was not able to take a shower for nearly two weeks. Most anyone of normal sensibilities would be annoyed by this behavior. Not being able to take a shower in your own apartment is a substantial interference with the use and enjoyment of the apartment.

Therefore, element (a) is met.

Here, re (b) Donna had notified Perry about the problem. At first he said he would simply not run water while she took a shower. However, in the end, he did so deliberately. As such, Perry had notice of the plumbing problem.

Therefore, element (b) is met.

Here, re (c) after two weeks with no shower, she turned stopped paying rent, returned the key and moved out.

Therefore, element (c) is met.

As such, elements (a), (b), and (c) are met. Therefore, Donna is relieved of her obligations under the lease through Perry's constructive eviction.

Conclusion re #2 Constructive Eviction.

Therefore, Donna can reasonably raise a defense of constructive eviction and is likely to succeed with this defense.

3. Breach of Warranty of Habitability.

A landlord of residential property, which includes commercial in California, owes a duty to his tenant to keep the premises fit for normal habitation. This duty is breached when the landlord fails to fix a condition that impacts the habitability of the premises or violates building codes.

Here, Donna was being scalded each time she took a shower. This started out being an unintentional problem, but grew into an intentional problem when Perry used the defect to intentionally annoy Donna. In the end, Donna was unable to take a shower at all for fear of being burned or scalded. The plumbing issue is likely a building code violation as well. Building codes typically set standards for the temperature of water coming from hot water heaters to avoid burning and scalding, as was happening here. Nevertheless, Perry refused to fix it.

Here, regarding the cheese, Donna was "annoyed" and became "nauseated" at the smell of Perry's new diet of strong-smelling cheese. However, this appears to be something unique to Donna. It does not go to the building code or other habitability issues.

Therefore, Perry breached his warranty of habitability to Donna by failing to fix the plumbing.

Remedies for breach of warranty of habitability.

When a breach of the warranty of habitability occurs, a tenant has several option;, the tenant can (a) stay in the premises, deduct rent and repair the issue, (b) stay in the premises and abate rent until the issue is repaired, or (c) stop paying rent and move out.

Here, Donna chose option (c). She stopped paying rent, returned the keys and moved out. Therefore, she is relieved from any further obligation under the lease.

Conclusion re #3 Breach of Warranty of Habitability.

Therefore, Donna can reasonably raise a defense of breach of warranty of habitability and is likely to succeed with this defense.

4. Failure to Mitigate damages.

A landlord has a duty to mitigate his damages in the event of a breach by the tenant.

Here, Donna tried to find another solution for Perry. She wanted to move out and assign the lease to her wealthy historian friend. The lease required consent for this assignment, and Donna was seeking such consent. However, Perry decided he really did not want to live with a wealthy historian because of his prior bad experiences with them. Due to the nature of this [sic] leased premises, that it was a part of Perry's actual home that required the sharing of space, it is not necessarily unreasonable for Perry to be a little picky about this. Nevertheless, Perry did not even agree to meet with the wealthy historian. Being wealthy and [a] historian does not automatically place someone in an annoying class. Perry's prior experience was probably on a personal level with an individual and had nothing to do with him being a wealthy historian. Perry should have, at a minimum, met with the person, interviewed him, sought references, and otherwise done his due diligence before turning down the opportunity. By failing to do this, he failed to mitigate his damages.

Mitigation as limitation on damages.

A landlord has a duty to use reasonable efforts to re-let the premises. Damages will be reduced by an amount found [that] could have been reasonably avoided.

Here, no, after Donna has left the premises, Perry is under a continuing duty to mitigate his damages by using reasonable efforts to re-let the premises. He must advertise it and seek a reasonable replacement for Donna. Perry is not automatically entitled to full rent for the remaining 22 months without first trying to re let the premises. He already knows at least on [sic] prospective tenant — the wealthy historian — who would take Donna's place.

Therefore, Perry's award for damages, if any, will be reduced by the amount that is shown could have been avoided by mitigating his damages.

Conclusion re #4 Failure to Mitigate.

Therefore, Donna can reasonably raise a defense for failure to mitigate damages and is likely to succeed — at least in part — on this defense.

Overall Conclusion.

In conclusion, Donna can raise the following defenses: (1) material breach of lease, (2) constructive eviction, (3) breach of the warranty of habitability, and (4) failure to mitigate damages. Donna is likely to succeed on all four defenses.

Q6

Answer B

Statute of Frauds

A contract which cannot, by its terms, be completed or fully performed within one year must be in writing in order to be enforceable. Furthermore, a contract conveying an interest in land must be in writing in order to be enforceable. In order to satisfy the statute of frauds, a contract that comes within its purview must be signed by the party to be bound. Here, Donna and Perry have entered into an agreement to lease the second story of Perry's home for two years. Donna has "signed" the lease, meaning it must have been in writing, and she is the party to be bound. Therefore, the statute of frauds will not be an effective defense to enforcement of the contract against Donna.

Valid Assignment

If Donna validly assigned the lease to her friend, then she would only be secondarily liable based on privity of contract with the original leasor, Perry. The original lessor must seek payment from a valid assignee before seeking payment from the assignor.

Lack of Privity of Estate

If the assignment from Donna to her friend is valid, then privity of estate is destroyed between Perry and Donna. However, privity of estate is not required if there is privity of contract between the landlord and previous tenant. Therefore, the lack of privity of estate will not protect Donna from a lawsuit following a valid assignment because, as the original lessee, she still has privity of contract with Perry.

Restriction on Alienation/Assignment

Restrictions on alienation of property are disfavored. As a consequence, lease clauses restricting a tenant's right to assign or sublease will be strictly construed. For example, a prohibition on assignment absent consent will not prohibit sublease without consent and vice versa. Here, the lease prohibits assignment without consent and would not bar sublease. However, Donna sought to assign her interest to her friend. The language is not controlling. The difference between assignment and sublease is whether the whole remainder of the term is conveyed to the new tenant. If the whole remainder of the lease term is conveyed, then the transfer is an assignment. If only part of the remaining term is conveyed, then the transfer is a sublease. Here, Donna sought an assignment.

Landlord's Unreasonable Refusal to Consent to Assignment

Under the terms of the lease, an assignment requires the landlord's prior written consent. Donna sought Perry's consent and he refused because he had "bad experiences with historians, especially wealthy ones." Donna may argue that Perry's refusal was unreasonable and that the assignment should be valid.

In residential leases of a single family dwelling, a landlord's refusal of consent need not be reasonable so long as it is not based on an unlawful form of discrimination--such as race. In commercial leases or residential leases for large apartment complexes, most jurisdictions require the landlord's refusal to be objectively reasonable, but not so with small residential leases such as the second story of Perry's home. Perry discriminated on the basis of Donna's friend's occupation and wealth which are not unlawful bases. Therefore, Perry's refusal is permissible and Donna will not be permitted to avoid liability by assigning her lease to her friend.

Implied Warranty of Habitability

Every residential lease contains an implied warranty of habitability which requires the leased premises to be fit for basic human dwelling. Housing code violations and serious problems such as lack of heat in a cold winter, lack of running water, flooding, etc. would constitute violations of the implied warranty of habitability. A tenant has several options when the implied warranty of habitability has been violated. After giving the landlord reasonable notice, the tenant may repair the problem and deduct the cost from rent payments, may repair the problem and sue for the cost in damages, may remain in possession and sue for damages, or may move out and avoid liability for the remaining rent. Here, Donna wishes to move out which she may do if the alleged violation is sufficiently serious.

Stinky Cheese

The smell of Perry's cheese, though annoying and nauseating, is problably not enough to make the leased premises unfit for basic human dwelling. If Donna's nausea is so severe that the smell constitutes a health risk to her, then her claim would be significantly strong, but that does not appear to be the case here.

Hot Shower

The hot shower water definitely constitutes a safety hazard, but may not, by itself, be enough to make the premises unfit for basic human dwelling. This is a close call. In conclusion, Donna will probably not be successful on a claim for violation of the implied warranty of habitability. She has a strong claim for constructive eviction anyway.

Constructive Eviction

If, by a landlord's act or omission, a tenant is constructively evicted from premises, then the tenant is relieved of any obligation to pay rent. In order to satisfy the requirements for a constructive eviction, there must be (1) substantial interference with the tenant's use and enjoyment of the leased premises, (2) reasonable notice and time to fix or repair, and (3) tenant must vacate within a reasonable amount of time.

(2) Substantial Interference

Meanness--"Too bad; that's my diet now"

As a landlord, Perry is very mean and refuses to express any concern for Donna's comfort. Just because a landlord is mean does not constitute substantial interference with a tenant's use or enjoyment of her property. Therefore, Perry's meanness will not be sufficient to satisfy the substantial interference requirement.

Landlord's Duty to Repair--Hot Shower

A landlord generally does not have a duty to repair defects in leased premises with several exceptions such as a duty to keep common areas reasonably safe and a duty to make safe furnished, short-term leased premises. If there is a risk of serious harm from a latent defect inside leased premises on a long-term lease, however, a landlord has a duty to repair the problem. The tenant must give the landlord notice of the problem. If the tenant gives notice and the landlord refuses or fails to repair the defect, then the landlord has violated his duty. Here, Donna faces a serious latent defect by virtue of the shower being so hot that it could seriously burn her. She notified Perry and Perry refused to repair. He took steps to avoid injury (at first) by "mak[ing] sure not to run the water when [Donna was] in the shower," but he did not repair the defect. This omission, in the presence of a duty to repair, may constitute a substantial interference provided that the risk of injury is sufficiently high.

Retaliation--Hot Shower

A landlord must not retaliate against tenant for complaints or requests made under the lease. Here, Donna merely sought Perry's consent to assign the lease to her friend. Perry refused and, thereafter, deliberately ran the water downstairs to make Donna's shower dangerously hot. This intentional, bad-faith retaliation for requesting to assign her lease to another constitutes substantial interference with Donna's use and enjoyment of the premises because it created a significant risk of injury to her.

Nuisance--Stinky Cheese

A private nuisance is any substantial interference with another person's use and enjoyment of property to which they have a right to possession. Whether an alleged nuisance constitutes substantial interference is an objective question. If the plaintiff is deemed ultra-sensitive, she will not recover because the interference is not objectively substantial even if it is substantial subjectively. Whether the stinky cheese is a substantial interference is a question of fact for the trier of fact at trial. Depending on the severity of the odor, a reasonable person may find that stinky cheese odor constitutes substantial interference. Therefore, Donna may satisfy the substantial interference requirement based on the stinky cheese as well as the retaliation.

(3) Notice

Donna gave Perry notice of the problems with the shower and the stinky cheese as evidenced by Perry's recognition of her complaints. Donna gave Perry a total of five weeks to resolve the problems about which she complained. Perry refused to resolve the issues. Therefore, the notice and time to repair requirements are satisfied.

(4) Vacate

Donna moved out of the premises and returned the keys in a timely manner.

Conclusion--Constructive Eviction Satisfied

Based on the foregoing, Donna has satisfied the requirements for constructive eviction and will not be liable for past due or future due rent for the remainder of the lease. She is not liable for past due rent because she stopped paying at or after the time the constructive eviction arose--namely, when Perry started retaliating after already refusing to repair the hot shower. She is not liable for future rent because she has been constructively evicted and moved out by that time.

Absence of Equitable Defenses

Perry may claim equitable defenses such as laches or unclean hands, but Donna moved out timely and did not have unclean hands. Rather she demonstrated good faith by giving notice and returning the keys and moving out in a peaceable fashion.

Duty to Mitigate/Avoidable Consequences

Even assuming that Donna moved out wrongfully, when a tenant wrongfully vacates premises, the landlord has three options (1) treat the tenant's vacation as a voluntary surrender and accept without demanding further rent, (2) re-let the premises [to] someone else as an act of mitigation and sue the tenant for the unpaid rent, (3) only in a minority of jurisdictions, ignore the tenant's act and sue for damages for past and future due rent. As a general/majority rule, and the rule reflected in the second option, a landlord must attempt to re-let premises in order to obtain damages that would otherwise be considered avoidable. Any damages that could reasonably have been avoided by mitigation will not be awarded to the landlord.

Here, Perry attempted to hold Donna liable for the entire twenty-two months remaining on the lease. None of those money damages are recoverable because Perry could reasonably have avoided those damages by leasing the premises to Donna's friend.

Conclusion

Donna has successful defenses based on constructive eviction and failure to mitigate damages.

Q1 Criminal Law and Procedure

Vicky operates a successful retail computer sales business out of the garage of her house. Vicky told Dan that she intended to go on vacation some days later. Dan subsequently informed Eric of Vicky's intended vacation and of his plan to take all of her computers while she was away. Eric told Dan that he wanted nothing to do with taking the computers, but that Dan could borrow his pickup truck if Dan needed it to carry the computers away.

While Vicky was scheduled to be away on vacation, Dan borrowed Eric's pickup truck. Late that night, Dan drove the truck over to Vicky's house. When he arrived, he went into the garage by pushing a partially open side door all the way open. Vicky, who had returned home early from her vacation, was awakened by noise in her garage, opened the door connecting the garage to the house, and stepped into the garage. When she saw Dan loading computers into the back of the truck, she stepped between Dan and the truck and yelled, "Stop, thief!"

Dan pushed Vicky out of the way, ran to the truck, and drove off. He immediately went to Fred's house where he told Fred what had happened. In exchange for two of the computers, Fred allowed Dan to hide the truck behind Fred's house.

What crimes, if any, have Dan, Eric, and/or Fred committed? Discuss.

Answer A

I. Dan's Crimes

By plotting to break into Vicky's home to steal her computers and then actually doing so, Dan committed the crimes of burglary, larceny, robbery, and battery. He may have also conspired to commit burglary and/or larceny with Eric.

Burglary

At common law, burglary was defined as the unlawful breaking and entering of the dwelling house of another at night with the intent to commit a felony therein. Most modern jurisdictions have amended the elements to include burglary of any structure and have not limited it to nighttime burglaries.

Here, Dan committed burglary when he entered Vicky's home to steal the computers.

Breaking and Entering

Burglary requires that the burglar break and enter into the structure. "Breaking" constitutes any form of forcible entry, including pushing open a partially open door. "Entry" requires physical entry by any part of the burglar's body or a tool under his control.

Here, Dan pushed a partially open side door to V's garage fully open in order to gain entry. This is evidence of breaking. Further, Dan entered the garage, which is a part of Vicky's residence. Thus, the elements of breaking and entering are satisfied.

Structure of Another

Dan entered into Vicky's garage, both the location of her retail sales business and part of her home (her dwelling place). This is sufficient to constitute a protected structure for purposes of burglary, which belonged to another (Vicky). Therefore, this element is met.

With the Intent to Commit a Felony Therein

Burglary requires the intent to commit a felony (or a misdemeanor in some jurisdictions) inside the structure at the time of the breaking and entering.

In this case, Dan had the intent to commit larceny of Vicky's computers when he entered her garage. He had previously expressed this desire to Eric, and nothing in the facts suggests he changed is mind prior to entering. In fact, his actions of actually taking the computers demonstrates that the intent was present.

Therefore, Dan committed burglary.

Larceny

Larceny at common law was the trespassory taking and carrying away of the personal property of another with the intent to permanently deprive the victim of the property.

Trespassory

Trespass is the unpriviliged, nonconsensual invasion of another's protected space.

Here, Dan did not have the consent of Vicky to enter the garage at night and therefore his decision to do so was a trespass. While Dan might argue it was not trespassing because Vicky opened her business up to the public and her business was located in the garage, this argument will fail because he clearly did not have implied or actual authorization to force his way into the garage at night when Vicky was not operating her business and was in fact supposed to be on vacation.

Asportation

Asportation is the taking and carrying away of another's property. For larceny purposes, even slight movement of the property is sufficient.

In this case, Dan took computers from Vicky's garage, loaded them into his truck and drove off with them. Thus, he moved the computers and this element is satisfied.

Personal Property of Another

The computers were the tangible, moveable personal property of Vicky and her business. The computers did not belong to Dan and he had no claim of right to the computers. Therefore, this element is satisfied.

Intent to Permanently Deprive

At the time of the taking, the defendant in a larceny case must have the intent to permanently deprive the owner of the property.

Here, Dan had the intent to permanently deprive because he planned to steal the computers and presumably sell them for value. Nothing in the facts indicates a contrary intent on Dan's part, so this element is satisfied.

Therefore, Dan also committed larceny.

Robbery

Common-law robbery requires that the defendant take and carry away the personal property of another from their person or presence by force or threat of force, with the intent to permanently deprive.

The requirements that Dan took and carried away the computers belonging to Vicky with the intent to permanently deprive have been described above. The remaining elements follow.

Person or Presence

Robbery requires that the items be taken from the victim's person or presence, which has been broadly defined to include anything the victim is holding or, indoors, items from the same room that the victim was in at the time of the taking.

Here, Vicky was present in the garage when Dan loaded some of her computers into the truck. In fact, she stepped between Dan and the truck as he was attempting to flee with the computers, so it suggests that she was immediately present when her property was taken. Therefore, this element is likely satisfied because the computers were taken from within a very close proximity to Vicky. As such, they were taken from her immediate presence.

Force or Threat of Force

A robber must use physical force or threaten to use physical force to commit robbery.

Here, as he was attempting to flee, Dan physically pushed Vicky out of the way. Shoving another person is physical force, which Dan used to accomplish and complete his taking of Vicky's computers.

Dan will argue that he did not accomplish the taking by force because he already had the computers in his possession before Vicky confronted him. He will defend by saying that the force was only used to effectuate his escape, and not the robbery itself. However, because the robbery would not have succeeded but for the physical force to the victim, it's likely to satisfy the requirement of forcible robbery.

For those reasons, Dan also robbed Vicky.

Battery

Battery is the intentional unlawful application of physical force to another person. Battery is a general intent crime, meaning there is no requirement that the defendant intend to cause injury to the victim. He must only intend to commit the physical action that constitutes the force.

Here, Dan physically shoved Vicky out of the way as he was escaping. He intended to complete the shoving action because it allowed him to get Vicky out of his way and proceed to the truck. Therefore, Dan committed a battery.

Conspiracy to Commit Burglary/Larceny

Conspiracy is an inchoate offense that required at common law an agreement between two or more people to accomplish the same unlawful objective with the intent to complete that objective. Many jurisdictions require proof of an "overt act" to establish conspiracy. In a majority of states, only bilateral conspiracies are permissible, but a minority of states recognize the idea of a "unilateral conspiracy," where the defendant believes he is conspiring with another "guilty mind" who in fact shares a different objective.

The prosecution may attempt to argue here that Dan conspired with Eric to rob Vicky because he discussed his plans with Eric in advance and Eric loaned Dan his truck for purposes of the robbery. However, as will be addressed below, it is not clear that Eric had the intent for the robbery to be completed. If Eric lacked the requisite intent to accomplish the robbery, then Dan can only be convicted of conspiracy in a jurisdiction that recognizes unilateral conspiracy.

II. Eric's Crimes

Conspiracy to Commit Burglary/Larceny

The issue is whether Eric had the intent to enter into an agreement with Dan for an illegal purpose (the burglary/larceny) and if Eric intended for the illegal object to transpire as planned. Here, the facts suggest that Eric lacked that intent, so he is likely not guilty of conspiracy.

The prosecution will argue that Eric's decision to loan his truck to Dan knowing that Dan intended to use it to burglarize Vicky's business is evidence that Eric conspired to commit that crime. However, Eric specifically told Dan that he wanted "nothing to do with taking the computers." Although the prudence of nonetheless letting Dan use his truck to commit the robbery is questionable, the facts do not prove that Eric intended to participate in the burglary or that he shared Dan's goal for the burglary to succeed. He may have been indifferent to the theft being committed or even favorable to the idea, but this is not persuasive evidence that he intended for Dan to succeed in the burglary. Since the prosecution will have the burden to show intent beyond a reasonable doubt, this is unlikely to be a persuasive argument.

Therefore, it's likely that neither Dan nor Eric could be convicted of conspiracy.

Accomplice Liability

An accomplice is someone who aids, abets, counsels or encourages the principal to commit a crime with the intent that the principal succeed. A majority of jurisdictions hold accomplices liable for all reasonably foreseeable crimes that the principal committed.

Burglary and Larceny

Here, Eric was likely an accomplice to the burglary and larceny committed by Dan, and he should be convicted of those offenses. By offering to let Dan use his truck to carry away the computers after he stole them, Eric aided Dan by giving him a getaway vehicle. Without Eric's participation in loaning Dan his truck, it's not clear that Dan would have been able to commit the crimes. Therefore, if it was foreseeable that Dan would commit burglary and larceny, Eric is liable therefor.

In this case, Eric knew that Dan intended to enter Vicky's business and take her computers. Therefore, he was personally informed of Dan's intent to commit larceny and burglary. In fact, he specifically told Dan that he could use Eric's truck "if Dan needed it to carry the computers away." Therefore, Dan is liable as an accomplice to burglary and larceny.

Robbery

Eric will argue he is not an accomplice to the robbery of Vicky because it was unforeseeable that Vicky would be home and therefore that Dan would take anything from her person or presence. He will claim that he thought Vicky was on vacation, and that therefore, the most that Dan could be guilty of is burglary and/or larceny.

On balance, however, this argument is likely to fail. Eric had no personal knowledge of Vicky's travel plans, and by agreeing to lend Dan his truck for the purposes of escaping with Vicky's computers, he assumed the risk that Dan might have erred in determining Vicky's travel plans. Further, because the business was in Vicky's garage and therefore on her property, it would not be unforeseeable that someone might be either on Vicky's property for business purposes or that someone else besides Vicky was living there. As such, the presence of another person was reasonably foreseeable, and so was the robbery of the computers from that person's presence.

Eric is therefore guilty of robbery as an accomplice.

Battery

Similarly, Eric will argue that it was not reasonably foreseeable that Dan would commit battery against Vicky because he didn't even know that Vicky would be present. For the reasons discussed above, this argument will likely fail. Committing a home invasion always carries with it inherent risks that someone will be present, and breaking into a business carries similar concerns. It was foreseeable that Vicky or another person might be there during the burglary, and therefore, that Dan might use force against them in order to effectuate his escape.

As such, Eric is guilty as an accomplice to battery.

III. Fred's Crimes

Accessory After the Fact

Most jurisdictions will label an individual who aids, abets, counsels or encourages a criminal in avoiding apprehension to be an "accessory after the fact" if they did not play any role in the crimes before they happened. Such a defendant is an accomplice, but is generally only punished for his own behavior in obstructing justice rather than the crimes of the principal.

Here, Fred knew that the computers Dan brought to his home were stolen from Vicky by Dan. Nonetheless, in exchange for two of them, he agreed to let Dan hide his truck on Fred's property. This action aided Dan in covering up the crime and aiding detection. Hiding the getaway vehicle that Vicky had seen Dan driving away increased the chances that Dan would get away with the theft of her property, and therefore Fred acted as an accessory after the fact.

Receipt of Stolen Property

If the jurisdiction in this case recognizes knowing receipt of stolen property as a criminal offense, Fred is likely guilty of that crime as well.

Dan specifically informed Fred that the computers were stolen, but Fred agreed to take them in exchange for hiding Dan's truck. Therefore, the scienter requirement is met here because Fred had firsthand knowledge of the computers' stolen status but agreed to take them into his possession.

Answer B

Dan's criminal liability:

Burglary:

Burglary is the breaking and entering at nighttime into the dwelling house of another with the intent to commit a felony therein.

Breaking and Entering:

A person must physically enter the dwelling house of another to commit a burglary. Here, Dan entered into the garage of Vicky's house by pushing a partially open side door all the way open. Although he did not literally break anything to enter into the garage because the door was already open, this element is still met. Only the slightest movement is required to "break" into the house. The door need not be locked either. Thus, by pushing the partially opened door to the garage open and subsequently entering the garage, Dan committed a breaking and entering.

At nighttime:

Although modern statutes have eliminated the requirement that a burglary be committed at night, the common law crime of burglary required that the burglary happen at night. Here, the facts indicate that Dan drove over to Vicky's house at nighttime. Thus, the common law element and any modern statutory elements are met.

Dwelling house of another:

The common law definition of burglary required that the breaking and entering be of the dwelling house of another, that is, where the person lived and slept. Modern statutes have expanded this element to include any structure such as an office building. Here, Dan broke into the garage of Vicky's house. Vicky did not sleep in her garage, but she did conduct her computer business out of her garage and frequently spent time in there. Additionally, the garage was connected to the house by the door that Vicky entered when she heard the noise. Thus, the garage is part of Vicky's dwelling house, and this element is met under the common law definition of burglary. The element is also met under a modern statutory definition because a garage would be considered a structure.

Intent to commit a felony therein:

A person must have an intent to commit a felony inside the dwelling house at the time that they committed the breaking and entering. Here, when Dan learned that Vicky was going away on vacation, he informed Eric that he planned to take all of her computers. Thus, Dan intended to commit larceny, analyzed below, once he broke into Vicky's house. He had this intent at the time he pushed the partially open side door. Thus, Dan had the requisite intent to commit a felony once inside the garage, and his intent was simultaneous with his breaking and entering.

Because Dan broke and entered into Vicky's garage, at nighttime, with the intent to commit a larceny, he has committed burglary.

Larceny:

Larceny is the trespassory taking and carrying away of the personal property of another with the intent to permanently deprive.

Trespassory taking and carrying away:

A person must take the personal property from the possession of another and move the property, if only the slightest bit. Here, Dan loaded Vicky's computers into the back of the truck. The computers were in Vicky's possession because they were stored in her garage as part of her retail computer sales business. Thus, Dan has met the element of a trespassory taking and carry away

Personal Property of another:

Here, the computers belonged to Vicky as she ran a retail computer business out of her garage. Thus, this element is met.

Intent to Permanent Deprive:

A person must intend to permanently deprive the victim of the possession of the personal property or act knowing that there actions will result in a substantial risk of loss. Dan intent to take all of her computers, which he told Eric. Although the facts do not indicate what he was going to do with the computers once he took them, it is unlikely that he was going to return them to Vicky, especially after he pushed her out of the way and drove off with them. Thus, Dan acted with the intent to permanently deprive Vicky of the computers. Because all the element for larceny are met, Dan committed larceny when he took Vicky's computers.

Robbery:

Robbery is the trespassory taking and carrying away of the personal property of another by the use or threat of force from the person of another. Here, Dan took the computers from Vicky's garage and loaded them into his truck meeting the requirement of a trespassory taking and carrying away. The computers where Vicky's personal property, which she stored in her garage. Although Dan though Vicky was away when he entered the garage, Vicky heard him and stepping into the garage as Dan was loading the computers into the back of the truck. She stepped in between Dan and the truck, at which point Dan pushed her. Although the computers were not on Vicky's person, the computers were in the immediate area. When she yelled at Dan, he pushed her by using force. Therefore, Dan used force to take the computers from the area in Vicky's immediate control. Because of the use of force when he took Vicky's computer, he has committed robbery as well.

Battery:

Battery is the unlawful application of force on the person of another, committed with the intent to cause the application of force to another. Here, Dan pushed Vicky out of the way when she stepped in between him and the truck. This was the unlawful application of force on Vicky. He acted with the intent to push Vicky out of the way because he was trying to move her to escape. Thus, Dan committed a battery as well.

Eric's Criminal Liability:

Conspiracy:

A conspiracy is the agreement of two or more person for an unlawful objective, with the intent that the unlawful objective be obtained. Additionally, statutes now include that an overt act be committed in furtherance of the conspiracy. Here, Dan told Eric of his plan to take all of Vicky's computers while she was away on vacation. Eric told Dan that he wanted nothing to do with the theft although he let Dan borrow his truck knowing Dan would use the truck to take the computers away. Eric did not agree with Dan to commit the burglary of Vicky's home. He did not have the same unlawful as Dan. Although he handed Dan his keys, which would qualify as an overt act, he did not have the intent to burglarize Vicky's home and steal her computers. Thus, he did not enter an agreement with Dan for the unlawful purpose of stealing from Vicky. Eric is not liable for conspiracy.

Accomplice Liability:

An accomplice to a crime aids, encourages, counsels, or abets a person committing the crime, with the intent that the person commit the target crime. Here, Eric gave Dan his keys to his pickup truck so that Dan could use the truck to move the computers. This was aid to the principal, Dan, who actually committed the burglary because Dan was able to move the computers once he could use Eric's truck. Although Eric wanted nothing to do with Dan taking the computer away, he told Dan that he could borrow his truck if he needed it to carry the computers away. Thus, although Eric did not want to actually take part in the burglary, he acted knowing that burglary would take place. He knew that Dan would use the truck to burglarize Vicky's house. Eric had the requisite intent for accomplice liability. Because he both aided Dan in committing the crime against Vicky, and acted with the intent to aid Dan, Eric is liable as an accomplice.

Vicarious Liability for the Target Crime:

An accomplice is liable for the crimes committed by the principal if the principal's crimes were foreseeable. It was completely foreseeable that once Eric gave Dan the keys to his car, Dan would steal all of Vicky's computers and Dan would use Eric's truck to move them. Additionally, it was foreseeable that Vicky might be home even though she told Dan that she would be on vacation; it is possible that her vacation plans had to be cancelled, as it turned out. If Vicky or anyone else was in the house, it was foreseeable that Dan would use some measure of force to take the computers. Thus, Eric is liable for Dan's crimes of burglary, larceny, robbery and battery because all of these crimes were foreseeable once Eric gave Dan his keys to his truck knowing Dan would try and steal the computers.

Fred's Criminal Liability:

Accessory after the fact:

Under the common law, accomplices were liable as accomplices in the first degree or in the second degree based on how they aided the principal and when their aid occurred. Modernly, a person who aids a felon in his escape is liable as an accessory after the fact. This is a separate crime, and an accessory is not liable for the principal's target crime. Here, Dan immediately went to Fred's house after he drove off from Vicky's house. He immediately told Fred what he had done. Thus, Fred knew that Dan was a felon and that he was trying to escape after he stole Vicky's computers. He aided Dan because he allowed Dan to hide the truck behind Fred's house. This would make it harder for the police to spot that truck that Vicky would report, and thus help Dan in his escape. Fred is liable as an accessory after the fact. Unlike Eric who acted as an accomplice, Fred's liability as an accessory does not mean that he is also liable for the separate crimes that Dan committed.

Receipt of Stolen Property:

Receipt of stolen property requires that the person receive, buy, or accept property knowing that the property was stolen. Here, Dan immediately told Fred what he had done once he arrived at Fred's house. Fred was aware that the computers belonged to Vicky, and that Dan had just unlawfully taken them from Vicky's garage. When Fred accepted two of the stolen computers in exchange for allowing Dan to hide his truck behind Fred's house, he accepted the property knowing that it was stolen from Vicky.
Thus, Fred is criminally liable for the crime of receipt of stolen property.

Q2 Civil Procedure

Doctor performed surgery on Perry's spine to insert a metal rod designed by Bolton, Inc. (Bolton). Shortly after the surgery, Perry developed severe back pain at the location where the rod was inserted. Within the applicable statute of limitations for a tort action for negligence, Perry sued Doctor in federal district court, alleging that she was negligent in using Bolton's rod for the kind of back condition from which he suffered. Personal jurisdiction, subject matter jurisdiction, and venue were proper.

During a deposition, Perry's attorney asked Doctor to state whether she had performed any other spine surgeries using Bolton's rods and, if so, whether any of those surgeries had resulted in complications. Doctor's attorney objected to the questions on the ground that the information requested had nothing to do with whether Doctor was negligent as to Perry, and Doctor refused to answer. After the attorneys properly met and conferred concerning Doctor's refusal, Perry's attorney filed a motion to compel Doctor to answer the questions.

Shortly after the statute of limitations had run, Perry learned through a newspaper article that Bolton had been sued by several patients who alleged that they suffered severe back pain after Bolton's rod was inserted into their spines during surgery. Perry immediately sought and obtained leave to amend his federal complaint to join and include a claim against Bolton, alleging that it had negligently designed the rod. Bolton immediately filed a motion to dismiss Perry's claim against it on the ground that the statute of limitations had already run.

Perry also learned that Doctor had lost a lawsuit brought by another patient with a back condition like his who had also alleged negligence by Doctor for inserting Bolton's rod into his spine. Perry filed a motion for summary judgment against Doctor on the basis of preclusion.

1. How should the court rule on Perry's motion to compel Doctor to answer? Discuss.

2. How should the court rule on Bolton's motion to dismiss Perry's claim on the ground that the statute of limitations had run? Discuss.

3. How should the court rule on Perry's motion for summary judgment? Discuss.

Answer A

Perry v. Doctor

1. Perry's Motion to Compel Doctor to Answer

Discovery provides fact-gathering tools for parties to obtain relevant evidence to the case. The scope of discovery is broad but not limitless. A party may only discover relevant evidence/information or facts reasonably calculated to lead to relevant evidence/information. However, a party may not discover privileged information. Therefore, the scope is broader than evidence admissibility as not only relevant evidence is discoverable, but also those that provide a good lead to relevant information. Deposition is one of these fact-gathering tools.

During a deposition, typically there is not judge present, but attorneys should still make proper objections for the future purpose of excluding any answers at trial. If an attorney does not make an objection during deposition to a question or an answer, it is considered waived and the same question cannot be objected to in the future. If the opposing attorney later wishes to admit the objected question and/or answer at trial, the judge will determine whether the attorney's objections at the deposition should be sustained or overruled. At the deposition, because there is no judge present to determine the objection, the witness must still answer because, as stated above, all relevant evidence or facts reasonable calculated to lead to relevant evidence/information is discoverable. One deposed does not have to answer a question unless the answer would reveal privileged information.

Here, Perry's attorney asked Doctor to state whether she had performed any other spine surgeries using Bolton's rods, and if so, whether any of those surgeries had resulted in complications. Doctor's attorney objected on the basis of relevance - asserting that the information requested had nothing to do with whether Doctor was negligent as to Perry, so Doctor refused to answer. The question asked is a relevant question because Perry is suing Doctor for negligence. In this case, Doctor performed surgery on Perry's spine to insert a metal rod designed by Bolton. Shortly after the surgery, Perry developed severe back pain where the rod was inserted. If Doctor has performed similar surgeries with the same Bolton's rods in the past and those have also resulted in complications, that would be relevant to the question of Doctor's duty and breach of duty. For example, if Doctor had performed similar surgeries and had resulted in complications, then a reasonable doctor with similar skill, knowledge and experience as another doctor in the same field of profession may decide to no longer use Bolton's rods or to improve or change his technique so as to avoid future surgical complications. The answer to this question could reasonably lead to Perry's attorney finding other patients for relevant information and may also discover the techniques used during those surgeries. Thus, the information is relevant and reasonably calculated to lead to relevant information. Thus, this information is discoverable, and the Doctor must answer. Because the attorneys properly met and conferred concerning Doctor's refusal to answer and could not come to an agreement, the motion to compel was properly filed. The court should grant Perry's motion to compel Doctor to answer.

Doctor may argue that revealing such information would violate doctor-patient confidentiality, thus privileged information. However, the question simply asked whether Doctor had performed other spine surgeries using Bolton's rods, and whether any of those surgeries had resulted in complications. The answer only requires a yes or no answer. The answer would not require Doctor to reveal any patient's names or medical conditions. Thus, Doctor's argument would fail.

The court should grant Perry's motion to compel.

2. Motion to Dismiss Perry's Claim on the ground that Statute of Limitations had run

Assuming that this is a diversity of citizenship case in federal court (because negligence is typically not a federal question), the Federal court must apply the Erie doctrine where Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (FRCP) for procedure and apply state law for substantive law. Courts have established that in a diversity case, the state statute of limitations must be used as that is considered substantive law. Under FRCP, a party has 14 days to amend a complaint after original filing.

To amend a complaint after the statute of limitations had run, the complaint must relate back to the original complaint that was filed before the statute of limitations had run. To relate back to the original complaint while adding a defendant on the amended complaint, 3 elements must be satisfied: 1) the claim arises out of the same transaction or occurrence as the original complaint, 2) the new party knew of the original action within 120 days of filing, and 3) the new party, but for the mistake, knew that they should have been named as the original party.

Here, the original complaint was filed in federal district court within the applicable statute of limitations for a tort action for negligence. Perry alleges that Doctor was negligent in using Bolton's rod for the kind of back condition from which he suffered.

Same transaction or occurrence

The amended complaint includes a claim that alleged that Bolton negligently designed the rod. Because Perry was suing Doctor for negligence for using Bolton's rod during surgery for Perry's kind of back condition, the new claim against Bolton arises out of the same occurrence because they both arose out of Doctor's surgery and inserting Bolton's rod. Thus, this element is satisfied.

New party knew of original action

It is unclear whether Bolton knew of the original action where Perry sued Doctor for negligence. If doctors are sued based on products they used on patients, it is not unusual that doctors would seek indemnification or contribution from the manufacturers of those products. Thus, if Doctor informed Bolton of Perry's lawsuit (or if Bolton somehow was aware of it) within 120 days of filing, then this element is satisfied. Otherwise, this element is not satisfied.

But for the mistake, Bolton knew they should have been named

There is no indication that Perry had originally wanted to file a claim against Bolton. Perry's original claim was that Doctor negligently used Bolton's rods for his type of injury, thus alleging that Bolton's rods were wrongly used. Perry did not allege that anything was actually wrong with the rod itself. Therefore, there appears to be no mistake regarding the identity of the defendant. In fact, there is no facts to suggest that Perry had even considered suing Bolton for negligence until Perry learned through a newspaper article that Bolton had been sued by several patients who alleged that they suffered severe back pain after Bolton's rod was inserted into their spines during surgery. Clearly, Perry did not make a mistake as to the defendant when he filed the original claim prior to reading this newspaper. Only after reading the newspaper did he "immediately sought" to amend his complaint. The evidence shows that there is no mistake as to the identity of the defendant in Perry's suit.

Even if Bolton was aware of the suit, no indications on the claim would lead Bolton to believe that Doctor had originally meant to sue Bolton instead of Doctor. Therefore, this element is not satisfied.

The court should grant Bolton's motion to dismiss because the applicable statute of limitations had run and the amended complaint does not relate back.

3. Perry's Motion for Summary Judgment

Motion for summary judgment will be granted if the court determines there is no dispute of fact in the case. The court may look at evidence when making such a determination.

Claim Preclusion (res judicata)

To assert claim preclusion, 3 elements must be satisfied: 1) same claimaint vs. same defendant in both case #1 and #2, 2) case #1 ended in a valid final judgment on the merit (which means it did not end based on jurisdiction, venue or indispensable party), and 3) the claimant is asserting the same claim as case #1 (same claim usually means arises out of the same transaction or occurrence).

The first lawsuit was brought by another patient, not Perry. Thus, the first element requiring the same claimant and defendant fails because Perry was not the plaintiff in the first case, as he is in the second case. Although it appears that case #1 ended in valid final judgment on the merits, case #1 did not assert the same claim because it is not the same transaction or occurrence. The previous patient's claim arises under his individual surgery, and Perry's claim arises out of his own separate surgery. Thus, claim preclusion should not be asserted.

Issue preclusion (collateral estoppel)

To assert collateral estoppel, 5 elements must be satisfied: 1) case #1 ended in a valid final judgment on the merits, 2) the issue was actually litigated in case #1, 3) the issue was essential to the judgment (if the issue was decided differently, the case would have ended differently), 4) collateral estoppel is being used against one who was a party in case #1, and 5) collateral estoppel is being used by one who was a party in case #1 (satisfies mutuality requirement in those jurisdictions who require it), one who was not a party in case #1 but is a defendant in case #2 if plaintiff actually litigated the issue in case #1, and one who was not a party in case #1 but is a plaintiff in case #2 if it is fair. Collateral estoppel may be used by nonparties in case #1 because many jurisdictions have found that not complying the mutuality requirement does not violate due process.

Valid Final Judgment

No facts suggest that the first case did not end in final valid judgment on the merit. No facts state that case #1 ended based on jurisdiction, venue or indispensable party. Thus, if it did not end in one of these bases, then it ended in valid final judgment, and this element is satisfied.

Issue actually litigated

The facts state that "Doctor had lost a lawsuit brought by another patient... who also alleged negligence for inserting Bolton's rod into his spine." Therefore, it appears that the issue of negligence was actually litigated. If it was, this element is satisfied.

Issue essential to judgment

Because the previous patient brought an action based on negligence, the issue of negligence was likely essential, and if the court or jury in case #1 had found Doctor not to be negligent, then the outcome of case #1 would have been different. Thus, this element is satisfied.

Used against party in case #1

Perry is asserting issue preclusion against Doctor, who was the defendant in case #1 because in the previous case, Doctor was sued by another patient. Doctor is a current defendant in Perry's case and was a defendant in case #1. Thus, this element is satisfied.

Used by nonparty in case #1 but plaintiff in case #2

For Perry to assert issue preclusion, the use of issue preclusion must be fair. Here, Perry would argue that it is fair because the previous plaintiff/patient's injuries had a back condition like Perry's and Doctor inserted the same Bolton's rod into his spine, just like Doctor did with Perry. However, this argument would likely fail. Doctor would argue that although the previous patient in case #1 had a "back condition like" Perry's, medical conditions/injuries, especially back injuries, are almost never exactly the same. Its causes may be different and its symptoms may be different, which would call for different treatment. Thus, even if Perry and the previous patient had similar injuries, its causes, symptoms and other factors may require Doctor to use different technique or treatment. Or even if the same technique was used, each patient may react different based on the patient's physiology even without any negligence on the part of Doctor. Therefore, it would not be fair to preclude Doctor from litigating the issue of negligence in Perry's case based on Perry's injuries/condition, causes of Perry's injuries/medical condition, and techniques used during Perry's surgery. Because it would be unfair to preclude Doctor from litigating the issue of negligence in Perry's lawsuit, this element is not satisfied.

Thus, the court should deny Perry's motion for summary judgment.

Answer B

1- Motion to compel Doctor (D) to answer
Scope of discovery- relevance

During discovery, both parties to a lawsuit may engage in discovery through depositions, interrogatories, requests for production, requests for admissions, and other discovery devices any evidence that is relevant to the lawsuit. Relevance is a low standard and it just requires that the evidence sought to be discovered be likely to lead to the discovery of any admissible evidence relevant to a claim or defense in the subject case. Here, Perry (P) is bringing a lawsuit against D for negligence. Negligence is a tort action that requires the plaintiff to establish 1) duty, 2) breach, 3) actual causation, 4) proximate causation, and 5) damages.

Here, P is seeking discovery of whether D had performed any other spine surgeries using Bolton's rods, and if so, whether any of these surgeries resulted in complications. Although D is arguing that this information has nothing to do with whether D was negligent as to Perry, this evidence is relevant to the issues of duty and breach- which P will have to establish as part of his prima facie negligence lawsuit.

Although this information does not involve P, it is relevant to duty because it helps determine what standard of care D should be held to. A physician is typically held to the standard of care of an average member of his profession in good standing. Thus, D will be held to the standard of care of an average back surgeon in good standing. Here, if D in fact used Bolton's rods before and these surgery's resulted in complications, this would indicate that D should have warned P about these complications. An average back surgeon in good standing would warn his patients of complications that occurred when the doctor performed similar surgeries on other patients.

This information is also relevant to breach. In order to establish breach, a plaintiff has to establish that the defendant fell below the applicable standard of care. Here, if other spine surgeries using the same rod had led to complications, this would be relevant to whether D fell below his standard of care because either he did not inform P of these complications (which he should of done) or because he in fact used this rod for the spine surgery knowing that it had a potential to lead to complications.

Thus, the evidence that P is seeking is relevant to his negligence theory and should have been discoverable.

Privilege/ work product

Relevant evidence is discoverable unless there the party against whom the discovery is sought can claim a privilege such as doctor-patient confidentiality or work product privilege. Here, D will have to answer P's request unless he can claim either of these privileges.

Although many jurisdictions, including CA, recognize the doctor-patient privilege, the federal courts do not. Here, P is suing D in federal district court thus the doctor-patient privilege does not apply and D will not be able to assert it to avoid his discovery obligations to P.

Work product privilege protects the work of the attorney and parties that is down in anticipation of litigation. Here, there is no indication that D's attorney complied a list of other spine surgeries in anticipation of this litigation, thus D will not be able to claim the work product privilege.

Conclusion

Because the evidence as to other spine surgery complications is relevant to P's negligence claim against D and not subject to any privilege, the court should grant P's motion to compel D to answer his deposition question.

2-Motion to dismiss on ground that statute of limitations (SOL) had run

Generally, a plaintiff must file his complaint with all claims and all defendants within the applicable SOL. There are 2 limited exceptions, outlined below, where there plaintiff may 1) add a new claim and 2) add a new defendant after the SOL has run. In these situations, the new claim/ new defendant will "relate back" to the original complaint and the date that this original complaint was filed. This way, if the original complaint was filed within the applicable SOL, the plaintiff will be able to avoid the SOL problem with his new claim/ defendant.

Here, P filed a suit against doctor within the applicable SOL, thus whether P can add the claim against Bolton depends on whether it "relates back."

Relation back- Amendment of pleadings to add a claim

A plaintiff may amend his complaint to add a new claim after the SOL has run if the claim arises out of the same transaction or occurrence as his original claim against the original defendant. Here, P wants to add a claim against Bolton based on negligent design of the rod. P's original claim is against the doctor for negligence in using this rod. Thus, P's claim against Bolton arises out of the same transaction or occurrence as his original complaint- both the new claim against Bolton and the original claim against D arise out of the back surgery/ rod insertion that led to P's severe back pain. Thus, P will be able to amend his complaint to add this claim.

Relation back- Amendment of pleadings to add a defendant

A plaintiff may amend his complaint to add a new defendant after the SOL has run only in very limited circumstances. The plaintiff must establish 1) that his claim against this new defendant arises from the same transaction or occurrence as the original complaint, 2) that the new defendant knew about the original action within 120 days of its filing, and 3) that the defendant knew that, but for a mistake, he would have been originally named in the plaintiff's original complaint.

Here, P wants to include a claim against Bolton, alleging that it had negligently designed the rod that D placed in his back during the spin surgery. P's original claim is against the doctor for negligence in using this rod. Thus, P's claim against Bolton arises out of the same transaction or occurrence as his original complaint- both the new claim against Bolton and the original claim against D arise out of the back surgery/ rod insertion that led to P's severe back pain. Thus, this first element is satisfied.

Here, P will also have to establish that Bolton knew about his claim against D within 120 days of its filing. Here, there is no indication that Bolton received a copy of P's complaint against D or had any notice that P brought a claim against D as a result of his surgery. Thus, unless P can establish that Bolton knew about the lawsuit, he will not be able to establish this element.

Here, P will also have to establish that Bolton knew that he made a mistake and that he would have originally named Bolton but for the mistake. Here, P will try to argue that Bolton had been sued by several other patients who alleged that they suffered severe back pain after Bolton's rod was inserted during spine surgery. Thus, P will argue that Bolton knew that P should have filed the lawsuit against it. However, P will not be able to establish this element. P did not make a mistake and negligently name the wrong defendant- rather, he named Doctor who is likely a proper defendant and then subsequently named Bolton after he learned more information. He did not even learn this information through discovery/ deposition of Doctor- he learned it by reading a newspaper article. This is not a situation where the plaintiff completely puts the wrong name in the applicable line of his complaint. P did not make a mistake at the time of his complaint and rather learned about a potential claim against Bolton too late. He will be barred by the SOL.

Conclusion

Here, P's new claim will relate back to his original complaint. However, his addition of Bolton as a new defendant will not relate back to the original complaint and P will not be able to add his claim against Bolton. Thus, the court should grant Bolton's motion to dismiss P's claim on the ground that the SOL had run.

3- Motion for summary judgment based on preclusion

A motion for summary judgment requires the moving party to establish 1) there is no genuine dispute of material fact and 2) he is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Preclusion is a common ground for a motion for summary judgment because it involves the judgments of prior lawsuits so there is genuinely no dispute as to material fact (the outcome of these lawsuits).

Res judicata/ claim preclusion

Res judicata (RJ) bars a subsequent lawsuit (lets call it case 2) when there is a prior lawsuit (call it case 1) and 1) case 1 and case 2 involve the exact same parties (the exact same plaintiff and the exact same defendant), 2) case 1 ended in a final judgment on the merits, and 3) case 2 involves the same transaction or occurrence as case 1.

Here, P will not be able to assert RJ against Doctor. Here, case 1 is the lawsuit brought by another patient against Doctor. Case 1 involved a negligence action for inserting a Bolton rod into his back. Although P's lawsuit (case 2) is very similar, RJ will not apply because P was not a party to the prior case 1. RJ requires the exact same persons to be parties to both the first case and the second case. Although D was a party to the first case, P was not, thus he will not be able to assert RJ against D.

Collateral estoppel/ issue preclusion

Collateral estoppel (CE) bars a subsequent lawsuit (case 2) when 1) case 1 and case 2 involve the same issue, 2) this issue was actually litigated and decided in case 1, 3) this issue was essential to the judgment in case 1, 4) issue preclusion is being asserted in case 2 against a party who was a party in case 1, and 5) traditionally, is being asserted by a party who was a party in case 1 (mutual collateral estoppel) but modernly, does not to be asserted by a party who was a party in case 1 (non mutual collateral estoppel).

Here, case 1 (the lawsuit by the other patient) and case 2 (P's negligence suit against D) will likely involve similar issues. They are both negligence suits so they will both have issues such as 1) what was the defendant doctor's standard of care? 2) did the defendant breach this standard of care by installing a Bolton rod in his patient's spine, 3) did the insertation of the Bolton rod cause the patient to suffer subsequent back pain, etc. Thus, case 1 and case 2 will involve many of the same issues, and this first element will be satisfied.

Because Doctor lost the first negligence lawsuit, many of these issues will also have been litigated and decided, thus there are a number of issues which will have been actually litigated and decided in case 1, thus P will likely be able to satisfy the second element of CE.

Similarly, many of these issues would have been essential to the judgment in case 1. A plaintiff has the burden of establishing all of his prima facie negligence elements so each of these issues would have been essential to the first patient prevailing in his negligence suit against Doctor, thus this third element will likely be satisfied.

P is also asserting issue preclusion in case 2 against Doctor, who was a party in case 1. Thus, issue preclusion is being asserted against a party who was a party in case 1 and the fourth element is satisfied.

For the fifth element, traditionally, mutual collateral estoppel was required and CE could only be asserted by a party who was also a party to case 1. However, unlike the fourth element (which is required by due process), due process does not require the party who is asserting CE to be a party to case 1. Thus many jurisdictions allow nonmutual use of collateral estoppel. The standard that must be met depends on whether the party is asserting CE as a plaintiff or as a defendant. If the party is asserting it as a defendant (defensive collateral estoppel) the court will apply CE to bar further litigation of this issue as long as the plaintiff had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue in case 1. However, if the party is asserting it as a plaintiff (offensive collateral estoppel) the court will be more reluctant to apply CE and will look at a number of factors- 1) did the defendant have a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue in case 1, 2) could this new plaintiff have joined case 1, 3) could the defendant have foreseen multiple lawsuits, and 4) are there any inconsistent judgments so that assertion of CE could be unfair to the defendant.

Here, P was not a party to case 1 however he still may be able to use nonmutual collateral estoppel since most courts have got rid of the mutuality requirement. P is a plaintiff and he is the one asserting CE against D. Thus, P is trying to make offensive use of CE. The court will look at a number of factors- whether Doctor had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the first lawsuit against the other patient. Whether Perry could have joined the first negligence lawsuit involving the Bolton rod- did P know of this claim at the time it was brought? Whether the doctor could have foreseen that there would be multiple lawsuits like this- here multiple patients had sued Bolton from back pain they suffered so D likely could have foreseen that plaintiffs would bring lawsuits against him as well for use of the rod. And finally, whether there are inconsistent judgments against Doctor. Here, this appears to be the only other lawsuit against this particular doctor involving negligent use of the rod thus unless there are other lawsuits where the Doctor prevailed on this issues, there are unlikely to be inconsistent judgments.

Conclusion

The court should dismiss Perry's motion for summary judgment as to his claims of res judicata but likely should grant his motion as to his claims of collateral estoppel for a number of negligence issue (outlined above) depending on the factors (outlined above).

Q3 Contracts

Betty is a physician. One of her patients was an elderly man named Al. Betty treated Al for Alzheimer's disease, but since she believed he was destitute, she never charged him for her services.
One day Al said to Betty, "I want to pay you back for all you have done over the years. If you will care for me for the rest of my life, I will give you my office building. I'm frightened because I have no heirs and you are the only one who cares for me. I need to know now that I can depend on you." Betty doubted that Al owned any office building, but said nothing in response and just completed her examination of Al and gave him some medication.

Two years passed. Al's health worsened and Betty continued to treat him. Betty forgot about Al's statement regarding the office building.

One day Betty learned that Al was indeed the owner of the office building. Betty immediately wrote a note to Al stating, "I accept your offer and promise to provide you with medical services for the rest of your life." Betty signed the note, put it into a stamped envelope addressed to Al, and placed the envelope outside her front door to be picked up by her mail carrier when he arrived to deliver the next day's mail.

Al died in his sleep that night. The mail carrier picked up Betty's letter the following morning and it was delivered to Al's home a day later. The services rendered by Betty to Al over the last two years were worth several thousand dollars; the office building is worth millions of dollars.

Does Betty have an enforceable contract for the transfer of the office building? Discuss.

Answer A

Applicable law

The common law governs all types of contracts except those for the sale of goods. Here, the contract between Al and Betty was for services of medical care in exchange for an office building thus it will be governed by the common law.

Valid contract

A valid contract must have been formed by an offer, acceptance, be supported by consideration and no subject to any defenses. If Betty can show that these all existed she will have an enforceable contract. This is decided by the objective manifestations of the parties, thus Betty's subjective thoughts in believing that Al did not have the office building or in forgetting about the offer do not impact the formation of the contract.

Offer

An offer is a manifestation of intent to enter into a contract that is certain and definite and communicated to the offeree. Here, Al stated that he would give Betty his office building in exchange for her to continue to give him medical care until his death. This shows intent to be bound to the offer on those terms and was stated to Betty. Thus, his statement is an offer. On the other hand, the offeree did not think there was an offer because she did not think he owned a building and his statement was phrased in such a way as to suggest that he was merely expressing gratitude for Betty's work, by saying she was the only one who cared for him and that he did not have any other heirs. Overall, although couched in language that would not be an offer, there is a clear intent to give Betty his building in exchange for her caring for him for the rest of his life.

Bilateral or unilateral contract.

The issue is whether Al's offer was an offer to enter into a unilateral or bilateral contract. A unilateral contract is one that can only be accepted by performance. Here, Al said he would give Betty the office if she cared for him for the rest of his life. He was not seeking her promise to care for him for the rest of her life, but rather that she actually care for him for the rest of his life.

On the other hand, most contracts are construed as bilateral, that is are formed by the promises to perform. And here the offer could be accepted by Betty's promise to provide medical services.

Termination of an offer

An offer may be terminated. Here, there is no indication that Al terminated his offer in the two years after the conversation.

Lapse of time

An offer will terminate if it is not accepted after a reasonable period of time, if none is suggested by the contract. There is usually a reasonable time limit on offers. Here, Betty did not accept the offer until two years later when she learned that Al actually owned the building. It should be argued that the offer has lapsed. However, since it was an offer to care for him for the rest of his life, two years may not be an unreasonable period of time, depending on his age and need for care.

Death

Death of the offeree will terminate the offer. Here, Al died before receiving the acceptance. However, Betty may have accepted the offer before her death, see acceptance, and thus his death would not be an issue, since death only terminates an offer, not necessarily a contract.

Irrevocable offer for unilateral K

Betty will argue that the offer was unrevocable because she had started performance of the unilateral contract by continuing to care for Al through the next two years.

Acceptance

Acceptance is the unequivocal manifestation of assent to the offer by one with power of acceptance. Here, the offer was made to Betty so she had power of acceptance. There are several arguments Betty will make to show acceptance.

Silence

Here, Betty was silent when the offer was first made. Thus she made no manifestation of assent. However, she did continue to treat him for the remainder of his life and thus her silence could be deemed acceptance since she continued to perform the contract by providing medical care.

Mailing Acceptance

Normally an acceptance is effective upon mailing. Here, the effectiveness of Betty's actions depend on whether properly addressing and stamping the envelope and putting it outside is an effective mailing of the acceptance. On one hand, she completed all actions required for mailing and putting it outside her door to be picked up by a mailman is no different than walking to the post office and dropping it in the mailbox. All that remains is the actual mailing of the envelope. On the other hand, when one goes to a post office or hands mail to the mailman one cannot thereafter get that mail back. Betty could easily have gone outside and retrieved the envelope from her own mailbox at any time before the mailman arrived and thus the letter was not posted. Overall, it is likely that this is not proper dispatch of the mail since she could so easily retrieve it. As such it was not an effective acceptance until the mailman picked up the letter the next morning. As discussed above, once Al had died the acceptance could no longer be effective since the offer was terminated. Thus she did not accept the offer by mailing.

Acceptance by Performance of a unilateral Contract

Betty will also argue that she accepted the contract by performing the terms of the unilateral contract. She continued to provide Al with medical care until his death. Thus upon Al's death she had fully performed and had the makings of an enforceable contract.

Consideration

A valid contract must have consideration. Consideration is the bargained for exchange of something of legal value. Here, Al is offering Betty his office building in exchange for her medical care, these are both of legal value or detriment because they are giving up an office building and Betty is giving up payment for her services.

Bargained for exchange: The promise must induce the detriment and the detriment induce the promise. Here, Al's offer to give the building was to induce Betty to give him medical care. However, Betty did not think he had the building and continued to give him medical care anyhow for two years before "accepting" the offer. This suggests that she was not induced to give medical care for the rest of his life by the promise of the building.

Past Consideration

Al's heirs should also argue that Al's promise was really for past consideration. That is the work Betty had done before. This is evidenced by Al's statement I want to pay you for all the "work you have done over the years." Consideration is not present where the work has already been done. However, this argument will fail because Al not only offers for the previous work done by Betty but also by the remaining work that he will do.

Illusory

The heirs should argue that the promise is illusory because Betty may only have to do work for Al for one day or even one hour. However, this argument will fail because she will be bound to compete the medical work until he dies, which could be in twenty years or in 2 minutes.

Overall, it does not seem like there is consideration since the promise of the building did not induce the medical work.

Promissory Estoppel

Betty will argue that while there is no consideration she should be able to enforce under a promissory estoppel doctrine. There, a person must have relied upon a promise, to their detriment, and done so justifiably. Betty will argue that in providing free medical care to Al for two years she was relying on his promise. However, she had forgotten about the statement regarding the building and thus her actions were not a result of reliance on the promise, but rather her own good work.

Defenses

Assuming there is consideration there are several defenses to contract formation that can be raised and prevent the enforcement of the contract.

Statute of frauds

The statute of frauds requires that certain contracts be in writing in order to be enforceable. The sale of land is one such contract. Here, although Al is not obtaining the typical purchase money in his conveyance he is nonetheless receiving a service of value in exchange for his land. Thus, it could properly be considered a sale of land. Additionally Betty could argue that it is a contract that cannot be performed in under a year, however this will fail since Al could die at any time and the contract would be performed.

Additionally, since this is a contract to give something at death it could be considered an executory contract, but this does not fit either since it is not relating to the executor giving a promise to pay the debts of the estate.

The statute of frauds is satisfied by a writing signed by the party to be charged or by part performance or detrimental reliance. Here, Al orally offered the building to Betty and thus there is no writing that evidences the contract. The letter from Betty to Al wil not satisfy the writing requirements because although it contains the material terms (building for medical care) as required to satisfy the statute of frauds it does not contain the signature of the party to be charged, here, Al.

Further, the statute is not satisfied by the performance because in the sale of land this is satisfied by two of three things: possession, improvement or payment. Here, Betty's "payment" of medical services would satisfy one, but she did not take possession and did not make any improvements to the land thus it would not be removed from the statute of frauds.

A contract that cannot be performed in under a year would be satisfied by full performance, as here where Betty provided care until Al's death, but as discussed above this has no merit since this was not a contract that could not be performed in under a year.

Finally, there is no detrimental reliance on the contract since she forgot about while giving care for the two years until she found out he actually owned the building. She was not relying on the contract. Thus she will not remove the contract from the statute of frauds through detrimental reliance.

Betty could argue that this agreement is not within the statute of frauds since it is not for the conveyance of property for money. She will likely fail as the substance of the agreement is the office building for an amount of service.

Incapacity

A contract is voidable at the option of a person who does not have the capacity to contract. Here, the facts state that Al has Alzheimer's disease. Thus he may not have been able to understand the contract or enter into it. If Al did not understand what he was doing when he offered the building due to his mental disease and could not properly contract a contract will not be enforced. Here, Betty was his doctor and should have known that he was incapable of contracting. She knew he had a mental disease and thus even if he showed no outward signs of incapacity at the time he entered into the contract, she was aware. However, incapacity does not depend on the awareness of the other party. A party that does not have capacity due to mental disease cannot be found to have entered into an enforceable contract regardless of whether the other party knows of this.

Undue influence

A contract will be voidable if it is a result of undue influence. Here, Betty was in a position of power - giving him medical care. Al was clearly frightened by the prospect of not having medical care in the future as evidence by his statements that he needed to be able to depend on her. This suggests that the contract for the building is a result of her power over him as a physician and not freely contracting to give her the building. The fact that she had previously provided medical care buttresses the argument since Al had come to rely on her and she could use her influence to her advantage. However, this argument is likely to fail since she did not say anything in response to his offer and simply continued her exam and gave him the medication he needed.

Conclusion

Betty probably does not have an enforceable contract for the transfer of the building because it is not supported by consideration or a consideration substitute and it is barred by the statute of frauds.

Answer B

Applicable Law

This is a contract for Betty's personal services as a physician. Therefore, the common law applies.

Contract Formation

To form a contract, there must be offer, acceptance, and consideration. Betty will argue a contract exists based on theories that (a) an implied contract was created when Betty accepted the offer as implied by her conduct; (b) an express contract was created when Betty sent the letter; and (c) a contract was formed when Al made the offer in payment for past services. Each theory will be examined below. Also, a number of defenses exist, which are discussed at the end.

Implied Contract

Betty will argue that Al made an offer, and her acceptance can be implied by her conduct.

Offer

An offer is a manifestation of a present intent to enter into a contract. It must be definite and clear, and it must be communicated to the offeree. Here, Al offered to enter into a contract when he offered to give her the office building in exchange for continued care. His statement shows that he intended, at that moment, to enter into this relationship with Betty. His statement was unambiguous and on precise terms, hence it was definite and clear. Al said it to Betty, thus it was communicated to the intended offeree. Therefore, Al's statement is a valid offer.

Acceptance

An acceptance must be an unambiguous communication from the offeree to the offeror showing acceptance of the offer on its terms. The acceptance can be through words or conduct, and is judged by an objective standard. Here, Betty will argue that her conduct should reasonably be understood to show acceptance, because right after Al offered to give her a building in exchange for treatment, Betty completed her examination and gave him medication. Therefore, Betty will argue that her conduct shows an unambiguous intent to be bound by the offer's terms.

However, in the context of their past dealings, Betty's conduct does not show an intention to accept the offer. Betty had long treated Al without charge. After Al made the offer, Betty said nothing and proceeded with business as usual. If this had been their first meeting, then her subsequent performance (by treating Al) would be indicative of an acceptance of the offer. However, given their past dealings, Betty's subsequent performance was perfectly in line with what would be expected if she rejected the offer. In other words, it could be argued that Betty did not intend to be obligated to Al for the rest of his life, and her conduct was merely consistent with how she had acted in the past.

Therefore, Betty's conduct was ambiguous, in that it is unclear whether she intended to accept the offer, or reject the offer and continue their relationship as it existed before the offer. Thus, Betty most likely did not accept the offer by her conduct.

Acceptance by silence

Courts have sometimes found acceptance by silence, if the parties' past dealings would create a reasonable expectation that silence equals acceptance. However, the rule will not apply here. Betty and Al do not have a history of previous contracts. Betty's treatment of Al has been purely gratuitous, therefore there is no history of prior dealings on which to base an expectation of the form of acceptance. Thus, Betty will not be able to establish silence by acceptance.

Consideration

Consideration is the bargained-for exchange of legal detriments. Each party must suffer a detriment, and the detriments must induce each other. Here, Betty will argue that she suffered a detriment in the obligation to care for Al for the rest of his life, and Al suffered a detriment by giving up his office building.

However, the detriments must induce each other. Here, Al was induced into giving his office to Betty in exchange for medical care. However, Betty was not induced into providing services to Al for his office building. In fact, Betty "doubted" whether Al even owned an office building. She even forgot about Al's statement, which by itself does not have legal significance, but it does serve as evidence that the office was not something Betty considered important. Most people, even rich Doctors, would not forget that they are due an office building, if they really expected to receive one.

Furthermore, once Betty learned about the office building, she responded immediately and enthusiastically with an acceptance letter. This shows that Betty did not provide her earlier services in exchange for Al's promise to give her an office building. It also shows that she did not believe she had accepted the offer with her prior conduct. Therefore, even if a court were to imply that Betty's conduct constituted an acceptance, there arguably would not be mutually-induced consideration.

Express Contract

Betty will argue that Al made an offer that she expressly accepted with her written letter.

Offer

Al's statement is a valid offer. See above.

Acceptance

See rule above. Betty will argue that she expressly accepted the offer with her letter. The letter was unambiguous. It will be a valid acceptance.

Consideration

See rule above. Al suffers a detriment (giving up his office building) in a mutually-induced exchange for Betty's promise to care for him the rest of his life. Even if that life were short, it would still be valid consideration, because courts do not generally question the sufficiency of the amount of consideration. Courts may choose not to enforce some contracts with an imbalance of consideration on duress or unconscionability grounds, discussed below.

Expiration

Unless stated otherwise, an offer stays open for a reasonable amount of time. Here, Betty attempted to accept Al's offer after 2 years. It was so long that she had even forgotten about Al's offer. Two years is most likely longer than a reasonable amount of time. Therefore, the offer expired, and Betty's attempt to accept it will not be valid.

Revocation

Offers are revoked on the death of the offeror, even if the offeree is not aware of that death. Here, Al died at night after Betty placed the letter in her mailbox, but before the mail carrier picked up Betty's letter. Therefore, Betty's letter will only be valid if it fits in the mailbox rule and thus accepted the offer before Al died. Note, even though Al's life was only for a few hours after acceptance, consideration is still valid for the reasons discussed above.

Mailbox Rule

If sent by mail, acceptances are valid when sent. A letter will be sent when it is placed in the mailbox or location where the mail is collected. Here, Betty's mail was usually picked up from a location outside her front door. Therefore, Betty's acceptance was valid once she placed the letter outside her front door, and thus the mailbox rule applies. Betty accepted Al's offer, and a contract was formed.

Contract formed by past services

Betty could argue that Al's statement was an offer to pay for past services rendered. Betty had treated him for years for free. She will argue his statement is an offer to pay the moral debt he owes to her.

Consideration

See rule above. Here, Al is offering to give his office to Betty, but there is no bargained-for exchange. Betty provided her past medical services gratuitously, and she was not induced by to do so by Al's subsequent promise to give her an office building. Therefore, there is no consideration to support this contract.

Past Moral Obligations

Courts will enforce offers to pay for past moral obligations. Typically, this is the situation where a debtor offers to pay his unenforceable debts. Here, Al does not owe Betty any debt. While she offered him free medical care, that did not create a moral obligation to pay. Indeed, many doctors are motivated by a dedication to their patients, as evidenced by their socratic oath. Therefore, Betty's motives were likely altruistic, and thus were gifts. Al's promise to pay her back for all she has done cannot be construed as an offer to pay for past debt.

Defenses

Statutes of Frauds

A contract for the sale or transfer of land cannot be enforced without a writing, signed by the party to be enforced against, evidencing the existence of a contract, i.e. showing the material terms. Here, Al's offer to Betty was an oral attempt to transfer ownership of land. The only signed writing appears to be Betty's letter. While it shows the material terms, and is signed by Betty, it was not signed by Al. Therefore, even if Betty formed a contract with Al, it cannot be enforced against him.

Duress

Al's estate could argue that the contract was formed under duress. Here, they can point to Al's statement that he has no heirs or anyone who cares for him. He needs someone to help him, and he appears to be in a state of loneliness and fear. Therefore, the estate could make an argument that Al was pressured into forming a contract out of duress, and he had no real choice but to form the contract.

However, this argument would most likely be rejected, since Al was the one who made the offer, and Betty gave no sign that she would withhold medical care if Al did not give her an office building.

Unconscionability

Similarly, Al's estate could argue that the deal was unconscionable, in that Betty took advantage of her superior position to extract a payment out of Al. Al's dependence on her created an element of unfair bargaining power, which Betty used to her advantage. It was improper for a doctor to make such a contract with a dying patient.

However, this argument will be rejected. The facts show no evidence that Betty in any way exerted pressure on Al. Indeed, Al's statement appears to be spontaneous.

Capacity

Al's estate can argue that Al lacked the capacity to enter into a contract. Al was an Alzheimer's patient. He most likely did not have the mental faculties necessary to enter into a contract.

Betty will counter that the statement was perfectly clear, and that it was made during one of Al's moments of lucidity. Therefore, at that moment, he did have the capacity to enter into a contract.

Q4 Professional Responsibility

Austin had been a practicing physician before he became a lawyer. Although he no longer practices medicine, he serves on a local medical association committee that works to further the rights of physicians to be compensated fairly by health insurance providers. The committee develops recommendations, but its members do not personally engage in public advocacy. Austin is a close friend of several of the other physicians on the committee, though as a lawyer he has never represented any of them.

In his law practice, Austin represents BHC Company, a health insurance provider. BHC has been sued in a class action by hundreds of physicians, including some of Austin's friends, for unreasonable delay, and denial and reduction of reimbursements for medical services. Austin initially advised BHC that he was not confident it had a defense to the lawsuit. After further research, however, Austin discovered that a stated policy of the health care law is the containment of health care costs. He advised BHC that he could plausibly argue that reimbursements to physicians may legally be limited to avoid a dramatic increase in the health insurance premiums of patients. He explained that he would argue for a modification of existing decisional law to allow such a result based on public policy.

When Bertha, counsel for the class of physicians, heard the defense Austin planned to assert in the lawsuit, she wrote him a letter stating that if he presented that defense she would report him to the state bar for engaging in a conflict of interest.

1. What, if any, ethical violations has Austin committed as an attorney? Discuss.

2. What, if any, ethical violations has Bertha committed? Discuss.

Answer according to California law and ABA authorities.

Answer A

1. AUSTIN'S ETHICAL VIOLATIONS AS AN ATTORNEY

Duty of Competence

An attorney owes to a client the duty of competence. Under the ABA Rules, an attorney must possess the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness, and preparation of an average member of the profession. Under the California Rules, an attorney must have the requisite diligence; learning and skill; and mental, emotional, and physical ability of an average member of the profession.

Here, the facts do not state Austin's particular area of legal practice. However, there is nothing in the facts to suggest that Austin is not competent in the present matter. Thus, Austin has not violated his duty of competence.

Duty of Confidentiality

An attorney owes to his client a duty of confidentiality, whereby the attorney may not disclose the client's confidential communications made during the representation either during or after the termination of the representation.

Here, the facts indicate that Austin has not represented any of the physicians in the medical association committee, nor has he represented any of his physician friends (to the extent that they are not part of the association committee). Thus, it does not appear as though Austin has obtained any confidential information from any prior representation of any of the parties involved in this action.

As such, it does not appear that Austin, as of yet, has violated any duty of confidentiality.

Duty of Loyalty

A lawyer owes to his client an ethical duty of loyalty. Pursuant to this duty, the lawyer owes to his client a duty of utmost trust and confidence. A lawyer may violate his duty of loyalty to his client if he has a concurrent or former conflict of interest with the client.

Concurrent Conflict

Under ABA Model Rule 1.7, an attorney must not represent a client where the attorney represents another client whose interests are directly adverse to the prospective client, or where there is a significant risk that the attorney's services will be materially limited due to the attorney's present or former personal relationships or interests or due to the attorney's representation of a former client. An exception to this rule exists where the attorney (1) reasonably believes that he can competently and diligently represent the client in the face of any such conflict; (2) the conflict does not require the attorney to advance a claim for the client in issue against another client in the same proceeding; (3) the representation is not prohibited by law; and (4) the clients give informed, written consent. The California Rules of Professional Conduct (CRPC) differ in three ways: (1) they apply to both present and potential conflicts; (2) they do not have a "reasonable belief" standard as under the ABA Rules; and (3) the attorney needs only give written disclosure to the client---as opposed to informed, written consent---where the conflict relates to the attorney's personal interests (actual conflicts between clients require informed, written consent). Finally, an attorney must obtain the client's informed written consent and comply with the above exceptions each time a potential conflict arises.

Austin's Service on a Local Medical Association

As a general rule, an attorney's mere service on a corporate board of directors or a local association does not in and of itself violate any ethical rules. However, such membership is highly discouraged due to the high risk such membership poses in terms of creating conflicts of interest in future client representation.

Thus, while Austin's membership in the association is not a per se ethical violation, it may cause a concurrent conflict to arise with respect to his representation of BHC, as described below.

Austin's Representation of BHC Company (BHC)

Here, Austin is presently representing BHC in defending a class action by hundreds of physicians, including some of Austin's friends, for unreasonable delay and denial and reduction of reimbursements for medical services. This poses a potential conflict of interest between his representation of BHC and Austin's membership on the local medical association committee, as well as Austin's prior occupation as an attorney and close friendship with many physicians on the committee. The issue then becomes whether Austin's personal relationships and interests here create such a conflict as to pose a significant risk of material limitation on his services.

That Austin serves on a committee that specifically works to further the rights of physicians with respect to fair compensation by health care providers is in direct conflict with his defense of BHC in a matter involving delay and denial of reimbursements for medical services. Thus, Austin's personal interests do appear to pose a significant risk of materially limiting his representation of BHC, as it could be very difficult for Austin to put aside his personal beliefs and convictions in order to aid BHC's defense. This is further supported by the fact that the association my publicly ostracize Austin's representation of a perceived "enemy." Thus, Austin must meet the exceptions enumerated above.

Reasonable Belief (ABA)

There are no facts directly revealing Austin's reasonable belief that his personal interests will not impede his diligent and competent representation of BHC. In fact, Austin's initial advice to BHC prior to any research was that he was not confident that BHC had a defense. The facts are unclear as to Austin's motivation behind this statement, but to the extent that the statement was based on his personal beliefs rather than a disinterested professional legal opinion, this statement likely makes Austin liable for discipline.

After further research, however, Austin appears to have formed a reasonable belief that he could plausibly argue that reimbursements to physicians may legally be limited to avoid a dramatic increase in the health insurance premiums of patients. He further expressed his belief that he could make an argument for a modication of existing decisional law to allow such a result based on public policy. This may reflect Austin's reasonable belief that he could in fact represent BHC competently and diligently. Thus, the "reasonable relief" requirement under the ABA rules could likely be met.

Assertion of Claim Against Another Client/Not Prohibited by Law

Because the facts indicate (as discussed in more depth below) that Austin has not represented any of the physicians in the committee previously, nor does he presently represent any of them now, Austin's representation of BHC will not require him to assert a claim on BHC's behalf against any of his present clients. Further, there is no indication that Austin's representation of BHC is contrary to any law.

Informed Consent

As stated above, under the ABA Rules, an attorney must obtain the client's informed, written consent from his client to proceed in the face of a personal conflict that poses a significant risk of materially limiting his services to another client. Under the CRPCs, the attorney needs only make written disclosure of the conflict.

Here, Austin likely fails to meet his ethical duty under both the ABA and California Rules. There are no facts indicating that Austin either obtained BHC's informed, written consent nor gave BHC written disclosure of his personal relationship with his physician friends, his prior occupation as a physician, or his membership in the medical association committee. Indeed, there are no facts that Austin made such disclosures at all, even orally.

Thus, because Austin neither obtained BHC's informed, written consent to proceed with the representation nor gave BHC written disclosure of his personal conflicts, Austin is subject to discipline under both the ABA and the California Rules.

Former Conflict

Under the ABA Rules, an attorney who has represented a former client may not thereafter represent another client in the same or a substantially related matter where the representation of the current client would be materially adverse to the former client, unless the attorney obtains the former client's informed, written consent. The California Rule is substantially the same.

Here, although Austin serves on the local medical association committee that works to further the rights of physicians to be compensated by health insurance providers, the facts indicate that Austin has never represented any of the other physicians in the committee.

Thus, for the purposes of the former conflict rule, because none of the physicians are former clients of Austin's, Austin has not violated his ethical duty of loyalty to BHC for purposes of the former conflict rule.

Duty of Candor to the Court

Under the ABA Rules, Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 11, and the California Rules, an attorney may not bring a claim that is not warranted under existing law or that is meant to harass or delay.

Here, Austin's initial belief that BHC did not have a valid defense may reflect Austin's belief that BHC did not have a valid claim that Austin could assert in good faith. However, the facts later indicate that after further research, he believed he could make an argument for a modication of existing decisional law to allow such a result based on public policy. Under the ABA Rules and the California Rules, an attorney is permitted to bring an action for a good faith proposal to modify existing law. Here, the facts do not indicate that Austin's belief that he could make an argument for a modification of existing decisional law was in bad faith or was intended to harass or delay.

Thus, Austin should not be subject to discipline for bringing an action to argue for a modification of present law.

2. BERTHA'S ETHICAL VIOLATIONS

Reporting Ethical Violations

Under the ABA Rules, an attorney must report another attorney's ethical violation to the state bar. Under the California rules, reporting ethical violations is only permissive (not mandatory), unless an attorney knows of the other attorney's misconduct and the attorney fails to report the conduct to prevent such conduct from occurring or continuing.

Here, Bertha has become aware of Austin's engaging in a conflict of interest. As such, under the ABA Rules, Bertha is required to report Austin's ethical violation to the state bar. In California, Bertha ordinarily would not be required to report Austin's violation, but she could if she were so inclined. Here, however, it appears that Austin intends to proceed with his representation of BHC in the face of a conflict. Thus, Bertha will likely be required to report Austin's continued violation of an ethical rule.

Threats to Obtain an Advantage in a Civil Case

Under the ABA Rules, an attorney may threaten criminal or disciplinary action against an attorney, so long as the charges are sufficiently related to the civil action. Under the California Rules, an attorney may not threaten criminal, administrative, or disciplinary action to gain an advantage in a criminal case.

Here, as discussed above, Bertha is likely under a duty under both the ABA and California Rules to report Austin's violation. Further, Bertha's letter to Austin is manifestly a threat, as she stated that she would report him if he presented a specific defense in the case. Under the ABA Rules, Bertha's threat to Austin likely does not violate an ethical duty, as the threat is reasonably related to the litigation, i.e., Austin's conflict of interest in this particular case. Under the California Rules, however, while Bertha may---and likely must---report Austin's conduct to the California State Bar, Bertha is nevertheless absolutely prohibited from using that fact as a threat to gain an advantage in this case.

Thus, while Bertha is likely not subject to discipline under the ABA Rules, she is subject to discipline under the California Rules.

Answer B

1. Austin's Potential Ethical Violations

Duty of Loyalty

A lawyer has a duty of loyalty to his client. The lawyer must ensure that no personal interest or duty to a third party materially impairs his ability to loyally represent the client. Here, Austin's client is BHC Company, a health insurance provider. By the nature of its business, BHC is interested in minimizing the amount it pays to physicians, because the more that BHC compensates physicians, the less able it will be to successfully compete in the market for health insurance providers. Furthermore, BHC has an obvious interest in winning its law suit for both financial and reputational reasons.

Conflict of Interest Posed by Austin's Committee Membership

Austin has a personal interest outside of his legal practice in that he is a member of a local medical association committee that works to further the rights of physicians to be compensated fairly by health insurance providers. As a former doctor, Austin seems to be passionate about this cause.

The fact that BHC has a diametrically opposite interest, which is to pay as little as possible to physicians, creates a conflict of interest. How can Austin be loyal to BHC when he is absolutely opposed to BHC's cause? Thus, in the face of this conflict Austin must decide whether it is reasonably objectively possible to represent BHC without materially impairing its interests, and if it is possible Austin must disclose and get BHC's written consent.

Is the Conflict Consentable?

The conflict is only consentable if Austin objectively and reasonably believes he can adequately represent BHC. Austin may believe this, saying he can compartmentalize his life outside the firm from his life as a lawyer. He may also argue that as a committee member he is working to change the health care laws, while as a lawyer he is working to ensure that his client complies with the law but is not forced to pay beyond what the law requires. If Austin is successful in changing the law in his role as a committee member it may not hurt BHC because costs for all health insurance providers will rise equally so BHC will not be put at a competitive disadvantage.

On the basis of these arguments, the conflict posed by Austin's committee role is probably consentable provided that Austin discloses to BHC and gets its written consent. Austin may also have a duty to inform the committee that BHC is a client because that may appear deceptive to the fellow committee members if Austin does not disclose. However, in so disclosing Austin must make sure he has BHC's prior consent in order not to violate the duty of confidentiality (discussed further below).

Conflict of Interest Posed by Austin's Friendships

Austin is a close friend of several of the plaintiff's in the class action suit that he is defending on behalf of BHC. Friendship is a personal interest of the lawyer that could potentially be materially adverse to the lawyer's duty of loyalty to the client. Thus, Austin must decide whether he can objectively reasonably believes he can adequately represent BHC in the face of this conflict.

Once again, Austin will state that he can compartmentalize between his work life and his outside interests. However, Austin may be faced by the reality that his close friends will not accept this compartmentalization and will begin to distrust him. If Austin is faced with losing some of his closest friends, will he really be able to continue zealously representing BHC as his duty of diligence requires him to? Lawyers are often required to speak impassionately against the other side and BHC may want to employ a take-no-prisoners strategy in the litigation; perhaps by impugning the work done by the plaintiffs including Austin's friends. For example, Austin may be called on to cross examine a friend in front of the jury to make the point that the friend overcharges for low quality medical services.

Based on these considerations, Austin can not objectively reasonably believe his representation of BHC will be adequate, and disclosure and consent will not be enough. Therefore, Austin should withdraw from the representation.

Duty of Confidentiality

A lawyer has a duty of confidentiality to the client, and may not discuss any information relating to the representation. Here, it is difficult to believe that Austin could meaningfully participate on his committee without discussing information relating to the representation of BHC. Therefore, Austin has very likely violated his duty of confidentiality.

Duty of Candor and Truthfullness to the Court

As part of his duty to the court, Austin must disclose adverse legal authority and may not make frivilous arguments. Here, Austin wants to make an argument to modify existing court decisions based on public policy grounds. This is a good faith argument to overturn precedent based on a legal argument not previously made, and therefore Austin may ethically go forward with the argument even if he is not confident the court will accept it. Indeed, as part of his duties of competence and diligence Austin must make such arguments if he thinks they have a reasonable prospect of success, as long as he is careful to fully inform the court of previous decisions that control within the jurisdiction and go against his argument.

2. Bertha's Possible Ethical Violations

Duty to Report

Under the ABA model code, but not California rules, an attorney has an ongoing duty to report any ethical violation of another lawyer. Thus, by not reporting Austin's ethical violations immediately, Bertha has violated the ABA code.

It is important for Bertha to report because it is unfair to the court and to the clients on each side of the case if one client's lawyer has a conflict of interest, because it creates the possibility of a mistrial or other delays.

Duty of Fairness

A lawyer has a duty of fairness to both the court and to her adversary. Here, Bertha is flagrantly violating this duty by using the threat of reporting an ethical violation to stop a lawyer from presenting a valid defense. This is essentially blackmail; Bertha is telling Austin to throw his case or risk being reported for an ethical violation. This is grossly unfair to the court, to Austin, and to BHC. Therefore under both the ABA code and the California rules, such behavior is prohibited. While it is permissible, and indeed required under the ABA, to report ethical violations, using the threat of reporting ethical violations as a bargaining chip is prohibitted and constitutes a serious ethical violation.

Q5 Real Property

Prior to 1975, Andy owned Blackacre in fee simple absolute. In 1975, Andy by written deed conveyed Blackacre to Beth and Chris "jointly with right of survivorship." The deed provides: "If Blackacre, or any portion of Blackacre, is transferred to a third party, either individually or jointly, by Beth or Chris, Andy shall have the right to immediately re-enter and repossess Blackacre."

In 1976, without the knowledge of Chris, Beth conveyed her interest in Blackacre to Frank.

In 1977, Beth and Frank died in a car accident. Frank did not leave a will and his only living relative at the time of his death was his cousin Mona.

In 1978, Chris and Andy learned that Beth had conveyed her interest in Blackacre to Frank. When Mona approached Chris a day later to discuss her interest in Blackacre, Chris told her that he was the sole owner of Blackacre and she had no interest in Blackacre. Chris posted "No Trespassing" signs on Blackacre. He also paid all of the expenses, insurance, and taxes on Blackacre. Andy and Mona have never taken any action against Chris' possession of Blackacre.

1. What right, title, or interest in Blackacre, if any, did Andy initially convey to Beth, Chris, and himself? Discuss.

2. What right, title, or interest in Blackacre, if any, are held by Andy, Chris, and Mona? Discuss.

Answer A

1. WHAT RIGHT, TITLE OR INTEREST IN BLACKACRE DID ANDY INITIALLY CONVEY TO BETH, CHRIS, AND HIMSELF?

Andy owned Blackacre in fee simple absolute, which indicates absolute ownership and means he had the full right to convey Blackacre.

Joint tenancy

In 1975, Andy by written deed conveyed Blackacre to Beth and Chris "jointly with right of survivorship."

A conveyance of land requires that the deed be lawfully executed and delivered. A conveyance to multiple parties can create a tenancy situation. A conveyance creates a joint tenancy when the four unities are present: possession, interest, time and title. The unity of possession means the joint tenants have the equal right to possession; interest means they have an equal ownership interest in the land; time means they received their ownership interest at the same time; and title means they received their ownership interest via the same instrument (such as a deed).

When a joint tenancy is created, it carries a right of survivorship (ROS), which usually must be expressed in the conveyance itself. The ROS means that when one joint tenant dies, the other succeeds to her entire interest in the land. In a situation involving two joint tenants, this means the surviving joint tenant would succeed to the entire ownership interest in the property. However, a joint tenancy can be severed by a sale, partition, or mortgage (in title theory jurisdictions). The severance of a joint tenancy typically results in a tenancy in common.

Here, Andy created a joint tenancy between Beth and Chris. This is because the deed expressly contained the words "jointly with a right of survivorship," and the four unities were present: Beth and Chris each have a 1/2 interest in Blackacre, right to possess the whole, and received their interest at the same time (1975) and by the same instrument (the deed from Andy).

Thus, there was a joint tenancy between Beth and Chris.

Fee Simple Subject to Condition Subsequent

However, the deed also contained another provision which potentially affects the parties' rights in Blackacre: the deed provided "If Blackacre, or any portion of Blackacre is transferred to a third party, either individually or jointly by Beth or Chris, Andy shall have the right to immediately re-enter and repossess Blackacre."

Through this language, Andy purported to create a fee simple subject to a condition subsequent (FSCS). A FSCS is an ownership interest in land whereby the present possessor owns the land until a specified condition occurs, whereby the grantor then has the option of exercising his right of reentry and re-taking possession of the land. To create a FSCS, the grantor must use express conditional language in the conveyance and reserves a right of reentry, using words such as "but if" and "the grantor shall have the right to re-enter." In other words, the express conditional language must indicate that the interest conveyed is subject to the grantor's right of reentry if the specified condition occurs subsequent to the conveyance.

Here, the specified condition is the transfer of Blackacre or any portion thereof, either individually or jointly by Beth and Chris. Andy carved out the right of reentry by stating "Andy shall have the right to immediately re-enter and repossess Blackacre." Thus, Andy purported to create an arrangement where he could cut off Beth and Chris' rights in Blackacre, reenter the land and possess it, if any portion of the land was transferred. This constitutes a FSCS.

Thus, under Andy's purported conveyance, Beth and Chris would be joint tenants with respect to their interest in Blackacre: a fee simple subject to a condition subsequent.

Restraint on Alienation

However, Andy's purported conveyance is problematic because it is a restraint on alienation. A restraint on alienation occurs when the grantor attempts to restrict the alienability (e.g. transferability) of the land. A grantor may impose certain conditions in connection with his conveyance of the land, such as restrictions on what purpose the land may be used for. However, when the grantor attempts to impede the grantee's ability to transfer the land to others, the courts will classify that as a restraint on alienation.

The law will uphold reasonable restraints on alienation, but not unreasonable restraints on alienation because of the public policy favoring the free transferability of land. When there is an unreasonable restraint on alienation, the court will simply strike the restraint from the conveyance and declare that the grantee holds the property without the restraint. A restraint is generally reasonable if the restriction lasts only for a specified period of time, such as a restriction during the grantor's life. It is generally unreasonable if the restriction continues indefinitely and applies even to the grantee's heirs and assigns.

Here, there is a restraint on alienation: the conveyance completely restricts Beth and Chris' rights to transfer the property because it provides that Blackacre or any portion thereof may not be transferred. This is probably an unreasonable restraint on alienation because there is no time limit to this restriction - Beth and Chris are indefinitely prohibited from transferring Blackacre; presumably, even their heirs/devisees could not transfer the land. Moreover, the prohibition is not for a reasonable time, such as for a set period of years.

Andy may argue the restraint is reasonable because it does not expressly apply to Beth and Chris' "heirs and assigns" -- he may argue that this restriction does not apply indefinitely, but rather only during the period of Beth and Chris' lifetime. He may argue their heirs and assigns are free to transfer the land. He may also argue that the creation of a joint tenancy restricts their ability to transfer anyway because doing so will sever the joint tenancy. However, these are weak arguments. The restraint is still probably unreasonable because it is a total restriction during the tenants' lifetimes, which is a significant amount of time. Beth and Chris may not even transfer a portion of Blackacre. While they would lose joint tenant status by a transfer, they still have the option of doing so in the absence of the restraint. Thus, the restraint is unreasonable.

Accordingly, the court would likely strike the condition Andy included in the deed. This would mean that Beth and Chris hold Blackacre in fee simple as joint tenants.

Conclusion: initial conveyance

Thus, the initial conveyance means Beth and Chris held Blackacre in fee simple as joint tenants.

2. WHAT RIGHT, TITLE OR INTEREST IN BLACKACRE ARE HELD BY ANDY, CHRIS, AND MONA?

1976: Beth's conveyance - severance of joint tenancy

In 1976, Beth conveyed her interest to Frank.

A joint tenant may sell her interest, but as indicated above, the sale of her interest severs the joint tenancy because it destroys the unity of time/title. When a joint tenancy is severed, the new tenants hold as tenants in common (TIC) with each other. TIC have no right of survivorship, which means that upon death, their interests in the property pass to their devisees/heirs through a will/intestate succession.

Here, Beth's sale to Frank severed the joint tenancy because it destroyed the unities: Frank and Chris do not have their interests conveyed by the same instrument and at the same time. So Frank became a TIC with Chris, and Beth no longer had any ownership interest. As of 1976, Frank and Chris both had a 1/2 interest in Blackacre. This is the case even though Chris did not know about the sale to Frank--the sale severed the joint tenancy nonetheless.

1977: Beth and Frank's death

In 1977, Beth and Frank died. Beth no longer had any interest in Blackacre. Frank's 1/2 interest as a TIC with Chris would pass via will or intestacy. Because Frank did not have a will, his interest would have to pass through intestate succession. Frank's only living relative was his cousin Mona, so she would be his heir under the principles of intestate succession. Thus, Mona would get Frank's 1/2 interest in Blackacre via intestate succession, and continue to hold Blackacre as a TIC with Chris.

Thus, as of 1977, Mona and Chris each had a 1/2 interest in Blackacre as TIC; Andy had no interest in Blackacre.

1978: Chris' ouster

In 1978, Chris learned about Mona. The issue is whether he deprived her of her ownership interest in Blackacre through his actions.

Chris and Mona were co-tenants (and specifically TIC) which means each had certain rights and duties. Each tenant has a right to possess the entire premises, so one tenant in exclusive possession has no duty to pay rent to the other. Moreover, the tenants are jointly responsible for paying ordinary expenses associated with the property, such as property taxes and maintenance expenses.

Moreover, because each tenant has the right to exclusive possession of the property, a tenant in exclusive possession cannot claim ownership of the entire property through adverse possession unless he commits an ouster. An ouster is when one tenant expressly excludes the other from possession of the premises, by preventing the tenant from possessing the premises and/or through words/conduct indicating they have no right to possess the premises.

Here, Chris probably committed ouster of Mona. As a co-tenant, she was entitled to possession of the premises, but Chris would not let her have possession. Chris told her he was the sole owner of Blackacre and she had no interest in Blackacre, which constitutes an expression that she had no right to possess Blackacre. Moreover, Chris put "no trespassing signs" on Blackacre, and also paid all of the expenses, insurance and taxes on Blackacre (he never sought compensation from Mona). Thus, his exclusive possession of Blackacre was notwith Mona's consent--even though she did not take any action against Chris' possession of Blackacre, that does not indicate that Chris and she consented to this arrangement whereby he would have exclusive possession. Rather, he clearly indicated that she could not possess the premises, thus committing an ouster and entitling him to claim adverse possession if he meets the elements discussed below.

Adverse possession

A person in possession of land may have the possession ripen into title through the application of adverse possession (AP). A tenant must meet several elements to show they have acquired title through AP: continuous possession of the land for the statutory period, open and notorious possession, exclusive possession, actual possession, and hostile possession.

Continuous:

The possession must be continuous throughout the statutory period. It is unclear what is the statutory period in this jurisdiction, but Chris has possessed the property for such a long time that it is likely he has met the statutory period. Since his ouster occurred in 1978, it has been 32 years that he has possessed the property. The statute of limitations usually ranges from 10-20 years, so he likely has met the element of continuous possession.

Open and notorious:

The possessor must possess the property as the true owner would--in other words, his possession must be open and notorious such that a reasonable inspection of the property would reveal the possession. Here, Chris took ample actions to make his possession open and notorious; not only did he live on Blackacre, but he also posted no trespassing signs, paid the upkeep, and informed Mona that she had no interest in Blackacre. Thus, his possession would put a true owner on notice.

Exclusive:

Chris' possession was exclusive because he alone lived on Blackacre.

Actual:

Chris actually possessed the whole of Blackacre because he presumably lived on it.

Hostile:

Finally, the possession was hostile (i.e. without the true owner's consent) because Chris committed ouster, as described above.

Thus, Chris can probably meet the elements of adverse possession and claim title to Blackacre entirely (he already had 1/2 interest in Blackacre, and acquired the other 1/2 of Mona's interest through AP). Andy and Mona have never taken action against Chris' possession of Blackacre, so they did not defeat his claims and he likely owns it all via adverse possession. Note that he would have to file an action to quiet title before he could convey Blackacre to a third party.

Conclusion:

Thus, the final rights, title and interest in Blackacre are as follows: Chris owns all of Blackacre; Andy and Mona own nothing.

[Alternative analysis re restraint on alienation]

If the restraint on alienation analyzed above in Andy's original deed was valid, and Andy did in fact have a right to re-enter and repossess Blackacre, the final outcome would be the same because Andy never exercised that right of re-entry, and Chris succeeded to ownership of the whole property by adverse possession. (Of course this might be problematic because Andy could argue that the "hostility" element of AP was met because he allowed Chris to possess the property because he did not try to exercise his right of reentry). Nonetheless, the better analysis is that the restraint on alienation was invalid.

Answer B

1. Andy's Initial Conveyance of Blackacre / What interest was Conveyed?

Joint Tenancy Discussion

Andy (A) conveyed Blackacre by written deed, thereby satisfying the Statute of Frauds, to Beth (B) and Chris (C). The language of the deed was to B and C "jointly with right of survivorship." On this language alone, B and C have a joint tenancy.

Joint tenancies are created when two or more people receive land under circumstances such that the four unities, possession, interest, time, and title, are met. Here, both B and C took possession at the same time (from A's grant), they have the same interest (they both own an undivided one-half interest in Blackacre), they have the same right to possess the whole, and the title they have in Blackacre will be the same (although exactly what title they own will be discussed further here).

Additionally, to create a valid joint tenancy, express language concerning the right of survivorship should be used. The right of survivorship means that when one joint tenant dies, he or she may not pass their share via will or intestacy; it passes automatically to the remaining joint tenant or tenants. Express language is required, because this automatic passing on an interest bypassing the probate system, which is generally "frowned up." Thus, courts will infer a tenancy in common (to be discussed further below) if express language is not used. Here, express language was used, as A conveyed to B and C "jointly with right of survivorship." As such, the requirement for a valid joint tenancy were met.

Attempt at Fee Simple Subject to Condition Subsequent

A's deed to B and C also contained language that "if Blackacre, or any portion of Blackacre, is transferred to a 3rd party, either individually or jointly, by Beth or Chris, Andy shall have the right to immediately re-enter and repossess Blackacre."

Here, A was attempting to create a fee simple subject to a condition subsequent. Unlike a fee simple absolute, where the recipient has full ownership and control of the land indefinitely, and which is alienable, descendably, and devisable, a fee simple subject to a condition subsequent means that the takers ownership is conditioned upon a certain occurrence either being met or avoided. A fee simple subject to a condition subsequent is similar to a fee simple determinable in that both reserve an interest in the grantor, here A. However, a fee simple determinable uses express durational language (To A, for so long as....) where as a fee simple subject to a condition subsequent conveys the interest in full, but then conditions it upon a certain occurrence or non-occurrence. Another important distinction is that a fee simple determinable creates a possibility of reverter in the grantor, which means that the grantor's right vests automatically as soon as the occurrence takes place (without any action needed on the part of the grantor) while a fee simple subject to a condition subsequent creates a right of re-entry, which does not occur automatically and requires that the grantor affirmatively exercise his or her right to retake the land if the condition is met. Here, A attempted to create a fee simple subject to a condition subsequent, retaining a right of re-entry in himself. He did not use durational language, but instead conveyed to B and C as joint tenants, but then he added a condition. He also used the words "right to immediately re-enter" which indicate a right of re-entry rather than a possibility of reverter.

Restraint on Alienability

Though A attempted to reserve for himself a right of re-entry, the condition on the land amounts to a total restraint on alienation. A restrain on alienation is when a grantor attempts to make it so that the grantee cannot sell the land. The right to sell land, however, is one of the rights inherent in property ownership, such that restraints on alienation are not viewed favorably. Reasonable restraints of alienation may be tolerated. For example, a condition that the grantee cannot sell the land for 15 years, until a cloud on the title will be resolved, may be tolerated. Similarly, other restraints are possible, such as those that affect the appearance of the land, or the purpose for which the land is used. Total restraints on alienation, on the other land, will be stricken as void. Here, the condition that A attempted to include will amount to a total restraint on alienation, as it stated that B and C could not transfer Blackacre or any portion of it, and it was an indefinite condition. Therefore, the condition will be considered to be void, and it will be stricken from the deed.

Conclusion

Because this was a fee simple subject to a condition subsequent, the effect of the stricken clause will be that B and C have a fee simple absolute (discussed above). A's future interest will be eliminated. Thus, A initially conveyed to B and C a joint tenancy with right of survivorship in fee simple absolute.

2. Rights, Titles, and Interests in Blackacre of Andy, Chris, and Mona

Andy's Interest

As discussed above, Andy's interest in Blackacre terminated when he included a total restraint on alienation in his deed to B and C. Because the condition will be stricken, there is no stated occurrence that can cause A to be able to validly exercise his "right to immediately re-enter and repossess Blackacre" though that was his intent and desire. Because his right to re-entry is impossible, it too will be stricken and A has no remaining interest in Blackacre.

Mona's Interest

In order to discuss what interest Mona has in Blackacre, it is necessary to first discuss Beth's conveyance to Frank and Frank's subsequent death.

Beth's conveyance to Frank

B conveyed her interest in Blackacre to Frank without the knowledge of C. When one joint tenant conveys his or her interest in the joint tenancy, the result is that the joint tenancy is severed. The reasoning is that the grantee who receives the conveyance will not share the four unities with the remaining tenant, thus they cannot be joint tenants with respect to one another. However, this does not mean that B cannot convey her interest in Blackacre - she can - it simply means that the person she conveys to will be a tenant in common with her former joint tenant.

A tenancy in common is when two or more people each own an undivided interest in land. An undivided interest means that each has the right to possess the whole. The four unities are not required, so that one tenant in common may own a larger interest in the land, but each will still have the right to possess the whole.

Here, when B conveyed to Frank, the joint tenancy was severed as between B and C, and C and Frank became tenants in common, each with an undivided one half share in Blackacre. There will be no remaining right to survivorship, as tenants in common do not have this right. The fact that B did not give notice to C of her conveyance is irrelevant - joint tenants do not need the consent of one another to convey their individual interests in the land.

Frank's Death

Frank died in a car accident after he received his interest in Blackacre. He did not leave a will, meaning that he died intestate. The facts indicate that his only living relative was his cousin Mona, which means that Mona will receive all of Frank's real and personal property via intestacy.

Mona's Interest

Mona thus received Frank's undivided one-half interest in Blackacre via intestacy, and became a tenant in common with C. This means that at the time of Frank's death, Mona HAD the right to possess Blackacre with C. However, as will be discussed further below, Mona may have lost this interest via adverse possession. More facts are needed as to the passage of time since Chris told Mona that she had no interest in Blackacre and posted "no trespassing" signs, thereby ousting Mona and initiating a hostile possession of Blackacre. If the statutory length of time has passed, Mona will have lost her interest in Blackacre, because (as discussed below) the other requirement for adverse possession will have been met. If, however, the requisite amount of time has not passed, Mona can exercise her undivided one half interest in Blackacre and remain a tenant in common with Chris. She would be advised to bring an action to quiet title in order to do this.

Chris's Interest

As discussed above, C was initially a joint tenant with B, and then became a tenant in common with Frank when B conveyed to him. Subsequently, he became a tenant in common with Mona when she inherited Frank's interest via intestacy.

C, though, may now possess all of Blackacre in fee simple absolute via adverse possession. When C told Mona that she had no interest in Blackacre, he effectively ousted her, basically meaning affirmatively kicked her off the property, thereby starting the adverse possession clock running. The requirement of adverse possession are a continuous, adverse, open, and hostile possession for the required statutory period of time. Here, C's possession was continuous for however long it's been since he ousted Mona - the facts do not indicate that C ever stopped possession Blackacre. His possession is open - he lives there and posted a No Trespassing sign for all to see. It is hostile and adverse, because it is not with Mona's consent. For this prong, it doesn't matter if C thinks that he is entitled to full ownership or not as subjective good or bad faith is irrelevant. The fact that C paid the insurance and taxes is not required by a majority of jurisdictions, but it certainly does not pose a problem for C that he did pay them, as indicated in the facts. Therefore, as long as the statutory time period is met, C will possess all of Blackacre via adverse possession.

Finally, it should be noted that although C may have acquired title via adverse possession, it will not be marketable. In order to convey the land in fee simple to someone else, and not just convey his one half interest, C will have to bring an action to quiet title against Mona.

Q6 Community Property

In 2003, Wendy and Hank were engaged to be married. They discovered that the $10,000 monthly income Wendy derived from a trust fund would terminate upon her marriage or upon her reaching the age of 25, whichever came first. Therefore, they decided to postpone their wedding until Wendy's 25th birthday, in 2006, and instead began to live together.

Also in 2003, Wendy and Hank agreed that Wendy would pursue a master's degree in education and that Hank would quit his job and stay home, taking care of the household chores. Wendy opened a checking account in both of their names, into which she deposited her $10,000 monthly trust income. Wendy used funds in the checking account to pay living expenses for Hank and herself. Wendy also used funds in the checking account to buy a new car. She put title to the car in both of their names.

In 2006, Wendy and Hank married. Wendy's $10,000 monthly trust income terminated. Afterwards, Wendy began teaching at a local college.

In 2008, Wendy learned that her compensation was less than that of her male counterparts and made a claim against the college.

In 2009, Wendy separated from Hank and filed an action for dissolution of marriage. Shortly afterwards, she settled her claim against the college in return for additional salary in the amount of $10,000 per year for the next three years.

Unbeknownst to Wendy, Hank had run up a gambling debt to a casino during their marriage. At the time of their separation, Hank owed the casino $50,000.

Upon dissolution of marriage, what are Wendy's and Hank's rights and liabilities with respect to:

1. The car? Discuss.

2. The $30,000 in additional salary under the settlement? Discuss.

3. The $50,000 owed to the casino? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

Answer A

California is a community property state. The community property system applies to people who are legally married or registered as domestic partners. All property acquired before or after marriage or separation and all property acquired by gift, bequeath, devise, or descent is presumptivelt the acquiring spouse's separate property (SP). All other property acquired during marriage is presumptively community property (CP). This question involved the dissolution of a marriage. Upon dissolution, each spouse is entitled to all of their separate property and community property should be divided equally between them.

The Car

CP Principles do not apply

Unmarried cohabitants are not included under the CP system, even if they are engaged and plan to marry. However, under Marvin, cohabitants may have some rights under contract theories where there are agreements between the parties regarding income and expenses.

Here, H and W were engaged and postponed their wedding until she turned 25 so W would continue to receive payments under her trust fund. They then moved in together. As unmarried cohabitants, they are outside the CP system even though they were engaged and had planned to married. There must be a valid marriage for any property to be CP. However, they may have contract rights under Marvin.

Contract Formed between H and W

An enforceable contract may be found between cohabitants when there is an agreement supported by consideration of each party and the consideration is more than sexual services.

H will argue that there was an enforceable agreement between him and W. H will show the joint bank account that the trust funds were deposited and the use of the trust funds to pay living expenses as evidence of this agreement. H may also argue that the agreement constitutes a valid contract as his household duties were consideration for

W's contribution of her income to support the couple so that W could attend school and earn her master's degree. This argument would likely be effective in most courts as it seems to be established under the facts that there was a meeting of the minds and the consideration on both sides was valid.

Interests in the Car under a valid agreement

Where there is a valid agreement between cohabitants, they may be able to acquire property interests under its terms.

W purchased the car while she and H were cohabitating before marriage. W paid for the car with her trust income, which is undisputably her SP as she has not yet married. The car was title in both H and W's names and the funds used were from a joint bank account. While certain title presumptions would control under CP system, here the interests in the car are governed by principles of contract and equity. H will argue that he has an interest in the car because he and W agreed that she would attend school and he would stay home and they would live off of her trust income until it expired when she turned 25. Further, the car was purchased with funds from a joint bank account to which H would have had a right to withdraw, showing an intent that the funds benefit both H and W. Further, W put the car in both names, confirming her intent that there be a joint interest. Therefore, H should be given an equitable interest in the car. W will argue that while they agree to use her income to support themselves, she never intended to agree to give H any interest in the car that would exist beyond their relationship and only put his name on the title for convenience while they were living together. At dissolution, then, the car should be treated as a gift and not as something to which H as an interest. However, because there is clear evidence of an agreement regarding the use of the trust income to support H and W in exchange for H's household duties and it was W who opened a joint checking account and deposited the trust funds there and then put the car in H and W's name, H will likely be found to have some interest in the car, likely one-half of its now depreciated value as the agreement and form of title indicate a desire to share equally, despite the fact that the purchase funds are traceable to W's SP.

The $30,000 Salary Under the Settlement

Termination of the Marital Economic Community

The marital economic community is formed at marriage and determinates upon permanent separation, which occurs when the parties live separate and apart and at least one spouse does not intend to return to the marriage.

W separated from H in 2009 and filed for dissolution of marriage. This evidences an intent not to return to the marriage and thus constitutes permanent separation and terminates the marital economic community.

What to the proceeds of the settlement replace?

Any labor performed by a married person is considered community labor and any salary earned during marriage is CP. However, salary earned following permanent separation is SP. Courts have found that when funds received following permanent separation are intended to replace wages that were earned during marriage, those funds are CP because they are traceable to community labor.

Here, W began working at a local college in 2006, after marriage to H. All salary earned prior to separation is therefore CP. In 2008 she discovered she was being paid less than male colleagues and filed suit. In 2009 and post-separation, she settled for $10,000 additional salary for the next three years. H will argue that the settlement is CP because it is intended to replace the salary that W should have been paid and was earning during marriage. W will argue that because the funds are going to be distributed as post-separation salary, they are her SP. Here, replacement analysis favors H and will result in the CP characterization as the settlement related to a claim for wages that should have been paid during marriage, as the claim was filed during marriage, and therefore are intended to replace CP earnings.

Distribution of Settlement Funds

In cases of personal injury settlement, courts have classified the settlement proceeds for injuries occurring during marriage as CP but strongly favor awarding such funds to the injured spouse upon dissolution in a rare exception to the presumption that CP should be divided equally.

W will likely try an analogize to these cases, arguing that the discrimination was an injury during marriage and even if the proceeds are CP she is entitled to them upon dissolution as they are compensation for her injuries. This argument will likely be unsuccessful. Personal injury funds are awarded because they typically compensate for the injured spouse's present and future suffering and medical expenses and as such should be given to the injured spouse both because he or she will have an continued increase need and because the injury was personal to the spouse. Further, even with personal injury damages, the award will be divided to the extent equity requires, including when there has been loss to the community. Here, the loss compensated was entirely the community's as W was underpaid for her community labor and thus did not receive the salary she should have, which would have been entirely CP. Therefore, H and W will each have a one-half interest in the proceeds at dissolution.

Rights of H and W to the settlement

The settlement is CP and so H and W each have a right to one-half the amount, or $15,000. This amount could be paid to H now by giving him a CP share in an amount that accounts for his $15,000 or by imposing a remedial trust on the funds such that H and W are each entitled to one-half of the payments over the next three years.

H's Gambling Debt

Liability During Marriage

During marriage, debts acquired before or during marriage are community debts and any CP and the acquiring spouse's SP will be liable for the debt. Therefore, whether H acquired the debt entirely during marriage or not, the CP would have been liable during marriage.

Liability Upon Dissolution

At dissolution, the community property is divided and thus no longer exists. While CP is divided equally, courts have more discretion in the division of liabilities acquired during marriage. Where one spouse has acquired a debt and the debt was not for the benefit of the community, it would likely be assigned to the debtor spouse upon dissolution.

H ran up a gambling debt of $50,000. This was without W's knowledge and not for the benefit of the community and therefore upon dissolution, a court would likely assign the remaining debt to H as that would be the equitable result and is within the court's discretion.

If a Creditor Makes a Claim post-separation and prior to property distribution

While separation terminates the marital economic community, it does not automatically terminate the CP estate. If a creditor makes a claim while the CP estate is still in existence, then the CP estate can be reached prior to the CP being distributed. In cases of contract debt, the creditor may opt to recover from the CP or the debtor spouse's SP.

In this case, even though W was not aware of the debt at the time of separation, the CP estate would still be liable. The casino could opt, at any time before property distribution, to seek recovery from CP or H's SP. However, any of W's SP would not be reachable to satisfy H's debt.

Answer B

California is a community property state. All property acquired during marriage, other than separate property, is presumed to be community property. All property acquired before marriage or during marriage by gift or inheritance is presumed to be separate property. Further, all property acquired during marriage with the use of separate property funds is presumed to be separate property.

To determine the character of property upon divorce, the court will look to the source of the funds used to acquire the property. A mere change in form of the property will not change its character. Further the courts will also look to the actions of the parties which may have an effect on the character of the property and any presumptions that apply. Upon divorce, the court will divide all community property equally, unless the interest of justice require otherwise.

With these principles in mind, we can turn to the property in issue.

1) The Car?

No marriage- Separate property funds used to acquire

Here the car was acquired before marriage. In 2003 Wendy and Hank were engaged to be married. They discovered that the $10,000 monthly income Wendy derived from a trust fund would terminate upon her marriage or upon her reaching the age of 25, whichever came first. Therefore they decided to postpone their wedding until Wendy's 25th birthday, in 2006, and instead began living together. Also, Wendy in 2003 opened a checking account in both of their names, into which she deposited her $10,000 (which would be considered her separate property as there is no marriage) into an account in both of their names. Wendy also used the funds to buy a new car.

Thus at this point, their relationship would not be governed by community property law.

Hank will assert that he is entitled to a portion of the car because Wendy opened a checking account in both of their names, into which she deposited her $10,000 monthly trust income. Thus, Hank will assert that she made a gift of the trust property, which before marriage, and even after marriage would have been considered separate property (as trust income is usually characterized as a gift or inheritance). However, Hank would have to satisfy the requirements of a contract under California's view on meritricious relationships.

Meritricous Relationship

California does not recognize common law marriage, but will recognize one that was contracted in another state that does recognize a common law marriage. Because there is no marriage at this point, any funds used would be separate property. Thus, as there is no community, any agreements the parties have as to any property would be governed by contract law, unless the main thrust of the contract is sexual relations. Here because instead of marrying one another and terminating the trust income payments, Hank and Wendy decided to move in together, there is no valid marriage and any agreements they have as to property would be governed by contract law.

Title to the car in both of their names

Accordingly, here Hank will assert that they had an agreement as to the car that it was to be in both of their names and thus he has a right to distribution of the car as partially his property. This would require that Hank prove that there was a contract between the two, as community property principles would not apply in this situation as, at this point there is no marriage.

Wendy will assert that she owns the car as her own separate property. She will assert that she used her funds prior to marriage, and thus the court should trace back the source of the property to her earnings prior to marriage. However, as noted above, if Hank is able to show that they had an agreement as to property acquired during the time pending their marriage and he is able to show that taking title in joint names evidences this agreement, he will be able to assert an interest in the car based on contract law. Further he will point to the fact that he quit his job in reliance upon their agreement to take title jointly to her trust income and thus there was valid consideration.

Further he will attempt to assert that the consideration for the contract was not sexual relations, rather it was the agreement that she would pursue an education, while he would take care of the household chores. If Hank is successful, the car would be distributed pursuant to a contract between the parties, likely here equally as title was taken in both of their names.

Lucas- Anti Lucas

Alternatively Wendy will assert that Lucas decision and Anti Lucas apply here. Under Lucas, when a spouse expends separate property to take title jointly, a presumption arises that for the purposes of divorce, it is treated as community property. Under Lucas, all separate property expended for the acquisition of property in joint form would be presumed a gift. However California enacted Anti Lucas statutes to overturn this decision and entitle the separate property to be reimbursed in the form of an interest free loan. Thus she will assert that because title was taken in both of their names, the Anti Lucas statutes apply and she should be entitled to her down payment for the property in the form of interest free loan. However, because there is no community, this is not applicable here.

Wendy's use of trust income to pay living expenses for Hank and herself

It should be noted that Wendy's use of separate property, her trust income prior to marriage, for the living expense for Hank and herself will not entitle her to any reimbursement, unless they had an agreement to the contrary. It is presumed that when one party uses separate property for the expenses of another party, that it was intended as a gift. Thus, unless Wendy can show an agreement to the contrary, she will not be entitled to reimbursement for such expenditures.

2) The $30,000 in additional salary under the settlement?

Cause of actions that arise during marriage

A cause of action that arises during marriage is deemed to be a community property asset, subject to division upon divorce. Here in 2006, Wendy and Hank married. Thus the community commenced and all community property principles will attach to the relationship.

Wendy's $10,000 monthly trust income terminated. Afterwards, Wendy began teaching at a local college. In 2008, Wendy learned that her compensation was less than that of her male counterparts and made a claim against the college.

Consequently, because the cause of action arose during marriage, likely the court will find that any subsequent award is deemed community property.

Wendy will assert that because shortly after her separation, she settled her claim against the college in return for additional salary in the amount of $10,000 per year for the next three years, she will claim that this settlement was meant not as a settlement for past wages but as wage replacement for future years.

Wage replacement

Wendy will claim the settlement is meant as a form of wage replacement for the future years. Wage replacement under community property law are characterized upon receipt. Thus if received during marriage, will be deemed community property, however if received after marriage, will be deemed the working spouse's separate property. Here, Wendy will assert that as such, the $10,000 should be deemed her separate property. She will argue that wage replacements are characterized at the time they are received rather than at the time the cause of action arose. Thus she will assert that because she will receive the $10,000 after marriage, they should properly be deemed wage replacements characterized upon receipt.

Community property right to settlement

However, Hank will likely prevail in his assertion that the payments are for past services that occurred during marriage. All time labor and skill expended during a marriage is considered a valuable community property asset. Further all wages earned during marriage are considered community property. Here Hank will point to the fact that Wendy in 2008, learned that her compensation was less than that of her male counterparts and made a claim against the college. The following year, Wendy and the college settlement for an additional $10,000 per year for the next three years. Because this settlement was likely due because of the fact that during the marriage she was earning less than her male counterparts, the intent of the college was to compensate her for her labor expended in the past.

Thus because Hank will successfully assert that the settlement was entered into to pay Wendy for past services, namely her years of employment at the college from 2006 to 2009, he will be entitled to a community property interest in the $30,000. Thus each will likely be awarded $15,000.

Education expenses

It should also be noted that if the community pays down the loans incurred to gain an education and that spouses earning capacity has been enhanced, the community will be entitled to reimbursement for such expenses made from community funds even if the education was gained prior to marriage, unless 1) the community has already substantially benefitted from the education, 2) the other spouse has gained a community funded education and 3) if it lessens the need for spousal support upon dissolution. Here there are no facts to indicate whether the education that Wendy received was at all funded by the community during marriage. However, in the case that the community did pay part of her education, she will assert the exceptions.

Community has already substantially benefitted

There is a presumption that arises if the education was gained 10 years before the end of a marriage, the community has already substantially benefitted and is not entitled to reimbursement. Here this is exception is inapplicable because Wendy earned the education in 2003, they married in 2006, and the community ended in 2008.

Other spouses Community funded education

There are no facts to indicate that Hank has received an education.

Lessen the need for spousal support

Wendy will likely assert that although she gained the education prior to marriage, it lessened her need for spousal support upon dissolution. She will assert that she was living off of a trust which expired in 2006, thus her education enabled her to gain employment which lessened the need for spousal support. Thus she will claim that H is not entitled to reimbursement.

3) The $50,000 owed to the casino?

Debts during marriage

All parties during the marriage have equal right to manage and control the community. Thus each spouse is allowed to incur debt and borrow money. Such debt incurred during marriage is generally presumed to be community property. However, debt acquired during the marriage will likely be awarded to the debt incurring spouse. The non debt acquiring spouse's separate property will not be liable on the debt incurred by the other spouse. Here Unbeknownst to Wendy, Hank had run up a gambling debt to a casino during their marriage. At the time of their separation, Hank owed the casino $50,000.

Thus this debt during marriage would properly be characterized as community property debt. However, upon dissolution, the court will likely award the debt to the debt incurring spouse.

Necessaries

There is an exception to the general rule that one spouse's separate property will be unavailable to the other spouse's creditors. This exception applies for all debt incurred during marriage and even during the separation if the debt is incurred for a necessary. A necessary is one that is a requirement of life, such as medical care and food and water. Here because the debt was incurred by Hank for gambling at a casino, likely this exception would not apply. Debt incurred at a casino is not a necessary of life and as such Wendy's separate property will not be available to the casino.

Interest of justice require different allocation

The court may however, in the interest of justice require that different debt allocation be made upon divorce. The rationale is that at this point, the interest is in protecting the creditors. Thus the court may look to see which spouse is in a better position to repay the debt and may allocate the debt to such a spouse. Here the facts indicate that Wendy was working for a college and actually earning a salary. However, Hank and Wendy agreed that Hank would quit his job and stay home taking care of the household chores. Thus if Hank is unable to repay the debt, it may be that the court will assign the debt to Wendy to assure that the Casino is repaid.

ESSAY QUESTIONS 1, 2, AND 3

California Bar Examination

Answer all three questions. Time allotted: three hours

Your answer should demonstrate your ability to analyze the facts in question, to tell the difference between material and immaterial facts, and to discern the points of law and facts upon which the case turns. Your answer should show that you know and understand the pertinent principles and theories of law, their qualifications and limitations, and their relationships to each other.

Your answer should evidence your ability to apply law to the given facts and to reason in a logical, lawyer-like manner from the premises you adopt to a sound conclusion. Do not merely show that you remember legal principles. Instead, try to demonstrate your proficiency in using and applying them.

If your answer contains only a statement of your conclusions, you will receive little credit. State fully the reasons that support your conclusions, and discuss all points thoroughly.

Your answer should be complete, but you should not volunteer information or discuss legal doctrines which are not pertinent to the solution of the problem.

Unless a question expressly asks you to use California law, you should answer according to legal theories and principles of general application.

Q1 Wills

In 2004, Tess, a widow, executed a valid will leaving her estate to her children, Abel, Bernice, and Cassie per stirpes.

In 2009, Tess, Abel, and Bernice quarreled and Tess decided to draft a new will. She went to an office supply store, got a preprinted will form, and filled in the following in her own handwriting:

> Because my son Abel and daughter Bernice have been unkind to me, I specifically disinherit them. I give and bequeath all my property to University.

Tess signed and dated the form. No one was present when she signed and dated the form and hence no one signed as a witness to her signature. At the time, she was addicted to prescription pain killers and was an alcoholic.

In 2010, Cassie adopted David as her son. Soon thereafter, Cassie died, survived by David.

In 2011, Tess died, leaving an estate worth $1,000,000.

Tess's 2009 will has been offered for probate.

(1) What arguments can Abel and Bernice reasonably make in objecting to the validity of Tess's 2009 will? Discuss.

(2) Does David have any claim to a share of Tess's estate? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

Answer A

(1) What arguments can Abel and Bernice reasonably make in objecting to the validity of Tess's 2009 will?

A. Was the first will revoked?

Abel and Bernice can first object that Tess's 2004 will wasn't revoked by the subsequent will drafted in 2009. A will can be revoked either expressly or impliedly. Express revocation requires the testator to use language that makes his intent clear that the original will is revoked by a later will. A will can be impliedly revoked if the second will contradicts with the first will and the second will bequeaths substantially all of testator's property. Here, unlike in the first will where Tess left Abel and Bernice part of her estate, Tess specifically disinherited Abel and Bernice. A testator can disinherit those who would take if testator died intestate (here, her children) by expressly using language that she intends to disinherit them in her will. Because the second will contradicts the first will and bequeaths all Tess's property to a different person (University), the will was validly revoked by implication and the second will can be probated if it is proved valid. It is clear Tess intended the second will executed in 2009 to revoke the 2004 will and not be a codicil because she specifically contradicts a provision stated in her first will (to Abel, Bernice, and Cassie per stirpes) and then Tess in her later will left all of her property instead to University.

B. Objection that 2009 will is not a valid will

(1) Was this a valid attested will?

California does not allow oral wills. Therefore, a valid attested will must be (1) Written, (2) Signed by Testator, (3) in the presence of 2 witnesses who have to sign before testator's death, but not necessarily in his presence. Also, [if] testator doesn't sign in the two witnesses' presence, it can be valid if he later acknowledges the signature on the will as his with witnesses present, who sign then or before T's death. Even if there are no witnesses, as long as (1) and (2) (writing and signed by T) are satisfied, extrinsic evidence or testimony can be offered that proves that T either in writing or orally expressed his intent that this writing be his will. This has to be proved through clear and convincing evidence. Here, Tess's will is likely not a valid attested will. Even though the will was in writing and signed by Tess, there were no witnesses to her signature. For this will to be considered valid, there would need to be clear and convincing evidence that Tess intended this to be her will or that later Tess acknowledged the signature as hers and witnesses sign. Since those facts are not included here, Tess's will is not a valid attested will.

(2) Valid holographic will?

Tess's will will likely be considered a valid holographic will. A holographic will doesn't have to be fully in the testator's handwriting, but all material provisions must be solely in the T's handwriting. Material provisions include the beneficiaries who will take must be named and specify the gifts they will receive. A holographic will must also be signed by T to be valid. Here, Tess's 2009 will includes all material provisions. Tess specifically names University as the beneficiary and specifically names the gift they will take - "all my property". Tess signed the will, satisfying the signature requirement. The holographic will is also dated, which is not required but helps a court when a will is offered for probate to know the order in which wills were executed. Even though the will was printed on a preprinted will form, this is not of consequence. Therefore, since Tess named a specified beneficiary (University) and specifically named what property they would take (all) in her own handwriting, and signed the will, all material provisions required of a holographic will exist and Tess's 2009 will would be considered a valid holographic will in California. For the reasons listed above, Tess's 2004 will was revoked, and her 2009 will should be probated, if it is found that Tess had the capacity at the time of execution of the 2009 will (discussed below).

C. Did Tess lack capacity when the 2009 will was executed?

A testator who executes a will must have capacity when the will is executed for the will to be considered valid and to be offered for probate. Capacity requires several things: (1) T must be at least 18, (2) T must understand the natural objects of her bounty, (3) must understand the nature and value of property, and (4) T must understand she is making a will. Here, Tess's capacity could be questioned because she was both addicted to prescription painkillers and was an alcoholic at the time she executed the will. A person could be considered to lack capacity normally but have times of being lucid. If the will is executed during a lucid period, then T will be considered to have met the capacity requirement. (1) The first element required for capacity here can likely be assumed. It seems Tess is over the age of 18 since she was already widowed and had three children, and presumably died of natural causes not many years after her 2004 will. (2) It appears that T understood the natural objects of her bounty (her children). This is possible because she specifically refers to her children who she knew would take either under her 2004 will or by intestate succession - Abel and Bernice. She made a point to disinherit them, and at least knew some of the natural objects of her bounty. Though, because Tess didn't list Cassie (who would also be a natural object of her bounty), it is possible she didn't understand all the natural objects of her bounty. (3) It is not clear that Tess understood the nature and value of her property. She only stated "all my property". She didn't specifically list any property but only made a blanket statement referring to the whole of her property. It is not clear that she understood the disposition of her property. (4) It is clear that Tess understood she was making a will. Her language specifically "disinherited" two of her children and then she "bequeathed" her property to University. Tess also wrote these statements on a preprinted will form that she went to an office supply store to buy. It appears that because Tess used certain language and wrote her bequests on a will form, she understood that she was making a will. Because Tess didn't even refer to Cassie (which questions whether she understood the natural objects of her bounty) and because Tess only bequeathed "all" her property instead of listing out certain dispositions, it is possible that Abel and Bernice could prove that Tess lacked the capacity to make the 2009 will.

(2) Does David have any claim to a share of Tess's estate?

A. Capacity

It is possible that David has a claim to Tess's estate. Adopted children inherit from their parents just as if they were natural born children, so David will be able to take any gift that his mother Cassie would've been able to take had she been living. If it is found that Tess lacked the capacity to execute the 2009 will (for the reasons listed above), and the 2004 will was never validly executed, then David could take his mother's share that was devised under the 2004 will. Since Tess wanted her estate distributed to Abel, Bernice and Cassie per stirpes, that means that the estate is divided equally at the first level where there is issue left (whether anyone is living on that level or not). Here, if Tess's estate was divided per stirpes, Abel, Bernice and Cassie's issue - David - would all inherit equal shares - 1/3 of the estate.

B. Pretermitted child

If the 2009 will is found to be valid, then David could argue that Cassie was a pretermitted child, but this argument is likely to fail. A pretermitted child will be provided for if they were born/adopted after a will was executed, were not provided for in the will, and (1) were not provided for outside of the will, (2) all the estate wasn't left to their other parent, or (3) they weren't expressly disinherited. Here, because Cassie was already living when Tess's will was executed, she cannot claim as a pretermitted child, even though she wasn't expressly disinherited. David would not be able to argue under the pretermitted child statute, even though he was adopted after the will, because he is the grandchild and not child of T. Therefore, Cassie nor David would be considered a pretermitted child and David does not have a claim under as a pretermitted child.

Answer B

1. Arguments Abel and Bernice can make objecting to the validity of Tess's 2009 Will:

Revocation of the 2004 Will

In 2004, Tess executed a valid will leaving her estate to Abel, Bernice, and Cassie. The issue is whether Tess's 2009 will revoked the 2004 will. A will may be revoked by a subsequent will (1) if the subsequent will is validly executed; and (2) if the testator simultaneously had the intent to revoke the prior will. Revocation may be express (e.g., "I revoke all prior wills and codicils"), or implied (a) to the extent that the wills are inconsistent; or (b) if the subsequent will makes a complete disposition of the testator's entire estate, then the prior will is revoked in its entirety.

Here, [Tess] did not expressly revoke the 2004 will in her 2009 will, because the 2009 will did not mention the prior will. However, Tess stated in her 2009 will that she "specifically disinherit[s]" her son Abel and Bernice. This statement is inconsistent with the 2004 will's disposition of Tess's entire estate to her children Abel, Bernice, and Cassie, so the 2004 will would be implicitly revoked as to its devises to Abel and Bernice, provided that it is validly executed or a valid holographic will. Moreover, Tess's 2009 will stated that she bequeaths "all my property to University," which is a complete disposition of her estate. As such, a court would likely find the 2004 will to be revoked in its entirety, if the 2009 will is valid.

The issue, therefore, is whether the 2009 will is a validly executed attested will, or a valid holographic will.

Validly Attested Will

Abel and Bernice will argue that the 2009 will failed to comply with the required formalities for a validly executed attested will. To be valid, an attested will must be: 1) in writing; 2) signed by the testator, or by another person in the testator's presence and at her direction; 3) the testator's signing or acknowledgement of the will must occur in the joint presence of at least two witnesses; 4) the two witnesses must sign the will within the testator's lifetime (though not necessarily in the testator's presence, or in the presence of each other); and 5) the two witnesses must have understood at the time that they were witnessing the testator sign her will.

Here, Tess's 2009 will was in writing (on the preprinted will form), and she signed and dated the document. However, there were no witnesses to Tess's signing of the will, and no witnesses signed the document. Thus, Tess's 2009 will failed to comply with the formalities required of a validly attested will.

Clear and Convincing Evidence Exception After 2009

After Jan. 1, 2009, a will which complies with the signature and writing requirements, but fails to comply with the witnessing requirements, may nonetheless be admitted to probate if the proponent of the will is able to produce clear and convincing evidence that the testator intended the document to be her will. Here, University (the party who stands to benefit from the 2009 will being valid) will argue that, since Tess's 2009 will was executed after this new rule went into effect, and since she signed and wrote portions of the will in her own handwriting, there is sufficient evidence to admit the will into probate.

This argument will probably fail. Abel and Bernice will argue that, as discussed infra, the fact that Tess was on painkillers and was an alcoholic at the time she signed the 2009 will weighs strongly against finding that there was clear and convincing evidence of her intent. Moreover, Abel and Bernice will argue that the clear and convincing evidence exception is usually only successfully employed when a testator attempts to comply with the witnessing requirements, but fails due to a technicality such as the two witnesses not being jointly present at the same time, or failing to sign the document within the testator's lifetime. Here, Tess had no witnesses present whatsoever. Moreover, Tess created the will on a preprinted will form, rather than going through the more formal procedure of having an attorney draft up a customized will. They will also point out that the will illogically does not mention Cassie. All of these circumstances will likely persuade the court not to apply the clear and convincing evidence exception in this case. As such, the 2009 will will not be admitted to probate as a validly attested will.

Holographic Will

University will argue that, even if the 2009 will is not validly attested, it qualifies as a valid holographic will. A holographic will is valid if (1) the material terms (including all beneficiaries and bequests) are in the testator's own handwriting; and (2) the testator signs the will. A holographic will can indeed revoke a prior attested will (that was typed).

Here, all material terms in the 2009 will were in Tess's own handwriting. This included specifically disinheriting Abel and Bernice, and bequeathing "all my property to University." Tess additionally signed and dated the will. (A holographic will need not be dated, but an undated holographic will would be invalid to the extent that it conflicted with other wills. Since this will was dated, that is not a problem.)

Abel and Bernice will argue that not all material terms were included in Tess's handwriting because she failed to mention Cassie in the 2009 will. This argument will likely fail. Tess's statement in her own handwriting that "I give and bequeath all my property to University" is a complete disposition of her estate. Specifically mentioning Cassie was not necessary. As such, a court would likely admit the 2009 will to probate as a valid holographic will, provided that they find there was sufficient evidence of testamentary intent.

Capacity

Abel and Bernice will argue that Tess lacked capacity at the time she executed the 2009 will. To have capacity to execute a will, a testator must: 1) be over 18 years old; 2) know the extent of her property; 3) know the natural objects of her bounty (e.g., heirs); and 4) understand the nature of the act of executing a will.

Tess was presumably at least 18 years old in 2009, seeing as she was a widow and had three children. Abel and Bernice will argue that Tess lacked capacity because she was addicted to prescription painkillers and was an alcoholic. However, this evidence will likely be insufficient under these facts. All testators are presumed to have capacity, and the burden will be on Abel and Bernice to present evidence that Tess lacked capacity at the precise time she executed the 2009 will. Merely showing that she was addicted to painkillers and was an alcoholic will not be enough. They would need to prove that she was high or drunk at the time she executed the document. Given that she had the capacity to go to an office supply store, purchase a preprinted will form, and write legibly in her own handwriting, it is likely that she knew the nature and extent of her property. She also specifically referenced the natural objects of her bounty (Abel and Bernice), although they will point to the fact that she left Cassie out of the will as evidence that Tess was not completely aware at the time. However, Tess did mention that Abel and Bernice "have been unkind to me," which logically might be a reference to the fact that they quarreled recently. Ultimately, the fact that Tess left out Cassie will likely not be sufficient to prove that she lacked capacity at the time she executed the will. She clearly understood the nature of the act of executing a will; otherwise she would not have been able to purchase the will form and execute it without help.
Accordingly, Abel and Bernice's capacity defense will fail.

Insane Delusion

Even if a testator had capacity at the time she executed a will, affected parts of a will will be invalid if (1) the testator had a false belief; (2) which was the product of a sick mind; (3) there was no evidence supporting the belief; and (4) it affected the will.

Here, there is no evidence that Tess had any false beliefs about her quarrel with Abel and Bernice. Accordingly, this defense will fail.

Conclusion

Because Tess's 2009 will is a validly executed holographic will, and because Abel and Bernice's capacity and insane delusion defenses will fail, Abel and Bernice likely will fail in objecting to the validity of the 2009 will.

Final Note re Dependent Relative Revocation

Under the doctrine of dependent relative revocation, a will which the testator revokes in anticipation that a subsequent will would be valid may nonetheless be admitted to probate if the prior will turns out to be invalid. However, this doctrine would not apply here in any instance, because the 2004 will was not revoked by physical act. If the 2009 will was invalid, then the 2004 will would have never been revoked. As such, the doctrine of dependent relative revocation would not need to be invoked to save the 2004 will, because the 2004 will would have never been revoked by the 2009 will in the first place.

2. David's Claim:

Adopted Children / Intestacy

David is an adopted child of Cassie, who is Tess's son. When a child is adopted, it severs any right to inherit from their blood parents, and the adopted child is treated the same as a blood child of the adopting parent for purposes of wills and intestacy. Here, Cassie died in 2010, survived by David. If Cassie died intestate (i.e., without a will), and if David is her only son, David would inherit Cassie's entire estate. The question, therefore, is whether Cassie would have inherited any of the $1,000,000 in Tess's estate.

Per Stirpes

If Cassie were to inherit under the 2004 will, she would receive a "per stirpes" split of the $1,000,000, which would be one third (an equal division between all three of Cassie's children), for about $333,333. [David] would inherit this amount as the only heir of Cassie. However, we must first determine if Cassie would take anything after the 2009 will.

Pretermitted Heir

David might try to claim that Cassie was a pretermitted heir. A child which is born after the testator executed all testamentary instruments (wills, codicils, and trusts), but is not provided for in any of them, may nonetheless receive her intestate share. This doctrine will not apply here because Cassie was already alive when both the 2004 and 2009 wills were executed by Tess.

Revocation of 2004 Will

Because Cassie is not a pretermitted heir, whether David can take will depend on whether the 2009 will is valid, and whether the 2004 will was revoked by the 2009 will. As discussed above, the 2009 will is likely a valid holographic will, and because the 2009 will made a complete disposition of Tess's estate ("all my property to University"), a court is likely to find that the 2004 will was implicitly revoked in its entirety. If the court adopts this view, Cassie would not inherit under the 2009 or 2004 wills, and David accordingly would be entitled to no share of Tess's estate.

Assuming the 2009 Will is Invalid

Assuming, arguendo, that the 2009 will is invalid, then David would argue that he is entitled to a 1/3 share of Tess's estate because (a) Cassie would have inherited 1/3 under the 2004 will, and (b) David is Cassie's only heir. The issue, under these circumstances, would be whether the fact that Cassie predeceased Tess caused her bequest to Cassie under the 2004 will to lapse.

Lapse

Under the common law rule of lapse, if a beneficiary of a testator's will predeceased the testator, any bequests to the beneficiary would lapse (i.e., fail), and would fall into the residuary of the will (the block of remaining property after all specific, general, and demonstrative devises). Here, because Cassie predeceased Tess, her bequest would lapse under the common law rule, and David would take nothing.

Antilapse Statute

However, California, like most states, has adopted an antilapse statute. Under the statute, a bequest will not lapse if (1) if is to the testator's kindred, or kindred of a former spouse; and (2) the beneficiary leaves issue. Here, Cassie is Tess's kindred because she was Tess's daughter. Moreover, Cassie left David as issue. Accordingly, her bequest would not lapse under the antilapse statute, and Cassie's bequest of 1/3 of Tess's estate (under the 2004 will) would pass to her issue, David.

Conclusion

The 2009 will is likely a valid holographic will which revoked the 2004 will in its entirety. As such, Cassie's estate would be entitled to nothing under the 2009 will, and David would take nothing. However, if the court finds that the 2009 will was invalid, then Cassie's estate would take 1/3 of the $1,000,000 in Tess's estate under the 2004 will, which would pass to David via intestacy.

Q2 Constitution

Out of a sense of patriotism, Charles enlisted in the United States Army. Charles had risen to the rank of Captain.

Shortly after that promotion, after serious reflection, Charles began to rethink his previous religious, philosophical, and political views. He modified the religious preference he listed on his Army records from “Christian” to “Belief in a Superior Principle of Noninterference with Others Who Have Not Harmed You.” Charles concluded that his belief did not prohibit his assignment to duty in Country A, but it did preclude his assignment to duty in Country B.

Federal law requires military personnel to accept any assignment to duty, but when Charles was assigned to duty in Country B, he declined to go, and was charged with refusing to deploy. Since the charges were brought, Charles has frequently criticized American involvement in Country B.

Charles wishes to raise a defense against the refusal to deploy charge based solely on (1) the Free Exercise Clause and (2) the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the United States Constitution.

What is the likelihood of Charles prevailing? Discuss.

Answer A

The First Amendment prohibits the federal government from interfering with the free exercise of religion, and it also prohibits the federal government from establishing a religion. In general, because the First Amendment protections are so important, laws are subject to strict scrutiny, which means they must be necessary to achieve a compelling state interest. Additionally, there must be no less restrictive alternative.

(1) FREE EXERCISE OF RELIGION

MUST THE RELIGION PROTECTED BE A RECOGNIZED RELIGION?

As indicated above, the federal government cannot enact laws that interfere with the free exercise of religion. A necessary threshold question, therefore, is which religions are protected by the First Amendment Free Exercise Clause. The Supreme Court has indicated that the religion need not be a generally accepted or recognized religion, so long as the individual who practices the religion has a genuine belief in the religion.

In this case, Charles' new religion, "Belief in a Superior Principle of Noninterference with Others Who Have Not Harmed You," is not a generally accepted or recognized religion. However, no facts indicate that Charles does not have a genuine belief in this religion. As indicated in the facts, he had rethought his views, which gives credence to the fact that Charles genuinely considered and believes in his new religion.

Accordingly, Charles' new religion qualifies as one which is subject to First Amendment limitations.

FREE EXERCISE OF RELIGION V. LAWS OF GENERAL APPLICABILITY

The Supreme Court has indicated that a law will be struck down as violative of a person's free exercise of religion only in the event that the law was enacted with the purpose of interfering with the person's religion, and the law in fact does so interfere. Thus, laws of general applicability will not be struck down under the Free Exercise Clause. A good example of this is where the U.S. Government prevents mind-altering substances (i.e., drugs). In Native American religions, the Native Americans use peyote, a mind-altering substance, in the exercise of its religion. However, because the Supreme Court determined the law against drugs was one of general applicability and not directed at inhibiting Native Americans from practicing their religion, the law was upheld. Notably, two exceptions have been found: 1) The Amish do not have to send their children to school until age 16; and 2) people may still receive unemployment benefits if they quit a job due to religious beliefs. Neither exception is applicable here.

Rather, in this case, as is similar to the Native American peyote example, it appears the federal law is one of general applicability. Specifically, federal law requires military personnel to "accept any assignment to duty." Therefore, because the law was not enacted with the intent to interfere with religion [sic].

The law may, however, actually interfere with Charles' exercise of religion. Because he must accept any assignment to duty, and because he was charged with refusing to deploy, he therefore cannot exercise his religion which necessitates he refuse assignment to Country B. However, as indicated above, because the law was not enacted with the purpose of interfering with Charles' religion, it is one of general applicability and will be upheld.

NECESSARY TO ACHIEVE A COMPELLING STATE INTEREST

Even if the federal law to "accept any assignment to duty" was enacted with the intent to interfere with religion, it may still pass muster under the Free Exercise Clause if it is necessary to achieve a compelling state interest. Of note, under this strict scrutiny standard, the burden is on the government to so prove the law passes muster.

Here, the law is necessary, as the U.S. military must maintain order with respect to its troops. There are hundreds of thousands of people in the U.S. military, and for efficiency and administrative purposes alone, it would not make sense to allow individual military personnel to "pick and choose" where they are assigned. Indeed, the U.S. might have to forego a presence in dangerous areas if such was the case, as some military personnel may decline to go to war-torn parts of the world. Moreover, it is important that the military retain obedience from its troops and reduce tension, given the gravity of their missions and likelihood that American troops may be killed. Indeed, once Charles was assigned to duty in Country B, he frequently criticized American involvement in Country B, thereby disrupting efficiency and perhaps causing others to lose faith in the mission. Accordingly, the law is necessary.

There is also a compelling state interest - the protection and defense of the United States. Because national security and defense is such a profound interest to the United States, it qualifies as "compelling."

Moreover, there does not appear to be any less restrictive alternative. For example, the law could not allow some military personnel to accept some duties and reject others, while maintaining that others must accept any assignment (as such a law would be subject to equal protection claims).

Accordingly, because the law is necessary to achieve a compelling state interest, as maintaining order in troops in order to accomplish national security and defense, the law is valid. The government meets its burden in so proving.

Thus, given all of the above, Charles cannot successfully raise a defense based solely on the Free Exercise Clause.

(2) ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE

As indicated above, the First Amendment prohibits the federal government from establishing a religion.

APPROVING ONE SECT OF RELIGION OVER ANOTHER

In the rare event that the U.S. government might establish one sect of religion over another, said law would be subject to strict scrutiny, as described above. Here, it does not appear that the federal government is approving one sect over another, as one must accept assignment to duty regardless of religious sect.

Therefore, the government is not approving one sect of religion over another.

LEMON TEST

The basic test the Supreme Court uses in determining whether the federal government has established a religion is the Lemon test, which is comprised of three inquiries: 1) was the law enacted for a secular purpose; 2) does the primary effect neither inhibit or advance religion; and 3) is there no excessive entanglement by the government? If all three inquiries can be answered affirmatively, the law passes the Lemon test, and accordingly, the Establishment Clause is not violated.

A) SECULAR PURPOSE?

As indicated above, the first inquiry is whether the law was enacted for a secular purpose. Here, the law that military personnel must accept any assignment to duty does not reference religion whatsoever. Moreover, it appears the purpose of the law was to maintain order and faith in the military missions, and not to establish a religion.

Accordingly, there is a secular purpose behind the law.

B) PRIMARY EFFECT?

It must be decided whether the primary effect is to advance or inhibit religion. The effect of the law is that a person in the military will have to accept assignment regardless of his religious preferences, and without taking said preferences into account. Thus, it cannot be said that the law advances or inhibits religion, as the fact that one has a religious leaning toward a particular assignment in a particular country is inconsequential as to whether the person is eventually assigned to a particular country.

Rather, the primary effect of the law is to maintain order and administrative military efficiency.

Accordingly, the primary effect of the law neither advances or inhibits religion.

C) EXCESSIVE GOVERNMENT ENTANGLEMENT WITH RELIGION?

In order for a law to be valid under the Lemon test, there must not be excessive government entanglement with religion.

This inquiry may be Charles' best argument that the law should fail the Lemon test. Specifically, he can argue that the Army records list a religious preference. Accordingly, because he listed his religious preference, the military was on notice that his beliefs under his religion may conflict with assignment into particular countries.

However, the government can argue that any preference that Charles indicated has little to do with where he is eventually assigned to duty. Rather, military personnel are assigned where they are needed; where ongoing conflicts arise; etc. Thus, the law that a person must accept any assignment to duty, even if the military knows your religious preference/beliefs, does not excessively entangle with religion.

Accordingly, there is no excessive government entanglement with religion.

Thus, because the Lemon test is not satisfied, a court will likely find that the Establishment Clause has not been violated.

Charles will not succeed under either the Free Exercise Clause or the Establishment Clause.

Answer B

1. Free Exercise Clause

Under the First Amendment's Free Exercise Clause, the federal government may not prohibit the free exercise of any religion.

Are Charles's beliefs religious?

The first question is whether Charles's nontraditional belief system is religious. A religion need not be a popular or generally recognized system of belief, like Christianity, but it must be religious rather than political or philosophical in nature. There is no single test for determining whether a belief system is religious, but courts look to factors such as whether the system has indicia of traditional religious beliefs like dealing with questions about the existence and nature of a higher power, life after death, holidays, rituals, and moral teachings for living one's day-to-day life.

Here, Charles's belief system seems to lack any of these traditional indicia of religious beliefs. The single belief that his religion espouses is one of noninterference, but that gives only limited guidance on how to live one's day-to-day life. There is no indication of beliefs in a god or gods, views on life after death, holidays, or rituals. Moreover, the fact that Charles's beliefs here are tied closely to the situation in particular countries (rather than, for example, a belief in nonaggression to all) and that Charles has been criticizing U.S. policy on this basis suggests that the beliefs are more political than religious.

A court likely would conclude that Charles's belief system is only political or philosophical, not religious, and therefore his Free Exercise Clause claim will fail on this basis alone.

Genuineness

Religious beliefs also must be genuinely held to qualify for First Amendment protection. Here, there does not seem to be any question that Charles genuinely believes in his principle of noninterference, and thus this requirement would be met.

Religious accommodation

The Free Exercise Clause generally does not require accommodation of religious beliefs. The government may require a person to comply with neutral laws of general applicability even if doing so violates that person's genuinely held religious beliefs.

Here, the federal law requiring military personnel to accept any assignment is a neutral law of general applicability. It does not target only the religious or single out one religion for disfavored treatment, and there is no indication that it was adopted specifically to disadvantage religious persons. To the contrary, it probably was adopted for purely secular reasons, to prevent soldiers from undermining military planning by refusing to serve when deployed.

Even if it were not a neutral law of general applicability, the statute would be lawful if it satisfied strict scrutiny -- that it was necessary to achieve a compelling governmental interest and the least restrictive means of doing so. Although strict scrutiny is a demanding standard and the burden of proof is on the government, this law has a good chance of surviving this standard. The federal government has a compelling interest in military readiness and discipline among the troops; indeed, raising an army is one of the federal government's most important functions. The law is necessary to achieve that interest because if soldiers could refuse deployments, it would become difficult if not impossible to plan troop movements adequately and to keep units that trained together intact for battlefield activities. Even allowing a few religious exemptions could severely complicate these efforts if, for example, the objecting soldier had a unique role. And here the fact that Charles is a Captain rather than a low-level soldier suggests that there would be disruption in the chain of command if the unit were deployed without him. Therefore, the law should survive strict scrutiny even if that were the standard.

(I should note that Charles might have a claim under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, which subjects all Free Exercise Claims to strict scrutiny. Although the law was struck down as applied to States, most courts continue to find it valid as applied to the federal government. This is beyond the scope of the question, but as explained above Charles likely loses even under strict scrutiny.)

Therefore, the government can require Charles to comply with this law even if doing so violates his religious beliefs. Charles is likely to lose on this basis alone as well.

Military exception

Finally, another barrier to Charles's claim is the fact that he voluntarily enrolled in the army. Soldiers give up many of their constitutional rights, to the extent that they are inconsistent with important military functions. And as noted above the military has a strong interest in enforcing its requirement that soldiers accept all assignments. While conscientious objectors -- those who are religiously or philosophically opposed to all use of military force -- have traditionally been exempted from military service entirely, those who object to some but not all wars have never been exempted. And because Charles enrolled voluntarily rather than through the draft, his claim to an exemption would be particularly weak.

Conclusion

Charles will not prevail on his Free Exercise Clause claim.

2. Establishment Clause

The Establishment Clause prohibits the federal government from establishing an official religion or preferring religion over irreligion. A federal statute passes muster under this clause if it (1) has a secular purpose, (2) does not have the primary effect of promoting religion, and (3) does not excessively entangle the government in religious or ecclesiastical matters.

Secular purpose

As noted above, the federal statue has a valid secular purpose of promoting military readiness and troop discipline. Because this has nothing to do with religion, Charles will not prevail under this test.

Secular effect

The primary effect of this statute also does not seem to be promoting religion. The primary effect is to keep military units intact no matter where they are deployed. Religious and irreligious soldiers are treated the same way regardless of their belief. In fact, if the rule was to the contrary and religious soldiers could refuse particular deployments, that would at least raise serious Establishment Clause questions about whether the government was promoting particular religious beliefs (although most religious-accommodation statutes have been upheld against Establishment Clause challenges). Therefore, Charles is likely to lose under this test too.

Excessive entanglement

There is no real risk of entanglement between the government and religion under the statute. The statute does not require the government to make any quintessentially religious determinations because it applies equally to all regardless of religion or belief. Again, the rule Charles seeks would raise more difficult questions than this one does if it required the government to decide whether a person had a genuine religious belief precluding a particular deployment. Therefore, Charles will lose under this test too.

Conclusion

Charles will not prevail on his Establishment Clause challenge.

Q3 Real Property

Leo owned three consecutive lots on Main Street. At one end, Lot 1 contained an office building, The Towers, leased to various tenants; in the middle, Lot 2 was a lot posted for use solely by the tenants and guests of the other two lots for parking; at the other end, Lot 3 contained a restaurant, The Grill, operated by Leo.

In 2008, Leo leased The Grill to Thelma for 15 years at rent of $1,000 per month under a written lease providing in relevant part: “Tenant shall operate only a restaurant on the premises. Landlord shall not operate a restaurant within 5 miles of the premises during the term of the lease. Tenant and his or her guests shall have the right to use Lot 2 for parking.”

In March 2009, Thelma assigned the lease to The Grill to Andrew after he had reviewed it. The lease did not contain any provision restricting assignment. Although Leo did not express consent to the assignment, he nevertheless accepted monthly rental payments from Andrew.

In April 2010, Leo sold Lot 1 and Lot 2 to Barbara after she had inspected both lots. Barbara immediately recorded the deeds. Leo retained ownership of Lot 3.

In June 2010, Leo informed Andrew that, within a month, he intended to open a restaurant across the street from The Grill.

Also in June 2010, Barbara announced plans to close the parking lot on Lot 2 and to construct an office building there. There is no other lot available for parking within three blocks of The Grill.

1. Andrew has filed a lawsuit against Leo, claiming that he breached the provision of the lease stating, “Landlord shall not operate a restaurant within 5 miles of the premises during the term of the lease.” How is the court likely to rule on Andrew’s claim? Discuss.

2. Andrew has filed a lawsuit against Barbara, claiming that she breached the provision of the lease stating, “Tenant and his or her guests shall have the right to use Lot 2 for parking.” How is the court likely to rule on Andrew’s claim? Discuss.

Answer A

1. ANDREW (A) V. LEO (L)

Applicable Law

Service contracts, including leases, are governed by the common law. These contracts involve a lease of land, which is a service. As such, the common law will govern these transactions.

Validity of Lease from L to T - Statute of Frauds

The Statute of Frauds prevents the introduction of a contracts for services that takes more than one year to complete, unless the statute of frauds has been satisfied by a writing, performance, or a judicial assention. In this case, the lease between L and T [was] for a sum of 15 years, but it was in writing and presumably signed by both parties. Therefore, the Statue of Frauds has been satisfied. Therefore, there was a valid lease from L to A.

Assignment from T to A

An assignment occurs when a person who is in rightful possession of property transfers all of her rights to another person. An assignment will be presumed valid, unless there is a no-assignment provision in the lease which is valid and has not been waived. Once rights have been assigned, the original assigning party, the assignor, remains in privity of contract with the lessor and the new assignee is not in privity of estate. As such, both the assignor and the assignee may assert their rights against the landlord, and the landlord may similarly assert his rights against both assignor and assignee.

In this case, A will easily be able to show that T assigned the lease to him since she transferred all of her rights in The Grill to him. Additionally, the original lease between L and A did not contain a 'no assignment' provision. T transferred all of her rights in Lot 3 to A for the balance of 14 years on her lease, which falls within the statute of frauds. Accordingly, A and T's assignment needs to be in writing. Because A and L both “reviewed” the assignment, it is likely that the assignment was indeed in writing and is therefore valid under the Statute of Frauds.

Therefore, the assignment will be deemed valid.

Equitable Servitude

An equitable servitude (ES) is a promise in relation to land that does not necessarily burden one party's land, but it will concern the land of the other party. The benefit of an ES will be deemed to run with the benefitted land if the following are found: (i) generally, a writing; (ii) intent of the parties that the benefit run; (iii) touch and concern of the land; and (iv) notice. The recovery of an equitable servitude is equitable relief, rather than damages.

In the present action, the lease between T and L contained a promise by L not to open a restaurant within 5 miles of Lot 3, which contained The Grill that T leased. That lease was then validly assigned to A. In order for A to enforce the contract provision against L, he will need to show that the promise was an equitable servitude that was intended to “run with the benefitted estate”, in this case Lot 3.

Writing

Generally, a writing is required for an ES to run with the benefitted land. In this case, there was a writing between L and T, which included the covenant. Additionally, the assignment from T to A was also in writing, as discussed above. Therefore, this requirement is met.

Intent

However, L will argue that he did not intend for the ES to run with the land, since it is not evidenced "to successors or assigns" in the lease. However, because there was a valid assignment and because it is very likely that a 15-year lease will be assigned at some point, A will argue that the fact that a non-assignment provision did not appear in the lease is sufficient to show intent to run. Additionally, A will argue that because L accepted monthly rental payments from him, that he was well aware that the lease had been assigned and had made no efforts to refuse the assignment or show his intent not to let the ES run with Lot 3.

Touch and Concern

The ES must also directly affect the benefitted party's use of the land. Here, A will argue that the ES concerns his ability to use Lot 3 as a restaurant, which was the purpose of his taking over the lease. L will argue that the provision only refers to restaurants and only inhibits A's ability to run the restaurant, which may be located on land, but does not directly affect the land. However, because A took the land as a restaurant and it is likely that he took it as a restaurant, the fact that the provision goes to preventing L from opening a restaurant within 5 miles directly affects his use of Lot 3. Therefore, the ES does touch and concern the land.

Notice

Finally, the parties must have had notice. L will argue that the assignment between T and A did not contain the provision restricting assignment, and therefore the benefited land did not have notice. However, notice can be gotten by looking to the record and inspecting the previous documents in the chain of leases. As such, A did have valid notice by looking to the lease between L and T. Additionally, L will be deemed to have notice because he was a party to the first lease between him and T. Therefore, this element is met.

Conclusion

It is most likely that A will want to seek equitable relief in the form of an injunction, to enforce the provision preventing L from opening a restaurant within 5 miles of Lot 3. For the reasons stated above, A will likely be able to show that the ES was validly formed and runs with Lot 3. Accordingly, the court will likely order an injunction against L to enforce the ES and prevent him from opening a restaurant within 5 miles.

Covenants to Run with Burdened Land

A may also argue that the provision is a covenant. A covenant is a contractual provision in a writing whereby one promises not to do something in relation to land. It is very similar to an ES, described above. However, money damages can be awarded, which A won't want.

Easements

An easement is a non-possessory interest in the use of someone else's land. An easement appurtenant involves the two properties, a dominant (the benefitted land) and a survient (the burdened land) tenement. An easement is created a number of ways, including by grant (which is a writing), prescription, implication, and necessity. It can be terminated, generally by release or abandonment, which takes a physical act. An easement will pass to a burdened estate so long as the new owner has notice of the easement, which is found by record (looking to previous conveyances), inquiry (looking to the land), and actual notice (being informed of the easement).

In this case, there was a provision in the original lease between L and T that allowed T and her clients to use the parking lot that was located in Lot 2, next door [to] T's leased premises. Because there were two lots, one burdened (lot 2), and the other benefitted (Lot 3), this is an easement appurtenant. Additionally, because the easement was granted in the writing between L and T, this was a valid easement by "grant". L then sold his property to B, who took the property and recorded the deeds. B will argue that because she was not informed of the easement by L and because her deeds did not include the provisions from L to A, since that was simply a lease and B's deeds were actually recorded conveyance documents, that she did not have notice. However, she did inspect both lots, Lot 1 and Lot 2, before purchasing them. In this regard, she most likely noticed that there were many people walking from Lot 2, where they parked their cars, to Lot 3 where they dined at The Grill. Additionally, she would have noticed that there were most likely more cars present in Lot 2 than would normally be for Lot 1 alone. This should have led her to inquire as to whether an easement or agreement existed to allow Lot 3 to use the Lot 2 parking lot. As such, the Court will likely find that B had inquiry notice of the easement and the easement will pass with the burdened Lot 2.

Therefore, B had inquiry notice of the easement and A will most likely be successful in enforcing the easement against her.

1) Restrictive Covenant/Equitable Servitude

A covenant is a promise to do or not do something on or near one's land. Here L promised in his lease to T that "landlord shall not open a restaurant with 5 miles of the premises during the terms of the lease." Since it is a promise not to do something near his land, it is a covenant.

Equitable Servitude

Whether a covenant is a restrictive covenant or an equitable servitude depends on the types of damage that the plaintiff seeks. If A is seeking money damages, then it is a restrictive covenant. If he is seeking injunctive relief, then it is an equitable servitude. Here, A is suing to prevent L from opening a restaurant, which he said he would do in one month. Since he is seeking injunctive relief, it is an equitable servitude.

Here, the issue is whether the benefit and burdens of the equitable servitude run to A, who is a successor to the original tenant, T. For the benefit to run, the original agreement 1) must have been in writing, 2) parties intended the benefit to run to future successors, 3) the agreement touches and concerns the land, and 4) the parties had notice.

Here, the original equitable servitude was from a written lease signed by L and T in 2009. Therefore, the writing requirement is satisfied.

Here, L could argue that there was no intent by the original parties that the benefit would run to future successors because there is nothing said in the lease about the benefit running to future successors. However, A could argue that because it said that the agreement would last "for the term of the lease" and the term was 15 years, it was intended that the benefit would be valid for the entire period of the 15 years. There was no clause restricting assignment and under the common law a tenant is free to assign her rights under the lease unless the lease or the landlord objects. Because the benefit was to last 15 years and T was free to assign her rights to another, it can be said that the parties intended that the benefit would run to future successors of the lease.

Touches and concerns the land means that whether the agreement affects the parties as landowners, not just community members. Here the agreement affects the tenant because the Grill is a restaurant and the previous owner of the restaurant opening up a new restaurant within five miles of the old restaurant brings along competition and hurts the tenant. It affects the landlord as a landowner because it prohibits him [from] doing something on his land.

Here A had notice of the agreement because it was in the lease and he reviewed it. L could argue that he did not have notice that the agreement was going to be able to [be] used to T's assignee, L. A could argue that L did have notice because he accepted rental payments from A, which presumably were checks written by A and should have then alerted L that A has taken over for T.

Restrictive Covenant

If L brought a claim for money damages, then it would have to be analyzed as a restrictive covenant. All the elements are the same except the original parties must have had horizontal privity and the assignor-assignee would have had to have vertical privity. Vertical privity is any nonhostile nexus. Here T (assignor) and A (assignee) have an assignment relationship which qualifies as nonhostile vertical privity. Horizontal privity means that the original parties must have had a relationship apart from the covenant. Here, T and L were landlord-tenant apart from the covenant. Therefore, horizontal privity is established. A would also prevail under a restrictive covenant theory.

2) Easement

An easement is the nonpossesory property interest to use another's land for one's benefit. Using another's land for the use and enjoyment of one's land is an easement appurtenant.

Here, the agreement that tenants should have the right to use lot 2 for parking is an easement because it gives the tenants a nonpossesory property interest to use lot two for their benefit. It is an easement appurtenant because it is for the using [of] another's land for the use and enjoyment of one's land. Lot 3 is the dominant tenement and lot 2 is the servient tenement.

Here, an express easement was created because it is written in a lease between T who was the tenant for lot 3, dominant tenement, and L who was the owner of lot 2, the servient tenement.

The benefit to an easement appurtenant runs with the land passes automatically with the transfer of the dominant tenement. Here, T, the original leasee of lot 3, assigned her rights under the lease to A. When an assignment of a lease happens, the new assignee and the landlord are in privity of estate and can enforce covenants that run with the estate/estate. Here, A, the assignee, would be able to enforce the easement because it runs with the land.

The burden of an easement appurtenant also passes automatically with the transfer of the servient tenement. Here, the servient tenement, lot 2, was sold by L to B. Therefore, the burden of the easement passes to B. However, the burden would not pass if B was a bona fide purchaser without notice (BFP). A BFP is someone who pays valuable consideration for the land and takes the land without notice of the burden. Here, B did pay valuable consideration for the land by buying it. However, she is not a BFP if she had notice of the easement.

One form of notice is record notice. A buyer is on record notice of what a record search of the grantor-grantee index would reveal. However, in this case L did not sell the land to T but instead leased it. Therefore, the lease containing the easement would not be found through a record search.

Another form of notice is inquiry notice. A buyer has a duty to inspect the land she buys and is on inquiry notice of reasonable inquiries that she should have made. Here, lot 2 was a parking lot of tenants of lot 3 before B bought it and it would have been obvious if she went there and saw that there were cars parked there. She should have asked L why there were cars there. Therefore, she is on inquiry notice of what L would have told her, which is that there is an easement on lot 2.

Easement by implication

Even if the easement from the lease is not enforced, it could be argued that when L sold the land to B he created an easement by implication. This requires a prior use that was reasonable [and] necessary to the owners of the dominant tenement and that this was reasonable [and] apparent when the land was bought. Here, when B bought the land it was apparent that lot 2 was being used as a parking lot. Also, it is reasonable [and] necessary for owners of the dominant tenement because other than lot 2 there is no parking available within three blocks of lot 3.

Q4 Torts

Gayle is 16 years old and attends high school in School District.

One day, Gayle's teacher was relaxing in the teacher's lounge during the first ten minutes of class time, as he usually did, leaving the students unsupervised. School District had long been aware of the teacher's practice, but had done nothing about it.

That day, in the teacher's absence, Gayle walked out of class and out of school. She got into her car and drove to the house of an adult friend, Frances. Gayle had promised Frances that, for $10, she would help her move some paintings.

Arriving at Frances' house, Gayle carelessly parked her car several feet from the curb and entered the house. She came out later, carrying paintings to her car. In a patrol vehicle, Paula, a police officer, spotted Gayle's car. Frances caught sight of the patrol vehicle and told Gayle, "Quick, move your car to the curb."

Gayle jumped into her car just as Paula was walking towards it. Suddenly, without looking, Gayle swung her car toward the curb, hitting and severely injuring Paula.

After Paula was transported to a hospital, she was visited by her husband, Harry. Shocked at Paula's condition, Harry collapsed and suffered a broken arm in the fall.

1. Under what theory or theories, if any, might Paula bring an action for damages against (a) Gayle, (b) Frances, and (c) School District, and how is she likely to fare? Discuss.

2. Under what theory or theories, if any, might Harry bring an action for damages against any defendant, and how is he likely to fare? Discuss.

Answer A

1. What theories may Paula bring [in] an action for damages against the following defendants:

(a) Paula v. Gayle

Negligence
In a negligence case, the plaintiff must show that the defendant owed a duty of care to the plaintiff. They also must show that the defendant's conduct breached the standard of care owed to the plaintiff and the breach was the actual and proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff. The plaintiff must be able to show damages to recover in a negligence case.

Duty of Care
The defendant owes a duty of care to all foreseeable plaintiffs. Under the Cardozo view, foreseeable plaintiffs are those who are within the zone of danger. Under the Andrews view, the test is broader, and considers all plaintiffs to be foreseeable plaintiffs. In this case, Paul was a foreseeable plaintiff under the Cardozo view because as a driver on the street she was within the zone of danger of other cars on the street, including Gayle's parked car that was far away from the curb and onto the street. Similarly, Paula would be a foreseeable plaintiff under the Andrews view because all plaintiffs are foreseeable.

Police Officer Exception
Members of certain professions, like police officers and firefighters, cannot recover for injuries that are inherent in the risk of their job. Gayle may argue that as a police officer with a patrol vehicle, the risk of being hit by someone's car is inherent to the job. Paula will argue that being hit by a car is a general risk that everyone on the street takes, and is not a special risk that comes along with being a police officer. If Paula is successful in rebutting the exception, she must prove that Gayle acted below the standard of care expected.

Standard of Care

The standard of care determines the particular duty of care the defendant owed to the plaintiff so it can be determined whether the defendant breached the duty or complied with the duty. Generally, in a negligence action, the plaintiff must exercise the level of care of a reasonably prudent person in the plaintiff's position. Since Gayle is a child, she will argue that the child standard should be used. Under the child standard of care, the child must exercise the level of care of a child of similar age, intelligence, education, and experience. Paula will argue that the adult standard should be applied because Gayle was engaging in an adult activity. Because driving a car is an adult activity, Paula is correct and the court will hold Gayle to the standard of a reasonably prudent person in her position.

Breach

Paula must show that Gayle breached a duty owed to her by acting below the standard of care. Paula will argue that Gayle breached a duty to her by parking far away from the curb, and suddenly, without looking, swinging her car to the curb. This is wrongful because a reasonably prudent driver always looks both ways before they move their car on the street, to look for other vehicles. Moreover, Gayle knew Paula was in the vicinity since Frances told Gayle that a police officer was around and suggested she move her car. Thus, this element is met.

Causation

The breach must be the actual and proximate cause of the plaintiff's damages for the defendant to be held liable.

Actual Cause

An act is the actual cause of an injury when it is the but for cause. If the injury would not have occurred, but for the defendant's act, the actual causation element is satisfied.

Paula will argue that but for Gayle jumping into the car and swinging it toward the curb without looking, Paula would not have been hit by Gayle's car, and would not have been injured. The court will agree. It should be noted that Frances' act of yelling at Gayle to move her car was not a superseding force that cuts off Gayle's liability because it occurred before Gayle's negligent act. Thus, this element is also met.

Proximate Cause

The defendant also must prove that the act was the proximate cause. To be the proximate cause, the act must have been foreseeable at the time the act was committed. Here, this was a direct cause case. As soon as Gayle swung her car toward the curb, Paula was hit and injured. There was no superseding intervening act that would cut off Gayle's liability. Thus, Gayle's breach was the actual and proximate cause of Paula's injury and if Paula can prove damages, she will recover.

Damages

The plaintiff must prove her damages. Under the "eggshell" plaintiff rule, the defendant must take the plaintiff as she finds them and is liable for the recovery no matter how surprisingly great it is considering the particular plaintiff. Here, Paula was injured from Gayle's car.

Compensatory Damages

The purpose of compensatory damages is to put plaintiff in the position she would have been in had the injury not have occurred. Paula may recover general damages for her injuries as well as the cost of the treatment of the injuries at the hospital. If she lost earnings, she may recover special damages subject to the certainty, avoidable, and mitigation principles.

Defenses

There are no applicable defenses because there is no indication Paula was contributorily negligent, assumed the risk, or comparatively negligent in a jurisdiction that recognizes these respective principles.

Conclusion

Gayle is liable for negligence against Paula and Paula may recover the damages noted above.

(b) Paula v. Frances

Negligence

Paula will have to prove the same elements above to hold Frances liable for negligence.

Duty/Standard of Care

Paula was a foreseeable plaintiff under the Cardozo view because Paula was within the zone of danger as a driver on the street. When Frances told Gayle to move her car, it was foreseeable that Paula was within the zone of danger. Paula is also a foreseeable plaintiff under the Andrews view because all plaintiffs are foreseeable using this standard. Since Frances is an adult, she must exercise the level of care that a reasonably prudent person in her position would. Paula will argue that Frances owed a duty of care to Paula because Frances, as an adult, should have supervised Gayle and made sure she never carelessly parked her car far from the curb, and made sure she was careful when trying to move her car to the curb. She may also argue that Frances had a duty to make sure that Gayle was not skipping school.

Frances will argue there is no duty to act affirmatively. Frances, as an adult friend, is not responsible for Gayle's actions, and therefore had no duty to supervise her. The only time a duty to act affirmatively arises is when there is a close relationship (usually a familial one), when the defendant puts the plaintiff in peril, when the defendant undertakes to rescue the plaintiff or when there is a duty imposed by law or by statute. A duty also arises when an employer is vicariously liable for employees.

Vicarious Liability

Paula will argue that because Gayle promised to pay Frances $10 for moving her paintings, Gayle was an employee of Frances, making Gayle vicariously liable for Gayle's torts. Vicarious liability attaches to an employer, when the employee commits a tort while performing an act in the scope of their employment. In this case, Gayle was loading paintings into her car when Frances told Gayle to move her car so the police would not see the car parked illegally. Because Gayle was performing an act in the scope of her employment with Frances, Frances may be held vicariously liable for the negligent torts of Gayle.

Breach

Paula will argue that Frances breached a duty by allowing her employee to park in the middle of the street and telling her to move her vehicle to avoid the police. She will say this is wrongful because someone could have been injured by Gayle moving her car so quickly toward the curb. However, Gayle had no duty to review the way her employee parked her car before she arrived at Frances' house to do the job.

Still, because Frances is vicariously liable for the torts of her employee, she will be liable for Paula's injuries and damages in the same manner that Gayle will be liable, as indicated above. Because Frances did not independently breach a duty owed to Paula, it is unnecessary to continue with the causation and damages analysis since she will only be liable for Gayle's negligence which was analyzed above.

(c) Paula v. School District

Negligence

Duty/Standard of Care

The same rules above apply here. Paula was a foreseeable plaintiff under the Andrews view because all plaintiffs are foreseeable. Under the Cardozo view, it is less clear whether Paula was in the zone of danger. Paula will argue that she was in the zone of danger because Gayle left school in a car and Paula was a driver on the road. School District may argue Paula was not in the zone of danger because Paula was not on school property, or anywhere near the property. Moreover, Gayle is 16 years old and presumably has a license to drive a vehicle. Thus, there is no clear indication that the School should have a duty to protect third parties from a licensed driver. However, because students are in custody of schools during school hours, it is foreseeable that children who are not in school at the time they are supposed to be will injure a third party. Thus, School District likely owed a duty to Paula under both the Andrews and Cardozo views.

School District owed the duty of care of other reasonably prudent school districts.

Vicarious Liability

Because the school district itself did not commit a tort, Paula will have to hold it liable on a theory of vicarious liability. As mentioned above, an employer is liable for the torts of its employees during the scope of their employment. Gayle's teacher was on school hours, relaxing in the lounge. Class had already started, thus she was in the scope of her employment when she left the students unsupervised and School District will be vicariously liable.

Breach

Paula will argue that School District breached the duty of care owed to Paula when it knowingly allowed Gayle's teacher to leave Gayle's class unsupervised. This is wrongful because children in high school need to be supervised. School District will argue that Gayle is 16 and is almost an adult; thus it was not wrongful to leave her unsupervised for only ten minutes. Although this is a close call, because schools are responsible for students during school hours in the same manner that a parent is responsible for a child during other hours, Gayle's teacher, and the school district through vicarious liability, probably breached a duty.

Actual Cause/Proximate Cause

School District was the but for cause because but for the negligent supervision, Gayle would not have been allowed to leave the property. School District will argue the teacher was not the proximate cause because Gayle's actions of hitting the teacher in the car was a superseding intervening act. Because it was not foreseeable that a student would leave school and drive negligently into a police officer, School District will not be liable and Paula cannot recover damages.

Defenses

There are no defenses for the same reason noted above.

2. Harry's Theories

Negligent Infliction of Emotional Distress

To make a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress, Harry must show that the defendant was negligent, and that he was part of a near miss situation, or a bystander on the scene who witnessed a close family member's injury. He also has to show some manifestation of a physical injury.

Gayle and Frances were negligent. Harry was not in a near miss situation himself, and he was not a bystander present on the scene. Although he suffered a physical injury, it is not enough to make out a case for bystander emotional distress because he did not collapse until he saw Paula in the hospital, which was not the scene of the accident.

Answer B

Paula v. Gayle

Negligence

Paula has a good cause of action for a negligence claim against Gayle. To make out a prima facie negligence case, Paula must show that Gayle (1) owed a duty to Paula, (2) breached that duty, (3) the breach was both the cause-in-fact and proximate cause of Paula's injuries, and (4) that Paula sustained damages.

Duty

Under the Cardozo standard, plaintiffs owe a duty of due care to all foreseeable victims of their conduct. Under the broader Andrews standard, plaintiffs owe a duty of due care to everyone else in the world. The law defines "due care" as that of a reasonably prudent person. However, since Gayle is only 16, she will argue that she be held to a lesser standard: that of a reasonably prudent person of like age and experience. Paula will contend, however, that since Gayle was engaged in an adult-oriented activity, that of driving an automobile, that the law should make no exception for Gayle's age. Courts have consistently held that children engaged in adult activities must perform those activities with the care of a reasonable person, so Gayle will not be able to lower her standard of care to take her age into consideration.

Breach

A duty is considered breached when the defendant's conduct falls below the standard of care. Here, Gayle swung her car towards the curb "suddenly" and "without looking," conduct which clearly falls below the standard of care. Automobiles are inherently dangerous and heavy, and proper vision and care are required. Moreover, since Frances caught sight of the patrol vehicle and told Frances, "Quick, move your car to the curb," it likely put Gayle on notice that someone was coming, making her sudden and quick movement of the car without looking that much more unreasonable. Paula will probably have no problem proving this element.

Another theory of breach would be that Gayle breached when she "carelessly" parked too far away from the curb, as a reasonable person would have parked next to the curb.

Causation

Courts have traditionally divided the causation element into two parts: (1) cause in fact and (2) proximate cause. Under the cause in fact, the traditional test is whether the harm would have occurred "but for" defendant's breach. Under proximate cause, the harm will be said to proximately cause the injury if the harm is a foreseeable result of the breach. Here, Paula will be able to establish both cause-in-fact and proximate cause. If not for the fact that Gayle quickly turned her car into Paula, it would not have "hit and severely injured" her. As for the proximate cause, the very reason prudent care is required while driving a car is because they are extraordinarily heavy and can cause severe damage to people and property they come into contact with. This makes the danger of hitting someone clearly a foreseeable result of driving negligently. Paula will satisfy both elements of causation.

On the second breach theory, that Gayle parked too far from the curb, the proximate cause prong will be harder to satisfy. It is true that, had she parked closer to the curb, Paula would not have had to get out of her car, and therefore the "but for" cause is met. But not parking near a curb is not reasonably prudent because you do not leave space for other cars on the road, and generally accidentally hitting someone is not something thought of as a foreseeable risk of parking too far from the curb. However, since Paula satisfies both elements under the first theory, she will probably stick with that one, and jettison the second theory of breach.

Damages

In a negligence action, the plaintiff must prove damages. The damages need not be economic, but must be real. Here, Paula will once again have no problem making out a case for damages because she was "severely injured" and taken to a hospital.

Defenses

Comparative Negligence

Gayle will try to argue that Paula was comparatively negligent because Paula saw the car near the curb and could likely have seen Gayle walking towards the car. After all, she would be hard to miss carrying some paintings. Gayle would also point out that since Frances called out "Quick, move your car to the curb," that Paula had notice that the car was about to be quickly moved to the curb. Therefore, by standing within a reasonable distance from a car that Paula knew was about to be quickly moved, Paula was also negligent. Paula will reason that as a police officer she has a duty

Fireman's Rule

Under the fireman's rule, firefighters and police officers who engage in dangerous activities in connection with their jobs are barred from bringing suits for injuries sustained from those activities. The rationale is that the nature of the job is such that the police assume the risk of their jobs. Under this theory, Paula will not be able to recover for damages incurred if she was acting in connection with her job. Since she was coming to the curb to talk to Gayle about her car being illegally parked, it is clear that she was doing something in connection with her job. On this theory, Paula will probably be barred from recovery.

Battery

Paula may be able to make out a battery action against Gayle, but it will be more difficult. Battery is defined as the (1) intentional, (2) harmful or offensive contact (3) with Plaintiff's person.

Intentional

Contact is intentional if the conduct is voluntary and there is a substantial certainty that the contact will occur. This is the most difficult for Paula to prove. There is nothing in the facts to indicate that Gayle acted voluntarily, or that she had any intention of hitting Paula. While her conduct was likely negligent and maybe even reckless, it does not contain the requisite intent. So while elements 2 and 3 will easily be met--hitting someone with a car is indisputably harmful, and the car hit Paula directly--the first element will not be proven, and the battery action will fail as a result.

Paula v. Frances

Agency

In order for Frances to be liable for Gayle's negligence, there needs to be an agency relationship between Frances and Gayle. This may be established under the doctrine of Respondeat Superior.

Under the doctrine of Respondeat Superior, employers are liable for the torts of their employees, so long as the conduct was within the scope of employment. So Paula must first prove that Gayle was an employee of Frances. If so, Paula must then establish that Gayle was acting within the scope of her employment when she injured Paula. If it is found that Gayle was merely an independent contractor, Paula must prove that either the duty was non-delegable or that [sic].

Employee versus Independent Contractor

The major test to determine whether someone is an employee or an independent contractor is whether the employer had a right to control the method and manner of the work. Factors that the court looks to include the degree of control, whether the pay was hourly or by piece, whether the employer furnished the tools and other items, whether the job was for the benefit of the employer's business, and the length of the working relationship.

Here, the job was done at Frances' house, was for a seemingly short duration, and does not appear to have much supervision. Moreover, the fact that Gayle received a one-lump sum of 10 dollars for the work suggests that it was not an employee relationship, but rather an informal, independent contractor type relationship. There is nothing to suggest a long-term commitment, and the movement of paintings is the type of job that needs to be done only once in a great while. Additionally, there was no benefit to Frances' business objectives because the paintings were being moved from Frances' home. This is in fact a prototypical independent contractor relationship.

Scope of Employment

Assuming Gayle is considered Paula's employee, [sic].

Negligence

Paula might also be able to make out a negligence action against Frances' own negligence. For the negligence framework, see above.

Duty

See above.

Since Frances is an adult, she owes that of a reasonable person. Clearly she saw that Paula was approaching the car, otherwise she would not have shouted to Gayle to quickly move her car. Therefore, Paula was a foreseeable victim.

Breach

See above.

The theory would be that Frances breached the duty of reasonable care by instructing a sixteen year-old to "quickly" move her car to avoid being cited for a minor traffic ticket. A reasonably prudent person would not have instructed an impressionable minor to move such heavy machinery "quickly."

Causation

See above.

As for cause-in-fact, Frances will argue that even in the absence of her instruction, Gayle would have likely moved her car quickly and hit Paula. Paula will counter that Gayle was in fact acting under Frances' instructions and would not have moved the car quickly unless Frances did not tell her. Since Gayle "jumped" into her car right after being told to move it quickly, it is more probable than not that Gayle was acting at the direction of Frances, and therefore Frances' instruction was the "cause in fact" of Paula's injury. However, Frances probably has the better argument on the issue of "proximate cause." While instructing someone to move their car quickly might not be the most prudent thing to do, it is likely not foreseeable that the mere suggestion that someone act in haste will result in a haste so overwhelmingly that it would cause injury to someone who, at the time of your instruction, was in their own car. Paula will argue that when police officers see something suspicious or in violation of the law, it is reasonable to expect them to get out of their cars. However, while true, this is probably not enough to overcome the foreseeability on the part of Frances.

Damages

See above.

Defenses

Frances will avail herself of the same defenses that Gayle did.

Paula v. School District

Agency

Paula will argue that the school district is acting as the agent.

Negligence

Paula once again will have a negligence claim against the School district. Her claim will be based on the school district's own negligence in allowing their students to roam freely.

Duty

See above. Here, however, it is unlikely that Paula is a foreseeable plaintiff. The chain of events leading from Gayle's ditching school to Paula's injury is extraordinarily remote, and has several intervening forces.

Breach

See above. Paula will claim that the district breached their duty by knowing that the teacher relaxed in the teacher's lounge during the first ten minutes of class time, and permitting him to do so. The reasonably prudent school district would make sure the teachers are supervising the children so they do not leave or otherwise misbehave.

Causation

See above. Here, Paula will claim that, but for the teacher's negligence in leaving the students unsupervised--and but for the school's negligence in allowing the teacher to do so--the injury would not have occurred. Once again, however, Paula has the problem of proximate cause. While the school district understands that schools have to protect their students, and the students could have dangerous propensities if permitted to leave school grounds, the situation here is pretty remote from those duties. However, if the jury finds that the student is likely to commit some harm while ditching school, Paula could be a foreseeable victim of that harm.

Damages

See above.

Defenses

The district will avail themselves of the same defenses that Gayle and Frances did, above.

Respondeat Superior

Paula may also have the claim that the school is negligent due to the teacher's negligence. Since the teacher was an employee of the school district (see respondeat superior discussion, above), the district is vicariously liable for his conduct. The teacher here is likely an employee of the school because the manner of his work is substantially controlled by the district. Moreover, since he was on school property and during school hours, the harm will be said to be within the scope of his employment. The rest of the analysis is substantially the same as the school district's own negligence, above.

Harry v. Gayle

Negligent Infliction of Emotional Distress

Harry can possibly bring a negligent infliction of emotional distress action against Gayle. Under this theory, Gayle is liable for (1) negligent conduct (2) in plaintiff's presence, and (3) plaintiff suffers subsequent physical symptoms.

Negligent Conduct

See above.

In Plaintiff's Presence

This is where Harry will have trouble. Since Harry did not see the accident, and only later saw Paula in the hospital he was not in the presence of the negligence, nor was he in the zone of physical danger.

Physical Symptoms

Under Negligent Infliction of Emotional Distress, plaintiff has to suffer subsequent physical manifestations of the distress. Here, since Harry collapsed at the sight of Paula's condition, breaking his arm, he should be able to prove subsequent physical manifestations. And since the broken arm was a result of the collapse, under the eggshell-skull principle, he would be able to recover for all damages.

However, since he cannot prove he was in the plaintiff's presence, he will not be able to recover.

Harry v. Frances / Harry v. School District

Harry can claim Negligent Infliction of Emotional Distress under the theories of respondeat superior and vicarious liability, the analysis of which will be identical to the analysis above, and will lose once again due to his lack of presence.

Therefore, Harry will be unlikely to succeed against any of the parties for his damages.

Q5 Business Associations / Professional Responsibility

Bob owns 51 percent of the shares of Corp., a California corporation. Cate owns 30 percent. Others own the remaining shares.

Bob and Cate have entered into a shareholder agreement stating they would vote their shares together on all matters, and that, if they fail to agree, Dave will arbitrate their dispute and Dave's decision will be binding. Bob and Cate also executed perpetual irrevocable proxies granting Dave the power to vote their shares in accordance with the terms of the shareholder agreement. Attorney Al handled Corp.'s incorporation and drafted the shareholder agreement and the proxies.

Bob and Cate have been able to elect the entire board of directors every year. The board currently consists of Bob, Cate, and Bob's wife, Wanda. Bob and Wanda decided, as directors, to sell substantially all of Corp.'s assets to Bob's sister, Sally. Cate thinks the price is too low. Bob claims he no longer regards their shareholder agreement as binding. He has gone to Al for advice in the matter, and Al has agreed to provide it.

At the shareholders' meeting at which the matter is to be put to a vote, Bob announces he is voting his shares in favor of the sale. Dave says that since Bob and Cate disagree, he is voting the shares against the sale.

1. Is the shareholder agreement between Bob and Cate enforceable? Discuss.

2. Are the perpetual proxies executed by Bob and Cate enforceable? Discuss.

3. Would any sale of Corp.'s assets to Sally be voidable? Discuss.

4. What ethical violations, if any, has Al committed? Discuss. Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

Answer A

1. Shareholder agreement between Bob (B) and Cate (C)

A shareholder's agreement is an agreement whereby shareholders agree to combine their votes for voting matters related to their rights as shareholders. The agreement is less formal than a voting trust and requires simply that the shareholders agree to the course of action. Where a voting trust is required to notify the Secretary of the Corp. the shareholder agreement need not be recorded by the Secretary. In addition, where a voting trust is only good for 10 years, a shareholder agreement has no durational requirement.

In this case, B and C have entered into a shareholder agreement stating they would vote their shares in agreement or else submit to Dave to arbitrate any disputes. Dave's decision would be binding. While B and C have entered into a valid shareholder agreement, as they can agree to arbitration to settle disputes, it is necessary to look at Dave in this instance.

It is not clear what, if any, relation Dave has to the corporation. If Dave is familiar with the corporation, then there would be no issues with him arbitrating disputes. If he is a true "outsider" he may not have the knowledge and ability to make the informed decisions in the corp's best interest. In this case, B and C would violate their fiduciary duties to the corp. and the agreement would be ineffective.

2. Perpetual Proxies

A proxy is an agreement between shareholders to have one vote on their behalf. The corp. must be notified and a proxy is valid for 11 months, unless otherwise agreed. An irrevocable proxy requires that the proxy be labeled irrevocable and must be coupled with an interest.

In this case, the proxies are perpetual and irrevocable. As stated above, an irrevocable proxy must be labeled such and be coupled with an interest. It is not clear here what, if any, interest Dave received as part of the proxy agreement, or if the proxies were labeled irrevocable. If neither requirement was met, the irrevocable proxies would be unenforceable.

If both conditions were satisfied, it would be necessary to determine if the corp. was notified. In addition, proxies typically last for only 11 months. Because the facts state this is perpetual, it is likely that the courts would find this unenforceable.

3. Sale of Corp. Assets

Directors have a duty to manage a corporation. Directors also have fiduciary duties of Care and Loyalty in managing the corporation. Directors may be insulated from violating the duty of care by the Business Judgment Rule.

Duty of Care

Directors have a duty to manage a corporation as a reasonably prudent person would in handling his/her own affairs. Directors must act in the best interest of the corporation.

Here, it is not clear from the facts if Bob and Wanda, as directors, are acting in good faith as reasonably prudent persons would in their own affairs.

Business Judgment Rule

Directors are protected from liability under the Business Judgment Rule when they act in the corp.'s best interest and make a reasonable, innocent mistake.

Here, because it is not clear if Bob and Wanda acted in good faith, it is not possible to determine if this is a simple mistake.

Duty of Loyalty

A director has a duty of loyalty to his corporation, which means that without full disclosure and independent ratification, a director cannot engage in a self-dealing transaction or usurp a corporate opportunity.

In this case, Bob and Wanda, as directors, have voted to sell substantially all assets to Sally, who is Bob's sister. A self-dealing transaction is one that benefits the director or his family members. In order for the transaction to be valid, there must be independent ratification, as defined above. It would be impossible to obtain independent ratification as 2 out of the 3 Directors will not be independent. Both Bob and Wanda, Bob's wife, stand to benefit from the self-dealing transaction, and it does not appear that there was full disclosure, so independent ratification is impossible.

Controlling Shareholders

Controlling shareholders have fiduciary duties to other shareholders in a corporation. As defined above, the controlling shareholder has a duty of loyalty and care as fiduciary duties.

As described above, Bob will have violated his fiduciary duty of loyalty to the corp. by engaging in a self-dealing transaction. In addition, courts have held controlling shareholders liable for looting a corporation in the event the corp. is substantially sold to a 3rd party and that party loots the company. It is not clear here what Sally will do.

Fundamental Change

A corporation must hold a special meeting when a fundamental change is proposed for that corporation. A fundamental change would include selling substantially all assets to another corporation. Therefore, the corporation would be required to have a special meeting.

A special meeting requires that a special notice be mailed to shareholders. This notice must include the reason for the special meeting, date and time, and place. It is important because no other business can be discussed at a special meeting that was not included in the notice. In addition, holding the meeting is important because it gives rise to appraisal and dissenter rights whereby the corporation would be required to repurchase a dissenter's shares.

Because Bob violated his fiduciary duties as a director and controlling shareholder, and because the corp. was undergoing a fundamental change without a properly scheduled special meeting, any sale to Sally would be voidable.

4. Ethical Violations

A. Duty of Loyalty

Al owes a duty of loyalty to the corporation. Al has drafted the incorporation of the corp. and has drafted agreements on behalf of the corporation. Therefore, Al's client is the corporation.

Al has a potential conflict in that he represented the corporation and then drafted the shareholder agreement and proxy on behalf of 2 shareholders. This is permissible under ABA rules and CA rules whereby an attorney can represent multiple parties if he reasonably believes that he can provide necessary legal services without impact. The attorney must also get this consent in writing.

Al has another potential conflict by representing Bob at a later time. As stated above, an attorney can represent multiple parties if he reasonably believes that representation of both will not impact either party. He must get consent in writing. Al would have violated his duty of loyalty if he did not get consent in writing.

This potential conflict would become an actual conflict when Bob has gone to Al for advice and Al agreed to provide it. Al previously represented Bob and Cate in drafting a shareholder agreement and proxies. CA Rules of Ethics strictly prohibits an attorney from representing a client when that client is being represented by the same attorney. Only when the matter ends can the attorney represent another client whose interest is adverse to a current client.

Al will have violated his duty of loyalty.

Duty of Confidentiality

An attorney has a duty to keep all communications with a client confidential. When an attorney represents 2 parties, and one party then approaches the attorney for representation on a similar matter, the attorney will not be able to represent the client because he has confidential information from both clients.

Here, Al arguably represents both parties, as he has drafted a shareholder agreement and proxy for both Bob and Cate. Al should advise both parties to obtain separate Legal Counsel instead of continuing to represent them, as by doing so, he may disclose confidential information received by Cate in representing Bob.

Duty of Competence

An attorney should have the skill and training to be able to competently represent a client. If not the attorney should be able to receive such training in a reasonable time.

In this case, as described above, it is not clear if the proxies were drafted correctly; therefore Al may have breached his duty of competence.

Answer B

SHAREHOLDER AGREEMENT

Shareholder agreements in which shareholders agree to vote their shares together are valid, although historically they were not permitted and voting trusts were required. They must be in writing and signed by both parties. Shareholder agreements are governed by regular contract principles, and are not revocable unless as a contract they would be revocable. A valid contract requires mutual assent and consideration. Bilateral contracts are contracts in which the parties exchange promises, and the promises can constitute consideration for the contract.

In this case, the shareholder agreement appears to be in writing, and signed by the parties. It was prepared by an attorney, Al, and so presumably has been validly drafted. In this case, the shareholder agreement is a mutual agreement for Bob and Cate to vote stocks together. It appears that there has been valid mutual assent to the contract, including offer and acceptance. Because the parties have exchanged promises to vote together, it is a bilateral contract. As a result, the contract is supported by consideration based on the exchange of mutual promises to vote together or have disputes decided by arbitration. Thus, Bob would be unable to revoke the shareholder agreement at will, and Cate could sue for damages or for specific enforcement of the agreement.

PERPETUAL PROXIES

PROXY GENERALLY - A proxy agreement must be in (1) writing, (2) signed by the party whose shares are affected, (3) addressed and delivered to the corporation's secretary, (4) clearly state they are delegating the authority to vote.

In this case, it appears that the requirements for a valid proxy agreement have been met. The agreement appears to be in writing, the problem notes it was executed so presumably is signed, it clearly states the procedures for the proxy, indicating that the shares will be voted in line with the shareholder agreement. Although the facts do not indicate whether the proxy was filed with the corporation, because Al the attorney assisted, presumably the requirement was met.

IRREVOCABLE PROXY - A proxy is normally for a duration of 11 months, and will be revocable at will. To be irrevocable, a proxy must be (1) supported by an interest and (2) clearly state it is irrevocable.

In this case, it appears that the proxy agreement did state that it was irrevocable, and thus the agreement has met the second requirement. However, there is no indication that the agreement was supported by any interest. Normally, the interest must be some exchange for value or, for example, a situation where the record date holder sells his shares to the owner and executes a proxy, and thus the new owner's purchase creates an interest. In this case, there is no interest to support the agreement. Cate may argue that the exchange of promises provides consideration for the proxy in the form of the mutual promises, as was the case for the shareholder agreement, and therefore that the mutual promise is a sufficient interest to meet the element and make the proxy irrevocable. However, the exchange of promises is not a sufficient interest to support a proxy as being irrevocable because the promisor has no interest in the shares to which she is making a promise, and therefore this element has not been met. As a result, Bob is free to revoke the proxy agreement at will.

While the proxy agreement would be revocable because it is not supported by an interest, the shareholder voting agreement would not be. As a result, Cate could sue Bob to enforce the agreement and then Dave would have the power as the arbitrator to vote the shares under the agreement as he saw fit.

WOULD SALE OF CORP BE VOIDABLE

FUNDAMENTAL CORPORATE CHANGE - A fundamental corporate change includes a (1) merger, (2) consolidation, (3) amendment of the articles of incorporation, or (4) a sale of all or substantially all of the business assets. A fundamental corporate change must be approved by a majority of all shareholders at a special noticed meeting in which notice of the change was given before the meeting. Additionally, the corporation must give dissenters rights of appraisal if the transaction is approved.

In this case, the sale of substantially all of Corp.'s assets is a fundamental change and thus must be approved by a majority of all shareholders in Corp.

DECISION OF DIRECTORS - All decisions of directors must either (1) be approved at a board meeting or (2) be approved by unanimous written agreement of the board. At a board meeting the majority of all directors must be present to have a quorum. A resolution will be adopted if a majority of the directors present approve. Before a fundamental corporate change is brought before a special meeting of shareholders, it must be approved by the board of directors.

In this case, the facts indicate that Bob and Wendy agreed to the sale, but that Cate disagreed. It is unclear if they met at a board meeting and the majority of directors, Bob and Wendy, approved. This would be a requirement that if not met, could lead to a rescinding of the transaction or allow Cate and other shareholders to sue Bob and Wendy for losses suffered as a result of the transaction.

DUTY OF LOYALTY OF DIRECTORS - A Director has a fiduciary duty of loyalty to a corporation to not engage in self-dealing or usurp business opportunities. Self-dealing includes transactions in which the director has a conflict of interest.

In this case, Bob is a member of the board of Corp, and thus has a duty to not engage in self-dealing.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST TRANSACTION - A conflict of interest transaction is one in which the director or his close relative is (1) a party to the transaction, (2) has a financial interest so closely linked to the transaction that would reasonably be expected to affect her judgment, or (3) is a director, officer, employee or agent of the other party to the transaction and the transaction is of such importance that it would normally be brought before the board. If a Director enters into a transaction in which he has a conflict of interest without approval, that transaction can be rescinded and the director can be held liable for any losses to the shareholders.

In this case, Bob is engaging in a sale of Corp's assets to Sally, Bob's sister. Thus Bob, a director, is engaged in a transaction in which a close relative, his sister Sally, is a party to the transaction, and therefore Bob would have a conflict of interest in the transaction. Thus, unless Bob has the transaction approved, it could be rescinded. Furthermore, because Wanda is also a director, and Sally is also a close relative of hers, her husband Bob's sister, she would also have a conflict of interest.

CONFLICT APPROVAL - A conflict of interest transaction will be considered approved if (1) after full disclosure a majority of the disinterested directors, if more than one, approve; (2) after full disclosure a majority of disinterested shareholders approve; and (3) if it is fair under the circumstances.

DISINTERESTED SHAREHOLDERS - In this case, it is unclear if Bob fully disclosed. Even if he did, the transaction would not be considered to be approved by shareholders if Bob used his 51% of shares to approve the sale because he is not disinterested due to his conflict of interest created by his sister, Sally, being the purchaser. Thus, a majority of the outstanding, the remaining 49% would need to approve. Because Cate owns 30% of the shares, she could essentially block the transaction because she owns more than 50% of the disinterested shares. Thus approval by disinterested shareholders would not be possible.

DISINTERESTED DIRECTORS - Similarly, both Wanda and Bob are considered to have a conflict of interest. Therefore the only disinterested director is Cate. Cate would not approve the transaction and furthermore, for a transaction to be approved by the majority of disinterested directors there must be more than one disinterested director.

Thus, the directors could not approve the transaction because 2 of the 3, Bob and Wanda, are not disinterested.

FAIR - As a result, the only way the transaction could be upheld is if under the circumstances at the time it was entered into it was fair. In this case, Cate claims that the price is too low, but there is no indication if this is really the case. If Bob could show that the price was fair, and thus the transaction was fair then the conflict of interest transaction would be upheld despite the lack of approval from disinterested shareholders and directors.

ACTING AS SHAREHOLDER NOT DIRECTOR - Bob may argue that in voting to approve the sale he is acting as a shareholder, and not as a director and thus does not owe the same duties to the corporation. However, this argument will fail because (1) a director has a duty of loyalty to the corporation even when selling his own shares, and (2) Bob may also have a duty as controlling shareholder.

DUTY OF CONTROLLING SHAREHOLDER - While a shareholder is normally not liable beyond the value of their shares, a controlling shareholder may be liable towards other shareholders if she uses her power in a way to disadvantage the minority shareholders. This is because a controlling shareholder has a fiduciary duty to minority shareholders to not use their controlling share to the minorities' disadvantage.

In this case, because Bob owns 51% of the shares, he is a controlling shareholder. He has a fiduciary duty to not use his controlling share to gain unfair advantage over the minority shareholders. This would likely include selling substantially all of Corp.'s resources to his own sister, Sally, if the price was not fair. Thus, even if Bob is successful in arguing that he is not under a duty as a director when trading on his shares, as a controlling shareholder he would still be liable for breaching his fiduciary duty.

AL'S VIOLATIONS

DRAFTING ARTICLES AND SHAREHOLDER AGREEMENTS - When an attorney represents a corporation, he represents the organization itself and not the directors or officers. While an attorney may also represent the directors and officers separately, these representations are governed by normal rules of conflict of interest. A lawyer may represent two clients so long as he reasonably believes he can do so and that there is no conflict of interest between them. If there is a conflict of interest he must (1) reasonably believe he can adequately represent each of them, (2) disclose the conflict, under the Cal RPC such disclosure must be in writing, and (3) must get the clients' consent in writing. While potential conflicts of interest can be waived, actual conflicts normally may not be waived by the parties because a reasonable attorney would not believe they could represent clients with an actual conflict.

In this case, there is no conflict of interest, potential or otherwise, between Corp and its shareholders. Therefore, Al did not violate any rules by drafting the agreement.

ADVISING BOB -

CONFLICT BETWEEN BOB AND CATE-

CURRENT CLIENTS- As noted previously a lawyer may not represent one client who has a conflict of interest with another client unless (1) the lawyer reasonably believes he can adequately represent each of them, (2) the lawyer discloses the conflict, under the Cal RPC such disclosure must be in writing, and (3) the client consents in writing. While potential conflicts of interest can be waived, actual conflicts normally may not be waived by the parties because a reasonable attorney would not believe they could represent clients with an actual conflict.

In this case, it is unclear who Al represented in the drafting of the shareholder agreement and whether or not he continues to represent Cate. If Al does represent Cate then agreeing to represent Bob in this matter constitutes a current conflict between clients, and Al would have to provide written disclosure and receive written consent. However, even if he did he would not be able to maintain representation because a reasonable lawyer would not believe he could adequately represent both Cate and Bob because their conflict is not just potential, it is an actual conflict.

FORMER CLIENTS- A lawyer may not represent a current client (1) in a matter that is the same or substantially the same as a matter he represented a former client, and (2) the current client's interests are adverse to the former client unless he gets written consent from the former client.

In this case, if Al represented Cate in drafting the shareholder agreement and proxy agreement then he would likely be in violation of this rule. Cate is a former client, and the matter now in dispute is whether the very agreements Al drafted for Cate are valid, and thus it is the same matter. Furthermore, Bob's position, that the agreements are not binding, is directly in conflict with Cate's interest. As a result Al could not represent Bob without Cate's approval because doing so would be in violation of his duty of loyalty to a former client.

Al could also be disqualified if he had gained confidential information in representing Cate, though that is unlikely here, considering he was drafting a shareholder agreement.

Q6 Evidence / Contracts

Green's Grocery Outlet ("Green's") sponsors a lawful weekly lottery. For one dollar, a player picks six numbers. All persons who select the six winning numbers drawn at random share equally in the prize pool.

Each week, for the past two years, Andrew has played the same numbers—3, 8, 10, 12, 13, and 23—which represent the birth dates of his children.

On June 1, Andrew purchased his weekly lottery ticket. Barney, a clerk employed by Green's, asked, "The usual numbers, Andrew?" Andrew replied, "Of course."

Barney entered the numbers on the computer that generates the lottery ticket and gave the ticket to Andrew. Without examining the ticket, Andrew placed it in his pocket. Unbeknownst to either Andrew or Barney, Barney had accidentally entered the number "7" on the computer rather than the number "8."

The winning lottery numbers that week were Andrew's "usual" numbers. Much to his horror, Andrew discovered Barney's error when he showed his wife the "winning" ticket. Andrew filed suit against Green's seeking to reform his lottery ticket by changing the "7" to an "8." Green's cross-complained seeking rescission.

1. At trial, Green's objects to Andrew's testimony about (a) Barney's question, (b) Andrew's answer, and (c) Andrew's attempt to explain what the phrase "the usual numbers" means. Should the court admit the testimony? Discuss. Answer according to California law.

2. How should the court rule on each party's claim for relief? Discuss.

Answer A

1. How will the court rule on Green's objection to

a) Barney's question "The Usual Numbers, Andrew"

Relevant

All evidence must be logically and legally relevant.

Logical: Under California Rules of Evidence, evidence is relevant if it tends to prove or disprove a disputed fact. In this case, Green is disputing the fact that there is a contract or the terms of the contract. Therefore, Andrew's testimony regarding Barney's statement tends to prove that Andrew bought the ticket from Barney and that the terms were for the usual numbers. Andrew can show this is logically relevant.

Legal: To be legally relevant the probative value should outweigh the prejudicial effect. The probative value in this case is that this tends to show Andrew bought the ticket and that he had a usual set of numbers. While this may be prejudicial, the probative value is high and outweighs the prejudice because it establishes the facts of the situation.

Hearsay

Green will object that the evidence is inadmissible hearsay. Hearsay is an out-of-court statement made by a declarant used to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

Out-of-Court Statement by a declarant

In this case Barney's question was made out-of-court and by Barney, therefore meeting this element.

Truth of the Matter Asserted

The statements presented to prove what the statement is asserting. In this case Green will argue that Andrew is introducing Barney's statement to show that Barney knew about the usual numbers and that Andrew asked for the usual numbers.

Act of Independent Legal Significances

Andrew will argue he is not introducing to prove the truth of the matter asserted, but rather to show that there was a contract created when Andrew got the ticket. At this point this statement does not provide a contract.

Knowledge of facts stated

Andrew may also be using it to prove that he always purchased the same numbers and that Barney knew about his practice or habit. It is likely that Andrew can show this is not hearsay, but being used to show Barney had the knowledge of his usual numbers.

Even if this is being introduced for the truth of the matter asserted Andrew can see if it falls under an exception to the hearsay rule.

Party-opponent admission

Admissions by a party-opponent are an exception to the hearsay rule. Vicarious admissions by an agent are only attributed to the principal if the statement was made in the scope of the agency and the principal would be liable.

In this case Green will argue Barney made a mistake, but Barney was doing his job within the scope of the agency and principals are liable for the mistake of their agents.

Andrew can show this was a party-opponent admission.

Conclusion:

Barney's question is admissible evidence and the court should admit Andrew's testimony on this issue.

a) Andrew's answer

Relevant (see rule above)

Logical: (See previous rule.) Green may argue that the creation of a contract is not in dispute and Andrew's testimony only tends to prove the existence of a contract. Andrew will argue the testimony also refers to the question Barney asked and that he wanted his usual numbers. Andrew can likely show this is logically relevant because it tends to prove a disputed fact.

Legally: See previous rule: This is similar to the previous piece of evidence and tends to establish the facts of the incident and therefore the probative value outweighs the prejudicial effect.

Hearsay

Green will object that this testimony is hearsay. See previous rule. Green will assert that this is an out-of-court statement by Andrew to prove that he assented to the purchase of the lottery ticket which is the contents of his statement.

Independent Legal Significance

Andrew can show in this case as previously discussed that his statement created a contract and is therefore not being used to prove the truth of the matter asserted, but rather to prove the formation of a contract. Andrew's assent in this case does form a contract and is therefore not hearsay.

Party-opponent Exception (See previous rule)

In this case the statement is by Andrew and not a party-opponent because Andrew is testifying and Andrew is not the opponent against Andrew himself. So this exception does not apply.

Conclusion

Andrew's testimony about his own statement should be ruled admissible because it is not hearsay and is relevant.

b) Andrew's explanation of "usual numbers"

Relevant:

Logical: This is the issue in dispute. Therefore Andrew's testimony is highly relevant.

Legal: In this instance, this testimony is highly prejudicial to Green and therefore might be excluded. However it is also the main issue of the case and its probative value outweighs its prejudicial effect.

Character Evidence

Evidence of a person's character cannot be used to show they acted in conformity therewith on a particular occasion.

In this case Green will argue that the introduction of this evidence is trying to show Andrew acted similarly as he had on other occasions.

Habit

Evidence that shows specific instances of conduct to prove that they have a regular habit are allowed. Andrew will argue that in this case he is establishing a habit he has had every week for the past 2 years. Andrew can likely show this is habit evidence and not character.

Parol Evidence

Green may argue that the evidence violates the parol evidence rule because it is evidence prior to formation of an integrated contract to contradict the terms of that contract.

Andrew will likely be able to introduce this because he is trying to show a mistake and not to contradict the terms of an integrated contract. In this case there was a mistake Barney made and Andrew is trying to prove the mistake.

Conclusion

The court should rule that this evidence is admissible.

2. How should the court rule on each party's claim for relief?

Reform

The court will grant reformation of a contract when each party knew what the terms were and they both had the same mutual mistake.

Green will argue that Andrew had the opportunity to look at the ticket and negligently failed to do so and therefore assumed the risk of the ticket being wrong. Andrew will argue the prior course of dealing with Barney and Green establishes that lottery ticket was supposed to contain a seven instead of an eight.

Recission

The court will assert recission when there is evidence the contract was not valid or lacked assent on a material term.

Green will make the same argument that there was no meeting of the minds and as such the contract should be rescinded. Andrew will argue that this was just a transcription error and does not rise to a level warranting recission of the contract.

Conclusion

The court should reform the contract because there is evidence that the mistake was mutual, but the mistake was a transcription rather than the objective belief of the parties. Both Barney and Andrew thought that the ticket should contain one number eight and not seven. The court should reform the contact.

Answer B

(1) Green's (G) objections to Andrew's (A) Testimony

(a) A's testimony re Barney's (B's) question

Green will object to A's testimony re B's question as irrelevant and inadmissible as hearsay.

Under California law, evidence is relevant if it has any tendency to make a disputed fact of consequence to the action more or less likely to be true. In this case, A is suing Green for breach of contract, and there is a dispute between the parties as to the terms of that contract (i.e., the lottery numbers A picked). As a result, A's testimony about B's question is relevant because it goes to whether A & B agreed about the numbers that should be on A's lottery ticket, and if so, what A & B agreed to, both of which are disputed facts in this case.

Under California law, a relevant statement may nonetheless be excluded if it is substantially more prejudicial than probative, a waste of time, or likely to confuse the jury. The probative value of B's question here outweighs any potential prejudice or confusion.

Under California law, hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered for the truth of the matter asserted. In this case, B's question to A is an out-of-court statement because it was made before the suit on the day that A bought the lottery ticket in question. But A will argue, persuasively, that he is not offering B's question for the truth of the matter asserted. A will argue that he is offering B's statement to establish a verbal act -- the fact that B asked A the question, "The usual numbers, Andrew?" As such, the statement is being offered for a non-hearsay purpose because it is not being offered to prove the truth of the matter that Andrew asked for the usual numbers.

A could also argue that B's question should be admitted for the truth of the matter because B's question shows B's then-existing mental condition, an exception to the hearsay rule. A will argue, persuasively, that B's questions shows that B knew that A wanted A's usual numbers.

A could also argue that B's question is offered for the effect it had on A, the listener, another non-hearsay purpose. Under this argument, A is offering B's question to show that A inferred from B's statement that B knew A's usual numbers.

A could also argue that B's statement is admissible hearsay in California because it is an admission of a party. Green will argue that B is not a party to the case, but A can persuasively respond that Green should be bound by B's statements because B was acting within the scope of his employment when he made them, i.e., part of B's job is to sell lottery tickets to customers.

(b) A's testimony re A's answer

B will argue that A's answer is irrelevant and inadmissible hearsay.

A will argue that his answer is relevant because it goes to the disputed facts of whether A & B agreed to the numbers in A's lottery ticket, and what those numbers were. Moreover, A will argue that his answer has great probative value because [it] is directly related to a key disputed fact in the case, i.e., what numbers A & B agreed to put in A's lottery ticket. A's answer is relevant for those reasons.

B will argue that A's statement was made out of court -- on June 1 -- and is being offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, that A asked for his usual numbers.

A will also argue, persuasively, that his answer is not offered for hearsay purpose because he is not offering it for the truth of the matter asserted. Rather, it is being offered as a verbal act -- agreement to the offer from B. Alternatively, A could argue that A's answer is being offered for the non-hearsay purpose of showing the effect on the listener B, i.e., that B understood that A wanted his usual numbers.

A's answer will be admissible on these grounds.

(c) Andrew's attempt to explain what "the usual numbers" means

B will argue that A is attempting to offer parol evidence regarding the terms of the contract in violation of the parol evidence rule.

The parol evidence rule excludes evidence extrinsic to a contract where that contract is considered a final, or integrated writing. There are exceptions to the parol evidence rule, including to show a clerical error.

Here Green will argue that any testimony regarding what "the usual numbers" means is extrinsic evidence because the lottery ticket is the contract, and there is no evidence within the ticket regarding what A's usual numbers are.

A will argue, persuasively, that parol evidence should be admitted in this case to prove that B made a clerical error in entering A's numbers into the computer that generated A's ticket, the contract. A's testimony on this point will be allowed under the clerical error exception to the parol evidence rule.

(2) The parties' claims for relief

Reformation

Reformation is an equitable remedy that is available where one party can show, among other things, a unilateral mistake of material fact that caused A irreparable harm.

In this case, A will argue that he is entitled to reformation because he suffered irreparable harm as a result of B's unilateral mistake -- a clerical error in entering his usual lottery numbers. A will argue that Green should be bound by B's error because B is Green's agent and was acting within the scope of his employment at the time of B's mistake. And A will argue that he was irreparably harmed by B's mistake because but for B's mistake he would have won the lottery, and that A's harm was foreseeable because only a ticket that has all the winning numbers will win the lottery, and it is foreseeable that a clerical error in entering one number could cause a party to lose a lottery he otherwise would have won.

Green will argue that A is not irreparably harmed, because Green can refund A the price of the lottery ticket, and that there was no mistake because the numbers A paid for are the numbers that are clearly printed on his lottery ticket. Moreover, Green will argue that A does not have clean hands, because he could have and should have confirmed that the right numbers were on his ticket, and that by failing to do so, A waived his right to complain after the fact that he got the wrong numbers.

Rescission

Green will argue for rescission because there was no meeting of the minds as to a material term of the contract. Rescission is an equitable remedy available where one party can show, among other things, mutual mistake of fact. Here Green will argue that there was a mutual mistake of fact as to what numbers A wanted on his lottery ticket, and that therefore there was no meeting of the minds required to form a valid contract. Green will argue that B thought A wanted the number 7 on his ticket, and A wanted the number 8 on his ticket, and that the numbers on the ticket were material elements of the contract between Green and A. As a result, there was no meeting of the minds as to a material term of the contract, and the contract should be rescinded.

A will argue that there was a meeting of the minds based on the question and answer between B and A -- "The usual numbers, Andrew?" "Of course." A will argue that B's question shows that B knew A's usual numbers and offered A a ticket with those numbers. A will argue that A accepted B's offer of those numbers, and that there was consideration in A's payment of the price of the lottery ticket and Green's promise to pay A the winnings if the numbers of A's ticket matched the winning numbers.

This is a close question, but in this case, because all of the testimony discussed above is admissible and support's A's position, a court would likely find that A is entitled to reformation and B cannot rescind the contract. A wins the lottery.

JULY 2010
CALIFORNIA BAR EXAMINATION

This publication contains the six essay questions from the July 2010 California Bar Examination and two selected answers to each question.

The answers received good grades and were written by applicants who passed the examination. The answers were prepared by their authors, and were transcribed as submitted, except that minor corrections in spelling and punctuation were made for ease in reading. The answers are reproduced here with the consent of their authors.

JULY 2010
ESSAY QUESTIONS 1, 2, AND 3

California Bar Examination

Answer all three questions. Time allotted: three hours

Your answer should demonstrate your ability to analyze the facts in question, to tell the difference between material and immaterial facts, and to discern the points of law and fact upon which the case turns. Your answer should show that you know and understand the pertinent principles and theories of law, their qualifications and limitations, and their relationships to each other.

Your answer should evidence your ability to apply law to the given facts and to reason in a logical, lawyer-like manner from the premises you adopt to a sound conclusion. Do not merely show that you remember legal principles. Instead, try to demonstrate your proficiency in using and applying them.

If your answer contains only a statement of your conclusions, you will receive little credit. State fully the reasons that support your conclusions, and discuss all points thoroughly.

Your answer should be complete, but you should not volunteer information or discuss legal doctrines which are not pertinent to the solution of the problem.

Unless a question expressly asks you to use California law, you should answer according to legal theories and principles of general application.

Q1 Torts

Homeowner kept a handgun on his bedside table in order to protect himself against intruders. A statute provides that "all firearms must be stored in a secure container that is fully enclosed and locked." Burglar broke into Homeowner's house while Homeowner was out and stole the handgun.

Burglar subsequently used the handgun in an attack on Patron in a parking lot belonging to Cinema. Patron had just exited Cinema around midnight after viewing a late movie. During the attack, Burglar approached Patron and demanded that she hand over her purse. Patron refused. Burglar drew the handgun, pointed it at Patron, and stated, "You made me mad, so now I'm going to shoot you."

Patron fainted out of shock and suffered a concussion. Burglar took her purse and fled, but was later apprehended by the police. Cinema had been aware of several previous attacks on its customers in the parking lot at night during the past several years, but provided no lighting or security guard.

Under what theory or theories, if any, might Patron bring an action for damages against Homeowner, Burglar, or Cinema? Discuss.

Answer A

Patron (P) v. Homeowner (H)

The issue is under what theories P might bring an action against H.

Negligence

Negligence is an action where a plaintiff asserts that a defendant breached a duty and caused damages. In order to prevail on a claim of negligence, the plaintiff must prove (1) Duty; (2) Breach; (3) Actual Causation; (4) Proximate Causation; and (5) Damages.

(1) Duty

Duty determines the level of care a defendant must exercise. Everyone owes a general duty to avoid harming others. In certain circumstances, an individual owes a higher duty of care. Under the Cardozo majority test, the duty is owed to those in the "zone of danger," meaning, those in the vicinity who may be harmed by the action. Under the Andrews minority test, the duty is owed to all foreseeable plaintiffs.

Applying the Cardozo test, H will claim that he did not have a duty to P, because she was not in his home when the event occurred. Under the Andrews test, P will claim that H did owe a duty because it was foreseeable someone could use the firearm to go out and shoot someone, or injure someone, or put someone into fear, as B did in this case. Depending on where H lives, and whether it is a community where burglaries often occur, P may succeed in showing it was foreseeable that a burglar could come in and take the handgun.

The court will likely agree with P, because it was foreseeable the gun could be used on a person, so H owed a duty to P.

Standard of Care

The next issue is what the standard of care is, meaning how H must exercise his duty.

The court determines the appropriate standard of care. While the standard of care might be adjusted based on such things as physical conditions or professional occupations, the court does not consider mental or emotional individual characteristics in setting the standard of care.

In this case, P will claim that H owed a duty of a reasonable person in his circumstances, meaning the reasonable care of a handgun owner. H may claim that he owes less of a duty because for some reason he is particularly afraid of people breaking into his home. However, this argument will fail, because the court does not consider mental or emotional individual characteristics in setting the duty of care. It does not appear that there are any particular physical characteristics of H that alter this standard of care, or that he was a professional or a child, in which case the standard of care would be higher or lower.

Therefore, the standard of care is a reasonable handgun owner.

It should be noted that though H is a landowner, the issues of landowner liability do not apply to H in this case, because the injury was not to a person on his land (B), but rather to another person (P).

Negligence per Se

P may further attempt to invoke the doctrine of negligence per se. Negligence per se is a doctrine that allows the court to substitute the standard of care with the words of a statute. Where the defendant has violated the statute, that is sufficient to prove breach of duty. The plaintiff must still prove the three other elements of negligence, actual causation, proximate causation, and damages. In order for negligence per se to apply, the plaintiff must prove that (1) her harm was the type of harm the statute was designed to protect and (2) she was in the class of persons the statute was designed to protect.

In this case, P will try to apply the statute that provides that “all firearms must be stored in a secure container that is fully enclosed and locked.” She will claim that this is the standard of care.

As for the first requirement, P will argue that her harm is the type the statute was designed to protect, because it was designed to protect people from being injured by handguns. She was injured by a handgun. The court will likely agree.

However, as for the second requirement, H will argue that P was not in the class of persons, because the requirement that the guns be stored in a secure container seems to protect children in the home. It does not seem to protect people who will be harmed by guns that are stolen, because if that were the case, the requirement might be that guns be kept in a "hidden" location, or that they must be kept in rooms with locked doors, but not necessarily in "secure containers." P will argue that the statute is broader, and legislative intent may show that it was designed to protect all people who might be injured by guns. The court will likely agree with P and that she was in the class. Therefore, the standard of care will be the statute and H will have breached. P must still prove the other elements of negligence.

However, if the court finds that the statute does not protect P, P will need to prove Breach.

(2) Breach

Breach determines whether the defendant met the standard of care, as established above. The standard of care in this case is the care of a reasonable handgun owner.

P will claim that H breached this duty because he kept a handgun on his dresser by his bed, and a reasonable handgun owner would be aware of the risks of doing that and put it somewhere more secure. He would also comply with the statute. H may claim that it was reasonable to keep it there because it was for self-defense, but P will claim he could have kept it under the bed or at least with some sort of a safety lock on it so that someone who came in and stole it would not be able to use it. Additionally, she will claim he should have put it away while he was "out," so that it could not be stolen. This may depend on whether B had a home alarm system.

The court will likely agree there was a breach.

(3) Actual Causation

Causation is satisfied if the defendant's act was the "but-for" cause of the plaintiff's harm. Where more than one thing contributes, the causation is satisfied if the defendant's act was a "substantial factor."

In this case, P will argue that H's act was the but-for cause because if he had not kept the gun out, B would not have gotten it and would not have brought on her damages. H will claim that a burglar is likely to find a gun in someone's house, so even if he had not had it in his, B would have found a gun somewhere else and the harm would have occurred anyway.

The court is likely to find H's argument tenuous, and find that H's breach was the but-for cause.

(4) Proximate Causation

The next issue is whether H's breach was the proximate cause. This is likely to be H's strongest argument. Proximate cause determines whether it was foreseeable that the harm would occur and whether it would be fair to hold H liable.

In this case, H will argue that it was not foreseeable that someone would break in, steal the gun, and use it to commit a tort against someone else. Typically, the court finds that criminal acts of third parties are "superseding intervening causes," meaning that they break the chain of causation. Therefore, H will argue B's burglary and criminal assault should break the chain. P will argue that it was foreseeable this harm would occur, as discussed above, because people often steal guns when they break into homes. Where a homeowner had notice that he was in a dangerous neighborhood, it is more likely proximate cause will be found. Additionally, it would be relevant whether H's home had ever been broken into before.

H will also claim the chain of causation was broken because P was leaving a midnight movie in a dangerous neighborhood, so that made it more likely she would be attacked. This argument will likely fail, because people often see late movies without getting assaulted at gunpoint. H will also claim that P was not injured because of his leaving the gun out, but rather because she “made [B] mad,” and he was going to shoot her for that reason. If she had handed over the purse, he would not have taken out the gun.

Therefore, the court will likely agree with H and find no proximate cause.

(5) Damages

However, if P were to succeed in showing proximate cause, she would also need to show damages. In this case, she will claim that the damages were the shock she suffered, the concussion, and perhaps any emotional damages.

Damages must be foreseeable, certain, unavoidable, and caused directly by the defendant’s action. The forseeability of P’s harm is discussed above, and H may argue it was not foreseeable she would faint but rather that she would be shot. The damages from the concussion and medical bills are certain, but future damages like time away from work and emotional distress may be less certain. P could have mitigated the damages by not seeing a movie at that hour. Causation is discussed above.

Conclusion

Therefore, the court will likely find that there was no negligence on the part of H because there was no proximate causation.

Defenses

If negligence is found, H may assert defenses.

Contributory Negligence

Contributory Negligence is mostly abolished. However, if the jurisdiction retains it, the defendant argues that the plaintiff should receive no recovery because his [sic] negligence contributed to the harm. H would argue that P owed a duty to exercise care for her own safety, and failed to do so because she saw a movie late at night, was approached by a burglar who demanded her purse, and failed to give it to him. This was the but-for cause of her harm and also a foreseeable result of her failing to give over the purse. However, a court would likely find that a reasonable person would not necessarily give over their purse, because she might think that a security guard could come help her or that the burglar was not armed. This would depend on whether P knew it was an area where attacks had happened before and if she saw the gun in B's pocket before he drew it.

On these facts, P was likely not negligent, so there was no contributory negligence.

Comparative Negligence

Comparative negligence reduces the plaintiff's recovery by the percentage of her negligence. Modified comparative negligence only allows the plaintiff to collect if her negligence was less than the defendant's.

For the reasons above, P was not negligent.

Assumption of Risk

This defense requires the assumption of a known risk. This would depend on whether P knew it was a dangerous area. It will also depend on whether she knew that B might be armed. It is unclear whether she knew these facts.

P v. Burglar (B)

P may bring various actions against B. It is important first to note that B may be guilty of several criminal acts, but they are not causes upon which P may bring an action for damages.

Assault

Assault is the (1) intentional (2) placing a plaintiff in fear of an imminent battery plus (3) causation and (4) damages.

Intent

Intent is desire or substantial certainty to cause a result. In this case, P will argue that B intended to place P in fear, because he said "I'm going to shoot you." He might have done it intending to frighten her into giving over the purse, but at least should have known it would cause fear.

Fear of an imminent battery

Battery is a harmful unconsented touching. P will argue that B's action put her in fear of this, because she saw the gun and through she was going to get shot. She was "shocked." Assault requires that the plaintiff be aware of the danger, and in this case P was. Therefore, this element is met.

Causation

P will argue that B's action caused the fear, and the court will agree.

Damages

As discussed above, P will claim that her damages are her concussion, her emotional distress, any medical bills, and perhaps time off work. As discussed above, these must be foreseeable, unavoidable, certain, and caused. There was nothing P could do to mitigate because she could not control fainting, and the harm was caused by B's act, so the requirements of unavoidability and causation are met.

In terms of certainty, it will be more difficult for P to prove her future time off work. Additionally, B may claim that it was not foreseeable she would faint and get a concussion. However, the defendant must take the plaintiff as he finds her, and, therefore, he is responsible for any damages that might occur, regardless of a plaintiff's extreme sensitivity. Therefore, P will succeed in proving damages, and may recover these damages from B provided that the court finds they are certain enough.

Conclusion

P will succeed in proving assault.

Battery

Battery is an unconsented harmful or offensive touching, harmful or offensive to a reasonable person. In this case, there was no touching, so this does not apply. P's hitting the ground does not count as a touching, because though B caused it, it was not direct enough.

Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress

Intentional Infliction of emotional distress requires (1) extreme or outrageous conduct (2) intentionally or recklessly caused (3) that in fact causes extreme emotional distress.

Extreme Conduct

P will argue that B's saying "You made me mad so now I'm going to shoot you" is extreme and outrageous. It would be outrageous to an average person, because they might think they were going to die. They might think about their children or live lives, and be very disturbed. Therefore, this is met.

Intent

B need not have intended to cause extreme emotional distress, he just need have recklessly done so. Recklessness is extreme indifference and beyond gross negligence. A person would clearly know this action would cause extreme emotional distress.

Emotional Distress

P will claim this is met because she fainted, and the court will likely agree. It may be bolstered by psychiatrist testimony.

Conclusion

Therefore, P will succeed in proving this tort.

Negligent Infliction of Emotional Distress

This occurs where a defendant negligently inflicts emotional distress, and it causes physical damages. Because B's act was likely intentional, this will not apply. However, if it were found to be negligent instead, this would apply because P suffered physical manifestations – fainting.

Conversion/Trespass to Chattel

Conversion is an intentional and extreme interference with a plaintiff's property.

B intended to take the purse.

P will argue this applies because B stole her purse and took it away, which had many valuable in it. B will argue this was not extreme because she was able to get the purse back when he was apprehended by the police, so it was instead Trespass to Chattel, which is a minor interference with a plaintiff's property right. This may depend on whether all of P's belongs were in the purse at the time she got it back. She may argue that a purse is particularly important to a woman, so even taking it for a brief period is conversion. The court will likely determine this based on whether P got it back intact, or if it was permanently damaged. If the police did not return it, the suit will be conversion.

False Imprisonment

False imprisonment is intentionally holding a plaintiff captive, or preventing her from escaping. This occurs where there is no reasonable means of escape. P will argue that for the brief time she was held at gunpoint, she was falsely imprisoned. A plaintiff need be held for only a second. He need not physically tie her up; merely holding at gunpoint is sufficient.

B may argue that P provoked him and "made him mad," but this is no defense to this intentional tort.

Therefore, P will likely succeed on this charge.

Negligence

Negligence does not apply because, as discussed above, B's act was intentional.

Defenses

It is unlikely that any defenses will apply. D may try to claim self-defense, but there is absolutely no evidence that P attacked him in any way.

P v. Cinema (C)

P may have a suit against Cinema for negligence. There are 5 elements to negligence, as discussed above.

(1) Duty

Duty is defined above. As discussed above, some people owe higher duties, and one such category is landowners. Landowners owe a duty to protect people on their premises. While the modern trend is a duty of reasonable care under the circumstances, under traditional rules, duty depends on what kind of an individual is on the land.

No duty is owed to an undiscovered trespasser. A slightly higher duty is owed to a known trespasser, and a higher duty to a person on the land for social purposes. The highest duty is owed to someone known as an "invitee," who is on the land for profit. In this case, the court will find that P was an invitee, because she was there to see a movie, and therefore for a business purpose. The parking lot belonged to Cinema, so C was the landowner and owed a duty to P as an invitee.

A landowner owes a duty to an invitee to inspect for dangerous circumstances and make them safe or warn the invitees.

Additionally, applying either [the] Cardozo or Andrews test, P was in the zone of danger (the parking lot) and she was a foreseeable plaintiff.

(2) Breach

Breach is defined above.

In this case, P will argue that C's failure to protect its customers was a breach. P will argue that C should have installed lighting, security guards, or some sort of a fence to protect the premises. It could have also warned patrons, so that if P had known, she could have been more on her guard walking through the lot. She might not have refused to give over her purse.

Therefore, there was a breach.

(3) Actual Causation

C will claim its action was not the but-for cause, because the burglary and P's fainting might have occurred even if C had put in a security system. However, the court will likely find that if C had taken some sort of security measure, it would have indeed prevented this event.

(4) Proximate Causation

B will claim the chain of causation is broken by the criminal act of a third party. However, this does not protect a landowner from liability where the risk was known to the landowner. In this case, C was "aware" of "several" previous attacks in the parking lot in past years. C may claim that they were spread out over many years. C may also introduce evidence that the neighborhood has become more safe recently, or that there is a greater crackdown by the police so it had less reason to worry. But absent this sort of evidence, P will argue that if there were "several" attacks, C should have done something more to protect. It was foreseeable there could be another attack, particularly because C shows movies at midnight, when crime is more likely to occur.

B's stealing the gun will not affect this, because it happened before the attack. It is foreseeable that a burglar would have a gun, regardless of how he obtained it. It is also foreseeable that a victim could faint and get a concussion, because people are frequently afraid of guns.

The court will likely agree with P, and find proximate causation because it was foreseeable. The court will also find it fair to hold C responsible, because it was in the best position to avoid the danger and prevent this from happening. Customers rely on their businesses to protect them. P could analogize to common carriers and claim that businesses should also owe a duty of care, because customers put themselves in their hands for protection.

(5) Damages

The damages analysis is the same as above, and it will be determined by the court on the same bases.

Defenses

The defenses of contributory and comparative negligence and assumption of risk do not apply, as discussed above.

Answer B

Patron v. Homeowner

Negligence: Keeping the Handgun on Bedside Table

Patron will contend that Homeowner was negligent in failing to keep his handgun in a secure locked container as directed by the statute. In order to prevail in an action for negligence, Patron must prove that Homeowner owed him a duty, that he breached the duty, that his breach caused Patron's injury, and that he suffered damages.

Duty

Under the Cardozo view, a duty is owed only to foreseeable plaintiffs. Under the Andrews view, a duty is owed to the whole world. In this case, Patron will argue that it was foreseeable that a thief could steal an unsecured handgun and use it to perpetuate crime such as a robbery.

Negligence per se: Violation of Statute

When a statute proscribes certain behavior, the violation of that statute establishes a breach in the standard of care when the harm is of the kind that the statute is designed to prevent, and the plaintiff is among the class of people the statute is designed to protect. Here, Homeowner will argue that the statute is intended to prevent small children from gaining access to dangerous guns and hurting themselves or others. However, Patron can persuasively counter that it was also designed to prevent thieves or criminals from obtaining weapons that they would then use to perpetuate crime. The legislative history of the statute might shed some light on the purposes of the law. If its purpose includes preventing criminals from stealing unsecured weapons, then Patron, a crime victim, would be within the class the statute was designed to protect, and Homeowner's breach would establish per se negligence.

A reasonable Person would have Secured the Gun

Alternatively, Patron can argue that even without the statute, Homeowner was negligent in leaving the gun in a place where it was easily accessible to any burglars. He would argue that a reasonable person would foresee that the gun would be noticeable and would be stolen by a burglar. He will also argue that the mere presence of the gun, which Homeowner kept to ward off intruders, indicates that Homeowner did in fact foresee the possibility of violent criminals entering his home.

Breach

Homeowner kept the gun on his bedside table. There is no indication that the gun was kept in a locked drawer, but rather out on his table. Therefore he violated the statute.

Causation

But-for Cause: Homeowner's act of leaving the gun on the table was the but-for cause of Burglar's assault on Patron. If he kept the gun in a locked container, Burglar would not have had access to it.

Proximate Cause: Homeowner will argue that Burglar's intervening criminal acts of breaking into his house, and then robbing Patron, were superseding causes of Patron's injury. However, an intervening act by a criminal will not interrupt the causal chain if it is foreseeable. As discussed above, it was foreseeable that a criminal could break into the house and use the gun on another unsuspecting victim. Therefore, Homeowner's argument will fail.

Damages

Patron suffered shock and a concussion as a result of Burglar's robbing him [sic]. Therefore, if Burglar's act is a foreseeable result of Homeowner's negligence in failing to secure his handgun, Homeowner can be liable for Patron's injury.

Patron v. Burglar

Burglar confronted Patron in the parking lot and demanded her purse. When Patron refused, Burglar pointed the gun at Patron and threatened her. Patron fainted, suffering a concussion, and Burglar took her purse and fled.

Assault

The prima facie case for assault is met when the defendant (1) performs an act that places the plaintiff in reasonable apprehension of imminent harmful or offensive contact with his person, (2) the defendant had the intent to place the plaintiff in apprehension, and (3) causation. There must be some physical conduct, not mere words, to constitute assault.

Here, Burglar drew his handgun and stated "You made me mad, so now I'm going to shoot you." His words, combined with pointing the gun at Patron, created in Patron an apprehension that Burglar was going to immediately shoot her. Further, Burglar had the intent to make Patron believe he was going to shoot her. This act caused Patron to faint and suffer a concussion. Therefore, Burglar can be liable for assault.

Battery

Battery consists of (1) harmful or offensive contact with the plaintiff's person, (2) intent by the defendant to cause the touching, (3) causation.

Here, Burglar intentionally took the purse from Paton's person after she fainted. Taking an object from someone's person satisfies the offensive touching element. Further, the fact that Patron may have been unconscious when Burglar seized her purse does not negate the offensiveness of the touching he caused. Therefore, he can be liable for burglary.

Trespass to Chattels

Trespass to chattels occurs when the defendant (1) interferes with the plaintiff's possession of her chattel, (2) had the intent of performing the act that interferes with possession, (3) causes the interference, and (4) plaintiff suffers damages.

Here, Burglar grabbed Patron's purse and ran away with it, interfering with her right to possess it. He did so intentionally. The police later apprehended Burglar. If he still had the purse and it was returned to Patron, she may recover for any damages that resulted from her temporary loss of possession.

Conversion

Conversion occurs when the defendant (1) interferes with the plaintiff's possession of her chattel, and the interference is so extensive as to warrant payment for the full value of the chattel, (2) has the intent of performing the act that interferes with possession, (3) causes the interference. When defendant's act amounts to an exercise of dominion and control over the chattel, conversion is more likely to be found.

Here, Burglar seized the purse with the intent to completely and permanently deprive Patron of possession. If Burglar's later apprehension by the police restored the purse to Patron's possession, she may not be able to obtain the full value. If, however, Burglar disposed of the purse before he was apprehended, Patron can recover the full Value of the purse and its contents at the time Burglar seized it.

Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress

Intentional infliction of emotional distress occurs when the defendant (1) engages in extreme and outrageous conduct (2) with the intent to cause severe emotional distress, or is reckless as to the likelihood of causing severe distress, (3) causation, and (4) damages: severe emotional distress.

Burglar's conduct in pointing a gun at Patron, demanding her purse, and stating that he was going to shoot her is conduct "beyond all bounds of decency in a civilized society." Theft and threats to inflict serious bodily injury are extreme and intolerable. Burglar clearly intended to cause Patron emotional distress, as he likely hoped his threat and menacing her with the gun would convince her to hand over the purse. Patron fainted out of shock and suffered a concussion. She is likely to suffer emotional distress including fear of being out at night by herself following this robbery. Therefore, she can prevail under this theory.

Negligent Infliction of Emotional Distress

Patron could also prevail under a negligence theory because she suffered physical harm (shock and concussion) as a result of her emotional stress from her encounter with Burglar. However, because Burglar's conduct was at least reckless with respect to her emotional distress, she will not need to rely on a negligence theory.

In sum, Patron can recover for her physical injuries, emotional distress, and the deprivation of her purse.

Patron v. Cinema

Duty to make Safe for Invitees

Patron was robbed in a parking lot belonging to Cinema, just as she was exiting the Cinema around midnight after viewing a late movie. She will argue that Cinema breached the duty of care owed to her as an invitee by failing to provide lighting or a security guard in the parking lot.

A person who comes onto the land for the economic benefit of the landowner, or as part of the general public is invited onto the premises, is an invitee. Patron was an invitee because she entered Cinema's property, which was open to the public, and paid to see a movie. Cinema's duty to invitees is to make safe or warn of any latent dangers, manmade or natural, that are known or discoverable with reasonable inspection.

Cinema knew that there had been several previous attacks on customers in the parking lot in previous years, yet failed to provide any lighting or a security guard. Because the threat was known to Cinema, there was a duty to make a reasonable effort to enhance security.

Negligence

Cinema can also be liable under a negligence theory (see above). A duty of care is owed to all foreseeable plaintiffs, and Patron was a foreseeable victim of crime because she was exiting the cinema after midnight in an area where there was a known risk of assault. A reasonable theater owner would have provided either a security guard or bright lighting to discourage crime. Providing lights is [a] fairly low cost and would significantly improve safety. Therefore, Cinema's failure to do so was a breach of duty.

The lack of lights or a guard was a but-for cause of the attack because Burglar would not have been emboldened to attack Patron if there was a security guard present or if bright lighting would increase his risk of apprehension.

Proximate Cause: Cinema will argue that Burglar's intentional tortious and criminal act was a supervening cause of Patron's injury. However, as discussed above, a defendant can be liable where his negligence increases the risk of subsequent criminal acts. Here, the failure to provide lighting or a guard, despite the known attacks on other patrons, was a substantial cause of the burglary.

Joint and Several Liability

In a jurisdiction permitting joint and several liability, a plaintiff can recover the full amount of any damages proximately caused by the combined tortious acts of two or more defendants, whether acting independently or in concert, that result in a single indivisible harm. If this jurisdiction follows joint and several liability, Patron can recover from any of the defendants, and they can seek contribution from one another.

Q2 Professional Responsibility

There was recently a major release of hazardous substances from a waste disposal site in County. Owen is the current owner of the site. Fred is a former owner of the site. Hap is the producer of the hazardous substances disposed of at the site.

As a result of the hazardous substance release, County has identified the site as a priority cleanup target, and has notified Owen, Fred, and Hap that they are the responsible parties who must either clean up or pay to clean up the site. County advised each responsible party of his degree of culpability. In the event each responsible party does not pay his share of the cleanup costs, County is entitled to impose joint and several liability on each of them.

In an effort to facilitate the resolution of County's demand, Owen, the wealthiest responsible party, arranged for Fred, Hap, and himself to meet with Anne, his tax lawyer. At the meeting, Owen offered to pay the attorney fees of all three of them in exchange for their agreement to be represented by Anne. Fred and Hap accepted Owen's offer and Anne distributed identical retainer agreements to each of them, which they signed.

What ethical violations, if any, has Anne committed? Discuss.

Answer A

Anne's Ethical Violations

Duty of Loyalty

An attorney must not represent a client when there is a concurrent conflict of interest. A concurrent conflict occurs when the interests of one client are directly adverse to those of another or the representation of one client will be materially limited because of the interests of the attorney, a third party, another client or a former client. An attorney can nevertheless take on representation if she reasonably believes that she can competently and diligently represent the interests of all effected clients, discloses the conflict and gets informed written consent from the clients. The CA rules do not apply the "reasonably believes standard" and require written disclosure in situations where the conflict involves a former client.

Potential Conflict

Here, Anne is the longtime tax attorney of Owner (O). She agrees to represent O, Fred (F) and Hap (H) is a case where they are each being required by the County to clean up a hazardous substance spill. Anne has agreed to represent them as her joint clients against County. The County has made it clear that if each party does not pay his share, County will impose joint and several liability one each of them. This means that County can recover the full amount of the costs from either of them. Here, O is wealthier than F and H. We are not aware how wealthy F and H are. Due to County's decision to pursue joint and several liability in case each person does not pay, there is a potential conflict of interest. If either of the parties turns out to be insolvent or does not pay his share, the others are exposed to liability for the full amount, which likely will be a lot. Also, each party has been notified of his culpability. It might be that the parties each have an argument for why they are not at fault and for why another party is more at fault. For example, F is the former owner of the site and may want to argue that he does not have any responsibility for the spill. H produces the hazardous material that is dumped on the site. Thus, H might argue that he is not responsible for the release because O as the owner of the site has responsibility to prevent a release.

Thus, Anne must have realized that there was a potential conflict of interest between the parties and [it] must [be] determined whether she reasonably believed she could effectively represent O, F and H as her joint clients. Here, Anne might reasonably believe that she can do so because their interests are all aligned against County. However, because of each party's different involvement and responsibility for the spill, as well as the County's decision to pursue its claims under the theory of joint and several liability in case one party does not pay, Anne should have realized that she could not make arguments on behalf of each client without taking a position adverse to the others. However, if she reasonably believed that the conflict was consentable, she should have disclosed the conflict [to] the parties, preferably in writing, and received their informed written consent to proceed. Anne must have been careful not to disclose any confidential information about O and his finances since Anne had such information as O's tax attorney. If she could fully disclose the conflict without revealing O's confidential information, and the clients each gave their informed, written consent, then Anne could have proceeded to represent all three of them. However, the conflict would be unconsentable if Anne did not believe she could effectively represent them all. For the reasons discussed above, Anne might have believed that this conflict was not consentable and thus could not have advised the clients to consent.

Also, there is a potential conflict stemming from the fact that O is Anne's former client. [Anne] must not take on representation of a client in a matter that is the same as or substantially related to a matter in which she represented a former client if the former client's confidential information might be relevant. Furthermore, Anne cannot use any confidential information against O in this matter without O's consent. Since O has arranged for Anne to represent O, H and F, O has consented to the representation. However, Anne must be careful not to reveal any confidential information about O without O's consent during the course of her representation.

The fact that O is Anne's current client creates a conflict. Anne may feel a greater sense of loyalty to O to protect his interests because O is already her client and she likely wants to keep O as her client in her tax practice. Thus, Anne might not be able to effectively and fairly represent the interests of F and H. She must also disclose this conflict to F and H and only proceed if it is reasonable to do so and F and H provide their informed consent. Given that this lawsuit is not related to Anne's tax practice, Anne might reasonably believe that she can fairly represent the clients' interests as joint clients, especially because they are all defending against County. However, given her loyalty to O, perhaps this conflict is also not consentable. It would be useful to know just how long O has been Anne's client. In any case, if the additional facts make it such that a reasonable attorney would not advise F and H to consent to Anne representing all three clients, the consent of F and H will not be effective.

Actual Conflict

An actual conflict can develop in the course of representation. If it does, Anne must revisit the process discussed above, disclose the conflict and only proceed if she has written, informed consent from the parties to proceed. If Anne proceeded with the representation despite the conflicts discussed above, she must be aware of any actual conflicts that might arise. For example, if any of the three parties decides to argue in his own defense that culpability lies with another one of the parties, Anne must realize that continuing with representation is no longer reasonable. At that point, she must disclose the conflict (subject to any limitations due to her duty of confidentiality) and advise the clients to seek independent counsel. Depending on how much confidential information she has at that point, she may be able to continue representing one of them. In this case, that party would likely be O because she already has confidential information about O due [to] previously representing O for tax purposes. However, if she learns confidential information from the parties and an actual conflict arises, she may have to withdraw completely and advise each of them to seek independent counsel in this matter.

Duty of Competence

A lawyer has a duty to competently represent her clients. She must use the skill, knowledge, thoroughness and preparation reasonably necessary for effective representation. Here, we are told that Anne is a longtime tax attorney. The case she is hired to work on involves a major release of hazardous substances from a waste disposal site and cleanup required by County. As a longtime tax attorney, she likely does not have much experience in this particular area of the law. The case relates to matters outside of the scope of a tax attorney's area of practice. However, Anne may take on representation if she can become competent in the areas of the case by researching and preparing herself in the pertinent field. If she can do so without causing any harm to the clients or causing an undue delay, she may represent them in the matter. Also, she can associate with another attorney who has more experience in the specific area. If Anne takes these measures to prepare herself or associate with another competent attorney, she will not have violated this duty. However, if she proceeds to represent the clients in this matter without becoming competent in this particular area, she will have breached her duty of competence.

Duty of Confidentiality

Under the ABA, an attorney has a duty not to disclose confidential information related to the representation of that client. It does not matter from whom or how the information was acquired. In CA, this duty of confidentiality is recognized in the attorney's oath. There are exceptions for disclosing confidential information: 1) express consent, 2) implied consent, 3) disclosure ordered by court, 4) disclosure to prevent a crime or fraud likely to result in substantial financial loss when the attorney's services have been used to commit the crime or fraud, and 5) disclosure if the attorney reasonably believes it's necessary to prevent certain death or substantial bodily injury. CA does not recognize the exception for crimes and fraud and limits the disclosure to prevent death or bodily injury to situations where the act to be prevented is a crime.

During the course of representation, Anne must take care not to disclose the confidential information from one client to another without their consent, unless one of the other exceptions discussed above applies. Also, if Anne discovers an actual conflict of interest during the course of representation, she must take care to protect such confidences when making any disclosures related to resolving the conflict of interests. If Anne does not properly protect the confidential information from her clients, she will have breached this duty.

Attorney-client privilege

This privilege is an exclusionary rule of evidence. The plaintiff can refuse to testify and prevent his attorney from testifying as to confidential communications between them and their agents during the course of representation. The communications must have been intended by the client to have been confidential and must have been made for the purpose of legal services. Under the ABA, this privilege lasts even after the client dies. Under the CA rules, the privilege ends when the client's estate is finalized after his death. There are exceptions to this privilege; the attorney may testify 1) to prevent a future crime or fraud when the client has used the attorney's services to commit the crime or fraud, 2) when there is litigation related to a breach of duties between the client and attorney and 3) when joint clients are later involved in civil litigation. CA also allows disclosure to prevent a crime that is likely to result in death or substantial bodily injury. The client holds this privilege and may waive it.

Under this privilege, Anne may not testify as to confidential communications between herself and the three clients unless the clients waive it. If the crime/fraud exception applies or the CA exception for death or bodily injury applies, then Anne can testify as to the confidential communications. Also, if the joint clients are later involved in civil litigation against one another, the clients will not be able to assert this privilege. Anne should make it clear to O, H and F that she may have to testify against them if they are later involved as adversaries in a civil case.

Fiduciary Duties of Attorney

Under the ABA, fees must be reasonable under the CA rules, fees must not be unconscionable. Thus, Anne must make sure that her fees meet these standards based on the amount of time and skill she will use and the level of difficulty in the case. Also, under CA rules, a fee arrangement must be in writing if it is for over $1000 unless the client waives the right to get a writing, there is an emergency, the attorney is performing routine services for an existing client, or the client is a corporation. Thus, the fee arrangement must be in writing to meet the CA requirements if it is for more than $1000 and the clients do not waive their right to a writing.

Receiving Payment from One Person for Representing Another

An attorney may receive payment from one person to represent another so long as 1) the client being represented is aware of this arrangement and provides written, informed consent, 2) the attorney's judgment and the effectiveness of representation will not be affected because of the interests of the person paying for the services, and 3) the client's confidential information is protected. Here, O is the wealthiest of O, H and F. O offers to pay the attorney's fees for all three of them. Thus, F and H must be made aware of the arrangement. Also, Anne must ensure that her representation of H and F is not affected by the fact that O is paying for her fees. Because O is also a client in the case, the fact that he is paying the fees might interfere with Anne's judgment. Anne might feel a greater sense of loyalty and duty to O not only because O is her current client but also because O is paying for her fees. Thus, she might choose to pursue O's interests at the expense of the others. Thus, Anne may violate her duties of loyalty to F and H if she lets the fact that O is paying her fees influence her judgment. Also, as discussed above, Anne must protect the confidential information of all three clients. If she fails to, she will have violated this ethical duty.

Anne should have disclosed this conflict when she disclosed potential conflicts to all three clients and obtained their informed, written consent. F and H must have been made aware of this situation before agreeing to be represented by Anne and accepting O's offer for O to pay the attorney's fees. If Anne failed to inform the clients when they agreed to the joint representation, Anne has violated her duty to loyalty.

Duty to Communicate – Settlement

Anne also has a duty to communicate to her clients all material developments in the case and to keep them informed. Thus, Anne must communicate material information to all three clients and not rely on one of them to communicate it to the others. If she does [not] she will be found to have violated this duty.

The client has the power to decide whether to settle. Here, if there is a settlement offer by the County or any resolution that affects all three clients, Anne must communicate it to each of them individually, make sure that they understand it and only proceed with their consent. Anne cannot rely on the consent of only one client to proceed. Furthermore, she must clearly explain the terms of any settlement to each client and how it affects each of them.

Answer B

Duty of Competence

A lawyer has a duty to the clients to provide competent representation. Competence is defined as the still, thoroughness, and preparation reasonably needed to provide adequate representation in a case. Whether an attorney is competent is dependent on the complexity of the case, the availability of other lawyers in the region to take the case, the circumstances the case was brought to the attorney, the ability of the attorney to research and become acquainted with the case without undue expense to the clients, and the ability of the attorney to consult with local counsel. Here, Anne may have violated this duty. The nature of this case is a complex environmental case arising under state and federal law, CERCLA liability. However, the facts state that Anne's area of expertise is tax. Environmental law requires significant technical training and experience and knowledge of the federal statutes and state statutes. There is no evidence Anne has practiced in this area in the past. Further, there is no evidence that other attorneys in the region are not competent to practice in this area of law. Further, there is no evidence to establish that Anne has attempted to consult with a local expert on environmental law in order to provide competent representation to the clients. Finally, no evidence establishes that Anne has done any research to become familiar with this area of the law. Therefore, under the circumstances she has probably violated her duty of competence by taking a case in an area of the law in which she is extremely unfamiliar.

Conflicts of Interest

Both the ABA and California Model Rules limit an attorney's representation of clients with conflicting interests. Under the ABA rules, an attorney may not represent a client if representation would be directly adverse to a client or there is a significant risk his representation of one client would be materially impaired by his duty to himself or another client, unless the attorney reasonably believes he can provide competent and diligent representation, does not involve a claim by one client against another in the same case, and is not prohibited by law. Under the ABA rules, an attorney only needs to get informed consent in a situation where an actual conflict exists. Anne may argue that under the ABA rules no informed consent was necessary here because all the parties had the interest in avoiding liability from the county and therefore all of the interests were aligned at the time. Further, she will argue that this offense is a strict liability offense so none of the parties can absolve liability by placing the blame on another party.

However, it may be argued that the parties did have conflicting positions. As parties who were to be jointly and severally liable and had the right of contribution under the act, all parties wanted to shift the blame to the other party and recover from the prior landowners. Generally, environmental statutes allow the nonactive party to seek contribution from the active party; here Hap is the active party. Therefore because each side is trying to place the blame on the other party, it is likely that there is a current conflict of interest. If there is a current conflict of interest, the attorney must reasonably believe she can provide diligent and competent representation to all clients and must give full informed consent, confirmed in writing. The ABA suggests that an attorney notify the clients on the risks of the duty of loyalty, confidentiality, and the lack of privilege if a suit were to arise between the clients. There are two problems here. First it would be tough to argue that Anne reasonably believed she can provide competent and diligent representation to all clients. Given that all the clients are attempting to push liability on each other and will want to recover contribution from each other in the case, it is likely that a reasonable attorney would not believe that they would be able to provide competent and diligent representation. This is not simply a case where the parties are trying to avoid liability, but it also involves relative contribution if the county is to recover from one client. Further, given her continuing business with Owen, it would be tough for her to argue she could provide equal representation to F and H.

Under the ABA, it will also be unconscionable to receive this consent if Anne's duty of confidentiality to Owen prevents her from making a full disclosure of the potential conflicts of interest to the parties. There is no evidence that her duty to Owen will prevent her from fully disclosing the risks and circumstances of joint rep to the other clients because she represented Owen on a totally unrelated matter and the details of that matter are not necessary for full informed consent of the clients.

Further, Anne failed to get the informed consent of any of the clients confirmed in writing. She only distributed retainer agreements but did get the informed consent of any of the clients in a case of actual conflict between the clients. Therefore she has violated her duty for concurrent conflicts of interest under the ABA rules.

She also violated this duty under the California rules. California has similar requirements but extends the conflicts to potential conflicts as well as actual conflicts, requires disclosure of the risks of the conflicts, and the attorney only needs to believe in good faith that she can provide competent representation, not the reasonable attorney standard adopted under the ABA rules. Anne may be able to argue that she honestly believed that she could provide competent and diligent representation to all the clients and may be able to prevail here, which she would not under the ABA rules, which require an attorney's reasonable belief. However, under the CA rules, Anne failed to give full disclosure to the clients of the risks provided by joint representation and failed to get their written consent to these conflicts. Therefore Anne violated the ethical rules relating to joint representation under CA law also.

Therefore, Anne should withdraw from representing all three because she has received confidential information from H and F.

Fee Payor Interests

Anne violated her duties under both the California and ABA authorities by having Owen pay the fees for all three defendants. Under the ABA rules, an attorney may not have a party pay all of the fees for a group of clients unless the attorney reasonably believes it will not interfere with her professional judgment, confidential communications will not be shared with the party, and the nonpaying clients give informed consent. California has similar requirements but also requires that the informed consent be in writing. Here, Anne may run into a few problems. First, it may be argued that by having one of the joint clients paying the interest of all three clients in a joint liability context may interfere with her professional judgment. However, in offering to pay the fees Owen did not require that Anne exercise her judgment in a certain way or proceed in a certain way under the case. Therefore, the payment probably did not interfere with her professional judgment. Next, the payment probably did not interfere with the duty of confidentiality to the other clients because the fee payor, Owen, did not request that confidential information be given to the other clients. Under the ABA rules, H and F need to give informed consent. There is no evidence of this. Although they both knew that Owen was paying, Anne never disclosed to them the risks of the fee payor interest. For that reason, informed consent was never given. In addition, under California law, informed consent must be given by F and H in writing. Since informed consent, even orally, was never given, Anne violated her duties under the ABA and California authorities.

Duty of Confidentiality

As a past attorney for Owen, Anne has a duty to Owen not to reveal information learned in the course of her past representations of Owen without the consent of Owen, where consent is implicitly given, or where another exception exists. Here, there is no evidence that Anne has revealed any information learned in the course of her past representations of Owen on tax matters. Further, it is unlikely she even came across this information. Therefore a violation of her duty of confidentiality has [not] been violated in this instance, unless she revealed this information. There is no evidence here that she had revealed any of this information but she needs to be sure she does not reveal any of this without the informed consent of Owen.

Further, Anne has a duty of confidentiality to all current clients, Owen, F, and H. In representation she may not reveal information learned in the representation of the other clients unless the clients give informed consent confirmed in writing or an exception exists. Before revealing any information and before jointly representing the clients, Anne should have the clients waive their right for the information to be kept confidential. If this is not done either before rep or during rep, she will probably be forced to withdraw because her duty of loyalty to the other clients requires her to do so.

Duty to Keep Reasonably Informed

Anne [as an] attorney has a duty to keep all clients reasonably informed as to the status of their litigation. Here, this may conflict with Anne's duty of confidentiality to the other clients. If Anne learns of a matter central to her representation of the group, her duty of loyalty to a certain client may conflict with the duty to keep the other clients reasonably informed. As stated above, Anne should inform the clients ahead of time of this duty and require them to waive their duty of confidentiality so she can fulfill her duty to keep all clients reasonably informed. If a client refuses to waive the duty of confidentiality, she should withdraw from representing all clients.

Duty Not to Use Information of past Clients to Disadvantage

Similar to the duty of confidentiality, an attorney may not use any information to the disadvantage of past clients unless the information is public or the client has given informed consent confirmed in writing. Here, Anne should be sure not to use any information learned in the representation of Owen to the disadvantage of Owen, even if the information is not itself revealed. This is particularly tough situation for Anne if she does come across a situation where some information used in the past representations may be used to the disadvantage of Owen; she will need to be sure not to reveal this information or get Owen's informed consent.

Fee Agreement

The ABA rules do not require a noncontingent fee arrangement to be in writing, although they highly suggest doing so. Further, the ABA rules require the attorney to notify the client within a reasonable time of representation of the fee arrangement.

The California rules that all fee arrangements, including noncontingent fee arrangements, be in writing, unless the services are for less than $1,000, it is a corporate client, the client has received the services in the past, or it is otherwise impracticable to do so. Here, none of the exceptions are met, unless Anne plans on charging less than 1k. Further, the payor, Owen, is an individual, not a corporation. She should give a written disclosure of this arrangement.

Duty of Loyalty

Anne has a duty of loyalty to all clients, which includes the duty to put the interests of your client before all others. In a joint rep situation this is tough to do, but it is required that all clients get treated fairly. Here, Owen is a past client of Anne and Anne hopes for future representation of Owen on his tax matters. Therefore, it will be tough for her to treat all clients equally. She should withdraw from rep for this reason.

Q3 Evidence

David and Vic were farmers with adjoining property. They had been fighting for several years about water rights.

In May, Vic and his wife, Wanda, were sitting in the kitchen when Vic received a telephone call. During the call, Vic became quite angry. As soon as he hung up, he said the following to Wanda: "That rat, David, just called and told me that he was going to make me sorry! He used some sort of machine to disguise his voice, but I know it was him!"

In June, Wanda and Vic passed a truck driven by David, who made an obscene gesture as they drove by. Vic immediately stopped and yelled that if David wanted a fight, then that was what he was going to get. Both men jumped out of their trucks. After an exchange of blows, David began strangling Vic. Vic collapsed and died from a massive heart attack. David was charged with manslaughter in California Superior Court.

At David's trial, the prosecution called Wanda, who testified about Vic's description of the May telephone call.

During cross-examination of Wanda, the defense introduced into evidence a certified copy of a felony perjury conviction Vic had suffered in 2007.

The prosecution then introduced into evidence a certified copy of a misdemeanor simple assault conviction David had suffered in 2006.

During the defense's case, David claimed that he acted in self-defense. He testified that he knew about two other fights involving Vic. In the first, which took place four years before his death, Vic broke a man's arm with a tire iron. In the other, which occurred two years before his death, Vic threatened a woman with a gun. David testified that he had heard about the first incident before June, but that he had not heard about the second incident until after his trial had commenced.

Assuming that all appropriate objections were timely made, should the California Superior Court have admitted:

1. Wanda's testimony about Vic's statement regarding the May phone call? Discuss.
2. The certified copy of Vic's 2007 felony perjury conviction? Discuss.
3. The certified copy of David's 2006 misdemeanor simple assault conviction? Discuss.
4. David's testimony about the first fight involving Vic breaking another man's arm with a tire iron? Discuss.
5. David's testimony about the second fight involving Vic threatening a woman with a gun? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

Answer A

1. Wanda's testimony about Vic's statement concerning the May Phone call:

Logical and Legal Relevance

For evidence to be admissible it must be relevant which, under California law, is any evidence that has any tendency to make any fact of consequence, that is at issue, more or less probable than it would be without such evidence. In this case, Wanda's testimony concerning the phone call is relevant, in that it goes to show that David's intent to hurt Vic in some way prior to the June fight, a fact that is at issue, since David is claiming he acted in self-defense when he killed Vic.

Under Proposition 8 of the California Constitution (hereafter Prop. 8), any evidence that is relevant may be admitted in a criminal case. However, Prop. 8 makes an exception for balancing under California Evidence Code (hereafter CEC) 352, which gives a court discretion in excluding relevant evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by a risk of unfair prejudice, confusion of issues, or misleading the jury. In this case, the evidence has significant probative value, as it tends to show that David had a preexisting intent to hurt Vic and thus makes it more likely than not that he, not Vic, was the initial aggressor in the June fight that led to Vic's death. There is no indication that such evidence poses a risk of unfair prejudice, confusion of issues, or misleading the jury, and as a result, the evidence would not be barred by CEC 352.

Personal Knowledge

A witness may only testify as to those matters to which she has personal knowledge, in that she must have perceived the matter in some manner, such as by hearing or observing it. In this case, Wanda personally heard Vic's statement concerning the phone call, and as a result, she has sufficient personal knowledge to testify.

Authentication

All evidence must be authenticated, in that it must be proven to be what it purports to be. In this case, the authenticity of the phone call – namely, whether David was the person who actually made the call – comes into question, given that Vic stated David was using some machine to disguise his voice. To authenticate a phone call, the person hearing it must be shown to have some familiarity with the speaker's voice, which can be gained either from prior interactions before the trial or subsequent to the trial. In this case, David and Vic had been fighting for several years about water rights, and thus it would be likely that Vic was familiar with the sound of David's voice. As a result, he would be qualified to make an identification of David's voice over the phone. As a result, Vic's statement concerning the phone call would be properly authenticated for purposes of trial.

Hearsay

A statement is hearsay if it is made out-of-court and being offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. In this case, Wanda's statement contains two pieces of hearsay: 1) Vic's statement made to her, and 2) David's statements to Vic over the phone. Both are being offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, in that Vic's statement is being offered to show that David called him and Vic knew it was him despite the voice distortion, and David's statement is being offered to show that David was planning to make Vic sorry.

In general, hearsay is inadmissible. However, the CEC does contain numerous exceptions to this general rule of hearsay inadmissibility that may allow these statements in. In a situation where a statement contains two levels of hearsay, such as here, both levels of hearsay must fall within an exception in order to be admissible.

Prop. 8 would not be sufficient to admit the evidence, as Prop. 8 contains an exception which requires hearsay rules to be satisfied before admitting relevant evidence.

David's Statement to Vic:

Admission of a Party-opponent:

If the statement is made by one party to the case and is offered into evidence against him by the opposing party, it is an exception to the hearsay rule and is admissible. In this case, the person who made the statement is David, the party-opponent, and it is being offered against him by the prosecution. Thus, it would be admissible under the exception for statements of a party-opponent.

Statement Against Interest:

A statement may also be admitted if it is mad by one party against their penal or pecuniary interest, and such party is unavailable. Here, David is available to testify, and there is no indication that he made the statement knowing that it was against his penal interest to do so; thus, the statement would not qualify under this exception.

Then-existing State of Mind:

A statement may be admissible to show the party's then-existing state of mind at the time the statement was made. In this case, Wanda can argue that the statement shows David's existing state of mind at the time, namely, that he was going to make Vic sorry and intended to act on his statement. If the court finds this to be accurate, the statement would be admissible.

Vic's Statement to David:

Contemporaneous Statement:

A hearsay statement is admissible if it is made describing or explaining certain conduct of the declarant while the declarant is engaged in such conduct. In this case, while the statement does describe Vic's conduct, namely, that he was just on the phone with David, Vic made the statement about the phone call only after he had hung up, not while he was actively listening to David. Thus, the statement was not contemporaneous with Vic's action and would not be admissible under this exception.

Excited Utterance:

A hearsay statement is also admissible if it describes an exciting or startling event or condition and is made while the person is still under the stress of excitement from an event or condition. In this case, the facts indicate that Vic became quite angry during the call, thus indicating the call itself was a startling event or condition. In addition, given David's particular statements to Vic during the call, namely, that he meant to make Vic sorry, a court most likely would find this to be a startling event or condition. Vic's statements about the call were made to Wanda as soon as he hung up, thus indicating that he was still under the stress of the phone call – furthermore, the statements are followed by exclamation points, implying that he was still agitated from it.

Therefore, the statement would qualify as an excited utterance, and would be admissible.

Thus, in conclusion, the court did not err in admitting Wanda's statement.

2. Certified Copy of Vic's 2007 Felony Perjury Conviction:

Logical and Legal Relevance

The evidence of Vic's conviction is logically relevant to the case, as it goes to show Vic's character for truthfulness, and thus would be used to impeach his statements to Wanda above concerning the telephone call, indicating that David did not make the call or have the intent to hurt Vic. Further, David's preexisting intent to hurt Vic is in dispute, since David is claiming he acted in self-defense and was not the initial aggressor. Thus, the evidence is logically relevant.

The prosecution could argue that the evidence is inadmissible under CEC 352, on the grounds that it would mislead the jury by making them think that Vic's character for truthfulness is relevant to whether he started the fight or not. However, it is unlikely a court would find that a reasonable jury would make this inference, given that the conviction was for perjury, not for a crime of violence, and it is being offered during the cross-examination of Wanda, thus indicating that it is meant to attack Wanda's testimony, not Vic's character for violence as a whole. Furthermore, the evidence has substantial probative value, as it tends to show that Vic is not truthful, and was therefore lying about the phone call from David – thus making David's self-defense argument more probable. Therefore, the evidence would not be barred by CEC 352.

Character Evidence

Character Evidence is any evidence offered to show that a person acted in conformity with character on a particular occasion, and is generally inadmissible. Here, the evidence of Vic's prior conviction is being offered to show Vic's action in conformity with character – namely, his character for lying – and thus would ordinarily be inadmissible. However, evidence of a witness's or declarant's character for truthfulness can be offered for the purposes of impeachment to attack the witness's or declarant's credibility on the stand. Therefore, the evidence would not be inadmissible character evidence.

Impeachment

Any party is permitted to impeach a witness in order to diminish his or her credibility for speaking the truth. In addition, a declarant, or out-of-court speaker, may be impeached in the same manner that a testifying witness may be impeached. Here, as the evidence goes to show Vic's – the declarant in Wanda's testimony – character for truthfulness, it would be permitted into evidence.

Under California law, the court has the discretion to allow in evidence of prior felony convictions for the purposes of impeaching if such convictions are for crimes of moral turpitude. In this case, the conviction is for perjury, or lying on the stand, which is a crime of moral turpitude, and thus the court would have the discretion to admit it for purposes of impeachment. In addition, prior convictions can be admitted in the evidence either through cross-examination or extrinsic evidence. Here, the conviction was introduced during cross-examination, but by means of extrinsic evidence – namely, the certified copy of the conviction, and therefore is a permissible means of impeachment.

Hearsay

The conviction is hearsay, in that it is an out-of-court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, namely, that Vic was convicted for felony perjury in 2007. However, a judgment of a prior felony conviction is an exception to the general hearsay rule, and would thus be admissible.

In conclusion, the court did not err in admitting the conviction.

3. Certified Copy of David's 2008 Assault Conviction:

Logical and Legal Relevance

The evidence is logically relevant for two purposes – first, it goes to show that David had a character for violence, and thus acted in conformity with such character during the June fight, thus negating his claim of self-defense. In addition, the evidence can be used to impeach David's credibility on the grounds that his prior conviction speaks to his ability for truthfulness.

However, the evidence would be subject to CEC 352, particularly, the possibility of unfair prejudice. In this case, the evidence is being used to show action in conformity with character, which is an impermissible character inference and would unfairly prejudice David. In addition, as will be demonstrated, the use for impeachment is impermissible. As there is no other probative value attached to the statement, it would be inadmissible under CEC 352 for being unduly prejudicial.

Character Evidence

As stated, character evidence is any evidence offered to show that a person acted in conformity with his character on a particular occasion. In a criminal case, such evidence cannot be offered by the prosecution unless the defendant "opens the door;" in other words, the defendant must put his character at issue, and the prosecution can only then rebut with character evidence. In this case, David had not yet opened the door to his character – while he did plead self-defense, it was only after the prosecution offered his assault conviction into evidence, not before. Therefore, the prosecution could not admit such evidence prior to David's opening the door, and the evidence should have been ruled inadmissible.

Proposition 8 would not be applicable, as it contains an exception for the rules concerning character evidence.

Impeachment

Under California law, a witness can only be impeached with a misdemeanor conviction if it is one of moral turpitude – otherwise, it is inadmissible. In this case, the conviction was for simple assault, which is not a crime of moral turpitude. As a result, it would be admissible.

Thus, the court erred in admitting the prior felony conviction.

4. David's Testimony about the First Fight:

Logical and Legal Relevance

The evidence is logically relevant, in that it goes towards David's self-defense claim by showing Vic's character for violence and thus indicating that Vic acted in conformity with character on this particular occasion – which is a fact at issue, since the prosecution claims that David was the initial aggressor, while David claims that Vic started the fight.

The evidence is also substantially probative, as it tends to show that Vic started the fight and thus makes David's self-defense claim more likely than it would be without the evidence. However, it does carry a risk of unfair prejudice, in that it involves a character inference concerning Vic's character for violence. However, as described below, the character evidence is permissible under the circumstances, and thus the evidence would not be inadmissible under CEC 352.

Character Evidence

David's introduction of Vic's breaking a man's arm with a tire iron is character evidence, as it is being used to show that Vic had a character for violence and acted in conformity with such character during the June fight. However, under the CEC, a criminal defendant can bring in evidence of the victim's character for violence if he claims self-defense and wishes to show that the victim was the initial aggressor. As this is David's purpose in bringing this evidence, since he is claiming self-defense and is brining in the evidence to show Vic's initiation of the fight, the evidence would be admissible.

Character evidence can take the form of either reputation evidence, opinion evidence, or specific acts. Under the CEC, a defendant is permitted to use any of these methods in bringing in evidence of the victim's bad character for violence during the direct examination. Here, David's testimony would constitute specific acts, as he is testifying to specific acts that Vic had done in the past. Therefore, the method of character evidence used is permissible.

Personal Knowledge

In this case, David does not have personal knowledge as to the fight. While he heard about it from someone before June, he did not personally witness it, nor is there any indication as to who he heard it from, for example, whether the person who told him was the other man involved in the fight whose arm was broken, or was from someone else. Thus, there is no indication that he has personal knowledge as to the fight, and as a result, the testimony would not be admissible.

Thus, the court erred in permitting David's testimony into evidence.

5. David's Testimony about the Second Fight:

Logical and Legal Relevance

The evidence is logically relevant, in that it, like the testimony about the first fight, goes towards David's self-defense claim by showing Vic's character for violence and his action in conformity with such character on this particular occasion – a fact at issue in this case. The evidence is also substantially probative, as it tends to show that Vic, not David, started the fight and makes David's self-defense claim more likely. In addition, as will be demonstrated below, the use of such evidence is a permissible use of character evidence, and as a result, the testimony would not be barred by CEC 352.
