Essay 的考点包括 MBE 所有科目和如下科目（小法）：

代理（agency），加州民诉（California civil procedures），加州证据法（California evidence），夫妻共同财产（community property），企业（cooperation），职业道德（professional responsibilities），救济（remedies），信托（trusts），遗嘱（wills）。其中遗嘱和共同财产具有鲜明的加州特色，职业道德、加州证据有不到一半的加州特色，其他本质上是用通说观点（legal theories and principles of general application）作答。

我们先看看过去5年论文的考点分布：

Feb 2024 共同财产，宪法，职业道德，证据/刑诉，合同
July 2023 合伙/侵权，侵权，职业道德，刑法/刑诉，救济
Feb 2023 民诉，宪法，房地产，职业道德，证据
July 2022 合同，宪法，职业道德，企业，遗嘱/共同财产
Feb 2022 刑法/刑诉，共同财产，侵权/救济，证据/职业道德，企业/救济
July 2021 民诉，职业道德，侵权，刑诉，遗嘱/共同财产
Feb 2021 证据，合同/救济，夫妻共同财产，职业道德
Oct 2020 职业道德，企业，房地产，刑法/刑诉，救济
Feb 2020 侵权，职业道德，合同，证据，企业

July 2019 民诉，救济/宪法，刑法/刑诉，职业道德，合同
Feb 2019 遗嘱/信托/共同财产，侵权，房地产，证据/民诉，职业道德

总结规律如下：
1、 几乎一定会单独考一题职业道德，所以这科一定要学好，这也是我们论文的第一课（论文我按照重要性排课，PT 放在最后）。
2、 剩下 4 题中，MBE 科目和非 MBE 科目（小法）大约占一半，如果不认为救济、加州民诉和加州证据是小法，MBE 出现 3-4 题也没什么奇怪的。“得 MBE 过司考”同样适用加州。
3、 遗嘱和共同财产最近常考，这两科不难，知识点密集，花一点点时间能掌握全部考点，几乎是送分，一定要学。
4、 刑法不会单独出现，救济一般不单独出现。信托、代理出现的概率很小。
5、 企业和信托是我本来就很不喜欢的科目。它考点较为分散，需要花大量时间。但是如果真的花了大量时间，没考又觉得很亏。我自己的策略是几乎放弃了这两门。但不代表这两科不会考，对于分数沾边的考生来说，还是得学。

为什么不认为救济、加州民诉和加州证据是小法，因为：
1、 完全可以用 MBE 的知识点作答，其中救济的知识点就是 MBE 课件合同篇的普通法救济、衡平法概述、衡平法救济和民诉篇的保全（初步禁令、临时禁制令），
2、 证据法虽然会让你用加州法回答，但直接用联邦证据法回答稍微加一点加州特色即可，精选答案就是如此回答的，
3、 即使考民诉，似乎也是用联邦法作答的，已经很久没有见过考加州民诉，即使考，请直接用联邦民诉法做题。

学习方法

每个人都有自己论文的学习方法，我总结三点我认为最重要的：
1、 对知识点的准确理解，这包括 MBE 的知识点和常考小法的知识点（职业道德、遗嘱、共同财产）。理论上也存在过观点不同的答案同时作为精选答案的情形，但非常少。很多题答案是唯一的，尤其是共同财产、遗嘱、合同等考算数的题，答案都错了只能说明你没有学明白。这种情况下无论你辞藻多么华丽、观点多么鲜明，在评卷人心中的印象都是大打折扣的。
2、 需要有一些写作功底。这对受过系统性英文司法写作培训和英语系的同学是重大利好。对于没有这些功底的考生，必须要持之以恒进行英文法律文书写作的训练。
3、 多看原题和精选答案。没有什么模拟题能比原题更能准确反映考点、出题思路，也没有什么参考答案会比精选答案更符合阅卷者的心意。为了方便，我将过去 20 年的精选答案都放在论坛上供大家下载。相比 MBE 是要多做题，论文就是要多看题，把你自己的答案简要写下来，然后和精选答案进行比对。当然，每门课至少还是要练习 1-2 篇。虽然我是卖课的，但我从来不会建议大家把过多时间放在听我的课上，我的课只起抛砖引玉的作用。
4、 如果英语水平不足以理解英文答案，可以先看看香港的判决。香港有大量普通法判决是中英文双语的。当然，如果英文水平还停留在答案都看不懂的阶段，建议先学

英语，而不是来考 bar.
5、 重者恒重，有舍有得。如果时间有限，一定要注重于最常考的科目和考点，甚至可以赌一下这次不考自己不喜欢、放弃的科目和考点。

ESSAY QUESTION INSTRUCTIONS

Your answer should demonstrate your ability to analyze the facts in the question, to tell the difference between material facts and immaterial facts, and to discern the points of law and fact upon which the situation turns. Your answer should show that you know and understand the pertinent principles and theories of law, their qualifications and limitations, and their relationships to each other.

Your answer should evidence your ability to apply the law to the given facts and to reason in a logical manner from the premises you adopt to a sound conclusion. Unless a question expressly asks you to use California law, you should answer according to legal theories and principles of general application.

Henry and Wendy married in California in 2012. Henry got a job as an auto mechanic. Wendy's aunt, who owned a house free and clear of any mortgage, gave it to Wendy. Wendy then added Henry on the title document to the house. Wendy and Henry lived in the house. Wendy then began singing with a local band. Some years later, Wendy and the band began traveling and performing across the state. The band was profitable, and Wendy sent money home to Henry and stayed with him periodically.

Henry decided to purchase an auto repair garage and applied for a loan from a bank for that purpose. Because Wendy was on the road with her band, Henry forged Wendy's signature on the loan documents without her knowledge. The bank approved the loan, using the house as collateral. Henry purchased the auto repair garage with the loan funds. Title to the auto repair garage was taken in Henry's and Wendy's names in joint tenancy.

After a while, Wendy told Henry that the marriage was over. She stopped returning home and also stopped sending money to Henry. She began making independent investments with her earnings. Henry was unable to make the loan payments and the bank demanded payment of the loan in full. Shortly thereafter, Wendy filed for dissolution of marriage.

What are Henry's and Wendy's respective rights and liabilities, if any, regarding:

1. The house? Discuss.

2. The bank loan? Discuss.

3. The auto repair garage? Discuss.

4. Wendy's investments? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

QUESTION 1: SELECTED ANSWER A

California Community Property Presumption

California is a community property state. All property acquired by either spouse during the life of the marital economic community (MEC) is considered the community property (CP) of both spouses. Property acquired by either spouse before marriage or after permanent separation is presumed to be the separate property (SP) of that spouse. Additionally, any property received by one spouse during marriage through gift, bequest, or inheritance is considered the SP of the spouse who acquired it.

Duration of Marital Economic Community

In California, the MEC exists from the time of marriage through the time of permanent separation. When determining whether the spouses have permanently separated, the court will look to whether one spouse evidenced a clear intent to discontinue the marriage. Actions such as leaving the marital home, making independent investment decisions, putting money into a separate bank account, and telling the other spouse that the marriage is over are weighed heavily when determining whether a spouse intends to permanently separate.

Here, Wendy (W) evidenced a clear intent to permanently separate from Henry (H) when she told him that the marriage was over. This clear statement of intent was corroborated by the fact that she stopped returning home to the marital house and stopped sending money to H. Additionally, she began investing her earnings into independent investments. Accordingly, the court will deem permanent separation to have occurred when W told H that the marriage was over and stopped returning to the marital home.

Rights to the House

Presumption

Property acquired by either spouse during marriage is presumed to be CP. Here, the house was acquired by W during marriage, so it is regrettably presumed to be CP.

Source

Property acquired by a spouse through gift or inheritance is considered the SP of that spouse. This is sufficient to rebut the CP presumption.

Here, W acquired the house from her aunt as a gift. Since the house was acquired through gift from a family member, the court will consider the house to be W's SP. Accordingly, at divorce, the house is considered W's SP, unless the characterization of the house was changed during the marriage.

Change in Character - Transmutation

A spouse may transmute her SP to CP of the MEC by creating a writing, signed by the adversely affected spouse, that clearly evidences that spouse's intent to treat the property as CP. Often, adding one spouse to the title of the property is sufficient to transmute the character of the property from SP to CP.

Here, the facts indicate that W added H to the title document to the house. Since H was added to the title document, it is presumed that there was a writing (i.e., the title document) and adding H's name to this document is likely sufficient to show that W intended for the house to be treated as CP, since both their names were on the title. However, the facts do not state that W signed the title document. If W did not sign the document, then it would not be a valid transmutation. However, since it appears that W took sufficient steps to formally add H to the title, it is likely that she also signed the document herself. Therefore, there was a valid transmutation of the house from SP to CP.

Conclusion

The house will be treated as CP upon divorce.

Rights to the Bank Loan

Presumption

See rule above. Debts, like property acquired during marriage, are treated as CP debts.

Here, the bank loan was acquired during marriage. Therefore, the debt associated with the loan is presumed to be CP debt.

Source

When a lender relies on both spouses' assets when issuing a loan, the loan is presumed to be the responsibility of the community and is treated as CP debt. However, when the bank relies on only one spouse's SP as collateral for the loan, the loan proceeds and the debt are presumed to belong primarily to the spouse whose collateral was used.

Here, the facts state that H forged W's signature on the loan application forms and used the marital house as collateral for the loan. Accordingly, it appears that the bank used CP property as collateral for the loan and issued the loan under the presumption that both spouses had signed off on the application. Accordingly, since the source of the loan was CP collateral and both spouses' names were on the application, the loan debt and proceeds are presumed to be CP.

Title

When both spouses' names are signed onto a loan document, the loan is presumed to be taken out in both spouses' names, and the loan debt is treated as CP debt. Here, since both H and W's names are signed to the loan document, the loan debt is presumed to be CP debt.

Breach of Spousal Fiduciary Duties

In California, spouses are held as owing one another the absolute highest duty of good faith and loyalty. This includes accounting to the other spouse for all transactions involving community property and debts. In addition, each spouse is deemed to have equal management and control over the community's assets, so one spouse may not encumber the community property of the MEC without the written consent of the other. Encumbering or otherwise disposing of CP without the written consent of the other spouse is considered a breach of the spousal duty of loyalty and good faith. Such a breach may result in the court voiding the transaction, ordering the offending spouse to compensate the innocent, non-consenting spouse, granting the non-consenting spouse a greater share of the CP upon dissolution of the marriage, or any other remedy that the court deems just and proper.

Here, H forged W's signature on the loan documents and used the marital house as collateral for a loan. Since H forged W's signature, he breached the duty of good faith by entering into a transaction that impacted the marital community without W's consent. Furthermore, he breached the duty of equal management and control when he used the marital house as collateral for the loan, thus encumbering it without W's knowledge or consent. Accordingly, the court may take any measure that it deems just to remedy the situation. This includes assigning all the debt from the loan to H as his SP (highly likely) and awarding W a greater share in the CP assets upon dissolution, in order to compensate her for H's breach of fiduciary duty.

Conclusion

The loan will be treated as H's SP debt. Additionally, the court will likely break from the standard rule of equal division of CP and award W a greater share of the CP to compensate her for H's breach of marital fiduciary duty.

Rights to the Garage

Presumption

See rule above. Since the garage was acquired during marriage, it is presumed to be the CP of the MEC.

Source

When the source of the funds used to acquire property is CP, the property so acquired is considered to be CP. When the source of the funds used to acquire the property are SP, the property so acquired will likely be considered SP, unless another rule applies.

Here, H will attempt to argue that, if the loan debt is characterized as his SP, then the garage acquired with the loan proceeds should be considered his SP as well. However, this argument will likely fail because, as discussed above, H forged W's signature on the loan documents. H cannot now benefit from his breach of fiduciary duty by claiming that the fruits of his breach belong solely to him. As a result, the loan proceeds will likely be considered CP, and the garage that was purchased with the loan proceeds will be considered CP as well. This is further supported by the fact that the loan was issued with the house as collateral. Since the house is considered CP (see above), the proceeds from the loan should also be considered CP. Accordingly, the source of the funds used to purchase the garage can be traced back to CP, so the garage will most likely be considered CP.

Title

Property held in joint tenancy between the spouses is considered the CP of the MEC upon divorce.

Here, H took title to the garage in both his and W's names as joint tenants. Since title to the garage was held as joint tenants, the garage is presumed to be CP upon dissolution of the marriage.

Conclusion

Given the above, the garage will be considered CP of the MEC.

Rights to Investments Made By W

Presumption

See rule above. Whether the investments are characterized as CP or SP likely depends on whether they were made before or after permanent separation. If they were made after permanent separation, then they will likely be considered SP.

Permanent Separation

As discussed above, permanent separation occurs when one spouse evidences a clear intent to dissolve the marriage and takes action consistent with that intent. Here, W showed a clear intent to end the marriage when she told H "that the marriage was over." Thereafter, she took action consistent with that intent by choosing not to return to the marital home and not to continue sending H money. While H may argue that her failing to return to the home is not conclusive, because she had consistently been on the road with her band during marriage, H's argument will likely fail. That is because previously, W had always returned home at least somewhat frequently and, when she had not, she at least continued to send him money. Accordingly, W's clear statement of intent combined with her actions will be deemed sufficient to conclude that the marital community had ended.

Since the investments were made after permanent separation, then they will be presumed to be W's SP.

Source

See rule above. Here, the facts are ambiguous as to whether W used earnings she had made before or after permanent separation to purchase the investments. If she used earnings made before permanent separation, those earnings would be considered CP, and any investment purchased with them would be considered CP as well. On the other hand, if she used earnings she made after permanent separation, then those earnings would be considered her SP, and any investments she purchased with them would be considered SP as well.

Since it appears from the most likely interpretation of the facts that W used earnings acquired after permanent separation to purchase the investments, then the court will hold that the investments are her SP.

Conclusion

The court is most likely to find that the investments are W's SP, provided that she used her earnings acquired after permanent separation to purchase them. To the extent that she used any of her earnings acquired before separation, which would be considered CP, to purchase the investments, the MEC would be entitled to a pro rata share of the investments based on the amount of CP used.

California is a separate property state. In California, there is a presumption that property acquired during the marriage is community property. Community property often includes salaries and wages earned during the marriage. Property acquired before the marriage and after separation is presumptively separate property. Additionally, property acquired by one spouse during the marriage by gift, will or inheritance, is separate property. To determine the character of an asset, a court will trace back to the source of the funds used to acquire the property. Upon divorce, community property will be divided equally in kind. Each spouse is presumed to have a one-half interest in each community property item. Also upon divorce, one spouse's separate property will remain their separate property.

House

The issue here is whether the house is community property, to be divided equally in kind upon divorce, or whether the house is Wendy's separate property.

Generally, property acquired during the marriage is presumed to be community property. However, as noted above, property acquired during the marriage acquired by gift, will or inheritance will be that spouse's separate property. However, during the marriage, spouses are able to retain the character of an asset either from separate property to community property, or from community property to separate property. If done during the marriage, changing the character of an asset is done by transmutation.

If done prior to 1985, a transmutation did not require a writing. However, after 1985, a transmutation will require a writing, clearly indicating and expressing that a change in the nature of the property is being affected, and the writing must be signed by the spouse whose rights are being affected. The transmutation writing requirement, however, does not apply to exchanges of personal property during the marriage, like gifts, that are relatively insubstantial in value when examining the entire marital economic community. Additionally, there is a presumption that property held in joint and equal form during the marriage is community property.

Here, Wendy's aunt owned a house free and clear of any mortgage. Wendy's aunt gave the house to Wendy. Therefore, the house at that time would be presumptively Wendy's separate property.

However, it is possible that Henry and Wendy decided to change the character of the house from Wendy's separate property to community property. Here, after receiving the house as a gift, Wendy then added Henry on the title document to the house. It is possible that adding Henry to the title document changed the character of this asset. Because adding Henry to the title occurred after the spouses were married in 2012, a written transmutation would be required to change the character of the property. Here, there is a writing - the title document. The facts do not clearly provide whether the title document clearly stated that the spouses intended to change the character of the asset to community property. Additionally, it is not clear whether Wendy executed the title document when she added Henry to the document. Wendy's signature would be required because since the house was initially her separate property, her rights are being affected by the change in the asset's character. Though not dispositive, because it is not one of the transmutation writing requirements, the fact that Wendy and Henry lived in the home together, and Henry continued to live there even while Wendy traveled with her band, is some indication that the parties may have intended to change the character of the asset from Wendy's separate property to the marriage's community when Wendy added Henry on the title document to the house.

If the title document did satisfy the requirements for a written transmutation, the house would then become community property, subject to equal division in kind upon divorce.

Bank Loan

The issue here is whether the bank loan is Henry's separate obligation, or whether the bank loan is a community obligation.

Generally, credit obtained during the marriage is considered to be marital credit. When examining whether a loan is community property or separate property, the analysis requires looking at the intent of the lender. If the lender provided the loan based in substantial part on one (or both) spouse's credit scores or earning capabilities, the loan would be community property, because credit earned during the marriage, and a spouse's salaries and wages earned during the marriage, are considered to be community property. However, if the lender is looking to one spouse's separate property to secure the loan, the loan is likely going to be considered that spouse's separate obligation.

Here, Henry decided to purchase an auto repair garage and applied for a loan from a bank for that purpose. Just because Henry applied to the bank for the loan for his business purposes, does not automatically make the loan Henry's separate obligation. The bank here approved the loan, using the house as collateral. There is a discussion above of whether the house is considered community property or Wendy's separate property; however, here the house will likely be considered community property. If a creditor looks to community property for the securing of the loan, the loan is likely to be considered a marital obligation.

However, an important aspect of Henry's behavior regarding the bank loan is the fact that due to the nature of the confidential relationship of a marriage, spouses owe each other fiduciary duties. Each spouse owes the other the duty of the highest good faith and fair dealing in their management and control of community property. Additionally, spouses generally have the right to act alone regarding community property, because each spouse has an equal right to manage and control community property. However, there are certain acts and decisions involving marital property that require that the acting spouse either get consent from, or consult with, the other spouse. These situations include, in part, when one spouse is making a gift of community property, or where one spouse intends to sell, convey, lease, or encumber community real property.

Here, Henry forged Wendy's signature on the loan documents without her knowledge. Henry's forging of Wendy's signature, without her knowledge, is a violation of the fiduciary duties that spouses owe to each other. Forging a spouse's signature without their knowledge is certainly not consistent with the requirement to act with the highest good faith and utmost fair dealing. Thus, Henry's forging of Wendy's signature is a violation of the spousal fiduciary duties. Additionally, if Henry was seeking to encumber the home, Henry would need to get Wendy's consent to this encumbrance on community property (even if the home was separate property, Henry would then certainly not have the authority to encumber the property himself). Henry may try to argue that he only forged Wendy's signature because she was on the road with her band, and that Wendy would have consented and signed the documents if she had been around. However, this would likely not be a successful argument for Henry as there is no evidence of Wendy's consent. It is especially damaging that Henry did this without Wendy having any knowledge. Henry may also try to argue that he was using community funds to pay for the loan, so the loan should be community property. There are facts that indicate that Wendy sent money home to Henry; however, this argument likely will not help Henry because of his unethical behavior regarding the loan documents. As a result of Henry's actions, if Wendy were to learn of the forging of her signature, Wendy could bring an action to have herself removed as a signatory to the loan documents, and have the loan be entirely Henry's separate obligation, which would remain his separate obligation upon the dissolution of the marriage.

Auto Repair Garage

The issue here is whether the auto repair garage is Henry's separate property, or whether the auto repair garage is community property subject to equal division in kind upon divorce.

To determine the character of an asset, a court will trace back to the source of the funds used to acquire the property. If an asset was acquired through community funds, or from a loan secured by community property, the asset is likely to be characterized as community property. If the asset was acquired by separate funds or separate property, the asset will likely be characterized as separate property. Even property acquired during the marriage, if acquired through separate funds, will be considered separate property. Additionally, there is a presumption that property held in joint and equal form during marriage is community property. An example of property held in joint and equal form is when both spouses' names appear on the title document.

Here, Henry purchased the auto repair garage with the loan funds. Importantly, title to the auto repair garage was taken in Henry's and Wendy's names in joint tenancy. Since both names appear on the title document, the property was taken in joint and equal form and is presumably community property. The source of funds must also be considered, and could be used to rebut this presumption. Here, Henry purchased the auto repair garage with the loan funds. As discussed above, the loan funds were forged with Wendy's signature and secured by the house as collateral. Setting aside Henry's marital fiduciary duty violation (which is discussed above), it is important that the loan is secured by the house as collateral. If the house is community property, then this loan is secured by community property, and the funds obtained from the loan would be community property. However, Henry may try to argue that the auto repair garage should be separate property, because there are some facts that indicate that Henry was the only one paying the loan. Henry may try to argue that he was paying the loan out of earnings from the garage, which would be his property. However, as noted previously, salaries and wages earned during the marriage, which would include Henry's earnings from his auto repair business, are considered community property. Thus, because the tracing back would show that the source of the funds for the auto repair garage was community funds/property, the auto repair garage would be community property, subject to equal division in kind upon divorce.

Wendy's Investments

The issue here is whether Wendy's investments are community property, to be divided equally in kind upon divorce, or whether Wendy's investments are her separate property.

Generally, community property can only be acquired or accumulated during the marital economic community. The marital economic community ends either upon the date of one spouse's date, or on the date of separation. The date of separation is determined by the date where one spouse (or both, but only one is required) forms the intent not to resume the marital relation, and acts in a manner consistent with that intention. Additionally, salaries or wages earned during the marriage are presumptively community property. If such salaries or wages are used to invest in other property, such other investments or property would also be community property.

Here, Wendy told Henry that the marriage was over. This is likely the date when Wendy formed an intent not to resume the marital relation. Wendy then stopped returning home and also stopped sending money to Henry. Both Wendy's actions of not returning home, and no longer sending money to Henry, are actions consistent with her intent not to resume the marital relation. Thus, the date of separation has occurred, and there will no longer be an acquiring of community property because the marital economic community has ended. Even though Wendy later filed for dissolution of the marriage, the marital economic ended when Wendy told Henry the marriage was over and acted consistent with that intent by not returning home nor sending Henry money.

Here, after Wendy ended the marital economic community, she began making independent investments with her earnings. If Wendy was using earnings that she had earned since the date that the marital economic community ended, both the earnings and the subsequent investments would be Wendy's separate property. However, Wendy's earnings that she accrued during the marriage are community property. Therefore, upon divorce, those earnings would be subject to an equal division in kind. Therefore, if Wendy was using the earnings that she earned during the marriage, those earnings would be subject to community property division. Consequently, the investments that Wendy made could also be subject to community property division because the investments were the fruit of community property funds. However, the facts seem to provide that Wendy ended the marital economic community, and then subsequently made investments with her earnings accrued after the date of separation.

Therefore, if a court were to find that Wendy used her earnings earned after the date that the marital economic community ended to make the investments, the investments would be separate property. Wendy's investments being separate property would mean that the investments remain her property upon the dissolution of marriage.

State X has many small farms selling organic produce, which is grown without the use of any chemical fertilizers or pesticides. Instead of using chemical fertilizers or pesticides, these farms organically enrich their soil with animal manure products from State X's large livestock industry.

Recently, State X enacted the Organic Farming Act (Organic Act). Section 1 of the Organic Act bans the sale and use of chemical fertilizers and pesticides in State X and also bans the sale of any produce grown with, or treated by, chemical fertilizers and pesticides. Section 2 of the Organic Act requires that all publicly funded State X institutions only buy organic produce grown in State X.

In the absence of any federal law, the State X legislature passed the Organic Act after concluding that the use of chemical fertilizers and pesticides contributed to measurable environmental harm. It further found an increased threat to the health of farmers using chemical fertilizers and pesticides, as well as to the health of consumers of the farmers' produce. The State X legislature also declared that it wanted to preserve the existence of small farms and to "protect" those farmers' "way of life."

State X has no significant chemical fertilizer or pesticide industry. Chemco, Inc., in nearby State Y, is a chemical fertilizer and pesticide manufacturer that has always had a significant portion of its revenue come from sales in State X.

A&L Berries is a partnership that grows and sells organic strawberries in State Y. A&L Berries sells some of their strawberries directly to consumers in State X. However, most of their sales are to Organic Produce, Inc., a State Y wholesaler. Both A&L Berries and Organic Produce, Inc. have publicly-funded State X customers who now refuse to do business with them because of the Organic Act.

Chemco, Inc., A&L Berries and Organic Produce, Inc. have now filed lawsuits in Federal Court in State X.

1. What claims can Chemco, Inc. make under the United States Constitution and how should the court rule? Discuss.

QUESTION CONTINUES ON THE NEXT PAGE

2. What claims can A&L Berries make under the United States Constitution and how should the court rule? Discuss.

3. What claims can Organic Produce, Inc. make under the United States Constitution and how should the Court rule? Discuss.

QUESTION 2: SELECTED ANSWER A

1. What claims can Chemco, Inc. make under the US Constitution and how should the court rule?

Standing

In order to bring a claim under the constitution, the individual, corporation, third party or organization must have standing. In order to have standing, there must be a case or controversy and (i) injury, (ii) causation, (iii) redressability, (iv) the claim must be ripe for adjudication and (v) the claim must not be moot.

(i) Injury

Here, Chemco's injury is that they are not able to sell their product (chemical fertilizer and pesticides) in State X due to the Organic Act.

(ii) Causation

Causation can be shown by a direct link between the defendant's actions and the plaintiff's harm. Here, Chemco can show causation because their ability to not sell their product in State X is due to the Organic Act.

(iii) Redressability

Redressability can be shown by establishing that there is an adequate remedy at law or in equity to address the harm suffered by the plaintiff. Here, Chemco can show redressability by asking for an injunction or having the state struck down as unconstitutional.

(iv) Ripeness

Ripeness can be established by showing that the plaintiff's harm is ongoing and the claim is ripe for adjudication. Here, we are told that State X recently passed the Organic Act and thus the harm being suffered by Chemco is ongoing and the claim is ripe for adjudication.

(v) Mootness

A case or controversy is deemed moot if while the plaintiff's suit is pending or ongoing, something takes place that either makes the harm disappear altogether or the plaintiff's injury no longer exists. Mootness can be rebutted if it can be shown the harm is repetitive and capable of evading review. Here, the Organic Act is still being enforced and Chemco is still suffering harm, so the case is not moot.

11th Amendment - Suits against a State

The 11th Amendment states that a state cannot be sued by its own citizens or the citizens of another state unless the suit consents to such lawsuit. Exceptions to this rule are lawsuits between states, the federal government suing the state and lawsuits against state officers. Here, State X is being sued by Chemco, Inc., a State Y corporation, A&L Berries, a State X partnership and Organic Produce, Inc., a State Y wholesaler. If the court determines that the Chemco, A&L Berries and Organic Produce, Inc., are considered "citizens" for purposes of the 11th Amendment, they may be barred from bringing their respective lawsuits. We will continue the analysis on the assumption that their claims are not barred by the 11th Amendment.

State Action

In order to bring a claim under the constitution, the claim the plaintiff is bringing must be committed by a state actor. Here, State X passed the legislation harming Chemco, Inc., and thus state action is satisfied.

Commerce Clause

The United States congress has the power to regulate interstate commerce, intrastate commerce, and commerce between the United States and foreign nations. This power includes regulating the instrumentalities of interstate commerce (cars, boats, trucks), (ii) the channels of interstate commerce (rivers, roads, bridges), (iii) people involved in interstate commerce and (iv) any thing that has a substantial effect on interstate commerce. Congress can even regulate local acts by individuals that in the aggregate have a substantial effect on interstate commerce.

The commerce clause does not apply here since this regulation was promulgated by a state government and therefore the Dormant Commerce Clause will govern the legislation at play here.

Dormant Commerce Clause ("DCC")/State Police Power

The DCC says that states are prohibited from passing laws that either (i) discriminate against interstate commerce or (ii) unduly burden interstate commerce. If the regulation discriminates against interstate commerce on its face, the regulation must pass strict scrutiny and the state has the burden to prove that such regulation is necessary to achieve a compelling government interest, the regulation was passed for another reason besides commerce and the regulation is the least restrictive way possible to regulate such commerce. Regulations that are discriminatory on their face are a per se violation of the DCC. If the regulation unduly burdens interstate commerce, the state must show that the regulation is related to a legitimate government interest.

Here, we are told that State X enacted the Organic Farming Act (Organic Act). Section 1 of the Act bans the sale and use of chemical fertilizers and pesticides in State X and also bans the sale of any produce grown with, or treated by, chemical fertilizers and pesticides. Chemco, Inc., a chemical fertilizer and pesticide manufacturer located in State Y, has always had a significant portion of its revenue come from sales in State X. Chemco, Inc. will argue that both Section 1 of the Organic Act is facially discriminatory against interstate commerce because it bans the sale of all chemical fertilizers and pesticides in the State and therefore out-of-state corporations will not be allowed to sell their products in State Y. State X will then argue that (i) the statute is even-handed in that it discriminates against both out-of-state and in-state commerce equally, (ii) the statute was passed to prevent environmental harm to its consumers and farmers, and (iii) the statute was passed to preserve the existence of small farms and to protect those farmers' way of life.

Conclusion: State X will be able to prove that the Organic Act is in adherence with the DCC since the law applies to in-state and out-of-state manufacturers equally, the statute was passed to protect the health of citizens and farmers and the Organic Act was the least restrictive means possible to regulate this type of commerce.

2. State Police Power

Under the 10th Amendment, states are able to pass laws in adherence with their police power to protect the health and welfare of their citizens.

Here, we are told that State X found that chemical fertilizers and pesticides contributed to: (i) measurable environmental harm and (ii) threat to the health of State X farmers and citizens. Therefore, in addition to its arguments under the DCC, State X may also be able to rely on the state police power to provide evidence that the Organic Act is constitutional.

Privileges and Immunities Clause

The Privileges and Immunities Clause applies to the states through the 14th Amendment. The Privileges and Immunities Clause forbids states from discriminating against out-of-staters in connection with rights that are fundamental to national unity. Rights that have been considered fundamental to national unity are the right to have a job, the right to run a business and other economic rights. The Privileges and Immunities Clause does not apply to corporations or aliens.

Conclusion: Here, Chemco, Inc. will argue that it is being discriminated against by State X. The issue with Chemco's argument is that since Chemco is a corporation it is not protected by the Privileges and Immunities Clause and therefore this argument will fail.

Equal Protection Clause

The Equal Protection Clause applies to the states through the 14th Amendment. Equal protection challenges arise when similarly situated people are treated differently. Equal Protection challenges fall into three different standards of review: (i) strict scrutiny, (ii) intermediate scrutiny and (iii) rational basis. Strict scrutiny applies to regulations that discriminate based on race, alienage or national origin. The burden is on the government to show that the regulation is necessary to achieve a compelling government interest. Intermediate Scrutiny applies to regulations that discriminate based on gender or illegitimacy. The government has the burden to show that the regulation is substantially related to an important government interest. Rational Basis applies to regulations that discriminate based on characteristics not covered by strict or intermediate scrutiny or economic regulations. The plaintiff/challenger has the burden to show that the regulation is not rationally related to a legitimate government interest.

Here, the Organic Act is an economic regulation and thus rational basis applies. Chemco must show that the Organic Act is not rationally related to a government interest. Chemco could argue that State X is trying to punish chemical and fertilizer manufacturers since their products have been shown to cause harm or that there is another irrational reason for the regulation. State X will argue that the regulation was passed to protect the environment, State X farmers and consumers, and to preserve the existence of small farms and farmers' way of life. These health related arguments can establish that the regulation was rationally related to a legitimate government interest (i.e., the health and wellbeing of State X citizens) and therefore should be able to survive rational basis review.

2. What claims can A&L Berries make under the US Constitution and how should the court rule?

Standing

The rules for standing are set forth above. A&L Berries has standing to sue because they have an injury (cannot sell to consumers in State X or through Organic Produce, Inc., to State X publicly funded customers), causation (injury can be traced back to the Organic Act) and redressability (injunction or have statute struck down).

Dormant Commerce Clause

The rules for the Dormant Commerce Clause are set forth above. A&L Berries challenge to the Organic Act will fall under Section 2 of the Act which states that all publicly funded State X institutions only buy organic produce grown in State X. This portion of the Organic Act facially discriminates against interstate commerce because it forces publicly funded State X institutions to only buy organic produce grown in State X. A&L Berries has a strong argument here since this portion of the Organic Act does not apply even handedly to out-of-state and in-state organic producers. State X will argue that the law is necessary to achieve the compelling interest of ensuring that its citizens only eat organic produce grown in the State which is deemed to not have been grown with the use of chemical fertilizers or pesticides. This Section of the Organic Act may survive this DCC review, but only because the interest the state is protecting (environment and health of citizens of farmers) outweighs the burden on interstate commerce. If the court hearing this case is more economic and market friendly and rules in favor of A&L Berries, then State X may need to rely on an exception to the DCC, the market participant exception.

Market Participant Exception

The Market Participant Exception is an exception to the DCC which allows states to regulate interstate commerce if they are acting as a market participant instead of as a legislator. Market Participation analysis is a fact intensive review in which the state must show they are solely acting in a business capacity and the actions of the government are as market participant, not for legislative purposes.

Here, State X will argue that it is acting as a market participant by limiting customers that it funds to only buy organic produce grown in State X. Section 2 of the Organic Act only applies to state-funded customers, not all customers in State X. A&L Berries may argue that the Organic Act should be read as a whole and since only one portion of the legislation applies to State X publicly funded customers, then State X is acting in a legislative capacity. In conclusion, a court would likely rule that the Market Participant Exception applies because this portion of the Organic Act only applies to publicly funded customers, not all State X customers.

Privileges and Immunities Clause

The rules for the Privileges and Immunities clause are set forth above. A&L Berries may have a claim under the Privileges and Immunities Clause if the court does not recognize a partnership as a corporation for purposes of the Privileges and Immunities Clause. If A&L Berries is considered a corporation, then they are in the same situation as Chemco and are not protected by the Privileges and Immunities Clause.

Equal Protection Clause

Same analysis as for Chemco.

3. What claims can Organic Produce, Inc. make under the US Constitution and how should the court rule?

Standing

Same analysis as for A&L Berries, except that the injury for Organic Produce is not being able to sell to publicly-funded customers in State X.

Dormant Commerce Clause

Same analysis as for A&L Berries since they are affected the same way by the Organic Act.

Privileges and Immunities

Same analysis as for Chemco since Organic Produce, Inc., is a corporation.

Equal Protection Clause

Same analysis as for Chemco.

QUESTION 2: SELECTED ANSWER B

1) Claims by Chemco, Inc.

Dormant Commerce Clause

The negative implications of the commerce clause prevent a state from regulating interstate commerce in certain circumstances. First, if a state is determined to be discriminating against out of state individuals for the benefit of in-state individuals, the regulation must be strict scrutiny. Second, if no discriminatory intent is found, the regulation can still be found unconstitutional if the burdens caused by the regulations substantially outweigh the benefits.

Not discriminatory

Strict scrutiny places the burden on the state to prove that the regulation is necessary to achieve a compelling government purpose. And, that the regulation is the least restrictive alternative.

Here, the law is not facially discriminatory because the act bans the sale and use of all chemical fertilizers and pesticides in State X. It also bans the sale of any produce grown with, or treated by, chemical fertilizers and pesticides. It does not ban chemical pesticides or fertilizers made in State Y or another state so that State X's interest will be achieved.

Chemco may try to argue that the act has discriminatory intent. This is because the State had protectionist interests because State X has many small farms selling organic produce. State X does not have a significant chemical fertilizer industry. That legislators for State X wanted to "preserve the existence of small farms and to 'protect' those farmers' 'way of life.'" However, there is no actual evidence that the act has been applied discriminatorily. Therefore, Strict Scrutiny will not apply.

Do the burdens on interstate commerce substantially outweigh the benefits

Because strict scrutiny does not apply, the court will look at whether the burdens of the regulation of interstate commerce substantially outweigh the benefits. Here, Chemco receives a significant portion of its revenue from State X. Chemco will attempt to argue that this regulation in effect will prevent any out-of-state competition and that the regulation will serve to protect the economic interests of those who sell animal manure products from the State's large livestock industry. Specifically, to protect those farmers' way of life.

However, it will be difficult for Chemco to make a successful argument. The state has a strong interest in protecting the State's environment. Specifically, the state concluded that the use of chemicals and fertilizers and pesticides contributed to measurable environmental harm. It found an increased threat to the health of farmers using chemical fertilizers and pesticides, as well as to the health of consumers of the farmers' produce. The fact that a regulation benefits some in state farmers, without more, is insufficient to show that the burdens outweigh the benefits of the regulation. Additionally, organic suppliers such as A&L Berries can still sell in the state, so long as they meet the standards of the Act. Therefore, Chemco will likely be unsuccessful in its claim.

Privileges or Immunities Clause

The privileges or immunities clause prevents States from treating out of state residents differently than in-state residents. Additionally, corporations are not protected under the clause. Therefore, it does not apply.

Preemption

Additionally, Chemco cannot argue the legislation was preempted because the facts state there is no federal law on point.

Substantive Due Process

The due process clause prevents States from depriving citizens of fundamental rights. Here, there is not fundamental right involved, so therefore, Chemco will not be able to make out a claim that the government action was arbitrary.

2) A&L Berries

Dormant Commerce Clause

Strict Scrutiny

The regulation provides that all publicly funded State X institutions only buy organic produce grown in State X. On its face, this section is discriminatory because it requires the state to purchase from in state supplies over out-of-state suppliers. A&L Berries has publicly funded state X customers who now refuse to do business with them because of the Organic Act.

However, the Market Participant exception to the dormant commerce clause provides that a state, if it is acting as a participant in the market, may discriminate against out-of-state suppliers to the benefit of in-state parties. If this exception is met, the regulation is upheld unless it is arbitrary, which requires the plaintiff to show that the regulation is not rationally related to a legitimate government purpose.

Here, the market participant exception applies because the regulation only applies to "publicly funded State X institutions". Therefore, A&L Berries will have to show the regulation is arbitrary, which it cannot do because there are conceivable reasons why the State may want to only purchase from in-state-supplies, such as ensuring the produce comes from the nearest source and supporting the local economy.

Equal Protection

Equal Protection prevents the State from treating similarly situated people dissimilarly. If the state is regulating a suspect classification, strict scrutiny will apply. If the state is discriminating against a quasi-suspect classification, intermediate scrutiny applies, and the government must show that the regulation is necessary to achieve an important government purpose. If neither applies, the plaintiff must show under a rational basis standard that the regulation is arbitrary.

Here, the state is treating out of state suppliers differently than in-state suppliers. However, there is no suspect or quasi suspect classification in this scenario. Therefore, the plaintiff, as similarly discussed above, will not be able to show that the regulation is arbitrary. The court will rule against this claim.

Privileges or Immunities

The privileges or immunities clause prevents States from treating out of state residents differently than in-state residents. Here, A&L berries is a partnership. A general partnership is a collection of individuals. And therefore, A&L will likely be able to make claim under this clause. If the state is treating out-of-state residents differently than in-state, strict scrutiny applies.

Here, the government will not be able to show that it has a compelling purpose in the economic protection of state industry. Also, a blanket ban on the purchase from out-of-state suppliers is not the least restrictive alternative. Therefore, the court will strike down the act under this clause.

3) Organic Produce

Dormant Commerce Clause

Strict Scrutiny

The regulation provides that all publicly funded State X institutions only buy organic produce grown in State X. On its face, this section is discriminatory because it requires the state to purchase from in state supplies over out-of-state suppliers. Organic Produce has publicly funded State X customers who now refuse to do business with them because of the Organic Act.

However, as discussed above, the State is acting as a market participant. If this exception is met, the regulation is upheld unless it is arbitrary, which requires the plaintiff to show that the regulation is not rationally related to a legitimate government purpose. There is an exception to the market participant that, if the regulation is an attempt to regulate the downstream effects of interstate commerce, it will still need to meet strict scrutiny.

However, it will be difficult to show that the state is attempting to regulate downstream commerce. Organic Produce will try to argue that it will stop purchasing entirely from State Y growers and solely purchase from State X growers so that it does not have to distinguish goods when it sells to State Institutions, as compared to private clients where regulation 2 does not apply. The state will argue that this is a blanket regulation, and that on its face, there is no attempt to regulate the downstream effects. Therefore, similar to A&L Berries, Organic will not be able to show the regulation is not rationally related to a legitimate government purpose.

Equal Protection

Similar to A&L Berries, there is no suspect or quasi suspect classification that applies. Therefore, they will not be able to make out a successful claim because the regulation is not arbitrary.

Privileges or Immunities

Organic Produce is a corporation, and therefore, cannot seek relief under the privileges and immunities clause of the U.S. constitution.

Allison, a criminal defense attorney, represented Davos, a professional athlete, through a valid written retainer agreement. Davos was charged with assaulting Caren at a restaurant. Allison asked Davos to gift her season tickets to Davos' games if she prevailed in the criminal case. At trial, the prosecution presented the restaurant's surveillance videotape as evidence which showed the assault, along with a video surveillance expert, who identified Davos in the video.

Allison presented the testimony of two witnesses: (1) Wilfred, who was waiting tables at the restaurant, and saw an argument between Davos and Caren but did not see an altercation; and (2) Eileen, an experienced video technician, who testified that, in her opinion, there was no assault based on the poor quality of the video. When Allison and Eileen had previously watched the video together, they both agreed that the video showed strong evidence of the assault.

Allison agreed to pay Wilfred an hourly fee, roughly equal to his hourly wages and tips at the restaurant, for his time in testifying and for an entire day of preparation, but only if Wilfred refused to meet with the prosecution before trial.

Once Eileen agreed to change her opinion and testify that there was no assault based on the quality of the video, Allison agreed to pay Eileen $500 per hour for testifying at the trial. In her closing argument, Allison argued that the video showed that there was no assault, and that in her own opinion, after considering the evidence, Davos was not guilty.

What ethical violations, if any, has Allison committed with respect to:

A. Request for season tickets to Davos' games? Discuss.

B. Payments to Wilfred? Discuss.

C. Payment to Eileen? Discuss.

D. Presentation of Eileen's expert opinion? Discuss.

E. Allison's statements in closing argument? Discuss.

Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

QUESTION 3: SELECTED ANSWER A

A. Request for season tickets to Davo's game?

Fee Agreements

Lawyers have a duty to the clients to avoid fee misunderstandings. That is why it is imperative lawyers follow the rules regarding fee agreements. Under the ABA, the fee must not be unreasonable, while under CA, the fee must not be unconscionable. Here, we are told that L executed a valid fee agreement with D, thus so long as the fee is not unreasonable nor unconscionable, the fee agreement was proper.

Additionally, in CA, fee agreements over $1000 must be in writing and satisfy other requirements. Since this case is for a criminal assault, it is likely the fee was over $1000, although it appears the agreement was valid thus we will presume all requirements were met.

Gifts

A lawyer may not solicit or procure gifts from clients, unless the client is their relative. California carves out an additional exception which allows a lawyer to accept a gift from a client if the client provides a certificate of independent review by another L and no undue influence occurred.

Here, L would be in violation of the ABA as she has solicited D to provide her with season tickets to his sports team and she is not related to D. This is a clear violation as L asked D to give her tickets, he never offered them, and there are additional violations discussed below for attaching the gift request to her outcome on the case. Under CA, D has not provided a certificate of independent review and L has used her position to pressure D into agreeing (undue influence) by linking the gift to the outcome of the case. D likely felt pressure that if he wanted L to do a good job he must provide the tickets, and thus this was improper.

Thus, L is subject to discipline for soliciting a gift from D under the ABA and CA.

Contingency Fees

Additionally, a contingency fee agreement is not allowed for criminal or family law cases, both under the ABA and CA. This gift could arguably be a contingency fee, since it is dependent on the outcome of D's trial. Thus, this was improper.

Conflicts of Interest

A lawyer owes a duty to avoid conflicts of interest, and provide unfettered loyalty to their client. A conflict can arise between current clients, a former client, a third party, or the lawyer's own personal interests. A current conflict exists when one of those other interests creates a substantial risk that the client’s representation will be materially limited due to the conflict. Here, L may have a personal conflict of interest, since L now has a personal interest in the outcome of the case. L may be distracted with trying to win the case and create a risk of a mistrial or otherwise prejudice D's trial. Additionally, as mentioned above, L has exerted undue influence on D, and has placed her own interest in the tickets above D's wellbeing. This was inappropriate.

L should be subject to discipline under CA and ABA for creating this personal conflict of interest.

Competence

A lawyer owes a client a duty to provide competent representation, which under the ABA, includes using reasonable skill and knowledge necessary to represent the client. Under CA, the duty of competence requires the lawyer not intentionally, repeatedly, or recklessly fail to apply diligent and competent representation.

Here, L may have violated this duty as she has become invested in the case personally and may use inappropriate means (as discussed below) to achieve her desired outcome of the case. Thus, it is not a clear violation yet but likely will be.

B. Payments to Wilfred?

Payments to Witnesses

Under the ABA and CA, a lawyer may not give anything of value to anyone for acting as a witness in a trial, this is to avoid any impropriety that could exist. The only exception to this is actual expenses incurred to testify at trial. Importantly, the fees for testifying must not be contingent on the content of the testimony.

Here, L has asked W to testify at trial to what he witnessed. L has offered to pay W's hourly fee he would be getting if working (plus tips) for the time W spends testifying and preparing the day before. L can pay W's hourly fee plus tips for time spent actually testifying, but L may not pay for the day before preparation. W has only one thing to offer during the trial, that he saw the argument before the altercation. There should be no reason that W needs a full day of preparation, and even if he did. Unless L can show good reason that W needs a full day of prepping, it appears this is more of a payment to testify rather than a reimbursement for costs incurred by a witness. Thus the payment for W's testimony is likely not a violation under CA or ABA but could be if the prep day before is pre-textual to actually pay for testimony.

Additionally, under the ABA L should have gotten D's consent, and in CA their written consent to pay the witness. Absent any information showing D was informed and consented, this is a separate violation under CA and ABA.

Duty of Fairness to Opposing Counsel and the Tribunal

A lawyer has a duty to be fair with opposing counsel, to have integrity with the court and pursue justice. While L also owes D a duty to be a zealous advocate, this cannot come at the extreme cost of withholding witnesses from opposing counsel. L has absolutely breached her duty to not only opposing counsel but to the tribunal, by acting with dishonesty, unfairness, and disregard for justice. L is subject to discipline.

Additionally, W did not actually see the altercation take place. It may not be proper for her to call W as a witness as his testimony may not be helpful for the jury. So long as L had a good faith basis and strategy that was relevant to D's defense, it was likely not a violation to call W to the stand even though he had limited information to provide upon his testimony.

Duty of Competence

See rule above.

L is likely acting incompetently by hiding W as a witness. The whole case could be set as a mistrial, and D would have to go through this entire process again, if L's actions are found out. This is not how a competent attorney acts, and it is not in D's best interest. L has failed to act with reasonable skill and knowledge to properly handle this case and is subject to discipline under ABA. Additionally, L's actions are intentional and recklessly disregard the risk to D's case, thus L is subject to discipline under CA.

C. Payment to Eileen?

Paying Witnesses

See rule above for paying witnesses.

Here, E originally believed that she could see an assault on the video, and only after L offered her $500 per hour did E agree to change her opinion and testify that there was no assault based on the quality of the video. It is not clear what E's fee was before, but it is clear that the fee was adjusted based on E's agreement to change her testimony. Thus, L is paying E based on the content of the testimony, and this is a bribe. This is a violation of ABA and CA rules and L is subject to discipline.

Additionally, under the ABA L should have gotten D's consent, and in CA their written consent to hire the expert. Absent any information showing D was informed and consented, this is a separate violation under CA and ABA.

Duty of Competence

See rule above. L has acted without proper skill, reasonableness, and knowledge that a prudent attorney would. Her conduct puts her client at serious risk of prejudicing his case, risking a mistrial, and increasing D's cost of litigation and time. Thus violating ABA rules. L has acted intentionally to violate the rules of ethics and the law (by facilitating perjury), and thus L has violated CA rules.

D. Presentation of Eileen's expert opinion?

Facilitating Perjury

A lawyer has a duty to present evidence in good faith of its truth to the tribunal, and to prevent witnesses from testifying with false testimony when the L knows or reasonably believes the testimony is false. Here, not only does L know the testimony is false, L solicited the false testimony by increasing E's fee based on the fact that E was willing to change her testimony. E and L both "agreed that the video showed strong evidence of the assault". L should not have allowed E to testify, let alone bribed her to, thus this is a clear violation of both the ABA and CA rules.

Additionally, E is testifying as to a legal conclusion "there was no assault". This is a question for the jury to decide and L should have used the proper skill and knowledge to properly prepare E to testify in correct fashion. This is a violation under ABA. Since this only occurred one time and it is not clear that L intentionally prepared E to testify in this fashion it is likely not a violation under CA.

E. Allison's statements in closing argument?

Ratifying E's perjury

L has a duty of candor and fairness to opposing counsel and the tribunal. A lawyer may not put on a witness that intends to commit perjury, and when it does occur, the L must seek to rectify the injustice with the court. L did the opposite. L ratified E's testimony by addressing it in her closing argument and stating that the video showed no assault. L knew this was false, she procured E's false testimony, and then she ratified it in her closing argument. L should have made a statement clarifying the perjury, she should have spoken to the court about the perjury, or something to rectify the perjury. She did not and she furthered the perjury. All of this was improper and L is subject to discipline under ABA and CA.

L Testifying as a Witness

A lawyer may not testify as a witness in their own action. Here, in L's closing argument L stated "in her opinion, after considering the evidence, D was not guilty". This was improper as L was acting as a witness. The L may summarize the evidence presented but may not offer opinions as if L is a witness. This was improper under ABA and CA and L is subject to discipline.

QUESTION 3: SELECTED ANSWER B

Request For Season Tickets

Under both California and the ABA model rules, an attorney is prohibited from soliciting substantial gifts from a client or prospective client. Season tickets to professional sporting events are an expensive, significant gift and it would be a violation to solicit such a gift. Allison might argue that she was not soliciting a gift, but making a contingency fee arrangement, as she would only receive the tickets if she won. An attorney may accept an interest in property or other forms of non-cash compensation, provided that such an interest does not result in a conflict of interest. But there are several issues with this argument. First, we are told that she asked for a "gift" which presumably means that she did in fact characterize it in that manner. Second, we are told that she had a valid written retainer agreement for the representation, but the implication is that this request for tickets is outside of the scope of that retainer. A retainer agreement must clearly explain what compensation is to be paid under it and how it will be calculated (including, in California, which expenses will be paid by the client in a contingency fee arrangement). So, for the retainer fee to be valid it would have to clearly identify the compensation scheme, including the tickets, but here it appears that they were not included. Finally, even if the tickets were identified as contingent compensation in the retainer agreement, contingency fees are prohibited, both in California and under the ABA rules, for criminal representations. Here, Allison was representing him in a criminal prosecution for assault, and thus she could not agree to accept a form of contingent fee.

Payments to Wilfred

An attorney may reasonably reimburse a lay witness for their time and expense in preparing to testify and testifying. Here, Wilfred is a lay witness and Allison has offered to pay him an hourly fee roughly equal to his salary and tips (i.e. lost earnings) for the time he would spend testifying. This is a reasonable amount to reimburse Wilfred, provided that it is reasonable for him to prepare for an entire day. But based on the simple nature of his testimony, i.e. that he witnessed a brief argument and did not even witness the altercation, a full day of preparation does not seem reasonably necessary, so she committed an ethical violation by agreeing to compensate him above a reasonable reimbursement.

There is a further issue of whether she committed an ethical violation by conditioning payment of the fee on refusing to meet with the prosecution before trial. An attorney has an ethical duty to opposing counsel not to obstruct them from conducting necessary discovery, including not procuring the unavailability of witnesses with relevant testimony. Conditioning payment of the reimbursement for the witnesses' expenses on their refusing to meet would count as procuring the unavailability of that witness or preventing the opposing counsel from conducting discovery of relevant testimony of that witness who has relevant testimony to offer. Here, Wilfred has information about an argument between Allison's client and the alleged victim, which is relevant to a charge that Davos then assaulted Caren as it goes to motive and intent. Thus, Allison has committed an ethical violation by conditioning her payment to Wilfred in a manner designed to prevent opposing counsel from conducting relevant discovery.

Payment to Eileen

An attorney may pay an expert witness a reasonable fee for their preparation of a report and testimony at trial. However, they may not pay a witness to procure false testimony from that witness. Here, Eileen is an expert video technician witness, so it is acceptable for Eileen to pay her a fee for her testimony. It is not clear whether $500 an hour is a reasonable fee for such expert testimony. Regardless of what would be a reasonable fee, however, it appears that the fee was, in part or in whole, paid to induce Eileen to give false testimony. When Eileen and Allison first watched the video together, they both agreed that it showed "strong evidence of the assault," which would be very damaging for Allison's client. Allison then agreed to pay the hourly fee only after Eileen agreed to change her opinion with no apparent basis for that change of opinion. This supports a clear inference that the fee was offered as an incentive to produce false testimony. Thus, Allison committed a breach by offering Eileen a payment for an improper purpose.

Presentation of Eileen's Expert Opinion

An attorney owes a duty of candor towards the tribunal under both California and ABA rules. They are obligated not to knowingly allow the presentation of false evidence to the court. While they cannot prevent their client from taking the stand in their own defense, they can refuse to bring to the stand a witness which they know or reasonably suspect will offer false testimony. Where they know that a witness has offered false testimony, or learn that they have later, they are under a duty to disclose this to the court. An attorney may offer opinion testimony from an expert witness where that testimony is reasonably calculated to be helpful to the fact finder, the expert is reasonably certain of the opinion, the opinion is supported by facts and produced via a reliable methodology. The judge will determine whether the methodology used is reliable. In California, the only factor relevant to the determination is whether the methodology is generally accepted in the field; under the ABA other factors can be considered, such as whether it has been tested and peer reviewed and the potential error rate. Here, there is no information on the methodology, but the issue is the factual support underlying the opinion, or lack thereof and the general relevance of the testimony to begin with.

Eileen is a video technician hired to give expert testimony concerning a video of the event. Eileen and Allison discussed their respective opinions of the video and both agreed that it showed clear evidence of the assault, but Eileen later agreed to change her opinion. There is zero evidence that Eileen had any factual basis on which to change her expert testimony and in fact Allison knew that Eileen's opinion based on the video was that the assault happened. Thus, by bringing Eileen to the stand to testify that in her opinion there was no assault when she knew that her true opinion was the opposite, and by failing to prevent the false testimony or get the witness to correct it on the stand, and failing to bring it to the attention of the court, Allison has committed an ethical violation and is subject to discipline.

Allison's Closing Arguments

There are two separate issues with Allison's closing arguments. First, whether she committed an ethical violation by arguing that the video showed there was no assault. Second, whether she committed an ethical violation by giving her opinion that, considering the evidence, her client was not guilty.

As part of an attorney's duty of candor, they must not make false statements or advance baseless arguments. They can advance any good faith argument that their client is not guilty, but where they know the argument to be baseless, they are obligated not to make it. An attorney generally can rely on the opinions of their expert witnesses in advancing an argument, but cannot do so where they know the expert opinion to be false or baseless. Here, as noted above, Allison believed that the video showed that there was an assault. She might still have advanced the argument that it didn't if she had a valid expert opinion to the contrary, but the expert opinion here was baseless and she knew it to be baseless, thus she could not advance an argument that the video showed no assault when she had no basis to do so. Therefore, she committed an ethical violation by advancing such a baseless argument in her closing testimony.

Under the ABA, an attorney is prohibited from offering in court their personal opinion as to the guilt or innocence of their client (engaging in "chicanery") but under the California rules there is no such prohibition, provided that the opinion is genuine and legally supportable. Here, Allison said in court, in her closing argument, that in her opinion her client was not guilty. Under the ABA rules, this is a clear violation of the prohibition on Chicanery regardless of the underpinnings of the opinion. Under the California rules, she has not made a violation merely by offering her opinion. However, knowing that her true opinion is that the video shows an assault by her client, and in the absence of any other exculpatory evidence, she has made a false statement because she claims that her opinion is that he is not guilty "considering the evidence" yet the only evidence offered that directly goes to guilt or innocence (the video, the prosecution's witness, and the false opinion testimony of her expert) all either indicates her client's guilt or is known to her to be false, thus she cannot even make a good faith claim that her opinion is that he is not guilty based on the evidence. By offering this false statement, she has made yet another ethical violation, both under California and the ABA rules.

Acme Bank (Bank) was robbed in December 2022. On January 15, 2023, Dan was charged with robbing Bank. In April 2023, Officer Pat showed Tessa, the teller who was robbed, photographs of six men, each of whom were the same race, approximate age, and had blond hair and a mustache like Dan. Tessa immediately selected the photograph of Dan, saying he was the robber, and signed her name on it.

Before trial in the Superior Court, Dan moved to suppress the photograph under the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution, claiming that it should be suppressed because his attorney was not present when Tessa was shown the photographs. The motion was denied.

At trial, the parties stipulated that the photograph Tessa had selected was neither a business record nor an official record. The prosecutor called Tessa, who in court identified Dan as the robber. On cross-examination, defense counsel asked Tessa whether she had made a statement to the defense investigator in February 2023, that the robber had black hair and no mustache. Tessa admitted to having made the statement, but testified that it was incorrect because the robber did have blond hair and a mustache. On redirect, Tessa again identified the photograph of Dan as the robber. This was the same photograph Tessa had signed previously. The photograph was admitted into evidence.

In the defense case, Dan testified that he was not the robber and that he had been visiting his mother in Alaska for three weeks, including one week before and two weeks after the robbery.

In rebuttal, the prosecutor called Chet, the custodian of records from Credco, a credit union. Chet identified records from a Credco automated teller machine (ATM) located down the street from Bank. Chet testified that the ATM records were created as part of Credco's regular course of business. Chet further testified that the records reflect a withdrawal was made from Dan's account the day before the robbery, using a personal identification number (PIN) assigned to Dan's account.

1. Did the court properly deny Dan's motion to suppress the photograph? Discuss.

QUESTION CONTINUES ON THE NEXT PAGE

2. Assuming all reasonable objections were timely made, did the court properly admit under the California Evidence Code:

    a) Tessa's testimony about her statement to the defense investigator? Discuss.

    b) The photograph with Tessa's signature? Discuss.

    c) The ATM records? Discuss.

QUESTION 4: SELECTED ANSWER A

Under Proposition 8 of the California Constitution any relevant evidence is admissible in a criminal case. However, Prop 8 includes exceptions for balancing under California Evidence Code (CEC) 523, which allows the court to exclude relevant evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by its risk of unfair prejudice, misleading the jury, or confusing the issues. Since this is a criminal matter, Prop 8 will apply.

1) DAN'S (D) MOTION TO SUPPRESS

6th Amendment Right to Counsel

The Sixth Amendment provides criminal defendants with a right to counsel at all critical states of a criminal prosecution. That right attaches automatically after the commencement of formal proceedings, such as a formal charge.

Here, Dan's Sixth Amendment right to counsel attached when he was charged, on January 15, 2023. The photo line up took place after that. However, unlike in person line ups, photo array lines ups are not considered a critical stage at which the Sixth Amendment Right to Counsel attaches. Therefore, Dan's Sixth Amendment Right to Counsel was not violated by the absence of his attorney at the photo line up, even though it took place after Dan's Sixth Amendment Right had already attached.

Impermissibly Suggestive Line Ups

Although it is not clear if Dan raised the issue, he may have also argued that the photo identification should be excluded because the identification procedure was impermissibly suggestive. In order to succeed on that argument, he would have to establish that the procedures were impermissibly suggestive and that they created a substantial risk of misidentification.

Here, all of the individuals in the lineup were of the same race, approximate age, and had blonde hair and a mustache like D. Additionally, since Tessa (T) was the teller who was actually robbed, she would have had a good opportunity to view the suspect. And it is important that she immediately identified D in the photo line up. All of those facts suggest that T's photo identification was reliable. The fact that approximately four months had passed between the robbery and the photo identification would support D's likely argument that the lineup was not reliable. But on balance, the court properly determined that the lineup was not impermissibly suggestive.

2.a.) TESSA'S (T) TESTIMONY RE HER STATEMENT TO DEFENSE INVESTIGATOR

Logical Relevance

Evidence is logically relevant if it has a tendency to prove or disprove any disputed of fact that is of consequence in determination of the action. Here, T's statement to investigators that the robbery suspect had black hair and no mustache is relevant because it tends to prove that D, who does not have those features, did not commit the robbery. The evidence also calls into question T's credibility, which is important because she is a witness at trial who identified Dan as the robber. The evidence is logically relevant.

Legal Relevance

The court to exclude relevant evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by its risk of unfair prejudice, misleading the jury, or confusing the issues. Here, the probative value is very high because the evidence tends to prove that D did not commit the crime. It also impeaches T's credibility. There does not appear to be any risk of unfair prejudice, misleading the issues, or confusing the jury. The evidence is legally relevant.

Hearsay

Hearsay is an out of court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. T's statement to the defense investigator was made outside of the court room (and in fact before trial had even started). It is therefore an out of court statement. However, D will argue that the statement is not being offered for the truth of the matter asserted because it is a prior inconsistent statement and a prior statement of identification.

Prior Inconsistent Statement

A prior inconsistent statement is not excluded as hearsay. In California, the prior statement need not be sworn. And it can be used both for impeachment and for the truth of the matter asserted (as substantive evidence). Here, T identified D in court. But she previously said that the robber had black hair and a mustache. Because that prior statement was inconsistent with T's in-court statement and identification, it is admissible.

The court properly admitted this evidence.

Impeachment

A witness who takes the stand is subject to impeachment. T's prior statement to the defense investigator can also be used for impeachment based on the inconsistency and T's apparent ability to accurately perceive the robber.

Again, the court properly admitted this evidence.

2.b.) PHOTOGRAPH WITH T'S SIGNATURE

Logical Relevance

See rule above. The evidence tends to prove that D robbed the bank. That is a disputed fact. Thus, the evidence is logically relevant.

Legal Relevance

See rule above. The probative value is high because the evidence tends to establish D's guilt of the crime charged. The risk of prejudice is high. But it would be unfair prejudice for the jury to convict D because they believe he actually committed the crime. Rather, evidence causes unfair prejudice when it leads a jury to make a decision based on improper considerations, such as emotion or anger at the defendant. The evidence is legally relevant.

Authentication

A party offering a document or physical item into evidence must authenticate it by establishing that the item or thing is actually what the party claims it to be. Assuming T testified that the photo was a photograph she had previously viewed and signed, it was properly authenticated.

Hearsay

See rule above. The photo itself is not a statement, but T's signature is. Additionally, T signed the photo out of court, so it is an out of court statement. And the prosecution is offering the signed photo to prove that D is the person who robbed the bank. Therefore, it is being offered for the truth of the matter asserted. Consequently, the signed photo is inadmissible hearsay unless an exception applies.

Prior Statement of Identification

Prior statements of identification are excepted from the rule against hearsay. While this rule operates as an exclusion from the definition of hearsay under the Federal Rules of Evidence, it is an exception to the rule against hearsay under the CEC.

T signed the photo during the lineup (before trial) to communicate that she was identifying D as the robber. Thus, the signed photo is a prior statement of identification.

Prior Consistent Statement

Prior consistent statements are also excluded from the rule against hearsay if the statement was made before the motive to fabricate arose and is offered only after the witness's veracity has been challenged in court. Here, the prosecution offered the photo after the defense team questioned the veracity of T's in court identification of D. However, because T had told the defense investigator that the suspect did not look like D before she identified Dto Officer Pat, D would have a good argument that she had a motive to fabricate at the time she made the identification to officer Pat. The facts are not entirely clear as to if and when T had a motivation to lie. A court could rule either way on this. But as explained above, the evidence was properly admitted as a prior statement of identification.

Confrontation Clause

The Confrontation Clause of the United States Constitution prohibits the government from admitting testimonial out of court statements against a criminal defendant unless the defendant had an opportunity to cross examine the witness. Disputes in this area often concern whether the out of court statement was testimonial. An out of court statement is testimonial if the witness could reasonably foresee that it would be available for trial. A photo identification satisfies that standard. However, in this case, T showed up at trial and took the stand. She was subject to cross-examination by D's attorney. Thus, the Confrontation Clause did not preclude her prior out of court statement from being entered into evidence.

The court properly admitted this evidence.

2.c.) ATM RECORDS

Logical Relevance

See rule above. The ATM records contradict D's alibi for the crime. Thus, they are relevant.

Legal Relevance

See rule above. The ATM records suggest that D is lying about his alibi. Thus, the probative value is high. The risk of unfair prejudice could be significant if, for example, someone else had access to D's ATM card such that the records could be used to wrongfully implicate D. On balance, the court properly admitted the evidence.

Hearsay within Hearsay

See rule re hearsay above. When there are multiple levels of hearsay, each level must fall within an exception to be admissible. D likely argued that both the receipt and the information on it were hearsay. However, the receipt itself is a statement generated by a machine, and there is thus a strong argument that it is not hearsay.

Business records

Even if the receipt was hearsay, it would fall within the business record exception. That exception applies to records of regularly conducted business activities that were created by or with information transmitted by, someone with knowledge. Unless the record is certified, the custodian of records must lay the foundation. And in California, the proponent of the evidence also must establish that it is otherwise trustworthy. That standard is satisfied here by Chet's testimony at the trial.

Authentication

See rule above. Chet's testimony regarding the ATM record properly authenticated it.

Opposing Party Statement

An opposing party's statement is also excepted from the rule against hearsay. D's entry of his ATM pin code in the ATM was an out of court statement that was captured in the ATM record that was offered into evidence. However, the proponent of the evidence is the prosecution. And the prosecution is offering D's statement to use against him. Therefore, D's statement within the ATM record is admissible as a statement of a party opponent.

The court properly admitted this evidence.

QUESTION 4: SELECTED ANSWER B

1.Motion to Suppress Photograph

Exclusionary Rule

Under the exclusionary rule, evidence obtained in violation of the 4th, 5th, or 6th Amendments may be suppressed. Here, whether the court properly denied Dan's motion to suppress the photograph depends on whether the photograph was obtained in violation of Dan's rights under either the 4th, 5th, or 6th Amendments.

Sixth Amendment Right to Counsel

The Sixth Amendment provides a defendant with the right to counsel at all critical stages of the proceedings against him. The right to counsel attaches when formal charges are filed. Critical stages of the proceedings include hearings, arraignments, post-indictment lineups, and trial, but do not include post-indictment photo arrays.

Here, Dan's right to counsel under the 6th Amendment attached on January 15, 2023 when he was charged with robbing Bank. The issue is that the photograph signed and selected by Tessa was obtained during a post-indictment photo array, which is not a critical stage of the proceeding. Thus, the fact that his attorney was not present when the photos were presented to Tessa does not trigger a 6th Amendment violation, and thus, is not suppressible under the exclusionary rule.

Suggestive Arrays

A defendant may also move to exclude evidence of an identification made by a witness through a photo array if the photo array was unduly suggestive. Here, Dan could not argue that the photo array presented to Tess was unduly suggestive because each of the photographs were of men who were the same race and approximate age as Dan, and who had blonde hair and a mustache like Dan. Thus, the photo array was not suggestive.

Conclusion

The court did not err in denying Dan's motion to suppress.

2. California Constitution Proposition 8

Under Proposition 8 of the California Constitution all relevant evidence is admissible in a criminal case. Proposition 8, however, makes exceptions for evidence under the rules for hearsay, character evidence, exclusionary rule, Best Evidence Rule, and discretionary balancing under California Evidence Code 352, which allows a court to exclude relevant evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice, confusing the issues, misleading the jury, undue duly, or the needless presentation of cumulative evidence. This is a criminal case, so Proposition 8 applies.

2a. Tessa's Testimony

Logical Relevance

Evidence is relevant if it tends to make any disputed fact more or less likely. The identity of the robber is a fact that is in dispute in this case because the prosecution asserts that Dan was the robber and Dan asserts that he was not the robber. Tessa's prior testimony to a defense investigator in which she stated that the robber had black hair and no mustache--features that are inconsistent with Dan's features, who has blonde hair and a mustache, tend to prove Dan's claim that he was not the robber. As explained below, Tessa's prior statements also tend to rebut the credibility of her identification of Dan as the robber as part of a photo array, months after having made a contrary statement to the defense investigator. The relevant is very relevant.

Legal Relevance

Relevant evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice, confusing the issues, misleading the jury, undue duly, or the needless presentation of cumulative evidence. Here, Tessa's prior statement is highly probative of a key fact in dispute--the identity of the robber, and there are no facts to indicate that the prior statement is unduly prejudice or carries some other risk outweighing its relevance. The evidence is also legally relevant.

Impeachment Prior Inconsistent Statement

When a witness testifies, she puts her credibility at issue, and thus, opposing counsel is permitted to impeach a witness's testimony, including by prior inconsistent statements. Under the CEC, prior inconsistent statements may be used both to impeach and for their truth regardless of whether they were made under oath. Here, on direct examination, Tessa identified Dan as the robber in court. Thus, on cross examination, defense counsel was permitted to impeach her testimony (identifying Dan as the robber) through her prior inconsistent statement to the defense investigator in 2023. Defense counsel may use her admitting the prior statement both to impeach the credibility of her testimony as well as for its truth--to show that Dan was not the robber.

Impeachment for Truthfulness

When a witness testifies, she puts her credibility at issue, and thus, opposing counsel is permitted to impeach a witness's testimony, including by opinion or reputation evidence of a witness' character for truthfulness or untruthfulness. On cross examination in a criminal case, an attorney may also ask about specific acts of untruthfulness. Alternatively, even if Tessa had not identified Dan as the robber during her direct exam, defense counsel was permitted to inquire into a specific act--Tessa' statements to the investigator--that goes to her character for truthfulness or untruthfulness. The fact that Tessa admitted that her prior statement to the investigator was not correct might tend to rebut her credibility for truthfulness with respect to the identification.

Hearsay

Hearsay is an out of court statement offered for the truth of the matter asserted. Here, Tessa's prior statements to the defense investigator are out of court statements and defense counsel is likely introducing them for their truth--that the person who robbed the bank has black hair and no mustache, such that Dan is not the robber. Defense counsel may argue that the statement is being used only to impeach the credibility of Tessa's in court identification of Dan as the robber (as discussed above), but given that Dan's identity as the robber is in dispute, defense counsel likely seeks to introduce the evidence for its truth. Thus, the statement is inadmissible, unless it falls under an exception to hearsay.

Prior Inconsistent Statement

Under the CEC, prior inconsistent statements, whether made under oath or not, are admissible as an exception to hearsay because they can be used either to impeach or for their substantive truth. Thus, because the evidence at issue concerns Tessa's prior inconsistent statement to the defense investigator, it is admissible under this exception.

Prior Statement of Identification

A prior statement of identification is also admissible as an exception to hearsay, so long as the witness who made the identification testifies that the identification was made while the matter was fresh in their memory and that the prior identification was accurate at the time it was made. Here, the statement would not be admissible under this exception because while the prior identification to the defense investigator was made just a few months after the event, Tess specifically testified that the prior identification was not accurate at the time.

Conclusion

The court properly admitted Tessa's testimony.

2b. Photograph

Logical Relevance

See rule above. As Dan's identity as the robber is in dispute, Tessa's prior identification of Dan as the robber when showed a photo array makes it more likely that Dan was the robber. The evidence is logically relevant.

Legal Relevance

See rule above. The photo is extremely probative of whether or not Dan was the robber which is the central issue in the case and presents no apparent issues of countervailing undue prejudice or other concerns. The evidence is legally relevant.

Rehabilitation--Prior Consistent Statement

If a witness is impeached on cross examination, a lawyer can attempt to rehabilitate a witness through various means, including by introducing evidence of a prior consistent statement. Here, as discussed above, defense counsel attempted to impeach the credibility of Tessa's identification of Dan as the robber with a prior inconsistent statement she made to the defense investigator. Thus, on redirect, the prosecution was entitled to rehabilitate the credibility of Tessa's in court identification by introducing evidence of a prior consistent statement she made--namely her identification of Dan in a photo array.

Authentication

All tangible evidence must be authenticated by the proponent prior to it being offered into evidence. The proponent must demonstrate through sufficient evidence that the document is what he claims it to be. Here, the prior photograph was identified by Tessa as the photograph she had previously signed when she selected Dan from a photo array. She is also competent to recognize and verify her own signature on the photograph. Thus, the photograph was properly authenticated by Tessa.

Hearsay

See rule above. The prior photograph with Tessa's signature on it can be construed as an out of court statement (that Dan is the robber) offered for its truth (that Dan is the robber). While the prosecution may claim that the photograph was merely used to rehabilitate Tessa's credibility, rather than for its truth, because Dan's identity as the robber is in dispute, the prosecution is likely offering the photo as proof for its truth that Dan was the robber. It must thus be subject to an exception to be admitted.

Prior Statement of Identification

See rule above. Here, the signed photograph, which asserts a statement that Dan is the robber, is a prior statement of identification made by Tessa. However, to be admissible under this exception, Tessa must testify that the events were fresh in her mind at the time she made the identification and that the identification of Dan in the photo array was accurate at the time she made it. There is no indication she made such testimony prior to its admittance into evidence. Thus, this exception does not apply.

Confrontation Clause

Under the confrontation clause, out-of-court testimonial evidence is inadmissible against a criminal defendant unless the declarant is unavailable and the defendant had a prior opportunity to examine the declarant. Testimonial evidence is any statement made by a declarant under circumstances in which a reasonable person would expect that the statement might be used at a later trial. Here, even if the photograph is admissible under the CEC, it should likely have been excluded on confrontation clause grounds. The photograph is an out of court statement made by Tessa, as discussed above. It is also testimonial because it was made to police as part of a photo array meant to identify a potential suspect. A reasonable person should expect that if they identify a suspect as part of a photo array, that the statement could likely be used at trial. Further, Tessa is not unavailable--indeed she has testified in court. Thus, the photograph is likely barred under the confrontation clause.

Conclusion

Logical Relevance

See rule above. Once again, Dan's identity as the robber is a fact in dispute in this case. The ATM records which show that a withdrawal was made from Dan's account the day before the robbery, using a PIN assigned to Dan's account, tends to make it more likely that Dan was the robber, because it rebuts Dan's alibi that he was not present in the state the week before and during the robbery. The records are logically relevant.

Legal Relevance

See rule above. As explained above, the records are extremely probative of the central issue of the robber's identity in this case and present no apparent countervailing issues of undue prejudice. The evidence is legally relevant as well.

Authentication

See rule above. Here, the ATM records were properly authenticated by the custodian of records for the company that maintains the ATM records.

Hearsay

See rule above. The ATM records are an out of court statement. It can be argued that the records are being asserted for its truth, that Dan did in fact withdraw the stated amounts from the ATM because the government is attempting to prove Dan was the robber.

Offered for Other Purpose

The government may argue that the records are not being offered for their truth, that Dan withdrew the specific stated amounts from the ATM, but rather as circumstantial evidence of Dan's location prior to the robbery and to impeach Dan's alibi. The government will likely succeed in arguing that the records are not hearsay because they are not being offered for their truth.

Business Records

A record that (1) records an event at or near the time of the event it records; (2) is prepared by a person with knowledge of the event or with a duty to report the event; and (3) that is kept in the regularly conducted course of business at a business, is admissible under the business records exception to hearsay. Alternatively, even if the ATM records are construed as hearsay, they likely fall under the business records exception. First, the ATM records record withdrawals and deposits at or near the time such events occur. Second, the ATM records are prepared by a custodian of records at Credco, who is under a duty to report the withdrawals and deposits made at the ATM. Finally, the ATM records are kept in the regularly conducted course of business at Credco. Thus, the statement would be admissible under this exception even if it were construed as hearsay.

Conclusion

The court did not err in admitting the ATM records.

Brian, owner of a commercial bakery, and Sam, owner of a bakery supply business, met for the first time and discussed Brian's inability to find a reliable source of maple topping. When Sam told Brian he could supply the maple topping, they orally agreed that Sam would immediately ship 500 gallons of topping at $20 per gallon. Sam then added that he did not want to ship without something in writing, and Brian replied: "I will send written confirmation tomorrow."

For the next three weeks, Brian was busy negotiating a conference center catering contract and forgot to send Sam the confirmation. The catering contract obligated Brian to provide large quantities of pastries with maple topping. Brian then recalled his promise to Sam and sent him a purchase order on his standard form for 5,000 gallons of maple topping at $20 per gallon, to be delivered to Brian's place of business in two weeks.

Sam received Brian's purchase order but did not notice the change in gallonage. He saw the delivery date, but in light of Brian's delay in sending the confirmation, he did not believe it was firm. That same day, Sam sent a signed acknowledgment restating Brian's purchase order items and then left on a four-week vacation to a remote locale.

Upon his return, Sam shipped 500 gallons of maple topping to Brian. By that time, Brian was in default of the catering contract due to lack of maple topping. Brian had tried but had been unable to reach Sam while he was on vacation. Because Brian had been unsuccessful in obtaining an alternate source of maple topping, the conference center canceled its contract, resulting in $100,000 in lost profits.

Brian refused delivery of the 500 gallons of maple topping and sued for breach of contract, seeking the $100,000 in lost profits.

1. Is there an enforceable contract between Brian and Sam? If so, what are the terms? Discuss.

2. Is Brian likely to prevail on his claim against Sam? If so, what damages is he likely to recover? Discuss.

QUESTION 5: SELECTED ANSWER A

1. ENFORCEABLE CONTRACT

Governing Law

Contracts for the sale of goods are governed by the UCC. This is true regardless of whether the contract is between merchants. All other contracts, including contracts for personal services, are governed by the common law. If the contract has a mixed purpose, then the question is whether the predominant purpose of the contract is for the conveyance of the goods or for the service.

Sam and Brian are attempting to contract for the sale of maple topping ("the topping"), which is a good. The agreement also involves the shipment of goods. In theory, that could be construed as a service, but it's a standard part of goods contracts. Moreover, the predominant purpose was clearly the sale of the topping, and the delivery is just incidental.

The UCC thus governs.

Merchants

Some of the terms in the UCC vary depending on whether one or both of the contract parties are merchants. A party is a merchant if they are a professional seller of the goods in question or if they are a commercial entity engaging in the purchase of goods.

Brian is the owner of a commercial bakery, purchasing maple topping, thus he is a merchant with regard to the contract over the sale of topping. And Sam is the owner of a bakery supply business, and thus he is a merchant in maple topping.

Thus, this is a contract between two merchants.

Oral Agreement

A contract is a legally enforceable promise. A contract requires offer, acceptance, and consideration. An offer is an expression of present intent to enter into a contract that creates in the offeree the power of acceptance. The offer must generally contain the material terms of the contract. Under the UCC, the material terms are the parties, the quantity, and the goods--the UCC is able to gap fill the rest of the terms with UCC defaults. (That is different from common law, where price is a key term that must be specified--under the UCC, market price can be a gap filler.) An acceptance must follow the terms specified by the offer and it must be communicated to the offeror. Consideration is the requirement that a contract be a bargained for exchange in which both parties alter their legal positions.

The facts state that Brian and Sam reached an oral agreement. Thus, it is presumed that there was an offer and acceptance. The material terms are present: 500 gallons of topping is the quantity and the good, and Brian and Sam are the parties. There are also other terms, such as the immediate shipment, and the contract price of $20 per gallon. And there was bargained for consideration: Sam is giving up product, and Brian is giving up money. Thus, at this point there was a legally binding contract for the sale of the goods on those terms, unless a defense applies.

Sam's Request for Written Confirmation

Under the common law, a contract cannot be modified unless there is new consideration given for the contract modification. However, under the UCC, a contract can be modified as long as the parties modify it in good faith.

Here, the agreement had already been formed by the time Sam added that he wanted the written confirmation to be a condition of Sam sending the maple topping. That would be a condition precedent--the confirmation is a condition that must occur before Sam is obligated to perform by sending the topping. However, he said this in good faith, and Brian seemed to agree to it by saying that he would send written confirmation tomorrow. Thus, the condition of written confirmation would likely be seen as binding. Thus, even if the oral agreement was binding, Sam had no obligation to send the maple syrup until he received at least some writing, since the condition precedent had not occurred.

State of Frauds

Applicability

To be valid, a certain subset of contracts must satisfy the statue of frauds. Those contracts include marriage contracts, suretyship contracts, contracts for services that by their terms cannot be performed in less than one year, contracts for the sale of real estate and--relevant here--contracts for the sale of goods that are worth more than $500.

The contract was for 500 gallons of topping at $20 per gallon. That means that the total value of the contract is 500 x 20, which is 10,000--well over the limit for the statute of frauds to apply.

Satisfying

In order to satisfy the statute of frauds, a contract must typically be in writing, with all material terms in writing, and signed by the party to be charged. There are a few exceptions for goods contracts, including full or partial performance. The final exception is a merchant's confirmatory memo, which, if sent a reasonable time after the conclusion of the deal and signed by the merchant, can also satisfy the statute of frauds.

There was no contract in writing at the time of the agreement. And there is no indication that Brian or Sam fully or partially performed on the contract until much later--at least seven weeks after the oral agreement and three weeks after Brian's purchase order. Thus, that does not satisfy the statute of frauds.

Brian may try to argue that the purchase order three weeks later constituted a merchant's confirmatory memo. As noted, Brian is a merchant, and the contract is between merchants. However, there are a few problems. First, the memo was not sent a reasonable time after the deal was agreed to. Brian said he would send it tomorrow, but instead, he sent it three weeks later. Thus, it cannot make the oral agreement satisfy the statute of frauds. Second, the memo did not contain the same terms as the oral agreement: (1) it provided for the shipment to be delivered to Brian's place of business, where the oral contract was a shipment contract (that may not be a material term, but it shows a difference), (2) the writing provided for the topping to be shipped two weeks from that date, five weeks after the initial agreement would have provided, and (3) it had a different quantity term, 5000 instead of 500, and quantity is always a significant material term in a goods contract.

Thus, the memo cannot operate as a confirmation and bring the initial oral agreement into compliance with the statute of frauds. The oral agreement is thus invalid. And the memo will operate instead as an offer or invitation to deal in a new bargaining process.

Purchase Order

See rule above for offers.

The purchase order can be understood as a new offer to Sam to enter into a contract for the sale of topping. The signed purchase order stated the material term--quantity, and a number of new terms. It creates in Sam the power to accept by agreeing to those terms and create a valid binding contract.

The purchase order could also be understood as an acceptance--if the initial oral conversation is seen as an offer that remained on the table. However, offers can terminate after the reasonable passage of time. Since the contract was for the immediate shipment of goods, and there was a promise to send written confirmation the next day. Thus, by the time two weeks had passed, it was no longer reasonable to accept the offer, as it had terminated by then.

Signed Acknowledgment

See rule above for acceptances.

Sam's acknowledgement constituted an acceptance of the offer from Brian that was contained in the purchase order, this was Sam's confirmatory memo.

Statute of Frauds (Purchase Order + Acknowledgement)

The contract is now confirmed by Sam's written signed acknowledgement, signed by the party to be charged in the action in Question 2 (Sam), so the statute of frauds is satisfied.

Additionally, the statute of frauds can be satisfied by partial performance, but only for the amount already performed. After Sam sent the 500 gallons of maple topping, that would be enough to satisfy the statute of frauds at least for that amount.

Mirror Image Rule vs. UCC

At common law, when an acceptance contained terms that were different from the offer, there was no contract--they had to be the mirror image of one another. However, the UCC is more forgiving of conflicting terms. Where an offer and an acceptance contain different terms, the court will find that there was still a contract, and it will just knock out the conflicting terms and gap fill them. Moreover, if the acceptance contains additional terms to the offer, those terms will generally enter the contract, unless the offer was conditional on no additional terms being added or the additional terms go to the basis of the bargain.

If the initial agreement is understood as an offer, and Brian's memo is understood as the acceptance, then there cannot be a contract, because there is no agreement on the key term: quantity. However, if there were a contract, the terms of the acceptance would govern, because the offer was not made conditional on no additional terms.

If the initial agreement is not a valid contract, nor a valid persisting offer (as discussed above), then the purchase order is its own offer. Sam's signed acknowledgement constituted an acceptance--it was sent to Brian, and restated the items in Brian's purchase order, including the new price term. There is no indication of any conflicting or additional terms. Thus, the purchase order terms govern.

Objective Manifestations

Sam may try to argue that he did not know that the contract term was 5,000 and so there was no meeting of the minds on the quantity term. He did not notice the change in gallonage, which suggests that he was still thinking about the oral agreement from two weeks prior. However, mutual assent is based on the outward manifestations of assent--not the inward thoughts of the parties. Outwardly, Sam received a purchase form for 5,000 gallons, and he sent a note acknowledging that same quantity term, repeating it. Moreover, he should have noticed that many other terms were changed, as described above--that would have put a reasonable person on notice about the changed quantity term. Thus, there was mutual assent.

The same is true of the delivery date. Despite not personally believing that it was a firm date, Sam still repeated it in his signed acknowledgement, which is an objective manifestation of his intent to be bound to the terms.

However, Sam could try to argue unilateral or mutual mistake as a defense to formation (see below).

Terms

Thus, the terms of the contract are for the provision of 5,000 gallons of maple syrup, at $20 per gallon, to be delivered to Brian's place of business, and in two weeks.

Defenses (Mistake)

However, a contract that is otherwise valid may be deemed not to have been validly formed if a defense to formation applies. The defenses to formation are mistake, misrepresentation, incapacity, and the statute of frauds. The statute of frauds has already been discussed, and there are no facts indicating incapacity or misrepresentations.

Mutual Mistake

A mutual mistake happens when both parties are mistaken regarding a key term in the contract. They can seek judicial reformation of the contract to reflect their true intentions.

But it does not seem like Brian was mistaken. He sent the purchase form after spending three weeks negotiating a contract for a big new catering deal that required large quantities of topping. Thus, it seems likely that he intended for the purchase order to state 5,000. Although it seems like Sam was mistaken, since he did not notice the change and then did ship only 500 gallons, there was no mutual mistake.

A similar analysis applies to the delivery date. It also seems likely that Brian intended the date, in light of his new contract. However, Sam has even less of a case for being mistaken about this term because he actually saw it and recognized it, he just did not think that it mattered.

Unilateral Mistake

A contract may be rescinded for unilateral mistake where one party is mistaken about a key term in the contract that goes to the basis of the bargain, and the other party either knew of the mistake and failed to correct it or caused the mistake, and where the mistaken party is not responsible for the mistake.

Sam may try to argue that Brian caused the mistake because he represented that it was for 500 gallons then delayed sending the confirmation and increased the price term without calling sufficient attention to it. But Brian did not have reason to know that Sam did not process the increase in gallons or that Sam would infer from their prior conversation that all the terms were the same. Ultimately, it was Sam's responsibility to read the contract, and to process the terms when he repeated them in acknowledgement. Thus, the contract is not voidable for unilateral mistake.

Similarly, by not following up with Brian about the date, and confirming it despite having no intention of meeting it, that mistake was also Sam's fault, and he cannot void the contract on that basis.

2. BRIAN VS. SAM -- WINNER + DAMAGES

Contract

See above regarding contract formation and contract terms.

Breach

Under the UCC, the seller has an obligation of perfect tender. That means both perfect goods and perfect delivery.

The goods were not perfect, because, as discussed above, the contract was for the shipment of 5,000 gallons of maple topping instead of 500 gallons. This was not an installment contract, so the special rules for partial performance do not apply. And the time for delivery has already passed, thus there is no opportunity to cure owed to Sam. Thus, Brian is entitled to reject the maple syrup and sue for breach, as he did.

There was also not perfect delivery. The maple topping was delivered two weeks late. There was no time is of the essence clause, but that does not excuse late performance under the UCC where a delivery date is specified. And this was not just a little bit late--it was double the time given. There is an exception for imperfect tender for nonconforming goods when the seller has reason to believe that the buyer would accept the replacement goods, and Sam may say that given the delay with the writing follow up, he thought Brian would accept the late delivery--but this is late delivery, not imperfect goods, so that exception does not apply. Thus, again, Brian is entitled to reject the maple syrup and sue for breach.

Thus, Brian is likely to succeed in his lawsuit.

Damages

Expectation Damages

The standard form of contract damages is expectation damages. Expectation damages are designed to make the nonbreaching party in the same position that they would have been had the contract been performed according to its terms. That is typically calculated by the difference between the contract price and the cover price. But it might also be the difference between the contract price and the market price. However, Brian was not able to cover as he was unable to find a replacement supplier.

Incidental Damages

Consequential damages are costs incurred while trying to remedy the breach. Brian spent time and effort trying to contact Sam while he was away and trying to find a new supplier of maple topping. He could receive those damages.

Consequential Damages

Consequential damages are those other than expectation damages that are caused by the breach. Here, Sam lost out in a 100,000 dollar profit on the catering contract. And he did so because he could not provide pastries with maple topping.

However, there are limitations on consequential damages. They must be reasonably foreseeable at the time of the contract--either as a natural and probable consequence of the breach, or discussed by the parties at the time of contracting.

It is reasonably foreseeable that Dan would lose a business if not able to sell maple topping pastries--since he runs a commercial bakery. However, Sam was not aware of the large lucrative contract. Dan may argue that the 5,000 term plus the two weeks made it foreseeable that there was a big contract on the horizon--but it really only makes it foreseeable that he wants to sell a large number of baked goods, not that there's an immediate demand for them in a contract that might get cancelled if he's in default in a matter of weeks. Thus, Dan can get his likely standard lost profits for inability to meet standard demand for the goods with the maple topping, but he cannot get the full 100,000.

Duty to Mitigate

Dan satisfied his duty to mitigate damages by his efforts to find an alternate supplier.

QUESTION 5: SELECTED ANSWER B

Applicable Law

Contracts for services and real property are governed by common law. Contracts for goods is governed by the UCC.

Here, Brian (B) and Sam (S) are dealing with the purchase and sale of maple topping, goods, and thus the applicable law is the UCC.

Merchants

Merchants are business persons who are in the business of dealing with a certain good or service. A party is a merchant for the purposes of an agreement if the agreement relates to the item such business person regularly deals in.

B is a merchant as an owner of a commercial bakery and S is a merchant as an owner of a bakery supply business. S is selling B baked goods (maple toppings) which B is using for his bakery catering.

Statute of Frauds

Statue of Frauds (SOF) applies for contracts of goods over $500, that which cannot by its terms be completed in less than 1 year, regarding real property. If the SOF applies, contracts must be in writing and be signed by the party enforcement is being sought against. Between merchants, if they have an oral agreement, it can be confirmed by a written confirmation thereafter.

Here, the parties were contracting for goods over $500 and thus would be subject to the SOF. They initially had an oral 'agreement' but also agreed that it would be memorialized in writing. See analysis below for the different writing components, but generally parties did have writings so eventually this was met and the SOF was satisfied.

Enforceable Contract between B&S

In order to have a valid, enforceable agreement, there has to be offer, acceptance and consideration. An offer is an objective expression of an offer with the intention to be bound. An acceptance is an objective expression of confirmation of acceptance of the terms of the offer. Consideration is typically sufficient with legal detriment (i.e., a party incurring a detriment by forgoing a legal right) but generally the idea is the agreement is a bargained for exchange.

At common law, the material terms have to be set out in the agreement: parties, price, quantity, etc. However, the UCC only requires the quantity term for an enforceable contract, where the rest will be gap-filled per UCC rules.

Oral Agreement

B & S orally agreed that S would immediately ship 500 gallons of topping at $20 per gallon. However, S said he did not want to ship without writing and B replied that he would send written confirmation the next day. Without further detail, it's hard to ascertain whether the parties had reached meeting of the minds in advance of deciding they would have written confirmation or afterwards, after agreeing to paper the understanding. Regardless, in order to satisfy the SOF, because the amount would be over $500, the sale of goods had to be in writing. Thus, at this point, there is not an enforceable agreement. Had Brian sent the written confirmation the next day, perhaps this would be the enforceable agreement given merchants exception to signed writing by two parties (i.e., a confirmation memo would suffice).

B's Purchase Order - Offer - Battle of the Forms

Common law mirror image rule requires the offer and the acceptance to match (i.e., mirror each other); otherwise, a purported acceptance with different terms will be considered a rejection and simultaneously as a new offer. UCC 2-207: when there are two merchants who send form agreements back and forth, as long as the material terms are the same, additional and / or different terms do not cause there to be no agreement. Additional terms become part of the agreement unless it materially changes the terms of the agreement, or the offer explicitly conditioned acceptance to be on the exact terms of the offer.

B did not send the written confirmation for three weeks. Thereafter, he sent a purchase order on his standard form, but instead of the amount orally discussed with S (500), B's form was for 5,000 gallons of maple topping. This change is a material difference from the amount discussed (10x greater) and goes to a vital part of the agreement, i.e., the quantity term. Given the delay in sending the confirmation, and also the material difference, this likely cannot be a merchant memo confirmation of the oral agreement. Rather, this is more likely to be an offer by B to purchase from S 5,000 gallons of the topping.

S's Signed Acknowledgement - Acceptance

S sent a signed acknowledgement restating B's PO terms. However, he did not notice the change in gallonage. Thus, assuming S restated B's terms exactly, S agreed to 5,000 gallons of maple topping. Because S did not object to any of the terms, he accepted B's offer.

Thus, the enforceable agreement terms: S to ship to B 5,000 gallons of maple topping at $20 per gallon, to be delivered to B's place of business in two weeks.

Defenses - Unilateral Mistake

If both parties are mistaken as to a material item in / underlying the agreement, they can ask the court to revise the contract to reflect their understanding. If only one party is mistaken as to a material item regarding a contract, he can try to have rescission of the contract. The mistake must be reasonable. If the counterparty knew of the party's mistake (or actively caused the mistake) then this is even more likely.

S may try to argue that he made a mistake--he thought they had agreed to 500 and did not clearly read that the PO was for 5,000 gallons. While he genuinely was mistaken, given the unambiguous nature of 5,000 gallons and that B did not know about S's mistake (or cause such mistake), it's probably unlikely that a court would rescind / modify the contract.

B refused delivery from S of 500 gallons of maple topping and is bringing suit against S for breach of contract.

Performance / Breach

Under common law, parties to an agreement have to substantially perform their obligations under a contract. Material breaches excuse the counterparty from its obligation to perform. If a party substantially completes performance, it has fulfilled sufficiently to demand the counterparty's action and minor failings are considered minor breaches where the counterparty can seek damages for (but such counterparty's performance is not excused). The UCC however, requires perfect tender--this means perfect goods and perfect delivery. If the seller provides non-conforming goods, the buyer can reject the goods; if there is still time under the contract, the seller can resend conforming goods and not be in breach.

Perfect tender required S to send B 5,000 gallons of topping in two weeks. S sent 500 gallons after 4 weeks--because this is not perfect goods & perfect delivery, B can reject the goods and S is in material breach of the contract.

Time of the Essence

Typically, unless parties expressly provide for time being of the essence, courts do not find that timing deadlines are firm.

Under the agreement, S was to send B 5,000 gallons of topping in two weeks. S knew those were the terms but did not know about the underlying agreement B had which created the need for so many gallons of topping in the two week time frame. Absent express agreement, courts would be unlikely to find time being of the essence.

However, even if the courts did not find the two week deadline to be firm, S delivered only 500 gallons of topping four weeks later. S did not deliver on the 5,000 gallons and thus B is permitted to reject delivery and S is in material breach.

As discussed above, it's unlikely that S can claim mistake as an excuse to his performance.

Accordingly, S is in breach of the contract with B, and B likely can recover damages.

Damages / Remedies

Expectation Damages / Incidental Damages

When a contract has been materially breached, the injured party can sue for expectation damages, which are those which put the party in the position s/he would have been had the counterparty fully performed. With respect to goods, typically this is calculated as either (market price - contract price)(# of goods), or, if the injured party covered, (cover price - contract price)(# of goods).

If the injured party covers, (e.g., went into the market to buy replacement / substitute goods or sold to an alternate buyer), such party can also recover for any incidental damages which includes costs incidental to do that which the party expected (alternate buy or sell). These include expedited shipping costs, storage costs, etc.

Here, B was entitled to 5,000 gallons of topping at $20 per topping. It appears that B was unsuccessful in obtaining an alternate source of maple topping. Thus, B's expectation damages would be the difference between the market price of the topping and the contract price of $20, multiplied by 5,000. No incidental damages given no

Consequential damages are those that flow as a result of a party's breach. The injured party can recover consequential damages if the losses arise out of the breach of the contract and are foreseeable and reasonably certain.

Here, B is in default of his catering contract due to the lack of maple topping. He tried to reach S but S was out on vacation and unreachable. B was unsuccessful in finding a substitute. His losses were directly caused by S's breach. The losses are reasonably certain given B had a contract under which he would've obtained $100,000 in profits. However, it's not clear that this harm is foreseeable to S. B did not tell S about the contract in advance of their agreement. Furthermore, given the original quantity they'd discussed is 500 gallons, it would be unforeseeable to S that suddenly B would have such a high resultant amount of damages. B would argue that S was on notice when B sent S a PO for 5,000 gallons that it reasonably follows that B has business that requires high amounts of topping and accordingly the resultant damage is foreseeable.

Given the magnitude of the losses, it seems unlikely that a court would find the damages foreseeable; B is unlikely to get consequential damages.

Duty to Mitigate Losses

The injured party in a breach of contract has a duty to mitigate his/her losses (e.g., finding an alternate seller or buying).

Here, it seems that B did try to find an alternate but was unsuccessful.

QUESTION 1

Amy, Bob and Carl are partners in the ABC law firm, which operates under a general partnership agreement. ABC provides all firm attorneys with cell phones to facilitate prompt attorney-client communications. ABC has a policy that all firm attorneys must carry their work-provided cells phones with them at all times and that all client emails must be responded to immediately, at least with a personal acknowledgment of receipt.

Sam, an attorney well known for his many highly publicized trials, often works closely with ABC, but is not a party to the written ABC partnership agreement. ABC believes that Sam's presence raises the profile and prestige of ABC.

Sam leases an office in the suite of offices used by ABC, for which ABC charges Sam $3,000 per month. The ABC receptionist greets all clients of ABC and Sam. Sam uses the ABC firm name and telephone number on his letterhead. Sam bills his clients directly for his services. Sam also receives 10% of the annual profits of ABC in recognition of his value to the firm.

After work one day, Amy was driving in heavy traffic to attend a baseball game when she received an urgent email from an ABC client. While briefly stopped in traffic, Amy attempted to answer the email on her work-provided cell phone. Due to this distraction, Amy negligently caused a car accident that was the actual and proximate cause of serious injuries to the other driver, Priya.

Priya sued Amy, ABC, Bob, Carl, and Sam for damages arising from the car accident.

Which of these defendants might reasonably be found liable for damages arising from Priya's car accident and why? Discuss.

QUESTION 1: SELECTED ANSWER A

1. Amy's liability to Priya

Amy is clearly personally liable to Priya for the injuries Priya suffered. To be liable under negligence, four elements must be met: (1) the defendant must have owed the plaintiff a duty; (2) the duty must have been breached; and (3) the breach must have been the actual and proximate cause of (4) the plaintiff's injuries (i.e., damages are required). Here, it is clear that all four elements are met. Therefore, Amy is liable to Priya.

As we are told, Amy "negligently" caused a car accident that was the actual and proximate cause of serious injuries to Priya. In other words, we were told that three of the four negligence elements are met here: (1) breach of duty (given that Amy "negligently" caused the crash); (2) causation (both actual and proximate); and (3) damages (we are told that Priya suffered serious injuries) Therefore, the only question here is whether Amy owed a duty to Priya. All persons owe a duty to all foreseeable plaintiffs; i.e., to those within the zone of danger created by the defendant's actions. Here, in operating a vehicle, Amy owed a duty to all the other drivers on the road (at least those within the "zone of danger" created by Amy's actions, i.e., those within her immediate vicinity). Given that Amy collided with Priya, it is clear that Priya was within this zone of danger. Thus, all four negligence elements (duty, breach, causation, damages) are present here, and Amy is therefore liable to Priya.

Note that Amy's status as a partner at ABC law firm will not insulate her from liability. For one, general partnerships do not provide their partners with limited liability (as will be addressed in greater depth below). Second, even with business entities that provide limited liability, member/partners remain liable for their own personal actions (and here, Amy is personally liable). Third, the policy requiring immediate response will not serve to protect Amy from liability (i.e., there is no relevant negligence defense that this policy might trigger). Lastly, because we are provided with no facts indicating that Priya was negligent herself, Amy will likely not have any valid defenses (such as comparative or contributory negligence).

In short, Priya is likely to prevail against Amy.

2. ABC's liability

Partnerships are distinct legal entities from their partners. Nonetheless, a partnership will still be liable for the tortious conduct of its partners when the partners were acting in the ordinary course of the partnership business. Partners are the agents of the partnership. When determining whether a partner was acting in the course of the partnership business, we look to the following factors: (1) whether the partner was "on the job" (i.e., acting within the spatial and temporal bounds of their work); (2) whether they were performing work of the kind they perform for the partnership; and (3) whether the partner was acting to further the partnership business. For the reasons outlined below, ABC is liable to Priya.

Here, Amy negligently caused a crash while attempting to answer an email from an ABC client. Though ABC may try to argue that Amy was acting outside the scope of the partnership business, that is simply not true. As we were told, ABC provides all its attorneys with cell phones to facilitate "prompt" attorney-client communications. Moreover, ABC has a policy requiring all firm attorneys to carry their work-provided phones with them at all times and that all client emails must be responded to "immediately." Therefore, in attempting to respond to an "urgent email" from a firm client while sitting in traffic (i.e., immediately, as per firm policy), Amy was acting within the ordinary course of the partnership business (she was performing the kind of work she performs for the partnership (dealing with client matters) and was acting to further the partnership business (by responding to a firm client). Furthermore, given the aforementioned policy, ABC cannot even claim that it is not liable because Amy should not have been responding to emails while driving. Based on the information we are provided with, it appears as though the policy's mandate was absolute: attorneys must respond "immediately," seemingly irrespective of the circumstances. Perhaps Amy exceeded the scope of the policy when she attempted to "answer" the email instead of simply sending a personal acknowledgement of receipt (as was permitted by the policy), but I do not believe this will be a winning argument.

Moreover, it is true that Amy was responding to the email after work hours on her way to a baseball game. Thus, ABC may try to argue that Amy was not acting in the ordinary course of the partnership business at the time of the accident, as she was acting outside the spatial/temporal bounds of her work as a partner at ABC. However, as was mentioned above, the policy at issue here appears to be absolute in its mandate: firm attorneys must carry their work-provided phones with them at "all times" and respond to "all client emails ... immediately ...." Thus, it appears as though there are no spatial or temporal bounds when it comes to working for ABC law firm; a firm attorney (such as Amy) can be working within the bounds of their position at any hour of the day at any location.

Therefore, ABC will likely be found liable for the damages Priya suffered.

3. Bob and Carl's liability

As we were told, Bob and Carl are Amy's partners in the ABC law firm. Moreover, we are told that ABC is a general partnership, a business entity that does not provide its partners with limited liability. In other words, general partners are personally liable for partnership obligations. Partners are jointly and severally liable for partnership obligations; however, they are only liable as guarantors. Therefore, a plaintiff with a claim against the partnership must first exhaust partnership assets before she can recover from the partners themselves. Moreover, partners must be personally served before a plaintiff can recover against them. A partner who has to pay a plaintiff in her personal capacity has the right to indemnification from the partnership and/or contribution from her fellow co-partners (in the event that the partnership cannot indemnify her).

As was argued above, ABC is liable for Amy's actions at issue here. Therefore, Bob and Carl (and, of note, Amy) - as partners in a general partnership - are personally liable for the obligations of ABC law firm. Therefore, Priya may be able to recover from Bob and Carl (and Amy) in their personal capacity, assuming that ABC's assets are insufficient to cover its liability to Priya. If ABC's assets are insufficient, Priya can recover from Bob, Carl, and Amy personally (assuming she properly serves them). Then, if any individual party pays more than their fair share, they can seek indemnification from the firm or contribution from their fellow co-partners.

Therefore, because of their status as general partners in a general partnership, Bob and Carl may be held personally liable to Priya.

4. Sam's liability

Sam's liability turns on whether Sam can be properly classified as a partner in the ABC law firm. Though Sam is not a party to the written ABC partnership agreement, he may nevertheless be a partner. A general partnership is created whenever two or more persons carry on as co-owners to a business for profit. The partners need not have a subjective intent to form a partnership agreement, nor does any agreement have to be in writing (except where required under the Statute of Frauds). Rather, the relevant intent here is as follows: an intent to carry on as co-owners a business for profit. Where the parties' intent is unclear, the court looks to the following circumstances: (1) whether profits are shared (profit sharing creates a rebuttable presumption of a partnership; (2) whether the parties have the right to participate in the management of the business; and (3) whether losses are split. For the reasons outlined below, Sam is properly classified as a partner (and, for the reasons outlined above, is therefore personally liable to Priya as a guarantor).

Here, it appears clear enough that none of the parties subjectively intended for Sam to be a partner in ABC (otherwise, why not add him to the partnership agreement?). However, that fact alone is not dispositive. As we are told, Sam receives 10% of the annual profits of ABC in "recognition of his value to the firm." Sam's sharing in the profits creates a rebuttable presumption that Sam is, in fact, a partner in the ABC law firm. The rest of the facts provided only serve to further boost this presumption (instead of rebutting it). First, we are told that ABC believes that "Sam's presence raises" its profile and prestige; therefore, even ABC acknowledges that some relationship exists between Sam and ABC (apart from the tenant-landlord relationship that exists by virtue of the fact that Sam leases an office in ABC's office space). Second, we are told that an ABC receptionist greets all clients of both ABC and Sam, and that Sam uses the ABC firm name and telephone number of his letterhead. Third, we are told that Sam leases an office within ABC's suite of offices (i.e., he is working among ABC's firm attorneys). Though Sam bills his clients directly and pays rent to ABC for his office space - perhaps indicating an intent to carry on his own separate business - the evidence discussed above (the joint receptionist, the use of the firm name and phone number on the letterhead, the receipt of 10% of ABC's annual profits, ABC's belief that Sam's presence raises its profile) strongly weighs in favor of finding that Sam is, in fact, a partner at ABC.

Therefore, because Sam is a partner at ABC, he is personally liable to Priya for the same reasons that Bob and Carl are liable - as partners in a general partnership, they are personally (and jointly and severally liable) for all partnership obligations. Thus, because ABC is liable for Amy's actions, all of its partners are also liable.

5. Conclusion

In short, everyone here is liable: Amy is personally liable as the tortfeasor (and may also be liable as a partner); ABC is liable for the actions of its partner Amy; Bob and Carl are personally liable as Amy's co-partners; and lastly, Sam is liable as a partner of ABC as well.

Negligence by Amy

The issue is whether Amy may be found liable for negligence for the damages to Priya arising from the car accident to Priya. Negligence is a tort with four elements. The plaintiff must show that 1) the defendant had a duty to people such as herself (eg, that she was a foreseeable plaintiff), 2) that the defendant breached this duty by violating the standard of care that would be shown by a reasonably prudent person under the circumstances, 3) that this breach was the actual and proximate cause of 4) an injury. Here, Amy was driving in heavy traffic. When she briefly stopped, she attempted to answer an email on her phone and crashed into Priya. Drivers generally have a duty to other drivers on the road, and in heavy traffic, it is foreseeable that distraction or inadvertence would cause a car crash. Amy therefore had a duty to Priya as a fellow driver that she breached by negligently checking her phone. We know from the facts that this breach was the proximate and actual cause of serious injury to Priya, satisfying the remaining elements of negligence. Therefore, Amy is directly liable for the damage to Priya and Priya may recover money damages from her.

Vicarious liability of ABC

Partnerships are a type of business entity formed whenever two or more people carry on as co-owners of a business for profit. No formal paperwork must be filed to create a partnership; a general partnership is formed whenever the criteria are met, even if the co-owners did not intend to form a partnership.

Here, ABC is a law firm operating under a general partnership agreement, so it is clearly a partnership.

The issue is whether the partnership entity is vicariously liable for Amy's tortuous action. To answer this, we must determine whether Amy was acting as an agent of the partnership when she committed the tort.

A principal may be liable for the actions of its agent when the agent is acting in the scope of their agency or employment (respondeat superior). Partners are agents of their partnership and in the law firm context, also employees. If a partner commits a tort while acting in the scope of their employment, the partnership will be held liable. The scope of employment is determined by looking at whether the employee was doing the kind of thing she was employed to do at the time of the tort. An employee who takes a brief break or deviation from work will still be held to be within the scope of employment (known as a detour), while one who entirely abandons their employer’s purpose to follow their own will be held outside the scope of employment (a frolic).

Here, Amy was driving to attend a baseball game. Since there is no indication that Amy was attending this game for firm-related reasons, the partnership will try to argue that she was acting outside the scope of her employment when the accident occurred or engaged in a frolic. However, this position will likely fail based on other facts. ABC provides all its attorneys with cell phones in order to facilitate prompt attorney-client communications. ABC also has a policy that all firm attorneys must carry these work-provided cell phones with them at all times and respond to client emails immediately. When Amy answered an email while in heavy traffic, she was complying with this strict policy of the firm and doing firm work, placing her actions within the scope of her employment. While the firm may argue that it never required its attorneys to answer emails in unsafe situations, it is rarely the case that an employee who commits a tort was instructed to do so in clear terms--this will not save the partnership from liability. A firm that demands its employees be "on" at all times cannot then complain that its employees were doing firm business in an usual situation.

The partnership is vicariously liable for Amy's tort, meaning that Priya may collect damages from the partnership assets. (Note that the partnership's vicarious liability does not absolve Amy of her personal liability for the tort.)

An employer may be held directly liable for the actions of its employees based on its negligent hiring, training, or supervision of those employees. The standard, as in all negligence, is whether the hiring, training, or supervision was not reasonable under the circumstances, breaching a duty to a foreseeable plaintiff (and causing injury).

While there is no indication that anything in Amy's background made the partnership negligent in hiring her as an attorney, Priya could try to argue that ABC negligently trained and supervised Amy. Her argument would center on the requirements that ABC attorneys carry their phones at all times and must answer messages immediately. Priya could argue that this creates a risk of accidents like the one that happened to her and that a reasonable employer under the circumstances would have trained its employee to only check their phones in safe circumstances. However, this argument is somewhat far-fetched, since something like this generally goes without saying. A claim of direct liability by ABC would probably fail.

Personal liability of the ABC Partners, Bob and Carl

Now that we know the partnership itself is vicariously liable for Amy's conduct, we must ask whether Amy's partners are liable for her conduct in their personal capacities. Unlike other business forms, general partnerships do not provide limited liability to the partners-.Partners are jointly and severally liable for the liabilities of the partnership, even if the partner was not at all involved in the wrongdoing, so long as the partner was individually sued. However, individual partner assets will not be reached until partnership assets are exhausted.

In this case, ABC is a general partnership and Bob and Carl are partners, sued in their personal capacity by Priya. Priya will be able to recover damages from them, but only if the partnership assets are unable to cover her damages.

Partnership liability of Sam

Understanding that Bob and Carl are liable as partners, we next consider whether Sam will be liable as a partner of the ABC law firm. As discussed above, a person may be a member of a partnership without explicitly intending to be one or being part of a formal partnership agreement. The main factor considered in determining who is a partner is whether profits (as opposed to gross earnings) are shared with the individual. It is not a requirement of a partnership that profits be shared equally. Other factors are also relevant, including whether the partnership holds the individual out as a partner, whether they share facilities and employees, whether they share clients, and how they interact with those clients. The determination will be made looking at all the circumstances.

Here, on the facts, Sam is likely to be considered a partner of the ABC partnership. First and most importantly, Sam shares profits with ABC--he receives 10% of their annual profit. Sam might argue that if he were really a partner of a four-person partnership, he would receive 25% profits, an equal share. But while equal sharing is a default rule, partners may modify it.

The partnership appears to hold Sam out as a partner. He has a suite within ABC's offices and the same ABC receptionist greets clients of both Sam and ABC. He uses the ABC firm name and telephone number on his letterhead. ABC believes that Sam's presence raises the profile and prestige of ABC, suggesting that this appearance that Sam is associated with ABC is intentional and intended to profit ABC (which in turn profits Sam to a tune of 10% a year.)

Sam does have a few countervailing facts on his side. He can point to the fact that ABC charges him rent of $3,000 per month for his office space, an act that seems inconsistent with him being a partner, since the other partners do not pay rent. He may point out that he bills his clients directly and does not share his own profits with ABC. These facts are probably not enough to tip the balance in Sam's favor, however, considering how closely associated Sam and ABC are. At the end of the day, Sam is unlikely to be able to reap the benefits of association with the partnership without paying the cost of liability for its actions.

Therefore, Sam will be treated as a partner of ABC and also be held liable for Amy's tort. As with Bob and Carl, Sam's assets may only be reached once the partnership assets are exhausted.

To sum up: Priya may recover damages from Amy and the partnership, and if the partnership's assets are not sufficient, she may recover from Bob, Carl, and Sam as partners.

DishWay developed a new dishwasher powder that it named UltraKlean. The company advertised widely that UltraKlean was “a revolutionary, safe product with the most powerful cleaning agent ever.” This advertisement accurately represented that UltraKlean contained a new cleaning agent that made the product more effective than other dishwasher powders.

DishWay knew the cleaning agent could cause severe stomach pain if ingested, but this is true of all detergent products. What DishWay did not know was that a potentially dangerous amount of UltraKlean residue tended to remain on aluminum cookware after a wash cycle. It is not unusual for dishwasher powders to leave a harmless amount of residue on different surfaces. During product development, DishWay tested UltraKlean on some surfaces but not on aluminum because there was no indication that it would work differently on aluminum than on other surfaces. The residue was not detectable to the eye, and there was no flaw in DishWay’s manufacturing process. DishWay’s instructions on the product only stated that the product should not be ingested.

Paul purchased a box of UltraKlean from DishWay. The first time he used it was to wash some aluminum pots. The next day, Paul used several of those pots to prepare a meal. Shortly after finishing the meal, Paul experienced severe stomach pain, which required him to be hospitalized. Laboratory test results revealed the cleaning agent in UltraKlean caused Paul’s stomach pain.

What products liability claims may Paul bring against DishWay? Discuss.

QUESTION 2: SELECTED ANSWER A

Paul v. Dishway

Products Liability

A plaintiff may bring a products liability claim under five different claims: (1) strict products liability, (2) negligent products liability, (3) warranty, (4) misrepresentation, and (5) intent.

Strict products liability

To recover for strict products liability, a plaintiff must show: (1) Defendant was a commercial supplier, (2) product was defective, (3) actual cause, (4) proximate cause, and (5) damages.

Commercial Supplier

A defendant is a commercial supplier where he puts a product in the stream of commerce without substantial alteration.

Here, DishWay is the developer of UltraKlean. Dishway puts UltraKlean in commerce because they make it available for consumers like Paul to purchase a box. There is no alteration as DishWay sells UltraKlean directly after its development to consumers.

Thus, DishWay is a commercial supplier.

Product was Defective

A plaintiff can show that a product was defective under three theories: (1) manufacturing defect,

(2) design defect, and (3) failure to warn.

Manufacturing Defect

A plaintiff can show that there was a manufacturing defect where the product deviates from the intended design of the product, thus subjecting users to harm.

Here, there are no facts to suggest that the box of UltraKlean purchased by Paul deviated from the intended design of UltraKlean. It was not unusual for dishwasher powders to leave residue on different surfaces. DishWay tested UltraKlean on some surfaces, but failed to test on aluminum surfaces and did not design UltraKlean to specifically not leave residue on aluminum pots. Additionally, there was no flaw in DishWay's manufacturing process.

Thus, it is unlikely that Paul would succeed in showing a manufacturing defect in UltraKlean.

Design Defect

A design defect can be shown where the product has a common feature with other products within the same line of product that poses a risk of harm to consumers. Under the consumer expectation test, a design defect can be shown where a product fails to conform to the safety expectations of an ordinary consumer. Under the risk-utility test, a design defect can be shown where a product's utility is outweighed by a risk of harm.

Using the consumer expectation test, an ordinary consumer would expect that he could use a dishwasher powder to wash his aluminum pots without ingesting a dangerous amount of residue that would cause physical injury. Here, Paul used UltraKlean to wash some aluminum pots. After use, Paul used the pots to prepare a meal and experienced stomach pain that required him to be hospitalized. Thus, Paul could argue that his expectation as an ordinary consumer was not met. DishWay can argue, however, that it is true of all detergent products that severe stomach pain can occur after use. DishWay can argue that it is expected that every once in a while, a user of dishwasher powder will experience pain after use. However, Paul can argue that he suffered pain after the first use of UltraKlean, creating an inference that UltraKlean subjects users to stomach pain more often than average rate of all detergent products.

Using the risk-utility test, the risks of product use must be weighed against the product's utility. Here, the risk is that using UltraKlean to wash pots will leave residue that can cause internal stomach pain when using the pots later. The utility of the product is the ability to clean more effectively than other dishwasher powders in the market. Paul can argue that the risk of pain that a user subjects himself to when using UltraKlean is outweighed by UltraKlean's utility. Though having the best cleaning agent is beneficial, it is not necessary to have such effective cleaning power if it subjects users to pain while other dishwasher powders do not.

Thus, it is likely that Paul can show design defect under the consumer expectation test and risk-utility test.

Failure to Warn

Under failure to warn, a plaintiff must show that the product subjected users to harm, such harm was not obvious to users, and the defendant knew of such risk of harm.

Here, as mentioned above, UltraKlean subjected Paul to harm after use. The harm was not obvious to Paul because UltraKlean residue is not detectable to the eye and there were no instructions on the box to use a specified amount per wash. The instructions only said that the product should not be ingested. However, the facts state that Dishway did not know that a potentially dangerous amount of UltraKlean residue tended to remain on aluminum cookware after a wash cycle. Paul can argue, however, that as a developer of dishwasher powders, DishWay should have known of the risk of harm because Dishway knew that indeed residue is left on aluminum cookware, that this substance can be dangerous if ingested, and their instructions mention that the product should not be ingested.

Though it's a close call, Paul may be able to argue that UltraKlean was defective because it failed to warn.

Actual Cause

Plaintiff must show that but for the use of defendant's product, plaintiff would not have been harmed.

Here, presumably Paul was healthy before using UltraKlean. After using UltraKlean to clean some aluminum pots, Paul used the pots to cook a meal and subsequently suffered severe stomach pain that required him to be hospitalized. If Paul did not use UltraKlean to clean the pots, he would not have been harmed after using the pots. The laboratory test results specifically revealed the cleaning agent in UltraKlean caused Paul's stomach pain.

Thus, Paul can show actual cause.

Proximate Cause

Plaintiff must show that his injury was a foreseeable result of from the product use. A supervening cause is an unforeseeable event that cuts off defendant's liability after the occurrence of the event.

Here, Paul will argue that it was foreseeable that he would suffer harm after using Dishway's UltraKlean dishwasher powder that left dangerous residue. However, DishWay may argue that Paul did not use the product in a foreseeable manner. DishWay may argue that Paul failed to use UltraKlean with a sufficient amount of water or with water for a sufficient amount of time. If Paul did so, Paul would have consumed the powder more directly, obviously subjecting him to harm. However, no such facts are explicitly stated.

Thus, it is likely that Paul can show proximate cause.

Damages

A plaintiff may recover damages to compensate his harm. Compensatory damages must be causal, foreseeable, certain, and unavoidable.

Here, Paul suffered severe stomach pain that caused him to be hospitalized.

Thus, Paul can recover for hospital fees, medication to alleviate pain and contamination in his stomach. However, Paul cannot recover from economic harm.

Conclusion

Thus, Paul is likely to recover for strict products liability as he is able to show that DishWay is a commercial supplier, UltraKlean is defective, actual cause, proximate cause, and damages.

Negligent Products Liability

To recover for negligent products liability, a plaintiff must show (1) a duty was owed, (2) breach of the duty, (3) actual cause, (4) proximate cause, and (5) damages.

Duty

A plaintiff must show that defendant owed a duty to the plaintiff. Under the majority rule, a duty is owed to all plaintiffs within the foreseeable zone of danger. Under the minority rule, a duty is owed to all plaintiffs.

Here, a duty was owed because DishWay developed a dishwasher powder that it then sold in boxes to consumers. It is foreseeable that users of DishWay's product can be harmed from the use of the product.

Therefore, under both the majority and minority rule, a duty is owed by DishWay to Paul.

Breach

A plaintiff must show that defendant failed to conform is conduct to a specific standard of care. A developer of a product owes a duty of care to act as a reasonably prudent developer under like circumstances.

Here Dishway did not know of the potentially dangerous amount of UltraKlean residue that tended to remain on aluminum cookware after a wash cycle. However, Paul will argue that Dishway should have known of such risks. DishWay should've conducted tests to determine whether dangerous residue was a possibility. Though DishWay tested UltraKlean on some surfaces, they failed to test on aluminum because they believed that UltraKlean wouldn't work differently on aluminum.

Thus, Paul can likely show that DishWay breached its duty by failing to specifically test UltraKlean's performance on aluminum surfaces.

Actual Cause

See above in Actual Cause section for strict products liability.

Proximate Cause

See above in Proximate Cause section for strict products liability.

Damages

See above in Damages section for strict products liability.

Conclusion

Thus, it is likely that Paul can recover for negligent products liability as he can show that a duty was owed, DishWay breached such duty, actual cause, proximate cause, and damages.

Warranty

A plaintiff may recover for warranty under express warranty or implied warranty.

Express Warranty

A plaintiff may recover when defendant makes explicit statements concerning the product and the product fails to conform to those standards.

Here, UltraKlean expressly stated that UltraKlean was a "revolutionary, safe product with the most powerful cleaning agent ever." DishWay also represented that UltraKlean contained an agent that made the product more effective than other dishwasher powders. Paul will argue that UltraKlean failed to be a safe product. Upon first use of the product to clean his aluminum pots, Paul suffered severe stomach pains. Paul may argue that he used other dishwasher powders from other companies in the past and did not suffer such harm. The facts do not indicate whether UltraKlean was more effective at cleaning than other dishwasher powders.

Thus, Paul can likely recover for express warranty based on DishWay's express warranty that UltraKlean was a revolutionary, safe product.

Implied Warranty

A warranty is implied in the sale of goods that the goods conform to the ordinary expectations of ordinary consumers.

Here, a consumer would expect that he could use UltraKlean to clean cookware without suffering stomach pain after using the cleaned cookware. Paul's expectation as a consumer was not met as he suffered harm from the use of UltraKlean.

Thus, Paul could recover under implied warranty.

Misrepresenation

To recover for misrepresentation, a plaintiff must show that a (1) false statement of past or existing fact was made by defendant, (2) the statement was made with an intention to induce reliance on the statement, and (3) plaintiff did in fact rely on the statement.

False Statement

Here, a false statement by DishWay was made when it represented that its product, UltraKlean, was a revolutionary, safe product.

Intention to Induce Reliance

Here, it can be presumed that DishWay intended for consumers to see its advertisement, rely on the representations, and thus purchase more UltraKlean.

Statement Induced Reliance

Paul may have seen the advertisement and relied on the representations when buying UltraKlean.

Thus, if Paul did see DishWay's advertisement and relied on its statements when buying UltraKlean, Paul can recover for misrepresentation.

Intent

A plaintiff may recover under an intent theory for products liability if the defendant intended for the product to cause harm.

Here, DishWay did not know of the potentially dangerous amount of UltraKlean residue that remained on aluminum cookware.

Thus, Paul is unlikely to recover under the intent theory.

Overall Conclusion

Paul can likely recover under strict products liability, negligent products liability, express warranty, implied warranty, and misrepresentation.

QUESTION 2: SELECTED ANSWER B

Products Liability:

A plaintiff seeking to go after and sue a commercial supplier/manufacturer of a product can raise different claims such as 1) strict products claim 2) negligent products claim and 3) breach of warranty claim.

Strict Products Claim:

A commercial supplier can be held strictly liable for defective products that cause damage to a foreseeable user.

Commercial Supplier:

A commercial supplier is one who puts a product in the stream of commerce. Here, DishWay is the company who developed the new dishwasher powder named UltraKlean. The company not only advertised this product widely, but sold it in stores as Paul(P) purchased a box of it from Dishway. Thus, Dishway is a commercial supplier for the purpose of bringing a strict products liability claim and thus can be held strictly liable if all the other elements are met.

Defective Product:

Plaintiff must prove that the product they purchased was defective. A product can be defective in three ways 1) manufacturing defect 2) design defect or 3) failure to warn.

Manufacturing Defect:

This occurs where a product, a single product, deviated from the intended way the product should have been manufactured per the specifications. Here, Disway developed a new dishwasher powder and named it UltraKlean. Dishway was made as a cleaning agent and was advertised as a new cleaning agent that made the product more effective than other dishwasher products. Thus, Dishway manufactured this product as a whole as a cleaning agent to be used by consumers on different surfaces. The facts do not indicate that Dishway's product that was sold to P deviated from the specific intended manufacturing design, as it was produced like every other Ultraklean product sold. In fact, there was no flaw in Dishway's manufacturing process. The defect of Ultraklean seems to be toward the product as a whole and not the specific one sold to P.

Design Defect:

A design defect arises where the product itself, as a whole, was defective when it was designed and should not have been manufactured in that way. There are two tests the court will use to determine if there was a design defect 1) consumer expectation test and 2) risk utility test. Here, P will argue that there was a design defect in the product UltraKlean itself thus rendering the product defective.

Consumer Expectation Test:

Under the consumer expectation test, the product will be defective if it fails to meet ordinary consumer expectations of the product when used in its proper manner. However, even unforeseeable uses of the product still can render the product defective as it is foreseeable consumers may misuse the product in some fashion. Thus, under CET, the product must fail what an ordinary user would expect when using the product. Here, P purchased Ultraklean and he used it to wash some aluminum pots. This product as a cleaning agent, can be and is foreseeable that a consumer would use it on pots, even those of aluminum material. Many pots are in fact made out of aluminum, thus Paul reasonably and foreseeably used the product as intended. Moreover, as a consumer, this product failed to meet reasonable expectations because P and other consumers would not expect to experience severe stomach pain from merely using a cleaning agent in its intended manner. Cleaning agents are meant to effectively clean the pots or kitchen utensils, so it is safe and clean enough to rinse off of. The product used to clean the pots should not be nor would it be reasonably expected for such products to be the factor that causes consumers to get sick. In fact, Dishway advertised that the product is new and more effective than other dishwasher powders. Thus, P as a reasonable consumer who used the product in its intended manner can argue that this product has a design defect because it fails the consumer expectation test because one should not get sick from a product advertised to be effective and clean when used in dishwasher.

Risk Utility Test:

Under this test, the courts will balance the risk of the harm of product and providing different designs and the costs of changing the design to the manufacturer. Here, there are many different alternatives Dishway could have implemented to ensure the safety of the product and reduced the likelihood of harm to consumers. For instance, Dishway knew the cleaning agent could cause severe stomach pain if ingested, but chucked it up to the fact that all detergent products can. Instead, Dishway should have tested the product on all types of foreseeable dishwasher products, such as all pots, pans, plates, made out of various different materials to ensure the safety of the product on all types. Each household has different types of pots, some are aluminum such as P. Given that Dishway knew the cleaning agent could cause severe pain, they should have tested their product on all types of pots before placing it in the stream of commerce. Testing it on different surfaces would not have costed Dishway an exceptional amount nor would it take too much time to simply test their product on all common materials used in dishwashers that are prevalent in homes. Thus, P will argue Dishway failed the RUT because they did not test the product on all common types of surfaces used in homes and doing so would not cost the company too much money or time. When balancing the risk and utility of the product, merely taking more time during the product development stage to test the chemical on other known surfaces is not too much of a burden on the company and can save many consumers from physical injuries. Moreover, if Dishway did test the product on all surfaces, they could have found that the residue was on the surfaces and could have tested whether that amount could cause any harm. From there, they could have altered the exact chemicals in the cleaning agent powder to ensure if any residue amount was left, it would not harm a consumer. There are many alternative designs or means Dishway could have done to mitigate the risk of harm to consumers yet chose not to simply because they did not have an indication that it would work differently on aluminum nor was it detectable to the eye. Thus, P will be able to show that Dishway failed the RUT and their product was defective by design.

A manufacturer can also be held liable for a defective product based on the failure to warn theory. This is where a product does not have specific warnings placed on the product indicating certain harms that could results that are not of ordinary nature or that one would expect. Here, Dishway advertised their product as "new cleaning agent that made the product more effective than other dishwasher powders". The only warning was Dishway's instructions on the product that stated the product should not be ingested. P will argue that this warning was ineffective and incomplete. The warning does not indicate what would happen if someone ingests the product nor does it say the amount one would ingest that would cause pain. In fact, the warning does not even state what type of harm would result from ingesting the product. Given that this product is placed in the dishwasher and used to clean pots/plates that people eat off of, this warning is inadequate because a consumer is bound to ingest part of the product given that it is used to clean kitchenware. Thus, Dishway had an ineffective warning and failed to fully warn consumers about the dangers of ingesting certain amounts of the product and the results that would incur if ingested.

Causation:

A manufacturer will be strictly liable for the defective product if the product is the cause of Plaintffs (pf's)harm. Here, but for pf using Dishway's new cleaning agent he would not have suffered from severe stomach pain when ingested. Furthermore, Dishway in failing to ensure the product was designed safely and effectively, was the proximate cause of Pf's harm because Dishway's failure to ensure the product was safe before putting it in stores substantially led to P buying said product and suffering stomach pains. Moreover, after going to the hospital, the lab tests revealed that the cleaning agent in Ultraklean caused P's stomach pain. Thus, Dishway is strictly liable for P's harm as they were the cause of the harm.

Damages:

Pf must also show damages from the defective product. Here, Paul experienced severe stomach pain, which required him to be hospitalized. Thus, P suffered physical pain.

Therefore, P may be able to successfully bring a strict products liability claim against Dishway based on design defect and failure to warn.

Defenses:

Dishway may argue that P, as a consumer, assumed the risk that he could suffer from stomach pains. Dishway will point to the fact that it is commonly known and true that all detergent products can cause stomach pain if ingested. However, P will argue that he did not voluntarily and knowingly assume this risk. This risk was ambiguously stated in the instructions to not ingest but did not expressly state what the result would be. Moreover, P did not voluntarily assume this risk because Dishway did not even know of this risk because the residue was not detectable to the eye and they had no indication that it would work differently on aluminum. Thus, there is no possible way that P assumed this risk since it was not openly known to him when he purchased the product.

Negligent Product Liability:

A pf can bring a negligent product liability claim against a manufacturer. The elements needed to bring such a claim are 1) duty 2) breach 3) causation and 4) damages.

Duty:

A commercial supplier, like Dishway, has a duty to be a reasonably prudent manufacturer and supply a safe product for its intended consumers. Dishway owes this duty to any foreseeable consumer as well as bystanders. Here, Dishway had a duty to be a reasonably prudent dishwasher cleaning agent manufacturer and owed this standard of care to P, who is a foreseeable consumer as he bought the product at their store.

Breach:

A breach occurs when the manufacturer's actions fall below the applicable standard of care. Here, P will argue that Dishway breached their duty and was negligent in placing this product in stream of commerce because they did not adequately test the product's safety. First, Dishway knew prior to placing the product in stores that the cleaning agent could cause severe stomach pain if ingested. Despite this knowledge, Dishway still did not test the product on all different surfaces used in a home. Dishway decided not to test on aluminum simply because they thought there was no indication that it would work differently. Dishway will argue that all cleaning agents could cause severe stomach pain if ingested and thus they did not breach this standard of care simply by not testing it on all products. However, P will argue that Dishway's conduct fell below the applicable standard of a cleaning agent manufacturer because as a manufacturer dealing with chemicals and cleaning agents, they had a duty to ensure the product was reasonably safe on all surfaces and had the duty to test the product. Just because they did not think or have any indication that other surfaces such as aluminum would be different, does no negate their duty. They had a duty as a reasonable product manufacturer to at least test the product on known surfaces used in kitchens before placing product in a stream of commerce.

Causation:

As discussed above, Dishway is the cause of P's harm.

Damages:

As discussed above, P suffered severe stomach pain which resulted in hospitalization.

Thus, P will be able to successfully bring a negligent products claim against Dishway.

Defenses:

Contributory Negligence/Comparative:

Under this, a pf can be barred from any recovery from a Defendant (def) if they were negligent themselves. Here, Dishway will argue that P was negligent as he did not read the warning that the product should not be ingested. However, this will likely fail as discussed above. P did not assume this risk in any manner as he did not know that stomach pain would result from using this product in its intended purpose. Thus, it is unlikely that P will be found negligent on his part at all. In fact, many jurisdictions have strayed away from contributory negligence and modernly apply comparative negligence. Under comparative negligence, a pf is not completely barred if they are found to have been negligent in some manner. Here, based on P's actions, it does not appear he will be found negligent at all because he did not assume the risk of stomach pain from using the product on simple aluminum pots that are commonly used in kitchens. Thus, these defenses will likely fail.

Warranties:

A pf may also bring a breach of warranty claim against a def. There are different types of warranties such as 1) express warranties 2) implied warranty of merchantability and 3) implied warranty of fitness for particular purpose.

Express Warranty:

This is where the commercial supplier expressly in words or actions states/guarantees the product's efficiency. Here, Dishway created an express warranty to P as they advertised Ultraklean to be the new cleaning agent that made the product more effective than other dishwasher powders.

Moreover, Dishway also advertised that Ultraklean was a “safe product”. Here, Dishway made an express warranty/promise that this product was efficient for a consumer to use as a cleaning agent. P will argue this warranty was breach because the product was in fact not effective nor safe because it left residue on the pots that are harmful and caused him severe stomach pain. Moreover, in the ad, there are no disclaimers as to this express warranty thus P rightfully relied on this warranty that the cleaning agent would be the most efficient dishwasher powder, when in fact it was not because it left harmful amounts of residue causing P to be hospitalized.

Implied Warranty of Merchantability:

Under this, the manufacturer impliedly guarantees the quality of the product and that is it fit for the regular intended purpose. Here, Dishway impliedly warranted the dish powder was safe and effective and can be used in ordinary manner in a dishwasher. However, they breached this warranty as it did not contain safe amounts of chemical and left high amount of residue on pots causing stomach pain.

Thus, Pf can bring a breach of express warranty claim and IWM against Dishway.

Misrepresentation:

A pf can also bring a misrepresentation claim against the manufacturer. A misrepresentation is a false statement that was made to induce reliance on the pf and caused the pf to take such action, and under the circumstances, it was reasonable to rely on said misrepresentation. Here, Dishway misrepresented the quality of their product by claiming it was effective and safe. It was reliable for P to rely on this information because Dishway put this misrepresentation in all of their ads for consumers to read.

Laura is general counsel for MoreHome Mortgage Company (MoreHome), a California corporation. Eric is an entry-level mortgage advisor at MoreHome.

Eric approached Laura and gave Laura a package of documents that he obtained through his position at MoreHome. The documents demonstrate that MoreHome employees are falsifying the financial history of many mortgage applicants so they can qualify for mortgages they could not otherwise obtain. The documents also show that it is MoreHome's policy to push risky mortgages onto unsuspecting customers.

Eric confided in Laura that he was troubled to have learned of these practices himself and wanted Laura's legal advice on what do to. Eric said that he has never engaged in these practices himself and does not want Mianne, MoreHome's Chief Executive Officer (CEO), to learn of their discussion. Laura told Eric she would think about it and get back to him. Eric left all of the documents with Laura as she requested.

Laura knows that the practices shown in the documents and described by Eric constitute a crime under state law. Laura also knows that the State Attorney General is aggressively investigating similar practices by mortgage companies in the state, although Laura is not aware of whether MoreHome has been identified as a target for investigation.

Immediately after Eric left Laura's office, Laura called Mianne and informed her of Eric's visit and about Eric's concerns. Mianne instructed Laura not to do anything with the documents and to give them to Mianne. Laura consulted with outside counsel regarding what to do with the documents and based on that advice, and against Mianne's instructions, Laura provided copies of the documents to the State Attorney General.

What ethical violations, if any, has Laura committed? Discuss.

Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

QUESTION 3: SELECTED ANSWER A

Corporate Misconduct

When a lawyer learns of misconduct done by officers of the court they must not continue to allow their services to be used for a crime or fraud. The lawyer will also have a duty to report to higher ups in the corporation and sometimes to outside forces.

Here, the corporation performed significant misconduct in two ways. First, it falsified financial histories of applicants. As stated by the facts, Laura knew this was a crime under state law. Second, MoreHome enacted a policy that pushed risky mortgages onto unsuspecting customers. Again, we know from the facts that this is a crime that Laura knew about under state law. Thus, the corporation is acting in misconduct by committing crimes and Laura will have certain duties and obligations because of it.

Relevant duties and considerations will be discussed below.

Duty to Act in the Best Interests of the Corporation

When a lawyer is representing a company, they have unique obligations. First, they must always remember that their duties as an attorney remain with the company. Thus, under the Model Rules and the California rules, the attorney must always put the best interests of the corporation first.

Here, there is no indication that Laura acted without the best interests of the corporation in mind. She promptly reported the misconduct to the CEO and then reported this outside the company when Mianne failed to act (although this may violate her other duties as will be considered below). She likely reported all this misconduct to protect the business and the assets of the business from being fined or seized due to illegal conduct. This is the best interest of the corporation.

Mianne may try to argue that her best interest is the best interest of the corporation. However, lawyers do not even owe this duty to the CEO of the corporation, but rather to the corporation as a whole. Therefore, Laura did not breach her duty of loyalty when she disregarded Mianne's instructions and reported the misconduct out (although she might have breached other duties).

Therefore, Laura did not breach her duty to act in the best interest of the corporation.

Duties to Eric v.s. the Corporation

Because lawyer's best interests remain with the corporation, they must not put the interests of lower level employees above the corporation. They also have a duty to inform the employees that their interests remain with the corporation and must not act under the guise of prioritizing the lower level employees.

Here, Eric is surely a lower level employee because we know from the facts that he is an entry-level mortgage broker. He also approached Laura for legal advice, which she can give him unless it is against the interests of the corporation. She certainly could not represent both Eric and the corporation in a dispute between them. Laura, then, must not give him the impression that she is representing him in the matter or putting his best interests first.

Laura likely did not violate this obligation because she did not give Eric this impression. First, she did not give him any legal advice when he approached her about liability for the falsified history or policy. She merely told him that she would have to get back to him and then reported the misconduct. However, although she never told Eric that she represented him, a court would probably have preferred her to immediately and affirmatively disclose to Eric that she was the corporation's lawyer, not his.

Additionally, she acted in the best interest of the corporation over Eric's because she reported the misconduct to Mianne despite Eric's requesting that she not. The finding of the misconduct could potentially put Eric in a position of blame for the illegal conduct. Even though Eric asked her not to report it to Mianne, it was within Laura's ethical duties to put the interests of the corporation first.

Thus, Laura likely did not breach her duty to the corporation when she conferred with Eric about the corporate misconduct. However, she probably needed to confirm to Eric more affirmatively that she was not his lawyer nor had a duty to represent his best interests.

Duty of Confidentiality

Lawyers owe their clients a duty of confidentiality to not disclose confidential information to outside sources. Information is confidential when it is made privately to the attorney for the purpose of securing legal services. When representing a corporation, a lawyer does not owe a duty of confidentiality to lower-level employees when reporting to higher ups unless it is within the best interest of the corporation.

Here, Laura owes a duty of confidentiality to the corporation and higher-level employees in some cases. Because Eric is a lower-level employee (entry-level mortgage advisor) she does not owe him a duty of confidentiality when she is reporting to higher ups in the corporation. Even if she did owe him a duty, her duty to the corporation comes first. Therefore, even though Eric asked Laura not to tell Mianne about the misconduct, Laura did not breach her ethical duties when she reported to her higher ups about the misconduct that Eric brought to her.

However, Laura's duty of confidentiality is implicated in two other situations: (1) when she reported up about the misconduct and (2) when she reported out to the State Attorney General. They will be considered below.

Duty to Report to High Level Positions

When a lawyer learns about corporate misconduct, they have a duty to disclose the misconduct to people in high level positions within the corporation. Under the Model Rules, this duty is absolute as a duty to the corporation. However, under California, a lawyer still may not breach their duty of confidentiality when reporting the misconduct. Attorneys should also try to dissuade the corporate employees from committing the crimes or frauds.

Here, Laura likely acted properly when she reported the misconduct to Mianne because Mianne is the corporation's CEO. As explained above, she did not owe Eric a duty of confidentiality. She also owed it to the corporation to put its best interests first. Serious crimes being committed under its watch are certainly important to know for their best interest. Therefore, Laura did not violate her duties when she reported the misconduct to Mianne.

It might be argued that Laura should have also reported the misconduct to other high level employees, like a Board of Directors. However, there is no indication from the facts that any higher-level such employees exist. Therefore, Laura did not violate her duties.

Reporting Outside the Corporation

A lawyer may report corporate misconduct to outside sources in certain circumstances. First, the lawyer must prove that they first reported the misconduct to higher level positions in the organization. Only when the higher-level people refuse to act or fail to act, may an attorney then consider reporting outside the organization.

After that, there is a split in the Model Rules and California rules. Under the Model Rules, the attorney may report out if the attorney reasonably believes that the conduct will result in death or substantial bodily harm or if the misconduct will result in substantial financial harm to the corporation. The substantial financial harm exception is not permitted in California. Importantly too, a lawyer may not violate their duty of confidentiality when reporting out in California.

Here, Laura has a pretty good case for reporting out under the Model Rules. Because both the policy and the falsifying of the records are state law crimes, they are rather severe misconduct and could really hurt the corporation. Additionally, Laura knows that the State Attorney General is aggressively investigating similar practices, the chance that the corporation could be found out are rather high. Opponents may argue that she was not aware that MoreHome was identified so it is unlikely they were to be found out. However, aggressive pursuit of the same type of crime still results in a significantly high risk of being found out for criminal liability.

Exposure to criminal liability could result in plunging stock prices and huge decrease in revenue at best and forced termination of the corporation at worst. Both of these results are surely enough for Laura to believe that the corporation could sustain substantial financial harm, which makes violating the duty of confidentiality and reporting outside allowed under the rules.

However, as noted above, California does not allow the exception for substantial financial harm. Thus, in order for Laura to report out and violate her duty of confidentiality, she would have to prove that the misconduct could reasonably result in death or substantial bodily harm. There is no indication from the facts that this is even a conceivable possibility.

Therefore, Laura likely breached her duty under the California rules but acted appropriately under the Model Rules.

Permissive Withdrawal

Under the Model Rules, a lawyer may withdraw if the withdrawal will not materially harm the client's case. This is including if the lawyer finds the acts of the client so repugnant that it would materially affect their representation of the client.

However, the California rules do not allow withdrawal just because it will not materially harm the client. Despite this, a lawyer in California may withdraw from a case if their continuing representation would cause their services to be used in perpetuation of a crime or fraud.

Here, because Mianne is failing to act to rectify either crimes (the policy or the falsifying of history), Laura has a case to permissively withdraw. This is because if she stays on with the organization and it continues to commit crimes, Laura's services will surely be used in the commission of the crime or fraud. There is also no indication that Laura withdrawing will result in any material harm to the corporation (for example, there is no indication that there are current cases being litigated or cases pending). Therefore, Laura should permissively withdraw from representing MoreHome.

Mandatory Withdrawal

Under both the Model Rules and California rules, a lawyer must not assist a client in the commission of a crime or fraud. If a lawyer actually knows of the crime or fraud, they must withdraw from representation.

For the same reasons as above, it is likely that Laura's services will be used for the commission of a crime or fraud if she stays on as attorney. Therefore, she should withdraw from representing MoreHome.

Duty of Competence

Under the Model Rules, a lawyer must provide reasonably competent representation and legal services to their client. Under the California rules, a lawyer must abstain from intentionally, recklessly, with gross negligence, or repeatedly failing to provide competent legal services to their client.

Here, there is little indication that Laura fell below her duty of competence under the Model Rules, and thus, under the California rules since it is a lower standard. First, there is no indication that she did not act with reasonable care or with the competence of a reasonable lawyer. Even when she was not sure what to do, she consulted with outside counsel before moving forward with her actions. Therefore, Laura likely did not violate her duty of competence.

Duty to Communicate

A lawyer has a duty to communicate to their clients. This means regular and prompt communication about the state of their affairs, cases, and potential liability about acts.

Here, Laura has a duty to promptly communicate with her client the corporation about the status of their cases and representation. She likely met this duty because she was communicative and prompt with everyone she interacted with. She also promptly informed Mianne of the misconduct and promptly reported it out when Mianne refused to act. Therefore, Laura likely did not violate her duty to communicate.

Duty of Diligence

Under the Model Rules, a lawyer must provide reasonable diligent representation and legal services to their client. Under the California rules, a lawyer must abstain from intentionally, recklessly, with gross negligence, or repeatedly failing to provide diligent legal services to their client.

Just like for the duty of competence, it is unlikely that Laura violated this duty because she acted reasonably, competently, and promptly. Therefore, she likely did not violate her duty of diligence.

Conclusion

Under the Model Rules, Laura likely did not commit any ethical violations, except that she probably should have confirmed to Eric more affirmatively that she was not his lawyer nor had a duty to represent his best interests. However, under the California rules, Laura will likely be disciplined for her reporting of the misconduct to the State Attorney General because she is unable to prove prospect of death or substantial bodily harm. Finally, after learning about the crimes committed by the corporation, Laura should withdraw so her services are not used in the commission of a crime or fraud.

QUESTION 3: SELECTED ANSWER B

What ethical violations has Laura committed?

Lawyer for an Organization

Under both the ABA Model Rules (ABA) and the California Rules, attorneys of organizations are the attorney of the organization itself, not its constituents or officers. Consequently, they owe their duties and loyalty to the organization.

Here, Laura (L) is the general counsel of MoreHome, a California (CA) corporation. As general counsel, she is the attorney for MoreHome, not of the employees, like Eric, or the officers, like Mianne. Thus, she must do what is in the best interest of MoreHome.

Duty of Confidentiality

Under both the ABA and CA rules, lawyers owe duty of confidentiality to their client to take reasonable precautions to protect their confidential communications and documents. However, under the ABA, lawyers are permitted to reveal confidential information if it prevents substantial financial harm to another. However, the CA rules do not have this exception. Under the CA rules, the lawyer may only breach their duty of confidentiality if it is to prevent substantial harm or death to another, and they must inform the client of their duty and intention before doing so and try to get the client to take another path. Additionally under both the ABA and CA rules, the attorney can reveal confidential information if the client allows or it is implied necessary for the lawyer to carry out her representation.

Here, the documents that Eric (E) gave Laura (L) pertaining to MoreHome's practices show that MoreHome employees are falsifying the financial history of mortgage applicants to qualify them for mortgages and that MoreHome employees are pushing risk mortgages onto customers. These are confidential documents because they pertain to MoreHome's specific work and trade secrets.

When L sent these documents to the State Attorney General, she shared confidential documents of her client, MoreHome, without their permission. In fact, Mianne, the CEO of MoreHome, specifically told L not to do anything with the documents except to give them to her. Thus, L did not have permission to share these confidential documents.

However, L will argue that she was able to breach her duty of confidentiality because she wanted to prevent the financial harm to the current and future mortgage applicants of MoreHome, who were qualifying for mortgages they could not otherwise. Moreover, she wants to protect the clients from taking risk mortgages. However, while this is allowed under the ABA, it is not permitted in CA. And, since MoreHome is a CA corporation, L must follow the CA rules.

Additionally, L may argue that she did not breach her duty because she wanted to prevent any imminent harm or death to the clients who killed themselves or others over losing their money and homes because of MoreHome's practices. However, because there is likely no proof that L reasonably believed a customer was going to kill themselves or others, she will not be successful.

Thus, L breached this duty under the CA rules.

Duty of Loyalty -- Conflict of Interest

Under both the ABA and CA rules, lawyers owe a duty of loyalty to the organization. While Lawyers can represent constituents of the organization at the same time, they can only do so if the employee's interest are not adverse, or will not become adverse, to the organization. The lawyer must also explain to the employee who she represents and who her duty of loyalty lies with when it becomes apparent that an employee's interests may be adverse.

Here, E, an employee of MoreHome, came to L with these documents. Because L was the general counsel, E probably believed that she also represented him as well. Thus, L realized during their conversation that E was giving her information that could hurt MoreHome, she had a duty to tell E that she represented MoreHome, not him, and that her duty lied with protecting the company.

However, L failed to explain this to E. Moreover, when E asked her not to tell Mianne of what he found because he did not want to get in trouble, L should have explained that she did not have a duty to protect his interests and could not promise that she would not tell Mianne. However, she again failed to do this.

L should have explained her role and loyalty to E.

Thus, L breached her duty under both the ABA and CA rules.

Duty to Communicate

Under both the ABA and CA rules, the lawyer must communicate with their client about their case, answer questions, and keep the client apprised or matters relevant to the lawyer's representation.

Here, L called Mianne, MoreHome's CEO, right after she spoke with E and told Mianne (M) of what she learned from E. Moreover, she told Mianne that it was E who told her this information.

Consequently, because L immediately informed a high officer of MoreHome of this information, L met this duty. Moreover, L did not violate any duty by informing M that it was Eric who told her because she did not owe any duty of loyalty as E, as a mere employee.

Thus, L did not breach this duty.

Duty of Diligence

Under both the ABA and CA rules, lawyers must be diligent in their representation to do what is all reasonably necessary to represent their client and be prompt in their communication. Under the CA rules, if a lawyer intentionally, recklessly, with gross negligence, or repeatedly fails to be diligent, they breached their duty.

Here, L immediately informed M of what she learned from E, and she likely did this to see if what E told her was true. Consequently, she was diligent in quickly informing M and not sitting on the information.

However, L should have checked into the documents and information that E gave her to see if they were accurate and if the allegations were true before going outside the organization to report the information. The facts do not indicate that L did any of her own investigation of the client or that she looked into corroborating the information.

Thus, she breached this duty under both the ABA and CA rule.

Duty of Competence

Under both the ABA and CA rules, a lawyer has the duty to act competently with all the knowledge, skill, and expertise needed for the representation. However, she can research the matter or get advice from another attorney to gain competence. Under CA rules, a lawyer breaches this duty if they intentionally, recklessly, with gross negligence, or repeatedly fail to be competent.

Here, L did not look into the E's allegations or look into what she should do as general counsel to the mitigate the risk to MoreHome if they were true. While she did contact an outside lawyer to see what she should do with the papers from E, she did not do her own investigation to ensure that she was doing the right action under the rules. Moreover, she should have done her own research or contacted an outside lawyer with expertise to see how she could best protect MoreHome.

Because L did none of this, she breached her duty under the ABA and CA rules.

Duty to Report Within Org

Under both the ABA and CA rules, an organizations lawyer should report misconduct to a higher authority with the organization. If that authority does nothing, the lawyer can report the conduct to another high authority within the organization.

Here, L reported E's information and documents to Mianne, the CEO, so she did report up within MoreHome. However, if L did not think that M would do anything, she should have reported to another officer, like the CFO, or to the board of directors, if there was one, to find an authority who could help deal with the problem.

However, L neither reported to another authority, nor gave M a reasonable amount of time to do anything.

Thus, L breached this duty.

Duty to Report Out of Org

Under the ABA, the lawyer may report outside of the organization if reporting within the organization did not give any reasonable results. However, the lawyer cannot reveal confidential information unless it falls under an exception. However, the CA rules do not allow the lawyer to report outside the organization or reveal confidential information unless it is to prevent substantial harm or death.

Here, L sent the document to the State Attorney General. She will argue that she had to because she knew the Attorney General was investigating similar practices in other companies within the state, and she wanted to protect MoreHome from further damage. Moreover, she was permitted to reveal the confidential docs under the ABA under the financial harm exception, as explained above.

However, she was not permitted to report out or reveal confidential information under the CA rules.

Thus, L breached her duty under the CA rules.

Duty to Safeguard Client Property

Under both the ABA and CA rules, lawyers have a duty to safeguard and not commingle client property with their own.

Here, L sent the documents to the Attorney General (AG) despite M's specific instructions not to. Thus, L breached her duty by not safeguarding the documents and sending them outside the organization.

Speaking With a Outside Lawyer for Advice

Both the ABA and CA rules allow lawyers to speak to outside lawyers for advice on ethical rules.

Here, L contacted an outside attorney to ask what she should do with the documents. Because she did this based on her duty under the ethical rules, she did not breach her duty here.

Mandatory Withdrawal

Under the ABA, the lawyer must withdraw if their services are being used to for a crime or fraud. Under the CA rules, the lawyer must withdraw if she believes her services are being used for a crime or fraud or if her actions would violate a law or ethical rule.

Here, the practices that E alleged MoreHome was doing was against state law. Consequently, MoreHome would get into trouble with the AG for these practices. Moreover, L could also get into trouble as the general counsel if the AG found she assisted or hid these practices. Moreover, by continuing representation, L could be assisting with a crime or fraud.

Thus, L violated both the ABA and CA rules by failing to withdraw.

Permissive Withdrawal

Under the ABA, a lawyer may withdraw if it would not cause financial harm to the client or if continuing representation would cause significant financial harm to the lawyer (CA law does not allow this). Under both the ABA and CA, the lawyer may withdraw if she finds the course of action repugnant or if the client continues with an illegal action despite the lawyer counseling them not to.

Here, L is permitted to withdraw if she finds that conduct of MoreHome to be repugnant if MoreHome continues with these illegal practices. However, L does not have to. Thus, she has not breached her duty by not withdrawing.

Duties upon Withdrawal

Upon withdrawal, the ABA and CA rules require the lawyer return the client's property and payments she did not earn and to give reasonable notice to the client for them to have time find another attorney. However, the ABA allows the attorney to retain documents or property to obtain unpaid fees in certain circumstances.

Here, because L had a duty of mandatory withdrawal she should have returned the documents E gave her to MoreHome, return any fees she did not earn, and give back any other property she had. She also must tell MoreHome that she is withdrawing and give them reasonable time to find another attorney.

If L did not, or does not do this, then she will have breached her duty under both the ABA and CA rules.

Deborah was homeless and without money. One night, the temperature was below freezing and continuing to drop. Deborah realized she might die if she did not find shelter. She found a run-down house with an attached garage that had a door connecting it to the house. Deborah thought the house was unoccupied. She went around to the side of the garage, looked through a window, and saw a stack of wood. Deborah decided to go into the garage, take some of the wood, and build a fire outside the garage to keep herself warm. She broke the window to get into the garage. Because of the extreme cold, Deborah decided to stay in the garage. She gathered wood scraps and paper, started a small fire to keep herself warm, and fell asleep. A spark from the fire ignited some oil on the floor. Deborah awoke to flames and smoke. She then escaped through the window she had broken. The fire quickly engulfed the house where it killed Stuart as he was sleeping in his bed.

Officer Oliver, who was patrolling the area, saw Deborah walking on the sidewalk three blocks from the fire. When Officer Oliver asked her what she was doing outside on such a cold night, Deborah said, “I started the fire.”

Deborah is charged in criminal court and moves to suppress her statement “I started the fire.”

1. With what crime or crimes can Deborah reasonably be charged; what defense or defenses can she reasonably raise; and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

2. Should the court grant Deborah’s motion to suppress her statement? Discuss.

QUESTION 4: SELECTED ANSWER A

QUESTION 1 -- WHAT CRIME(S) CAN DEBORAH BE CHARGED AND WHAT DEFENSES CAN SHE RAISE

I. Larceny

Larceny is the taking and carrying away of someone's tangible personal property through trespass with the intent to permanently deprive the person of that property.

Here, Deborah took wood from the stack and used it to build a fire in the garage. Deborah might argue that because the wood never left the garage, that there was no taking and carrying. However, the taking and carrying away requirement for larceny is satisfied by the smallest of movement. By taking the wood from the stack, Deborah took and carried away someone else's tangible property.

Because Deborah did not have permission to take the wood, she did so through trespass. And because Deborah meant to destroy the wood by using it to make a fire, Deborah had intent to permanently deprive the owner of the wood of possession of their property.

Thus, the elements of Larceny are satisfied.

II. Burglary

Burglary is the breaking and entering into someone else's dwelling at night with the intent to commit a felony therein. Traditionally, the breaking and entering had to be into a dwelling and it had to be at night. But modern statutes have removed the "at night" requirement and have expanded "dwelling" to mean any building.

Here, Deborah broke a window and then entered the garage. This constitutes breaking and entering, as Deborah entered into the property, she did so by physically breaking a window, and she did so without consent.

Additionally, Deborah broke into the garage with the intention of taking the wood and using it to build a fire. As discussed above, taking the wood and using it to build a fire constitutes larceny. Thus, Deborah had intent to commit a felony inside of the garage.

And while under a strict traditional view, the garage would not likely count as a dwelling, most modern views of the crime of burglary would expand the definition of dwelling to include the attached garage.

III. Arson

Arson is the malicious burning of someone else's dwelling. A burning is malicious if it is done with reckless indifference to the risk of the structure burning down. Under traditional common law, the building had to be a dwelling. But modern interpretations of arson include almost any building. A structure is burned if there is charring to the structure, mere scorching is not enough.

Here, Deborah lit a small fire inside of the garage and then fell asleep, causing a spark from the fire to ignite oil and burn down the garage and the house. The garage likely constitutes a structure that falls into the arson crime, but also the house is a dwelling that certainly fits the statute. The fire "engulfed" the house, thus meaning there was sufficient burning for arson.

The question is whether this action constitutes a reckless indifference to the risk the house garage next door would burn down. Deborah would argue that she only lit a small fire, and she had no way of knowing that there was oil on the ground that could ignite.

But Deborah also lit a fire inside of a garage that was filled with wood that itself stood right next to a house. And then she allowed herself to fall asleep. Lighting a fire inside of a structure, especially one filled with flammable objects, and then falling asleep without first putting out the fire constitutes reckless indifference to the risk the building would burn down and the risk that the nearby buildings (including the house in this case) would burn.

The elements of arson are satisfied.

IV. Common-law Murder

At common law, murder is killing with malice aforethought. There is malice aforethought in four different situations: (1) intentional killing, (2) killing with intent to cause substantial bodily harm, (3) depraved heart murder, and (4) felony murder. Murder also requires that the death is the actual and proximate cause of the defendant’s actions.

A. Causation

Causation requires actual and proximate cause. Actual cause exists if the defendant's actions are the but-for cause of the victim's death. Here, but-for Deborah lighting the fire, the house would never have burned down and Stuart would not have died. There is thus actual causation.

Proximate cause exists if the death is the foreseeable result of the defendant's actions. Here, Deborah lit a small fire in a garage filled with wood that was next to a house and then she fell asleep. It is foreseeable that lighting a fire in a flammable (likely wooden) structure and falling asleep would cause the structure and nearby homes to burn down, and it is foreseeable that if a house burns down in the middle of the night that its occupants could die. There is therefore proximate cause.

There is sufficient causation.

B. Intentional killing and killing with intent to cause bodily harm

Here, Debora set the fire by accident. She did not intend to cause anyone harm. Accordingly, Deborah does not have sufficient intent for intentional killing or killing with intent to cause substantial bodily harm.

C. Depraved heart murder

Depraved heart murder is killing caused by an action that constitutes reckless indifference to an unjustified risk to human life. Here, the action in question is Deborah starting a small fire in the garage next to the house. While it is certainly irresponsible to start a small fire inside of a garage that is next to a home, it likely doesn't arise to the level of reckless indifference to human life. Indeed, the fire was small. Additionally, the main reason it spread was because of oil on the ground, and Deborah was not aware of the presence of the oil. Deborah also thought the house was unoccupied, and this was not entirely unreasonable because the house was run-down.

Accordingly, there is no depraved heart murder.

D. Felony murder

Felony murder applies whenever a defendant's inherently dangerous felony results in someone else's death and the death is a foreseeable result of the felony. The death must also occur during the felony, and before the felon finds a place of temporary safety. The majority view is that felony murder does not apply to people who are in agency with the felon (agency theory). A minority of courts say that felony murder applies to any death that occurs during the felony.

Here, the felony in question would be arson, which is considered an inherently dangerous felony. Moreover, it is foreseeable that someone would die as a result of arson, making Stuart's death within the scope of felony murder. The death happened while the house was burning, meaning it happened during the felony. And Stuart is not in agency with Deborah, so Stuart's death falls within felony murder regardless of whether the agency theory or proximate cause theory is applied.

Thus, the elements of felony murder are met.

V. Statutory murder

Under modern statute, murder is killing with deliberation and premeditation, or felony murder. As discussed above, there is felony murder in this case.

Deliberation and premeditation require that the defendant intends to kill the victim and that the defendant have a moment to consider their action, if even for a moment. Here, the killing was not intentional, so there is no deliberation and premeditation.

Because there is felony murder, there is murder under modern statutes as well.

VI. Involuntary Manslaughter

Involuntary manslaughter is killing caused by gross negligence. Gross negligence is acting with a conscious disregard for an unjustified and substantial risk, which constitutes a gross deviation from the standard of care of a reasonable person.

Here, the action in question is Deborah lighting a fire inside of a garage that is next to a house, and then falling asleep. The risk of the house burning down is substantial because the garage is full of wood, the garage is next to the house, and Deborah is asleep so she cannot monitor the fire. The risk is unjustified because there is no sufficient justification for why Deborah needed to fall asleep in front of the fire. Yes, Deborah was likely cold and sleepy, but she would have likely been sufficiently protected from the elements while she slept just by nature of being inside of the garage.

The next issue is whether the action is a gross deviation from the standard of care of a reasonable person. A reasonable person would not light a fire inside, and they certainly wouldn't fall asleep during the fire. Deborah will counter that the house next to her was run-down, and thus she thought there was no one in it and accordingly did not seriously risk human life. However, a reasonably prudent person would not just assume the house next door was empty without checking. Additionally, the existence of a pile of wood in the garage suggests that someone is living in the house next door. Accordingly, Deborah's conduct likely constitutes a gross deviation from the standard of care.

There is likely involuntary manslaughter.

VII. Trespass

While Trespass is usually a tort, it can also be charged as a crime. The elements of trespass are (1) entering another's land without consent and (2) intent to commit the action that causes the person to enter onto someone else's land.

Here, Deborah entered into a run-down house without permission. She also took that action intentionally. Thus, the elements of trespass are met.

VIII. Defenses

A. Necessity

The defense of necessity applies if, during an emergency situation, the defendant reasonably believes that committing the crime is necessary to prevent imminent harm, and the harm is more serious than the crime committed.

i. Burglary

The first issue is whether there was an emergency. Here, the temperature was below freezing and continuing to drop. Deborah realized that she might die if she could not find shelter. This is enough to constitute emergency.

The next question is whether it was reasonably necessary for Deborah to commit burglary in order to avoid an imminent harm that is greater than the societal harm caused by the crime.

Here, Deborah would have likely died if she did not break into the garage. She was homeless and had no money, so she could not purchase shelter for herself. That said, it is true that Deborah could have always knocked on the door of the run-down house to see if anyone would voluntarily help her out. However, people don't usually let strangers into their home, especially homeless people, and thus it was likely reasonably necessary for Deborah to break into the garage.

The last question is whether the risk to Deborah was more serious than the crime. In this case, the risk to Deborah is death, which is very serious. The crime is breaking into an attached garage with the intent to use some pieces of wood. While never good to trespass and steal, the loss of a couple pieces of wood and a broken window are far less than the risk of death.

Deborah can thus successfully apply the defense of necessity to her burglary crime.

ii. Larceny

The next question is whether necessity applies to larceny. Here, the larceny was using the wood to make a fire. Whether this was necessary to prevent Deborah's death depends on facts outside of the question. The court would want to know how warm the garage would have kept Deborah if she just stayed within the four walls without a fire. If Deborah would have been fine without the fire, then the defense of necessity doesn't apply. But if starting the fire was necessary to keep Deborah alive, which is certainly possible if the temperature was very low, then the necessity defense applies. After all, stealing a bit of wood is much less serious than the death of Deborah.

iii. Arson

Necessity could also apply to the crime of arson. Deborah would argue that she needed to light the fire to survive, and thus starting the fire, which is what caused the arson, was reasonably necessary to prevent imminent harm to Deborah. Deborah will also argue that while the arson did burn down the house and the garage, that property is always of less societal value than human life, and thus her crime was still less harmful to society than the risk of death against her.

The issue with Deborah's argument is that Deborah is guilty of arson not just because she lit a fire, but because she was recklessly indifferent to the risk that the garage and house would burn down. Indeed, Deborah fell asleep while the fire was lit and seemingly took no precautions to prevent its spread. So while it may have been necessary for Deborah to light the fire, it was not necessary for Deborah to act in a reckless manner when lighting the fire.

Accordingly, Deborah cannot use necessity to defend the arson charge.

iv. Felony murder

Typically, the defense of necessity does not apply to homicide crimes. However, if Deborah can use necessity to negate the underlying felony in felony murder, then that defense also negates the felony murder charge. Thus, if the court accepts Deborah's necessity defense for arson, then the necessity defense also applies to felony murder.

However, as discussed above, the court will likely not agree that necessity applies to the arson charge in this case. Accordingly, necessity also does not apply to the felony murder charge.

v. Involuntary manslaughter

Necessity does not apply to homicide crimes, including involuntary manslaughter. Thus, the necessity defense does not apply here.

B. Mistake

For specific intent crimes, mistake of fact is defense if it negates the specific intent required. For general intent crimes, mistake of fact is a defense if it is reasonable.

Here, the relevant mistake of fact is that Deborah thought the house was unoccupied, while really Stuart was in the house. Deborah can try and use this mistake of fact defense for three crimes: involuntary manslaughter, arson, and felony murder.

i. involuntary manslaughter

Involuntary manslaughter is a specific intent crime--it requires gross negligence.

Deborah could argue that her mistake about the existence of Stuart in the home means that she did not act with gross negligence. However, as discussed above in the original analysis of involuntary manslaughter, Deborah should have checked the home and should have assumed that someone was inside of the home when she saw wood in the garage. Thus, it was still grossly negligent to start the fire inside the garage and then fall asleep. Mistake of fact does not apply.

ii. Arson

Arson is a general mistake crime. Thus, Deborah's mistake of fact as to the existence of Stuart in the home applies only if the mistake is reasonable. Deborah will argue her mistake is reasonable because it was run-down. However, Deborah also saw wood inside of the garage. Additionally, the garage was locked (hence breaking in through the window). A locked garage and the presence of wood in the house both suggest that the house was occupied. Accordingly, the mistake was not reasonable.

iii. Felony murder

Because the mistake of fact defense does not apply to arson, it also does not apply to felony murder, which is based on the arson.

PART 2 -- Deborah's motion to suppress her statement

I. Violation of due process

To be consistent with due process, confessions must be voluntary based on the totality of the circumstances. Here, Deborah told the officer she started the fire when the Officer asked her what she was doing on such a cold night. Nothing in these facts suggests this confession was not voluntary. The confession satisfies due process.

II. Fifth amendment Miranda rights

The Fifth amendment states that suspects cannot be subjects of custodial interrogation by the government without being read their Miranda warning. The Miranda warnings state that the suspect: has the right to remain silent, that everything they say can be used against them, that they have a right to a lawyer, that if they can't afford a lawyer, one will be provided.

Additionally, police cannot place suspects in custodial interrogation by the government without first giving Miranda rights. A suspect is in custody if they reasonably do not feel free to terminate the encounter and they feel the same coercive pressures that are present at a station house. Interrogation is when the police know or should know that their actions or questions will illicit incriminating responses. And lastly the suspect must be aware they are being questioned by a government agent.

Here, Officer Oliver did not read Deborah her Miranda rights and thus Deborah cannot be the subject of custodial interrogation.

But in this case, the officer just runs into Deborah on the sidewalk and asks her an innocent question. Nothing in that situation would make a reasonable person think they were not free to end the encounter.

Moreover, there is no reason to think the question "what are you doing on a cold night" would illicit incriminating responses, so there is no interrogation.

And lastly, Miranda rules do not apply if the suspect makes a spontaneous and voluntary confession. Here, Deborah saying "I started the fire" in response to a question about the cold night certainly counts as a spontaneous and voluntary confession.

Accordingly, there is no violation of Miranda.

III. 6th amendment right to counsel

Suspects have a sixth amendment right to counsel, and here Deborah said "I started the fire" without counsel present. However, the 6th amendment right only attaches once charges have been filed. Charges were not filed in this case, the 6th amendment right to counsel doesn't apply.

IV. Conclusion

The court should deny Deborah's motion to suppress her statement.

QUESTION 4: SELECTED ANSWER B

Larceny

Larceny is the (1) taking and moving, (2) the property of another person, (3) without their consent, and (4) with the intent to permanently deprive the rightful owner of that property. If the defendant believes that the property is his or hers to take, they have not committed larceny.

Here, Deborah took some of the wood that belonged to Stuart and was located in Stuart's private home. Deborah knew that this wood did not belong to her. Still, she grabbed the wood, moved it into a pile, and started a fire with that wood. Deborah may argue that she did not take the wood out of Stuart's home and thus did not move it, but she moved it out of its original placement which is enough to satisfy this element. Deborah knew that she did not have consent of Stuart, the rightful owner, to use or burn this wood. Deborah also must have known that by burning the wood, it was no longer usable for anyone else and therefore would permanently deprive the rightful owner of the chance to use this wood. Thus, Deborah will be found to have committed larceny and can be charged with the crime of larceny.

Burglary

Common law burglary is the (1) breaking and entering, (2) the dwelling of another individual, (3) at nighttime, and (4) with the intent to commit a felony. The defendant must have intended to commit the felony upon entering the premises, not at a later point. Breaking can be constructive or actual. Entering occurs as soon as the defendant steps inside of the building. Most modern jurisdiction do not require that the building be a dwelling and do not require that the defendant enter at nighttime, but common law still lists these as elements of burglary.

Here, Deborah broke through the window of Stuart's garage and entered into the garage. This garage was directly attached to Stuart's home and although Deborah may argue that the garage is not a dwelling because it is not where an individual actually resides, this argument will likely fail. A garage that is connected to someone's home is generally considered to be part of the dwelling and will satisfy that element here. Deborah's acts occurred at nighttime, while Stuart was asleep in his home. Finally, Deborah had the intent to take wood from Stuart's garage back outside with her and use it to start a fire. If larceny is a felony, this will satisfy the final prong. On the other hand, if this is only found to be a petty theft or some crime less serious than a felony, the final prong is not satisfied and Deborah will not be found to have committed burglary.

Whether Deborah committed the crime of burglary depends upon whether her intent to steal the wood is classified as a felony, or a lesser petty theft misdemeanor.

Defense: Necessity

A defense to any crime is necessity. Necessity occurs when a defendant committed a crime in order to prevent greater harm that the consequences of that crime. There is both private necessity and public necessity. A private necessity occurs when the defendant commits the crime in order to prevent worse harm from occurring to himself, while a public necessity is when the defendant commits the crime in order to prevent worse harm from occurring to the general public or a large group of people.

Here, Deborah will likely be able to defend any larceny or burglary charges against her with the defense of necessity. Deborah was stranded out in the cold while the temperature was below freezing on the night in question. Deborah had realized that there was a possibility that she would die if she did not find shelter and some source of warmth. Thus, she broke into Stuart's garage and took his wood in order to create a fire for herself and prevent herself from dying out in the cold. The possibility of death outweighs the harm Deborah might have caused by breaking and entering or stealing Stuart's wood for a fire.

Deborah will be successful in defending herself against larceny or burglary by showing that she needed to do these acts in order to prevent greater harm to herself, or in this case death.

Arson

At common law, arson is the malicious burning of the dwelling of another person. Many modern jurisdictions do not require that the burning occur in a dwelling, but rather recognize the malicious burning of any building as arson. Malice is the required mens rea. Malice needs either an intent to create the outcome or reckless disregard for a high risk of that outcome. Burning must be actual damage or charring to the structure from fire, not mere blackening of the structure from smoke.

Here, Deborah lit fire to the wood while in Stuart's garage. As discussed above, the garage will likely qualify as part of the dwelling because it was directly attached to Stuart's home. The wood ended up catching some oil on fire and burning the entire house. This is enough to qualify as a burning of the dwelling far beyond mere smoke damage.

Defense: No Malice

Deborah will attempt to defend herself against the arson charge by stating that she did not have the requisite intent, or malice, but this will likely fail. Deborah started the fire on the ground, without any protective cover or container. The fire was highly likely to spread and catch part of the house on fire considering that homes and garages are built with wood. While Deborah may not have known that oil was on the ground and may not have intended to start a large house fire, she recklessly disregarded this risk when she started an unconfined fire, fell asleep, and failed to take any precautions to oversee and stop the fire from spreading. There was a substantial likelihood of a house fire here that Deborah consciously disregarded and thus, she will be found to have acted with malice in starting this open fire in a wooden home.

Defense: Necessity

Deborah may attempt to claim the defense of necessity again, but Deborah likely did not need to start this fire. Once she was in the confines of the garage of a home and was protected from the outside elements, she was much safer. She was not at risk of dying any longer. She could have found something in the garage to cover herself and simply remained in the garage overnight to stay out of the freezing cold outside. If the garage was below freezing, Deborah may have a stronger claim of necessity, but this will be a weaker defense than the necessity described above.

Murder or Manslaughter

Common Law Murder

Common law murder is the unlawful killing of another human being with malice aforethought. This includes the intent to kill, the intent to cause great bodily harm, a reckless indifference for a substantial risk to human life, or felony murder.

Here, Deborah will likely not satisfy any of these requisite mens reas. Deborah certainly did not have the intent to kill or cause great bodily harm. Deborah merely wanted to escape the freezing cold and start a small fire to warm herself up. On the other hand, Deborah may have had a reckless disregard for a substantial risk to human life, but only if Deborah had reason to believe that there were humans inside of the attached home. The facts state that Deborah believed that the house was unoccupied, thus she had no reason to think that she was putting anyone's lives in danger by starting a fire in the

Felony Murder

Felony murder is the killing of a human being that occurs during the commission of attempt to commit an enumerated felony or an inherently dangerous felony. These felonies generally include burglary, arson, rape, robbery, or kidnapping. The defendant does not have to have the intent to kill, as long as the death results during the attempt to commit one of these felonies. The felony must be distinct from the killing. The act that kills must occur before the defendant reaches a place of temporal safety.

Here, as discussed above, Deborah's acts will likely not satisfy the element of burglary because stealing wood is unlikely to be a felony. On the other hand, Deborah's acts will likely satisfy arson (see above). Thus, because the killing of Stuart was a result of the arson that Deborah committed, this might be found to be a felony murder.

Deborah may be found guilty of felony murder, but not under any other theory of common law murder.

First Degree Murder

First degree murder is considered by many states instead of common law murder and it includes the unlawful killing of another person with malice aforethought, as well as premeditation and deliberation. This requires that the defendant have thought of killing the victim even if just for a brief moment before doing so.

Here, Deborah never had the intent to kill Stuart -- she did not even know he was in the home. Thus, she cannot be found guilty of first degree murder.

Second Degree Murder

Second degree murder is the same as first degree murder, but without any premeditation or deliberation. Again, malice includes the intent to kill, the intent to cause great bodily harm, or a reckless indifference for a substantial risk to human life.

Here, Deborah will likely not meet any of these required mental states. She did not have the intent to kill, cause great bodily harm, or a substantial risk to human life because she did not know that any humans were in the house attached to the garage. She was under the impression that it was unoccupied. Thus, Deborah will not be found guilty of second degree murder.

Voluntary Manslaughter

Voluntary manslaughter is also considered killing in the "heat of passion" or under an imperfect self-defense claim. The heat of passion requires that (1) there be an adequate provocation, (2) that would provoke a reasonable person, (3) the defendant was adequately provoked, and (4) there was not sufficient time to cool down, so the defendant acted while still provoked.

The facts do not fit these elements. Deborah was not provoked and she will not be charged with voluntary manslaughter.

Involuntary Manslaughter

Involuntary manslaughter occurs when the defendant kills while committing criminal negligence or some criminal act that is not a serious felony that falls under the felony murder rule. The defendant does not need the intent to kill.

Here, Deborah will likely be found guilty of involuntary manslaughter if she is not found guilty of one of the greater murder charges. Deborah was committing larceny and arson when she started that fire that caused the death of Stuart. Thus, Deborah's criminal acts resulted in the death of another human being. Deborah will be convicted of involuntary manslaughter if she is not convicted of one of the greater offenses.

Outcome: Deborah is most likely to be convicted of (1) arson and (2) either felony murder (the greater offense) or involuntary manslaughter in the alternative (the lesser offense).

Deborah's Motion to Suppress Her Statement

Fifth Amendment

The fifth amendment provides all individuals with the privilege against self-incrimination. This means that no one can be compelled to make testimonial statements that incriminate themselves.

One of the ways that the legal system protects this privilege is by requiring Miranda warnings whenever someone is in a custodial interrogation. The Miranda warnings must be given by police officers, or anyone acting for the government, before eliciting any incriminating responses. This includes (1) that the suspect has the right to remain silent, (2) that anything the suspect says can and will be used against them, (3) that the suspect has the right to an attorney, and (4) that the suspect will be provided with any attorney if they are unable to afford one.

(1) Custody

The test to determine whether an individual is in custody is whether a reasonable person would feel free to leave. The totality of the circumstances should be considered to determine this, including whether they are confined, cornered, under arrest, or any other relevant facts.

Here, Deborah was walking freely on the sidewalk when Officer Oliver pulled his car up next to her. Officer Oliver did not handcuff Deborah, he did not cut her off in her path, he did not block her, he did not corner her, and he did not even tell her to stop moving. Thus, Deborah was likely not in custody. A reasonable person would still feel free to ignore his question, continue walking, and be free to leave in this scenario.

Deborah was not in custody.

(2) Interrogation

The test to determine whether someone is being interrogated is whether both the words and conduct of the government official are likely to elicit incriminating responses from the suspect. General booking questions, such as one's name, date of birth, or other basic questions are not considered an interrogation.

Here, Officer Oliver asked Deborah what she was doing outside on such a cold night. This question is borderline an interrogation, because Officer Oliver was aware that Deborah was only three blocks away from the recent house fire and he was likely looking for some information to connect her to this fire. On the other hand, this is a very basic question that Deborah could have responded to with any simple answer.

While this question may have been attempting to elicit any incriminating response from Deborah, Deborah was not in custody. Therefore, Officer Oliver did NOT need to inform Deborah of her Miranda rights before talking to her. Deborah's response about starting the fire will not be found to be a violation of her Fifth Amendment rights and will not be suppressed on these grounds.

Fourteenth Amendment

The fourteenth amendment requires that all confessions by a criminal defendant be voluntary in order to be used against them at trial. The totality of the circumstances should be considered, including the suspects age, how long they are being questioned for, the manner and method of questioning, whether they are mentally or physically disabled, whether they have been provided with necessities like food or water, and any other relevant factors.

Here, Deborah was walking on the side of the road when Officer Oliver pulled up next to her and asked what she was doing outside in the cold. Deborah immediately and freely responded that she started the fire. Deborah was not coerced into saying this, Deborah was not being brutally questioned or interrogated. There are absolutely no facts showing that this statement was involuntary.

Deborah blurted out "I started the fire" immediately upon talking to Officer Oliver and thus, her voluntary statement will not be suppressed on these grounds.

Sixth Amendment

The sixth amendment gives all criminal defendants the right to an attorney immediately upon being charged with a crime. This right attaches automatically once a criminal defendant has been charged. This right is offense specific, meaning the police can still question a defendant about any unrelated crime without the attorney present. This also includes the right to have your attorney present at any in-person lineups or identifications.

Here, Deborah has not been charged with any crime yet at the time she is speaking to Officer Oliver. Thus, her sixth amendment right has not attached and this is not grounds to suppress her statement.

Outcome: Deborah's motion to suppress will be denied because she was not in a custodial interrogation so her fifth amendment rights were not violated, her statement was voluntary so her fourteenth amendment rights were not violated, and she had not been charged with any crime at the time so her sixth amendment rights were not violated.

Deborah's statement is a party opponent exception to the hearsay rule (that out of court statements cannot be admitted for the truth of the matter), and it did not violate any of her constitutional rights, so the motion to suppress her statement should be denied by the court.

QUESTION 5

Steve owned property in the state of Columbia that Barbara offered to buy for $500,000. Steve agreed to sell, provided that he retained the mineral rights and had access to the land. Barbara later accepted Steve's conditions and said that she would tell her attorney to prepare the necessary papers. When Steve met with Barbara to sign the papers, he asked if the documents included his conditions and she assured him that they did. In fact, Barbara had not told her attorney of Steve's conditions and they were not in the papers that he and Barbara signed.

Shortly after the sale, Steve decided to investigate whether his former property had any mineral deposits. Barbara refused to let Steve and his geologist on the property and erected barricades to prevent their access. It was then that Steve realized that the documents he signed omitted his conditions.

Barbara had purchased Steve's property in cash, which included $250,000 of funds that she had embezzled from her employer, Acme Company (Acme). Barbara later embezzled another $20,000 from Acme, which she deposited in her checking account containing $5,000 at the time. The following month, she paid off $25,000 of her outstanding debts, bringing her checking account balance to zero. Subsequently, Barbara deposited $10,000 of her own money into the checking account. Shortly thereafter, Acme fired Barbara after discovering her embezzlement.

Both Steve and Acme have brought suit against Barbara.

1. What equitable remedies does Steve have against Barbara? Discuss.

2. What equitable remedies does Acme have against Barbara? Discuss.

3. What amount of money, if any, can Acme recover as part of an equitable remedy from Barbara's checking account? Discuss.

QUESTION 5: SELECTED ANSWER A

1) Steve v. Barbara

Governing Law

The common law governs the contacts for the sale of land. The UCC governs the sale of goods. The common law applies here since it is a contract for the sale of land.

Contract Requirements

A valid contract requires officer, acceptance, consideration, and absent of defenses.

Mutual Assent - Offer & Acceptance

An offer is an objective manifestation to enter into a binding legal agreement with offeree. It places power of acceptance in offeree. It requires reasonably necessary and certain terms. Acceptance is the objective manifestation of assent to be bound to the terms of the offer set by the offeror. A counteroffer is done when the offeree does not accept the offerors terms but instead rejects that offer and offers a new offer.

Barbara offered to buy Steve's property for $500k. Steve agreed provided that he retain mineral rights. Since he did not accept Barbra's offer by her terms, this is not valid since it does not follow the mirror image rule which requires the offer and acceptance to mirror each other. Steve's additional condition would be deemed a counteroffer. Therefore, he rejected Barbara's offer and set a new offer with terms that require the conditions set out by Steve. That he would sell his land for $500k and he retains mineral rights and retains access to the land. Barbara accepted these conditions.

Consideration

Consideration is the bargain for exchange of promises that the parties would otherwise not be legally obligated to do. Here, there is consideration since S must sell his land, B must give money, mineral rights, and land access to S in return.

Material Terms

The issue here is that their agreement is not reflected on the papers the two signed. Steve should assert: fraud, unilateral mistake, and mutual mistake to recover equitable remedies.

Fraud

D material misrepresented - Barbara told Steve that the documents included his conditions.

A material fact - Babara knew this was material as Steve made it a condition and it is not an opinion but objective fact.

D had intent to induce - Barbara knew this would induce Steve to sign the contract as he asked her if the documents included his condition and she assured him that they did.

D did induce performance - Steve signed the documents based on her material misrepresentation that they included his conditions.

P justifiably relied - Steve's justification was reliable since he had no reason to believe she was lying. Furthermore, he is not going to be held liable because he was negligent in not signing the document because he relied on her misrepresentation.

Mutual Mistake (scrivners error)

A scriveners error exist when by accident, the parties omitted something material that was supposed to be in the contract that the parties both agreed to. Steve will argue that based on their previous discussion when Barbara accepted, she told him she would tell her attorney to prepare necessary papers. The attorney committed an error by not putting Steve's conditions in. However, Babara is not mistaken to this. She is aware, therefore there is no mutual mistake.

Unilateral Mistake

Occurs when one party is mistaken to the material term of the contract and the other party knew of the mistake and failed to correct it. Here, Barbara knew that Steve was mistaken to a material term of the contract since their previous oral agreement indicated a contract based on certain terms. Furthermore, he even asked her if the documents included his condition and she assured him that they did, when in fact they did not. This is the type of unilateral mistake that is raised to fraud. Therefore, the unilateral mistake creates an option for reformation or recession.

Reformation

Reformation is the equitable remedy of redrafting the contract to reflect the party's true intent. There must (1) be an agreement, (2) grounds for recession, and (3) no defenses.

As analyzed above there is an agreement. While Barbara may assert that oral agreement is invalid due to (a) SOF and (b) PER. Statute of frauds bars the formation of some contracts when they are required to be in writing. A contract for the sale of land is required to be in writing. Therefore, Barbara will argue that this oral agreement is not valid. However, SOF does not bar reformation when the parties intended to have a material term in writing. Furthermore, Babara will argue the PER bars introduction of the prior or contemporaneous statements made before the final contract of the parties was formed. She will argue that this contract is the complete and final intention of both parties. However, this argument would to fail since evidence of fraud will not bar extrinsic evidence of prior conversations. Therefore, while the agreement may not be a valid contract, the reformation would fix these errors.

Grounds for reformation. The grounds for a recession are fraud, mutual mistake, or unilateral mistake if it was done fraudulently. Here, there are valid grounds for reformation. Steve will try to show that the parties did agree to Steve's conditions and had mutual assent to that. The fraud and deceit on Barbara's end has caused the contract to reflect terms that are not what the parties assented to. The court can alleviate the harm by rewriting the contract to the terms orally agreed on.

Recession

Recession is the equitable remedy of canceling the contract. There must (1) be a contract, (2) grounds for recession, and (3) no defenses.

Similarly, to reformation, Steve will argue that if the court finds there to be a valid contract, it should be voided due to the fraud or mistake. Since the contract was entered into through deception, the way to remedy the situation would be to put the parties in the position had the contract never been created. If the contract was never created, Steve would own it and Barbara would have her $500k.

Specific Performance based on Reformation

Specific performance is granted when there is a valid contract and one of the parties has failed to perform on some part of it.

Valid Contract with definite and certain terms

The contract based on the reformation would have definite and certain terms. Steve would retain mineral rights and have access to the land. Barbara may argue that Steve is unaware if the property even has any mineral deposits and therefore the terms are not definite. However, the terms do not state there are mineral rights just that if there are, he has the right to them.

Irreparable Harm/Inadequate Remedy at Law

The property is a unique good therefore there is an inadequate remedy at law. Furthermore, the lack of specific performance would create irreparable harm since he can lose right to the minerals. Money damages would not be sufficient. Furthermore since he has not even investigated the mineral deposits, he does not even know the value of what he is losing out on.

Mutuality

Under the contract, Steve has performed all of his terms. He has sold her the land and she is now in possession of it. There is no condition waiting to occur for Barbra to be required to perform. She has the property in her control and according to the terms of her deal she is required to perform.

Feasibility

The court may find this to be an issue in terms of feasibility. Since it involves the continuous supervision that he retains the mineral rights and has access to land.

However, Steve may argue that easements, licenses, extractions, are all similar and the court can enforce those. This should be no different. Furthermore, it is not like an employment contract that requires obligation of services. It would just require Barbara to give him access. She can leave the barricades up and just put a gate so Steve can go though.

TRO

A TRO is a temporary restraining order. It is issued before a preliminary hearing and can be issued ex parte. The purpose is to keep the status quo until a preliminary hearing can be held on the matter. Generally, it is 14 days. A TRO requires: irreparable harm, balancing of hardships weights in Ps favor, and likelihood of success on the merits.

Steve should ask for a TRO to make sure Barbara does not touch his mineral rights and/or to remove the barricades that prevent his access onto property.

Irreparable Harm

As analyzed above. Property is unique and if he loses access he would not be able to access the mineral rights of his property before the case is heard. In order to protect his interest, the court should issue an injunction. There is no indication that Barbara is doing anything, but because Steve is not able to see, it is impossible to know.

Balancing of Hardships

When balancing the hardships, it does not seem to make a difference to Barbara if she is not allowed to use her mineral rights. Babara may argue removing the barricades is beyond the status quo since it is already installed and removing them and putting them back would cause substantial harm. It would be a minor hardship. Barbara may argue removing the barricade is a huge hardship for her since she already erected them and to remove them would be costly especially if it is temporary. For Steve, if his rights are depleted, he would experience severe hardship. This weighs in Steve's favor.

Likelihood of Success on the Merits

If it is likely that the court will find Barbara acted fraudulently, 94his would mean that Steve should have the power to reform to rescind his contract. Either way, the issuance of the TRO would maintain the status quo until the issue is resolved on its merits.

Preliminary Injunction

Is nearly identical to a TRO however, it cannot be issued ex parte. A D must have notice. It is issued before or during a trial and lasts until the merits of the case are resolved. For the same reasons as stated above irreparable harm, balancing of hardships weighs in Ps favor and likelihood of success on the merits. Steve should seek a preliminary injunction to protect his potential interest in the mineral rights. He can also seek to get an injunction to remove the barricades that prevent his access onto property.

Equitable Defenses

Latches

If a plaintiff asserts an untimely claim, then the doctrine of laches may bar the plaintiffs claim.

Barbara will argue it is untimely since he did not file a claim after he read the contract but after the sale. When he decided to investigate whether his former property had any mineral deposits. It is only after Barbara refused him access to the property that he realized the signed contract did not contain his conditions. This argument will likely fail since presumably once he became aware, he filed suit. And as mentioned above he would argue that he was not negligent for relying on her fraudulent misrepresentation.

Unclean Hands

Bars recover if the plaintiff has unclean hands. This means that the plaintiff has been involved in some sort of fraud or deception.

Barbra will try to argue Steve has unclean hands since he did not investigate the mineral deposits before selling the land. This does not rise to the type of unclean hands the equitable defense is trying to protect. Therefore, this defense will fail.

2) Acme v. Barbra

Restitution - While restitution can be a legal remedy for monetary damages, it can also be an equitable remedy as a constructive trust and equitable lien. Restitution looks to see how the defendant has unjustly benefited. Here, Barbara was unjustly enriched from $250k which she had embezzled from her employer Acme.

Constructive Trust

A constructive trust is a judge constructed trust. The court will order a constructive trust if D has acquired title to property by unjust enrichment. If the courts can trace the money to purchase the property back to D's unjust enrichment, P can get a constructive trust on the property. This entitles the P to access the amount the property is now worth.

Barbra acquired title to Steve's property by $250k she stole from embezzling her employer. She paid $500k for Steve's property. Therefore, Acme can trace 50% of the value of the property to the money Barbra embezzled from them. If the property increases in value, Acme will also be entitled to that increase. On the downside, if the property decreases in value, Acme will not be entitled for the deficit. Therefore, if the property is going up in value, constructive trust should be used. If it is believed the property will decrease in value, Acme should opt for an equitable lien.

For example, under constructive trust if the property increases to $1 million, Acme is entitled to half of it, therefore they would be entitled to half a million. However, if the property is reduced to $100k, then Acme would be entitled to $100k and would not be able to recover the deficiency.

Equitable Lien

Has essentially the same elements as a constructive trust, however it will only give the P the amount that was taken. Furthermore, the funds do not need to be traced to the acquisition of title, but can be traced to the improvements as well. An equitable lien would allow the P to recover the deficiency judgment. It also would put their rights above unsecured creditors.

Acme can put an equitable lien on Barbara's property. She purchased that money using funds she embezzled from Acme. However, unlike a constructive trust where she is entitled to 50% here, she would be entitled just to the $250k. If the value of the property goes up, she is out of luck and will not get the access. However, if the value goes down, she will still be able to seek the deficiency judgement. For example, as mentioned above if the if the property increases to $1 million, Acme is still entitled to $250k. However, if the property is reduced to $100k then Acme would be entitled to $100k and would be able to recover the deficiency so they can be made whole.

Defenses

BFP

If the court orders the property to be returned to Steve, he can be considered a bona fide purchaser. This would bar the courts from putting a constructive trust or equitable lien on Steve's property.

Latches

If a plaintiff asserts an untimely claim, then the doctrine of latches may bar the plaintiffs claim.

It is unclear when Acme is bringing this claim, but it is assumed it is made timely. Furthermore, while Barbara embezzled from Acme twice, once they found out, they fired her which indicated timeliness.

Unclean Hands

Bars recover if the plaintiff has unclean hands. This means that the plaintiff has been involved in some sort of fraud or deception.

There is no indication that Acme has unclean hands. They likely have clean hands since they fired her after discovering her embezzlement.

3) Checking Account

Lowest Intermediate Balancing Rule

With restitution such as a constructive trust and equitable lien, the law assumes the lowest intermediate balancing rule. Which means that it is presumed that the defendant is taking the D's money out first, not the money it acquired unjustly.

At the time Barbara’s checking account contained $5,000. She later embezzled another $20,000 from Acme. At this point, the money she pulls out will first be deemed to have been a part of her $5,000. Once that is exhausted, the money taken unjustly from embezzlement will be reduced.

She then paid off $25,000 of her outstanding debt, bringing her checking balance to zero. Since the bank account was reduced to zero the presumption that the D's money will be used first no longer exist. At this point, she then deposited $10,000 of her own money into the checking account. Unfortunately at this point, Acme is not able to trace the embezzlement gains to Barbara's checking account. Therefore, Acme will not be able to recover under the lowest intermediate balancing rule. However, she should try to legal remedies as that may entitle her to the stolen money, but not through tracing.

S V. B - STEVE'S EQUITABLE REMEDIES.

Equitable remedies attempt to provide a solution that is the most fair considering the circumstances and often when legal (money) damages will be an inadequate remedy. Restitution is an equitable remedy and is typically measured by the benefit that the defendant unjustly gained from the plaintiff.

Contract Rescission & Reformation. When there are proper grounds for rescission, such as intentional misrepresentation, unilateral mistake or mutual mistake, the court will rescind or cancel the contract. Similar to the grounds for rescission, including intentional misrepresentation or unilateral mistake, the court may reform the contract to meet the innocent parties' intentions.

Intentional Misrepresentation. Intentional Misrepresentation occurs when a party intentionally misrepresents a material fact in the contract with the intention that the other party relies on the misrepresentation and where the other party actually does rely on the misrepresentation.

Here, B intentionally misrepresented a material fact of the contract when she orally accepted Steve's conditions and purposefully excluded these from the contract.

Material Fact. B will argue that the including a provision in the land-sale contract which allowed S to retain mineral rights in the property is not material to the K (contract) because the contract's predominant purpose is for the sale of the property, not the mineral rights.

However, this argument is weak because the S conditioned the entire sale on whether he would be able to retain the mineral rights in the property and even ensured to ask B whether the mineral rights were in the final written agreement like they negotiated.

Intent to Induce reliance. B intended to induce S's reliance when she lied about the contents of the agreement because when S specifically asked her whether the conditions he requested were in the final contract, B chose to lie to him by assuring him that they were in the contract at the time of signing. Further, she purposefully decided to not tell her attorney of Steve's conditions so that the attorney would not write his conditions into the contract and so that she could retain the mineral rights.

Does Induce reliance. B induced S's reliance because as a result of her intentional misrepresentation regarding the terms of the contract, S decided to sign the contract and give her the property.

Thus, S will be able to establish intentional misrepresentation which is a ground to rescind or reform the contract depending on S's desires.

Unilateral Mistake. A unilateral mistake occurs when one party intends for and believes that the contract terms include something when they actually do not, while the other party knows of their mistake and does not correct the misunderstanding. When a unilateral mistake occurs and the other party knows of the mistake but fails to disclose this to the innocent party, the court may rescind the contract or reform the contract to meet the intentions of the innocent party.

A unilateral mistake likely occurred as well because one party was mistaken as to facts which were material to the K. Further, since B was aware that S believed the contract terms were different than what they actually were and purposefully did not disclose this to him, S is considered the innocent party and his intentions will be honored if he decides to have the K reformed. In effect, the reformed contract will provide him with the mineral rights and access to the land as he previously requested.

Therefore, the court will likely reform the contract if Steve requests this. Reforming the contract may be the best remedy between rescission and reformation because by reforming the contract to include the mineral right access that he originally wanted, his contract goals will be met. However, if animosity remains between him and B, then he may not want to share a contract with her. If that is the case, then rescission will be his best option.

Injunctive Relief. There are various forms of injunctive relief which requires a party either to do something or refrain from doing something. A TRO and a preliminary injunction happen prior to the end of the trial in order to preserve the rights of the requesting party. Specific performance can occur after the trial has ended and would require the defendant to specifically perform his duties under the contract.

TRO. If Steve fears that Barbara may use up or sell the mineral rights that she is in possession of while the matter is sorted out, he may want to ask for a TRO (temporary restraining order) or preliminary injunction to keep B from taking either of thes actions. In order to obtain injunctive relief at the preliminary stages of the trial, the plaintiff must establish (1) Inadequate legal remedy (2) Irreparable harm 3) balancing of hardships that weigh in favor of P. (4) Likelihood of success on the merits.

(1) Inadequate legal remedy. Here, Steve will argue that money damages will be inadequate because the contract involves a unique thing, namely, the sale of land and mineral rights. Thus, forcing B to pay S money to compensate him will not be sufficient because land is irreplaceable.

(2) Irreparable Harm. Here, S will argue that he will suffer irreparable harm if the injunction is not granted because B may maliciously sell the minerals on the land that S is seeking. At that point he will not be able to get those minerals back even though they are rightfully his.

(3) balancing of hardships weigh in favor of P. If the injunction is not granted Steve's hardships will outweigh Barbara's because S values the minerals on the land more than B. Since S owned the property prior to B and specifically conditioned the contract on whether he would retain his mineral rights to the land, he obviously cares about them a lot and has more experience on how to utilize the mineral deposits because he's done so in the past when he owned the land. B will argue that she will suffer greater harm than S will because B does not want to have to share access to her land with someone she doesn't know. However, this was what was originally contracted for, so B's argument is weak. On balance, S will suffer greater harm than B.

(4) Likelihood of success on the merits. S has a high likelihood of success in a claim against B to reform or rescind the contract because B engaged in fraudulent behavior to induce S into entering into the contract.

Therefore, the court will grant a TRO or preliminary injunction if S requests this equitable remedy.

Specific Performance. Specific performance is a form of injunctive relief that requires to ask the court to require a party to specifically do something. If the K is reformed to meet the intent of Steve, then he may have to ask the court to require B to specifically perform her obligations under the K if she continues to refuse. Specific performance may be granted if the plaintiff can show (1) a Valid contract exists (2) there are clear and definite terms to enforce (3) legal remedies will be inadequate (4) feasibility and (5) no defenses to specific performance exist.

(1) a Valid contract exists. A valid contract exists because S and B both entered into a written contract for the sale of the land which they both signed.

(2) there are clear and definite terms to enforce. Since the contract terms do not reflect the intent of both parties but rather only B's intent, the terms are not clear and definite. As a result, the court will have trouble requiring B to specifically perform under the contract because the contract terms are not what S is seeking.

(3) legal remedies will be inadequate. See analysis under TRO

(4) feasibility. Requiring a party to perform under the contract must be feasible for the court to enforce and supervise. It may be difficult for the court to ensure that B is allowing S to access the minerals on her land because at any point, B may decide to erect the barricades again.

(5) no defenses to specific performance exist. It is unlikely that any equitable defenses apply that would bar injunctive or other equitable relief.

In conclusion, specific performance is not going to be granted because the terms of the contract are incorrect. However, a TRO or a preliminary injunction requiring B to allow S access to the property until the contract is reformed or rescinded will allow S to obtain the benefits that he would have been entitled to.

Equitable Defenses

Laches. Laches could bar a plaintiffs recover if the plaintiff waited an unduly long time to bring their claim against the defendant and this delay prejudiced the defendant.

Here, laches will not help B because there's no indication that S waited a long time prior to bringing his claim. B may argue that as soon as the contract was formed, S should have visited the land to check whether he could enforce his mineral rights and access the property. However, just "shortly after the sale" S decided to investigate the property and exercise his mineral rights, so he definitely did not delay asserting his rights. Further, B has suffered no prejudice. Thus, laches will not apply.

Unclean Hands. Unclean hands exists when the plaintiff acted with bad intent when contracting. S did not act with bad intent. In fact, he was the innocent party who suffered from B's fraud.

A V. B - ACME'S EQUITABLE REMEDIES.

Constructive Lien / Equitable Trust. When a defendant uses the profits he obtained from the plaintiff unjustly for other things, and the plaintiff can trace the source of the funds to the property or bank account, the plaintiff can get a constructive trust or equitable lien over the property. The elements are (1) D has legal title to the property (2) D was unjustly enriched (3) money damages are inadequate.

Here, B embezzled $250k from Acme (A) which A can trace back to the purchase of the Columbia property. B has legal title to the Columbia property because she purchased the land in a valid land sale contract. Next, B was obviously unjustly enriched because she is able to keep the entire property she purchased 50% of which was purchased using A's stolen funds. If she hadn't embezzled A's funds, then she likely wouldn't have had enough money to purchase the property at all. Last, money damages might be an adequate remedy because A just wants the money back that was embezzled. However, since B's bank account has a balance of $0, she will not be able to return the money she stole. Thus, money damages are inadequate.

In conclusion, a constructive trust or equitable, will likely be granted by the court if A requests this equitable remedy. When the value of the property purchased with the plaintiff's money has increased, the plaintiff is better off requesting a constructive trust because this allows the plaintiff to keep the entire property. In contrast, equitable liens effectively sell off the property and return the proceeds back to the plaintiff for the exact amount that was stolen from them, even if the property sold for more. Acme is better off requesting a constructive trust because property tends to increase in value.

A'S RECOVERY FROM B'S CHECKING ACCOUNT

Commingled Funds. Typically, when a defendant embezzles or otherwise steals, the stolen property or money can be traced to the defendants' purchases. However, once the defendant begins mixing the stolen funds with her own funds, tracing will become very difficult, and the plaintiff won't be able to continue tracing.

Here, B embezzled $20k from A which she deposited into her checking account containing $5k of her own funds. At this point the embezzled money likely could still have been traced and returned to A. However, once B used the entirety of the fund to pay off debts, bringing her balance to $0, the funds were no longer recoverable by A because they could no longer be traced.

In conclusion, Acme will not be able to recover the $20k as part of an equitable remedy from Barbara's checking account.

QUESTION 1

DuraTires manufactures and installs specially coated tires. DuraTires advertised that a scientific report declared that its tires will not go flat for the first 7,000 miles of use if driven properly. DuraTires' scientific report was created at the direction of its legal counsel and contained research on flat tire incidents involving DuraTires.

Pam purchased four new tires from DuraTires and had them installed by Maurice, a mechanic. Pam drove 100 miles and one tire went flat, causing Pam to swerve and crash into another car. Pam was not physically injured in the accident. Pam gathered a written statement from the other driver, Wynne, who suffered a minor injury. Wynne's statement was favorable to Pam's case.

Pam filed and properly served a complaint in federal court against DuraTires for breach of warranty and negligent installation and manufacture of the tires. The federal court had proper jurisdiction over Pam's complaint. Pam alleged that she suffered property damage and emotional distress as a result of the accident.

DuraTires filed a motion to dismiss for failure to join Maurice as a defendant. The court denied DuraTires' motion. DuraTires filed and properly served an answer to Pam's complaint.

Pam served her initial disclosures on DuraTires, but did not produce Wynne's statement. DuraTires filed and served motions to compel Pam to produce Wynne's statement and for Pam to submit to a physical examination. The court granted both of DuraTires' motions.

DuraTires served its initial disclosures, but did not include the advertised scientific report. Pam met and conferred with DuraTires, which refused to produce its scientific report. Pam filed a motion to compel DuraTires to produce its scientific report. The court granted Pam's motion and ordered DuraTires to produce its scientific report.

1. Did the court properly deny DuraTires' motion to dismiss? Discuss.

    A. To compel production of the statement from Wynne? Discuss.

QUESTION 1: SELECTED ANSWER A

1. D's Motion to Dismiss

A party may move to dismiss for failure to join a necessary party. A party is deemed necessary when its participation is required for a just adjudication. A court will consider the risk of prejudice to the current parties, as well as the potentially "necessary" party if the party is absent.

Specifically, it will analyze whether the existing parties can achieve complete relief without the "necessary" party. It will also consider the risk of multiple or inconsistent obligations that may occur if that party is absent. When a party is necessary, that party must be joined if it is feasible, meaning adding them will not defeat the court's subject matter jurisdiction and there is personal jurisdiction over the party. If it is not feasible to join such a party, a court will decide whether to proceed without them, or whether to deem them "indispensable" and dismiss the entire case, so the case may be re-filed with that party. Factors that will be considered in making such a determination are the extent of prejudice that may result, and potential ways that prejudice can be mitigated.

Here, DuraTires filed a motion to dismiss for failure to join Maurice as a defendant. Maurice is relevant to the litigation because he was the mechanic who installed the tires that allegedly caused Pam's harm. Additionally, P specifically alleges a claim for "negligent installation" of the tires, which was done by Maurice.

Potentially jointly and severally liable tortfeasors, meaning those who are both liable for a single, inseparable harm, are not necessary parties. Here, P will argue that DuraTires and Maurice fit that description, as P is suing for "negligent installation and manufacture," which combined led to her harm, so the court properly denied the motion to dismiss for that reason. D manufactured the tires, and M installed them. It appears M was likely working for or with D, as the facts state D is in the business of "manufacturing and installing tires." The plaintiff P may still obtain complete relief from the existing defendant D, because when defendants are jointly and severally liable, the plaintiff can obtain complete relief from any one of the defendants. Further, the existing defendant D is not prejudiced because he can later seek contribution or indemnification from the third party (or seek to implead him in the current case). The third party, Maurice, is not prejudiced because he may still defend his interest in such a later contribution or indemnification claim by DuraTires. Thus, Maurice is not a necessary party and did not need to be joined.

2a. Motion to Compel Production of Wynne's Statement

The scope of discoverable material includes all material that is relevant to a party's claim or defense, is not privileged, and is proportionate to the needs of the case. Discoverable material need not be admissible, but it does need to be reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible material.

Initial disclosures must include the names and contact information of likely witnesses, relevant tangible evidence (documents and things), and insurance policies, that are in the party's possession and that the party may use to support its claims or defenses. Prior to filing a motion to compel evidence, the opposing party must attempt in good faith to confer with the other party to try to get the relief sought without court intervention.

Here, P had possession of W's statement, which was favorable to her case, so she would likely be using this to support her claim at trial. W was also injured as part of P's accident, so her statement regarding that accident is relevant to both P's claim, and D's potential defenses.

Additionally, there is no undue burden that appears present from P being required to compel this, and she would likely need to produce it anyway as part of her final pretrial disclosures, which requires production of likely testimony of witnesses who will be testifying. Therefore, W's statement is within the scope of discovery. However, it appears that DuraTires failed to attempt to confer with P prior to making this motion to compel, so P will likely argue that the granting of this motion was improper for that reason. On balance, it is likely that the court still properly granted this motion, because the statement fits the scope of discovery, but it may sanction D for failing to confer first.

2b. Motion to Compel a Physical Examination of Pam

A party may compel a physical examination of an opposing party when it obtains a court order to do so, after showing good cause for the examination, and that the physical condition of the party is at issue. D will argue this examination is relevant because it will assist it in preparing its defense against P's claims. However, this will be unsuccessful.

A physical examination of Pam is inappropriate here because she has not alleged that she was physically injured as a result of the accident. She is only seeking relief for her property damage and emotional distress that resulted from the accident. Thus P's physical condition is not in issue, and there is no good cause for this examination. D instead could have sought a mental examination, because P's mental state (her alleged emotional distress) is at issue. The court properly denied this request for a physical examination.

3. DuraTires' Scientific Report

See rule above for scope of discovery, which excludes privileged material. D's scientific report is relevant to this case because it specifies the warranty that P is claiming was breached by D-- that the tires will not go flat for the first 7,000 miles of use if driven properly, as the tires went flat after she only drove 100 miles. Further, it is tangible evidence within the possession of D, that will likely be used to support its defense, as it states that the 7,000 mile warranty is only in place when the car is "driven properly." Additionally, P properly conferred with D regarding this piece of evidence prior to filing the motion to compel. Further, if D will likely have the expert who prepared the report testify at trial, or another expert who uses this report as the basis for his opinion, the report could also be compelled as part of the mandatory disclosure of expert witness materials, which include the bases each testifying expert relied upon. However, D will likely argue that it should not have been required to produce this report because it is privileged.

Work product protects from discovery documents that were created by or at the direction of the opposing party's attorney, in anticipation of litigation or for trial. The scientific report here was created that the direction of its legal counsel, but it is unclear whether that was done in anticipation for litigation. D will argue that it was, because it contained research on flat tire incidents involving D, which D likely anticipated being sued about. Based on those facts, it is likely the document is protected by work product privilege. However, work product that does not include the attorney’s mental impressions, opinions, or legal theories or research; and instead only contains factual information relevant to the case, is discoverable when the opposing party demonstrates a substantial need for the material, and that there would be an undue burden in obtaining it from other sources. Here, the scientific report contains factual information about flat tire incidents, so if it does not also contain mental impressions, opinions, or legal theories or research (which is not indicated by these facts), it may be compelled if P shows such a substantial need and undue burden. P likely does have a substantial need for this information, as research on other flat tire incidents involving D would be highly material to her claim regarding this accident caused by such a flat tire. Additionally, conducting this research herself would be very burdensome and expensive, which would likely cause her prejudice. On balance, the court properly ordered D to produce this report under the exception to work product.

Attorney-client privilege protects against compelled disclosure of confidential communications between attorney and client, made for the purpose of obtaining legal representation or advice. D will also likely argue that the scientific report is privileged because it was created at the direction of the attorney. However, it does not appear on these facts that this was a confidential communication between D and their attorney (or investigators employed by the attorney for purposes of legal services), although more facts are needed to properly determine this. Further, because the report was the basis of D's advertisements, it does not appear that D attempted to keep this confidential or private from third parties. When material portions of an allegedly privileged communication are voluntarily communicated to third parties, the privilege as to that information is generally waived. More facts are needed regarding whether D attempted to maintain the confidentiality of this communication. However, if D's experts will be relying on this material as basis for their opinions, it will likely be discoverable as part of the mandatory expert witness disclosures.

QUESTION 1: SELECTED ANSWER B

1. Did the court properly deny DuraTires' motion to dismiss?

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure ("FRCP") govern the procedural process in federal court. Pursuant to the FRCP 10, a defendant may file a motion to dismiss in response to a complaint filed against them. There are numerous grounds for filing a motion to dismiss. For example, a defendant can file a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted, or for lack of personal jurisdiction. Here, DuraTires ("DT") filed a motion to dismiss for failure to join Maurice as a defendant. Maurice is the mechanic who installed the four new tires that Pam purchased from DT. Failure to join a necessary party is a permissible ground for filing a motion to dismiss. So, the first issue is whether Maurice was a necessary party.

Failure to Join a Necessary Party

A party is a necessary party under the FRCP if complete relief cannot be granted without them or if there absence from the case subjects them to inconsistent judgments. Generally, joint tortfeasers are not necessary parties. Joint tortfeasers are jointly and severally liable to successful plaintiffs and tortfeasor defendants may thereafter seek contribution from joint tortfeasers who have not paid their fair share of the award. However, because a plaintiff can collect their full damages from any one tortfeaser, tortfeasers are not generally necessary parties. In other words, tort plaintiffs can go after tortfeasers in one combined action, or in consecutive actions, and tortfeasers themselves can go after joint tortfeasers in separate actions if they were not joined in an initial action.

Here, Pam is bringing suit for breach of warranty and negligent installation and manufacturer of the tires. She has chosen to sue DT, the manufacturer and installer of the tires. Despite the fact that Maurice, the mechanic, may have been negligent in installing the tires, Pam is permitted to bring her suit solely against DT. Maurice is not a necessary party and the federal court properly denied DuraTires' motion to dismiss for failure to join Maurice as a defendant.

If Pam successfully proves her claims against DT, DT can go after Maurice for contribution if he was contributorily negligent in installing the tires. Pam may also bring a second action against only Maurice for his negligence. There are many reasons for why Pam might not have brought suit against Maurice (maybe it would destroy diversity jurisdiction in federal court or maybe he's insolvent) and the court will not dismiss the claim because she did not include him.

If DT wants to join Maurice in the case, they may be able to file a third party claim against him. Third party claims are permissible in federal court. However, DT will have to ensure that the federal court has subject matter jurisdiction over that claim and personal jurisdiction over Maurice. Because this is a diversity case (we have no reason to believe that breach of warranty and negligent installation and manufacture arise under federal law), complete diversity and $75,000 in controversy will be required. If this is not satisfied, DT will have to show supplemental jurisdiction, which will require them to show that their claim arises from the same transaction or occurrence.

2(A). Did the Court properly grant DuraTires' motion to compel the production of the statement from Wynne?

In federal court, parties are entitled to seek discovery of all relevant non-privileged information that is proportional to the needs of the case. Discoverable information is broader than admissible information. Relevant information is any information that has any tendency to make a fact of consequence more or less likely. The proportionality requirement ensures that parties do not request unduly burdensome amounts of information.

Under the FRCP, parties are required to file initial disclosures. In their initial disclosures, parties must identify and/or produce the names of all individuals who are reasonably expected to have discoverable information relevant to the claims or defenses. Parties are also required to identify and produce the documents in their possession which they intend to rely on in proving any of their claims or defenses. Opposing parties do not have to request this information prior to the initial disclosure deadline. Finally, in initial disclosures, parties must identify whether they have an insurance policy covering the claim.

Motions to compel are a discovery tool that enable a party to seek discoverable information from an opposing party when the opposing party has failed to produce the information. Generally, before filing a motion to compel with the court, parties should attempt to meet and confer regarding a discovery dispute. The point of a meet and confer is to attempt to work out reasonable disagreements about the discovery process between the parties before involving the judge. If a party has attempted to meet and confer with opposing counsel and the parties have failed to reach an agreement, or the opposing party refused to engage in negotiations, the moving party should file a motion to compel. Pursuant to FRCP 11, the court has wide discretion to impose sanctions on a party that files frivolous discovery motions or fails to engage in the meet and confer process regarding reasonable discovery disputes. In some instances, the court could order a losing party to pay the costs of the motion to compel if they did not engage in good faith.

Here, Pam served her initial disclosures on DT, but did not produce Wynne's statement. Wynne was the other driver in Pam's accident. Pam gathered the written statement from Wynne after the accident. Wynne suffered a minor injury in the accident and her statement was favorable to Pam's case. There is no indication that DT sought to meet and confer with Pam before filing a motion to compel.

The court properly granted DT's motion to compel production of the statement from Wynne. Because the statement from Wynne was favorable to Pam's case, and it is in Pam's possession, Pam will reasonably rely on it in proving her case for breach of warranty and negligent installation and manufacture of the tires. Wynne's statement could presumably say something about what Wynne witnessed regarding the state of the tires during the accident. Pam will want to rely on this to prove her case. Accordingly, the court properly granted DT's motion to compel production of the statement from Wynne.

(Please note that if the statement was not in Pam's possession, DT may have needed to subpoena Wynne as a third party to obtain the statement. Because it appears Pam gathered the written statement, and it is thus in her possession, and because she is a party, a subpoena is not required.)

2(B). Did the Court properly grant DuraTires' motion to compel a physical examination of Pam?

The FRCP provide for certain circumstances in which a party is permitted to compel an opposing party to submit to a physical examination or psychological examination. Generally, for these rules to be relevant, the party's physical condition (for a physical exam) or psychological condition (for a psychological exam) must be relevant to the claims. A psychological exam always requires court involvement.

Here, the issue is whether the court properly granted DT's motion to compel a physical examination of Pam. The court erred in granting this motion because Pam's physical condition is not relevant to the case. Pam was not physically injured in the case. Her complaint alleges only that she suffered property damage and emotional distress as a result of the accident.

Accordingly, Pam has not put her physical condition in issue in the case, and the court erred in granting DT's motion to compel a physical examination of Pam.

3. Did the court properly order DuraTires to produce its scientific report?

The next issue is whether the court properly ordered DT to produce its scientific report. DT advertised that a scientific report declared that its tires will not go flat for the first 7,000 miles of use if driven properly. DT's scientific report was created at the direction of its legal counsel and contained research on flat tire incidents involving DT.

As set forth above, all relevant, non-privileged information is discoverable, subject to the proportionality requirement. Privileged information is not discoverable. Privileged information can be information protected by the attorney-client privilege or the work product doctrine. The attorney-client privilege protects confidential communications made by a client to counsel in furtherance of the representation. The privilege belongs to the client and survives the attorney-client relationship and the client's death. The work product doctrine protects information prepared in anticipation of litigation. These doctrines do not protect underlying facts.

Here, DT served its initial disclosures on Pam but did not include the advertised scientific report. After unsuccessful meet and confers, DT continued to refuse to produce the report. Thereafter, Pam filed a motion to compel, which the court granted.

As an initial matter, the advertised scientific report is clearly relevant to the dispute. Apparently, the report declared that DT's tires will not go flat for the first 7,000 miles of use if driven properly. This is presumably the basis for Pam's breach of warranty claim. What the report says thus is clearly relevant to Pam's claim that she had only driven 100 miles when one tire went flat, causing her to swerve and crash into Wynne's car.

The issue is whether the report is protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product doctrine. The attorney-client privilege does not apply because the report is not confidential information communicated to counsel. However, DT will likely argue that the report is protected work product because it was prepared at the direction of its legal counsel and contained research on flat tire incidents involving DT. This is a losing argument. As set forth above, the work product doctrine protects documents prepared in anticipation of litigation or for the purpose of litigation. While DT may try to argue that the report was prepared for litigation generally, Pam will counter that "anticipation of litigation" means specific litigation. For example, work product will protect an attorney's report summarizing an interview with the client or relevant witnesses. It will also protect a report prepared by a retained expert regarding the circumstances giving rise to litigation.

This report was prepared at the direction of counsel, but before Pam's accident, so it cannot fairly be said to have been prepared in anticipation of Pam's litigation.

Another important factor weighing in favor of finding that the report is not protected by the work product doctrine is the fact that DT advertised the report. DT will argue that it did not waive its work product protection by advertising the report because it only advertised a specific claim that the tires would not go flat for the first 7,000 miles. It did not publish the entire report. If the entire report was published or advertised, then presumably Pam wouldn't need to file a motion to compel to obtain it. Pam will argue that, even if the report was prepared "in anticipation of litigation," DT waived the work product protection by advertising the report.

Additionally, the work product doctrine is intended to protect attorney mental impressions and general litigation strategy. As set forth above, it does not protect underlying facts. So, to the extent the report contains only research on flat tire incidents and scientific reporting about the efficacy of DT's tires, it will be admissible. It is important to note that if the report contains attorney mental impressions, notes or litigation strategy information, the court should permit DT to redact this information before producing it. However, there is no reason to believe in this situation that there is anything that requires redaction.

It is also worth noting that Pam followed the required procedures and met and conferred with DT before raising the motion to compel with the court.

In sum, the scientific report is clearly relevant and is not protected by attorney-client privilege or the work product doctrine. Thus, the court properly ordered DT to produce its scientific report.

QUESTION 2

In response to a significant rise in diabetes among school-age children, and based upon links between diabetes, exercise and diet, Congress has passed, and the President has signed, the Childhood Physical Education Act (the Act). The Act, administered by the Federal Department of Education, provides significant additional funds to states for public schools with daily physical education classes for students. These funds are to be used for the hiring of additional physical education teachers and purchase of physical education equipment.

Testimony before Congress has revealed that, on average, public schools spend only 25% of their school lunch budgets on fresh fruits and vegetables. The Act requires that states accepting the funds must enact legislation setting as a minimum that 50% of public school lunch food budgets be allocated to the purchase of fresh fruits and vegetables.

Testimony has also revealed that rates of childhood diabetes tend to be highest in minority and low-income communities. The Act has significant additional subsidies for public schools where the majority of the student population is non-Caucasian.

Before the Act has gone into effect, State X, through its attorney general, has brought suit in federal court seeking a declaratory judgment that the Act is unconstitutional. The National Association of School Dieticians (NASD) is seeking to intervene in the attorney general's lawsuit. According to NASD's charter, it seeks to promote healthy diets for school-age children, especially through school lunch programs. The attorney general opposes NASD's intervention.

1. What constitutional challenges can the attorney general make to the Act and are they likely to succeed? Discuss.

2. Does NASD have standing to intervene? Discuss

QUESTION 2: SELECTED ANSWER A

1. Constitutional challenges to the Act

The Act was properly passed by Congress and signed by the President, so the AG cannot challenge the Act on those procedural grounds.

Spending Clause

The AG might argue that the Act is not a proper exercise of Congress's spending power. However, this argument will fail. Congress may spend to promote the general welfare; spending is itself an enumerated power of Congress, so spending bills do not have to be rooted in a different enumerated power. Other than the requirement that states pass certain laws, discussed more below, the Act is purely a spending bill, and any enumerated powers challenge will fail.

Spending requirement on fruits and vegetables

The Act's requirement that states enact legislation setting a minimum of 50% of public school lunch budgets be allocated to fresh fruits and vegetables is permissible under the constitution.

1. Anti-commandeering

If the requirement were a direct requirement that states pass laws, then it would be unconstitutional as a violation of the Tenth Amendment. The Tenth Amendment reserves all powers not given to the federal government to the states (or to the people). The Tenth Amendment embodies the principles of federalism, and core among those principles is that the federal government may not command state legislatures to pass certain laws, because states are sovereign governments and not merely local agents of the federal government. This is called the "anti-commandeering" principle. To demand a state pass a certain law violates that principle.

(Further, if the law were written that way--as a direct command--then the Spending Clause would not provide a basis for Congress's act, and another basis would be required. The Commerce Clause might provide such a basis, except that Congress's commerce power cannot force anyone, which presumably includes the states, to engage in commerce.)

2. Condition on funding - Dole test

However, that is not the way the Act is written. Instead, it is a requirement for states that accept the funding to pass these fruit-and-vegetable laws. Such conditions on funding are permissible, even if they require states to pass a law, so long as the Dole test is satisfied: The funding must be reasonably related to the spending and it must not be such a great amount of money as to be coercive. This inquiry also looks at whether the program is well- established. Because this test is rooted in the Tenth Amendment, the separate anti- commandeering test is not further applied.

Here, the conditions are reasonably related to the spending, because the purpose of the bill is to combat childhood diabetes. It does that in several ways, including providing the spending for PE classes and the other subsidies. The fit need not be perfect; for example, the federal government may require seatbelt laws and a minimum drinking age in exchange for highway funding. The connection between the low budgets for fruits and vegetables and combatting childhood obesity is sufficiently tight: All the federal funding for PE education may be essentially wasted if the children then go eat very unhealthy foods at lunch right after class.

The facts don't say whether the amount of money is large or small. However, state lunch programs should be quite small as a proportion of state budgets: While education is a big part of state budgets, the lunch money is a relatively small fraction of that--most of the education budget will be the buildings and buses and teachers, not the lunch food. Therefore, it is not coercive to require states to spend this amount of money on lunches (especially because it is structured as a fraction of the total public school lunch budget).

Further, the programs at issue are brand-new, so a state is especially free to turn down the funding and opt out of the program entirely. This is quite different from a situation like Medicaid, where states have long-established budgets built around Medicaid funding from the federal government. The states will not be coerced in this way either.

An additional requirement of Dole is that the required state act may not violate another constitutional right, such as the First Amendment. Spending money on fruits and vegetables will not violate any other such right.

Therefore, since this provision is a condition on the other funding, this requirement does not violate the constitution.

Equal Protection

The Equal Protection Clause (EPC) of the Fourteenth Amendment requires the government to treat people the same in various ways.

The EPC by its text applies to the states; but the same rules apply to the federal government via the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, which "reverse-incorporates" the EPC against the federal government.

The EPC can only be violated by the government, not private parties. There is such "state action" here in the form of the federal government passing the law and spending the money, and the states being forced to pass the lunch money laws.

1. First two provisions

The first two parts of the law, appropriating funding for PE classes and requiring states to budget lunch money for vegetables, do not differentiate on any suspect class such as race, gender, national origin, or legitimacy. Therefore, only rational basis review applies. Rational basis review requires that the government have a legitimate interest and that the means are rationally related to that interest. Both are satisfied for the first two provisions: Congress has factual findings about a significant rise in childhood obesity and the links between diabetes, exercise, and diet. Childhood diabetes is a legitimate concern of the government because it hugely affects the lives of children. And to combat childhood diabetes, the government is rationally focusing on physical education (exercise) and lunch quality (diet). (The evidence for this review need not be very strong, and can be hypothetical. But here, there is specific evidence about exercise and state budgets.) These two provisions definitely do not violate the EPC.

2. Extra subsidies

However, the last provision of the Act is constitutionally problematic. That provision provides "significant additional subsidies" for public schools based on whether the majority of the school is Caucasian. That is, it treats people differently based on their race (and the race of those around them). Race is a suspect class and triggers strict scrutiny under the EPC. Strict scrutiny requires that the government have a compelling government interest and take action that is necessary to accomplish that action.

Here, childhood diabetes does not rise to the level of a compelling government interest, despite its importance, because there are simply too many concerns of similar importance (even among health conditions alone) to justify the extraordinary step of discriminating on the basis of race. (Nor is there past specific discrimination that Congress is rectifying, which can be a compelling interest.)

But even if it were, the action here is not necessary or narrowly tailored. Congress is allocating "significant" budgets to schools based on their students' races. This is not "necessary" to fixing differential childhood obesity rates. For one thing, Congress could allocate such additional funds to all schools.

In any case, the action is not properly tailored: Congress has findings that diabetes is most prevalent in minority and low-income communities. But the funding is directed solely based on the race of the community, not its income level. So some funding will go to wealthy schools who are mainly minorities, while funding won't go to poor white schools with sky-high diabetes rates. (Note that income is not a protected or suspect class.)

This provision of the Act violates the EPC, so the challenge to it should succeed on the merits.

Additional issues

State X standing

Standing (discussed more below) is present for State X because the law requires them to take action (passing laws) and affects their state budgets. States also get "special solicitude" in the standing analysis, so even if it were a close question, a court would likely find that there is standing.

Ripeness

Article III's "cases or controversies" requirement means that courts will not hear cases before they are ripe--before the injury is present or imminent. Here, the Act has not yet gone into effect. This might mean that the case is not ripe yet. However, a court is not likely to rule on this ground because the law has been passed by Congress and signed by the President, so the question of whether it is constitutional is ready to be adjudicated. States are now faced with the certainty of the law going into effect unless it is blocked, and must prepare themselves and their budgets now, not later.

2. NASD standing

Article III limits the federal courts to hearing "cases" or "controversies." This limitation has been interpreted to include the requirement of "standing." Standing's irreducible constitutional minimum has three components: Injury in fact, causation, and redressability.

Injury in fact

The injury-in-fact requirement means that a party must have a real, concrete harm that is actual or imminent, and not just hypothetical. Economic losses are the classic form of injury in fact.

NASD has no economic losses. Their argument will be that they still have an injury because the implementation or non-implementation of the act will further or harm their group's mission. But there is no standing based on merely an interest in seeing that the laws are applied correctly; groups cannot intervene merely because they are interested in the policy question at stake. A mission statement cannot confer standing.

A better argument is that NASD's budget will be severely affected by this legislation: if it goes into effect, they will have to spend less money advocating for healthy lunches, because states will be required to spend more money. That argument is too hypothetical, because NASD may have to spend the same or even more money as the policy space evolves. Therefore, any such injury is too hypothetical to be an injury in fact (which must be more certain).

Causation

Causation means that the other party's actions are the cause of the party's injury. Even if a court accepted the knock-on argument about NASD's budget, the causation would be too diluted, because NASD is not itself spending its budget on fruits and vegetables. The state's expenditures would not neatly replace NASD's, so any economic harm to NASD's budget is not caused by the law going into effect or not.

Redressability

Redressability means that a court's judgment would fix or cure the injury in fact (at least in part). Here, because the injury and causation prongs are not met, the redressability prong is not met either (though arguably the court could let the law go into effect, but all three prongs must be met, so this prong need not be reached).

Other theories of standing also fail.

Associational standing

An association has standing when its members would have standing to bring the suit themselves. The NASD members appear to be school dietitians. For the reasons explained above, any given school dietician does not have an injury-in-fact, because they are not personally harmed by the law going into effect or not going into effect.

Taxpayer standing

NASD or its members cannot have standing on the basis of their status as taxpayers. Taxpayer standing argues that the party's interest is in the correct use of their tax dollars. But absent extremely narrow circumstances (mainly religious establishment clause issues), there is no taxpayer standing because it would swallow the "cases or controversies" requirement.

Conclusion

Therefore, NASD does not have standing to intervene.

(However, it is common in federal courts to allow a party like NASD to participate as amicus curiae in a lawsuit, but not as a party. In this capacity NASD could file amicus briefs to let the court benefit from its expertise. However, as a non-party, it could not bring claims or defenses or engage in discovery. An amicus curiae does not have to meet the standing requirement because it is not a party.)

QUESTION 2: SELECTED ANSWER B

(1) Constitutional challenges against the Act

The first issue is what constitutional challenges the attorney general ("AG") may bring against the Act. The AG can challenge the legislation as a (1) violation of the Tenth Amendment's anti-commandeering principle and (2) a violation of the equal protection clause.

1. Violation of the Tenth Amendment anti-commandeering principle

The AG can first challenge the Act as a violation of the Tenth Amendment's anti-commandeering principle. The federal government is one of limited powers, and can only act with authorization under the Constitution. States, on the other hand, have general police powers. The Tenth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution provides that all powers not vested in the federal government are reserved to the states.

The first issue is whether the federal government had power to enact the legislation. The U.S. Constitution grants to Congress the power to tax and spend for the general welfare. This power is very broad, and just requires a rational connection to a legitimate purpose. Here, the Act was enacted in response to a significant rise in diabetes among school-age children, which affects the health and welfare of the nation's citizens. The Act provides additional federal funding for the hiring of P.E. teachers, purchase of P.E. equipment, and healthier school lunches. The Act's purpose is to increase the physical education in schools and also improve the health of school lunches, which was based on the link between diabetes, exercise, and diet. Because the Act was rationally related to the goal of reducing diabetes and improving the health of school-age children, the Act was within Congress's taxing and spending power.

The next issue is whether the federal government's act nonetheless violated the Tenth Amendment and principles of federalism. The federal and state governments are separate sovereigns, the federal government may not exercise its spending and taxing power in such a way as to "commandeer" the states to act. This is called the anti-commandeering principle.

Under the anti-commandeering principle, a spending measure enacted by Congress will be invalidated if it (1) directly compels the states to act or (2) is unduly coercive, such that the states are left with no choice but to comply with the federal government's directives.

Here, the Act does not directly force the states to enact litigation, so (1) is not applicable. However, the Act does involve strings or conditions on the receipt of federal funding that the AG may argue are unduly coercive.

Here, the Act makes receipt of the "significant" additional funds conditioned on the states enacting certain legislation related to the Act's purpose. Specifically, if the states receive the funding, they are required to set as a minimum that 50% of public school lunch food budgets be allocated to the purchase of fresh fruits and vegetables.

The AG may argue that this spending condition is unduly coercive, effectively "commandeering" the state legislatures to enact legislation that the federal government desires. AG's strongest argument is that the Act provides "significant funding," and states may therefore feel compelled to comply with the conditions because the financial upside is so high (and public schools are notoriously under-funded.)

This argument, however, is not likely to succeed. The Act does not make any changes to the federal funding states already receive for the administration of public schooling; it merely adds additional funds. A spending condition is more likely to be found to be unduly coercive where, for example, the condition threatens a significant portion of the state's budget. For example, if the Act made the receipt of all federal funding for public schools conditioned on enacting the desired legislation, the AG would have a stronger argument. But the Act here keeps schools' normal amount of federal funding intact; it just gives them the option of obtaining more federal funding.

The AG will therefore likely not succeed in a challenge to the Act based on the anti-commandeering principle of the Tenth Amendment.

2. Violation of the Equal Protection Clause

The AG may also argue that the Act's additional subsidies to majority-non-white schools violates the equal protection clause.

The Equal Protection Clause ("EPC") of the Fourteenth Amendment provides that the government shall treat similarly-situated people or entities in a similar way. Although the Fourteenth Amendment is applicable only to the states, the Fifth Amendment's due process clause -- applicable to the federal government -- has been held to contain an identical guarantee.

The level of review applicable to a challenge under the EPC depends on whether the government's action burdens a suspect or quasi-suspect classification. Suspect classifications (including race, national origin, and alienage) are subject to strict scrutiny, meaning that the government must prove that the action is narrowly tailored to serve a compelling government purpose. Quasi-suspect classifications (gender and legitimacy) receive intermediate scrutiny; the government must prove that the action is necessary to achieve a substantial government interest. All other classifications receive rational basis review, which means the government action must be rationally related to a legitimate government purpose.

Here, the Act provides significant additional subsidies for public schools where the majority of the student population is non-Caucasian. Accordingly, the Act, on its face, draws a distinction between schools with majority white students and schools with majority non-white students. Because this is a classification based on race, the government must prove that the action is narrowly tailored to serve a compelling government purpose. The government, not the AG, bears the burden on this issue.

The stated purpose for the Act's additional subsidies is that rates of childhood diabetes tend to be highest in minority and low-income communities, so it is providing the additional funding to provide extra help to those schools in combatting these issues. The government can likely prove that reducing the rate of childhood diabetes is a compelling government purpose. The diabetes and obesity epidemic in this country results in a huge burden on the country's public health infrastructure and leads to countless deaths each year. The fact that there is a "significant rise" in childhood diabetes makes it even more crucial to combat the disease earlier rather than later.

The government, however, likely cannot prove that the additional subsidies are narrowly-tailored to serve that purpose. The facts state that there has been a significant rise in diabetes among all school-age children, not just minority children. The additional subsidies are based on testimony that the rate of childhood diabetes "tends to be higher" in minority and low-income schools, but there is no additional evidence that the Act's "significant additional funds" that already will be provided to all schools will not be enough to address this issue, such that the minority and low-income schools need even more funding. Moreover, the evidence of higher diabetes rates also applies to low-income schools, which may be predominantly white, and those schools will not be eligible for the additional funds since the classification was drawn entirely on race. (The government would have been better off drawing the classification on socioeconomic status, since many low-income schools are also heavily minority, and wealth is not a suspect class under the EPC.)

Accordingly, the AG can likely succeed in a challenge to the additional subsidies based on the EPC.

(2) Whether NASD has standing to intervene

All parties in federal court must have standing to assert their claims. Standing means that a litigant has a concrete stake in the outcome of the case. Standing requires (1) an injury in fact, that is concrete and particularized; (2) traceable to the challenged conduct; and (3) that can be redressed by a favorable court decision.

For an organization to have standing, it can either (1) base standing on an injury to itself, or (2) assert a claim on behalf of its members, where (a) the members would have individual standing to assert their claims and (b) the nature of the suit or remedy requested does not require that the members participate individually.

Here, the organization is a non-profit that seeks to promote healthy diets for school-age children, especially through school lunch programs. However, it will likely be unable to prove standing to intervene because it is unclear what concrete stake it has in the case. Although the legislation is related to its stated purpose and it would therefore prefer that the legislation be upheld, an injury-in-fact must be concrete and particularized.

QUESTION 3

Tuan sells antique furniture. He signed a ten-year lease for a warehouse owned by Leo at $1,000 a month, with a start date of January 1. The warehouse would be used to store Tuan's inventory. When Tuan attempted to occupy the warehouse on January 1, he discovered Annika there pursuant to her validly executed lease, which was not due to end until January 31. Tuan then immediately rented another almost identical warehouse from Bruno, on a month-to-month basis, for $1,500 a month.

When Tuan returned to Leo's warehouse on February 1, Annika told Tuan she was not leaving until May 31.

When Tuan visited the warehouse on June 1, he discovered that Leo had stored equipment in the warehouse that made 25% of the space unusable. Tuan refused to take possession and informed Leo that he was terminating his lease immediately.

The next day, Leo retook possession of the warehouse and placed "For Rent" signs in several windows. Shortly after, Leo executed a ten-year lease with Juanita for the warehouse at a monthly rent of $500, with a start date of July 1.

Tuan rented Bruno's warehouse from January to June. He later signed a new lease for 9 ½ years starting on July 1 with a monthly rent of $1,500.

Tuan has never paid any rent to Leo.

Tuan decided to sue for damages based on his rights under his lease with Leo.

1. What claim(s), if any, may Tuan reasonably assert against Leo? Discuss.

2. What claim(s), if any, may Tuan reasonably assert against Annika? Discuss.

3. What counterclaim(s), if any, may Leo reasonably assert against Tuan? Discuss.

QUESTION 3: SELECTED ANSWER A

1. TUAN'S CLAIMS AGAINST LEO

A. Violation of Duty to Deliver Possession

The question is whether Annika's continued residence from January 1st to January 31st under a valid unexpired lease or from February 1st to May 31st without a valid lease constituted a violation of Leo's duty to deliver possession. A landlord has a duty to deliver possession of a leased premises to a tenant. Under the majority English rule, this duty is the duty to deliver both actual possession of the premises and a legal claim to superior title over the premises. Under the minority American rule, a landlord only has the duty to deliver legal possession of the premises. In either case, a tenant has the right to evict a holdover tenant.

Here, Leo violated the duty to deliver possession under both the majority and the minority rule from January 1st to January 31st. The reason is that Annika continued to have a validly executed lease that gave her priority of legal possession over Tuan. Therefore, Tuan did not have legal possession. In addition, under the majority English rule, Leo likely violated the duty to deliver actual possession from February 1st to May 31st because, although Annika did not have a legally superior right to Tuan at the time, Annika was still in physical possession so that Tuan could not retake the premises without legal action. Under the minority rule, Tuan would have had an obligation on February 1st to evict Annika himself.

In contracts, a party is generally entitled to expectation damages consisting of the benefit the party would have received from the bargain. Additionally, because the duty to deliver possession and the duty to pay rent are dependent covenants, Tuan would not have had to pay rent for the period in which he was out of possession. During the periods when Tuan was out of possession, he could sue for the difference between the rent he should have paid for the warehouse and the rent he had to pay in order to obtain substitute space, or $500 a month. This would give him damages of $500 for the period from January 1st to January 31st. For the four-month period after that when Annika was not staying under a valid lease issued to her by Leo, it is less clear what Tuan's damages would be.

Even under the majority rule it is unclear whether Tuan could sue for the full period from February 1st to May 31st because Tuan appeared to fail to inform Leo of the holdover tenant, and to surrender the premises even though he had the legal right to it. A tenant who surrenders the premises in this way does so at the tenant's own peril and may not receive full damages. A party to a contract typically has their damages reduced by any amount that the party could have avoided through reasonable efforts. Tuan could have brought an ejectment or unlawful detainer suit against Annika, or he could have asked Leo to do so if Leo had a duty to deliver actual possession.

B. Actual Eviction

A tenant is actually evicted when the tenant is denied physical possession of all or some part of the premises. If a third party has evicted the tenant from even part of the premises, then the tenant is typically not obligated to pay rent any longer. Indeed, the tenant may abandon the premises. However, if a landlord deprives a tenant of only a portion of the premises, then the tenant's obligation to pay rent is merely decreased proportionally.

Thus, Tuan may have a defense to paying rent from the entire period lasting from January 1st to May 31st because he was evicted from the premises-- a third party (Annika) was in physical possession and he could not access the premises. (As mentioned above, Tuan's failure to make any moves to evict Annika may reduce this recovery). Tuan could have justifiably abandoned the premises but didn't. Additionally, for the period from June 1 to July 1 wherein Leo stored equipment in the warehouse making 25% of it unusable, Leo had taken physical possession of 25% of the premises from Tuan, thus actually evicting him. For that period, then Tuan would have owed proportionally less rent by 25%. Tuan could not justifiably abandon the premises because he was only deprived of part of it, however (unless he proves a constructive eviction claim-- see point 1C below).

Notably, however, Tuan could not recover double on both his claim of failure to deliver possession and actual damages. In addition, Tuan's eviction claim would be subject to the same duty to mitigate discussed in A, above.

C. Constructive Eviction

The final issue is whether Leo's possession of 25% of the space in the warehouse constituted constructive eviction that would justify Tuan's abandonment and give him a claim for damages for the rest of the lease term. A tenant may claim constructive eviction if the landlord's actions or failure to act deprive the tenant of the substantial enjoyment of the premises. A constructive eviction suit justifies a tenant in abandoning the premises. To prevail in this suit, the tenant must notify the landlord of the problem, give the landlord a reasonable amount of time to fix the problem, and then vacate the premises.

Here, because the nature of the commercial property was a warehouse used to store inventory, Tuan could make a strong claim that being deprived of a quarter of the space he had bargained for deprived him of substantial enjoyment of the premises. Assuming that he selected the spot in a cost-conscious manner and only had just enough space to suit his needs, he would no longer be able to profitably operate his business with a quarter of his inventory out on the street. However, Tuan failed to inform Leo that the arrangement was unacceptable (which was likely necessary because from Leo's perspective Tuan hadn't been occupying the warehouse at all). Furthermore, Tuan gave Leo no time to remedy the problem. Instead, Tuan immediately quit the premises. Thus, it is unlikely that Tuan will be able to claim constructive eviction.

Because Tuan cannot claim he was justified in abandoning the premises, Tuan likely cannot collect the difference of $500 monthly for the rest of his 9-1/2 year lease term under this theory.

2. TUAN'S CLAIMS AGAINST ANNIKA

A. Trespass

The question is whether a holdover tenant may be liable for trespass for either (1) a period during which both the tenant and the claimant held a valid lease or (2) a period during which the holdover tenant's lease had expired and the tenant had a current lease entitling the tenant to possession. The elements of trespass are an intentional entering or remaining on the land of another without the consent of the other. A tenant with a valid lease has a term of years or other present possessory interest, while a landlord holds a reversion.

Here, Annika is not liable for trespass for the period lasting from January 1st to January 31st because Annika had a right to possession of the property as demonstrated by her valid lease. The property she entered or remained on would not be the property of "another" because it was her leasehold property at the time. However, for the period from February 1st to May 31st, when Annika's lease had ended, she was not the owner of the property. Thus, if Tuan asked her to leave, she would have been trespassing because she would not have had consent from the current holder of a present possessory term of years on the premises.

Tuan's best remedy in that instance would have been an action for ejectment, which would have constituted a request to order the sheriff to remove Annika from the property. Tuan did not. However, insofar as trespass results in injury to the property or a substantial interference with the owner's right to the enjoyment of the property, the owner may also seek damages. In this instance, Annika deprived Tuan entirely of the property for four months. He could request the fair rental value of the property at that time as a measure of the use of the property he was deprived of.

3 LEO'S CLAIMS AGAINST TUAN

1. Abandonment

The issue is whether Tuan unjustifiably abandoned the premises in violation of Tuan's lease agreement, entitling Leo to damages for future rent he would have obtained under the ten-year lease. A tenant typically has a duty to occupy or pay rent on the leased premises for the entire term of the lease. A tenant violates this duty by unjustifiably abandoning the property. Abandonment occurs when a tenant quits the premises, has no intention of returning, and defaults in the payment of rent. Here, Tuan left the premises on January 1st; however, he didn't form an intent not to return until June 1st, when he told Leo he was terminating the lease. Before that, Tuan continued to return on the dates he was told the warehouse would be available. Tuan has paid no rent, so he defaulted on rent as of February 1st, when the first payment of $1,000 was due under the lease term. Thus, all elements for abandonment were present by June 1st. As noted above, while Tuan likely would have been justified in abandoning the premises from January 1st to May 31st when he was completely evicted, Tuan did not. Instead, Tuan selected June 1st, a date on which he was not justified in abandoning the premises (see point 1C above).

When a tenant abandons the premises, a landlord has one of several options. First, the landlord may accept surrender, which terminates the tenant's duty to pay rent. Acceptance of surrender may be implied if the landlord remodels or alters the premises so they are no longer suitable for the tenant's use, or it may be an explicit declaration to the tenant. Another option is that the landlord may treat the abandonment as unjustified but relet the premises for the tenant's remaining term on the tenant's behalf and hold the tenant accountable for a difference in the value of the rent, if any. Finally, in a minority of jurisdictions wherein a landlord does not have a duty to mitigate damages, the landlord may simply leave the premises open and sue for rent as it accrues over the lease term.

Here, the facts indicate that Leo treated the surrender as unjustified and relet the premises for Tuan. Leo made no representation to Tuan that he accepted Tuan's surrender. The facts do not indicate that Leo said anything to Tuan. While Leo retook possession of the warehouse, he did not relet it for the exact period remaining on Tuan's lease, but 10 years is close to 9.5 years and it was likely necessary to round up for the sake of a new tenant. This indicates he was merely reletting to minimize damages.

Typically, Leo's damages would be measured by the difference between the contract price and the substitute contract he was able to obtain. Tuan's lease was $1,500, while Juanita's was $500. This would make Tuan accountable for a difference of $1,000 a month. However, Tuan would be able to contest these damages if the relet to Juanita was not commercially reasonable. If there were other tenants willing to pay closer to the amount that Tuan paid and Leo failed to rent to those tenants because of a non-commercial preference for Juanita, Leo's damages would be reduced proportionally.

Additionally, if Tuan made an argument that his abandonment of the premises was justified because Leo breached the lease first through Tuan's eviction from January 1st to May 31st (almost half a year) (see points 1A and 1B), then Leo would not be entitled to any future damages. A party that materially breaches first is no longer entitled to expectation damages or return performance. A material breach occurs if the other party is deprived of the benefit of their bargain. Factors in whether a breach is material include the extent of the deprivation, whether the deprivation can be cured with money damages or other remedies, the likelihood of cure, and whether breach was willful. We do not have facts indicating whether Leo knew that Tuan had been evicted or Annika was holding over. However, six months out of possession is a long time, even for a ten-year lease. While Tuan could be compensated for his extra rental expenses, property is considered unique and so his loss of use might not be able to be cured, particularly if he chose Leo's warehouse as a strategic location. Therefore, if a court does not find that Tuan's failure to take steps to evict Annika renders the breach immaterial, Leo will not recover future damages.

2. Rent

A tenant has a duty to pay rent. If a tenant violates this duty, then a landlord is entitled to damages for the accrued unpaid rent. Here, Tuan has failed to pay rent for six months from January through June. Therefore, in the absence of Leo's breach, Leo would have been entitled to $1,500 for each of the six months he has already rented to Tuan.

However, a party in material breach has no right to a return performance, as discussed above. Leo failed to deliver possession to Tuan from the beginning of the lease. From January 1st to January 31st, Tuan certainly would not owe rent because Annika's lease still gave her a legal right to possession. From February 1st to May 31st, Tuan also was evicted and Leo did not deliver on his duty to deliver possession. Leo would have to demonstrate that Tuan was at fault for failing to notify him or bring an eviction suit in order to recover rent for this period. If Tuan had occupied the premises in June, then Leo would have been entitled to 75% of rent because he was only occupying 25% of the warehouse. However, if a court finds that Tuan's obligations had already ended due to Leo's material breach by June, then Tuan would owe nothing after that period.

QUESTION 3: SELECTED ANSWER B

1. Tuan's Claims Against Leo

Failure to Provide Right to Possession

A landlord owes a tenant a duty of providing the actual right to possess the property throughout a valid lease, as well as the legal right to possess it, at least in most states. (In a minority of states, a landlord need only provide the legal right to possess.) The right to possession is the right to maintain exclusive control of the whole of the property. A tenant-possessor must have the ability to exclude anyone that he does not want on the property or else he is not in full control of all of his rights under the lease.

For the first month, from January 1 to January 31, Leo provided Tuan neither the legal right nor the actual right. Leo signed two leases for the same month governing the same property, with Tuan and Annika. Leo's failure to provide either right to Tuan for that month is a material breach of the lease, and in every state Tuan may bring a claim against Leo for that.

For the months February through May, Leo again failed to provide Tuan with the actual right of possession of his property. Annika remained at the property in a tenancy at sufferance, preventing Tuan from accessing or possessing it. The tenancy at sufferance began at the expiration of Annika's lease and continued throughout the period that she remained in control of the property without a lease or other tenancy.

In most states, Leo's failure to provide Tuan with the actual right of possession for these four months is a material breach of their lease. For much the same reasons as supra, Tuan could not access the property or control it for use of the storage of his inventory. Tuan would thus have a claim against Leo for these four months in addition to the month of January in most states.

In a minority of states, however, Leo need only provide Tuan with the legal right to possess the property. Tuan's valid lease is that legal right beginning on February 1. In this minority of jurisdictions, Annika's holdover tenancy does not mean that Leo breached the lease with Tuan. It would require Tuan to pursue his own legal action against Annika for this four-month period (discussed infra).

Implied Covenant of Quiet Enjoyment

Every lease includes an implied covenant of quiet enjoyment (ICQE). This requires a landlord to permit the tenant the use of and control over the property in legitimate and legal ways. It bars the landlord from substantially interfering with the tenant's right.

Tuan will argue that Leo's equipment storage - rendering 25% of the warehouse unusable - was a violation of the ICQE. Because of that violation, Tuan will argue that he was constructively evicted. A constructive eviction can occur when a landlord's substantial interference with the ICQE is not resolved within a reasonable time of the landlord's receipt of notice of the interference and the tenant elects to break the lease and leave the property. Upon a constructive eviction, the lease terminates.

The storage of goods rendering 25% of the warehouse unusable is likely a violation of the ICQE. It is a substantial interference with Tuan's use and enjoyment of the property. Tuan leased the warehouse for the storage of his own inventory, and Leo is instead holding back 1/4 of the property for his own storage. The analysis may be different if Leo used the property in a different way that did not affect the capacity of the warehouse to store Tuan's goods, or if Leo's use of the property rendered 1% or 2% of it unusable for Tuan. But making 25% of it unusable for Tuan's storage is a substantial interference with his use of the property, and thus Leo has breached the ICQE. (A discussion of constructive eviction is infra.)

Mitigation and Damages

In January, upon learning Leo failed to deliver both legal and actual possession of the property, Tuan promptly mitigated his damages by renting an almost identical warehouse for $1,500.

Tuan acted reasonably, because the replacement warehouse is nearly identical and because Tuan elected to sign a month-to-month periodic tenancy rather than a lengthy tenancy for years. Tuan would then be able to end his tenancy with Bruno's warehouse to come to Leo's warehouse as soon as it was made available for him.

Leo will likely argue that Tuan did not reasonably mitigate because he found a replacement property at a 50% cost increase. That suggests that Tuan did not shop around or that he got an unreasonably poor deal from Bruno. But Tuan will argue that Leo's failure to provide possession on January 1 forced him to immediately sign another lease to allow him a place to store his goods on that same day. Tuan did not have to spend much time shopping around, because it was already January 1 when he learned that his lease starting that same day would not be honored. A 50% price premium - especially considering the month-to-month nature of the lease will not be seen as unreasonable on Tuan's part, and Leo will be responsible for it.

Tuan paid $500 extra for this warehouse in January. In every state, Tuan could seek this $500 from Leo.

Tuan also paid a total of $2,000 above and beyond his lease with Leo to use Bruno's warehouse for the four months of February through May. Tuan's ability to pursue these funds from Leo would vary by state. In most states, because Leo failed to provide Tuan with actual possessory rights in addition to legal possession rights, Leo is liable to Tuan for his damages accrued over those four months. In a minority of states, though, because Leo provided Tuan with legal possession rights as the sole holder of a valid lease for those four months, Leo fulfilled his duties and complied with the law. Thus, Tuan would be forced to pursue Annika for those funds (see infra).

Finally, Tuan will argue he was constructively evicted on July 1 and was required to then pay $500 extra per month in perpetuity for the remaining 9.5 years of the lease lifetime, a total of $57,000 in damages. Tuan will seek this $57,000 from Leo.

9.5 Year Lease

Tuan will argue that his constructive eviction forced him to continue using Bruno's warehouse for the remaining 114 months at the $1,500 price. Leo will argue it is neither reasonable nor fair to require him to pay the lease-price difference in perpetuity. First, the reasons underscoring the reasonableness of the $1,500 price in January are not present here. Tuan is no longer paying a month-to-month price premium and should be able to secure a price closer to $1,000 for such a lengthy lease, assuming the $1,000 lease was in line with market conditions. Second, Leo will argue Tuan needed only a warehouse for the 25% of his goods that could not be stored in Leo's warehouse, since Tuan could still use the 75% of Leo's warehouse that remained available to him. This will turn on the constructive eviction question discussed infra.

The court will likely evaluate the reasonableness and foreseeability of Leo having to pay damages for the increased rent price Tuan was subjected to by leasing Bruno's warehouse. On one hand, Leo was aware that Tuan sought a 10-year storage lease because he entered into one with Tuan. It is foreseeable that Tuan could have damages for that full lease period if Leo failed to live up to the lease. Assuming Tuan was constructively evicted, a court could find that he acted reasonably in a foreseeable way.

But on the other hand, a court could find that Tuan's decision to stick with the same warehouse that he found on short notice on January 1 for a 9.5-year lease, at the same price that he originally got the warehouse when he needed it that same day and on month-to-month terms, was not reasonable. The court could determine Tuan was required to analyze market conditions and seek better terms, even if Tuan could have stayed with Bruno for another month or two on the month-to-month lease before doing so. Ultimately, if Tuan truly was constructively evicted, this middle approach is likely. The court will consider expert testimony or other evidence about market conditions and decide, after reviewing all of the facts, whether Tuan should have spent one or two more months with Bruno before signing a 110+ month lease with some other party at a price closer to $1,000 a month.

Total of Claims

Thus, Tuan will argue Leo breached the lease by failing to provide him possession of the warehouse from January through May and that Leo constructively evicted him through a breach of his ICQE. Tuan will seek $500 for January, $2,000 for February through May, and another $500 for every month after that through the end of his 10-year lease term. But Tuan is unlikely to get all of it, even if he was constructively evicted.

2. Tuan's Claims Against Annika

Tuan's claims against Annika depend on which rule the jurisdiction follows. He also can bring a tort claim for trespass to land.

Majority Rule

Under the majority rule, Leo owed Tuan actual and legal possession as of the start of the lease. Leo breached that duty throughout the entire time Annika was present because he did not deliver actual possession. Thus, Tuan will pursue remedies from Leo for that period relating to the lease. But this does not affect a trespass analysis; see infra.

Minority Rule

Under the minority rule, Leo complied with his duty to provide legal possessory rights as of February 1, when the conflicting leases no longer overlapped. Thus, Tuan's claims for possession of the property under the lease would be brought against Annika. Annika would be solely responsible to Tuan under this role for any of his foreseeable damages as a trespasser to his land.

Trespass to Land

Trespass to land is an intentional tort. It is committed when a party encroaches on another's property and interferes with it. Trespass to land can be very slight, and nominal damages are available. It need not be a significant trespass to be cognizable.

Here, Annika's trespass is certainly significant. Annika is trespassing to the extent that she is using the whole of the property for herself. Tuan cannot use the property to store his goods. Thus, Annika has committed a trespass from which significant damages may flow.

Tuan may seek from Annika the $500 per month extra that he was forced to spend in renting Bruno's warehouse from February through May. But Annika is not responsible for the $500 extra Tuan spent in either January or June. In January, Annika was present at the property as the holder of a valid lease. Tuan's damages for January may only be sought from Leo, who unlawfully rented the same warehouse to both Annika and Tuan. And in June, Annika had terminated her lease and vacated the premises.

Still, Leo may argue that it is Annika who should be responsible for the 9.5 years' worth of $500 additional rent. Leo will say that, because Annika held over in sufferance, Tuan gave up and left on June 1. Had Annika not held over beyond February 1, Leo will argue, Tuan never would have left. But this argument is likely to fail. It is too attenuated in its causal chain, and it is neither foreseeable nor reasonably certain that Tuan would have stayed under Leo's lease long-term had Annika not overstayed her lease after February. Thus, Annika is not going to be liable for Tuan's damages after May.

3. Leo's Counterclaims Against Tuan

Leo will argue that Tuan breached their lease when he departed on June 1 and refused to pay. Leo was forced then to mitigate his damages and rent to Juanita for only $500 a month. Thus, Leo will argue that the $500 delta in rents he was paid for that 9.5 year period are Tuan's fault and Tuan owes him damages.

To determine who is right, a court will analyze whether Tuan was constructively evicted by Leo's actions. A constructive eviction occurs when a landlord violates the IWQE, the tenant notifies the landlord of that violation, the landlord does not remedy it within a reasonable time, and the tenant leaves and considers him or herself evicted. Upon constructive eviction, the lease ends. Thus, if Tuan was constructively evicted, he owed Leo no duties after June 1 and Leo cannot recover from him.

Substantial Interference

Leo will argue his use of 25% of the warehouse wasn't a substantial interference. This will likely fail for the reasons in the IWQE section supra. Using 25% of the warehouse that Tuan wanted to store his goods is a substantial interference.

Constructive Eviction

Leo will argue that Tuan's constructive eviction was wrongful because Tuan did not give him notice and a reasonable opportunity to cure. When Tuan arrived on June 1 and found 25% of the warehouse unusable, he terminated his lease immediately.

Tuan did not give Leo notice then and a chance to cure. This is Leo's strongest argument.

Tuan will argue that the "notice" relates back to at least January 1, when he found Annika in his warehouse. Because Leo executed valid leases with both Tuan and Annika for that month, Leo is considered to have actual knowledge of that conflict. Tuan will say that Leo was on notice as of that time. In addition, in some states, Tuan may be excused from the notice requirement for futility. Tuan may argue that it would have been futile to give Leo notice of yet another breach of his lease, because Leo had already failed to perform it for five months. Rather than the June 1 event being the sole thing giving rise to eviction, Tuan will argue, it was the last in a long series of events that gave rise to it.

The notice and opportunity to cure issue is the crux of Tuan and Leo's dispute. Tuan will argue that he was done at that point with Leo's repeated breaches of their lease. Upon showing up on June 1 - five months after his lease was supposed to start - he saw that Leo had reserved an entire quarter of the facility for his own use. Tuan will say that such a blatant disregard of the lease shows that any notice to Leo would have metaphorically gone in one ear and out the other, or alternatively, that Annika's presence for the months prior was sufficient notice.

But Leo will argue that Tuan never told him Annika overstayed her lease. While Leo will be considered to have known Annika was there in January due to the overlapping leases, no facts suggest that Tuan contacted Leo between February and June to inform him of Annika's tenancy at sufferance or to ask (or demand) that Leo provide him with the warehouse. Leo will argue that, had Tuan told him of that, he would have fixed it. Instead, Leo simply stored some things in the warehouse on the same day Tuan was moving in. Leo might argue that he would have immediately removed those items had Tuan asked him to do so.

Because Tuan never asked Leo to move the items, it is likely a court will find Tuan was not strictly constructively evicted.

If the court decides that Tuan was constructively evicted on July 1, it will not require Tuan to pay back Leo for anything under the lease after that point. Tuan will not be liable to Leo for his cheaper lease with Juanita.

If the court decides that Tuan was not constructively evicted because he failed to give notice and a chance for Leo to remedy the issue, then Leo will be able to sue Tuan. Leo will argue that he expected $1,000 a month for that property for the 10-year lease. His damages are $1,000 for the month of June, in which no one paid rent, and $500 a month for the 9.5 years after that when he only was able to get $500 from Juanita.

Tuan will argue the $500 lease with Juanita was not sufficient mitigation. He will likely use his lease with Bruno as evidence of market conditions. If warehouses are going for $1,500, then why is Leo renting his for $500? Leo will argue in return that he put "For Rent" signs in several windows to attempt to rent the warehouse. The reasonableness of this mitigation measure will likely be judged by context and business custom. If the warehouse is in the middle of a busy area in Los Angeles or San Francisco, such that many people would have seen those signs, then it will be seen as a more reasonable mitigation measure. But if the warehouse is in a rural area, or if it is intended for use for some specialized storage purpose that a narrow class of renters might need, then Leo might have been expected to take other measures to market its availability, such as advertisements or Internet marketing.

QUESTION 4

LawnCare Company (LawnCare) manufactured and sold a liquid weed killer for lawn care. Paula brought a personal injury suit against LawnCare when her children developed breathing problems after LawnCare's weed killer was applied on her lawn. LawnCare entered into a valid retainer agreement with Andy, an attorney, to defend LawnCare in the action.

Andy is a member and financial supporter of Citizens Concerned About Chemicals (C2AC), a consumer group that is currently lobbying for environmental regulations that would remove chemicals such as LawnCare's weed killer from the market as unsafe. Andy provided pro bono free legal advice to C2AC in the past regarding an unrelated corporate matter, but did not enter into a formal attorney-client relationship with C2AC.

Since Andy is convinced that his association with C2AC will not affect his representation of LawnCare, he did not tell LawnCare about his relationship with C2AC. LawnCare is impressed with Andy's reputation as a litigator, and Andy did not want to jeopardize losing LawnCare as a client by discussing his private concerns about their chemicals.

In response to an anonymous questionnaire sent to all C2AC members, Andy mentioned the publicly available information regarding Paula's complaint filed against LawnCare, but did not provide any other details. One week after Andy returned the questionnaire to C2AC, Andy received a call from the Chief Executive Officer ("CEO") of LawnCare, who said a representative of C2AC had called to ask about Paula's lawsuit. Andy told the CEO that he did not know where C2AC would have received that information from and recommended that LawnCare not disclose any details about the lawsuit.

What ethical violations, if any, has Andy committed? Discuss.

Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

QUESTION 4: SELECTED ANSWER A

Retainer Agreement:

Under ABA there is no writing requirement for a representation of a client, unless it is a contingency case. Similarly in CA, there is no writing requirement for representation up to $1,000, corporate client, or in the case of an emergency. Here, the facts suggest that LawnCare and Andy entered into a valid retainer agreement to defend LawnCare in a personal injury case against Paula when her children developed breathing problems after LawnCare's weed killer was applied on her lawn.

Corporate Client:

An attorney representing a corporation owes a duty of loyalty to the corporation itself and not its employees. If an attorney believes that the employees of the corporation are being misled to believing that the attorney is representing them directly, the attorney must make it clear that his attorney-client relationship belongs to the corporation. Here, Andy is defending LawnCare Company in a personal injury case and if at any time during the representation any employee is misled, Andy must make it clear that he represents LawnCare and not the employee. This is done to avoid any confidential information or conflict of interest arising during the representation.

Duty of Loyalty:

An attorney owes a duty of loyalty to his client. The duty of loyalty includes refraining from conflict of interest (COI) that will materially limit the representation of the client. An attorney should not materially limit the representation of a current client by the attorney’s own interest, interest of a previous client, or current client. If the attorney reasonably believes (subjectively & objectively) that he can competently and diligently represent the client, not prohibited by the law, and gets informed consent (ABA) or informed consent, confirmed in writing (CA), then the attorney may represent the client. Limitations of the attorney's own interest in the representation can be evidenced by relationship with the opposing attorney, stake in the outcome, membership in organizations that are against what the attorney is advocating for the client. A COI may arise during representation of a client or be apparent before the representation begins.

Association with C2AC:

Andy is a member and financial supporter of C2AC, a consumer group that is currently lobbying for environmental regulations that would remove chemicals such as LawnCare's weed killer from the market as unsafe. Unless Andy reasonably believes that he can defend LawnCare in the case without materially limiting LawnCare's representation and gets informed consent (ABA) or informed consent, confirmed in writing (CA), disclosing his membership with C2AC he may be in violation of ethical rules. Andy is convinced that his association with C2AC will not affect his representation of LawnCare and he did not disclose his relationship with C2AC; however, that is not enough because under both ABA and CA Andy should've disclosed his association with C2AC because there is a potential conflict of interest. Andy will argue that he simply wants to support organizations that care about the safety of the public and the current personal injury case between LawnCare and Paula has no bearing on it. This argument may not prevail as the facts later suggest that he even provided pro bono work for C2AC. Lastly, the COI became apparent because Andy knew that if he reveals his personal concerns about chemicals, it'll jeopardize looking LawnCare as a client.

Conflict of interest between current and former client*:*

An attorney who represented a previous client may not represent another client that would materially limit the current client or potentially reveal confidential information regarding the former client, unless the attorney reasonably believes that he can competently and diligently represent the current client, not prohibited by the law, not advocate an issue that is the opposite of what the attorney previously advocated for the former client, and gets informed consent (ABA) or informed consent, confirmed in writing (CA).

Pro Bono for C2AC:

Andy provided pro bono free legal advice to C2AC in the past regarding an unrelated corporate matter, but did not enter into a formal attorney-client relationship with C2AC. Although Andy provided pro bono legal advice, that does not make any difference that C2AC is still be considered a previous client of (discussed below). Andy may have reasonably believed that his previous pro bono work for C2AC will not have any bearing on his representation with LawnCare, because there was no apparent conflict of interest; however, Andy should've disclosed the potential conflict to both LawnCare and C2AC. Andy's previous knowledge about corporate matters may materially limit his representation with LawnCare, or in the alternative will require him to reveal confidential information regarding C2AC. Additionally, the COI existed once

Andy responded to the questionnaire and at this point Andy should've disclosed to both LawnCare and C2AC his limitation.

Attorney-Client Relationship:

An attorney-client relationship begins when the client reasonably believes that a relationship has begun. Additionally, under ABA, the attorney-client relationship lasts forever and under CA, the relationship terminates once the client has died and his estate has been settled. In the case of corporate clients, it is upon dissolution of the company. Here, Andy believed that he did not enter into a formal relationship with C2AC; however, it is not the attorney who has to believe that he did or did not enter into the attorney-client relationship, but rather the client.

Anonymous Questionnaire:

An attorney owes his client a duty of confidentiality to not reveal any confidential information regarding the representation. Confidential communication encompasses anything that the client has communicated to the attorney in confidence for the representation or the attorney has gathered in anticipation of litigation.

In response to an anonymous questionnaire sent to all C2AC members, Andy mentioned the publicly available information regarding Paula's complaint filed against LawnCare, but did not provide any other details. Since the information was available only, Andy would successfully argue that he did not reveal any confidential information regarding the representation. However, it is also possible that, but for Andy's anonymous tip, C2AC would have never known about the lawsuit. Now that C2AC knows about this, they may further push their lobbying for environmental regulations to remove LawnCare's weed killer from the market. Thus, Andy's anonymous response created a snowball effect on his clients.

Duty of Competence:

Under ABA, an attorney must represent its client with competence which includes knowledge, thoroughness, and completion. Under CA, an attorney's duty of competence is defined as the attorney must not act with reckless disregard, with gross negligence, or willfully when representing its client.

When Andy responded to the anonymous questionnaire he acted with reckless disregard, gross negligence because a competent attorney, regardless if information is publicly available or not, will not reveal any information that could potentially harm his client. Thus, under CA, Andy has failed to act with competence.

Duty of Diligence:

Under ABA, an attorney must represent its client with diligence which includes knowledge, thoroughness, and completion. Under CA, an attorney's duty of diligence is defined as the attorney must not act with reckless disregard or with gross negligence when representing its client.

Similarly here, Andy acted without diligence when he answered the anonymous questionnaire.

Duty to Communicate:

An attorney has a duty to communicate with his client regarding all critical stages of the case and disclose all potential or apparent conflicts.

Here, Andy did not want to jeopardize losing LawnCare as a client by discussing his private concerns about their chemicals. Andy had the duty to communicate with LawnCare his affiliation with C2AC, his personal concerns about their chemicals, and the pro bono work he did for C2AC.

Lying to your client:

An attorney must never lie to their client even if doing so would jeopardize their relationship with their client. An attorney has the duty to be truthful and communicate to the client about all critical stages of the case. In the case of the attorney made a mistake, the attorney should still stay truthful to the profession and notify the client about his mistake.

Andy received a call from the CEO of LawnCare, who said a representative of C2AC had called to ask about Paula's lawsuit. Andy told the CEO that he did not know where C2AC would have received that information from and recommended that LawnCare not disclose any details about the lawsuit. At this point, Andy has committed multiple ethical violations. To begin with, he has materially limited his former client (C2AC) and his current client (LawnCare). Andy has lied to his clients and has acted without competence, diligence, or any respect for the profession of law. Instead, Andy should've come forward and disclosed to Lawncare’s CEO that he has made the mistake of making an anonymous response letting C2AC know that there is a pending case going.

Withdrawal:

Under both ABA & CA, an attorney must withdraw when their representation is in violation of ethical rules. At this point after Andy did not disclose his association with C2AC, has personal belief against what LawnCare does, made an anonymous response about the pending case, lied to the CEO of LawnCare about how C2AC found out about the case, Andy must give notice to LawnCare to withdraw from the representation while he does not incur further damages to the case. When giving notice of withdrawal, Andy should give enough time for LawnCare to find an alternative attorney for the representation. Andy should return any money that has not been used for the case and turn over all documents that were gathered.

QUESTION 4: SELECTED ANSWER B

1. DUTY OF LOYALTY TO LAWNCARE

The first issue is whether, by failing to inform or receive LawnCare's consent to represent LawnCare despite the fact that C2AC is his former client, Andy has violated his duty of loyalty to LawnCare.

A lawyer has a duty of loyalty to operate in the best interests of the lawyer's client, and to exercise independent legal judgment in evaluating the client's case. Therefore, under both the Model Rules and California law a lawyer has a duty not to represent a client if either (1) the client's interests are directly adverse with those of another client the lawyer has in the same or a different matter; or (2) there is a significant risk that the lawyer's representation of the client will be materially limited by the lawyer's obligations to a current client, former client, third party, or by the lawyer's own interests. If either of these situations arise, a lawyer may only represent the client if the lawyer reasonably believes the lawyer can competently represent the client, the representation is not prohibited by law, the client and another client are not opposing parties in the same litigation, and the lawyer obtains informed consent, confirmed in writing (under the Model Rules) or informed written consent (under California law). Informed, written consent requires an attorney to inform a client of all of the surrounding circumstances and risks of representation, as well as reasonable alternatives.

Here, C2AC is not a current client, so the rule about directly adverse client interests does not apply. However, C2AC is a former client. The question is thus whether Andy has any continuing commitments to C2AC as a former client that would materially limit his obligations to LawnCare. This is unlikely. The prior representation was limited to free pro bono legal advice in an unrelated corporate matter. Andy would not have acquired confidential information he would have to avoid sharing with LawnCare as a result of the representation because it wasn't about weedkiller such as LawnCare would be using, but corporate matters.

That said, Andy's relationship with C2AC as a third-party organization of which he is a member creates a significant risk of materially limiting his representation. It is clear that Andy deeply cares about C2AC's mission because he's provided free advice and given the group financial support. In addition, while Andy believed his representation of LawnCare would not be affected, he created a situation in which his obligations to C2AC and LawnCare conflicted by informing all C2AC members about Paula's complaint. This has materially limited his representation to LawnCare because Andy is now lying about his role in C2AC to LawnCare and informing the organization about LawnCare's litigation. Thus, Andy has violated his duty of loyalty by failing to inform LawnCare of this relationship and receive its informed consent to continue representation.

Finally, an attorney is permitted to be a member of a nonprofit legal services group, even if it advocates for legislation and rulings that are adverse to the attorney's client. However, an attorney is not permitted to take any action within that group if it would (1) adversely impact the attorney's current client or (2) if the attorney would be making a decision for the organization that impacts a person with interests adverse to the attorney. Here, by informing an advocacy group about LawnCare's pending litigation so that they could potentially begin a campaign about LawnCare, Andy has acted adversely to LawnCare's interests. When an attorney acts adversely to a client's interests this violates their duty of loyalty.

2. DUTY OF LOYALTY TO C2AC

A lawyer owes a duty of loyalty to former clients not to represent future clients in the same or a substantially related matter if the future clients' interests are materially adverse to the former clients'. If the lawyer does so, the lawyer must obtain the clients' informed consent, confirmed in writing (under the ABA) or their informed written consent (under California law). Here, C2AC is a former client because they sought legal representation and Andy provided it, regardless of whether Andy and C2AC entered into a formal attorney-client relationship. However, LawnCare's personal injury litigation regarding weedkiller is not the same or substantially related matter as the corporate matters Andy handled for C2AC. Therefore, Andy did not violate a duty of loyalty to C2AC.

3. DUTY OF CONFIDENTIALITY

A lawyer owes a duty of confidentiality to all prospective, current, and former clients until the client is deceased and the client's estate is settled. Under the Model Rules, a lawyer must take reasonable care not to reveal confidential information the lawyer obtains about the client in the course of representing the client-- whether from the client or a third-party source. In California, the duty is to maintain a client's confidentiality inviolate at every peril to the attorney's self. Here, it is a close question whether Andy breached a duty of confidentiality. On the one hand, Andy only disclosed publicly available information to C2AC members. However, on the other hand, the existence of the lawsuit and its relevance to C2AC were matters Andy would have become familiar with only through his representation of LawnCare. This indicates that the information is something Andy should have held in confidence. In summary, the claim for a violation of a duty of confidentiality is weaker than the claim that there was a violation of Andy's duty of loyalty not to take adverse action against his client-- but using information he learned through his representation likely qualifies as a duty of confidentiality violation, even if he also derived it from public sources.

4. DUTY TO INFORM A CLIENT

A lawyer has a duty to keep a client reasonably informed of the status of a matter under the ABA. Under California law, a lawyer must inform a client of all significant developments related to a case. The lawyer must also respond to all the client's reasonable requests for information related to the status of the case. Here, Andy likely had a duty to inform LawnCare of his relationship with C2AC. In addition, Andy may have had a duty, once he learned C2AC might be going after LawnCare in a way that might negatively impact trial publicity, to inform LawnCare of the risk. This would have been necessary for LawnCare to plan a public relations mitigation strategy. Regardless, however, Andy breached this duty when LawnCare directly requested information about how C2AC received information about Paula's complaint and Andy failed to respond truthfully.

5. DUTY OF CANDOR

A lawyer has a duty not to make a false representation of fact to any person, including the client. This duty applies under both the ABA and California law. Here, Andy has violated this duty because, when LawnCare asked him how C2AC learned of Paula's lawsuit, Andy responded that he did not know. Andy did know because he supplied the information.

Therefore, Andy violated this duty.

Pedro brought a fraud and breach of contract action against Gallery in federal court.

At a jury trial, Pedro testified that he purchased a painting from Gallery for $200,000 after seeing an advertisement bearing Gallery's logo stating that the painting was the only painting by a noted 17th century artist available for sale in the world. On Pedro's motion, a photocopy of the advertisement was admitted into evidence. Pedro also testified that the painting was worth only $10,000 because it was a reproduction of the original and that he based his valuation on the average of three appraisals of the painting by art dealers.

Pedro called Rex, a chemistry professor, who had been retained by four art galleries to determine the age of paintings. Rex testified that the painting had been painted within the past 50 years and was a painted reproduction of the original painting. He testified that he had used the XYZ technique on Pedro's painting to arrive at his conclusion. Rex testified that he had tested the XYZ technique on paintings of known ages and that the results corresponded with their known age. He testified that the XYZ technique was reliable and used by most experts to determine the age of paintings. After cross-examination, Rex was excused and left the courtroom.

Gallery called Marie, and both parties stipulated that she is an expert in dating works of art. She testified that a publication entitled "The Science of Dating Works of Art" is generally recognized as a reliable authority. She then quoted an excerpt from that publication that asserted the XYZ technique is not reliable for determining the age of works of art. Gallery moved, and the court received, the excerpt into evidence as an exhibit.

Gallery then offered into evidence a journal article authored by Rex that included a statement that the XYZ technique is not reliable for determining the age of works of art.

Assuming all proper objections and motions to strike were timely made, should the court have admitted:

1. The photocopy of the advertisement? Discuss.

QUESTION CONTINUES ON THE NEXT PAGE

2. Pedro’s testimony about the value of the painting? Discuss.

3. Rex’s testimony about the age of the painting? Discuss.

4. The excerpt from “The Science of Dating Works of Art”? Discuss.

5. Rex’s journal article? Discuss.

Answer according to the Federal Rules of Evidence.

QUESTION 5: SELECTED ANSWER A

1. Photocopy of Advertisement

Relevance

Evidence must be relevant to be admitted. Evidence is logically relevant if it tends to prove or disprove a fact of consequence. Otherwise, relevant evidence may be excluded under the rule for legal relevance if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of undue prejudice, confusing the jury, or undue consumption of time.

Here, since Pedro has brought an action for fraud, he is trying to prove that Gallery made a fraudulent misrepresentation in claiming that the painting was the only one of its kind. Therefore, as the advertisement with Gallery's logo stating that the painting is the only one available for sale by this artist, this advertisement tends to prove the disputed fact that Gallery made this representation. Therefore, it is logically relevant.

As there is no indication that the probative value will be outweighed by a substantial danger of undue prejudice, the evidence is legally relevant.

Therefore, this evidence is relevant. Authentication

To be admitted, evidence must be shown that it is what it is purported to be. A document or writing can be authenticated by the testimony of a person familiar with it. Additionally, documents with a trade seal may be self-authenticating.

Here, as the advertisement has been introduced on Pedro's motion and Pedro himself saw the ad, he may have authenticated the advertisement through his testimony of his familiarity with it. Additionally, since the advertisement bears the Gallery's logo, it may be considered to be self-authenticating if the logo is considered a trade seal.

Therefore, it is authenticated.

Best Evidence Rule

When the contents of a writing are at issue, the original is required. Generally, photocopies are as admissible as originals, unless a genuine question is raised as to its authenticity.

Since the case pertains to the fraudulent misrepresentation that the painting was a valuable one-of-a kind, the contents of the advertisement and its claim are at issue to show that there was fraud. While the copy admitted is a photocopy, this will satisfy the best evidence rule unless a genuine question is raised as to its authenticity.

Therefore, this rule is satisfied.

Hearsay

Hearsay is an out-of-court statement by a human declarant, offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Generally, hearsay is inadmissible unless an exception or exemption applies.

The advertisement contains the out-of-court statement made by Gallery about its painting. Therefore, if offered for the truth that the painting was the only one by this painter available for sale, it will be hearsay and inadmissible unless an exception or exemption applies.

Nonhearsay Purpose

Where the purpose of the out-of-court statement is not to prove the truth of the matter asserted, the statement is admissible under a nonhearsay purpose. Where the statement itself is a legally operative act, such as words of a contract, will, or deed, the statement is admissible.

Here, since the statement is part of the alleged fraud, it is a legally operative act. Therefore, it is offered to show that Gallery committed fraud, not for the truth of Gallery's statement.

Therefore, the statement is admissible under a nonhearsay purpose.

Hearsay Exemption

An out-of-court statement by an opposing party, that is relevant, and offered against that party is admissible for the truth of the matter asserted.

As the statement in the advertisement was made by Gallery, is relevant, and is being offered against Gallery, it also satisfies the exemption for statement by an opposing party. Therefore, even if the statement is offered for its truth, it will be admissible.

Therefore, the court should have admitted this evidence.

2. Pedro's testimony about the value of the painting

Relevance

Rule given above.

As Pedro's testimony to the actual value of the painting tends to prove that its value was significantly misrepresented by Gallery, this evidence is logically relevant. While it is unfavorable to Gallery, its probative value is not substantially outweighed by danger of undue prejudice, so it is legally relevant.

Therefore, this evidence is relevant. Competence

Under the FRE, everyone is presumed competent to testify.

Therefore, Pedro is competent to testify.

Personal Knowledge

A lay witness must have personal knowledge of the matters to which he testifies. Personal knowledge may be proven by the witness's own testimony.

Here, as Pedro has testified that his opinion of the painting's value is based on the average of three appraisals done by art dealers, his testimony is not based on his personal knowledge of the painting's value, but rather on the opinions of others.

Therefore, Pedro does not have adequate personal knowledge to testify to the value of the painting.

Lay Opinion

Generally, lay witnesses testify to facts, not opinions. Lay opinion is appropriate where it is rationally based on the witness's perception and helpful to the jury in deciding the issues. Generally, lay witnesses can testify to perceptions, such as those of emotional states or of the value of property.

As Pedro is giving a valuation of the painting, he is offering opinion, not facts as a lay witness. Since as discussed above, his valuation is not rationally based on his own perception of the painting, but rather on the opinions of others, it is not proper. Additionally, since the jury does not get to hear from the art dealers appraisals, but rather only hears Pedro's averaging of the dealers with actual personal knowledge, this lay opinion will not be helpful to the jury.

While value of property is often a proper subject for lay opinion, Pedro's testimony here is improper lay opinion.

Therefore, Pedro's testimony should not be admitted.

3. Rex's testimony about the age of the painting

Relevance

Rule given above.

As an issue in the case is that Gallery misrepresented the painting as a valuable original from the 17th century, expert testimony that the painting was done within the past 50 years tends to prove that Gallery fraudulently presented the painting as from the 17th century. Therefore, it is logically relevant. As its probative value is not substantially outweighed by a danger of undue prejudice, Rex's testimony is also legally relevant.

Therefore, the testimony is

Therefore, Rex is competent to testify.

Expert Opinion

An expert must be qualified as an expert by their technical experience, specialized knowledge, education, or otherwise relevant experience in the relevant field. To be admissible, expert opinion must be believed by the expert to a reasonable certainty and based on reliable methods that are reliably applied. An expert may base his opinion on his own tests and experience as well as information that is presented to him at trial. Under the Daubert test, courts test the reliability of a scientific technique by evaluating factors such as: whether it has been tested, the rate of error, and whether it has been peer reviewed. Under the minority Frye test, the method must be generally accepted in the relevant community.

As Rex is a chemistry professor who has been retained by art galleries to date paintings, he appears to be qualified in dating paintings, based on his education in the area and experience. While the opposing side may impeach his level of experience in only four galleries, he nonetheless appears qualified to testify. As he used the XYZ method to arrive at his conclusion, he is able to properly testify to out-of-court tests performed to render his opinion. Here, as Rex has testified that the XYZ method is reliable and used by most experts to determine the age of paintings, his method appears to be a reliable method reliably applied. This method is approved under the Frye test if accepted by most experts to date paintings. While not all the Daubert factors are clear, Rex has testified to testing it himself to determine the accuracy. While other facts, such as high rate of error or lack of peer review may render the method unreliable, the method appears acceptable under the facts presented in Rex's testimony.

Therefore, Rex's testimony should be admitted.

4. Excerpt

Relevance

Rule given above. Evidence to impeach another witness is always logically relevant.

Here, Gallery has offered the excerpt that XYZ is unreliable to impeach Rex's testimony and disprove the claim that the painting was dated within the past 50 years. As impeaching a witness's testimony is always relevant, this evidence is logically relevant. Moreover, it tends to disprove the assertion that the painting is from within the last 50 years. As undue prejudice will not substantially outweigh prejudicial value, it is legally relevant.

Therefore, the evidence is relevant.

Authentication

General Rule given above. Periodicals and some books are often considered self-authenticating.

Here, the excerpt has been authenticated because Marie has testified to its authenticity. Moreover, since it is a publication, it may also be self-authenticating.

Therefore, it is authenticated.

Hearsay

General hearsay rule stated above.

Since the excerpt stating that XYZ is not reliable was made out of court and is being offered for the truth of the matter asserted, it is hearsay and will be inadmissible unless an exception or exemption applies.

Learned Treatise

Under the Learned Treatise exception to hearsay, statements from a learned treatise that is generally recognized as a reliable authority and relied on by experts may be admitted. Select excerpts may be read to the jury, but the learned treatise itself is not received as an exhibit because of the concern of how juries may interpret the learned treatise.

Here, since the publication was testified to by a stipulated expert to be a reliable authority, it fits the learned treatise exception for hearsay and the statements may be admitted. However, while the excerpts may be read to the jury, they are not received into evidence as an exhibit under this exception.

While the excerpt may be properly read to the jury, it should not be received as an exhibit.

5. Rex's Journal Article

Rule given above.

As Rex's statement in the journal article contradicting his testimony that XYZ is reliable is impeachment evidence, it is logically relevant and casts into doubt the truth of his testimony. Its probative value is high and not outweighed, so it is legally relevant.

Therefore, the journal article is relevant.

Authentication

Rule stated above.

As periodicals are considered self-authenticating, the article was authenticated.

Hearsay

Rule given above.

Since the statements in the journal article are offered to prove that XYZ is not reliable and were made out of court, they are hearsay and inadmissible without an exception or exemption.

Learned

given above.

If the statement is from a learned treatise, it may be admissible under this exception substantively and may be read to the jury, but not received as an exhibit.

Prior Inconsistent Statement

Prior inconsistent statements are hearsay exemptions, admissible to impeach testimony. The witness must be given a chance to explain or correct the statement. If they were not sworn statements, they are not admissible substantively.

Here, Rex's statement in the journal was a prior inconsistent statement to his testimony about XYZ. Therefore, it may be offered for the limited purpose of impeaching him, provided that Rex is given an opportunity to explain. Since Rex left the courtroom, he was likely not given this opportunity. Since the statement in the article was not sworn, it is not admissible substantively under this exemption.

Therefore, Rex's statements may be admitted under learned treatise or prior inconsistent statement, provided he has an opportunity to explain.

QUESTION 5: SELECTED ANSWER B

1. The Photocopy of the Advertisement

Relevance - Logical and Legal

To be admissible, evidence must be both logically and legally relevant. Evidence is logically relevant if it tends to make a fact at issue more or less likely. Evidence is legally relevant if its probative value is not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice or confusing the jury.

Here, Pedro is claiming that Gallery committed fraud when they advertised that the painting he purchased was the only painting by a noted artist for sale in the world. The advertisement is logically relevant because it supports Pedro's claim that Gallery made this representation. The advertisement is legally relevant because it is unlikely that the advertisement will unfairly prejudice Gallery - it does not appear that they are denying the advertisement, and it does not contain any inflammatory or misleading content.

Thus, the photocopy of the advertisement is relevant.

Authentication

When submitting documents into evidence, the proponent must demonstrate that the evidence is what it purports to be. A witness's testimony about the document is generally sufficient to satisfy the authentication requirement. Here, Pedro testified that he saw an advertisement bearing Gallery's logo, and submitted a photocopy of the advertisement. Pedro's testimony is sufficient to authenticate the document.

Best Evidence Rule

The Best Evidence Rule states that when a witness is testifying about the contents of a document, the document itself is the best evidence and must be produced and submitted to the jury. Here, the Best Evidence Rule applies, because Pedro is testifying about the contents of the advertisement.

However, the Best Evidence Rule states that photocopies of documents satisfy the rule. Therefore, because Pedro submitted a photocopy of the advertisement, the Best Evidence Rule has been satisfied.

Hearsay

Hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Hearsay is generally inadmissible as evidence unless an exception applies. Here, the advertisement was circulated out of court, and it is a statement because it is a written claim about the painting.

However, Pedro will point out that he is not offering the advertisement for its truth - that is, he is not offering it as evidence that the painting is the only painting by a noted 17th century artist. In fact, Pedro is offering it while claiming it is not true - that the statement is fraudulent. If he is not offering it for its truth, the statement is not hearsay and not barred by this rule.

Hearsay Exception - Admission by Party Opponent

If the court deems that Pedro is offering the advertisement for its truth, there is an exception to the hearsay rule for a statement made by a party to a case offered into evidence by the opposing party. Here, Pedro's party opponent is Gallery. He will point out that the advertisement bears Gallery's logo and that Gallery sold him the painting referenced in the advertisement. This is sufficient to establish that the advertisement is properly considered a statement made by Gallery, and it is admissible under the admission by party opponent exception.

Hearsay Exception - Independent Legal Significance

There is an exception to the hearsay rule when the act of making the statement is an element to the cause of action. For example, in a defamation case, the fact that a statement was made is independently legally significant, because the making of the statement is an element of a defamation claim.

Here, Pedro is claiming fraud. He alleges that Gallery's claim in their advertisement was materially false, induced him to purchase the painting, and that he suffered harm. Gallery's claim has independent legal significance because the existence of the advertisement is one of the elements of Pedro's cause of action. Thus, it is admissible.

Conclusion: The court correctly admitted the photocopy of the advertisement.

2. Pedro's Testimony about the value of the painting

Relevance - Logical and Legal

(See Rules above.) Pedro is claiming that the painting he purchased is only worth $10,000. If proven, this would make it more likely that Gallery had committed fraud when they sold the painting to Pedro for $200,000. Thus, it is logically relevant.

The main hurdle for Pedro here is whether his testimony is legally relevant. The probative value and danger of unfair prejudice depend largely on the source of Pedro's claim, and whether it is likely to confuse or mislead the jury. Therefore, to assess whether the testimony is legally relevant, we must assess the basis of Pedro's opinion.

Opinion Evidence - Lay Witness

A lay witness is permitted to testify to opinions rationally based on their perceptions. Lay witnesses are not permitted to provide lay opinions based upon specialized or technical knowledge.

Here, Pedro is testifying that the painting is worth $10,000 because it is a reproduction of the original. This testimony is based on his valuation based on three appraisals made by art dealers. The appraisals made by art dealers require specialized or technical knowledge, because art appraisals are not the type of thing that an ordinary person would be able to conclude based on their perceptions.

Thus, Pedro's testimony is not a permissible lay opinion.

Opinion Evidence - Expert Witness

An expert witness is a witness who has specialized knowledge or training in an area. They may provide expert opinions if those opinions are based on their training and experience and methods sufficiently reliable as to pass the Daubert test. The Daubert test assesses whether the methods are generally accepted in the field, if there is a known error rate, if the methods have been subject to peer review.

Here, there is nothing to suggest that Pedro is an expert in art appraisals. Rather, he is introducing his conclusion based on appraisals by experts. Although the appraisals might well be acceptable expert opinions, Pedro has not established the training and experience of the dealers, nor the methods utilized to establish the appraisals.

Thus, the testimony about the value of the painting is not a permissible expert opinion.

Hearsay

(See Rules above.) Pedro is claiming that his valuation is based on the appraisals of three art dealers. The art dealers made those appraisals out of court, and Pedro is offering them for their truth - that is, the valuation of the painting. Thus, the appraisals of the art dealers are hearsay and inadmissible unless a hearsay exception applies.

Otherwise inadmissible hearsay may be admitted if it forms the basis of an expert opinion. However, as discussed above, Pedro's conclusion is not a proper expert opinion. Thus, it is inadmissible under the hearsay rule.

Best Evidence

(See Rule above.) Pedro is testifying about three appraisals that formed the basis of his opinion. If the appraisals were in writing, then Pedro's testimony about their conclusions would be subject to the Best Evidence Rule, and the appraisal documents themselves must be admitted into evidence. If the appraisals were made to Pedro verbally, the Best Evidence Rule does not apply.

Returning to Legal Relevance

Because Pedro's opinion is not based on his own expertise, and because the methods have not been confirmed to be reliable, the probative value of his own opinion is likely low. On the other hand, testimony that the painting is worth $10,000 -- absent a sufficient basis for that opinion -- is unfairly prejudicial to Gallery, who was not permitted to cross-examine the art dealers on their conclusions. Therefore, it is not legally relevant.

Conclusion: The court should not allow Pedro's testimony about the value of the painting, because it is an improper opinion, it is hearsay, and its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice.

3. Rex's testimony about the age of the painting

Relevance - Logical and Legal

(See Rules above.) Rex's testimony is logically relevant because he claims that the painting is a reproduction, which makes Pedro's claim of fraud more likely. Legal relevance will be discussed further below.

Opinion - Expert Opinion

(See Rule above.) Here, Rex has specialized training and knowledge because he has been retained by art galleries to determine the age of paintings. It's not clear whether Rex's expertise in chemistry is related to the XYZ technique, but assuming that the technique involves chemistry, his specialized knowledge would qualify him as an expert.

The issue is whether the XYZ technique is sufficiently reliable to meet the Daubert standard. Rex testified that the principles are reliable, because he has used it in the past and his results have corresponded with the known age of paintings. He testified that it was reliable and used by most experts in his field.

Gallery's Challenge to the Reliability of the XYZ Technique

After Rex was excused from testifying, Gallery brought claims that the XYZ technique is not reliable. (Discussed more below.) However, if they wished to preclude Rex's testimony on grounds that it is not reliable, they should have raised the issue before

Rex delivered his opinion. Gallery should have requested the court make a determination about the reliability of XYZ technique outside the presence of the jury. If the court determined the technique was not sufficiently reliable, Rex's testimony would have been precluded. The fact that the court allowed it suggests that either the issue was not raised prior to Rex's testimony, or that the court determined it was sufficiently reliable.

Returning to Legal Relevance

The evidence is probative because it helps the jury understand the age of the painting and the likelihood that it is a reproduction. Although there may be some unfair prejudice if it turns out the XYZ technique is not reliable, there was a sufficient basis for the court to conclude that it satisfied Daubert.

Conclusion: The court properly admitted Rex's testimony about the age of the painting

4. The excerpt from The Science of Dating Works of Art

Relevance - Logical and Legal

(See Rules above.) The publication is logically relevant because it suggests that the XYZ technique is not reliable for determining age of works of art, which is at issue in this case. It is legally relevant because there is not a danger of unfair prejudice to Pedro. Thus, it is relevant.

Hearsay

The publication was created out of court, and is being offered for its truth - that is, that the XYZ technique is not reliable. Thus, it is hearsay and is inadmissible absent any exception.

Hearsay Exception - Learned Treatise

Learned treatises, or documents that are generally recognized as reliable authority, are permitted to be read to the jury despite the general rule against hearsay. Here, "The Science of Dating Works of Art" is generally recognized as a reliable authority.

However, while the learned treatise exception allows the text to be read to the jury, it does not permit the text to be introduced into evidence as an exhibit.

Thus, although the court properly allowed Marie to quote an excerpt from “The Science of Dating Works of Art,” the excerpt should not have gone back to the jury as an exhibit.

5. Rex's journal article

Relevance - Logical and Legal

(See Rules above.) The article is relevant because it undermines Rex's claim about the reliability of the XYZ technique, which is an important issue for the jury. Although it harms Pedro's theory and the credibility of his expert, this prejudice is not unfair. Thus, it is logically and legally relevant.

Best Evidence

(See Rule above.) This is satisfied because the article itself was offered into evidence.

Hearsay

Rex authored the journal article out of court, and Gallery is using it for its truth - that is, that the XYZ technique is not reliable. Thus, it is hearsay and is inadmissible unless an exception applies.

Hearsay Exception - Prior Inconsistent Statement

When a witness testifies under oath, the opposing party is permitted to introduce a prior inconsistent statement made by that witness. This can be used as impeachment evidence, which means it can be used to undermine the credibility of the witness.

Here, Rex had testified in court that the XYZ technique is reliable. His prior statement was that it was not reliable. Thus, the prior statement is inconsistent.

However, this exception requires that the party seeking to introduce the inconsistent statement confront the witness about it and give them an opportunity to explain. Here, Gallery did not introduce this during cross-examination of Rex, where he would have had the opportunity to explain or defend his positions. Instead, they introduced it after Rex was excused and left the courtroom.

Because Gallery did not introduce this statement while Rex had an opportunity to explain it, it is not properly admitted as a prior inconsistent statement.

Hearsay Exception - Learned Treatise

The evidence at issue is a journal article. Some journal articles may qualify as learned treatises, as explained above. However, it does not state that the journal article is generally recognized as a reliable authority. In fact, Rex's own testimony suggests that the journal article may not be reliable. Therefore, it should not be allowed under this exception.

Conclusion: Although the journal article would have been proper if Gallery had sought its admission during Rex's cross examination, the attempt to introduce it during their case-in-chief is improper because it is hearsay not within any exception. Therefore, the court should exclude it.

QUESTION 1

Bath Stuff (Bath), a retailer located in Betaville, sent Neat Scents (Scents), an importer located in Sunville, a signed offer to purchase 1,000 individually wrapped candles at a price of $10,000, free on board ("FOB") Betaville. Scents promptly sent Bath a signed acknowledgment accepting the offer, which also included the following language: "Some shipping boxes have external water damage. Contents of shipping boxes guaranteed to have no damage." Bath did not respond to the acknowledgment. No other express warranties or disclaimers were stated in the offer or acknowledgment.

Scents timely shipped the order to Bath's warehouse using TruckCo, a third-party common carrier, at a freight cost of $400. One-quarter of the shipping boxes showed signs of water damage. Each shipping box contained candles that were individually wrapped for retail sale. All candles and individual wrapping were undamaged. When the shipment arrived, Bath's employees noticed the water damage on some shipping boxes. They immediately rejected the shipment without opening any boxes, promptly notified Scents of the rejection, and refused to pay any amount.

Scents paid TruckCo $500 to ship the candles back to Sunville and notified Bath that Scents intended to resell the candles. Scents promptly solicited bids from all of its customers and received the best offer, which it accepted, from Redemption Candles (Redemption) of $9,000, FOB Sunville.

Bath promptly entered into a valid written contract with Hot Candles (Hot), an importer in Hatville, to purchase 1,000 replacement candles for $12,000, FOB Hatville. TruckCo was engaged to transport the candles from Hatville to Betaville. In transit, TruckCo's truck was struck by lightning in a storm and all of the candles melted. TruckCo's shipping contract disavows liability from acts of God, including lightning. Bath refused to pay for the candles and Hot refused to send replacement candles.

Bath sued Scents for breach of contract and Scents countersued Bath. Bath sued Hot for breach of contract and Hot countersued Bath.

1. Did Bath and Scents have a binding contract and, if so, did either party breach the contract? If there was a breach of contract, what damages are likely to be recovered, if any? Discuss.

2. Has Bath or Hot breached their contract? If so, what damages are likely to be recovered, if any? Discuss.

QUESTION 1: SELECTED ANSWER A

Applicable law

Contracts for the sale of goods (movable items of property) are governed by the UCC. Because the contracts at issue here involve candles, a movable good, the UCC applies.

Additionally, under the UCC, certain provisions apply only to merchants. A merchant is one who deals in goods of the kind involved in the contract, or who otherwise by virtue of his profession holds himself out as having peculiar knowledge in the goods involved. Here, all parties are likely merchants. Bath is a retailer that appears to deal in candles. Neat Scents is an importer that likewise appears to deal in candles. Further, Hot Candles appears to be an importer that also deals in candles. Accordingly, all parties to the relevant contracts are merchants, and the UCC's provisions pertaining to merchants will apply.

Whether B&S had a binding contract

A binding contract requires mutual assent, consideration, and no defenses to enforcement or formation.

Mutual assent

For a contract to be valid, it requires mutual assent. Mutual assent involves a "meeting of the minds," and is ordinarily shown by offer and acceptance (though under the UCC, if the parties conduct indicates that there is a contract, there may be a contract even if offer and acceptance cannot be specifically identified).

Offer

An offer is an assent of willingness to be bound, made so that the offeree could reasonably expect that the offeror intended to enter into a binding agreement / make a commitment or promise. An offer must have certain and definite terms and must be made to an identifiable offeree so that he could understand that his assent would conclude the bargain.

Here, Bath sent a signed "offer" to purchase 1,000 individually wrapped candles for $10,000. It also included a "FOB" term (with FOB being Betaville, Bath's location of business), which indicates that Bath sought to enterinto a shipping contract whereby the goods would be shipped by common carrier and the risk of loss would pass to Bath once the goods reached Betaville. The facts indicate this was an offer, and it likewise meets the definition. It indicates a willingness to be bound / enter into a binding agreement for the purchase of candles. Further, it has certain and definite terms. Under the UCC, generally, an offer need only include a quantity term--all other terms can be supplied by UCC default terms. Here, the offer included the quantity (1,000) of candles while also specifying other terms, including the price ($10,000), that they be individually wrapped, and the shipment method. Accordingly, this was likely an offer, as its terms were certain and definite such that it is capable of enforcement; it was also made to Neat Scents, an identifiable offeree.

Acceptance

Acceptance is a manifestation of assent to the terms of the offer, made so as to conclude the bargain. The offer creates the power of acceptance in the offeree, and by accepting, he binds the parties to the contract. Here, the facts indicate that Scents promptly sent a signed acknowledgment accepting the offer. In so doing, Scents appeared to assent to the terms of the offer. Under the UCC, an offer to buy goods may be accepted by prompt shipment, or by a promise to ship (the latter of which was the case here).

Under the common law, an acceptance had to be a “mirror image” of the offer; that is, it must not include any different or additional terms. However, under the UCC, the fact that an acceptance includes additional terms will not preclude a binding contract. Rather, a contract is formed by the manifestation of assent to be bound, and whether the different terms become part of the contract depends on if the parties are both merchants. Accordingly, when Scents sent the signed acceptance, a bargain was concluded and the parties had a binding contract.

UCC 2-207 (battle of the forms)

As referenced, Scents’ acknowledgment included additional terms. Particularly, it included language relating to the fact that the boxes would have external water damage, as well as the guarantee that the contents would have no damage.

As mentioned above, it appears that both Bath and Scents are merchants, as they both appear to deal in goods of this kind or otherwise by their profession hold themselves out as having knowledge/skill particular to candles. Accordingly, the contract was concluded with the acceptance and, under UCC 2-207, the additional terms included in the acceptance will become part of the contract unless the offeror’s offer was expressly conditioned on only the terms included, it rejects the additional terms in a reasonable time, or the terms materially change the bargain.

Here, Bath did not respond to the acknowledgment, nor did Bath’s offer appear to include any language indicating that the offer was expressly conditioned on only being accepted on the particular terms stated without any additions. Accordingly, the only issue is whether the terms included in Scents' acknowledgment materially altered the bargain.

Scents will argue that the fact that some of the shipping boxes would have external water damage hardly alters the bargain. After all, it also included that express warranty that the contents would have no damage. It does not appear that Bath was entering into the bargain with any particular expectancy or desire to have the shipping boxes be in a certain condition. While they did specify the candles' condition--that they be individually wrapped--no reference whatsoever was made to the external boxes. Moreover, damage to the external boxes which does not affect the contents (which are the things being bargained for) likely cannot be said to materially alter the terms of the bargain. Further, the express guarantee that the contents would not be damaged, if anything, is a desirable term for Bath, so cannot be said to materially alter the bargain. In other words, the terms included in Scents' acknowledgment did not significantly change Bath's expectancy under the contract, nor materially alter its potential damages or liabilities. As such, since both parties are merchants, these terms likely became part of the contract.

Accordingly, a contract was formed when Scents sent the acknowledgment form, and the terms included therein--that some of the boxes would have external water damage and the express warranty (i.e., the explicit promise as to the condition of the goods) that the contents would have no damage became part of the contract.

Note that, even if the explicit promise that the candles would not be damaged had not been included as an express warranty, it likely would have been implied anyway (which further supports the notion that it did not materially alter the contract), as--discussed below--the UCC requires perfect tender of goods. Moreover, the fact that the contract included an FOB term for Betaville (Bath's location) indicates that Scents would bear the risk of loss if the goods were damaged until they reached Betaville, thus implying that they should be undamaged.

Consideration

Consideration is the bargained-for exchange of legal value. Each promise must induce the detriment, and vice versa. Here, Bath promised to pay $10,000 if Scents promised to ship the 1,000 candles, and vice versa. Accordingly, there was consideration.

Thus, there is mutual assent and consideration here and there was a binding contract.

Defenses

There do not appear to be any viable defenses to formation. Scents could try to argue there was no mutual assent based on the additional terms included in the acceptance, but as discussed above, that argument will fail.

Statute of frauds

Some contracts require a signed writing to be enforceable. One such contract is a contract for the purchase of goods over $500. Here, Bath was to buy $10,000 worth of candles, and thus, this contract must be evidenced by a signed writing.

The writing and signature requirements, however, are liberally construed. There need not be a single writing embodying the entire contract; multiple writings can be put together, so long as they evidence that a valid contract was formed. Moreover, under the UCC, the writing(s) must indicate the quantity term.

Here, putting together both the offer--which was signed by Baths--and the acceptance--which was signed by Scents--there is likely sufficient written evidence to evidence both a contract and its essential terms (including, most importantly, quantity--1,000 candles). Moreover, the writing(s) is signed by both parties, and thus, both parties to be charged.

Also note that since both parties sued under the contract, they have effectively affirmed its existence in court.

Merchant confirmatory memo

Bath may argue that it only signed the offer and not the acceptance, and thus, that it cannot be charged with the contract because the only writing signed by it is the offer. However, this is likely not a good argument. Under the UCC merchant's confirmatory memo rule, where both parties are merchants, so long as there is a signed writing--even if signed by the party bringing suit--that was sent memorializing the terms' of the parties agreement, and the other party received it and had reason to know of it and did not object in a reasonable time, it can serve to bind the parties / satisfy the SOF, even if only signed by one.

Here, Scents signed the acknowledgment form and Bath received it but did not respond at all. As both parties are merchants, the acknowledgment form is likely enough to bind both Bath and Scents, even though it was only signed by Scents, under the merchant confirmatory memo rule.

Since there do not appear to be any other defenses to formation, and since there was mutual assent and consideration, the parties had a binding contract.

Whether either party breached & likely damages

Perfect tender rule

The UCC requires "perfect tender." This means that if a shipment of goods fails to conform in any way to the terms of the contract, then it is considered a breach and the buyer is entitled to reject all, reject some, or accept all.

Here, Scents shipped the goods timely to Bath's warehouse using TruckCo, a third-party common carrier. Though the contract did not specify the common carrier that should be used, there are no facts indicating that using TruckCo was unreasonable and, since this contract involved an FOB term, it was very likely a shipment contract requiring goods to be sent by common carrier (which is the presumption if a contract is silent, anyway). Accordingly, sending the goods in a reasonable time and via TruckCo appears to be compliant with the contract.

Moreover, though one-quarter of the boxes were water damaged, as discussed above, that term very likely became part of the contract. Though the contract indicates that "some" boxes would be damaged--which is not necessarily precise--the fact that only one-quarter of the boxes were damages is likely compliant with that term. Moreover, all the candles inside were individually wrapped (as required) and undamaged (as compliant with the express warranty provided by Scents which, as discussed, was likely part of the contract).

As such, it appears that Scents completely complied and did not breach any terms of the contract. Accordingly, it appears that tender was indeed perfect, and thus, that Scents did not breach.

Bath's rejection

Even though Bath's employees rejected the shipment because of the water damage, they were not entitled to do so, as that was a part of the contract, per the above discussion. Moreover, they immediately rejected the shipment without even taking time to inspect the goods to determine whether they complied. Though a buyer is entitled to reject a shipment where there has been imperfect tender--and though Bath did so immediately (which thus does not raise any issues re: revoking an already given acceptance) --since there was no breach by Scents, Bath was not entitled to reject the shipment. Thus, by rejecting the shipment and refusing to pay as they were obligated to do under the contract, Bath breached.

Scents' damages

Since Bath was in breach, Scents is likely entitled to damages.

Expectation damages

The standard measure of damages when a buyer wrongfully breaches under a contract is expectation damages, which are intended to give the non-breaching party the benefit of the bargain and to put them in a position as if the contract had not been breached. Damages can only be collected where they are certain and where they could not be mitigated.

As part of mitigating damages, a seller is entitled to engage in a commercially reasonable resale of goods wrongfully rejected. Here, Scents sold the goods to Redemption for $9,000. It apparently solicited bids--and did so promptly--from all its customers and selected the highest bid from Redemption. As such, the resale appears to be commercially reasonable (done timely and for a reasonable amount--indeed, it was fairly close to the original amount that Bath was to pay and Scents appears to have considered multiple offers before accepting Hot's). Since it was $1,000 less than Scents was supposed to get under the Bath contract, Scents is entitled to $1,000 for Bath's wrongful breach. Additionally, since Scents notified Bath that it would resell the candles, it was entitled to do so.

Incidental damages

Under the UCC, a non-breaching party is also entitled to incidental damages (i.e., commercially reasonable costs associated with dealing with the breach including shipping, storing goods, and other such costs). Here, Scents paid $500 to ship the candles back from Sunville. This appears to be a reasonable cost of reshipping the goods; though, originally, it only cost $400 to ship to Bath--perhaps it costs more to collect them from a buyer, or perhaps the fees were different since it was likely a few days later. Since the charge to ship them back was only $100 more, this was likely commercially reasonable and Scents is entitled to $500 as incidental damages. Bath may try to argue that it was not commercially reasonable to include the FOB Sunville term, but that argument will bear no weight since Scents' original contract with Bath also included an FOB term for the buyer's city of business.

Note that Scents cannot collect the $400 it originally spent on shipping the goods to Bath, because that was always going to be an expense under the shipping contract that Scents would be required to spend.

As such, Scents is entitled to $1,500 total.

Bath

Though Bath may try to argue that it is entitled to $2,000--the difference it had to pay for replacement candles--it will not succeed because, as discussed above, it breached and was not entitled to reject the shipment. As such, it will be unable to collect any damages from Scents, but rather will be required to pay $1,500 as discussed above. Though it has sued Scents, it will be unable to recover anything and Scents will instead win its countersuit.

Here, the facts indicate that the parties had a valid contract. The contract included an FOB Hatville term. As mentioned above, an "FOB" term in a shipping contract indicates that the goods will be shipped by common carrier, and that the risk of loss will pass to the buyer when the goods reached the identified location. Here, Bath and Hot's contract indicated Hatville as the FOB location. Hatville is Hot's place of business. Accordingly, Hot was responsible for getting the goods to Hatville. Once the candles arrived in Hatville, the risk of loss passed to Bath. Accordingly, even though the goods were to be shipped by common carrier (which, again, is the presumption in light of silence, but is also assumed when an FOB term is included), Bath would bear the risk of loss from the time the goods were in Hatville until they arrived with them.

Breach by Hot

Bath will argue that Hot breached by not delivering the candles. As such, it will argue that it was relieved of its liability to pay given the imperfect tender. As mentioned above, the UCC requires perfect tender. Obviously, failing entirely to deliver the candles is not perfectly compliant with the terms of the contract. Moreover, melted candles obviously are not a perfect tender of the ordered candles. However, as discussed below, Hot very likely bore the risk of loss when the goods were destroyed, and thus is liable for the contract amount.

Breach by Bath

As mentioned, an FOB term indicates that the buyer will bear the risk of loss from the time the good arrive at the specified location. Here, TruckCo was engaged to transport the candles from Hatville to Betaville. The goods were destroyed in transit, i.e., they had already left Hatville by the time they were destroyed. As such, Bath bore the risk of loss when the goods were struck by lightning. When the risk of loss has passed to the buyer, and when the goods are destroyed after--through no fault of the seller--the buyer will be liable for the full contract price.

Here, Hot will argue that the goods were destroyed by a lightning storm that struck the truck after the risk of loss passed, i.e., after the goods had been in / left Hatville. Moreover, Hot will note that this was not their fault in any way. They will also likely point out that TruckCo's shipping contract disavows liability from acts of God, including lightning. It should be noted, though, that this is not especially relevant here because, as discussed, under the FOB term, the risk of loss passed to the buyer after the goods were in Hatville.

Bath may try to argue that the risk of loss did not pass because it would have been entitled to reject the goods. It is true that the risk of loss will not pass if nonconforming goods are the ones that are destroyed--i.e., if the buyer would have a right to reject the goods, the ROL will not pass. Bath may try to argue that the candles were melted, and thus, that it would have had a right to reject them and should not be liable for the ROL. However, this would be bootstrapping the very thing that destroyed the goods as an attempt to argue that it had a right to revoke the goods. In other words, there is no indication that the goods--when sent--did not conform, or that Bath would have had a right to reject the candles had they not been melted by the lightning storm. As such, it cannot argue that the risk of loss did not pass. Accordingly, the goods were destroyed when Bath bore the risk of loss. Thus, Hot did not breach the contract. Rather, Bath did when it refused to pay for the goods.

Refusal to send substitutes

Bath may argue that Hot breached by refusing to send substitute candles after they were destroyed. However, the seller is under no obligation to send replacement goods if they are destroyed after the ROL passes. As such, this was not a breach.

Damages

Hot's damages

When goods are destroyed after the ROL passes, the seller is entitled to the full contract price, provided that they had no fault in destroying the goods. This is effectively expectation damages--i.e., gives the seller the benefit of the bargain. As such, Hot will be entitled to $12,000 from Bath and will win its countersuit.

Bath's damages

As discussed above, since Bath breached by refusing to pay after the risk of loss passed, it was incorrect to refuse to pay Hot. Thus, it will be liable for the full contract price and will lose its suit and be entitled to no damages from Hot.

QUESTION 1: SELECTED ANSWER B

The UCC will apply because this is a sale of goods.

Bath and Scents Contract

Bath and Scents had a valid contract, which Bath breached. To have a valid contract, there must be mutual assent and consideration. Mutual assent is defined as an offer plus acceptance. A valid contract is breached when one party, or both, breaks a promise in the contract and there are no defenses to the contract or excuses for non-performance. The UCC requires "perfect tender," and thus even a minor breach constitutes a total breach, allowing the buyer to reject goods or the seller to seek full damages. A court will award damages based on the type of harm suffered.

Mutual Assent

Mutual assent consists of an offer and acceptance. An offer is a manifestation of the intent to be bound. An offer must be relatively certain and definite. It should identify the parties and subject matter of the contract with reasonable certainty. An offer can be revoked at any time unless it is an irrevocable option contract, merchant firm offer, or one party reasonably incurs detrimental reliance. An advertisement is generally not an offer.

Here, Bath made an offer to Scents when they sent a signed offer to purchase 1,000 candles for $10,000. The quantity and price terms (note: price terms are not required by the UCC, only quantity terms are required) are sufficiently definite, and Bath has identified the parties.

An offer is accepted when the offeree accepts the terms of the offeror's offer. An offer must be accepted in a reasonable amount of time. Under the UCC, the offeree's acceptance does not need to mirror the offeror's terms. Additional terms will become part of the contract if: (1) both parties are merchants; (2) the terms are not material; and (3) the offeror does not object to the terms. A merchant is an individual who: (1) regularly deals in the type of goods sold; or (2) holds themself out as having special knowledge or skills regarding the goods sold. Terms are material if they have a tendency to cause surprise or hardship to the other party. Disclaimers of warranties are always material. A person is thought to accept additional terms when they do not object in a reasonable amount of time.

Here, Scents responded "promptly," accepting Bath's offer for 1,000 individually wrapped candles for $10,000, FOB Betaville. However, Scents' response included some additional terms. Scents stated that the boxes the candles would be sent in had external damage and added an express warranty that the contents (candles and wrapping) would have no damage. As stated above, these terms will become part of the contract if the two sellers are merchants, the terms are not material, and the offeror does not object. Here, both parties are merchants. Bath is a retailer that typically sells candles. Scents is a candle importer and that regularly deals in candles.

The terms will not become part of the contract if they are material. It is likely that the state of the shipping boxes and whether or not the shipping boxes themselves are damaged is not a material term. Water damage on the shipping boxes has no bearing on the state of the candles inside (it is stated they showed up undamaged). Shipping boxes with water damage would not cause surprise or hardship to a reasonable party. Most parties likely throw the boxes out. Still, Bath might argue that they intended to keep the shipping boxes to use when they sell candles to their own customers, and that the damage makes this more difficult. Scents will respond that they did not have knowledge of this purpose and that the damaged boxes still have no material impact on their contract, which was simply to purchase individually wrapped candles. Scents also expressly stated a guarantee that the candles themselves will have no damage. While the disclaimer of warranties is considered material, an express warranty from a seller will become part of the contract.

Last, Bath did not object to Scents additional terms. They did not respond at all, and this will be deemed an acceptance of the additional terms. Thus, Scents' terms likely became part of their contract, and the contract was for: 1,000 candles at $10,000 shipped FOB Betaville; some shipping boxes with water damage; and the express warranty the candles would have no damages.

Consideration

Consideration is bargained-for exchange. A court will typically not second guess the value of any agreed consideration. Here, this is easily met. Bath paid $10,000 for 1,000 candles. That is a bargained-for exchange.

Defenses to the Contract

Even if there is mutual assent and consideration, a party can still seek to get out of performance if there is a valid defense to the contract, including: lack of contractual capacity, mistake, ambiguity or misunderstanding, unconscionability, and violation of the statute of frauds. If the subject matter of a contract falls under the statute of frauds, the contract must be in a signed writing. The statute of frauds includes: (1) any promise in which the consideration is marriage; (2) contracts in which performance cannot happen in less than a year; (3) land sale contracts; (4) executorships; (5) sale of goods $500 or more; and (6) sureties.

Here, the statute of frauds is applicable. This is a sale of goods over $500. However, this is easily met. Both parties sent signed documents stating the quantity and price terms of the transaction. No other defenses apply, so neither party will be able to have the contract declared unenforceable.

Excuses for Non-Performance

Excuses for non-performance include impracticability and frustration of purpose. Impracticability is when an unforeseeable event has caused the performance of a contract to be rendered impossible or highly impractical. Frustration of purpose occurs when both parties are aware of the contract's purpose and an unforeseeable event has occurred that renders this purpose void.

Here, none of these excuses apply so, as stated above, there is a valid contract between Bath and Scents to which no excuses or defenses apply.

Breach

Under the UCC, there is the perfect tender rule. The perfect tender rule states that a contract has been breached when performance does not occur perfectly. When a seller breaches, the buyer may either: (1) accept all goods; (2) reject all goods; or (3) accept and reject some of the goods.

Here, it appears that Scents has met the perfect tender rule. Scents shipped the order to Bath's FOB Betaville. As Scents had stated, some of the boxes showed water damage and all of the candles and wrapping were undamaged. Thus, Bath did not have a right to reject the shipment and refuse to pay. Bath should have opened the boxes and inspected the contents before deciding if the shipment was not up to their standards. Because the terms of their contract included the term that some of the boxes would have water damage, Bath does not have the right to now say that the contract is breached. As stated above, this term became part of the contract when Bath did not object to the additional terms.

Thus, Bath is in breach of this contract and Scents can pursue damages.

Damages

A court will most likely award Scents expectation damages. Expectation damages are damages intended to put the non-breaching party in the position they would have been had the contract been performed as stated. Here, the contract was for $10,000. Still, sellers are obligated to use good faith and seek to resell any items rejected by the buyer. The buyer will be responsible for the difference between the original contract price and the new contract price.

Here, Scents was able to resell the candles to Redemption for $9,000. It appears that Scents attempted to cover in good faith, solicited bids from many customers, and indeed chose the best / highest offer. Thus, Bath will not be able to argue that Scents did not resell in good faith and that the damages should be reduced accordingly.

A non-breaching party will also be able to recover incidental damages. Incidental damages are damages that result from seeking to remedy the breach. Here, this would likely include any cost Scents had to pay to solicit bids from new customers and the $500 shipping cost they had to pay to ship the candles back to Sunville.

Scents will not be able to recover the initial $400 shipping fee as expectation damages, because, had the contract been performed fully and Bath paid the $10,000, Scents would have always been out the $400.

Last, Scents might try to argue they are entitled to lost profits damages. Lost profits damages are awarded when a seller is able to sell an infinite number of the goods in question and thus should be able to recover the lost profits from the sale. Here, the sale of candles likely qualifies as a lost profits situation. There is not a limit on the number of candles to be sold, and presumably Scents could order and sell as many candles as wanted. Thus, they may try to seek lost profits damages. However, I do not have enough facts to determine what the profit would have been on the 1,000 candles sale.

Bath might try to argue that any damages they owe Scents should be reduced by $2,000, because they had to purchase candles from Hot for $12,000. However, this argument is likely to fail because, as stated above, Bath is the breaching party and thus cannot recover any damages from Hot.

In conclusion, it is likely that a court will award Scents the $1,000 difference in contract prices, the $500 cost to ship the candles back to Sunville, and any expense they had to make to find a new buyer for the candles.

Bath and Hot Contract

As stated in the fact pattern, Bath and Hot had a valid written contract, so I will assume that mutual assent and consideration is satisfied.

Defenses and Excuses for Non-Performance

The defenses and excuses stated above do not apply here. Bath might try to argue that it is unconscionable for them to have to pay $12,000 when the goods were damaged and lost in transit. However, unconscionability of contract enforcement is determined at the time the contract was formed. Here, there is no indication the contract for 1,000 candles at $12,000 is unconscionable.

Breach

Hot has not breached the contract. Bath has breached the contract by refusing to pay. Bath and Hot had a shipment contract. A shipment contract is a contract in which the seller disclaims all liability for damage or accident to the items once the seller has delivered the goods to the third-party common carrier and notified the buyer. A shipment contract is formed when the seller is a merchant, and the contract states: FOB [seller's city].

Here, the seller is a merchant. Hot regularly deals in the type of goods sold (candles). The contract stated "FOB Hatville." Hot is located in Hatville; thus, this is the seller's city and the parties had a shipment contract. TruckCo is a third-party common carrier and it appears that Hot properly delivered the items to TruckCo. Thus, the cost of any accident or damage that occurs in transit or delivery of the items lies with the buyer, and Bath has no right to refuse to pay Hot. In addition, Hot is not required to send replacement candles. Hot has fulfilled their duty under this contract, i.e., deliver 1,000 candles to TruckCo.

Damages

Because Bath is in breach, a court will likely award Hot expectation damages as well. Here, the contract was for $12,000, so to put Hot in the position it would have been had the contract been performed, Bath must pay Hot $12,000.

Public School District (District) in State X is attempting to reduce gang violence in District's high schools. After consulting with local law enforcement, District has determined that most violence results from confrontations between two gangs, the Westsiders and the Eastsiders. As a result, District has adopted the following rule for all high school students: "No student shall wear any label, insignia, words, colors, signs or symbols that reflect gang-related activities. Students violating the policy will be immediately suspended or expelled from school."

For several years, Paloma, a high school senior, has had a small tattoo of a dove on one wrist, her "self-expression" as a peaceful person. Paloma has never been associated with any gang, including the Westsiders and Eastsiders. After learning of Paloma's tattoo, District officials described it to local law enforcement officials who said that it sounded like a Westsider gang symbol, which includes birds. Paloma was suspended for the last ten days of school after she refused District's request that she either wear long sleeves to cover her tattoo or have it removed.

Paloma, now graduated, and attending the college of her choice, has brought a declaratory relief action challenging the validity of District's policy under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution. District has moved to dismiss Paloma's lawsuit as moot on two grounds: (A) because she is no longer a high school student, and (B) District has now redefined "gang-related activities" in its rule in a manner consistent with State X's criminal code.

1. What arguments can Paloma make in support of her First and Fourteenth Amendment claims? Discuss.

2. Will either or both of District's arguments in support of its motion to dismiss Paloma's lawsuit be successful? Discuss.

QUESTION 2: SELECTED ANSWER A

First & Fourteenth Amendment Claims

First & Fourteenth Amendments

Paloma (P) is suing District (D) on the grounds that it violated her constitutional rights under the 1st and 14th Amendments. The First Amendment provides that Congress shall make no law abridging the freedoms of speech, press, association, and religion. The First Amendment is applied to the states via the 14th Amendment Due Process Clause (in other words, the First amendment is "incorporated" to apply to the states under the 14th Amendment Due Process Clause). Thus, P must show that her 1st Amendment rights, which apply to D under the 14th Amendment, were violated.

Standing

To bring a constitutional action in federal court, the plaintiff must have standing under Article III (because Article III only grants jx to "cases or controversies"). To show standing, the plaintiff must show: 1) injury in fact; 2) causation; and 3) redressability.

Here, P has suffered injury in fact because she was suspended for the last ten days of school (in other words, she has suffered actual harm as a result of D's policy). Second, P can show causation; the reason that she was suspended was because of D's policy prohibiting gang-related speech. Third, P can show redressability because a favorable court decision would declare the policy invalid and could potentially remove the suspension from her academic record. Thus, P has sufficient standing to bring this action (assuming it is not moot, see arguments below).

Freedom of Speech

P will argue that D's policy violates her freedom of speech under the 1st and 14th Amendments of the US Constitution. As a preliminary matter, speech is broadly defined under the 1st Amendment, and it can include symbolic/expressive conduct that would not be traditionally thought of as speech. Here, P was punished for having a small tattoo as an act of self-expression; the fact that she wore this tattoo as an act of self-expression shows that this is a symbolic/expressive act that counts as speech. P's tattoo constitutes expressive/symbolic speech that implicates the 1st Amendment.

State Action

To show a First Amendment violation, P must first show that there was state action (the Constitution does not apply to private actors, other than the 13th Amendment, which is not at issue here). State action simply means government action (it need not be at the "state" level; it can be local, federal, etc.). Here, P is challenging the actions of D, a public high school district. As a public school district, D is a part of the government and is thus a state actor. This requirement is met.

Vagueness

Laws/policies infringing on the freedom of speech cannot be vague; this requires that the law give fair notice of the prohibited conduct such that a reasonable person would understand what is prohibited by the policy.

Here, P can challenge D's policy on the grounds that it is vague. It prohibits symbols that reflect "gang-related activities," however, it does not define what exactly "gang-related activities" means. D will argue that given the prevalence of the two gangs, W and E, in the community, it would be obvious to a reasonable person what constitutes gang-related activities. However, P can argue that "gang-related activities" is a broad and unclear term with no set definition, and thus it does not put a reasonable person on notice of what conduct is prohibited--indeed, P had never had any association whatsoever with W or E, yet the symbol tattooed on her arm apparently was enough to get her suspended. P will argue that she was punished simply because her tattoo was a bird and birds are included in W's gang symbols--the phrase "gang-related activity" was insufficient to put her on notice that her own small dove tattoo may be punished. P has a good argument that this regulation was impermissibly vague.

Overbreadth

Similarly, a speech regulation will be struck down if it is overbroad, i.e., it regulates more speech than is necessary. P can also argue that D's regulation is impermissibly overbroad because it purports to broadly prohibit all symbolic speech reflecting "gang-related activities." This could include speech such as P's, which is not gang related in any way, simply because it looks similar to gang-related activity. This regulation could have been drawn more narrowly by clearly defining what constitutes gang-related activity; by allowing D officials to punish any speech that looks remotely gang-related, this regulation goes too far, and P can potentially challenge it as overbroad. D will argue that the rule was drawn as narrowly as possible to only impact gang-related activities but, given that that term is not defined and could be construed very broadly (as it was in P's case), D will have a difficult time proving this law is not overbroad.

Prior Restraint

A prior restraint is an order (such as an injunction or gag order) or a licensing scheme that seeks to prohibit speech before it has occurred. Here, although the regulation punishes speech, it does not appear to be a prior restraint in the way the court has traditionally defined it (this policy punishes speech after it happens, like most speech related laws). Thus, P cannot challenge this policy on the grounds that it is a prior restraint.

Symbolic Speech

P will argue that D's policy impermissibly regulates expressive speech under the 1st and 14th Amendments. The test is as follows: a regulation will be upheld only if: 1) it serves an important, non-speech related interest; 2) it burdens no more speech than necessary; and 3) the primary aim is not the suppression of speech. The government, D, has the burden of proving this test. Also, as a threshold matter, the government must have the power to create the law--here, the school district has the power to create reasonable regulations on public high school students, so D has the authority to implement such regulations.

Here, D will argue that this regulation passes the symbolic speech test. First, D will argue that it serves an important interest unrelated to speech--here, the purpose of this regulation is to reduce gang violence in public high schools. D will argue that a consultation with law enforcement has revealed that two main gangs, W and E, are responsible for gang violence in the community, and the goal of this regulation is to identify those students who are associated with the gang and may lead to violence. D will argue that there is an important interest here in making sure that children are safe from gang violence while at school. Moreover, D will argue that the primary aim of this law was not the suppression of speech, but rather to ensure the safety of students while at school. D will argue that permitting students to flash gang signs and represent their gangs will disrupt school and lead to violence; the goal of this law is not to suppress speech, but rather to facilitate public safety. Finally, D will argue that this policy does not burden any more speech than necessary--D will argue that this policy was narrowly drawn to only prohibit symbols/expression involving gang-related activities. D will argue that students can still express themselves in many other ways while at school and that this regulation only burdens gang-related speech; and is thus narrowly tailored and burdens no more speech than necessary. D will also point out that P could have simply worn long sleeve shirts for the final 10 days of her high school career and there would have been no issue (thus, the law is not overly burdensome on student speech because she was not required to remove the tattoo, she simply had to wear certain clothes to cover it up).

On the other hand, P will argue this regulation fails the test. P will argue that D's true aim is not to encourage safety in the school, but rather to suppress any speech it does not like by defining it as gang-related--she will point out that she is a peaceful person who has never been associated with any gang, and yet she was still punished and suspended from school for 10 days. P will argue that even if there is a valid interest in protecting student safety, this regulation burdens more speech than necessary by punishing students who engage in symbolic, expressive speech that is not gang-related, but arguably could be. She will argue that being suspended from school simply because she has a bird tattoo and one of the gangs (W) used bird symbols is a prime example of how this regulation is not narrowly drawn and burdens more speech than necessary---birds are an incredibly common symbol in numerous different contexts (religion, product logos, national symbols, etc.), and construing the ban on gang-related symbols to include all bird-related symbols is going much too far--this will result in the regulation of far more speech than is necessary to serve the interest of reducing gang violence and protecting students from such gang violence. P will argue that D's policy clearly burdens more speech than necessary by applying to anything that is even remotely gang-related, even if it is simply a bird tattoo that is designed to show "peaceful" self-expression.

On balance, even though D can likely establish an important, non-speech related interest motivating this policy (the safety of students at school and reduction of gang violence), P will likely prevail here by showing that the law burdens more speech than is necessary to protect that interest. P can most likely demonstrate this policy is an unconstitutional regulation of symbolic/expressive speech, and thus the court should strike it down and grant her relief on that basis.

Content-Neutral vs. Content-Based

If the court did not apply the symbolic/expressive speech test set forth above, and instead took a more traditional freedom of speech approach, the court would examine whether the regulation was content-neutral, or content-based. Content-neutral regulations are subject to intermediate scrutiny-like analysis, while content-based regulations receive strict scrutiny.

Here, the regulation is content-based given that it specifically targets gang related expressive conduct/speech (it regulates a particular type of content, not the time/place/manner of the speech's occurrence). Because it is content-based, it must pass strict scrutiny. Strict scrutiny requires that the government show the regulation is the least restrictive means of achieving a compelling government interest. Here, D will argue that it has a compelling interest in the protection of high school students from gang violence. A court may or may not find this to rise to the level of compelling. However, even if it is compelling, the policy still fails strict scrutiny because P can show that it is not the least restrictive alternative. Broadly banning all symbols/labels/colors that reflect "gang-related activity" (which is not clearly defined) is not the least restrictive way of preventing gang violence--the school could establish clear guidelines showing what counts as gang-related activity and could establish some sort of review process rather than outright suspending/expelling students. Because the district policy is not the least restrictive means of achieving the goal of reducing gang violence, it would fail strict scrutiny. Thus, P could successfully challenge it as a content-based regulation of speech that fails strict scrutiny.

Unprotected Categories of Speech

There are certain categories of speech that are viewed as unprotected: incitement, fighting words, true threats, and obscenity. Here, D may try to argue this regulation is attempting to regulate speech that falls into one of these categories. However, the problem is that this regulation is broadly drawn to impact all expressive speech related to "gang-related activities." This does not explicitly regulate incitement (words that have a likelihood of inciting imminent lawless activity), fighting words (words that tend to cause an immediate breach of the peace), true threats of violence, or obscenity (sexually explicit material under the 3-part Miller test; not seen here). Although gang-related speech may tend to incite violent activity and may tend to cause a breach of the peace, a broad regulation prohibiting any gang-related expressive conduct does not qualify as a regulation of a category of unprotected speech, and D could not defend against P's claims on that ground.

Type of Forum: SCHOOL

Additionally, there is an issue raised by the fact that this is a public high school regulating speech within its walls. As SCOTUS held in Tinker, public students do not shed their First Amendment freedoms at the schoolhouse gate. Thus, the fact that this speech took place while at school does not give the school district plenary authority to regulate it; it can only regulate speech at school if there is a substantial and material likelihood that the speech will cause disruption to class. Although there is a likelihood that gang-related conduct/speech could cause disturbances at school, there are zero facts to suggest that P's small, peaceful dove tattoo caused a substantial/material disruption to the mission of the school. Thus, even though D was regulating her speech while at school, P can still challenge the constitutionality of that regulation under the 1st and 14th Amendments.

Conclusion

P can likely succeed on a First Amendment freedom of speech claim, either because this fails the test for regulating symbolic speech or because it fails the content-based strict scrutiny test.

Freedom of Association

The First Amendment also guarantees the freedom to associate with groups whom one chooses. Arguably, a regulation prohibiting gang-related speech would violate the freedom to be associated with that gang. P may potentially consider raising a challenge under this provision of the 1st Amendment as well, although she would likely be better served by challenging this on speech grounds since it would likely be difficult to convince a court that high school students should have the right to associate with gangs, which are often a source of violence/criminal activity in local communities.

Fourteenth Amendment Claims

Additionally, P may be able to argue that this regulation violates her constitutional rights under the 14th Amendment only.

Procedural Due Process

Under the 14th Amendment procedural Due Process Clause, no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of the law. This requires a showing that 1) there was a deprivation of a protected interest, 2) without due process protections (namely, notice and a hearing). When deciding what process is due, the court looks at the nature of the interest affected, the probable value of additional safeguards, and the burden on the government.

The court has recognized that students have a protected interest in public high school education; they cannot be denied the opportunity to attend school without some level of due process protections. Here, the decision to suspend P took place immediately and it does not appear the speech regulation allows for any opportunity of notice and a hearing. Notice and a hearing are generally viewed as the bare minimum for PDP, and here P was provided with neither. P can argue that a hearing would have been helpful because she would have been able to present evidence that shows her tattoo was a peaceful non-gang-related symbol, and that the burden on the school district to have a pre-suspension hearing would be relatively minimal (it would not be too difficult for D to hold a quick hearing in connection with each suspension rather than implementing it immediately). Thus, given that P was not provided with any sort of due process protections and was suspended immediately, she likely can show a PDP violation here.

She may be able to challenge this law on PDP grounds because she was suspended without any sort of due process protections (i.e., notice and a hearing).

Substantive Due Process

Under the 14th Amendment substantive Due Process Clause, the government shall not infringe on individual rights in an arbitrary or irrational manner. If the right is fundamental, strict scrutiny applies; if the right is not fundamental, it is subject to rational basis review. Here, D will argue that there is no fundamental right to attend public school, and thus suspending her from school did not violate her fundamental rights and this action should be viewed under the rational basis test. If the rational basis test is applied, the law will be upheld as long as it is rationally related to a legitimate government interest (here, preventing gang related symbols is rationally related to the interest in preventing gang violence at school; the law will likely be upheld).

On the contrary, P will argue this law infringes on her rights of speech/self-expression while at school, and the First Amendment rights are regarded as fundamental. She will argue that strict scrutiny should apply here, and as set forth above, this policy will fail strict scrutiny because it is not narrowly tailored/least restrictive alternative.

The court could potentially go either way, depending on whether it views this regulation as infringing on the right to go to school (not fundamental) or the right to free speech (fundamental). P would be best served by pursuing the First Amendment claims set forth above, but she could also potentially raise this substantive due process argument.

Equal Protection Clause

The EP clause protects from unconstitutional discrimination. If the law discriminates based on a suspect class or involves a fundamental right, strict scrutiny applies; if it's not a suspect class, rational basis review applies.

Here, P may argue this law violates EP because it discriminates against students wearing gang-related symbols and students who do not. However, people who belong to gangs are not a protected class, so the law will be subject to RBR (will be struck down; see above). The arguments re whether it involves a fundamental right will be the same as they were for SDP (see above).

The Equal Protection Clause is not the best argument for P to advance. She would be better served by focusing on the First Amendment and procedural due process issues.

D's Arguments in Support of Motion to Dismiss as Moot

D has moved to dismiss P's action as moot. An action is moot when a live controversy under Article III no longer exists. Here, D will argue that this case is moot and there is no more controversy because: 1) P is no longer a student being harmed by the regulation; and 2) the district has redefined "gang-related activities" to be consistent with the criminal code (implying that under this new definition, P would not have been punished).

1. P No Longer HS Student

D argues the case is moot because P is no longer a high school student and thus no longer subject to D's policy. However, P will argue that this falls under an exception to the mootness doctrine: cases capable of repetition yet evading review. The key example of this exception is pregnancy: claims involving pregnancy often evade review because the length of time is short, but because one can get pregnant again, they are capable of review.

P will argue that such cases will keep arising as more and more students are subjected to this policy (i.e., her type of claim is capable of repetition), and yet because high school only lasts four years and the process of litigation a case often also takes years, it is often that these claims will evade review because students will graduate by the time the claim gets through the court system. D will argue this should not apply because the length of time (4 years) is far longer than something like a pregnancy (9 months), so it is not truly going to evade review (although it unfortunately does for this specific plaintiff, given that she sued so late into her career). Moreover, D will argue that it is not capable of repetition because P will not go to high school again.

On balance, the court will probably side with P and not dismiss it as moot because the claim is capable of repetition (more students will be subjected to the policy in the future and thus will have claims), but evading review (students will graduate before claim is finished because high school only lasts 4 years).

2. Redefined "Gang-Related" Activities

Another exception to the mootness doctrine arises when the defendant voluntarily ceases the offending activity--the case will not be deemed moot simply because the offender has ceased the activity, given that they could always do it again and that would render the case no longer moot.

Here, P will argue that D's voluntary redefining of the term in the policy does not render her action moot because D's voluntary choice to change the policy could always be overturned (it's not as though the state's legislature changed the law; a school district policy can be changed far easier). Here, P will argue that D's voluntary choice to change the policy does not make her case moot because D could always choose to change the policy back, and thus everyone would be right back in the same situation. A declaratory relief action can help clarify the constitutionality of this policy and will prevent future cases if the district decides to simply change the policy back. Thus, on balance, a court will likely find that P's action is not moot on this ground, because D could always re-define the policy in a manner that is overly broad/unconstitutional.

QUESTION 2: SELECTED ANSWER B

I. ARGUMENTS THAT PALOMA CAN MAKE IN SUPPORT OF HER FIRST AND FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT CLAIMS

Sovereign immunity

Paloma is suing the public school district for declaratory relief challenging the validity of the district's gang-related clothing rule. Under the Eleventh Amendment, a state cannot be sued in state or federal court by a citizen unless certain circumstances exist. A citizen may sue for declarative relief or sue a local government or municipality.

Here, Paloma seems to be seeking a declaratory judgment holding that the District's rule is unconstitutional, thereby abolishing the rule. This type of declaratory judgment does not fall within sovereign immunity protection. Furthermore, Paloma is suing a school district, which likely qualifies as part of a local government or municipality, which can be sued under the Eleventh Amendment. Thus, there is no Eleventh Amendment bar to Paloma's suit.

State action

Only a unit or instrument of government can be sued for violating the Constitution, because private parties not subject to state action cannot violate the Constitution. Here, the District is an instrumentality of the state, seeing as it’s a public school, and can be sued for unconstitutional actions. Thus, Paloma may sue the District for constitutional violations.

Standing

An individual only has standing to sue when there is an injury in fact, causation, and redressability. Here, Paloma has suffered an injury by being suspended from school for violating the District's policy, the injury was caused by the District enacting and enforcing its policy, and the injury is redressable if a court awards declaratory relief to Paloma because she may be able to get damages based on the District's action or ensure that the rule is not enforced for future students. Thus, Paloma has standing to sue.

Ripeness and Mootness

As will be analyzed further below, the issue of the constitutionality of the District's policy is ripe because Paloma suffered an injury from it and the policy is still in effect. The issue is not moot because it will be a continuing harm that can be redressed for future students and for Paloma's incurred injury, even though Paloma is no longer a high school student. Thus, the requirements of ripeness and mootness are satisfied.

1. FIRST AMENDMENT CLAIMS

The First Amendment prohibits the government from limiting an individual's freedom of expression in most cases. There are a variety of First Amendment grounds upon which Paloma could challenge the District's policy. If a court finds that Paloma succeeds on any of these grounds, then the District's policy constitutes an unconstitutional violation of the First Amendment.

Symbolic Speech

Symbolic speech, such as freedom of expression when doing an action (i.e., flag burning) is protected by the First Amendment. The speech at issue in this case is Paloma's dove tattoo, which isn't written or spoken speech, but qualifies as symbolic speech because it is her "self-expression" as a peaceful person. The government (here, the District as a public school) may only regulate symbolic speech if the regulation is narrowly tailored, related to a significant government interest, and not primarily concerned with the suppression of symbolic speech.

Narrowly tailored

A regulation is narrowly tailored when it is not too restrictive and targets the conduct at issue.

The District's policy prohibits all students from wearing any "label, insignia, words, colors, etc... that reflect gang-related activities." This is very broadly tailored to basically encompass all forms of bodily expression, including clothing and tattoos, that bear any relation to a gang. The District could have narrowly tailored this policy by providing specific restrictions, such as prohibiting an exact bird gang sign or finding the actual signs used by the Westsiders and Eastsiders and banning the use of those signs. Instead, the District enacted a broad rule that covers almost everything on a student's body, and which can be related to "gangs" in general, not even mentioning the Westsiders and Eastsiders. Additionally, the restriction provides a broad and harsh punishment that is not narrowly tailored to fit any violation of the restriction.

Related to a significant government interest

In addition to being narrowly tailored, the restriction on symbolic speech must be related to a significant government interest. Here, the District has a significant interest in reducing gang violence in schools. The District has consulted with local law enforcement to determine that the most violence results from gang confrontations between the Westsiders and Eastsiders. The District, in overseeing public schools, has a significant interest in fostering a safe learning environment without violence so that students can learn peacefully and be shielded from the gangs and violence beyond the school. Thus, the District has a significant government interest in reducing gang violence and this interest is related to the District's policy prohibiting students from wearing labels that reflect gang-related activities.

Suppression of symbolic speech

To be valid, a restriction on symbolic speech must not be primarily enacted to suppress that speech or have that effect. Here, the District will argue that its purpose in enacting the policy is to suppress gang violence and reduce the violence in the District's high schools, not ban students from having dove tattoos and engaging in self-expression of their peacefulness. However, Paloma will argue that the District's failure to narrowly tailor its policy effectively results in the suppression of symbolic speech, as any symbolic speech that bears a relation to gang-activity in general will constitute a violation of the District's policy and open the student to a harsh punishment.

Thus, the lack of narrow tailoring in the District's policy leads to an unjustifiable suppression of symbolic speech, even though the policy is related to a significant government interest. Thus, the District's policy is unconstitutional as a suppression of symbolic speech.

Time, Place, or Manner Restriction

If the court does not accept Paloma's argument that the District's policy unconstitutionally suppresses symbolic speech, Paloma can argue that the policy is an unconstitutional time, place, or manner restriction. These restrictions apply to the government's limitation of speech in traditional public forums or designated public forums and enable the government to place restrictions on the time, place, or manner of speech so long as the restriction is content-neutral.

A content-neutral restriction does not regulate the content of speech, and to be valid as a time, place, or manner restriction, it must be narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest and leave alternative avenues of communication available. A content-based restriction is subject to strict scrutiny and must be necessary for a compelling governmental interest and narrowly tailored to that interest.

Paloma may try to argue that her high school is a traditional public forum whereby students can engage in free speech. A court may not accept this characterization, but if it does, then Paloma can argue that the District's policy is an invalid time, place, or manner restriction that regulates students' speech during the time they are at school.

Content-based

A content-based regulation prohibits some speech on the basis of its content and is subject to strict scrutiny. Here, Paloma will argue that the District's policy is a content-based one because it prohibits expression related to gang activities, so it regulates the content of gangs.

Under strict scrutiny, the regulation must be necessary for a compelling governmental interest and narrowly tailored to that interest. The burden is on the District (the governmental unit) to prove these elements. The District will argue that it has a compelling governmental interest in reducing gang violence in high schools, for reasons of student safety and school functioning outlined above. The District will argue that the regulation is narrowly tailored because it only regulates expression related to gang activities, and only while the student is in school. The District will argue that gang signs are changing and numerous, and the District or law enforcement officers may not have all the information on what constitutes a gang sign, so it is necessary to restrict students from having anything that might be related to gang activities in order to discourage students from aligning with their gangs in school or breaking out in fights upon seeing the sign of a rival gang and disrupting school operations and student safety. The District will thus argue that its policy is necessary due to the problem of gang violence in its high schools and the difficulty of nailing down who exactly is a gang member and what constitutes a gang sign, and thus that its policy passes strict scrutiny.

However, as analyzed above, Paloma will argue that the policy is not narrowly tailored because it prohibits basically any expression related to a gang activity without defining these terms and comes with a harsh punishment. Even if the policy is necessary for a compelling governmental interest, Paloma has a good argument that it is not narrowly tailored, and thus the regulation will likely fail strict scrutiny.

Content-neutral

The elements of being narrowly tailored to a significant governmental interest have already been analyzed above under the symbolic speech analysis. The additional element here is that there are alternative avenues of communication available. The District will argue that its policy only applies in schools, and that students are free to wear gang insignia outside of school so there are alternative avenues of communication. However, Paloma will argue that the District is requiring students to remove things like tattoos, which are not temporary and cannot be banned in school while existing outside of school. Even though the District gave Paloma the option of covering up her tattoo, it confines her to only being able to show the tattoo outside of school which may be impossible if she has strict family that will not let her show the tattoo. Additionally, students often spend much of their day in school and there are not many alternative avenues of communication outside of school for students who go to school and then return home.

Thus, even if classified as a content-neutral time, place, and manner restriction, the District's policy will likely fail, primarily because it is not narrowly tailored.

The government has more freedom to restrict speech in nonpublic forums, such as prison. In these forums, a restriction on speech is valid so long as it is viewpoint neutral and related to a significant government interest. The District will argue that a school is a nonpublic forum and should be subject to this analysis, instead of being classified as a traditional or designated public forum and subject to strict scrutiny or the time, place, and manner analysis.

If a court accepts the District's classification of a school as a nonpublic forum, then the restriction is valid if viewpoint-neutral and related to a significant governmental interest. The significant governmental interest has been analyzed above in the suppression of symbolic speech point. The District may argue that the policy is viewpoint-neutral because even though it bans content-based speech on the subject of gangs, it does not take a viewpoint stance on gangs. Rather, the language of expression that reflects "gang-related activities" can cover viewpoints that are supportive of gangs, as well as viewpoints that are opposed to gangs, as long as the viewpoint is related to gangs.

Thus, the District likely has the best chance of convincing the court that its policy is constitutional if it argues that a public high school is a nonpublic forum and subject to that analysis.

Vagueness

A restriction on speech is unconstitutional if it is too vague. The District's policy that "no student shall wear any label, insignia, words, colors, signs... that reflect gang-related activities" is likely much too vague and unconstitutional for vagueness. This is because the policy basically prohibits any form of clothing, tattoo, paint, or anything that a student can wear, possibly extending even to backpacks and items that touch a student --essentially any item, so there is no limitation or definition on what constitutes a banned item. Furthermore, the term "gang-related activities" is much too broad and not defined at all. As analyzed above, this term encompasses both viewpoints supportive and dismissive of gangs, and can encompass any gang, not just the Westsiders or Eastsiders. It could conceivably encompass a fictional gang, a gang in another city that causes no harm in the District's schools, or symbols that have a non-gang meaning and possibly a gang meaning, such as Paloma's tattoo. The lack of definition makes the policy too vague and almost absurd because it has no limit, essentially.

Thus, the policy is very likely to be void for vagueness.

Overbreadth

A restriction on speech is unconstitutional if it is overbroad and encompasses too much protected speech. As analyzed above, the District's policy is not narrowly tailored, to the point of being overbroad because it encompasses too many items, and "gang-related activities" is not defined to the point where it can be broadly interpreted to encompass symbolic speech such as Paloma's tattoo. Thus, the District's policy is likely to be void for overbreadth.

2. FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT CLAIMS

The Fourteenth Amendment applies to the states and contains the Equal Protection Clause as well as the Due Process Clause.

Equal Protection Clause

Under the Equal Protection Clause, all individuals must be treated equally without discrimination. A restriction is subject to strict scrutiny if it discriminates on the basis of a suspect class such as race or national origin, subject to intermediate scrutiny if it involves gender or legitimacy, and subject to rational basis review for everything else.

Here, Paloma will likely argue that the District's policy violates the Equal Protection Clause because it discriminates on the basis of gang members or those who may be gang members. Gang members are not a suspect class, so the policy would be subject to rational basis review under which the challenger must show that the policy is not rationally related to a legitimate governmental interest. As analyzed above, the District has a legitimate interest in reducing gang violence in its high schools.

Paloma will argue that there is no rational relationship between the District's policy prohibiting gang-related symbolic expression and the District's interest in reducing gang violence. However, this argument will likely fail because it is conceivable and likely that the District's prohibition on gang-related symbolic expression will make it harder for gang members to identify each other at school and get into disputes, so there is a rational relationship here. Thus, Paloma's Equal Protection Clause challenge will likely fail because the policy satisfies rational basis review.

Due Process Clause

Under the Due Process Clause, a person may not be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process. This clause comes from the Fifth Amendment but is applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. Paloma will argue that her procedural due process and substantive due process rights have been violated by the District's policy.

Procedural due process

Procedural due process guarantees protective procedures such as notice and hearing when an individual is deprived of life, liberty, or property.

Life, liberty, property interest

Paloma will argue that she has a liberty interest in wearing what she wants at school, or a property interest in her body such that the school cannot make her cover up her tattoo or remove it. Paloma can further argue that she has a liberty interest in going to school and cannot be immediately suspended or expelled without an opportunity for notice and hearing. Here, Paloma was immediately suspended for ten days when she refused to cover up or remove her tattoo. A court will likely find that Paloma's liberty and/or property interest was implicated here.

Notice and hearing

A court weighs many factors in deciding what process is due. The main issue is Paloma's suspension, seemingly without notice or a hearing. It is unclear when the District enacted the policy or how much notice Paloma had, especially considering she had her dove tattoo for years without issue. More facts are needed here, but if the District did not broadcast its policy and adequately inform students, then it is likely that Paloma did not have notice. Furthermore, due to the vagueness and overbreadth of the policy, it's likely that, even if Paloma knew about it, she did not know that it could apply to her dove tattoo due to the lack of definitions or examples in the policy.

Thus, Paloma likely lacked notice of the policy and was likely entitled to a hearing of whether she should have been suspended, especially considering she was not a gang member and she lost out on the last few days of her high school experience.

Substantive due process

Substantive due process applies when the government prohibition at issue impacts an individual's fundamental right, such as the right to travel, vote, or have privacy. Here, Paloma will argue that her right to privacy was intruded on when the District tried to make her cover up or remove her tattoo.

Right to privacy

An individual has a right to privacy, including a right to what they wear on their body. This is a fundamental right that is subject to strict scrutiny. If the court finds that Paloma had a valid privacy right in her tattoo and her choice of how to display it, then the District has to pass the strict scrutiny standard. This standard is the same for purposes of due process and the Equal Protection Clause, so the strict scrutiny analysis above will apply to Paloma's right of privacy. Even if the court finds that Paloma doesn't have a right to privacy here, and that any right is only subject to rational basis review, that analysis has also been done above and will apply here.

Conclusion

Paloma can make all the above arguments in support of her First and Fourteenth Amendment claims, but her strongest argument is that the policy is unconstitutional due to vagueness and overbreadth.

II. WILL EITHER OR BOTH OF DISTRICT'S ARGUMENTS IN SUPPORT OF ITS MOTION TO DISMISS PALOMA'S LAWSUIT BE SUCCESSFUL

The District can dismiss Paloma's lawsuit in the first instance if it can show that Paloma does not have standing to bring the suit. A lack of standing will cause the court to dismiss the lawsuit. The District will argue that Paloma's lawsuit is moot, meaning that the injury has passed and there is no current or continuing harm to sue on.

1. Mootness--Paloma is no longer a high school student

A claim is moot if the injury has passed and is not capable of repetition. But, as in abortion standing cases, mootness will not bar a suit when the injury is one that eludes judicial review because it passes before a court has time to hear and decide the issue. The District will argue that Paloma's injury has passed because it occurred when she was in high school and she is now in college, so the lawsuit is now moot because Paloma will never again be subject to the District's policy for high school students.

However, Paloma can argue that when the harm occurred in high school, she was not able to sue for some reason, or that the harm is one that will likely repeat itself for future high school students in the District. Paloma can likely successfully argue that the brevity of her high school experience (this injury occurred during the last days of senior year) is similar to the abortion-standing in that the harm eluded judicial review, but is capable of repetition. Paloma will likely prevail on this point given that the District's policy still exists.

2. Mootness--District has redefined "gang-related activities" in a manner consistent with State X's criminal code

A court may still hear a case even if the offending party has stopped its criminal conduct or reformed its conduct. This is because there is no guarantee that the criminal or otherwise prohibited conduct will not continue because the offending party may merely be pretending to conform to avoid judicial review or has the discretion to repeat the offensive conduct in the future in the absence of an injunction or a judicial determination that the conduct is unconstitutional.

Here, the District may not argue mootness merely because it has redefined "gang-related activities" to be consistent with State X's criminal code. First, there is no guarantee that the District will adhere to this definition or not change the definition in the future, thus repeating the harm that Paloma is suing upon. Second, it is unclear whether its redefinition is constitutional because it may not be enough to redefine the term in accordance with a criminal code that itself may be unconstitutional. Third, the redefinition of gang-related activities does not solve the other parts of the policy that may be unconstitutional, namely the vagueness and overbreadth in what items of clothing/tattoos/etc. are covered under the policy, and the harshness of the immediate suspension or expulsion without any procedural protections in place.

Thus, both of the District's mootness arguments will likely fail, and the case will proceed.

QUESTION 3

Clint hired Linda, a lawyer, to represent him in a personal injury lawsuit against Dan, the driver of the car that collided with Clint's car, thereby causing him serious bodily injury. Clint could not afford to pay Linda, so Linda told Clint not to worry about paying anything until there is a recovery in the case. Linda told Clint that if a recovery is obtained, Linda would take 50% as her attorney fee and Clint will get the other half, less any costs Linda incurred. Clint orally agreed to this fee arrangement.

Dan's insurance company, Acme Insurance (Acme), emailed Linda before Linda completed any substantive work on the case, and offered to settle the matter for $100,000. Linda was thrilled and replied to the email that she accepted the settlement offer. Linda then told Clint about the settlement. Clint was relieved that the case settled so quickly.

Acme delivered a check for $100,000 payable to Linda, who deposited it into her law firm's business account. Linda then wrote a check from that account to Clint for $50,000, minus her costs, and mailed it to him. Upon receipt of the check, Clint complained about Linda's fee and threatened to sue Linda for malpractice and report her to the State Bar. Linda offered to return $10,000 of the fee in exchange for an agreement releasing Linda from all liability associated with the representation. Clint accepted and executed the release.

What ethical violations, if any, has Linda committed? Discuss.

Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

QUESTION 3: SELECTED ANSWER A

Formation of Client Relationship

Formation

A lawyer-client relationship is formed when the client reasonably believes that the relationship has been formed. Here, Clint (C) asked Linda (L) to represent him, and L agreed. At this point, C would reasonably believe that L was his lawyer so a lawyer-client relationship had been formed.

Duty of Competence

A lawyer should not accept representation of a client unless they are competent to perform the duties or can reasonably become competent through preparation. Here, there is no evidence that L has experience doing anything to do with personal injury law. If she did not have personal injury experience, then she either needed to ensure that she could adequately represent C through adequate preparation, or associate with a competent lawyer with C's permission, or decline the representation. Because there is not enough information to determine if L was competent to accept representation, there is no clear violation here.

Conflicts of interest

A lawyer also must ensure that they have no conflicts of interest that would prevent them from providing competent and diligent representation to the client before accepting or continuing representation. This could be due to personal conflicts or current, former, or prospective client conflicts. Here, there is no evidence of conflicts of interest, so there is no violation.

Working with an indigent client

A lawyer may waive fees for an indigent client and may advance reasonable expenses for litigation. If the client is in fact indigent, then the client does not need to pay the lawyer back. If the client is not indigent, then there must be arrangements for the client to repay the lawyer for the advanced costs. Here, it states that C cannot afford to pay L so there is some indication that he may be indigent. Therefore, L could ethically advance only the legal costs and is not obligated to force C to repay her for those if he is in fact indigent. Otherwise, C must repay her.

Contingency Fee Agreement

A lawyer is permitted to work for a contingency fee in most cases. The exceptions are when there is defense of a defendant in a criminal case or when the lawyer is working on a divorce or divorce settlement case and the contingency fee is based on obtaining a divorce or the amount of settlement. Here this is not the case, so L is able to agree to a contingency fee.

Writing Requirement

Under both the ABA and CA rules, all contingency fee agreement must be in writing.

For the ABA, the agreement must be: (1) signed by the client; (2) include the allocation of expenses; and (3) outline the scope of the representation. Under CA, the agreement must: (1) be signed by both the client and the lawyer and a copy must be given to the client; (2) include allocation of expenses; and (3) outline the scope of performance.

Here, L did not comply with the ABA or CA requirements. This is a contingency fee arrangement because it is based on a percentage of the outcome of the case. However, it is not in writing, it is not signed by anyone, and C never got a copy. C and L merely agreed orally to the arrangement. L did state that it would be "less any costs," but this was not an exact definition of what costs C should be expected to pay and what costs L will pay as is required. It also did not dictate when this would be paid, nor did it state the scope of their relationship.

Therefore, L violated her ethical duties through making this oral agreement with C for a contingency agreement.

Fee must be reasonable / not unconscionable

Any time a lawyer represents a client, the fee must be reasonable (ABA) and not unconscionable (CA). Under the ABA, the reasonableness of the fee is determined by the complexity of the case, the preclusion of other employment, the expertise and reputation of the lawyer, the actual outcome achieved, structure of the fee (fixed v. contingent), and community standards for these kinds of cases.

Characteristics of the case

Here, this is a very easy case of a personal injury suit negotiating with an insurance company. L did not have to give up any other employment as she ended up doing no real work on the case. She also was likely not expecting to give up substantial work as this is a one-off personal injury case, so it was unlikely to lead to wide reaching conflicts of interest. While this case may have taken some work, it was not likely to dominate her entire practice and preclude her from taking on other jobs. This kind of case requires some expertise, but not extensive as it seems like it is a standard accident personal injury negligence case and there is also no information on L's reputation in the field.

L's Actual Work, Fee structure, and Community Standards

Her actual outcome was good for C as it was a fast and efficient resolution getting him a large settlement, but that was not actually due to anything that she did, but rather her just accepting a settlement so this does not deserve such a large fee. This is a contingent fee agreement, which does inherently come with more risk for the lawyer. Therefore, in general, it is reasonable for the fee on contingency to end up being higher than a fixed fee as the lawyer takes on more risk when structuring the agreement this way. However, it is not justifiable to have a fee that is grossly disproportionate to the amount of work done. Contingency fees also must still be reasonable on community standards. There is no information about the kind of fee normally charged, but, in general, contingency fees tend to be 20-30% of the settlement, not 50% plus fees. Here, L is getting $50,000 plus costs for doing no substantive work at all on the case other than accepting an unauthorized agreement for settlement. This fee is grossly disproportionate to the services that she rendered to the client and would imply an outrageous hourly rate of about $100,000, assuming she even did 30 minutes of work total on the case. Therefore, this fee seems unreasonable.

CA's Unconscionably also looks to the negotiation process

Under CA, most of the above elements are also considered. CA does not expressly look at the community standard for fees, but they do take into account the complexity, time/skill, reputation of lawyer, structure of the fee, and preclusion of other employment when considering the fee. In addition, they add several more requirements to these by looking at the time when the agreement was made. This includes elements such as if the lawyer committed fraud or misrepresentation in making the agreement, the relative sophistication between lawyer and client and the existence of a preexisting relationship. Here, this fee was also likely unconscionable. L had a duty to memorialize this agreement in writing and get C to sign it, but she did not. Instead, she spoke it orally when C was likely desperate for a lawyer. Therefore, the instance of negotiating this fee was unethical on L's part. Additionally, there is likely a large discrepancy in the sophistication of the parties because C was a potentially indigent client who could not pay. He is seeking a lawyer because of a personal injury suit, not a business relationship, which indicates that he may have no prior experience with the law. Therefore, there is a substantial power imbalance here that makes the negotiation and agreement to the fee unconscionable as well as the rest of the factors described above.

Therefore, the fee is unconscionable as well and L violated both her duties under ABA and CA.

C has option to void, and L would get reasonable fee

Because the writing requirement for a contingency fee was not met, C would have the option to void the contingency fee contract. In this instance L would get a reasonable fee, which would be substantially less than $50,000.

Agreement to settle

Duty to communicate settlement offers

A lawyer has a duty under the ABA to communicate all settlement offers. Under CA, the lawyer in a civil case has a duty to communicate all written settlement offers and all oral significant settlement offers. Here, this is a written settlement offer being made by Acme (A) to settle the claim. This means that under both ABA and CA, L had a duty to communicate this settlement offer to C. She failed to communicate this offer to him prior to accepting the deal. This was a violation of her ethical obligations under both ABA and CA.

Client's decision to accept settlement offers

The clients and lawyers have different spheres within the representation. The lawyer has control to make decisions regarding the strategy of the case, but the client has complete authority to make all decisions that are substantively related to the rights under the case, such as acceptance of settlement offers, plea deals, or demand for a jury trial. Here, it was only within C's power to accept the settlement offer. L was not permitted to accept the settlement offer without express authority from C. If C had given her express authority to accept any settlement above $90,000, then L's acceptance would have not been unethical, but here there was no such agreement beforehand. Therefore, L violated her ethical duties by accepting this agreement.

L may argue that C was happy with the settlement and was not harmed by this. However, a client need not be harmed for an ethical violation to occur. Therefore, L has still violated her ethical duties and should still be punished accordingly.

Duty of Competence

A lawyer has a duty of competence to their client, which means that the lawyer must act with the required knowledge, skill, thoroughness, and preparation of a reasonable lawyer to provide services to the client. Under CA, the rule is that a lawyer must not intentionally, recklessly, with gross negligence or repeatedly fail to provide competent representation to a client. The standard of competence for CA is similar, requiring knowledge and skill as well as the appropriate physical and emotional state to serve the client.

Here, L likely breached her duty of competence to her client. She failed to take any investigation or preparation to uncover if the $100,000 settlement offer was in fact in the best interest of her client. She took no action to understand similar claims, what her client's claim may be worth if they went to trial, or what the chances of success on the merits would have been. By accepting the settlement offer without making any effort to properly investigate the claim or the potential alternatives that C would have if he did not accept it, L breached her duty of competence.

Duty of Diligence

A lawyer has a duty of diligence to their client, which means that the lawyer must act with the reasonable promptness to provide services, managing their workload to ensure that they can see the matter through to the end. Under CA, the rule is that a lawyer must not intentionally, recklessly, with gross negligence or repeatedly fail to provide diligent representation to a client. Here, L could have also been said to have violated her duty of diligence by quickly accepting the settlement offer and cutting short the chance to fully explore all the options. However, she did respond quickly and take prompt action, which is also required under the duty of diligence. Therefore, this violation is less clear.

Duty of Loyalty

The lawyer also owes a duty of loyalty to act in the best interest of their client. A lawyer need not press for every possible advantage for the client, but they must reasonably act to serve the best interest of their client and not act in a self-serving manner that undermines the best interest of the client.

Here, L violated her duty of loyalty by accepting the settlement offer without making reasonable investigations into the true value of the claim. L was acting in her own best interest when she did this because she was going to make $50,000 for doing no work. However, she clearly did not adequately consider the client's best interest as she had completed no substantive work yet on the case. Therefore, it was not possible for her to reasonably know if accepting the settlement offer would be in C's best interest. As a result, it was a violation of the duty of loyalty to accept this settlement (regardless of the issues with lack of client consent) without proper investigation.

Receiving settlement check

Client Trust Account and Commingling Client Funds

When a lawyer receives client funds, they must keep that money in a separate client trust account. A lawyer is strictly prohibited from commingling the client funds with the lawyer's personal assets or firm's assets.

Here, L violated her duty to keep the client funds separate. She took the $100,000 check that was given to her from A as the settlement and deposited the check into her law firm's business account. This meant that she commingled C's settlement with the rest of the firm's assets. This is strictly prohibited and is a violation of both ABA and CA rules.

Disputed amount

L then sent C the amount that she believed that he was entitled to under their agreement by mailing him a check for $50,000 less fees. L was right to promptly deliver the client their funds from a settlement. A lawyer has a duty to hold client property and promptly distribute all client settlements to the client once the settlement is complete. Therefore, this action itself was not a violation.

However, once there became a dispute with the funds L was obligated to continue to hold the rest of the fee, or any disputed amount if not all the amount is disputed, in the client trust account until the matter was resolved. Here, L never had a client trust account which was a violation, as explained above. Now that there is a dispute, it continues to be a violation as L is required to hold all disputed funds in the client trust account. Only funds that she has a clear legal and undisputed right to can be deposited into her own account. Here, she deposited the funds in her own account prematurely and this is a violation.

Settling claims of malpractice

A lawyer under CA rules is strictly prohibited from making agreements to prospectively limit their malpractice liability. Under the ABA, a lawyer is permitted to do this only if the client is represented by independent counsel when they make this release. Here, under both rules, L would have violated as C was not represented by counsel.

Here, L is negotiating after C has threatened her to sue for malpractice. Therefore, this should be analyzed as a settlement offer for malpractice rather than a prospective release.

Written Release and Representation by independent counsel

Here, when negotiating settlements of malpractice liability, the client should be advised and given an opportunity to seek external counsel. This makes the negotiation process substantially more fair and will allow the client the best chance to protect their own interest. Here, L never told C that he should seek independent counsel, nor did she give him an opportunity to do so.

L and C only negotiated orally on the release after C threatened to sue. L offered to return him $10,000 of the settlement that she had withheld in exchange for him not suing. While under contract law, this likely would be an enforceable contract. This is also unethical because this was purely an oral conversation in which C had no counsel. Additionally, C did have a reasonable claim and could have voided the entire agreement. This was an option that C was not aware of because he was not advised of his rights. Therefore, L violated her duty of loyalty to C in this situation as well by failing to provide him with an adequate warning and opportunity to seek counsel.

Fee Agreements

Under the California rules (CA), a written fee agreement is required if fees will likely exceed $1,000. It must be signed by the client and attorney, and the client must get a copy. It must explain the basis of the fee. Under the ABA Model Rules (MR), a writing is not always required except for contingency fees. Under both rules, cases on a contingency fee basis always require a writing. In CA and the MR, fees must be reasonable. Under CA rules, they must not be unconscionable.

Even if this were not a contingency fee case, the fact that the agreement was oral, not written, would violate the California rules. Were it not contingent, the lack of a written agreement would be acceptable under the MR, though that is not the case here.

Reasonable Fee

Fees must be reasonable, and this is evaluated on factors including the skill of the attorney, the time the matter will take, the matter's complexity, the amount to which the work will preclude other employment, and the standard fees generally charged in related matters and circumstances. In California, the prohibition on unconscionable fees also looks to the relative sophistication of the parties in negotiation.

50% of a client's recovery in a case is very high for a personal injury contingency fee. Contingency fees are generally around 30%, so this is significantly higher and could be viewed as unreasonable.

Clint is likely not a sophisticated negotiator regarding personal injury representation. There's no indication he has prior experience seeking legal services, nor that he works in a related field. This made him lack knowledge about negotiating the fee and could suggest procedural unconscionability. Clint also said he is unable to pay for a lawyer, so is in a disadvantageous financial position, giving him less power in negotiating a fee. Due to his inability to pay, he may think that he is unable to afford a lawyer at all, and this offer may seem generous to him, or at least, the only offer he is able to get.

The fact that C was surprised at how low his cut of the settlement amount was also indicates that he was not provided with information on how the fees and costs would be allocated--another ethical issue.

Contingency Fee Agreements

Under both the CA and MR, a contingency fee requires a written fee agreement. Under the MR, this requires a writing signed by the client indicating the basis of the fee and the extent to which the client will be responsible for costs at the end of the case. The CA rules are more stringent and require the agreement, again, to be signed by both the client and the attorney. They require noting the basis of calculation of the fee, the extent to which the client is responsible for costs in the outcomes of the case, and a statement that the fee is negotiable, if it is not a medical malpractice case.

When C told L he didn't have money for an attorney, L told C not to worry about payment and that instead she could provide legal services where she took 50% of the ultimate recovery. This is a contingency fee agreement and, under MR and CA rules, requires a writing signed by the client (MR and CA) and, in CA, also the attorney. There was no writing here, as C orally agreed to the terms.

There is no indication C knew the fee was negotiable, which would violate CA rules.

L told C she would take 50% as well as "any costs" she incurred. This is likely insufficient information to meet the requirements that the agreement specify his responsibility for costs. It doesn't indicate what types of costs that could include, and whether and to what extent he would be responsible for them in the case that he did not prevail. This would likely violate CA and MR rules.

CA also requires an explanation of how fees are calculated. L would say that noting the 50% split is sufficiently specific. However, this doesn't make any explanation of costs of litigation, which may be insufficient. She merely told him to "not worry about it," which is vague, providing no basis or explanation.

Advancing Costs of Litigation to Clients

An attorney may not give money to clients, however under CA and MR, an attorney may advance litigation costs so long as the client must repay those at the end of litigation.

L did not pay C but did front litigation costs as under their agreement she would pay for any costs and then recoup them from the ultimate recovery amount at the end of the case. This was permissible.

Scope of Employment

In an attorney-client relationship, the client has control over setting the goals of the case, while the attorney can make strategic decisions. The client controls aspects of the representation such as whether to waive a jury trial, testify in a criminal case, or accept settlement offers among others.

D's insurance company emailed L with a settlement offer for $100,000. L accepted it without D's consent. This violated her duty as that was D's choice, not L's.

L would argue that D was relieved when he heard of the settlement, so there was no issue, but that does not absolve her of her violation.

Communicating Settlement Offers

A lawyer has a duty to communicate with the client, keeping them reasonably apprised of the status of the case. In the model rules, the lawyer must communicate all settlement offers to a client. In CA, the lawyer must communicate all written offers as well as any oral offers that are a significant advancement in the case.

Dan's insurance company emailed Linda with a settlement offer. She did not communicate it to Dan before accepting it. This violated the CA and MR rules as it was both written and a significant advancement in the case.

L would argue that D didn't object to the settlement as he was "relieved" it settled so quickly. However, this doesn't cure her ethical violation. Dan did object later once he came to understand how little he would recover (again indicating the issue of fee reasonableness discussed above). Also, harm to the client is not required for an attorney to be in violation of ethical duties.

Duty of Competence

Under MR and CA rules, a lawyer has a duty of competence and must have the requisite skill, knowledge, training, and preparation to represent the client. In CA, an attorney may not repeatedly, recklessly, or grossly negligently fail to provide competent representation. If a lawyer is not competent in an area, they may accept representation if they are able to educate themselves on the matter enough to become competent in a timely manner, seek assistance from another attorney who is competent in the area, or in an emergency.

Here, L didn't set an appropriate fee agreement, which arguably shows a lack of knowledge regarding how to proceed in a personal injury case on a contingency fee basis. She also accepted a settlement offer without asking for C's permission, also arguably demonstrating a lack of competence as a client advocate.

There is no indication whether L has experience in personal injury cases, or whether this was an area she was unfamiliar with. Her overall conduct indicates lack of competence which may suggest this wasn't her usual area of practice; if so, she should have not taken the case, done additional preparation, or retained co-counsel to assist. This situation was also not an emergency.

L didn't do any substantive work on the case before accepting a settlement offer, also indicating lack of preparation and skill in negotiating and advocating for a client. L likely violated her duty of competence.

Duty of Diligence

Per the MR and CA rules, a lawyer has a duty represent the client diligently, including keeping the client reasonably apprised of updates in the case, pursuing a matter to completion, meeting all filing deadlines, and managing workload.

L had not done any substantive work on the case when she received and accepted the settlement offer. This is clearly a lack of diligence as she did no work on the case. Had she done work on it, she would have had the knowledge about the extent of his injuries, applicable law, and comparable amounts of recovery at trial or by settlement in comparable cases. As it stands, she has seemingly no basis for determining whether this was a reasonable settlement offer in the circumstances (this overlaps with the competence issue). It also violates this duty in that she did not keep her client updated on a serious development in the case.

As noted above, the duty of diligence also includes the duty to keep clients reasonably updated on their case. Here, L only informed him after she accepted the offer. Based on C's surprise at how little he received, it seems that her explanation of the situation to him did not in fact provide him with a reasonable amount of information, suggesting failure to adequately communicate regarding substantive information as well as timing.

Client Trust Account

An attorney may not mingle their assets and a client's assets under the CA and MR. A lawyer must keep all a client's money in a separate client trust account. An attorney may only move money out of the trust account into their account once they have earned the fees.

Here, A gave L a $100,000 check and she put it in her firm's business account. She did not put it in a client trust account. She mingled this with her assets. After depositing the money in her account, she then wrote a check to C for $50,000 minus costs.

She would argue that she paid C in a timely manner, but that is not sufficient to meet the requirements of either the MR or CA rules.

Disbursement of Disputed Fees

When there is a dispute about the fees owed to an attorney or payment due to a client, the attorney must immediately pay the client all money that is not disputed as theirs and maintain the rest in the trust account until the matter is settled.

D disputed that the amount L took as costs deducted from the check was not acceptable, complaining about it and threatening to sue her. At that point, L should have maintained the disputed amount of money in a trust account until the issue of fees was resolved. But she did not, as she had the money in her firm account and kept it there.

Settlement of Malpractice Claims

Under the CA and MR, an attorney may not settle a malpractice case with a client before advising the client to seek independent legal counsel and giving them an opportunity to do so.

C threatened to sue L for malpractice and report her to the State Bar. L offered him $10,000 to settle the malpractice allegation as well as all liability with the representation. L did not advise C to seek independent counsel, nor gave him the opportunity to do so. C accepted the money and executed the release without having the opportunity to seek counsel. L violated her ethical duties here.

QUESTION 4

The Articles of Incorporation for Corp Inc. (Corp) provide that it is a closely-held corporation formed for the purpose of manufacturing televisions. Corp has been highly profitable in this business for twenty years. The Articles also provide that, for the purpose of electing directors, each shareholder shall have one vote per share that they own multiplied by the number of open director positions, i.e., cumulative voting.

Aliyah and Bowen each owned sufficient shares to elect, through cumulative voting, one of the three directors of Corp. Aliyah and Bowen entered into a signed written agreement stating that they will vote to elect themselves to the board of Corp and agree on the election of any successor board members and, if they cannot agree on a particular successor, will abstain from voting in that election. They also agreed that, once they became directors, they would select Palmer as the new president of Corp. The agreement stipulated that it is binding on all subsequent owners of the shares. Aliyah and Bowen stamped "Subject to Agreement" on the backs of all of their share certificates.

Aliyah and Bowen were subsequently elected to Corp's board of directors, along with Chantal. At the next board meeting, Aliyah and Bowen voted to select Palmer as the new president of Corp, Chantal abstained, and Palmer was named as president.

Palmer immediately instituted several costly changes intended to shift Corp solely into the manufacturing of bicycles. Palmer reasoned that, by the time the directors heard anything about the changes, Corp would be so profitable that no one would complain.

Bowen discovered almost immediately what Palmer had done. Bowen then informed Daya of all of these facts, sold his shares to her, and resigned from the board.

Esgar, a shareholder of Corp since its inception, wishes to seek legal relief regarding Palmer's actions and Corp's change to solely manufacturing bicycles.

1. Is the agreement between Aliyah and Bowen valid? Discuss.

2. Is Daya bound by Aliyah and Bowen's voting agreement with respect to the election of successor directors? Discuss.

QUESTION CONTINUES ON THE NEXT PAGE

3. On what theory or theories, if any, might Esgar bring an action to enjoin Corp from moving solely into manufacturing bicycles, and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

4. On what theory or theories, if any, might Esgar bring an action for damages against Palmer related to Corp moving solely into manufacturing bicycles, and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

QUESTION 4: SELECTED ANSWER A

1. Is the agreement between A and B valid?

Type of Entity

The first issue is what type of business entity is at issue. A de jure corporation is one that has been properly formed through the filing of articles with the secretary of state. Here, the facts indicate that Corp Inc. is a closely held corporation. Thus, it will be presumed that Corp Inc. (C) was properly formed and is a valid de jure corporation. Because it is a corporation, C has distinct legal personhood and the capacity to sue, or B sued. Additionally, its shareholders will enjoy limited liability.

A and B's Role in the Company

The next issue is the role that A and B play in the company. A corporation is generally managed by a board of directors, but financially owned by shareholders (who enjoy limited liability). Here, the facts indicate that A and B each own shares in Corp, thus they will be considered shareholders. It is unlikely that they will be controlling shareholders, given that each was only capable of electing one director to the board through cumulative voting (had they been controlling shareholders, they likely could have elected more individuals to the board than one each). Thus, A and B are shareholders of Corp Inc., and, as shareholders, they also have the power to vote in the corporation's annual election of the board of directors. Corp adheres to cumulative voting, so A and B, as shareholders, are permitted to pool their votes behind one candidate in the hopes of electing someone to the board (as they did here).

Moreover, A and B were subsequently elected as directors, and thus also serve as directors of Corp in addition to being shareholders. This may potentially expose them to liability (see more discussion below). However, the agreement they entered into was done so prior to them becoming directors, thus this agreement will be viewed as an agreement between shareholders, not directors.

Validity of Agreement to Vote Together as Shareholders

The issue is whether A and B's agreement is valid. The agreement contains two key provisions: 1) A and B agreed to elect themselves to the board and to agree on the election of successor board members (and if they could not agree, they would abstain from voting); and 2) A and B agreed that once they became directors, they would select P as the new president of Corp. Moreover, the agreement indicated that it would be binding on subsequent owners of their shares (and they indicated as such on the actual share certificates). Here, each of the two provisions will be addressed separately.

The first provision provides for how A and B will vote as shareholders. A shareholder voting agreement, known as a "voting pool," is permissible, as long as it is in a signed written agreement clearly setting forth the terms. Here, A and B will argue that they entered into a valid shareholders agreement when they agreed to elect themselves to the board of directors. Shareholders are permitted to enter into contracts agreeing on how to vote at director elections and, here, A and B entered into a signed written agreement doing just that. Thus, the provision of the shareholder agreement which provides that A and B will vote to elect themselves to the board of directors will likely be upheld as valid.

However, it is less clear whether this voting agreement would be binding on successor shareholders (this will be discussed further below).

Validity of Agreement to Select P as President

The next issue is whether the second major provision of the shareholder agreement, providing that they will elect P as president, can be upheld. Although shareholders are permitted to enter voting agreements, they are not permitted to enter into agreements that will control how they will vote and act in their capacity as directors. This is because directors are required to exercise their independent business judgment and have a duty to look out for the best interests of the corporation, thus we don't want them to be constrained by prior voting agreements (if they have contracted to elect P, but P is a bad option, we want the directors to make the best decision for the company, not feel bound by a prior K). Here, A and B have entered into an agreement providing that they will select P as president of Corp once they become directors. This part of the agreement must be struck down as invalid because shareholders cannot limit their discretion as directors through agreements such as this. The court will likely find that this agreement was designed to control their actions as directors and it will be struck down as invalid.

Some courts have recognized a limited exception to this rule in the context of a close corporation, where all of the shareholders enter into the agreement (if all the shareholders are on board with an agreement as to how to elect the directors, that may be permissible). The concern behind this rule is that courts don't want controlling shareholders who can elect directors entering into agreements that will harm the minority shareholders; thus, if all the shareholders enter the agreement, this concern is eliminated. Here, A and B may argue this exception should apply. However, this argument will fail, because even though C is a closely held corporation, this agreement was only entered into by A and B, not by all of the shareholders.

Thus, the provision of the agreement providing that they will elect P as president once they are made directors will be struck down as invalid.

Conclusion

The provision of the agreement governing how A and B will vote as shareholders at director elections will be upheld as valid. The provision governing how A and B will vote for P once they become directors will be struck down as invalid.

2. Is D bound by A and B's voting agreement with respect to the election of successor directors?

The facts indicate that B, unhappy with P's actions, sold his shares to D and resigned from the board. As discussed above, the voting agreement between A and B provided that it would be binding on subsequent owners of the shares. As already demonstrated, the voting agreement between A and B was likely valid given that shareholders are permitted to enter agreements governing how they will vote at director elections. Thus, the issue becomes whether this agreement binds D.

In order to form a voting agreement that is binding on subsequent shareholders, some jurisdictions may require that the parties enter into a "voting trust" that is filed with the secretary of state. Here, it does not appear that A and B have done so, so this agreement will likely not be found to apply to subsequent shareholders if the jurisdiction follows such a rule.

However, they will argue that the agreement should still be binding on D under general contract/equitable principles because D, the subsequent purchaser of B's shares, had valid notice of the agreement given that B informed D of "all of the facts" and the shares had "subject to agreement" stamped on the back. A and B will argue that D had notice of their agreement and of their intent to make the agreement binding on subsequent purchasers, and as such, D should be estopped from arguing she is not bound by the agreement. A court may go either way, but the more likely result is that since D was on notice of the agreement and bought the shares "subject to" the agreement, D too will be bound by the agreement's terms.

3. E's Action to Enjoin Corp from Manufacturing Bicycles

E seeks to file an action against C in the hopes of enjoining C from changing from a corporation that manufactures televisions into a corporation that manufactures bicycles. In order to do so, E should bring a derivative lawsuit on behalf of the corporation to enjoin it from engaging in ultra vires actions.

E's Status in the Corporation

The facts indicate that E has been a shareholder of Corp since its inception. Thus, E is a shareholder of Corp and has standing to bring either a direct action to vindicate his own rights or potentially a derivative action on behalf of the corporation to protect the corporation's rights. A shareholder can only bring a direct action to challenge specific harms to them, such as being denied a distributed dividend or if a tort is committed against them by the corporation.

Derivative Shareholder Lawsuit

A shareholder of a corporation may bring a derivative lawsuit on behalf of the corporation against its own directors/officers, where the shareholder believes those directors/officers are not protecting the rights and interests of the corporation. In order to do so, the shareholder must: 1) have been a shareholder at the time of the wrong and continue as a shareholder throughout the time of the suit; 2) adequately represent the interests of the shareholders; and 3) make a demand on the board, unless such demand would be futile.

Here, the facts indicate that E has been a shareholder since Corp's inception, and there are no facts suggesting he is no longer a shareholder; thus the first requirement is met. There are also no facts to indicate that E does not represent the interests of the other shareholders; this requirement is likely met. Finally, there are no facts to suggest that E has already made a demand on the board. If E does not do so, E may be prohibited from bringing suit. However, E can argue that demand here would be futile--the board contains three members, A, B, and Chantal, and two of those three members elected the president whose actions E is challenging. E can argue that A and B are interested directors because they made the decision to hire P, and thus 2 / 3 of the board members would be biased in favor of not bringing a lawsuit (because it could potentially open them up to liability, as the ones who voted to have P as president). Demand would likely be futile on these facts.

Thus, it appears that E can bring a derivative lawsuit, assuming that E either makes adequate demand or demonstrates demand is futile.

Ultra Vires Action

Through the derivative lawsuit, E will challenge P's decision to move Corp solely into the business of manufacturing bicycles as an ultra vires action that is not permitted by Corp's Articles of Incorporation. When a corporation registers with the secretary of state, they will file Articles of Incorporation. The AOI will state a purpose for the corporation. In modern times, most AOI state a very broad purpose for the corporation such that almost any legitimate commercial activity is permissible. However, even today, there are still corporations with a limited, enumerated purpose in the AOI. If the corporation's controlling officers/board take an action contrary to the stated purpose, shareholders can bring a derivative action to prevent the action as an improper "ultra vires" action.

Here, C has an AOI with a stated purpose: manufacturing televisions. Moreover, C has been highly profitable in this business for years, and there are no facts to suggest that C has ever engaged in any activity other than manufacturing televisions. Thus, E will argue that C's purpose as a corporation is limited to manufacturing televisions. However, once P became president, P instituted numerous costly changes that shifted C into the business of manufacturing bicycles--E will argue this is an ultra vires prohibited act that is contrary to Corps stated purpose in the AOI. E can point out that televisions and bicycles are vastly different products that are manufactured differently, sold in different markets, and serve different purposes. E will argue that shifting C's purpose from making TVs to bikes constituted a fundamental corporate change that required amending of the AOI, and yet there was no valid amendment of the AOI. To amend the AOI, there must be a special meeting of shareholders called to vote on whether to amend the AOI. Here, there was no such special meeting; P simply made the unilateral decision to change the purpose of the corporation that has been operating for years. This was an ultra vires action without approval.

Accordingly, E can likely establish that manufacturing bicycles is an improper ultra vires action that Corp should not be permitted to undertake.

Direct Action

E can also potentially bring a direct action on the grounds that his shareholder rights were violated because he was not permitted to vote on a fundamental corporate change, i.e., the amendment of the Articles of Incorporation. E will argue that P's actions were an attempt to unilaterally amend the AOI without calling a special shareholder voting meeting and, as such, E's rights as a shareholder were violated by Corp and E may be permitted to sue directly on these grounds.

Right to an injunction

In order to obtain a permanent injunction the moving party must show success on the merits, inadequate remedy at law, irreparable harm, the balance of hardships/equities tips in their favor, and public interest does not disfavor the injunction. E can likely establish these elements given that Corp engaged in a wrongful ultra vires action that will likely cause imminent harm to the shareholders' interest in the form of lost profits.

Conclusion

E can likely bring a derivative lawsuit to enjoin Corp from changing to bicycle manufacturing because this is an ultra vires action and there was no special shareholder meeting called to amend the AOI.

4. E's Action for Damages Against P

E also seeks to bring an action against P directly for damages in connection with the ultra vires action. As a preliminary matter, E would once again need to bring a derivative action on behalf of the corporation itself, not a direct action (see above; analysis would be the same--E can probably bring a derivative lawsuit). E will bring a shareholder's derivative action against P in his capacity as a corporate officer and allege that he breached the duty of care.

Liability as an Officer

Officers are generally viewed as agents of the corporation (an agent is one who agrees to work for the principal's benefit subject to the principal's control). P, as president of Corp, is thus considered an officer and an agent of Corp. As an agent, P owes the corporation a duty of care and a duty of loyalty.

Breach of Duty of Care

Here, E will argue that P's decision to move Corp solely into bicycle manufacturing constitutes a breach of the duty of care. Corporate officers/agents are required to act as reasonably prudent persons, and their goal must be to serve the best interests of the corporation. Here, E will argue that P breached his duty of care by unilaterally implementing costly changes that entirely changed the direction of Corp's business. E will argue that Corp has been operating for twenty years in the TV manufacturing industry, and they have been highly profitable. Thus, E will argue it was unreasonable for P to cast aside twenty years of effort and goodwill in the hopes of pursuing a new line of business. E will argue that P also acted unreasonably by making these changes without going through the proper channels and acting unilaterally behind the directors backs--E will argue that shareholders have a right to vote on such fundamental decisions or, at the very least, P should have ran such a serious decision by the board of directors (had he done so, it is clear that B likely would have disagreed and voted against such a change given that B resigned from the board immediately upon finding out P's actions).

E will likely successfully be able to show that P failed to act as a reasonably prudent person when P made the unilateral decision to entirely change Corp's business and engage in an ultra vires action without ever seeking the consent of the board or the shareholders.

Business Judgment Rule

P will argue his actions were protected by the business judgment rule.

The business judgment rule provides that corporate officers and directors are not liable for mistaken business judgments that were made in good faith. This creates a rebuttable presumption that the director/officer (here, P) was acting in good faith in the best interests of the corporation. This can only be overcome by a showing of bad faith, fraud, illegality, or the failure to be reasonably informed.

P will argue he was acting in good faith and is thus protected by the BJR, because his reasoning behind the decision was to increase Corp's profits. He was not acting out of self-interest, but rather he was trying to maximize Corp's profits by entering a new market (his hope is it would be so profitable that no one would complain). He will argue that the costly changes he implemented were in a good faith attempt to expand C's business and maximize shareholder profit and is thus protected by the BJR.

Here, however, E can likely overcome the business judgment rule for two reasons: 1) there are no facts to suggest that P did any research or investigation into whether this would be a good decision for the company, so it was highly likely that P was not reasonably informed (overcomes the BJR); and 2) P appears to be acting in bad faith/slightly fraudulently because he made all of the changes unilaterally without telling the directors, in the hopes that they would not find out until it was too late and C was already making money from the bikes. The fact that P intentionally concealed his plans for the company's new direction suggests he was acting in bad faith (and potentially even fraudulently since he failed to disclose that he was making material, fundamental changes to the business).

Conclusion

E can derivatively sue P for breaching his duty of care owed to Corp as an officer by unreasonably and unilaterally engaging in ultra vires acts, and E can most likely overcome the business judgment rule presumption.

QUESTION 4: SELECTED ANSWER B

1. Valid Shareholder Agreement

Shareholders have the power to vote directors into office. Additionally, shareholders are able to vote for fundamental changes such as mergers, dissolutions, amendments to articles, and sale of substantially all assets. Additionally, shareholders are able to enter into voting agreements with each other. Voting agreements are contracts between shareholders to vote in a specific way. Voting agreements must be signed and must pertain to matters in which shareholders have the power to vote on. Here, Aliyah ("A") and Bowen ("B") entered into a written agreement stating that they will vote to elect themselves to the board of Corp and agree on the election of any successor board members, and if they cannot agree on a particular successor board member, they will abstain from voting. This agreement is enforceable because it is written and both A and B have the power to elect directors because of their status as shareholders. The fact that the voting is cumulative does not impact A and B's ability to enter into a voting agreement.

However, their agreement to vote for Palmer once they became directors will not be enforceable. Board members do not have the ability to enter into voting agreements with each other. Board members are charged with exercising a duty of care to act as a reasonable director under the circumstances, which means being informed on matters and having a good faith and honest belief that their actions are in the best interest of the corporation. A voting agreement among directors runs counter to a director's duty to act with care and reasonableness. Therefore, this provision of the voting agreement is unenforceable.

2. Is Daya Bound?

Voting agreements can be binding on successors if the successor has notice of the agreement (i.e., there is some notice on the actual stock certificate). Here, A and B stamped the certificates with "subject to agreement" on all of their stock certificates so Daya ("D") would be on notice of the shareholder agreement between A and B. Thus, she is probably bound to the enforceable terms of the voting agreement (see above). Daya could argue that she is not bound because B violated federal securities laws by selling his shares to her. A corporate insider runs the risk of violating Rule 10b5 when they trade on the basis of material, non-public information without first disclosing the information to the person they are trading with. Here, B did disclose all of the material facts to D. Thus, he likely didn't violate federal securities laws and Daya will probably be bound.

3. Enjoining Corp

To be valid, corporations must have a suitable purpose (as well as filing Articles of Incorporation with the secretary of state). Generally, a corporation's purpose is stated as "any lawful purpose." That is sufficient to fulfill this requirement. However, when a corporation is formed for a specific purpose, such as for the purpose of manufacturing televisions, that purpose must be strictly adhered to. If not, the director or officer has committed an ultra vires act. Remedies available for ultra vires act include an injunction if brought by a shareholder, damages for breach of duty if brought by the corporation, or dissolution if brought forth by the state and there is evidence of unlawful actions or other wrongdoing. Here, Corp was incorporated for the specific purpose of manufacturing televisions. Corp has adhered to this purpose for twenty years. Palmer's attempt to shift the corporation into the bicycle manufacturing industry diverges from the specific purpose of manufacturing televisions that is stated in the Articles of Incorporation. This is an ultra vires act. As such, Esgar is a shareholder and can sue to enjoin Palmer's actions. Additionally, Palmer can be civilly liable to the corporation for damages caused by a breach of duty if he has committed one. The facts do not suggest that there was unlawful activity, so the state is unlikely to seek dissolution.

Palmer will argue that he had authority to take the actions he did. An agent can bind a principal if there is an agency relationship in which both parties have consented that agent is to act for the benefit of principal and principal asserts control over agent. For an officer (i.e., agent) to be able to bind a corporation (i.e., principal), there must be either actual or apparent authority to act. Actual authority can be express or implied. Express authority derives from the express agency agreement between the two parties. Implied authority is present when the agent has a reasonable belief that they have the power to take the action in question based on the principal's conduct (i.e., past dealings, necessity, emergency, etc.). Here, the facts do not state whether Palmer had actual authority to shift corporate operations into another industry. Normally, the president of a corporation has implied authority, if not actual authority, to enter into business transactions with other entities. However, because Corp has a limited purpose to manufacture televisions, it is unlikely that Palmer had a reasonable belief that he could move Corp into the bicycle manufacturing business. In fact, he reasoned that no one would care once his actions proved to be profitable. As such, Palmer probably did not have a reasonable belief based on Corp's conduct that he had the implied authority to take the course of action he did. Absent express authority, which is unlikely given the specific purpose of Corp, he probably will not have a justification for his actions.

Palmer could also argue that he has apparent authority to act. Apparent authority is present when a third party reasonably believes that an agent has the authority to take a certain action based on the principal's conduct. Here, apparent authority is unlikely because Corp has a specific purpose, so any third party that dealt with Palmer could not have a reasonable belief that Palmer had authority to enter into the bicycle manufacturing business. Thus, Palmer likely did not have apparent authority either.

Furthermore, he will be liable for the transactions because he acted without actual authority.

Palmer could argue that Corp has ratified his actions, and therefore, Esgar is not able to enjoin Palmer's actions. A board of directors can ratify a transaction if they expressly accept it by way of a board resolution, or if they accept the benefits of the transaction. Here, the facts do not state that the board has made any board resolution or otherwise accepted the benefits of Palmer's actions. Thus, the board of directors likely did not ratify Palmer's actions.

4. Damages Against Palmer

Derivative Suit

Shareholders can bring actions directly when their rights as shareholders have been infringed. Additionally, a shareholder may bring forth a derivative suit on behalf of the corporation when the corporation is harmed because of an action taken by a director or officer. To be able to bring forth a derivative suit, a shareholder must have standing, must be able to adequately represent the corporation's interests, must be a shareholder through the duration of the litigation, and must file a demand on the corporation's board of directors to take action. A shareholder must wait ninety days after making demand on the board to take action before filing a suit. In some states, the demand requirement is not required if making such a demand would be futile or if irreparable harm will result. A shareholder has standing to sue if they owed stock in the corporation when the transaction or conduct occurred. Here, Esgar has standing to sue because he has been a shareholder since its inception. Furthermore, nothing in the facts suggests that he won't be able to adequately represent Corp's interests.

The facts do not state that Esgar has made a demand on the Board to take action against Palmer for his acts. However, Esgar can argue that waiting 90 days until the Board decides whether it will take action or not can lead to irreparable harm to him as a shareholder. If a court accepts this argument, Esgar will be able to successfully bring forth a derivate suit against Palmer so long as he remains a Corp shareholder throughout the litigation.

Note that, in the event that Corp wins the suit, Esgar will not be entitled to any damages. Damages will be awarded to Corp. However, Esgar will be able to have his legal fees paid for.

QUESTION 5

Hari and Wanda were married to each other for 20 years, being domiciled in State X (a non-community property state) for the first 15 years, and thereafter, until Hari's death, being domiciled in California for 5 years.

At Hari's death in 2020, two documents were submitted for probate:

1. A formal will signed by Hari and Witness One on June 1, 2018 and signed by Witness Two on June 3, 2018. Both witnesses were disinterested. This document left all of Hari's community property to Wanda, but did not mention any separate or quasi-community property.

2. An undated pre-printed will form that had printing at the top, declaring that it was intended to be a will. On the form Hari had written, in his own handwriting, "All of my separate property and 25% of my community property goes to my son, Samir." Hari signed the will form, but no witnesses signed it, and there was no date on the form.

Hari had full mental capacity throughout his life.

At his death, Hari's property consisted of:

A. Separate property worth $100,000;

B. Community property – Hari's half being worth $50,000;

C. California land worth $100,000, which Hari had bought with his earnings while he and Wanda were still living in State X. In 2017, without Wanda's written consent, Hari gave this land to himself and his daughter, Deepa, as joint tenants on her birthday.

What rights, if any, do Wanda, Samir and Deepa have in Hari's estate? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

QUESTION 5: SELECTED ANSWER A

What rights, if any, do Wanda, Samir, and Deepa have in Hari's Estate?

Wanda will have a right to all of Hari's community property, as well as a one-half interest in the California land. Samir will have a right to all of the separate property, worth $100,000. And lastly, Deepa will have a one-half interest in the California land.

Hari's Death in 2020

At his death, Hari left behind a formal will and a holographic will. The validity of each will be discussed in turn.

Will Witnessing Requirements

To be a valid will in California, certain formal witnessing requirements must be met. There must be: (1) a signature by the testator or someone else at the testator's direction; (2) in front of, or previously signed and then acknowledged in front of; (3) two disinterested witnesses; (4) who sign in the testator's lifetime; and (5) who understand that the document that they are signing is a will.

Here, Hari's will seems to comply with nearly all the formal statutory requirements, but there may be some doubt as to the complete adherence to formality because of the witnesses' signatures. It appears that one witness signed on June 1, 2018, and the other on June 3, 2018. These signatures are within Hari's lifetime because he died in 2020. However, there is no requirement that the witnesses sign at the same time, and no facts indicate the witnesses did not witness actual signing or acknowledgement at the same time. If the reason for these two dates is that Hari did not either sign his will in front of them at the same time or acknowledge the signature in front of them at the same time, then the will may fail the formal witnessing requirements.

Substantial Compliance Doctrine

In an event where the formalities of witnessing requirements are not perfectly met, the proponent of the will may still be able to have the will properly probated if they are able to show substantial compliance with the witnessing requirements and that the testator intended the document to be their will.

Here, if there is some doubt raised as to the witnesses' signatures, the proponent of the will should be able to show intent by Hari that this document be his will, in part because of how closely he followed the strict requirements.

Thus, this will is valid despite any perceived inadequacies in the witnessing requirements; it is valid and Wanda has interest in the will.

Holographic Wills

A holographic will is a handwritten will and it does not necessarily need to follow the same formal requirements as a typed will. A holographic will is valid if it contains: (1) a signature by the testator (in whatever marks the testator intended to be a signature); (2) in the testator's own handwriting; (3) and the will contains the material provisions. Material provisions are the beneficiaries and the gifts to be distributed. A date on a holographic will is very helpful to understanding the disposition of property but is by no means necessary to finding a valid will.

Here, the undated pre-printed will form is signed by Hari and written in his own handwriting, which satisfies the first few requirements. Additionally, the will names the beneficiaries "my son, Samir" and the gifts to be bequeathed, "All of my separate property and 25% of my community property," which successfully handles the material provisions requirement. Samir will likely be the proponent of this will, as he would want to obtain the property, and he will have a successful claim to the estate.

However, Samir will run into problems with the gift of community property because it is inconsistent with the other will from 2018. Unless he can prove that the holographic will came after the formal will and revoked the community property clause, he will be unable to assert rights to that part of the estate.

Revocation

A will or its clauses may be revoked physically, expressly, or impliedly. Physical revocation may be some physical act, such as tearing, crossing out, obliteration, destruction, or burning. Express revocation occurs where a subsequent will specifically disavows a previous will. Implied revocation occurs where a subsequent will contains clauses or gifts which are inconsistent with the previous will, such that they cannot both exist at the same time. In these cases, the latter will controls.

Here, the formal will leaves all community property to Wanda, but the holographic will leaves 25% of the community property to Samir. Because the holographic will has no date, the courts will probably not consider it to be the "second will," and will probably consider the dated will's disposition of the conflicted property as being superior. As such, the terms of the formal will were probably not "revoked".

Thus, the courts will likely distribute the community property solely to Wanda.

Conclusion as to Samir

In conclusion, Samir will have a right to all of Hari's separate property at the time of his death, in the amount of $100,000.

Capacity

A testator must have proper mental capacity when making their will. This means they must: (1) be over 18; (2) be of sound mind; (3) understand the nature of their assets and the extent of their bounty (those who could possibly receive under the will); and (4) understand that they are creating a will.

Here, the facts state that Hari had full mental capacity throughout his life, so his disposition of property would be tough to challenge. The fact that he left inconsistent terms in his wills does not sufficiently demonstrate a failure to understand the nature and extent of his assets, and so a challenge to capacity.

Thus, capacity is likely a non-issue.

California Community Property

California is a community property state. This means that all property obtained during the marriage is presumptively community property. All property obtained before and after the marriage is separate property. Community property includes wages of a spouse, in addition to the fruits of a spouse's efforts and labor. Furthermore, title alone nor change in nature of the property will not determine the characteristic of the asset. Where the asset is unclear, courts will "trace" the funds used to purchase a property to determine whether it is community property or not. Quasi-community property is any property obtained in a non-community property state, which would be community property had it been obtained in California.

California community property laws take effect at either death or divorce.

Here, Hari and Wanda lived in State X, a non-community property state, for 15 years, and then eventually in California for 5 years whereupon Hari died. Because Hari died in California, certain property will be administered under California community property laws. Hari purchased California land worth $100,000 with the earnings he made in State X. It appears that Hari had purchased this land and put title in his name alone, using funds that he earned solely on his own, which is a valid disposition of separate property in State X. However, because he retained his interest until death and he died in California, the land will become quasi-community property.

Thus, the land is quasi-community property at Hari's death.

Gifts During the Marriage

Where one spouse wishes to gift community property to someone outside the marriage, the spouse must obtain the written consent of the other spouse to make such a gift. Failure to obtain consent gives rise to the non-gifting spouse to demand reimbursement to the community, or to refuse the gift altogether.

Here, Hari gifted a one-half interest in California land to his daughter, which was quasi-community property at his death, but at the time of the gift it was separate property. Because the funds can be traced back to his separate property earnings in State X, and he had neither died nor divorced in 2017, the property was still separate property.

Thus, Hari did not need Wanda's consent to make the gift to Deepa.

A joint tenancy with right of survivorship occurs where two or more tenants have simultaneous interest in: (1) time; (2) title; (3) interest; and (4) possession. When one joint tenant dies, the other receives the ownership interest that the other one had. This interest cannot be disposed of by will. There are four ways to sever a joint tenancy: inter vivos conveyance, contract, mortgage in a title theory jurisdiction, and agreement. Under the Strawman rule, a self-conveyance does not break joint tenancy, even though it is an inter vivos conveyance because it prevents the needless complication of someone transferring land to a third person and simply transferring it back to oneself.

Here, in 2017 Hari created a valid joint tenancy with right of survivorship with his daughter, which was within the time of the marital community (2000 to 2020). Although an inter vivos conveyance may sever a joint tenancy, it is doubtful that the self-conveyance would qualify as a severance due to the Strawman rule.

Under normal circumstances, at Hari's death the property interest would fully vest in Deepa as his survivor. However, because of the Clawback rule, this situation must be examined more closely.

Clawback Rule

Where quasi-community property owned by a deceased spouse and given away without paid-for consideration, but while retaining some ability to exercise ownership or control over the property (such as a trust or joint tenancy property ownership), the surviving spouse may "claw back" the property to their own possession as community property at the death of the spouse.

Here, Hari gave the half-ownership in the California land to Deepa as a gift for her birthday. Because he gave it to her as a gift, there was no paid-for consideration. Further, because he maintained a one-half ownership in the property, he maintained ownership and possession of the property until his eventual death in California. Once he dies, California community property rules apply, and Wanda will be able to reclaim his quasi-community property ownership in the property as her own because no consideration was paid in the conveyance.

Thus, Wanda owns a one-half interest in the California land as tenants in common with Deepa.

Conclusion as to Wanda

Thus, Wanda has an interest in all of Hari's half of the community property and a one-half interest in the California land worth $100,000 (her share $50,000).

Conclusion as to Deepa

Pretermitted Children

A child who is unintentionally left out of a will is nevertheless able to have rights in the will and inherit some of their parent's property. However, a pretermitted child will not be able to recover when: (1) the testator intentionally left the child out of the will; (2) the testator left a sizable estate to the child's parent; or (3) the child is provided for outside the will, such as with a trust.

Here, Deepa was not left anything under either will, and all of Hari's property has been disposed of, so she may challenge the will claiming she is pretermitted. This argument would likely fail as she was provided for outside the will in $50,000 worth of land, and her mother has received a sizable estate from Hari which could be used to provide for her. Also, as mentioned above, Hari had full mental capacity so he probably did not leave her off the will unintentionally.

Thus, Deepa is likely not a pretermitted child and has no interest in the estate.

QUESTION 5: SELECTED ANSWER B

How is community property treated in California?

California is a community property state in which there is a presumption that all of the property that is acquired during the marriage will be considered to be community property. Upon death, each spouse may only freely transfer or will away one-half of the community property. Separate property is all the property that was acquired either before marriage, after marriage, or as a result of earnings of separate property. A spouse has full disposition of this property upon his death.

Here, Hari has $50,000 worth of community property and the distribution is discussed below. Hari also has $100,000 of separate property, which is discussed in its disposition below.

Was there a valid will in 2018?

A valid will has the following requirements: (1) there must be a writing concerning the disposition of property upon death; (2) the writing must be signed by either the testator or by someone in the testator's presence and at their direction; (3) there must be at least two disinterested witnesses who were both present contemporaneously at the time that the testator signed the will, and they must then (4) both sign the will at some point during the testator's lifetime; and (5) they must understand when they are signing the will that the document that they are signing is the testator's will. A valid will does not have to dispose of all of a decedent's property, as any remaining parts of the property will go through intestacy. Additionally, even if there was not a valid witness requirement that was met, after 2009, as long as the proponent of the will can show by clear and convincing evidence that the testator intended the document to be his will at the time that he signed it, then the will is still able to be probated.

Here, there was likely a valid will from Hari that he made on June 1, 2018 because there was a writing concerning the disposition of his property that he signed on June 1, 2018, and the facts state that the witnesses both signed the will before Hari's death in 2020, and because the last signature was on June 3, 2018. Additionally, the facts state that Hari was competent at all times when he disposed of his property. Even though Samir might argue that there was nothing in the facts to indicate that both of the disinterested witnesses were contemporaneously present at the time that the will was actually signed by Hari, even if they were not both present, given that Hari was of full mental capacity through his life, the proponent (Hari's wife) would likely be able to show that Hari intended the document to be his will at the time that he signed it.

Thus, here, Hari had a valid will in 2018.

Was there a valid Holographic will?

California allows testators to use holographic wills as wills and as codicils; all that they require is that the material terms of the will must be in the testator's handwriting and that the will be signed by the testator in his own writing. The material terms are usually considered to be who is getting the property and what amount of the property they are getting. Holographic wills do not have to dispose of all of the decedent's property in that instrument and they do not have to be dated. However, if the holographic will is not dated and there is another will that conflicts with the undated holographic will, then the dated will is likely to prevail unless there can be clear and convincing evidence that the other will was made after.

Here, it is likely that Hari's undated will on the pre-printed will form would have been a valid will because Hari wrote the material terms of the will in his own handwriting, stating that all of his separate property was going to his son and that 25% of his community property would be going to his son as well. The holographic will was signed by Hari in his own writing. However, because the holographic will is undated there will be a problem with the conflicting terms in the holographic will and the 2018 will regarding who gets the community property because the 2018 will that is dated states that Wanda gets all of the community property.

Therefore, unless Samir can rebut the presumption and show clear and convincing evidence that the undated holographic will was created after the 2018 will, Samir will only take the separate property gift under the valid holographic will.

If the holographic will was shown by clear and convincing evidence to be made after the 2018 will then who would take the 25% of the community property?

A party may revoke their will by a subsequent will, codicil, or valid holographic will as long as they can show that they had an intent to revoke, and as long as they followed the proper will requirements. Then any subsequent will, codicil, or holographic will that is made that directly conflicts with a prior will takes effect over the prior inconsistent provision.

Here, in the (unlikely) event that Samir could prove by clear and convincing evidence that Hari made the holographic will after the 2018 will, then the subsequent holographic will would revoke the 25% gift of community property to the mother.

Who would get the Quasi-Community Property Real Property Upon Hari's Death?

What is Quasi-Community Property?

Quasi-community property is all property that was acquired while living in another state that would have been considered to be community property had the spouses been domiciled in the state of California at the time of the acquisition of the property. If a spouse has quasi-community property and then dies while domiciled in California, during the spouse's lifetime, the quasi-community property will be treated as separate property. However, upon dissolution it will be treated as community property and, upon death, all personal property will be treated as community property. All real property will be governed by the state in which the property resides.

Here, the house would have been treated as quasi-community property because the house was purchased by Hari with his earnings, which would be presumed to be community property as stated above. Not only did Hari purchase the property with his marital earnings, but he also purchased the property while married and living in State X. Because he purchased the property while married and living in another state, it would have been considered to be community property had they been living in California at the time of purchase, and thus the property would be considered to be quasi-community property at death, but separate property during his lifetime.

Was there an illusory transfer of the quasi-community property house during Hari's lifetime?

Generally, QCP is treated as separate property during a marriage, which means that the owning spouse is free to sell or manage the property how they would like. However, there is an exception if there is an illusory transfer. There will be an illusory transfer of quasi-community property if: (1) the decedent dies while domiciled in the state of California; (2) the spouse sold the property for less than its fair or reasonable value or gave it away; (3) did so without the other spouse's consent; and (4) the decedent spouse retained some control over the quasi-community property by “keeping their hooks in the property,” either by retaining some sort of right of reentry in the property, joint title in the property, or retaining some other usage. If there is an illusory transfer of quasi-community property, then the non-transferring spouse can demand back up to one-half of the QCP after the death of the decedent spouse. If there is a right of survivorship that is granted to another party, which gives joint title to both holders and then avoids probate altogether, courts usually consider this to be a means to retaining control over the property.

Here, Deepa is likely going to try and argue that she has a right to the real property in California because Hari granted himself and Deepa a right of survivorship on her birthday. Thus, Deepa would claim that the real property will pass over probate and go straight to her upon Hari's death. However, Wanda is likely to argue that Hari's transfer of the real property was an illusory transfer because: first, Hari died while domiciled in California; second, Hari gave the property away to Deepa as a gift and thus it was given away for less than substantial value; third, Wanda did not provide her consent or agreement to the transfer of the real property. Thus, Wanda would claim that, under the illusory transfer rules, she is entitled to one-half of the real property located in CA and thus should get $50,000 worth of the land. Given that the property was given away for free and without Wanda's consent, the court is likely to agree with Wanda that this was an illusory transfer.

Thus, there would be an illusory transfer and Wanda and Deepa would each get one-half of the cabin, both getting $50,000 and they will each own the property as tenants in common.

Who gets what share of the property?

In light of rules stated above, the following is the likely disposition of the property: (A) First, regarding the $100,000 of separate property, this will all go to Samir through the holographic will; (B) Second, regarding Hari's $50,000 of community property, this will all go to Wanda, unless it can be shown by clear and convincing evidence that the holographic will was made after the 2018 will; and (C) third, regarding the California property, one-half (or $50,000) worth will go to Wanda and one-half (or $50,000) worth will go to Deepa.

Q1 Criminal Law and Procedure

Jim and Fred armed themselves with handguns and drove to a store on Avon Street. They both went into the store, drew their guns, and demanded that Salma, an employee, give them the store's money. After Salma handed Jim the money, he nervously dropped his gun. The gun discharged when it hit the floor, and the bullet hit and killed Chris, a store customer. Salma then got a shotgun from under the counter and shot Fred, killing him. Jim picked up his gun, ran out of the store, and drove back to his apartment.

Later that evening, Jim saw Salma while walking down Park Street. Thinking that he could eliminate her as a witness, Jim shot at Salma with his gun, but the bullet missed her. Jim then drove away in his car.

A few minutes later, Police Officer Bakari saw Jim driving down the street. Officer Bakari, who had no knowledge of the events at the store or on Park Street, pulled Jim over because Jim looked nervous. When Jim got out of his car, Officer Bakari noticed a bulge under his shirt. Officer Bakari then patted Jim down and found Jim's gun. Officer Bakari arrested Jim for possession of a concealed firearm and seized the gun.

1. With what crime(s) could Jim reasonably be charged regarding the events at the store? Discuss.

2. With what crime(s) could Jim reasonably be charged regarding the incident on Park Street? Discuss.

3. Under the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution, can Jim successfully move to suppress Jim's gun from being introduced into evidence at trial? Discuss.

Answer A

1. Jim's crimes at the store

Conspiracy

A conspiracy is an agreement between two or more people to commit a crime. A conspiracy requires 1) an intent to enter into an agreement, 2) an intent to agree, and 3) an intent to carry out the target offense. Most modern jurisdiction also require an overt act which sets the conspiracy in motion. A conspiracy punishes the agreement. However, a conspirator will be liable for not only the target offense, but for all substantive crimes that are the natural and foreseeable consequences of the target offense (Pinkerton rule).

Here, Jim(J) will likely be found guilty of a conspiracy with Fred(F) to rob the store. 1) J and F "Armed themselves" with guns and drove to the store. This act of supplying a dangerous weapon, coupled with driving to the store is circumstantial evidence of J and F's intent to enter into an agreement to rob the store. Thus, they intended to enter into an agreement to commit a crime. 2) They both armed themselves and endeavored on this venture together. This further indicates that they intended to agree with one another to fulfill their intent. 3) Finally, the fact that they grabbed weapons and drove to the store evidences an intent to commit the underlying offense of robbery (there is no other logical reason for driving to s tore with likely illegal weapons other than for the purpose of committing some crime). Further, the act of driving to the store will amount to an overt act which set this conspiracy in motion.

Therefore, J will likely be charged with conspiracy and will be culpable not only for the underlying offense, but for all crimes which were the reasonable and foreseeable consequences of committing a robbery.

Assault

Assault is either 1) a failed battery (a non-consensual offensive touching), or 2) an intent to cause imminent apprehension in another of an imminent battery.

In this case, J will also likely be guilty of assault because by drawing his gun and pointing it at Salma (S) and demanding that she give him the money, he intended to put S is apprehension that if she did not comply, she might be shot (which would certainly amount to an offensive, non-consensual touching).

Therefore, J committed an assault.

Larceny

Larceny is the 1) trespassory (without consent), 2) taking, and 3) carrying away (the slightest movement is sufficient) of 4) the personal property or 5) another with 6) the intent to permanently deprive that person of their property.

Here, J also committed a larceny because 1) S did not give voluntary consent when she gave J the money (rather, she was under threat of possible death if she did not), therefore making it trespassory, 2) he took the money when S handed it to him, 3) J carried it away when he "ran out of the store," 4) the property was cash (and therefore personal property), which 5) belonged to the store, not Jim, and 6) J intended to permanently deprive the store of this money because he obtained it by force and ran away. Clearly, he had no intention of returning it.

Therefore, J committed a larceny.

Robbery

Robbery is essentially an assault plus larceny. It is the 1) taking of 2) the personal property 3) from a person's presence, 4) by force of threat of force, 5) with the intent to permanently deprive that person of their property.

Here, J committed an assault and a larceny and thus also committed a robbery. He 1) took 2) the cash 3) from S, who was in charge of safeguarding it, 4) by threat of force by drawing his handgun and making S believe that she may be shot if she did not comply, and 5) intended to permanently deprive the store of its property because he had no intention of returning it.

Therefore, J also committed a robbery.

Burglary

At common law, burglary was the 1) breaking and 2) entering of 3) the dwelling house 4) of another 5) in the nighttime 6) with the intent to commit a felony therein. However, many jurisdictions have eliminated the breaking and nighttime requirements and expanded "dwelling house" to include a multitude of enclosed structures.

Here, J and F did go into the store with the intent to commit a crime. However, there was no "breaking" because they went during store hours and thus had permission to be on the premises.

Thus, there was no burglary.

Murder (Chris)

Common Law Murder

At common law, murder was the killing of one human being by another human being with malice aforethought. The intent to kill--malice--can take several forms: 1) the intent to kill (express malice), 2) killing with reckless indifference to human life (depraved heart murder), 3) intent to cause great bodily injury (GBI), or 4) felony murder.

1. Express Malice

Express malice requires the intent to kill.

Here, J "nervously dropped his gun" and it accidentally discharged. Therefore, J did not intend to kill Chris.

2. Depraved Heart

Depraved heart murder is a killing with a reckless indifference to an unjustifiably high risk to human life.

Here, J did not kill Chris with indifference to a high risk to human life because he dropped his gun. He did not know the gun was discharge and it was completely accidental. Therefore, he probably cannot be convicted of depraved heart murder.

3. Intent to Cause GBI

Malice can be inferred from the intent to cause GBI.

Again, J accidentally dropped his gun and did not intent to harm Chris and thus did not intent to commit GBI. This type of malice thus does not apply.

4. Felony Murder

Under the felony murder doctrine, malice is implied from the intent to kill the underlying felony. However, many jurisdictions have adopted the Redline theory, which states that a co-felon cannot be guilty of felony murder for the killing of another co-felon during the commission of the felony by a third party.

Here, J intended to commit a robbery, as discussed above. In all jurisdictions, a robbery is a felony. Therefore, J can be found guilty of felony murder for any killing that occurs during the commission of the robbery. Chris was a store customer, not a co-felon, so the Redline theory would not bar J from being convicted.

Therefore, J can be found guilty of felony murder of Chris.

First Degree Murder

First degree murder is statutory in nature and most jurisdictions have held that it encompasses 1) premeditated and deliberate murder or 2) felony murder during certain inherently dangerous enumerated felonies (including burglary, rape, arson, robbery, and kidnapping).

1. Premeditation and deliberation

As stated above, the killing of Chris was accidental, so it was not premeditated or deliberate.

2. Felony Murder

Here, the killing occurred during the commission of a robbery--a first degree felony murder offense.

Therefore, J will likely be found guilty of first-degree murder.

Second Degree Murder

Second degree murder includes all murders not in the first degree.

Here, J will not be guilty of second-degree murder because he can be found guilty of first-degree murder.

Murder (Fred)

See rule above.

1. Express Malice

Here, S shot F. Therefore, J did not have intent to kill F.

2. Depraved Heart

Again, because S is the one show shot F, J would not have killed F with a depraved heart.

3. Intent to Cause GBI

J did not intent to cause F GBI because he is not the one who shot him.

4. Felony Murder

Here, the state will argue that J is guilty of felony murder to F because it was a killing during the commission of a felony. However, if this jurisdiction has adopted the Redline theory, then J cannot be found guilty of murder of F because a third party---S--killed a co-felon.

Therefore, assuming the jurisdiction has adopted the Redline theory, J will not be guilty of murder of F.

First Degree Murder

See rule above.

1. Premeditation and deliberation

This was not a premeditated or deliberate murder because J did not plan to kill F.

2. Felony Murder

This was a killing during the commission of an inherently dangerous felony. However, assuming this jurisdiction has adopted the Redline theory, J cannot be found guilty of murder of F.

Second Degree Murder

See rule above.

This is inapplicable because J did not intent to kill F.

2. Jim's crimes on Park Street

Attempted Murder (Salma)

Attempt is a specific intent crime which requires 1) the specific intent to commit the underlying offense and 2) a substantial step toward the commission of that offense (the substantial step element requires that the crime come dangerous close to commission).

Here, J will likely be found guilty of attempted murder of S because 1) he thought he could "eliminate her as a witness" and drew his gun at her, thereby evidencing his intent to kill S so that she could not testify against him. 2) There was a substantial step toward the crime because J actually "shot" and fired his gun at S.

Therefore, J will be guilty of attempted murder of S.

Assault

See rule above.

J will also be guilty of assault because he attempted to shoot S (which would be a harmful or offensive touching, i.e., a batter), but he missed her.

Therefore, this was a failed battery and thus an assault.

3. 4th Amendment Claim

4th Amendment

The 4th Amendment protects against unreasonable searches and seizures. A search without a warrant is per se unreasonable unless there is an exception to the warrant requirement.

Here, J was subject to a stop by the police when he was pulled over and this he was searched without a warrant. Therefore, this stop and seizure is per se unreasonable, and thus a violation of J's 4th Amendment rights, unless there is an exception.

Government Conduct

The 4th Amendment only protects individuals from governmental conduct--it does not govern purely private behavior.

Here, J was pulled over by a police officer--a government employee. Therefore, this element is met.

Search/Reasonable Expectation of Privacy

A search is a governmental intrusion into an area where a person has a subjective expectation of privacy that society is willing to regard as reasonable, or a search into a constitutionally protected area. In order to assert a reasonable expectation of privacy, and thus have standing to make a 4th Amendment claim, the person must have had an ownership or possessory interest in the place searched or item seized.

Here, J has standing to object to the search because he was pulled over in his car which he presumably owned, and thus had a reasonable expectation of privacy in his vehicle (although the courts have held that there is a diminished expectation of privacy in one's vehicle, there is nonetheless some expectation of privacy). Furthermore, J's person was searched during a pat-down and the police officer took an item of personal property from him.

Thus, J has standing.

Warrantless Search

As stated above, warrantless searches and seizures are per se unreasonable without a warrant expectation.

Here, the stop and seizure were without a warrant and is per se unreasonable unless there is an exception.

Vehicle Stops: Reasonable Suspicion

A police officer may pull over a vehicle if they have reasonable suspicion, supported by articulable facts, that criminal activity is afoot. Whether an officer has reasonable suspicion will be determined based on the totality of the circumstances, although the courts have held that it requires more than a mere hunch.

Here, the officer stopped J because he "looked nervous." The officer had no knowledge of any of the preceding events and thus no basis to believe that criminal activity was afoot. A person "looking nervous" is not enough for reasonable suspicion. There must be facts which support the officer's basis for concluding that some criminal activity is happening.

In this case, J's mere "nervousness" likely did not amount to reasonable suspicion such that the stop was unreasonable and thus a violation of J's 4th Amendment rights. However, assuming the stop was not unreasonable, the state must further prove that the officer had grounds to search J.

Warrant Exception: Terry Stop and Frisk

A stop and frisk, or Terry stop, permits an officer to stop a person whenever they have reasonable suspicion, based on articulable facts, that criminal activity is afoot. If the officer also believes that the person is armed and dangerous, then the officer can conduct a pat-down of their outer clothing in order to search for weapons.

Here, if the officer had reasonable suspicion for the stop, then the frisk was likely a permissible Terry frisk because the officer noticed a bulge under J's search. Based on his experience, the officer likely had justifiable grounds for believing that "bulge" could be a weapon, thereby supporting his basis for patting J down.

So long as the court finds that the stop was supported by reasonable suspicion, then the pat-down and seizure of the gun will also be permissible.

Exclusionary Rule/Fruit of the Poisonous Tree

The exclusionary rule is a judge-made doctrine that states that any evidence obtained in violation of a person's 4th, 5th, or 6th Amendment rights is inadmissible (subject to a few exceptions not applicable here). Under the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine, all secondary evidence obtained as a result of an unlawful search will also be excluded. Here, it is more than likely that the stop of J when the officer pulled him over was unreasonable because it was not supported by reasonable suspicion. Therefore, any evidence obtained as a result of the unlawful search, such as the gun, will also be inadmissible as fruit of the poisonous tree.

Conclusion

Because J was stopped in violation of his 4th Amendment rights, J can successfully move to suppress the gun from being introduced at trial.

Answer B

(I) Events at the Store

Jim could be charged with first- or second-degree murder depending on how a jurisdiction codifies those crimes. He can also be charged with robbery and conspiracy to commit robbery.

Robbery

J committed the crime of robbery. A robbery is the taking of property of another with force. Here, J took property of another, i.e., the cash of the store from the store whose property it was. J also used force to take that property. Specifically, he brandished his firearm, threatening the use of force if Salma the store employee did not comply. Thus, J committed the offense of robbery.

Murder

J committed the crime of murder. He could be found guilty of felony murder (which could be first- or second-degree murder depending on the jurisdiction) or involuntary manslaughter.

A. First degree murder is generally codified as one of two things (a) premeditated, calculated murder that occurs in a calm, dispassionate manner or (b) felony murder.

(a) Premeditated murder. Here, Jim (J) and Fred (F) armed themselves with handguns and drove to a store on Avon Street. They both went into the store with their guns drawn and demanded that the store employee Salma (S) give them money. It does not appear that J and F's intent was to murder anyone, nor did they premeditate committing a murder; rather, they were only interested in obtaining the money from the store. J only killed C when he nervously dropped his gun, and the gun fired a bullet. And F was killed only when S shot him. Thus, J cannot be convicted of first-degree premeditated murder as he did not premeditate either of those deaths.

(b) Felony murder. Some jurisdictions codify felony murders as first-degree murder. If the state where J and F committed this offense is one of those states, then J could be found guilty of first-degree murder. Felony murder is found when a murder occurs during the commission of certain violent felonies, including burglary, kidnapping, robbery, assault, and rape. This is because the commission of these felonies is dangerous on their own, and it is foreseeable that a death could occur in their commission. To find felony murder, it must be first established that one of these underlying crimes occurred. Here, as discussed above, J intended to commit a robbery and did do so. Thus, the deaths that occurred can be considered under the felony murder rule.

Here, two deaths occurred--those of C and F--which we will discuss in turn. First, as to C's death, C was killed when J nervously dropped his gun and when S was handing J the money he demanded. C's death was not really in furtherance of the commission of the crime--J was already getting the money handed to him and probably would have left after that. And J and F did not point the gun at C or ask C for his money or except C to hand them over the store's money. Nonetheless, it was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the robbery, given how J and F chose to commit the robbery. J and F both brandished firearms at S. Because they have it pointed at someone and clearly there is no safety on, it is reasonably foreseeable that they would use the firearms in the commission of the offense or even that a firearm may accidentally discharge, harming someone. Thus, J could be found guilty of C's death under the felony murder rule.

As to F's death, there are two theories as to whether J would be liable for it. Under the majority theory, a defendant is not liable of a co-conspirator's death by a third party (such as a victim of the offense, here S). This theory believes that F's death is not foreseeable, since a third party took independent action and caused the death. However, under the minority theory, such an action is foreseeable since the defendant was already involved in such a dangerous offense and any resulting death is foreseeable. Thus, under the minority theory, J would be held liable, but J would not be held liable under the majority view. Accordingly, depending on whether the jurisdiction follows the majority or minority rule, J could also be found liable for F's death.

B. Second degree murder is the codification of common law murder. Common law murder has four variations: (a) a malicious intent to murder another (b) a malicious intent to cause substantial bodily harm (c) a disregard for human life, and (d) murder while committing a dangerous offense (i.e., felony murder).

(a) malicious intent to murder another. It does not appear that J had any intent to murder C. J dropped his firearm and it accidentally discharged. The firearm was not even pointed towards C when he did have it brandished. Thus, J would not be found guilty of second-degree murder under this theory.

(b) malicious intent to cause substantial bodily harm. Again, it does not appear that J had any intent to murder C. J dropped his firearm and it accidentally discharged. The firearm was not even pointed towards C when he did have it brandished. Thus, J would not be found guilty of second-degree murder under this theory.

(c) disregard for human life. Again, it does not appear that J had any intent to murder C. J dropped his firearm and it accidentally discharged. The firearm was not even pointed towards C when he did have it brandished. Thus, J would not be found guilty of second-degree murder under this theory.

(d) felony murder. As noted above, J could be found guilty of felony murder of C. And depending on the rules of the jurisdiction, he could also be found guilty of murder of F under this theory.

C. Voluntary Manslaughter. Voluntary manslaughter is the codification of murders committed while the defendant is still under the stress of an event. These murders are often described as heat of the passion murders. The prototypical example is when a husband walks in on his cheating spouse and immediately murders the spouse and/or spouse's lover. Here, the murder of F and C did not occur while J was under the stress of any event--the robbery was a pre-planned event between J and F. Thus, J could not be charged with voluntary manslaughter.

D. Involuntary Manslaughter. Involuntary manslaughter can be thought of as criminal negligence. This charge is generally used to charge drunk drivers when they murder someone. Here, it is possible that J could be convicted of involuntary manslaughter. Here, J, in holding the firearm, had a duty to take the precautions that someone holding a firearm should, i.e., hold it steady, don't drop it, keep the safety on until you are ready to discharge. J did none of those things. He did not have the safety on, he did not hold the firearm steadily, thus breaching his duty of care when he dropped it and it discharged. And his dropping of the firearm caused the death of C--but for him dropping it, C would still be alive. Thus, J could be charged under this theory as well for the death of C.

Conspiracy

Also, J could be charged with a conspiracy. A conspiracy is an agreement between 2 or more persons for a criminal purpose to act in furtherance of that criminal purpose. The modern jurisprudence also requires the commission of an overt act in furtherance of a conspiracy. Under the modern jurisprudence, the crime is committed once an overt act has occurred, and the defendants can no longer withdraw from the conspiracy at that point. Here, although there is no written agreement between the J and F (and a written agreement is not required but would help if you're prosecuting these types of crimes), J and F are clearly in agreement that they were going to rob the store. J and F, prepared with guns, armed themselves with firearms and both drew their guns at the store clerk and demanded money. Here, their actions clearly demonstrate they were acting in concert with one another towards to the same agreed upon goal--the commission of a robbery. They have also clearly committed an overt act, in furtherance of their criminal purpose--they drew their guns and demanded money from the store employee S. Upon completion of the overt act, the crime of conspiracy is completed, and neither could withdraw from the conspiracy.

2. Incident at Park Street.

Here, J could be charged for attempt 1st degree or 2nd degree murder. To be convicted of an attempt, a defendant must have the intent to commit a specific offense and take a substantial step in furtherance of that crime. The substantial step need not be criminal in nature, but it must be in furtherance of the offense (i.e., it takes defendant one step closer) and cannot simply be planning or preparation.

Here, J had the intent to commit 1st or 2nd degree murder. Specifically, he had the intent to commit a premeditated murder (1st degree) or intent to maliciously murder another or cause substantial bodily injury (2nd degree). As to the premeditated murder, premeditation does not need to be a long-drawn out plan. Premeditation can occur instantly so long as defendant has sufficient time to intend to murder before attempting to do so. Here, upon seeing S, J believed that he should murder her to eliminate her as a witness to his robbery and other offenses. J had enough time to come to a decision to murder S in a cool, dispassionate matter. Alternatively, if J did not form the requisite intent and did not have time to premeditate, he could alternatively be charged with murder in the 2nd degree. As discussed above, murder in the second degree includes a malicious intent to kill or to cause substantial bodily harm. J clearly had both of those intents as he hoped to eliminate S as a witness by killing her. Thus, alternatively, if he did not have time to come to a cool dispassionate decision to murder S while he was driving past her, he did have the requisite intent to commit a second-degree murder.

In addition, Jim took a substantial step towards his offense--he actually fired his gun at S hoping to kill her. Even though the bullet missed her and the substantive, underlying crime (murder) was not completed, J completed the crime of attempt when he took this substantial step.
Accordingly, J can be found guilty of attempt murder.

3. Suppression of the Gun

The Fourth Amendment protects against unreasonable searches and seizures. To trigger the protections of the Fourth Amendment, the search/seizure must have been done by a government actor. Here, the search and seizure were done by Officer Bakari (Off B), who works for some type of government entity (either local, state, or federal police department). And the search that was done was of Jim's person, thus Jim has standing to challenge the seizure of the firearm.

An unreasonable search/seizure is one that is done where an individual has a reasonable expectation of privacy. Those areas include an individual's person and their home. An individual has a lessor privacy interest in their vehicle.

Here, Off B pulled over J because J looked nervous. Off J had no knowledge of the events at the store or on Park Street. Off B just stopped J because J looked nervous. An officer can stop an individual for a reasonable period based on reasonable suspicion that that individual committed a crime. The officer must be able to point to specific articulable facts justifying the reasonable suspicion/stop. Notably, a stop can be pretextual (see Whren), but there still must be reasonable suspicion for the stop. Here, at a suppression hearing, Off B would testify simply that J looked nervous. That is not sufficient to justify the stop, because nervousness, on its own, does not suggest any evidence of criminal activity. It is totally possible that J is simply a nervous driver. Accordingly, the stop was in violation of the 4th Amendment. Any evidence that is found in violation of an illegal stop must be suppressed in accordance with the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine. And accordingly, the firearm would be suppressed. (Also, note that there are no facts that would suggest that the firearm would be found in the normal course in the investigation, negating any exception such as inevitable discovery or collateral source doctrine).

Assuming arguendo that the stop was legal, Off B then did a pat down search of J. It should be first noted that an officer may ask an individual to exit their car during a lawful search. Searches generally need to be done in accordance with a search warrant;

however, there are exceptions to the warrant requirement, including but not limited to a search incident to arrest, exigent circumstances, Terry search, automobile exception, and administrative searches. Here, J was not under arrest at this time, there were no exigent circumstances justifying the search, and there was no administrative search. Off B could try to justify his search under the automobile exception. An individual has a lessor privacy interest in his/her vehicle because vehicles are so regulated. However, to search a vehicle after a lawful traffic stop, an officer must have probable cause that he will find evidence of an offense. (This most commonly occurs when the officer, after a stop, smells drug use or sees drugs/alcohol in plain view). Because Off B did not know of the previous crimes and was only stopping J because he looked nervous, Off B did not have PC that a crime had occurred and could not justify his search. Off B then could alternative try to justify his search as a Terry frisk. A Terry frisk is not a search for evidence of a crime, but a safety pat down to ensure that an individual is not dangerous. TO justify a Terry frisk, the officer must have reasonable suspicion that a defendant is dangerous or trying to flee. Here, Off B would testify that J looked nervous and that he had a visible bulge. There are no facts to suggest that the bulge was in the shape of a firearm or other weapon, however. Also, J looked nervous prior to the stop. Thus, a likely result is that the Terry frisk will be deemed a search without reasonable suspicion and thus found in violation of the 4th Amendment. Thus, the search of J's person was in violation of the 4th Amendment as no exceptions to the warrant requirement apply. Accordingly, because the stop and the search were both in violation of the 4th Amendment, the firearm will likely be suppressed.

Q2 Community Property

Harry had premarital savings of $10,000 in a bank account when he married Winona in California in 2015. After the wedding, Harry started working at a new job and deposited his $3,000 salary check into the account. Shortly afterward, he paid $2,000 for rent and $2,000 for living expenses with checks drawn on the account. He then bought $1,000 in Acme stock in his own name with another check drawn on the account. The Acme stock increased in value over time.

During the marriage, Winona purchased disability insurance out of her salary. She later became disabled and could no longer work. As a result, she became entitled to monthly disability insurance payments, which will continue until she reaches the age of 65.

Thereafter, Harry and Winona decided to live separately, but to go to counseling with the hope of reconciling. After Harry moved out of the family home, he used his earnings to gamble at a local casino, winning a large amount of money with which he opened an investment account in his own name. Harry did not tell Winona about his winnings or investment account because she did not approve of gambling.

Subsequently, after a period of counseling, Harry and Winona concluded that they would not reconcile and Harry filed for dissolution. A few days later, Harry took out a loan to pay for a sailboat, hoping that sailing would relieve the stress of the divorce.

What are Harry's and Winona's rights and liabilities regarding:

1. The Acme stock? Discuss.

2. Winona's post-separation disability insurance payments? Discuss.

3. The investment account? Discuss.

4. The loan for the sailboat? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

Answer A

INTRODUCTION

California is a community property state. The marital community begins upon the formation of a valid marriage and terminates upon permanent separation, divorce, or death of a spouse. During marriage, all earnings and income of both spouses, and all property acquired by either spouse during the marriage with community funds, are part of the marital community and are considered to be community property ("CP"). All income and property owned by either spouse from before marriage, as well as earnings through inheritance, gift, or bequest during marriage, are separate property ("SP") of the recipient spouse. All debts and liabilities of both spouses from before and during the marriage are generally presumed to be CP. All debts and liabilities of each spouse after permanent separation or dissolution are generally SP.

1. ACME STOCK

Presumption--CP

All property acquired by either spouse during the existence of a valid marriage is generally presumed to be CP. In this case, Harry acquired the Acme stock after the formation of the marital community. Thus, the stock will generally be presumed to be CP, although Harry will try to rebut this presumption.

Action: Titling Stock in Harry's Name Alone/Transmutation

If property is acquired as community property, the action of titling the property in one spouse's name alone will not suffice to change the nature of the property. Since 1984, in order to change the nature of acquired property from community property to separate property, there must be an express writing by the adversely affected spouse assenting to the change in nature of the property.

In this case, Harry may attempt to argue that the Acme stock is his separate property because it is titled in his name alone. However, that alone is not sufficient to change the nature of the property. Moreover, the facts do not indicate that there is any writing by Winona acknowledging the nature of the change in status of the stock, or that she even knew about the existence of the stock. As such, Harry's titling the property in his name will not suffice to rebut the presumption of it being community property, without more.

Source: Harry's Bank Account

Harry will argue that the stock is his separate property because the purchase was conducted via a bank account that contains his premarital savings of $10,000. Savings from before marriage are Harry's SP. However, the facts also indicate that following the marriage, Harry deposited $3,000 of his salary into the account. All wages and salaries earned by both spouses during the marriage are for the benefit of the community and are community property. Thus, because Harry commingled community property and separate property in his bank account, he may attempt to rebut the presumption of community property through tracing.

Tracing

When separate property and community property are commingled, a spouse may establish that the source of funds was separate property through tracing.

Direct Tracing

A spouse may trace the source of funds to separate property by directly linking a deposit of separate property to a purchase, so long as the spouse had intent to purchase the property as separate property.

In this case, Harry had deposited $3,000 of CP into the account before making the $1,000 purchase of stock. All of the other deposits seem to have been made prior to the marriage. Thus, Harry will be unable to directly trace the source of the funds to SP. Moreover, the facts are unclear as to whether Harry intended the stock to be SP when he purchased it. He placed the stock in his own name, but without more, he probably cannot establish intent to keep the stock as SP.

Exhaustion

Alternatively, a spouse may establish that any CP funds in a commingled account were exhausted prior to the purchase of purported SP.

In this case, Harry deposited $3,000 of CP into the bank account. He then paid $2,000 for rent and $2,000 for living expenses. Rent and living expenses of spouses during the marriage are CP. When a commingled account is used to pay for CP liabilities, it is presumed that CP funds are withdrawn first, followed by the spouse's SP. Because the total of CP costs withdrawn from the account are $4,000, which exceeds the CP deposit of $3,000, Harry will be able to establish that the CP funds in his bank account were exhausted prior to the purchase of the stock, and that the source of the funds can be adequately traced to Harry's pre-marriage SP savings.

Distribution

The Acme stock is Harry's SP, because the CP funds in the account were exhausted before he purchased the stock, and he will be able to establish the source of the funds for the stock as his SP savings. As such, the stock, along with the increase in value that occurred during the existence of the marriage, will be assigned to Harry upon divorce.

2. WINONA'S POST-SEPARATION DISABILITY PAYMENTS

Disability Insurance--Presumed CP

The disability insurance was purchased by W during the existence of the marriage. Moreover, the source of the payment of the insurance policy was W's salary, which is CP. Thus, the insurance policy qualifies as CP.

Disability Payments

When a spouse receives disability or other payments, the court will first look to whether the payments are intended to compensate for past work or to replace future earnings. In this case, W purchased the insurance policy during the marriage with CP, as discussed above. The facts indicate that the disability payments will continue until W is 65 years old. Thus, it appears that the disability payments are meant to replace future earnings, rather than compensate for past earnings. As such, all payments received by W prior to permanent separation are CP, as they acted as a replacement for W's earnings during the existence of the marriage.

When did separation occur?

Since 2017, permanent separation occurs in California when one spouse indicates intent to permanently end the marriage, and that spouse's behavior is consistent with that intent. Living separately is not required but will be considered when examining the intent and behavior of the spouses.

In this case, the facts indicate that H and W decided to live separately but continued to go to counseling in the hopes of reconciling. After a period of counseling, H filed for dissolution after deciding that they could not reconcile. Even though the spouses were living separately, they were attempting to reconcile. As such, it cannot be said that either spouse had intent to permanently end the marriage at that point. However, at a later point, W and H decided that they could not reconcile, and H then filed for dissolution. Because H's filing for dissolution is consistent with his intent to permanently end the marriage, the court will determine that permanent separation occurred at that point. Prior to H filing for dissolution, permanent separation had not occurred, even though the spouses were living separately.

Disability Payments Post-Separation

When disability payments that replace future earnings are received by a spouse after permanent separation, those payments are that spouse's SP. In this case, W will continue receiving disability payments until she is 65. The payments she receives after dissolution will replace earnings that she would have acquired through labor. All payments received after H filed for dissolution will be considered to be W's SP.

Distribution

All of W's disability payments prior to H filing for dissolution are CP and will be assigned to the marital estate. All payments received after H filed for dissolution are W's SP and will be assigned to her.

3. INVESTMENT ACCOUNT

Presumption=CP

As discussed above, the marital community did not end, and permanent separation did not occur, until H filed for dissolution. H may argue that the parties were separated and that the account is his SP. However, the purchase of the investment account occurred during the existence of the marriage because the spouses were attempting to reconcile at that point. As such, it is presumed to be CP.

Action: Titling Account in Own Name/Transmutation

See rule above. The fact that H titled the investment account in his name alone is not by itself sufficient to change the nature of the account. Moreover, the facts do not indicate that there is any writing by W acknowledging the change in character of the property, or that she knew about the account at all. Rather, the facts indicate that H did not tell W about the account because she did not approve of gambling. Thus, H will need to provide more facts in order to establish a change in the nature of the account.

Breach of Fiduciary Duty

Spouses are considered to be fiduciaries of each other and owe each other the highest duties of good faith and loyalty. When a spouse breaches his fiduciary duty, a court may take that into account when distributing community property and may assign the non-breaching spouse a higher share of the CP or take other action consistent with remedying the breach.

In this case, the facts indicate that H won a large amount of money gambling at a casino. Because W does not approve of gambling, H declined to tell her about the winnings and instead opened an investment account in his own name. The court will likely find that this action constituted a breach of H's fiduciary duty to W. H had a duty to keep W apprised of his financial status, and not to take actions in order to disadvantage W. When H opened the account without telling W, he was presumably attempting to hide earnings from W in order to benefit himself in a possible future divorce. This is a clear breach of fiduciary duty.

Distribution

Because the investment account was purchased during the existence of the marriage and there are no facts indicating that a valid transmutation occurred, the account is CP and will be divided equally between the spouses upon divorce. However, because H breached his fiduciary duty to W by refusing to tell her about the account and attempting to hide its existence from her, the court may determine that W is entitled to a larger share of CP.

4. LOAN FOR THE SAILBOAT

Debts

All debts and liabilities of both spouses before and during the existence of the marriage are CP. All debts and liabilities by spouses after divorce or permanent separation are that spouse's SP. An exception exists if the debt or liability is for necessaries of life, such as food or medical expenses.

End of Marital Community

See discussion above. Although H and W started living separately prior to H filing for dissolution, the court will determine that the marital community did not end until H filed for dissolution, because prior to that point the spouses were attempting to reconcile.

Action: Acquiring the Loan After Filing for Dissolution

Debts acquired by both spouses after permanent separation or dissolution are SP of the debtor spouse. In this case, the facts indicate that H took out the sailboat loan a few days after filing for divorce. Even though the marriage had not been formally dissolved at that point, the fact that H and W had decided that they could not reconcile, and that H had filed for dissolution indicates that permanent separation had occurred. Thus, the loan will be assigned to Harry as his SP.

Liability of H's SP for Loan

Because the loan is H's SP, his SP will be liable for payment of the loan.

Liability of CP for Loan

If a loan is acquired by a spouse following permanent separation, the loan will be the debtor spouse's SP, and the CP will not be liable for the debt. An exception exists for necessaries of life, for which CP may be liable even following permanent separation. H may attempt to argue that the sailboat loan qualifies as a necessary, because it helped him to cope with the stress of the divorce. However, the court will not accept that argument, as the loan was not necessary to sustain H's health or life.

Liability of W's SP for Loan

If a debt acquired after separation may be satisfied from CP, the non-debtor spouse's SP may also be reached if all other funds are exhausted. The non-debtor spouse may protect their SP from liability by keeping their money in a bank account titled in their name alone and to which the debtor spouse does not have access.

In this case, as discussed above, the CP is not liable for H's sailboat loan, because it was acquired after separation and is not a necessary of life. As such, W's SP will also be protected from liability for the loan.

Distribution

The loan is H's SP and will be satisfied from his SP funds.

Answer B

Community Property Essay

California is a community property state. This means that the marital economic community begins at marriage and ends at divorce, or permanent separation, or the death of a spouse. All earnings made during a valid marriage are considered community property (CP), and all things purchased with those earnings are also considered CP. Property acquired before marriage or after divorce or permanent separation is presumed separate property (SP). Additionally, all property acquired during marriage by either gift or inheritance are considered SP.

Valid Marriage

In California, a valid marriage requires (1) consent, (2) capacity, and (3) legal formalities. Here, the facts simply state that Harry (H) and Winona (W) were married in California in 2015. Therefore, it is presumed they had a valid marriage that began in 2015.

Permanent Separation

Permanent separation ends the marital community. This occurs when one spouse (1) communicates to the other spouse a desire to end the marital community, and (2) conduct in conformity with that desire. Permanent physical separation is no longer required. Here, at some point, H and W decided to separate but continued to go to marital counseling before there was a final dissolution of the marriage. Although there was a physical separation between H and W when H moved out of the family home, the fact that both sought marriage counseling indicates that they wanted to work things out and there was no set intent on ending the marital community with conduct in conformity with that intent. Therefore, although H and W physically separated, it is unlikely that the marital community ended until there was a final dissolution.

1. Acme Stock

CP Presumption

The general presumption is that all property acquired during a valid marriage is CP. This presumption can be rebutted by a preponderance of the evidence that the property acquired was traced from a separate property source or an agreement between the spouses to keep certain property separate.

Here, the Acme stock was purchased after H and W were married. Therefore, the general presumption is that it is CP.

Earnings

A spouse's labor, skill, and effort are considered community assets and therefore, the earnings of a spouse during a valid marriage are CP, absent agreement between spouses to contrary. Here, Acme stock was purchased from funds in bank account that had H's earnings deposited into it, and those earnings were acquired during marriage. Therefore, account that purchased Acme stock had CP earnings in it. But H's account also had premarital savings of $10,000 which are H's SP. H will likely want to claim Acme stock as his own SP and must therefore rebut CP presumption by tracing the purchase of stocks to his SP.

Tracing to SP

CP presumption can be rebutted if spouse demonstrates that funds used to make purchase came from SP source. If this evidence is proffered, then spouse is entitled to refund of SP contribution but not any increase in the value of the property acquired with

SP funds.

Here, H will want to argue that Acme stock is his SP. Since it was acquired during marriage, H must overcome CP presumption. Since H purchased stock from commingled account that had both CP and SP in it, H can only establish Acme stock as his SP if he can show direct tracing or exhaustion method.

Direct Tracing

Direct tracing requires that the spouse show that the funds used from commingled account to purchase property came from a SP deposit, and CP funds were not used. It is not enough for the spouse to show that the account had more SP funds than CP funds at time of purchase. Generally, a spouse can prove direct tracing by keeping conspicuous records of the deposits and credits of the account and their characterizations (CP or SP). With this information, the spouse must then show that he had the intent to make purchase with SP funds and the proof of the SP deposits and credits that demonstrate such SP funds were in fact used to make the purchase.

Here, H had $10,000 SP funds in account and H also deposited CP earnings into same account. Facts are unclear as to whether H intended purchase of Acme stock to come from SP funds in account, and the facts are also silent as to H's accounting practices that would help corroborate that needed intent. For these reasons, it is unlikely that H can demonstrate direct tracing.

Exhaustion Method

The exhaustion method of tracing requires that the proponent spouse show that the commingled account was depleted of all CP funds at the time of the purchase, and the only remaining funds in the account to make the purchase were SP funds. It is presumed that family expenses are paid with CP funds first, and then SP funds. Here, account had $10,000 SP, then H deposited $3,000 salary check (CP), and thereafter withdrew $2000 for rent and $2,000 for living expenses. Since H and W lived in the family home prior to separation, the rent payment and living expenses payments are considered family expenses to be paid from CP funds first. Since CP funds in account only totaled $3,000 and the family expenses totaled $4,000, there was not enough CP in account to pay off those family expenses. Therefore, $1,000 of H's SP funds were used to pay the rest. After this payment, the account only had $9,000 left, which is considered H's SP. Thereafter, H made purchase of Acme stock. Since CP funds depleted from account at time of purchase, exhaustion method can be properly used here to help H prove that Acme stock was purchased with SP funds and therefore H is entitled to reimbursement for his SP contribution to the Acme purchase.

Title

A spouse placing title to property in his or her name alone does not change the character of the property without more, such as a valid transmutation. Therefore, the fact that H bought stock in his name alone is not determinative on this issue.

Conclusion

H can trace Acme purchase to SP funds using exhaustion method. Therefore, H is entitled to his $1,000 SP contribution for the purchase of that property but not any increase in value of the stock beyond that amount. The appreciation is considered CP.

2. Post-Separation Disability Insurance Payment

CP Presumption

See above rule. Here, W purchased disability insurance during marriage. Therefore, it is presumed CP.

Earnings

See above rule. Here, the insurance was bought with W's earnings made during marriage, which makes the earnings CP, as well as the property purchased with those earnings (i.e., the insurance policy).

Disability Insurance Payment

Disability payments will generally be considered the disabled spouse's SP upon dissolution, but if the disability payments were, in part, given as a form of prior compensation, then the community is entitled to its proportionate share of the disability payments that reflects the compensation earned during marriage.

Here, W purchased the disability insurance during marriage with CP earnings. Therefore, the community is entitled to an interest in the policy and the policy is generally considered CP until divorce. W became disabled while still married to H and began receiving disability payments. These payments made while H and W were still married will be considered CP. But after H and W dissolved their marriage, the court will likely find that it would be equitable for W to be entitled to most of the proceeds for the disability payments because she resultingly became disabled and likely needs the policy payments to replace her lost earnings. But the community will likely be entitled to any CP contributions made to acquire the policy (i.e., the premiums paid out of W's earnings).

3. Investment Account

CP Presumption

See above rule. As noted above, although H and W physically separated in prior to their dissolution, since they both sought marriage counseling, it is likely that they would not be deemed to have permanently separated until the dissolution. Here, H acquired the gambling winnings used to fund the investment account after using his earnings made after separation. This would usually result in the investment account and the gambling winnings being considered SP because earnings after separation are SP as well as things purchased with SP earnings. But since there was no permanent separation at the point in time when H made those earnings (see above analysis) used to gain gambling winnings, the earnings were still CP and thus, the gambling winnings acquired from those earnings and the investment account funded with those winnings are also presumptively CP.

Breach of Fiduciary Duties

Spouses owe fiduciary duties to each other to act in the highest of good faith and fair dealings. Spouses must be loyal to each other, and each is entitled to a full account and disclosure of the community estate and in some instances, the other spouse's SP interests. It is a breach of a spouse's fiduciary duties to actively conceal property from the other in order to derive a secret profit from the property. This is a breach of the duty of loyalty.

Here, H likely breached his fiduciary duty of loyalty to W when H did not disclose the fact that he used CP earnings to gamble and take a substantial amount of gambling winnings to open up an investment account in his name alone. As noted above, the investment account is presumptively CP, and therefore, W has an interest in the winnings and investment account. The fact that H did not disclose any of this to W may be found to be active concealment which could lead the court to punish H for such breach by depriving him of any interest in the investment account.

Title

See above rule. Here, although H titled the investment account in his name alone, this does not change the character of the account to SP.

4. Loan for Sailboat

Debts and Creditor Rights

Generally, debts acquired before or during marriage, by either spouse are considered community debts. These community debts are first paid with CP and then the SP of the spouses. After permanent separation, debts acquired by either spouse are usually considered the separate debt of the debtor-spouse. While permanently separated but before divorce, the debts acquired by one spouse for necessities can result in the non-debtor spouse's SP being reached to satisfy those debts for necessities during separation.

SP Presumption

See above rules. Here, H acquired a loan for a sailboat. This loan was acquired after H and W concluded counseling would not help their marriage and H filed for dissolution. Since this debt was acquired either after permanent separation or divorce, the loan is the SP debt of H, rather than it being a community debt. Therefore, the loan on the sailboat will be H's separate debt.

Division of Community Estate

At the end of the martial economic community, the community property is usually divided equally among the spouses. Each spouse is entitled to a 1/2 portion of the net community estate.

Q3 Torts / Remedies

Thirty years ago, Diana built a large open-air theater to provide an outdoor multi-use entertainment venue. On weekdays, Diana rents the venue to the local dance companies. On weekend evenings, Diana hosts rock concerts at the theater. Revenue from the rock concerts funds most of the operating costs of the venue. The theater employs about 200 people and has been a focus of the city's cultural scene. When built, its location was near the edge of the city. As time went by, city development expanded to include housing in the vicinity of the theater.

Pedro recently purchased a house in a subdivision located adjacent to the theater. Although Pedro knew about the theater when he bought his house, he thought that the new house was a perfect place to raise a family.

As soon as Pedro moved into his new house, he was horrified by the noise and vibration coming from the theater during rock concerts. He could feel the floor shake and could not have a normal conversation because of the loud noise. Pedro later learned that his neighbors complained to Diana about the noise and vibration, that they were unsuccessful in obtaining relief, and that they decided to live with it in the end.

Pedro approached Diana. She explained that she had already taken steps to mitigate the negative impact by requiring that all concerts end by 11:00 p.m. and setting a maximum noise level. Diana explained that the facility could not survive economically without rock concerts and that rock concerts were, by their nature, loud.

A few days later, in an effort to find out if she might be able to relieve Pedro of some of his discomfort, Diana went to his house to determine whether sound-deadening materials might be added. She forgot to tell Pedro that she was coming. Diana let herself into Pedro's backyard, took some measurements, and left without disturbing anything.

Pedro intends to sue Diana.

1. What claims may Pedro reasonably assert against Diana? Discuss.

2. What remedies may Pedro reasonably seek? Discuss.

Answer A

Pedro v. Diana

1. Pedro's Claims Against Diana

The issue is which claims that Pedro may assert against Diana.

Private Nuisance

The issue is whether Pedro may assert a claim for private nuisance against Diana due to the excessive noise and vibration from the open-air theater. A claim for private nuisance can be established by demonstrating that the defendant is causing a substantial and unreasonable interference with the plaintiff's use and enjoyment of the property. Interference is considered substantial when a reasonable person would find that there has been a significant deprivation of his or her ability to enjoy the property. A plaintiff's hyper-sensitivities are ignored when a court is adjudicating whether a nuisance exists.

Here, the facts describe the noise level coming from the rock concerts as "horrific." The floor shakes and Pedro is precluded from having even a normal conversation in his own home. Pedro purchased the home because he thought it was going to be a perfect place to raise a family. Much to his horror, the loud noise from the rock concerts coming from the open-air theater constitute a substantial and unreasonable interference with his use and enjoyment of his residence. Pedro does not appear to be hypersensitive to the noise, given that his neighbors have also complained to Diana about the noise level on the property. Further, a reasonable person would find a substantial and unreasonable interference with the enjoyment of his or her own home if the floor was shaking every weekend and conversations could not be had. Diana may argue that no reasonable person would see this as a substantial interference because she has taken steps to mitigate the noise and resulting inconvenience as a result of the rock concerts (e.g., she only hosts rock concerts on weekends, the concerts must be done by 11:00 p.m., and she has set a maximum noise level). Diana also appears to be considering installing sound-deadening equipment as evidenced by her taking measurements in Pedro's backyard. But Diana's arguments are not likely to be availing given the significance of the disruption that Pedro is suffering.

Thus, Pedro can assert a viable claim for private nuisance against Diana.

Public Nuisance

The issue is whether Pedro may assert a claim for public nuisance against Diana. A claim for public nuisance can be established by an unreasonable interference with the health, safety, and morals of the community at large. To recover under a theory of public nuisance, the plaintiff must suffer unique damages.

Here, Pedro will argue that the public health and safety is being threatened by horrific loud noise coming from the rock concerts at the theater every weekend. However, Pedro's claim for a public nuisance suffers because he cannot identify that he has suffered unique damages. In particular, Pedro's neighbors have already complained about the noise. Pedro also lives in a subdivision located adjacent to the theater. Pedro's interest as a homeowner of one home in this subdivision that is experiencing noise is not unique as compared against to any other member of the residential community. Further, Diana will likely entirely contest that the theater is a public nuisance at all because the community thrives upon the inclusion of the theater; it is a cornerstone of the community and a focus of the cultural scene.

Thus, Pedro is not likely to assert a viable claim against Diana for public nuisance.

Trespass to Land

The issue is whether Pedro may assert a claim for trespass to land against Diana. A trespass to land is an intentional tort. Trespass to land requires the showing of: (i) an intentional act on the part of the defendant, (ii) a physical invasion of real property, and (iii) causation, meaning that the defendant's conduct was a substantial factor in causing the injury.

Here, Diana went to Pedro's house without his permission. She intended to come onto Pedro's property to determine whether sound-deadening materials might be added. She then voluntarily let herself into Pedro's backyard, which constituted a physical invasion of Pedro's real property. Moreover, Diana caused the action to occur because her letting herself into the backyard was the substantial factor in causing the trespass.

Thus, Pedro can reasonably assert a claim against Diana for trespass to land.

Conclusion

Therefore, Pedro can assert claims for private nuisance, public nuisance, and trespass to land against Diana.

2. Remedies that Pedro May Seek

The issue is which remedies Pedro may seek against Diana.

Compensatory Damages

The issue is whether Pedro may obtain compensatory damages from Diana for the nuisance claims. Compensatory damages are meant to compensate the plaintiff for foreseeable losses and may be pecuniary or non-pecuniary (such as pain and suffering). Compensatory damages must also be certain and unavoidable. Traditionally, the method of damages calculation for a nuisance claim is the loss of use and enjoyment of the property plus any costs incurred while attempting to abate the nuisance. Courts will also offer an additional award to the plaintiff for the discomfort incurred as a result of the nuisance. Modernly, some courts are applying the doctrine of "permanent nuisance" when calculating a damages award in order to reduce the multiplicity of lawsuits that are being filed. Under this damages model, the plaintiff is entitled to recover as damages the diminution in value of his or her land.

Here, if the court applies a traditional damages calculation, Pedro will be entitled to his loss of use and enjoyment in his residence. The facts do not indicate that Pedro incurred any costs in an attempt to abate the nuisance. In fact, the only action that he took to abate the nuisance was when he approached Diana and explained to her the complaints about the nuisance. Pedro did not incur any costs as a result of having this conversation. The court will make a reasonable award of damages to compensate Pedro for the discomfort caused. Diana may argue that Pedro's damages award should be reduced by his knowing purchase of a residence in close proximity to a theater that is known to host rock concerts.

If the court applies the "permanent nuisance" doctrine, then Pedro will be entitled to recover the value of the diminution in his land as a result of the rock concerts. Diana will similarly argue that Pedro's recovery will need to be reduced by virtue of his assumption of the risk of coming to the nuisance.

Thus, Pedro can recover compensatory damages under either of the models above.

Nominal Damages

The issue is whether Pedro may obtain nominal damages from Diana for the trespass to land. Nominal damages are those that are obtainable by a plaintiff when no harm was actually suffered (as in a simple trespass to land case).

Here, Pedro did not suffer any damages as a result of Diana entering his property without his permission. The facts indicate that Diana left without disturbing anything in the backyard; thus nothing was damages as a result of Diana's conduct. Pedro can only be entitled to nominal damages from Diana for the trespass to land.

Thus, Pedro can recover nominal damages from Diana for her trespass to land.

Punitive Damages

The issue is whether Pedro may seek punitive damages against Diana. Punitive damages are designed to punish a defendant for intentional conduct arising out of an intentional tort. Here, Pedro will not likely be able to recover punitive damages from Diana because she has acted in good faith by establishing reasonable parameters to confine the impact of the noise from the rock concerts. Thus, Pedro will not be able to seek punitive damages from Diana.

Permanent Injunction

The issue is whether Pedro may obtain a permanent injunction against Diana enjoining rock concerts at the open-air theater. An injunction is an equitable remedy. A permanent injunction will last for the amount of time imposed by the court. A negative injunction enjoins the defendant from engaging in a specified activity. A mandatory injunction orders the defendant to perform an affirmative act. The elements of a permanent injunction are (1) inadequate remedy at law, (2) the injunction is feasible, (3) the balancing of hardships weighs in favor of granting the injunction, and (4) no defenses apply. Each element will be discussed in turn below.

Inadequate Remedy at Law

The issue is whether there is an adequate remedy at law. If a violation if continuing, a court will deem that there is no adequate remedy at law.

Here, the nuisance is continuing. In fact, on weekend evenings, Diana hosts rock concerts at the theater. The theater is a large open-air theater and Diana explained that the loud rock concerts will need to continue.

Thus, there is no adequate remedy at law.

Feasibility of Enforcement

The issue is whether an injunction is feasible. The feasibility of enforcement turns on whether the injunction will be mandatory or negative. See above for the definitions of mandatory and negative injunctions. There are no feasibility issues with negative injunctions because the court can merely exercise its contempt power and hold the defendant in contempt of court if the defendant commits an act that it is enjoined from engaging. There are feasibility issues with a mandatory injunction, however, because it requires the court to supervise the defendant in ensuring that the defendant is complying with the injunction. Generally, the scarcity of judicial resources precludes courts from acting as supervisors to enforce mandatory injunctions.

Here, Pedro will request a negative injunction in that the theater be enjoined from hosting further rock concerts. This will be feasible to enforce because the court can simply hold Diana in contempt of court if it learns that she sponsors a rock concert in violation of the injunction order.

Thus, enforcement of the injunction is feasible because it will be a negative injunction.

Balance of Hardships

The issue is whether the balance of hardships will favor the granting of injunctive relief. In effectuating the balancing test, the court will balance the interests of the plaintiff in obtaining the injunction against the interests of the defendant and the public. If the burden to the defendant and the public outweighs the benefit to the plaintiff, then damages will be deemed an adequate remedy and an injunction will not be proper. Here, Pedro will argue that the balance of hardships tip in his favor because the noise from the rock concert is horrific and causing the floor to shake. Pedro cannot even maintain a conversation in his home due to the severe noise. Moreover, Pedro will argue that the public interest weighs in his favor because Pedro's neighbors have complained to Diana about the noise and vibration, and they received no meaningful response from Diana. Further, the theater is also rented to local dance companies during the week and generates revenue that way; it cannot be said that the theater is wholly dependent upon rock concerts for revenue generation.

On the contrary, Diana will argue that her interests and the public interests will be significantly burdened if an injunction is issued against her. With respect to Diana, she has owned the facility for 30 years; in fact, she built it. At the time that she built the facility, it was near the edge of the city, and it was only as time went by that the city development expanded to include housing in the vicinity of the theater. The theater cannot survive economically without rock concerts and thus Diana's financial interests could be wholly, negatively impacted. Moreover, Diana will argue that the public interest will lie against granting injunctive relief because the theater employs 200 people and has been a focus of the city's cultural scene for many years. Without the rock concerts, the theater will become bankrupt, and 200 citizens will be out of work.

Moreover, Diana has already taken steps that will work to mitigate the amount of the nuisance. Not only are rock concerts only on the weekend, but she requires that all concerts end by 11:00 p.m.; Diana also set a maximum noise level. Pedro's neighbors further dropped their complaints about the noise and Diana is taking reasonable measures to ensure that the nearby housing is only minimally impacted by the nuisance.

In consideration of all of this evidence, a court will likely side with Diana in concluding that the public interest and her interests outweigh the burden on Pedro. An injunction would have an overall negative impact of the economy and the culture of the community, force numerous people out of jobs, forfeit revenue brought in by the rock concerts, and cause the theater to close its doors.

Thus, on balance, the balance of hardships weighs against granting a permanent injunction.

Defense - "Coming to the Nuisance"

The issue is whether Diana can raise the defense of "coming to the nuisance" in precluding Pedro from obtaining injunctive relief. "Coming to the nuisance" means that the plaintiff voluntarily encountered the nuisance and decided to live near the nuisance anyway. "Coming to the nuisance" is generally not a defense to equitable relief.

Here, Diana may argue that Pedro came to the nuisance and thus assumed the risk because he knew about the theater when he purchased the house. But that will not be a successful defense in the injunction action. (Diana could assert this in response to the damages award so that Pedro's damages can be mitigated by those that would have been avoidable.)

Thus, "coming to the nuisance" is not a defense to the injunction.

Conclusion

Thus, it is likely that Pedro may reasonably seek a permanent injunction from Diana, but it will likely be denied on the basis of hardship.

Overall Conclusion

Therefore, Pedro may reasonably seek injunctive relief and damages remedies against Diana.

Answer B

I. PEDRO'S CLAIMS AGAINST DIANA

Trespass to land

Trespass to land is intentional physical invasion of the land of another. Knowledge of legal title or intent to legally invade is not necessary; only the intent to physically invade suffices.

Here, "A few days later, in an effort to find out if she might be able to relieve Pedro of some of his discomfort, Diana went to his house to determine whether sound-deadening materials might be added. She forgot to tell Pedro that she was coming. Diana let herself into Pedro's backyard, took some measurements, and left without disturbing anything." As such, D physically entered P's backyard, which is P's land, without consent. Although D did not intend to interfere with P's rights, D intended in fact to enter P's backyard physically. This satisfies the intent requirement.

In conclusion, D committed trespass to land and is liable

Defense of consent or private necessity fails

Consent is a defense to trespass to land. Consent may be express or implied. Necessity is also a defense that exists when the action was justified because the trespass was done to prevent an imminent harm. Private necessity is when trespass was necessary to prevent harm to a private interest. Public necessity applies when the imminent or threatened harm was to the public. Public necessity is immune to damages caused by trespass. Private necessity claimant is still responsible for damages caused by trespass.

Here, D may raise the defense of consent or private necessity. Consent defense fails because D did not seek P's consent expressly. Further, the mere owning of land does not imply consent to let others enter the backyard, even if they seek to enter to help the landowner. Further, any private necessity argument is weak. D could argue that it was necessary for D to measure P's land to help P. However, D could simply have asked P before entering. Since D forgot, D could have called P or returned at some other time. Since D simply entered P's backyard without seeking any form of consent, and since D had alternatives available and no imminent threat existed to make D's immediate entrance necessary, D will not establish these defenses.

Only nominal damages available

A physical trespass presumes that harm existed, and as such P does not have to prove that P suffered a specific pecuniary harm. However, based on the facts, D did not disturb anything and so it is unlikely P suffered any significant pecuniary damages. P will likely recover nominal damages, which are little amounts of damages that are awarded to vindicate the plaintiff's rights when not much harm was incurred in fact.

Conclusion

In conclusion, D committed trespass to land against P, and is liable. However, P can recover nominal damages, but will likely only recover nominal damages unless P can prove that P suffered some facts that indicated in the facts.

Pedro approached Diana. she explained that she had already taken steps to mitigate the negative impact by requiring that all concerts end by 11:00 p.m. and setting a maximum noise level. Diana explained that the facility could not survive economically without rock concerts and that rock concerts were, by their nature, loud.

Pedro intends to sue Diana

Private nuisance

Private nuisance occurs when the defendant substantially and unreasonably interfered with another private person's possession or use of private property. An interference is substantial when it would be offensive to a reasonable person. A hardened plaintiff who is subjectively not bothered by the interference can still recover if that interference is "substantial." An interference is unreasonable when the harm it causes is outweighed by the value it provides.

Whether interference is substantial

Here, "As soon as Pedro moved into his new house, he was horrified by the noise and vibration coming from the theater during rock concerts. He could feel the floor shake and could not have a normal conversation because of the loud noise." It appears that the shaking is physical as P can feel the vibrations of the sound. This likely offends reasonable persons because although whether loud noise by itself offends a reasonable person is arguable, when the sound physically vibrates and causes movement the reasonable person is likely to be offended by it and be annoyed by it, and the reasonable person's life will be interfered by it and their enjoyment of their home is likely reduced, possibly significantly. Further, "Pedro later learned that his neighbors complained to Diana about the noise and vibration, that they were unsuccessful in obtaining relief, and that they decided to live with it in the end." As such, it appears that people other than Pedro were in fact offended by the noises and vibrations to the point that they instituted a good faith lawsuit. D will highlight that they decided to live with it, and this shows that the interference is not substantial. Had it been substantial, D will argue, then the neighbors could objectively not decide to live with it. Although whether interference is substantial is a fact intensive inquiry, given the fact that the venue is surrounded by residences and the noise physically vibrates and quakes the neighbors, the court will likely deem the noise and vibrations substantial and offensive to a responsible person.

Whether interference is unreasonable

Here, "D operates a large open-air theater. "On weekdays, Diana rents the venue to the local dance companies. On weekend evenings, Diana hosts rock concerts at the theater. Revenue from the rock concerts funds most of the operating costs of the venue. The theater employs about 200 people and has been a focus of the city's cultural scene."" As such, it appears that D produces a lot of value to the community. Local dance companies likely need D's venue to do their performances and make their living. Further, rock and culture are important benefits to the community. It appears that culture is a major economic drive for the city. Further, the theater employs 200 people, which is a great benefit and contribution to the community. D will highlight that D's venue allows 200 people to make a livelihood while promoting the city's culture and fostering social ties and community bonds through art. Although P will counter that the harm is significant because it makes the lives of people around the venue difficult to live, to sleep, etc., D will counter that the very fact that the neighbors can decide to live with the noises attest to the fact that the harm is not significant, especially considering the great magnitude of value to the community - 200 jobs, cultural focus, tourism, economy, dancers, and musicians, etc.

Conclusion

In conclusion, the court can rule either way, if this were a case of first impression and preclusion was not a consideration. Although it appears that the interference is substantial, it also appears that an organized group of people can decide to live with it. Also, it appears that the venue provides a great amount of value to the public that cannot be denied. As such, the court may legitimately determine that the interference is not unreasonable and thus there is no private nuisance here.

Coming to the nuisance is not a defense

Coming to the nuisance is typically not a defense. Such consideration only is a defense when a party intentionally comes to the nuisance for the sole purpose of harassing or instituting a lawsuit. In general, coming to the nuisance is one of many factors considered in the overall analysis.

Here, "Thirty years ago, Diana built a large open-air theater to provide an outdoor multi-use entertainment venue." Then, "Pedro recently purchased a house in a subdivision located adjacent to the theater. Although Pedro knew about the theater when he bought his house, he thought that the new house was a perfect place to raise a family." As such, it appears that P not only came to it, P knew of the theater and its potential consequences and P did not investigate at all. Since the neighbors had already brought a lawsuit before, a simple asking of questions around would likely give P notice of the theater's activities. As such, it appears that P was on inquiry notice to inquire into the theater's activities but failed to do so. However, coming to the nuisance is not dispositive in any way because P did not come to the nuisance solely to harass with a lawsuit; P genuinely came in good faith because P believed that it was a perfect place to raise a family. As such, the court will not outright dismiss P's private nuisance. However, the court may use the fact that P came to the nuisance and the fact that P failed to inquire at all into the theater's activities to conclude on the substantial/unreasonableness analysis in favor of D.

Neighborhood creeping into D's venue

Another factor is the neighborhood's creeping into D's venue. As mentioned above with P's coming to nuisance, the "neighborhood" coming to the nuisance will not be a dispositive factor and may merely be one of many other factors. However, it appears that the court should at least give some weight to the fact that "When built, its location was near the edge of the city. As time went by, city development expanded to include housing in the vicinity of the theater." As such, D was operating D's venue in good faith.

Conclusion

In conclusion, the court will likely side with D based on the totality of circumstances and find that the value of D's operation outweighs harms that apparently were accepted to by the neighbors. Further preclusion may or may not be a consideration as discussed below.

Public nuisance

Public nuisance is substantial and unreasonable interference with health, safety, morals, or other rights of the community. When a private party seeks to bring a lawsuit for public nuisance, that party must have suffered a harm distinct from the harm suffered by the community.

Here, the harm as mentioned above might be ruled not unreasonable. Further, P has not suffered any harm from the noise or vibration that is unique from the harm suffered by other neighbors. P suffered the same exact harm that everyone around P suffers. As such, P cannot bring a public nuisance claim.

Preclusion

Preclusion bars the re-litigation of issues already litigated. Claim preclusion and issue preclusion exist.

Claim preclusion

Claim preclusion bars re litigation of same claims when there is a final valid judgment on the merits, asserted by same parties in same configuration, and the claims are the same. Here, the parties are different because P was not part of the earlier lawsuit for relief. As such, claim preclusion does not apply.

Issue preclusion

Issue preclusion bars re-litigation of same issues when 1) in a final valid judgment on the merits exist; 2) the issues was necessarily determined; 3) the issue was essential to the judgment; and 4) no mutuality problems exist.

Here, the prior parties were unsuccessful in obtaining relief, and they decided to live with it. As such, the prior lawsuit likely ended, and the plaintiffs decided against appealing. As such, the decision is final. It appears that the claim was not unsuccessful because of personal jurisdiction or other issues, and so it appears that the prior lawsuit went into the merits. The vibrations and noise are the whole point of the prior lawsuit and of this lawsuit as well. As such, the issue was both necessarily determined and essential to prior judgment. Finally, mutuality problems must not exist. First, D was party to the prior action and had a chance to defend D's self. Further, P was not party to the prior action. However, in this case since D was successful in the prior action, D will seek to assert issue preclusion against P. Since P was not party to the prior action, P had no chance to be heard. As such, D cannot assert issue preclusion against P.

Conclusion

In conclusion, D will not be able to assert issue preclusion against P. P will not want to assert preclusion because D prevailed (it appears) in the former action.

Negligent infliction of emotional distress

Defenses: defense (self, property, others); consent; arrest; necessity

Other torts (negligence, strict liability)

II. REMEDIES PEDRO CAN SEEK

Remedies for trespass to land was discussed earlier and is likely to be limited to nominal damages, especially since D will probably not come against and against and cause a multiplicity of suits problem. The remedies here will concern the case that P wins on the nuisance claim.

Money damages

Tort money damages are primarily "compensatory damages" which seeks to compensate the plaintiff put make the plaintiff whole. Sometimes there are "nominal" damages that seek to vindicate a plaintiff who basically has not been harmed, as discussed above. There are also "punitive" damages which will punish the defendant for willful and wanton conduct.

Here, punitive damages should not be available because D is not engaged in willful and wanton conduct to harm P or others. Rather, D is engaged in a legitimate business that benefits the entire community which happens to also harm nearby neighbors, who came to the nuisance because both the neighborhood crept towards D's venue and the neighbors decided to purchase the homes or rent the homes (in which case it would not be that costly for them to relocate or move away).

Further, P was seeking to raise a family here and live a quiet life here with P's family. However, the value of what P is unable to do this because of the noise and vibrations. First, it is not certain that P will win damages because of reasons discussed above - no nuisance might exist. Second, even if P wins on the private nuisance claim, it is possible that P did not suffer much pecuniary harm. Perhaps P actually got the land for a cheaper price because the seller reduced the price because of the noise and vibrations. As such, P might not have suffered harm in decrease of land value (P might have gotten the land cheaply to begin with). Third, it is possible that P will be culpable as well because P failed to inquire at all, as described above, when a simple few questions would have revealed the problem, or even a visit on a weekend.

If P's land value did go down because of the noise and vibrations, then P may be entitled to the difference between the value of the land as P purchased it without the noise and vibration issues.

Temporary restraining order, preliminary injunction, permanent injunction

P may also seek equitable relief. Although P might go through temporary restraining orders and preliminary injunction, ultimately it is a permanent injunction that P would seek to try to enjoin D from having such loud noises.

Permanent injunction is appropriate when 1) legal damage is inadequate; 2) enforcement is feasible; 3) property right exists; 4) balance of harms and equities; 5) no defenses.

1) legal damage is inadequate

Legal damages might be inadequate when the conduct at issue might be repeated or occur in the future; or when damages would be speculative or uncertain; or when the defendant is insolvent so a judgment would be meaningless.

Here, damages would be speculative because it would be difficult not only to measure the harm of constant noises and vibrations. Further, D seeks to play noises every weekend into possibly likely decades into the future. But D might stop the operation next year. As such, damages are speculative and uncertain. It can be argued that the decrease in value of land with the noises is a sufficiently certain measure of damages, however.

2) enforcement is feasible

A negative injunction prohibiting an action is easier to enforce than affirmative injunctions. One single act is easier to enforce than series of acts. An act requiring skills or personal taste is harder to enforce than objective acts. Involuntary servitudes are disfavored if not unconstitutional.

Here, the injunction sought is negative, which is not hard to enforce. Every time D engages in the making of noise, every neighbor would hear. As such, it would be noticed, and someone can make a complaint to the court and the court can issue contempt order. Further, since the land is in the state and city of the court, there are no jurisdictional issues and the injunction, and its enforcement is feasible.

3) property right exists

Traditionally, a protectible property right was needed. Modernly and in CA, property right is not necessary. Here, however, there is right in use and enjoyment of land property, quiet enjoyment, without the noise and vibrations. As such, this element would be satisfied.

4) balance of harms and equities

The harms and equities must be balanced, including benefit to the public. Here, the harm to public would be high because 200 people would lose their jobs. The harm to P would be high as well because on every weekend P would suffer loud noises and vibrations until 11pm, which is arguably very late and offensive to reasonable ordinary persons. The harm to D would be significant, although perhaps D can still operate during weekdays because dance performances seem not to be the issue, only rock concerts.

5) no defenses

It appears that P did not unduly delay and cause D prejudice (no laches). It also appears that P did not act in a culpable manner even if failure to inquire was a little neglectful (no unclean hands)

Conclusion

In conclusion, the analysis for permanent injunction does not appear to be one sided. As such, the court may likely refuse to grant it, as it did in the prior action by neighbors against the same D.

TROs and preliminary injunctions

The analysis for TROs and preliminary injunctions is similar to that for permanent injunctions. The major difference is that they require the necessity of maintaining status quo until a preliminary hearing can be held because of imminent harm (TRO) and until a full trial (preliminary injunction).

Here, it appears that neighbors can decide to live with the noise and vibrations. The neighbors had organized to file a lawsuit. As such, they would not merely decide to "live with it" out of shyness, since they could commiserate with each other and feel free to complain and such feelings would avalanche and not be reduced. As such, it appears that there is no imminent irreparable harm that would justify TROs and preliminary injunctions.

Further based on the analysis above on private nuisance especially, likelihood of success does not appear to be great; It might be 60% at most.

other remedies

Other remedies such as constructive trust and equitable lien do not apply and are not relevant. Permanent injunction is the only relevant one and even that is unlikely.

Q4 Evidence / Professional Responsibility

Dan is facing trial in the Superior Court of California for the murder of Victor. Dan entered into a valid retainer agreement with Attorney Anita for her to represent him. Anita met with Dan to discuss Dan's defense. In their interview, Dan claimed he had spent the entire evening when the murder occurred with his father, Frank. The next day, Anita sent an email to Dan expressing her concern that his alibi was weak. Dan replied to the email and admitted that he had lied about his alibi, but denied that he killed Victor.

Anita visited Dan's apartment and spoke with Dan's roommate, Ben, who said that Dan confided in him that he had killed Victor. Ben gave Anita a pair of Dan's pants that were covered in blood. The next day, Anita gave the prosecutor the bloody pants and the email exchange about Dan's alibi.

Anita then decided she did not want to represent Dan any longer because she was tired of his lies. Anita petitioned the court to withdraw as Dan's attorney. The court granted permission for Anita to withdraw. Frank then immediately hired another lawyer to represent Dan.

At Dan's trial, the prosecutor called Ben as a witness to testify to Dan's statement that he killed Victor. The prosecutor then called Anita to testify: (1) about Dan's statement that he had been with Frank on the night of the murder; (2) that Anita had received the bloody pants from Ben and turned them over to the prosecutor; and (3) that Ben had told Anita that Dan said he killed Victor.

1. Assume all proper objections have been made. Should the following items be admitted into evidence:

    a) Ben's testimony? Discuss.

    b) Anita's testimony regarding Dan's statement that he was with Frank the night of the murder? Discuss.

    c) Anita's testimony that she had received the bloody pants from Ben and turned them over to the prosecutor? Discuss.

    d) Anita's testimony that Ben told her that Dan said he had killed Victor? Discuss.

    Answer each according to California law.

QUESTION CONTINUES ON THE NEXT PAGE

2. What ethical violations, if any, did Attorney Anita commit by:

    a) Turning over the bloody pants to the prosecutor? Discuss.

    b) Turning over the email exchange regarding Dan's alibi to the prosecutor? Discuss.

    c) Withdrawing from representing Dan? Discuss.

    Answer each according to California and ABA authorities.

Answer A

Under Proposition 8 of the California constitution, all relevant evidence is admissible during a criminal trial, unless it is subject to an exclusion such as hearsay or privilege.

Logical relevance

For any evidence to be admissible, it must be logically relevant. Evidence is logically relevant when it makes the existence of any fact of consequence more or less likely to be true. In California, the fact of consequence must also be in dispute.

Legal relevance

Evidence is legally relevant when the probative value of the evidence exceeds the risk of undue prejudice, confusing the jury, or unnecessary delay.

1. (a) Ben's testimony

Logical Relevance

See rule above.

Ben's (B's) testimony is logically relevant. B is able to testify that D admitted to killing Viktor (V). That is a fact at issue and of consequence, and highly relevant to this case.

See rule above.

B's testimony is also legally relevant. D's statement has substantial probative value. It wouldn't confuse the jury or cause undue delay. And while it would be prejudicial to D's case, it would not be unduly prejudicial, as the requirement of legal relevance does not prohibit any evidence that may show guilt.

Witness Competency

In order for witnesses to testify as to a certain topic, they must have personal knowledge of the facts they are speaking to, and a present recollection of the events. They must also take an oath to tell the truth and be able to present their testimony in a way that is helpful to the trier of fact.

Here, B is competent to give this testimony. It is based on his personal knowledge of his conversation with D, and he is able to presently recall it.

Accordingly, because his testimony is relevant and he is a competent witness, he was property allowed to testify.

Hearsay

However, the issue is whether D's statement that Ben is testifying to is hearsay. Hearsay is an out of court statement offered for the truth of the matter asserted. Hearsay is not admissible, because the party is offered against is not able to impeach the witness or make issue of the declarant's credibility.

Here, D's statement is hearsay. It was told to B out of court, and it is being offered by the prosecutor as evidence that D killed V. Accordingly, it is inadmissible as hearsay. However, there are exceptions and exclusions to the hearsay rule. If one exists, the statement can still be offered into evidence.

Party admission

A party admission is an exclusion from hearsay. It exists when the opposing party has offered the statement out of court, and it is an admission of a relevant fact.

Here, the statement is being offered into evidence by the prosecution, so D is the opposing party. Additionally, this constitutes an admission of the most important fact of all - that D killed V. Accordingly, D's statement could be offered into evidence as a party admission.

Statement against interest

D's statement could also possibly be offered as a statement against interest. In order for this exception to apply, the defendant must make a statement that is against their proprietary, pecuniary, penal, or social interest, and they are aware it is against their interest when it is offered.

Here, this statement is clearly against D's penal interest. By admitting to a murder, he could be charged and sent to prison. This is also a fact that any reasonable person would be aware of.

However, in order for this exception to apply, the declarant must be unavailable. A declarant is unavailable when they are dead or sick, when they refused to testify, or when they assert a privilege, among other reasons. Here, it is possible that D, as the defendant in this case, will assert his right not to testify. If he were to do so, this exception would also be available.

In conclusion, this testimony was properly admitted as a party admission, and may also be proper as a statement against interest if D choose not to testify.

(b) Anita's testimony regarding Dan's statement.

Logical Relevance

See rule above.

Anita's (A) testimony is logically relevant because it speaks to D's possible alibi. Whether or not D was with Frank is a fact of consequence, and one that it is in dispute.

Legal Relevance

See rule above.

Her testimony is also legally relevant. Information concerning D's alibi has substantial probative value and outweighs any of the other factors discussed above.

Witness Competency

A is competent to testify to testify on this topic because it is based on her conversation with D.

Attorney/Client Privilege

The issue is whether D's statement is covered by attorney/client privilege.

Attorney client privilege prevents the disclosure of any confidential information obtained from the attorney from their client for the purpose of furthering the representation. The privilege is held by the client, and only the client can choose to waive it, not the attorney. In California, the privilege lasts until the client's will has been probated after their death.

Here, D's statement to A was made during the representation. D and A entered into a valid retainer, and then the two of them met to discuss the case and provide A with the facts. The statement was provided as D's alibi, and while he later admitted that the statement was false it was still made as part of the representation and in furtherance thereof.

Hearsay

Additionally, the statement may be objected to as hearsay. However, it would not be provided into evidence for the truth of the matter asserted because (1) the prosecutor would not want to help D establish an alibi, and (2) D later admitted it was false.

In conclusion, the statement is protected by the attorney/client privilege and should not be admitted into evidence.

(c) The bloody pants.

Logical Relevance

See rule above.

This testimony is logically evidence is relevant because it speaks to the source of important evidence.

Legal Relevance

See rule above.

This testimony is also legally relevant because it is highly probative, and outweighs the other factors discussed above.

Witness Competency

A is competent to make this testimony because it is based on her personal interaction with B, and she has a present recollection of the events.

See rule above.

D may also assert that this evidence is subject to attorney/client privilege. However, information regarding where the bloody pants came from was not communicated to A by D. The attorney client privilege only covers statements made in confidence from the client to the attorney, not statements made by third parties, and not information obtained independently from the attorney. Because A received the bloody pair of D's pants from B, no information surrounding them is subject to attorney/client privilege.

In conclusion, the testimony regarding the bloody pants should be admitted into evidence.

(d) Ben's statement that Dan had killed Victor.

Logical Relevance

See rule above.

This testimony is logically evidence is relevant because it is an important admission by D as to his guilt.

Legal Relevance

See rule above.

This testimony is also legally relevant because it is highly probative, and outweighs the other factors discussed above.

Attorney/Client Privilege

D may once again attempt to assert attorney/client privilege. However, for the reasons discussed above, statements by third parties are not covered by the privilege, only statements between attorney and client. Accordingly, this information is not subject to attorney/client privilege.

Hearsay

See rule above.

However, this statement is also hearsay, as it is being offered for the truth of the matter asserted. When there are two layers of hearsay, both of them must be admissible for the statement to be admitted into evidence. Here, D's statement to B that he killed V is hearsay, and B's statement to A that D admitted to killing V is also hearsay.

D's statement to B would be admissible for the reasons discussed above. It is a party admission, and potentially a statement against interest.

However, Ben's statement does not fit into any hearsay exception. Because the hearsay rules require that all levels of hearsay have an exception, this statement should not be admitted.

In conclusion, B's statement to A regarding Dan's admission should not be admitted.

2. Anita's ethical violations.

(a) Turning over the bloody pants.

Duty of confidentiality

A may have violated her duty of confidentiality to D under the ABA and California rules of professional conduct. An attorney owes their client a duty of confidentiality. All confidential info obtained by an attorney in the course of representation must not be disclosed to third parties, and only used for their client's benefit. This duty is broader than the attorney/client privilege, as it prevents all disclosures not just testimony.
Here, that duty covers all confidential information A obtained about D during their representation. However, the duty of confidentiality does not extend to the fruits of a crime.

Fruits of a crime

If an attorney comes into possession of the fruits of a crime, that information cannot be protected by the duty of confidentiality. It must be turned over to the authorities. If a client informs their attorney where evidence of their crimes is located, the attorney is under no obligation to retrieve it. If they do, they must turn it in. However, an attorney is allowed to hold an item of evidence for a reasonable period of time in order to inspect it as part of building their client's case. Additionally, the attorney cannot disclose the source of the evidence when turning it over.
Here, A was under an obligation to turn in the bloody pants and did not violate her duty of confidentiality by doing so. However, if she was to disclose any information regarding where the evidence came from, that would have been a violation. Though that does not appear to have occurred based on the facts presented.

Accordingly, A did not violate an ethical obligation by turning in the bloody pants.

(b) Turning over the email

See rule above.

However, A did commit a breach of her duty of confidentiality by turning over the emails from D. That information was protected by the duty of confidentiality, and A was under no requirement to turn that information over.

By disclosing this email, she breached her duty to D.

Duty of competence

A also may have breached her duty of competence. An attorney owes a duty to their clients to use their skill, knowledge, thoroughness, and preparation solely for their client's benefit. They must act prudently and diligently in their client's best interest.

By turning over an email admitting he lied about his alibi, A has violated that duty. A reasonably prudent attorney would not turn over confidential information regarding their client’s case and alibi.

If D has insisted on testifying at trial that he had this alibi when A knew it was not true, she would have ethical obligations to dissuade him from testifying, to seek to withdraw if D insisted on offering false testimony, and to only allow him to testify in a narrative fashion if she could not withdraw. However, this was far before that point

Accordingly, A also breached her duty of competence owed to D.

In conclusion, by turning over the email, A breached her duty of confidentiality and duty of competence.

(c) Withdrawing from representation.

Mandatory withdrawal

An attorney is required to withdraw when (1) they are terminated, (2) when their representation of the client violates the law or ethics rules (such as in the case of a conflict), (3) when a mental or physical condition prevents the attorney from undertaking effective representation, and (4) where the client's course of conduct requires the attorney to participate in or assist with a crime or fraud.

Here, A has not been terminated, there is no violation of law or ethics rules, she has no mental or physical condition preventing her from representing D, and D has not asked her to participate in a crime or fraud. Accordingly, there are no rules mandating that she withdraw.

However, there are also grounds that exists for permissive withdrawal.

Permissive withdrawal

Under the ABA, an attorney is permitted to withdraw if they can do so without prejudicing their client's case. This rule does not exist under the California ethics rules. Under both sets of rules, an attorney can also withdraw if the client insists on a course of action the lawyer disagrees with or considers repugnant, if the client has misused the client's services in the past, or if the client has not performed their duties (such as the payment of fees).

The most likely reason for withdrawal that A could argue is that D is insisting on a course of conduct that she disagrees with or considers repugnant. If she believes based on the evidence that D is guilty, and is lying about his innocence, that may be sufficient grounds. As the court has allowed her to withdraw from this case, it appears that they

However, A is required to give D notice prior to withdrawal. It does not appear that she has done so. By not providing him notice, there is a risk that her withdrawal has prejudiced his case.

Additionally, A is required to return any portion of an unused fee that D has paid and return his files promptly. The facts don't appear to indicate that she has done this either.

In conclusion, A has violated a duty to D by improperly withdrawing.

Answer B

Ben's Testimony

Relevance

In order to be admissible, evidence must be both legally and logically relevant. Under the CEC, evidence is logically relevant if it tends to prove or disprove any fact in dispute related to the matter. However, judges have broad discretion to exclude logically relevant evidence if it is not legally relevant. Evidence is legally relevant if its probative value is not substantially outweighed by other factors such as unfair prejudice, waste of time, delay, unnecessarily cumulative evidence, or confusing the jury. Under Proposition 8, all relevant evidence is admissible in a criminal trial, subject to some exceptions such as hearsay and privilege rules.

Ben's testimony is logically relevant, since it tends to prove a fact in dispute (that Dan killed Victor). It is also legally relevant since its probative value is not substantially outweighed by unfair prejudice or other issues. Prop 8 will not apply because the statement is hearsay.

Hearsay

Hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Hearsay is inadmissible unless an exception applies. Here, Dan's statement that he killed Victor is an out-of-court statement that is being offered to prove that Dan killed Victor (the truth of the matter asserted). Thus, the statement is hearsay and will be inadmissible unless an exception applies.

Statement by Party Opponent

A statement made by a party to a proceeding will be admitted even though it is hearsay if it is offered by the party's opponent. Here, the hearsay declarant is Dan, who is a party to the proceeding. The statement is being offered by his opponent, the prosecution. Thus, the statement qualifies as a statement by a party opponent and will be admissible.

Statement Against Interest

A statement against interest is a statement that was against the penal, financial, or social interest of the declarant when it was made. In order to be admissible as an exception to hearsay, the declarant must be unavailable to testify. A declarant is unavailable to testify if they have a total loss of memory, are dead, or are unreachable by subpoena. Here, Dan's statement that he killed Victor was against his penal interest, since confessing to murder can get you arrested and sent to prison. However, if Dan is testifying in his own defense, then he is available, and the exception will not be available. If Dan is not testifying in his own defense (as is his right as a criminal defendant), then he will be considered unavailable, and the statement may come in under this exception. Regardless, the statement will be admitted under the "statement by party opponent" exception.

Conclusion:

Ben's testimony is admissible.

Anita's Testimony: Dan's Statement

Relevance

Anita's testimony about Dan's statement that he was with Frank the night of the murder is logically relevant, as it tends to make it less likely that Dan killed Victor. Additionally, depending on how the prosecutor tries to use it, it may be relevant as impeachment evidence. However, it may not be legally relevant. Since Anita used to be Dan's attorney, having her testify against him may hold undue influence with the jury, and create unfair prejudice that substantially outweighs the probative value of her evidence. Thus, the evidence may not be legally relevant.

Privilege

Even if the evidence is logically and legally relevant, it is protected by the attorney-client privilege. Attorney-client privilege is an evidentiary privilege held by the client, whereby an attorney may not disclose anything a client told her in confidence in the course of seeking legal services. Here, Dan clearly told her that he was with Frank in confidence, as they met (apparently alone) in order to discuss his case. Additionally, Dan told Anita this while seeking legal services, since they were discussing Dan's defense. Thus, Anita violated the attorney-client privilege by testifying against Dan without his waiver of the privilege. Under the CEC, the attorney may only violate the privilege in limited circumstances. For instance, the attorney may violate the privilege to prevent a crime that would result in substantial bodily harm or death to another. Here, the crime has already occurred, so Anita's testimony does not fall within the exception.

Prop 8 does not overcome attorney-client privilege.

Hearsay

Dan's statement to Anita does not qualify as hearsay, because it is not being offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted (that Dan was with Frank). Rather, it is either being offered for impeachment purposes (to show that Dan was lying), or for some other purpose. However, the testimony was still improperly admitted as it violated the attorney-client privilege.

Impeachment

If this statement is being offered for impeachment purposes, it is also improperly admitted, as it is not permissible to impeach a witness by prior inconsistent statement (in this case, Dan) who has yet to testify (and thus, there is nothing that his prior statement could be inconsistent with). It is also improper to impeach a witness by prior inconsistent statement if that witness is not given a chance to explain the inconsistency (which Dan will not get if he is asserting his Fifth Amendment right not to testify).

Character Evidence

If this statement is being offered to show Dan's character for dishonesty, it was also improperly admitted. In a criminal trial, character evidence is only admissible about traits pertinent to the crime charged and is only admissible once the defendant has opened the door. Here, Dan has not opened the door, and honesty is not a pertinent trait in a murder trial. Thus, this would be improperly admitted character evidence.

Anita's Testimony: Bloody Pants

Relevance

Anita's testimony about the bloody pants is logically relevant, since the fact that Dan had bloody pants tends to make it more likely that he killed Victor. Additionally, Anita's testimony can be used to authenticate the pants. There is the same legal relevance issue as before, where the fact that Anita was formerly Dan's attorney might create unfair prejudice sufficient to outweigh the probative value of the testimony. Thus, this testimony likely should not be admitted unless Prop 8 overcomes this issue.

Privilege

Receiving Dan's pants from Ben would not qualify as privileged information, since it was not a statement made by Dan for the purpose of obtaining legal services. Thus, the attorney-client privilege does not apply.

Personal Knowledge

A witness must have personal knowledge about the matter of which they are testifying. Anita knows that she received the bloody pants from Ben and turned them over to the prosecutor. Thus, she had personal knowledge sufficient for this requirement.

Conclusion

The testimony about receiving Ben's pants was improperly admitted unless Prop 8 allows the evidence in despite the legal relevance issue.

Anita's Testimony: Ben's Statement

Relevance

Anita's testimony about Ben's statement is logically relevant because Dan's statement that he killed Victor tends to make that fact more likely. Anita's testimony still has the same legal relevance issue related to her being Dan's prior attorney. However, other than that the probative value is not outweighed by unfair prejudice, and so the evidence is legally relevant.

Personal Knowledge

There is no personal knowledge problem, because Anita is testifying about what Ben told her Dan said, rather than testifying that she heard Dan said something to someone.

Hearsay within Hearsay

Anita's testimony contains two levels of hearsay: the outer hearsay is Ben's statement, and the inner hearsay is Dan's statement. Where there are multiple levels of hearsay, each level must be admissible under an exception in order for the entire statement to be admissible.

Dan's Statement (Inner Hearsay)

Dan's statement is hearsay because it is being offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted (that Dan killed Victor). As discussed above, this is likely admissible as the admission of a party opponent.

Ben's Statement (Outer Hearsay)

Ben's statement is hearsay because it is being offered to prove that Dan said he killed Victor. This is hearsay not admissible under any exception. It is not the statement of a party opponent since Ben is not a party. It also was likely not an excited utterance to Anita, as there is no indication that Ben was under the stress of a stressful event when he made it. Thus, because the outer hearsay is inadmissible, the entire statement was improperly admitted. Prop 8 cannot overcome hearsay issues.

Privilege

Attorney-client privilege does not apply to this statement, since Ben was not Anita's client and Dan's statement was not made directly to Anita (because it was made to a third party, it was not confidential).

Ethical Violations: Turning over Pants

Duty of Candor/Duty of Fairness to Opposing Counsel

Attorneys have an obligation of candor to the tribunal and a duty of fairness to opposing counsel. This duty prohibits them from concealing evidence. While Anita likely should have refused to take the bloody pants in the first place, it was likely not an ethical violation for her to turn them over to the prosecutor once she had them.

Ethical Violations: Turning over Email Exchange

Duty of Loyalty

Lawyers have a duty of loyalty to their clients. Anita violated this duty when she turned over the email exchange about Dan's alibi to the prosecutor, since a defendant in a criminal case could reasonably expect his attorney not to help the prosecution in ways not required by law or the ethical rules. Thus, this constituted a violation of the duty of loyalty.

Duty of Confidentiality

Under both the ABA and California rules, lawyers have a strict duty of confidentiality to their clients. This prohibits lawyers from revealing any information they learn related to their client's case that is not known to the general public. This rule is broader than the attorney-client privilege; the California rule is much stricter than the corresponding ABA rule.

Under the ABA rule, a lawyer may break the duty of confidentiality if it is necessary to prevent a crime, substantial bodily harm or death, or mitigate financial loss if the lawyer's services were used in connection with that financial loss. Additionally, if the lawyer's services were used or are currently being used to perpetrate a crime or fraud, the lawyer may break confidentiality to mitigate the harm. Under the California rules, confidentiality may only be broken in order to prevent a crime that is likely to result in substantial bodily harm or death.

Here, the breach of confidentiality was not permissible under either the ABA or California rules. Turning over the email exchange did not prevent or mitigate the harm from any crime or activity in which the lawyer's services were used. Anita might try to argue that Dan was attempting to use her services to lie to the court by lying about his alibi. However, there is no indication that Dan was going to lie on the stand at trial, as he admitted his alibi was false. Additionally, even if he was planning on lying on the stand, Anita had a duty to try to mitigate by attempting to persuade him not to lie. If he insisted on lying on the stand, Anita would have been allowed to withdraw (under the ABA rules), or simply allow him to testify without engaging (the narrative approach, under the California rules). However, Anita did not attempt to dissuade Dan from lying, if that was even his intention in the first place. Thus, Anita violated her duty.

Duty to Communicate

Lawyers have a duty to communicate with their clients. By not telling Dan that she was turning the email exchange over to the prosecutor, Anita likely violated her duty to communicate with Dan and keep him appraised of her actions related to the case.

Ethical Violations: Withdrawal

Duty to the Profession

Lawyers have a duty to the profession that discourages them from withdrawing from the representation of clients simply because they are guilty, especially criminal defendants. Anita likely violated this duty by her withdrawal.

Permissive Withdrawal

Under the California rules, a lawyer is allowed to withdraw from representation if the client is making the representation unreasonably difficult. Here, the fact that Dan lied once about his alibi is probably not enough to meet the standard of "unreasonably difficult". It sounds like she has only had one conversation and one email exchange with him and did not even try to see if he had a different alibi. Additionally, just the fact that a client is guilty is not "unreasonably difficult". Thus, Anita likely violated her duty under the California rules by withdrawing when it was not permitted.

Under the ABA rules, an attorney may withdraw if it will not result in unfair prejudice to the client. Here, the trial had not started, and Frank was immediately able to hire another lawyer for Dan. Thus, it is unlikely that there was unfair prejudice, and Anita did not breach her duty under the ABA rules. The ABA rules also permit withdrawal if a client's view is repugnant to the lawyer, which Anita can argue that Dan's views are.

Mandatory Withdrawal

Mandatory withdrawal under the ABA and California rules arises when a client is insisting on a course of conduct that would violate the law or ethical rules, or if the client insists on a course of conduct solely to harass another person (California only), or if the lawyer's mental or physical condition make it impossible to continue. None of these exceptions apply, so Anita is not covered by mandatory withdrawal.

Q5 Business Associations / Remedies

Arnold and Betty agreed to launch a business selling a durable paint that Arnold had developed and patented. They agreed to share all profits and to act as equal owners. Betty agreed to contribute $100,000 to the business venture. Arnold agreed to contribute his patent for durable paint. Arnold told Betty that he thought the patent was worth $100,000. He did not tell Betty that he had previously tried to sell the patent to several reputable paint companies but was never offered more than $50,000. Arnold and Betty agreed that Betty would be responsible for market research and marketing and Arnold would be responsible for incorporating the business and taking care of any other steps needed to start the enterprise.

Arnold first located a building within which to operate the business, owned by Landlord Co., and entered into a one-year lease in the name of Durable Paint, Inc. Subsequently, after Arnold took the necessary steps, Durable Paint, Inc. was incorporated. At the corporation's first board of directors meeting, Arnold and Betty were named as sole directors and officers. During that meeting, Arnold and Betty voted for the corporation to assume all rights and liabilities for the lease and to accept assignment of Arnold's patent rights.

Over the next six months, Durable Paint, Inc. faced unforeseen and costly manufacturing and supply problems. At the end of the first six months, the corporation had exhausted all its capital and was two months behind on rent. To make matters worse, a competitor developed a far superior product, making Durable Paint, Inc.'s patent effectively worthless. Durable Paint, Inc. had no other assets.

Landlord Co. sued Arnold and Betty personally for damages for breach of the lease.

Betty sued Arnold.

1. On what theory or theories might Arnold be found personally liable for damages to Landlord Co.? Discuss.

2. On what theory or theories might Betty be found personally liable for damages to Landlord Co.? Discuss.

3. On what theory or theories might Arnold be found personally liable for damages to Betty? Discuss.

Answer A

Arnold's Liability

There are multiple theories under which Landlord Co. can try to hold Arnold personally liable.

Corporation Formation - when did Arnold and Betty form a corporation?

De Jure Corporation

A corporation is a business entity which is separate from its legal owners (shareholders). This means that the shareholders of the business are not personally liable for the obligations and liabilities of the business. They are only liable to the extent of their investment (and for their own torts). In order to form a corporation (known as a de jure corporation if properly formed), articles of incorporation must be filed with the secretary of state following certain required procedures and including certain information.

Here, Arnold did not take the necessary steps to form Durable Paint, Inc. until after entering into the lease with Landlord Co. Accordingly, a de jure corporation was not formed when Arnold entered into the lease.

De Facto Corporation

If a corporation is not properly performed, the corporation still may be treated as a corporation for purposes of personal liability of its shareholders if there is a corporation formation statute, there is a good faith attempt to comply with the statute, and the corporation acts as if it is a corporation. In this situation, the incorporator must not know that it failed to form a corporation.

Here, Arnold did not form the corporation or attempt to form the corporation until after the corporation entered into the one-year lease with durable Paint, Inc. Accordingly, Betty and Arnold cannot take advantage of the de facto corporation doctrine.

Promotor Liability

Promoter liability concerns a situation in which an individual enters into contracts on behalf of a corporation before the corporation is formed. In this scenario, the promoter is liable on the contract unless there is a later novation (between the corporation, third party and promoter) or the contract states that the promoter is not liable, in which case it is treated as a revocable offer for the corporation. The corporation is only liable on the contract if the corporation adopts the contract.

Here, while the corporation arguably adopted the contract, the facts do not state that there was a novation of Arnold or that the lease stated that Arnold was not liable for the lease. Accordingly, Arnold will be found personally liable on the lease as a promoter. The corporation, Landlord co. and the promoter would have been required to adopt a novation in order to release Arnold from the contract or the lease would have had to state that Arnold was not liable. Thus, Arnold will be found liable on the lease under the promoter theory (unless he is successful on his claim for corporation by estoppel).

Corporation by estoppel is another doctrine which allows an entity that is not a corporation to be treated as a corporation for purposes of personal liability. This has been abolished in most states, but if applicable, it is applied when the entity has been treated as a corporation by a third party. In this scenario, the third party is estopped from arguing that the corporation is not a corporation. This applies in contract actions, but not in tort actions (because tort plaintiffs do not voluntarily enter into torts). This can also prevent the incorporator from stating that the corporation was not formed as well. Here, Arnold entered into a one-year lease with Landlord Co. in the name of "Durable Paint, Inc.". Accordingly, Arnold held out the tenant of the lease as being a properly informed corporation. Thus, Arnold can argue that Landlord Co. had the opportunity to investigate Durable Paint, Inc. and see that it was not incorporated. If Arnold is successful in having the court apply this doctrine, Landlord Co. will be estopped from arguing that Durable Paint Inc. is not a corporation because it treated Durable Paint, Inc. as a corporation, in which case both Arnold and Betty would not be personally liable (unless Landlord Co. is successful in piercing the corporation veil, discussed below). However, since Arnold never tried to incorporate the entity before signing the lease, the court may be reluctant to assert this doctrine.

Betty's Liability

Partnership

Formation - did Arnold and Betty enter into a partnership before incorporating the business?

A partnership is an association of two or more persons to carry on a business for profits. Intent to carry on a business for profit is required, but intent to form a partnership is not. Sharing profits establishes a presumption that a business is a partnership. Equal management rights further add to such presumption. No formalities are required and there need be no written partnership agreement. A partnership is a separate entity from its partners; however, the partners are jointly and severally liable for all obligations and liabilities of the partnership. However, a person that is seeking remedies from the partnership must first extinguish all partnership assets before attempting to recover from the partners personally.

Here, before the business was incorporated as a corporation, Arnold and Betty agreed to launch a business selling durable paint that Arnold had developed and patented. They agreed to share all profits and act as equal owners. This created a presumption that they intended to carry on a business for profit. Accordingly, before Arnold and Betty entered into a corporation, they entered into a partnership. The fact that they "called" the partnership "Durable Paint, Inc." is irrelevant for purposes of establishing a partnership. Thus, Arnold and Betty were both personally liable for all obligations of the partnership Authority - is the partnership liable for the lease?

A partner is an agent for the partnership and has the actual and apparent authority to enter into all ordinary business transactions on behalf of the partnership. Actual authority is authority the partner reasonably believes she has from the written partnership agreement or agreement of the partners. Apparent authority is authority a third party reasonably believes the third party has based on the manifestations of the principal. A partnership is liable for obligations and liabilities entered into by a partner acting with authority. Accordingly, the partners are personally liable for all such obligations and liabilities as well (see rules above).

Here, Betty and Arnold agreed that Betty would be responsible for market research and marketing and Arnold would be responsible for incorporating the business and "taking care of any other steps needed to start the enterprise." Accordingly, Betty had actual authority to conduct market research and market the business and Arnold had actual authority to incorporate the business and take care of its other startup needs. Betty will argue that entering into a one-year lease is not a step need to start the enterprise and that, therefore, Arnold had no actual authority to enter into the lease and that the partnership was therefore not liable on the lease. Landlord co. will argue that entering into a one-year (short-term) lease is a normal step needed to start an enterprise for developing paint. Landlord co. is likely to succeed on this point. As to apparent authority, entering into a one-year office lease is the type of ordinary business transaction that a third could reasonably think that a partner was entering into on behalf of the partnership. Accordingly, under either an actual authority or apparent authority theory, Arnold likely had authority to bind the partnership to the lease.

Therefore, Betty would be personally liable for the obligations of the partnership - i.e., the entering into of the lease. However, Landlord co. would first have to exhaust partnership assets (and the assets are apparently already exhausted).

Betty will argue she is not liable on the lease because the partnership turned into a corporation. While the partnership was dissolved when it turned into a corporation, the lease was entered into while the business was still a partnership. She may be able to argue that the liability (failure to make payments) was not incurred until the partnership was a corporation. If this is the argument, Landlord. Co. can attempt to proceed on a piercing the corporate veil theory.

Corporation's Adoption of the Contract

As discussed above, a corporation can assume a contract entered into by a promoter by adopting the contract after formation. In order for a corporation to adopt a contract, the directors, who are in charge of the management of the corporation, must vote by a majority to adopt the contract.

Here, the facts state that Arnold and Betty assumed all rights and liabilities for the lease. Arnold and Betty were named as the sole directors, and they both voted to adopt the contract. Accordingly, the corporation validly adopted the contract.

Piercing the Corporate Veil

As discussed above, shareholders of a corporation are not ordinarily liable for the obligations of the corporation. However, they may be held liable when the court pierces the corporate veil to prevent fraud and abuse. This will occur (i) when the corporation does not observe corporate formalities (alter-ego theory), (ii) the corporation was undercapitalized, or (iii) to prevent a fraud.

Here, Landlord co. will argue the corporation was undercapitalized as Betty only contributed $100,000 and Arnold contributed his patent. Landlord co. will argue that clearly the corporation was undercapitalized because it could not make payments on a one-year lease or take care of its startup costs. However, $100,000 is not a minor amount, and the facts suggest that the manufacturing and supply problems were unforeseen. However, six months is a very fast amount of time to lose $100,000. Further, the rent may have been expensive if the lease was for manufacturing space. If the lease was for office space, the rent would be cheaper, and the capitalization amount may have been reasonable. Ultimately, this is a question for the court, but Betty is likely to succeed on this point. There are no facts to suggest corporate formalities were not formed as the corporation held a board of director's meeting where the directors were named, and no corporate funds are implied to have been used for private use. Further, there is no evidence of fraud.

Accordingly, Landlord Co. is probably unlikely to succeed on a claim for piercing the corporate veil unless it can prove undercapitalization.

Arnold v. Betty

Contribution - Partnership

When a partner is held personally liable for an obligation of the partnership, such a partner may be entitled to sue the partner who is actually responsible for such liability for contribution if they violated an obligation to the partnership. Further, a partner is a fiduciary to the partnership and partners and owes a duty of care to act in the best interest of the partnership and with reasonable care.

Here, as discussed above, Betty may be found personally liable to Landlord Co. for damages for the unpaid rent. However, as discussed above, Arnold entered into the partnership lease with Landlord Co. However, he did so with authority of the partnership. Accordingly, Betty will probably not succeed against Arnold in an action for damages based on contribution under a partnership theory.

Betty can argue that Arnold breached his duty of care in failing to form the corporation before entering into the relationship with Landlord and in failing to properly "capitalize" the corporation with a patent. However, Arnold will argue that it was Betty's job to conduct market research, not Arnold, and she should have known about the competitor. She will likely not succeed on this argument, but she may succeed in arguing that Arnold failed to properly form the corporation since he violated his duty of care in doing so and thereby injured the partnership.

Fraudulent Misrepresentation

A person may be found liable for fraud when they make a material misstatement of past or present fact upon which a reasonable person would rely and upon which the person does, in fact, rely to their detriment.

Here, Arnold agreed to contribute his patent for durable paint to the partnership. He told Betty that he thought the patent was worth $100,000. However, he did not tell Betty that he had previously tried to sell the patent to several reputable paint companies but was never offered more than $50,000. Accordingly, at worst, he had no reasonable basis to believe the paint was worth $50,000, and at best, he failed to disclose a material fact. It is likely that Betty agreed to enter into the partnership and corporation with Arnold due to an equal share of investment and that this induced her to enter into such business. She then lost her investment and was held personally liable for an obligation of the business. Accordingly, she may be able to succeed against Arnold on a theory of fraudulent misrepresentation for his nondisclosure regarding the true worth of the patent.

Duty of Care - Corporation

A director owes a corporation the duty of care. Betty can sue Arnold on a derivative claim for violation of the duty of care in mismanagement of the corporation in causing it to financially exhaust its resources, but the damages would go to the corporation, and not to Betty. Further, Arnold can rely on the business judgment rule, which defers to the judgment of the directors so long as they act reasonably and in good faith without a conflict of interest.

Answer B

ANSWER TO Q5

I. Arnold's Liability to Landlord Co.

A. Partnership Liability

The issue is whether Arnold can be held personally liable as a partner of Durable Paint, Inc.

i. Formation

The issue is whether Arnold and Betty formed a valid partnership.

A partnership is the carrying on of a business for profit by two or persons as co-owners. There are three types of partnerships: general partnerships, limited partnerships, and limited liability partnerships. There are no formalities necessary to create a general partnership. A general partnership will be presumed where two parties share the profits of a business venture. The parties' subjective intentions are irrelevant when considering whether a partnership was formed. Where a partnership is formed, the partnership agreement will generally control the rights and liabilities of the partners, but where the agreement is silent, the provisions of the Uniform Partnership Act will control.

Here, Arnold and betty agreed to launch a business selling a durable paint that Arnold had developed and patented. Thus, they entered into an agreement to carry on a business for profit. Moreover, Arnold and Betty agreed to share all profits and act as equal owners in the partnership. Even though Betty contributed $100,000 as a capital investment and Arnold only contributed a patent worth $50,000, the two will likely be considered to have entered into a general partnership where Betty would be responsible for market research and marketing and Arnold would be responsible for incorporating the business and taking care of other steps to start the enterprise. They did not enter into a limited partnership or limited liability partnership, because each require filing for certification with the secretary of state.

Thus, Arnold and Betty were each general partners of a valid general partnership.

ii. The Partnership's Liability on the Lease Contract

The issue is whether the partnership is liable on the contract entered into with Landlord Co., and if so, whether Arnold can be found personally liable.

A general partner is considered an agent of the partnership when acting in the ordinary course of business. An agent has authority to bind the principal where they have been given express authorization to do so. They have implied authority to do what is necessary to carry out their responsibilities. If the agent has authority to enter into a contract, either express or implied, the principal will be bound by the agreement. The agent will not be personally liable unless they did not disclose the identity of the agent.

Here, Arnold was an agent of the partnership and thus could act as its agent. The partners expressly agreed that he would be responsible for incorporating the business, but also in taking care of any other steps needed to start the enterprise. Arnold entered into a lease with for a building in which the Arnold and Betty would operate the business. Entering into the lease would be considered a "step needed" to start he enterprise, and thus Arnold was acting according to his actual express authority when he agreed to the lease. Because Arnold is a general partner of the partnership and acted under his authority to bind the partnership, the contract is binding on the partnership. Moreover, Arnold disclosed that he was entering into the lease on behalf of the partnership, which he named Durable Paint, Inc. Thus, Arnold is not personally liable for the contract.

iii. Arnold's Liability as a General Partner

The issue is whether Arnold, as a general partner, is liable for the contracts.

General partners not in a limited liability partnership are personally liable for the obligations of the partnership. The general partners are jointly and severally liable and can seek contribution from any partners who do not pay their share. Absent any agreement otherwise, the partners are liable in the same proportions as they share in profits.

After six months, Durable Paint, Inc. breached the lease agreement. Arnold, as a general partner, would be personally liable for the breach by the partnership. However, though he is jointly and severally responsible to Landlord Co., the obligations of the partnership must be split equally between himself and Betty - which is the proportion in which they split profits. It is of no consequence that they contributed different amounts of capital investment. Thus, he can seek contribution from Betty for half of the debt.

B. Corporate Liability

The issue is whether Durable Paint, Inc. can be liable for the agreement.

Promoters are those who take the preliminary steps to set up a corporation and incorporate it. Promoters are not agents of the to-be corporation, and thus have no power to bind it in a contract. However, once incorporated, the corporation can adopt the agreement either expressly or impliedly. Adoption can be by a valid resolution of the board of directors, which requires a quorum (meaning a majority of directors must be present) and a majority of the quorum must approve the resolution. If they do so, both the corporation and the promoter are personally liable on the contract. If the corporation instead executes a valid novation, replacing the promoter with itself on the contract, the promoter is no longer liable.

Here, Arnold entered into a lease with Landlord Co. on behalf of Durable Paint, Inc. At the time, Durable Paint Inc. was not yet a corporation because it had not yet been incorporated. Because Arnold was taking preliminary steps to incorporate it and set up the enterprise, he would be considered a promoter at the time he entered the lease. Thus, as a promoter, he was personally liable on the contract. However, the board, consisting of Arnold and Betty, then voted to "assume all rights and liabilities for the lease." The vote was unanimous and with all the directors present, and thus they had a quorum, and the resolution was approved by a majority of the quorum. Thus, the corporation expressly adopted the contract. It did not, however, execute a novation, as it didn't enter into an agreement with Landlord Co. to relieve Arnold of his liability. Accordingly, both Arnold, as a promoter, and Durable Paint, Inc., by adoption, are liable on the contract.

Moreover, even if the adoption was invalid, the corporation would be estopped from denying liability. Under the doctrine of corporation by estoppel, an entity that enters a contract that was not yet properly incorporated will be stopped from asserting that as a defense to contractual liability where it would be unjust to the other party to do so. Here, Arnold entered into the contract and listed Durable Paint, Inc. as the lessee. The corporation will be estopped from asserting as a defense that the corporation was not yet an incorporation to avoid liability.

C. Piercing the Veil

The issue is whether Arnold can be held personally liable for the obligations of Durable

Paint, Inc., as a corporation.

Generally, shareholders and directors cannot be held personally liable for the obligations of the corporation. However, if necessary to avoid a substantial injustice, the court can pierce the corporate veil and attach personal liability to shareholder where (1) corporate formalities are not observed, (2) the corporation is undercapitalized, and (3) the corporation is nothing but an alter ego of the shareholders.

Here, Arnold is presumably a shareholder of the corporation as well as an officer and director. Though he would generally not be personally liable for the corporation's obligations, the court may be able to pierce the veil. The corporation exhausted all its capital in only six months and was thus likely undercapitalized. Moreover, the sole directors and officers of the corporation were Arnold and Betty, who are also presumably the shareholders. Thus, Durable Paint, Inc. is likely considered merely an alter ego of Arnold and Betty. Even though it’s unclear to what extent Arnold and Betty did not observe corporate formalities, the court will likely find that it can pierce the veil and attach personal liability for the corporation's obligations to Arnold. This especially true considering that the corporation no longer had any capital, had no assets, and the patent rights that it was assigned for Arthur's patent effectively became worthless, and thus Landlord Co. likely could not recover anything from the corporation and would be without remedy for the breach.

Thus, Arnold will be personally liable for the obligations of the corporation.

II. Betty's Liability to Landlord Co.

The issue is whether Betty can be found personally liable to Landlord Co. for breach of the lease.

A. Partnership Liability

The rules regarding partnerships are set forth above.

Just like Arnold, Betty was a general partner in the partnership that was formed prior to the incorporation. Thus, as a general partner, she is liable on the contract, as it was entered into while the enterprise was a partnership under the authority of the partnership.

Accordingly, like Arnold, Betty can be held personally liable for the debts of the partnership, which had no assets by which Landlord Co. could recover at the time of the breach.

B. Shareholder Liability

The rules regarding corporations and shareholder liability are set forth above.

For the reasons discussed above, like Arnold, Landlord Co. will likely be able to pierce the corporate veil to hold Betty, as a shareholder and director, personally liable for the obligation of Durable Paint, Inc.

III. Arnold's Liability to Betty

A. Duty of Care

The issue is whether Arnold is liable to Betty for breaching his fiduciary duties to the partnership and corporation.

Each general partner in a partnership owes a duty of care in how they conduct the business of the partnership, just as each director owes a duty of care to a corporation. Partners and directors must act with the reasonable care that an ordinarily prudent person would under the circumstances. As a director, this requires acting in good faith and with a reasonable belief that your actions are in the best interest of the corporation. Under the business judgment rule, a director is presumed to have acted in good faith, on an informed basis, and with an honest belief that the action is in the best interest of the corporation. If a partner or director breaches a duty, he can be liable for any damages that result from the breach.

At the inception of their enterprise, Arnold falsely told Betty that he thought his patent was worth $100,000 when it was in fact worth only $50,000. As a result, he was not required to contribute any capital investment in the enterprise, as Betty assumed that he had made a contribution equal to her $100,000 capital investment. Thus, Arnold breached his duty of care by not acting in good faith when staring the business with Betty. However, there is no indication that Arnold breached any duty in incurring the obligation to Landlord Co. that would have caused any damages to the enterprise. Nor is it clear what damages his breach caused the enterprise.

Accordingly, even though he breached a duty, he would not be personally liable to the partnership or the corporation because it is unclear what damages, if any, resulted.

B. Misrepresentation

The issue is whether Arnold can be liable to Betty for misrepresentation. Misrepresentation occurs when one knowingly makes a material representation of fact with the intent to mislead, and the other person reasonably relies on it.

It appears Arnold knowingly made a false misrepresentation to Betty regarding the worth of the patent, and he did so with the intent to induce a similar value capital contribution. Betty then reasonably relied on that misrepresentation to invest $100,000 rather than a lesser amount, which is now lost.

Thus, Betty may be able to recover for an excess she invested compared to how much she would have if she knew the patent was worth only $50,000.

Q1 Civil Procedure

Jiff, a California citizen who resides in Truckee, California, just west of Reno, Nevada, provides cleaning services. At Jiff's request, customers submit written evaluations of his services so he can monitor their satisfaction.

Jiff entered into a contract with Shearer, a Nevada citizen who operates a beauty salon in Reno, Nevada. The contract, signed in Reno, obligated Jiff to use due care in cleaning. One night while cleaning, Jiff accidentally broke an antique vase, which Shearer claimed was worth $100,000.

Shearer sued Jiff for negligence in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of California, which includes Truckee. The complaint alleged that Jiff's lack of due care caused breakage of the vase. Shearer moved to compel production of evaluations completed by Jiff's customers in the past year. The court denied the motion.

Following a trial, the jury returned a general verdict in favor of Jiff and the court entered judgment on the verdict. Shearer did not appeal.

Six months later, Shearer sued Jiff again in the same court for breach of contract. The complaint alleged that Jiff's lack of due care caused breakage of the vase.

1. Was venue properly laid in the Eastern District of California? Discuss.

2. Did the court err in denying Shearer's motion to compel? Discuss.

3. May Jiff take advantage of the judgment in the first suit in defending against the second suit? Discuss.

Answer A

Applicable Law

The United States District Court for the Eastern District of California is a federal court. Because the cause of action at issue here is a negligence claim, the district court must have subject matter jurisdiction through diversity. Here, the requirements of diversity are satisfied because Jiff and Shearer are citizens of different states with no indication that they intend to reside elsewhere (California, and Nevada, respectively) and because the amount in controversy—the value of the broken vase—is $100,000. However, when a federal court is sitting in diversity, it is necessary to determine which law applies: state law or federal law.

To determine the applicable law, the Erie Doctrine applies. Generally, federal courts apply state substantive law and federal procedural law. Here, state "substantive" law includes the negligence cause of actions, a statute of limitations, and other necessary substantive elements. Rules of venue and discovery are governed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. However, rules of preclusion (discussed below) are governed by the substantive law of the state in which the court sits. Therefore, the federal court will apply California law in determining whether preclusion applies.

1. Venue

Venue is proper (1) in any district in which a defendant resides, if all defendants reside in the same district, or (2) in the district where the events giving rise to the cause of action occurred, or where the subject matter of the action is located. If neither of these is proper, then venue may be proper in any district in which a defendant is subject to personal jurisdiction.

Defendant's Residence

Here, the defendant, Jiff, is a California citizen. Additionally, Jiff is the only defendant here. Further, the facts indicate that Jiff resides in the Eastern District of California, which includes Truckee. Therefore, because Jiff is the only defendant in this action, all of the defendants live in the same state, so venue will be proper in any district in which a defendant resides. Therefore, venue will be proper over Jiff in the Eastern District of California, because it is the district where Jiff lives.

Events Giving Rise to Cause of Action

Though venue is proper on the above ground, this ground would not be a satisfactory ground for venue: though a contract would generally give rise to venue in a district in which it was signed, the contract that governed Jiff's cleaning services was also signed in Reno. Second, Jiff was cleaning in Reno, Nevada, when he broke the vase. Accordingly, the events giving rise to the cause of action, or the area where the property is located, do not give rise to proper venue in the Eastern District of California. However, venue will be proper on the first ground, as discussed above.

Conclusion

Venue is proper, therefore, in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of California.

2. Motion to Compel

Discovery

Discovery enables parties to obtain information from one another relevant to their claims and defenses. As discussed above, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure apply to the discovery here. Before parties may properly begin discovery, they must make initial disclosures of certain information, including names of those who have information, and other necessary information to disclose. Further, parties must also confer to create a discovery schedule. Here, there is no indication that such initial disclosures were made, nor that such a process was followed. Accordingly, discovery may have been improper on the grounds of improper procedure.

Grounds for Motion to Compel

A motion to compel may be filed only upon a good faith certification by the person seeking discovery that they have either conferred or made a good-faith effort to confer with the opposing party in seeking the discovery, and the party opposing the discovery refuses to turn over the discovery regardless. Here, there is no indication that Shearer and Jiff have conferred, or that Shearer made a good faith effort to confer with Jiff. Accordingly, because the motion may not have been filed properly by Shearer, the court may have properly denied the motion to compel.

However, if this conferral and requisite procedure were properly made, then it is necessary for a court to determine if the information sought is within the scope of discovery.

Scope of Discovery

Discovery is proper for any non-privileged matter that may lead to the discovery of any relevant evidence. Relevant evidence is evidence which tends to make any fact more or less likely. However, discovery does not have to be admissible in court in order to be discoverable; so long as it is relevant, the evidence may be properly discoverable.

Here, Shearer moved to compel production of evaluations completed by Jiff's customers in the past year, and the court denied the motion. Therefore, it is necessary to determine whether these evaluations are relevant to Shearer's cause of action. The evaluations likely contain information about Jiff's cleaning services, and the extent to which the customers are satisfied with the services. They may contain good reviews, bad reviews, and history of different incidents, including breakage of items. Shearer will argue, therefore, that because his cause of action is based on Jiff using due care in cleaning, then a history of different incidents and evaluations will demonstrate whether Jiff tends to use due care, or whether he does not. Though this information would not necessarily be admissible in evidence, this is certainly relevant to Shearer's cause of action, as it would likely tend to show Jiff's pattern of behavior while cleaning, as well as any unique incidents that occurred while Jiff cleaned.

On the other hand, Jiff may argue that the evaluations are not relevant because Shearer requested all evaluations from the last year. However, Shearer will argue that a year is likely a narrow enough time period that will enable Shearer to obtain information relevant to his cause of action.

Further, Jiff may point to the fact that he requests that customers submit written evaluations. When a person operating a service business requests evaluations, it is likely that they are only requesting evaluations that will treat them favorably, meaning that such evaluations would not likely contain information about any negligence that Jiff was engaged in. Regardless, because Jiff cannot prove that the evaluations do not contain relevant information that can assist Shearer in preparing his claim or defense, the evaluations are properly within the scope of discovery.

Request for Production of Documents

A party may properly request that another party produce documents. Though it may be possible to obtain such information from non-parties through a subpoena duces tecum, a subpoena would not be necessary here because Jiff is a party to the action. Accordingly, this is a proper discovery request, because the evaluations are documents that are within the control of the other party. Though Jiff could argue that turning over the evaluations would impose too extensive a burden on him, the documents are within his control and do not appear to invade on too extensive a privacy interest, unlike the disclosure of emails between family members, for example. Accordingly, this is a valid request for the production of documents.

Conclusion

If Shearer properly filed the motion to compel after an attempt to confer with Jiff, then the motion to compel is proper here because the information requested is within the scope of discovery, and the court erred in denying the motion. However, if Shearer failed to do so, which appears to be the case given that the facts do not mention any such conferral, then the court properly denied the motion to compel.

3. Judgment in First Suit

In order for Jiff to "take advantage" of the judgment in the first suit in defending against the second suit, he must either rely on principles of claim or issue preclusion. Preclusion may either be used offensively or defensively—though certain states have different rules on the use of offensive preclusion. Here, Jiff would be using preclusion defensively in order to prevent a same claim or issue from being raised against him a second time.

Claim Preclusion (Res Judicata)

Claim preclusion prevents the same claim from being litigated multiple times, so long as it is (1) the same claim (2) between the same parties (3) that is a result of a final, valid judgment (4) on the merits.

Same Claim

To determine whether a second claim is in fact the same claim as the first, federal courts apply a "transactional" test, which requires determining whether the incident was a part of the same transaction or occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences. However, because federal courts apply the law of the state court in which they sit when in diversity, California law would apply, as discussed above. Under California law, the test is whether the claim arises out of the same "injury," which is broader than the federal test.

Here, Shearer's initial claim was against Jiff for negligence, and alleged that Jiff's lack of due care caused breakage of the vase. Six months later, Shearer sued Jiff again in the same court for breach of contract, and alleged that Jiff's lack of due care caused breakage of the vase. Shearer will argue that a breach of contract claim is different than a negligence claim, which arises out of tort, and that the underlying claims are not the same. However, under either the transaction or the injury test, the underlying claim is the same because it arises out of the same transaction and injury: the breakage of the vase and Jiff's alleged lack of due care as a result. Despite the different causes of action, the underlying claim in Shearer's second case is the same.

Therefore, this element is satisfied.

Same Parties

A claim is between the same "parties" if the actual same parties are involved, or if it involves the parties' successors in interest. Here, the claim is between the same parties, meaning because the first suit was between Shearer and Jiff, and the second suit is between Shearer and Jiff.

Therefore, this element is satisfied.

Valid, Final Judgment

In federal court, a valid final judgment is one that is the result of either a motion for summary judgment or a verdict. The judgment is final after the verdict has been rendered and there is nothing additional to perform other than entry of judgment. However, under California law, a judgment is generally not treated as final until the subsequent appeals have been exhausted. Because federal courts generally apply the preclusion law of the states in which they sit, the finality of the judgment will likely be determined by California law.

Here, however, Shearer failed to appeal the verdict. Because an appeal is generally required to be filed within 30 days after entry of judgment, Shearer's appeal will be time barred, meaning that he has exhausted the appeals process. Accordingly, Shearer's failure to appeal the verdict means that the judgment is final. Further, the judgment was rendered by a jury after a general verdict, in Jiff's favor, and the court entered judgment on the verdict.

Therefore, this element of claim preclusion is satisfied.

On the Merits

A judgment is on the merits if the court or a jury ruled on the case's substantive grounds, as opposed to dismissing the case on a procedural issue (though some procedural issues, too, may be treated as substantive, depending on the issue).

Here, the case was disposed of on substantive grounds because it occurred after a judgment by a jury through a general verdict in favor of Jiff. A general verdict means that the jury found that Jiff was not guilty. Accordingly, the case was properly decided on the merits, and the court later entered judgment.

Conclusion

Accordingly, the elements of claim preclusion are satisfied, meaning that Jiff may take advantage of the judgment in the first suit in defending against the second suit. To do so, Jiff may file a motion to dismiss on grounds of claim preclusion, or a motion for summary judgment, so long as the motion is made within 30 days after the close of discovery (though discovery would not likely occur here).

Issue Preclusion (Collateral Estoppel)

Jiff may also argue that the judgment is precluded on grounds of collateral estoppel.

Valid Final Judgment

See rule and analysis above. Because the jury returned a general verdict in favor of Jiff, and the court entered judgment on the verdict, this is a valid final judgment.

Same Issue

The same "issue" refers to the same factual or legal dispute as to a certain occurrence or transaction. Here, in the first case, Shearer's suit against Jiff alleged that Jiff did not exercise due care, which caused breakage of the vase. In the second suit, Shearer's suit was based on breach of contract, but still was based on litigating the same issue: that Jiff's lack of due care caused breakage of the vase. Therefore, because both suits deal with this same issue—whether Jiff failed to exercise due care such that there was breakage of the vase—then this element is satisfied.

Actually Litigated

To determine if the same issue was actually litigated, it is necessary to determine if the parties were able to present evidence on the issue, call witnesses, and litigate the matter. Here, the matter appears to have been actually litigated because it was the sole issue in the initial case: whether Jiff's lack of due care caused breakage of the vase. The parties would have presented evidence on the matter, called witnesses, cross-examined them, and litigated the issue.

Accordingly, the same matter was actually litigated, and this element is satisfied.

Necessarily Decided

An issue must have been necessarily decided, which means that the jury (or judge, in a bench trial) could not have ruled on some other grounds in its verdict for a party. Though this may generally be difficult to decide in the case of a jury trial with multiple issues, this is a jury trial with only one issue: whether Jiff's lack of due care caused breakage of the vase.

Therefore, in the first case, the jury would have necessarily decided whether Jiff's lack of due care caused this breakage. However, Shearer may argue that the actual underlying "issue" that they might have decided could be different, based on a narrow interpretation of "issue." Specifically, maybe the first jury ruled the way it did because of the evidence to do with causation, or maybe it did because of the evidence of Jiff's breach. Shearer would argue that because it is impossible to identify the specific ground that the jury ruled on, especially in the absence of a special verdict, it is not possible to determine that Jiff's lack of due care was "necessarily" decided.

However, Shearer's argument would be too broad: in deciding the elements of due care, the jury would have properly considered the elements of negligence, and then decided that exact issue. Accordingly, Jiff's negligence was decided in the first case, despite the different cause of action in the second case.

Therefore, this element of issue preclusion is satisfied.

Conclusion

Jiff will properly be able to take advantage of the judgment in the first suit in defending against the second suit based on grounds of claim preclusion and issue preclusion.

Answer B

Was Venue Properly Laid in the Eastern District of California?

As the below analysis will show, venue was properly laid in the Eastern District of California.

Preliminary Issues

As a preliminary matter, a venue analysis is only proper after it has been determined that there is personal jurisdiction and subject matter jurisdiction to hear the claim.

In personam personal jurisdiction is the court's ability to have jurisdiction over the people involved in the claim. Subject matter jurisdiction is the ability to render a decision on the subject matter of the dispute, in line with the delimitations on subject matter jurisdiction of federal courts covered in Article III of the Constitution.

In personam jurisdiction has three traditional bases: presence, domicile, and consent. Here, Jiff is domiciled in Truckee, where the suit was brought and therefore the court has PJ over him through domicile and PJ over Shearer through consent (plaintiff who brought the suit consents). Therefore, no analysis needs to be made under a constitutional analysis using a long arm statute (which would be contacts (minimum contacts - purposeful availment and foreseeability), relatedness (specific or general PJ), and fairness (an analysis under specific jurisdiction).

Article III federal courts have subject matter jurisdiction over federal question cases and diversity cases. Here, there is no federal question raised in the complaint of Shearer.

Federal diversity jurisdiction occurs when: the parties are citizens of different states and the cause of action is greater than $75,000. Diversity jurisdiction is the mechanism through which federal courts can hear state law claims. Diversity is present here as the claim is for $100,000 (it is a plausible amount based on the facts and a case will only fail this aspect if it is "beyond a legal certainty" that the amount in controversy is less than $75,000). Also, the plaintiff is diverse from the defendant and there is complete diversity (no plaintiff can be of the same state as any other defendant). Jiff is a California citizen. Shearer is a Nevada citizen. Finally, the Eastern District of CA can hear the state law claim for negligence.

Thus, there is both personal jurisdiction and subject matter jurisdiction and a venue analysis can proceed.

Venue Analysis

Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, venue is proper: (1) any district where any defendant resides, if all defendants are residents of the state where the district court is located; (2) where the events r*elating to the cause of action* (contract formation or tort occurrence) t*ook place;* and (3), if (1) or (2) does not apply, in any district where personal jurisdiction can be had over a defendant.

Analysis Under Defendant Resides - Prong 1

In this case, Jiff is a California citizen who resides in Truckee, California. As the facts provide, Truckee California is located in the Eastern District of California. Shearer, a Reno Nevada resident, sued Jiff for negligence in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of California. Since Jiff resides in the Eastern District of California (for residency purposes under a venue analysis for individuals), residency is determined by domicile which is where an individual resides and intends to stay [no facts indicate that Jiff planned on shifting his domicile so he does reside in Truckee, California as provided for by the facts].

Analysis Under Substantial Events - Prong 2

Since we have found that venue is proper under Prong 1, the venue analysis concludes here. However, for hypothetical analysis, venue would also have been proper if Shearer had brought suit in the federal district court that encompasses Reno, Nevada. Venue would have been proper in the district court that embraces Reno because that is where the contract was signed and that is where Jiff performed the services under the contract (cleaning Shearer's beauty salon) and where the alleged tort of negligence occurred (the breaking of the vase due to an alleged lack of due care).

While it is unlikely under these facts, since Jiff is domiciled in the Eastern District of California and it is convenient to defend the case there (and Shearer elected to bring the case there), if the parties did make a motion to transfer venue, the judge may allow the transfer of the case to a venue within the same judicial system (here the federal court system) where venue would have been proper. If such a motion for transfer was made from either party from the Eastern District of California to the federal district that embraces Reno, such a motion should be granted as venue is proper there and there are interests in favor of such a transfer (that is where the contract was made and where the alleged tort occurred). The transferee court would apply the law of the original transferor court since venue was proper.

Analysis Under Prong 3

Since Venue is proper under prong 1, no analysis is needed under prong 3. This prong usually applies when there are multiple defendants and no determination is able to be made under prong 1 or 2. This option is the fallback option in the venue analysis.

Conclusion for Venue - Venue is Proper

Venue was properly laid in the Eastern District of California. Here, there is only one defendant, Jiff. He is a California citizen who resides in Truckee, California. Shearer brought suit in the Eastern District of California, which encompasses Truckee, and therefore venue is proper under prong 1 of the three- prong venue test under the FRCP (it is a district where a defendant resides when all defendants reside in the same state [which has happened here since there are no other defendants]).

2. Did the court err in denying Shearer's motion to compel?

The court did not err in denying Shearer's motion to compel because the evaluation records are both relevant and proportional to the discovery issues in this case relating to a claim of negligence, specifically a lack of due care.

Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, discovery is the part of the case where the parties make requests (through interrogatories, depositions, and other mechanisms) for evidence which the other party has in order to put forth their case (and, indeed, based on discovery certain motions can be made such as a motion of summary judgment where one side alleges that based on the discovery available and the pleadings, there exists no genuine issue of material fact). Therefore, discovery is a critical part of federal civil procedure.

Parties initially meet for a Rule 26f conference to meet and confer over the plan for discovery. There are certain mandatory disclosures that must take place including the identities of expert witnesses, presence of insurance, items that they will use to support their claims and other matters. From there, discovery begins and the court only gets involved when one party refuses to comply with the discovery request of another party.

It is unclear from the facts whether Shearer initially asked Jiff for the evaluations and Jiff refused. If this was the case, then Shearer is justified in bringing a motion to compel and involving the court, since the motion is asking the court to use its coercive power (the threat of sanctions as well as, in extreme cases, contempt of court or dismissal with prejudice) to compel the discovery of certain items.

Standard in Discovery - Relevant and Proportional

The key standard that a court must use when analyzing whether to grant a motion to compel (or to determine whether anything is discoverable) is whether the item in question is relevant to the case at hand and whether the request is proportional given the circumstances of the case. It is important to note that an item might be discoverable because it is relevant even though it might not be admissible later on under the rules of evidence (due to issues such as hearsay which might come into play here since it involves double hearsay statements of customers submitting their written evaluations of Jiff's services).

Evaluations are Relevant

The evaluations are relevant to this case. At Jiff's request, customers have submitted written evaluations of his services in the past so that he can monitor their satisfaction. Shearer will argue that these evaluations are critical to understand Jiff's track record in the cleaning industry. These evaluations could provide other examples in which Jiff has acted negligently and not adhered to a proper standard of due care. It also would be helpful to understand whether other contracts with Jiff's other customers specifically contained obligations requiring Jiff to adhere to a standard of due care in cleaning. This is relevant to show that Jiff was aware of his duties. While legal relevance under FRE 403 is beyond the scope of this question, it is likely that these evaluations would also be admissible at trial (assuming hearsay can be overcome) since the probative value is not outweighed by unfair prejudice.

Jiff might argue against their ultimate admissibility as grounds for not allowing them to be discoverable but admissibility, as stated above, is not a key touchstone in discovery analysis.

Request is Proportional

The request is proportional.

This case is for negligence and for damages of $100,000. The cost on Jiff is small to produce these records in light of the circumstances, potential liability, and hardship that Shearer would have to undergo to subpoena and identify the past customers.

No Privilege Applies

Jiff might argue that these evaluations were made in preparation for trial in an attempt to shield them under the attorney work product doctrine. This would fail as these are preexisting evaluations that predate the litigation. Even if it were determined to be work product (not likely), that would be overcome by the substantial hardship Shearer would undergo to obtain similar information (and that there are no attorney mental impressions which are absolutely privileged).

Conclusion

The court erred on denying the motion to compel since the evaluations are relevant and proportional to discovery and no defense applies.

3. May Jiff take advantage of the judgment in the first suit in defending against the second suit?

Yes, Jiff may take advantage of the judgement in the first suit in defending against the second suit.

The doctrines of claim preclusion and issue preclusion are both applicable to this fact pattern.

Claim Preclusion

The doctrine of claim preclusion prevents a party from relitigating an identical case. Claim preclusion applies when there is: (1) the same parties; (2) the same cause of action or controversy and (3) a final judgment on the merits. Merger occurs when a plaintiff wins in one case and attempts to relitigate an issue that he did not raise in the first case. Such an issue merges into the first judgment and cannot be brought in a subsequent action. Bar occurs where a plaintiff loses and then tries to relitigate an issue he did not raise in the first case. Such an issue is barred in a subsequent action.

Here, Shearer sued Jiff for negligence in the Eastern District of California. Following Shearer's loss in a final judgement (which was not appealed), Shearer is now bringing another action 6 months later in the Eastern District (the same court). Therefore, issue preclusion applies because it is (1) the same parties [Shearer and Jiff]; (2) the same cause of action (the damages incurred when Jiff cleaned the beauty parlor in Reno); and (3) a final judgment was issued (the jury verdict against Shearer).

Shearer could have brought the contract claim in the first case but did not and is thus barred now under issue preclusion from doing so.

Primary Rights Doctrine - Possible Defense to Claim Preclusion

Some states, including California, adhere to the Primary Rights doctrine. This means that for the same cause of action, a claim is not barred if they involve different primary rights (an example would be property damage and personal injury). Here, Shearer would make an argument that different primary rights are involved due to a tort claim and a contract claim. Shearer would argue that this is a substantive law issue that the federal court must apply CA law under the Erie doctrine. However, since these are not separable actions as typically found in primary rights doctrine scenario as described above (ex. property damage and personal injury), a court would most likely deny this defense and say that it is barred under issue preclusion.

Issue preclusion occurs when there is (1) a final judgment on the merits; (2) an issue was actually litigated in the first case; and (3) it was essential to judgment. Traditionally, only completely mutual issue preclusion was allowed meaning that it had to be the same parties. Under the modern view, nonmutual issue preclusion (either defensive where a defendant from a previous action can use a previous action to defend against a new plaintiff or offensive where a new plaintiff is attacking a defendant from a prior action). Here, there is mutuality of the parties so a nonmutual analysis doesn't apply (although it is worth noting that CA allows for offensive nonmutual issue preclusion).

Here, there was a final judgement on the merits. Shearer might have an argument to make as to whether the issue was actually litigated. In the first case, which centered around negligence, it is highly likely that Shearer would have pointed to the contractual language of due care in order to help establish the duty that Jiff owed to Shearer and to assist helping the trier of fact (the jury) find a breach of that duty. If Shearer had pointed this out and it was essential to the judgment, it is likely that issue preclusion would apply.

However, if Shearer did not point to the contractual language and/or relied primarily on general negligence principles (thereby relegating the contractual provision to a minor issue status), issue preclusion would not prevent this claim from going forward.

Conclusion:

Shearer will be prevented under claim preclusion from filing suit again. Depending on the role contractual language might have played in the first case, issue preclusion could also prevent the claim.

Q2 Professional Responsibility

Laura is a lawyer. She practices family law in a suite she shares with Alex, a tax attorney. Laura and Alex share a conference room, a printer, and a receptionist. Their receptionist is Laura's son, Sam. Laura and Alex each use separate letterhead, business cards, and telephone numbers.

Laura represented Wendy, who was divorcing her husband Henry. Laura filed a request for child support from Henry. In his financial statement, Henry claimed that he had no significant assets and that he lived alone. Wendy told Laura that she suspected Henry was not being truthful, that he had more income and assets than he claimed, and that he lived with and shared expenses with his girlfriend, Ginny.

One morning, while picking up papers from the office printer, Laura saw and read a document addressed to Alex left on the printer by Sam. The document was a property deed in the names of Henry and Ginny, and listed Ginny's address as the same as Henry's. Henry had not disclosed the property on his financial statement. Alex had received the document from Ginny, whom Alex represented on a matter unrelated to Henry's divorce.

Because Laura did not want to get her son into trouble, she never mentioned the property deed to Alex, Wendy, or the court. Wendy received a lower award of child support from the court than she should have, based on Henry's incorrect financial statement.

1. What ethical violations, if any, has Laura committed? Discuss.

2. What ethical violations, if any, has Alex committed? Discuss.

Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

1.

Laura and Alex Office Arrangement

Laura and Alex are carrying on their respective practices in a shared family law suite. They must be sufficiently separate or else they risk being considered a partnership, and thus would be facing potential conflicts of interests with clients. While they share the same suite and the same receptionist, which could raise concerns about the adequacy of their separateness, they have been using separate telephone numbers, letter head and business cards. They are also each in different distinct specialties of family law and tax law, which could indicate to potential clients that they are separate practices.

With this arrangement they run the risk of not being sufficiently separate such that they could be considered a partnership. The facts do not indicate that they are clearly separated by demarcated offices, or how their respective individual practices are presented on the door of the suite. If they were deemed to be one firm, or a partnership, then they would face conflicts of interest.

A conflict of interest would exist between Laura representing Wendy, while another lawyer in the firm represents an opposing party in the same issue. If they were deemed to be one firm or partnership, then Sally would have to withdraw from representation of Wendy, or Alex would have to withdraw from representation of Henry and they would have to shield the other partner from the case. Or they would be required to receive consent from both conflicted parties to representation, with informed written consent (CA) or informed consent in writing (ABA).

However, it is likely that Laura and Alex would be considered to be separate entities and must continue to keep their work separate and maintain clear boundaries between the two individual firms. They would need to create a new process for printing materials and keeping their practice clients' information confidential.

Document Addressed to Alex: Inadvertent Disclosure

When an attorney inadvertently receives confidential information or work product from an opposing party under ABA Rules. they are required to notify the sending party of the error and must not continue to read or use the document and return the offending document. In CA. the rule is that they must also refrain from reading the material and inform the sending attorney. but are not required to return the document.

Here, Laura should have stopped reading when she saw that the document was addressed to Alex. She should have also informed Alex of the inadvertent disclosure.

Duty of Competence

Laura owes a duty of competence to her client Wendy that she will competently represent Wendy in her case-meaning without negligence or recklessness. Here, Laura breached this duty because she had information about Henry's property and assets that were essential to her competently representing Wendy in Wendy's divorce. The property deed of Henry was essential to the determining of child support. And in declining to inform Wendy and apply it to the request, Laura was not acting competently nor in the best interests of her client. The result was that Wendy received lower child support than she should have.

Communication

Additionally, Laura has a duty to communicate with her client and keep her client informed of key issues and steps in representation. Discovering that Henry had a property that he had not listed as a significant asset was important information for Wendy, as the client, to know. In failing to inform Wendy of this critical fact in her case, she violated professional ethics.

Duty of Loyalty

Laura has a duty of loyalty to her client. As discussed above, she must act competently and diligently in their representation; she must also be in communication with her client and keep them informed of the case. Here, she was concerned about her Son getting into trouble, and as a result, breached her duty of loyalty to her client by not informing Wendy of the property deed.

Duty of Candor

Laura owes a duty of candor to the tribunal. She is aware that Hugh said he lived alone, and that he had no significant assets; however now Laura is aware that there is a property deed in Hugh's name, and that Ginny resides at the same property, meaning that Hugh does not actually live alone.

Laura has a duty to inform the court of this discrepancy.

Duty to Supervise

Attorneys have a duty to ensure that their staff are behaving ethically. Here, Sam is a staff member of Laura as well as Alex. Laura has a duty to ensure that Sam is complying with ethical standards, which means keeping client information confidential. She has failed to supervise Sam, and additionally has failed to take steps to inform Sam of his duties after finding the property deed.

Duty of Competence

Alex has a duty to act competently in the representation of his clients. He must not act with recklessness or negligence. Here, in leaving a property deed, a client's information, in a shared and potentially public space in the printer, is a breach of duty of competence.

Duty of Diligence

Along with competence, Alex has a duty of due diligence. This means he must timely manage and handle cases and documents. Here, Alex was not diligent in handling the property deed for Hugh and Ginny because he left it out on the office printer in a shared space.

Duty of Confidentiality

Alex has a duty of confidentiality to his client Hugh, and to possibly Ginny who is also his client, he cannot share information about representation of a client without consent of the client or under various exceptions, such as he may reveal confidential information to prevent serious bodily harm or death. For a client to consent to attorney sharing revealing information about representation or privileged attorney client communication, the client must give informed written consent in CA or informed consent in writing (ABA). Here, the disclosure of the property deed was inadvertent, so it does not meet any exceptions like those that allow a client to reveal confidential information to prevent serious bodily harm or death (CA and ABA) or to prevent or rectify substantial financial harm where the client is using the lawyer's services in furtherance (ABA only).

Here, Alex negligently revealed confidential client information when the deed was left in the printer. He breached his duty of confidentiality to his client.

It is not clear if Alex was aware that the property deed was not disclosed in Henry's divorce case against Wendy. If Alex was aware, he could attempt to argue that this breach of confidentiality fell under the exception of revealing confidential information to rectify or prevent serious financial harm where the client is using the lawyer's services in furtherance (ABA only). However, the facts are not clear on the seriousness of the financial harm as a result of the lower child support payment, or that Henry was using Alex's services in furtherance. The information seems to have been inadvertently disclosed by Alex and Sam.

Duty to Supervise

Alex has a duty to supervise his staff, including Sam, who acts as a receptionist for Laura and Alex. Alex has a duty to supervise staff to ensure that they conform to ethical standards. Sam leaving out information on a printer in a shared office suite is behavior that risks the confidentiality of clients.

Alex has failed to supervise staff diligently.

Answer B

Laura's Ethical Violations:

Duty of Loyalty: Self Interest

Laura (L) represented Wendy (W) and therefore, owed Wendy a duty of loyalty under both CA and ABA rules. The duty of loyalty requires a lawyer to act in the client's best interests. Under both rules, if a lawyer knows or has reason to know that there is a substantial risk of materially limiting their ability to represent their client competently or diligently because of a personal conflict, they must withdraw from representation unless (1) they reasonably believe they can provide competent and diligent representation, (2) representation would not be against the law, (3) they are not representing two clients on opposing ends of the same litigation, and (4) they obtain informed consent, confirmed in writing under the MR, or informed written consent under CA. CA differed in consent requirements because it requires that both the consent AND the disclosure be in writing, whereas the MR only require the former to be in writing.

Here, L had a personal conflict of interest because her receptionist, Laura's son, Sam (S), accidentally left a property deed on the printer. L will argue that at the start of representation, there was no conflict of interest and thus she did not have a duty to inform nor withdraw. However, after L found out that her son made a mistake, she acted on her own interests because she did not want to get her son in trouble. Since L was in a position to pick her son over her client, there was a conflict of interest here and thus, L breached it by not getting informed written consent or informed consent confirmed in writing from W. Even if L did get the consent, it is unlikely that she could have believed that she would be able to provide competent nor diligent representation because she would have to pick her own client and put her son at risk of getting in trouble. Thus, this was a breach of her duty of loyalty under both ABA and CA rules.

Duty of Diligence

Under both CA and ABA rules, a lawyer must act with hard work and dedication, to diligently act in the best interest of their client. Under CA rules, a lawyer must not intentionally, recklessly, with gross negligence or repeatedly fail to provide diligent representation. This rule does not require an attorney to breach ethical rules in order to zealously represent their client; however, they must do their best to advance their client's non-frivolous interests.

Here, Laura had a duty to use all the information that she got to W's best interest. However, she did not use the information about the deed because she did not want to get her son in trouble. L will argue that she did not use this information because she did not want to breach confidentiality between Alex and his client, Ginny. However, by prioritizing Ginny and her son's interests above her own client, L failed to do all that she could to advance the best interests of her client. Therefore, L breached her duty of diligent representation to W.

Duty to Withdraw

Under MR, a lawyer must withdraw from representation if representing the client would lead to a violation of the ethical rules, or any other law. Under CA rules, the lawyer must withdraw if continued representation would lead to a violation of the ethical rules. Here, continuing to represent W led L to breach the ethical rules of diligence, conflict of interest, and more as discussed below. Therefore, by failing to withdraw, L was also in breach of this rule under both CA and ABA rules as well.

Duty of Candor

An attorney owes a duty of candor to opposing parties and the tribunal. Under both ABA and CA rules, a lawyer must not knowingly make a false statement to the court or fail to correct a false statement previously made.

Tribunal

Here, L breached the duty of candor to the tribunal because she knew that the financial statement that Henry submitted claiming he had no significant assets and lived alone was false. She knew that the court would rely on this statement when awarding Wendy's lower award of child support. However, instead of being truthful with the court and informing the falsity of this statement that she KNEW was false, she never mentioned it. Therefore, not only was this a CLEAR breach of diligence to her client as explained above, it was also a breach of candor to the court under both ABA and CA rules.

Alex

L also arguably breached the duty of candor to Alex because she failed to tell him about getting this information about his client. L will argue that she does not owe A any duties because he isn't even opposing counsel. However, as discussed below, she did owe him a duty to inform him of the inadvertent disclosure; by failing to do so she probably breached her duty of candor to him as well. (See below, duty of fairness).

Duty not to assist in perjured testimony

L may have also breached her duty not to assist in perjured testimony or false evidence. Here, H gave false evidence to the court that said he did not have significant assets and lived alone. However, L will likely be successful in arguing that H was not her client. She therefore did not have a duty to prevent him or try to dissuade him from offering false evidence like she would have if L were trying to offer that false document. Therefore, it is unlikely that L assisted H in providing false testimony. However, her failure to inform the court that she knew that this information was false due to her own self-interest will still likely be a breach of candor to the tribunal.

Duty of Communication

Under both ABA and CA rules, a lawyer has a duty to reasonably communicate with their clients. In CA, this includes updates of any significant developments in the case, which includes all written settlement offers or plea deals. Under ABA, this includes keeping the client reasonably performed of the status of the matter. Under both rules, the lawyer must keep the client reasonably informed of details necessary to make an informed decision.

Here, W told L that she believed H was not being truthful about having no significant assets and living alone. However, L found out that there was a deed in the names of both Henry and Ginny. This is likely something that is necessary to communicate to a client because it is about the status of the matter for child support, and it is a significant development under CA rules because it makes W's chance of receiving a higher award of child support more likely. However, L did not inform W of the fact that she discovered evidence that will help W's claim. Instead, she hid it and never mentioned it to Alex, Wendy, not the court. Therefore, she breached her duty of communication to W.

Duty to Supervise

Under both CA and ABA rules, lawyers have a duty to adequately supervise the staff that they manage or exercise control over. Here, L practiced family law in a suit shared with Alex (A), a tax attorney. L and A both shared a conference room, a printer, and a receptionist, who was L's son, Sam. L will argue that since S was L and A's shared receptionist, she could not exercise control over him. However, a receptionist usually follows directions given by a lawyer that they are employed by, even if that means S was under the direction of both L and A. Moreover, S was L's son, which makes a stronger case that S was within L's control. Therefore, L breached a duty of supervising S and making sure that he did not leave confidential communications on the printer. L should have provided adequate training to ensure that things like this do not happen. By failing to provide such training and corrections, and denying that this whole incident didn't happen, L breached her duty to supervise under both MR and ABA rules.

Duty of Fairness: Inadvertent Disclosure

Lawyers owe a duty of fairness to opposing counsel. Under both ABA and CA rules, when a lawyer receives information that that they know or reasonably should know was sent by mistake, they must take certain steps to mitigate the harm to opposing counsel. Under the ABA rules, the lawyer must notify opposing counsel as soon as possible that they received this information. Under CA, the lawyer must notify opposing counsel and also only read as much as necessary to determine that the information was inadvertently sent.

Here, L saw that deed in the names of Henry and Ginny and knew that H did not disclose the property on the financial statement. Under both ABA and CA rules, L was in breach because she timely failed to notify A who was in the other office next to her. She clearly did not notify him because she didn't want to get her son into trouble; however, her failure to do so was a breach of fairness to opposing counsel. Additionally, it is unclear whether L read more than necessary before she would have been required to disclose receipt of the information, but since she failed to disclose at all, she would be in breach of both rules regardless of how much of the deed she examined.

Contingency Fees

It is unclear what L and W's fee agreement was. In CA, the fee agreement may not be unconscionable and under ABA, the fees charged may not be unreasonable. Contingency fee agreements must be in writing under both authorities, and they are not allowed for criminal cases where payment is based upon a favorable judgment, or for family law cases where payment is based upon an award of spousal or child support.

We would need more facts about the fee agreement between L and W to determine whether this would have been a breach. Since L is representing W on a divorce matter and L is seeking child support, a contingency fee agreement would not be appropriate, and if L did execute one, this would be an ethical violation under both ABA and CA rules.

Duty of Competence

Under ABA and CA rules lawyers owe their clients a duty of competence. Under ABA, a lawyer must use the legal knowledge, skills, thoroughness, and preparation necessary to provide competent representation. Under CA rules, a lawyer must not intentionally, recklessly, gross negligently, or repeatedly, fail to provide competent representation.

Here, it is unclear whether L acted competently because it seems she did not know of the property deed until after seeing it from the printer. Assuming that the deed was recorded, it is likely that a quick title search or further research would have revealed that H and G were living together to refute any claim that H did not own any property. Assuming a reasonable investigation would have revealed these facts, L breached her duty of competence by failing to find this out. Additionally, if she was able to find this out by a title search, she breached her duty because this makes a case even stronger that she breached her duty of diligence because this information could have been lawfully obtained even despite S's mistake. A lawyer would use this preparation necessary for competent representation; by failing to be thorough and adequately prepare, L breached her duty. Additionally, L breached her duty repeatedly by failing to search, failing to disclose, and failing to advocate for her client, therefore she also breached the duty of competence under the CA rules as well.

Alex's Ethical Violations:

Duty of Confidentiality

Lawyers owe a duty of confidentiality to their clients under both ABA and CA rules. Under ABA rules, the lawyer must not disclose information acquired through representation of the client, unless the client consents or it is impliedly authorized in the course of representation. Under CA rules, a lawyer must "maintain inviolate the confidence and at every peril to himself to preserve the client's secrets." The duty of confidentiality lasts forever under the ABA rules, and ends when the client's estate is settled under the CA rules. Encompassed in both ABA and CA rules, a lawyer must take reasonable steps to avoid inadvertent disclosure of confidential communication.

Here, Alex (A) owed his client, Ginny (G), a duty of confidentiality. A received the property deed from G during his representation of her through a matter unrelated to Henry (H)'s divorce. He had a duty to exercise reasonable care to prevent inadvertent disclosure of documents received by her. A will argue that he did use reasonable care, and that it wasn't him who was careless, but L's son, S. However, assuming that S was subject to A's control, like he was subject to L's control discussed above, it is likely that A failed to use reasonable care to provide training to ensure that such careless mistakes would not happen. A should have also checked the printer from time to time to make sure that such communications would not inadvertently be shared with L. By failing to take any reasonable steps, it is likely that A breached confidentiality.

Not confidential?

A may also argue that the deed was confidential because it was readily available. Although the ABA rules make information that is readily discoverable not confidential, the CA rules differ in this regard. Therefore, the fact that the deed could have been discoverable by a quick title search (as discussed above), may make this not a breach of confidentiality under the ABA rules. However, under the CA rules, even if the deed was discoverable through some other means, this would not affect the analysis above.

Duty of Competence

Under ABA and CA rules lawyers owe their clients a duty of competence. Under ABA, a lawyer must use the legal knowledge, skills, thoroughness, and preparation necessary to provide competent representation. Under CA rules, a lawyer must not intentionally, recklessly, gross negligently, or repeatedly fail to provide competent representation.

Here, A did not use the thoroughness necessary to provide competent representation because a receptionist, subject to his control, left a document that was found by L who represented a client whose interests were related to G's interest (since they were in a relationship). A will claim he did not breach the CA rules because he did not do this repeatedly and did not know that L even had the document. It is unclear whether A was aware of this risk which make it reckless, but it is likely that if no reasonable measures were taken to make sure that Sam wasn't doing this all the time, this would be gross negligence at least. Therefore, it is likely A breached his duty of competence.

Duty of Loyalty, Conflict of Interest: Laura and Alex

Certain measures must be taken under both ABA and CA rules when two lawyers are working in the same firm. It is unclear here whether A and L were working in the same firm. Although they shared a conference room, printer, and a receptionist, which suggest that they were sharing spaces, they also used separate letterheads, business cards, and telephone numbers, which suggests that they were just sharing an office space and not a practice. Moreover, since L practiced in family law and A was a tax attorney, they also practice in different areas, which still could make this analysis go either way.

Duty of Loyalty: Potential Conflict of Interest

Since L and A were sharing common areas, even if they aren't working in the same firms, the policy reasons for both MR and CA rules would likely apply to their situation. Lawyers may not represent a client if there is a substantial risk that representation will be materially limited by the lawyer's duties owed to a different client, whether that client is represented by the firm or by the lawyer individually. There will be a substantial risk when the lawyer receives harmful material information adverse to one of the clients. Under CA rules, the information need not harmful, but it must be material which means it is important to the subject matter of the case. The lawyer may only represent the client if they reasonably believe they can provide competent and diligent representation and they get informed written consent (CA) or consent confirmed in writing (MR).

Here, L and A were working in a common area and thus there was a substantial risk that their duties owed may be limited because harmful material information may have been shared among them with the use of a shared (arguably irresponsible?) receptionist. Therefore, they had a duty to inform both of their clients of the situation and get required consent under both rules. By failing to do so, both A and L breached their duties of loyalty. A will argue that there was no conflict of interest because he was representing W on a matter unrelated to H and W's divorce. A has a strong claim here because it is unclear whether there was a substantial risk of materially limiting representation with such different claims that are a bit removed. However, the fact that they shared so many common areas, and the fact that L's belief about H living with his girlfriend G was in direct dispute, this really could go either way.

Screening

Lawyers working in a same firm, assuming that a court does apply these rules because of the shared space between L and A, are allowed to participate in a matter if the lawyer entering a firm is "screened." Screening procedures require that the lawyer is not apportioned any part of the fee from a case and the prior client is given notice and details of the procedures taken to ensure compliance with the ethical rules. CA rules also require that the former client receive a certification by a partner in the firm and from the attorney that procedures followed were in compliance with the ethical rules. Here, no such notice was given to either W, on behalf of L, or G, on behalf of A. Even though it is likely that L and A were not operating in the same firm anyway, we can confirm that no screening measures were taken absent any additional facts.

Q3 Torts

State Hospital, a public hospital funded and managed by State, entered into a contract with Cook's Catering, a business owned and operated by Kimberly Cook, to provide on-site meal service to patients, staff, and visitors.

Recently, Denise Davis, the Chief Executive Officer of State Hospital, received a series of anonymous email messages threatening to carry out "a massive attack" at the hospital. In response to these threats, Davis decided to reassign a security guard from patrolling the kitchen area to patrolling the hospital lobby and entrance area. Davis did not share the information concerning these threats with anyone else at the hospital.

Several days later, Frank, a former patient, entered the hospital kitchen shortly before lunchtime and mixed peanut powder into a serving tray full of mashed potatoes. Neither Kimberly Cook nor any of her employees were present in the kitchen at the time because they had all left to use the restroom. A state health code provides that food served in a hospital must never be left unattended before, during, or after meal service in order to prevent contamination or tampering. At lunchtime, Patrick, a patient, consumed the mashed potatoes. Patrick, who had a serious allergy to peanuts, suffered severe injuries.

Patrick sued Cook, Davis, and State Hospital. Cook was found negligent for failing to comply with the state health code.

1. Is State Hospital liable for Cook's negligence? Discuss.

2. Does State Hospital owe Patrick a duty to protect him from Frank? Discuss.

3. What defense(s), if any, may Davis reasonably assert against the claim that she was negligent for her decision to reassign the security guard from the hospital kitchen? Discuss.

Answer A

PATRICK V. COOK, DAVIS, AND STATE HOSPITAL

(1)* State Hospital Liability *for Cook's Negligence

If State has waived sovereign immunity for negligence actions, then State Hospital may be liable for Cook's negligence under the doctrine of respondeat superior.

Sovereign Immunity

At common law, a State sovereign could not be held liable for the torts of its agents or of itself. However, most jurisdictions have passed statutes that waive sovereign immunity for negligence actions. Thus, a State can be held liable for its torts in most jurisdictions, subject to damage caps in some jurisdictions.

Here, State Hospital is a public hospital funded and managed by State. Thus, Hospital will be considered an agent of the State. Therefore, the traditional rule of sovereign immunity would prevent Patrick from holding State liable for both its own torts and the torts of Hospital's agents. However, since most jurisdictions have waived sovereign immunity for negligence actions, the suit against State can likely proceed.

Respondeat Superior

The doctrine of respondeat superior allows a plaintiff to hold a principal responsible for the torts of its agents so long as the tort was committed within the scope of the agent's employment. Principals are not liable for torts committed by independent contractors unless the principal owed a duty that cannot be contracted out.

Independent Contractor

State will argue that it cannot be held liable for Cook's negligence because Cook is an independent contractor. A principal is not liable for the torts of independent contractors. To determine if an agent is an employee (servant) or an independent contractor, the Court will look to a variety of factors including (i) the business relationship and contract between State and Cook's catering; (ii) whether State had control over the manners and means in which Cook performed; (iii) whether the job performance provided by Cook was the kind of performance typically provided by an independent contractor; (iv) whether the parties had thought they were in an employee-employer relationship; and (v) whether the job performed included a duty that could not be delegated.

State will argue that Cook is not an employee, but rather an independent contractor. Cook's Catering is an independent company that State has contracted with in order to provide on-site meals. State will also point to the fact that it did not control the manner and means of Cook's work -- Cook was free to provide meals however it saw fit. But Patrick will argue that this was more akin to an employee (servant) -- employer relationship because Cook was not just providing a finished product. Rather, Cook was required to be at the hospital daily and worked on-site in preparing meals.

Patrick's strongest argument to hold State liable as master of the servant is to argue that the duty to provide safe meals could not be delegated. Patrick will argue that the safety of patients, staff, and visitors required that State provide safe food. A duty for safety of others cannot normally be delegated.

Therefore, the Court will likely conclude that Patrick can hold State liable for the torts of Cook's Catering Service because the duty to ensure Cook's compliance with the safety code that applies to hospitals could not be delegated.

(2) DOES STATE HOSPITAL OWE PATRICK A DUTY TO PROTECT FROM FRANK?

DUTY

The question of whether a duty exists is one for the Court to decide. In most jurisdictions, a defendant owes a duty to act in a reasonable manner and this duty extends to everybody. However, a minority of jurisdictions have adopted the duty rule from Palsgraf, which limits the reasonable duty to only foreseeable plaintiffs.

Generally, there is no duty to protect from third-party tortfeasors / criminals. However, Patrick is a patient of the hospital and it is foreseeable that Patrick is a person that could be hurt if the Hospital is negligent. At common law, this would be a close call, but the court would likely find Patrick to be a foreseeable plaintiff.

The fact that the harm occurred due to a third-party tortfeasor will not be conclusive in determining duty

Premises Liability

Under the traditional approach, a person on premises is categorized as a trespasser, licensee, or invitee. The duty owed depends on the person's categorization. Here, Patrick will be categorized as an invitee and thus Hospital owed him a duty to ensure the premises were safe.

However, many jurisdictions, including California, have abolished categorizations and just hold that a landowner / possessor of real property owes a duty of reasonable care to everybody except flagrant trespassers. Here, Patrick would be owed a duty of care.

Inn Keeper

At common law, certain businesses that catered to providing transport and lodging services owed a heightened duty of care. This included businesses like common-carrier and inns. These businesses owed a duty to provide the utmost care.

Here, State is a hospital, which is similar to an inn because people stay at a hospital with the intent to leave. Thus, they are relying on the owner of the premises for basic protection. However, the Court will likely hold that the common law duty of utmost care does not extend to a hospital because there is a statutory basis to find duty.

Statutory Duty

In addition to duties provided by common law, the legislator can create duties via statute. Here, a state health code provides that food served in a hospital must never be left unattended before, during, or after meal service in order to prevent contamination or tampering. The legislation is clearly designed to protect those eating in hospitals.

Therefore, Patrick has a strong argument that the legislator created a duty for a hospital to provide safe food to all of those that would eat the food.

(3) WHAT DEFENSES MAY DAVIS ASSERT?

DUTY

See rule above. Here, Davis owes a duty to use reasonable care in managing the Hospital.

NEGLIGENCE / BREACH

Negligence occurs when a party fails to use reasonable care, and as a result, the party breaches the duty it owes to the plaintiff. Negligence is found when the benefits of acting reasonably outweigh the potential harm.

Here, Davis can defend her actions by claiming they were not negligent.

BPL Analysis

The BPL analysis from Judge Learned Hand provides a formula for determining if a party has acted negligently. Under the analysis, a party has acted negligently if the benefits from acting outweigh the potential costs.

Here, Davis will argue that she acted in a reasonable manner by reassigning a security guard. Davis reassigned the security guard after receiving emails about a "massive attack" at the hospital. Thus, Davis will say the reassignment was the prudent action to take given the threat. However, Patrick can argue against this by pointing to the fact that a reasonable CEO would still have security in the cafeteria even if a reassignment was required.

Under a traditional analysis, a jury could come out either way on determining if Davis was negligent.

Emergency Situation

In the event of an emergency, a party will be judged by the reasonable standard a prudent person would exercise in an emergency situation. If the Court finds that Davis failed to use reasonable care, Davis will attempt to get an emergency instruction to the jury which would require the jury to judge Davis' actions based on the fact he was acting in an emergency situation.

This argument will likely fail because there was no present emergency. Patrick will argue Davis received a series of emails over the course of a period of time. So, there is no reason to suspect that the attack is imminent because the emails keep on coming. Also, Davis did not tell anybody about these emails. If this were a true emergency, then Davis would have called in for backup by telling other hospital staff about the threat and potentially bringing in extra security. But Davis did none of that; all he did was reassign a security guard.

Therefore, Davis will likely be unable to get an emergency instruction to the jury.

CAUSE IN FACT

The breach must be a factual cause of the injury. This is usually easily satisfied with the but-for test. Here, Patrick will argue that but-for the reassignment of security, the food would not have been tampered with. Davis can try to argue that the true but-for cause is that but-for Cook's staff going on a bathroom break, the food would not have been tampered with.

PROXIMATE CAUSE

Proximate cause requires the harm that flows from the breach of duty be foreseeable.

Like with the factual argument above, Davis can further argue that the proximate cause to the incident is the lack of kitchen staff. Davis will argue that the security in the kitchen is not designed to secure the food -- that is Cook's job.

Superseding intervening cause

A superseding, intervening cause is an outside event that cuts one’s liability off from the breach. Here, Davis will argue that the reassignment was not a proximate cause for the harm experienced by Patrick. Instead, Frank's criminal actions are a superseding, intervening cause.

DAMAGES

Patrick can show damages because of his allergic reaction.

Answer B

1. Is State Hospital liable for Cook's negligence?

Employers are generally liable for the torts of their employees conducted within the scope of their employed duties. On the other hand, a party is not generally liable for the torts of independent contractors, unless it concerns a non-delegable duty.

Employee vs. Independent Contractor

First, a court will need to determine whether Cook's is more similar to an employee of State Hospital or an independent contractor. The principal factor a court considers in determining whether a party is an independent contractor or an employee is whether, and the degree to which, that party was subject to the control of the employer. The more control, the more likely that party is to be an employee. Courts also consider whether the party conducts business regularly in the area in which it was contracted to perform, whether the employer supplied the tools and equipment, and other factors.

The facts do not indicate with sufficient detail the level of control that State Hospital had over Cook's. If State Hospital dictated the menu, for example, that would indicate an employer-employee relationship. But the facts only indicate that Cook's was to provide on-site meal service. Presumably, Cook's could decide which meals to prepare. On the other hand, if the hospital dictated meal- times, when staff had to arrive or leave, etc, that would indicate greater control.

The fact that Cook's Catering is in the business of catering (as evidenced by its name) and providing meals, indicates that it might be more of an independent contractor. On the other hand, State Hospital seemed to have provided the kitchen that Cook's Catering used, since Cook's Catering was operating in the hospital kitchen. Moreover, the staff used the hospital restrooms. This seems to indicate more of an employer-employee relationship.

The question as to whether Cook's Catering is an employee or an independent contractor is a close one. But on balance, Cook's Catering is likely to be an independent contractor.

However, just because Cook's Catering is an independent contractor does not mean that State Hospital is not liable for the negligence of Cook's. Some duties are non-delegable. In such situations, a party will be liable for the breach of its non-delegable duties because it cannot delegate those duties away to an independent contractor to insulate itself from liability. For example, when a property owner invites the public onto its property, it is responsible for the safety of the public on its property, and for the negligence of independent contractors that create unsafe conditions on the property.

Non-Delegable Duty

Here, it is likely that State Hospital's provision of food to its patients is a non-delegable duty. Although the patients do not constitute the "public," by accepting the patients, the hospital has accepted them into its care, including providing them food. It is therefore likely that the hospital cannot delegate this duty to a catering company in order to avoid its duty of care to its patients.

Moreover, a statute may establish a duty, and here, the state health code likely established a non-delegable duty (see analysis below).

Eleventh Amendment

The Eleventh Amendment prohibits suits by citizens against the states without the states' consent. It embodies the concept of sovereign immunity. Thus, if the State Hospital can be properly characterized as an arm of the state, it likely cannot be liable in tort to Patrick unless the State has consented to such suits (e.g. with something similar to the Federal Tort Claims Act).

Here, the State Hospital likely can be characterized as an arm of the state. It is a public hospital, and it is funded and managed by the State. The funding and management are prime indicators that it is not separate from the State (e.g. compare with a municipality, which may be sued if its funding does not come from the state).

Therefore, unless the state has consented, State Hospital is not to be liable on a negligence claim. It is unlikely that the state health code, which imposes a duty on hospitals (see below) constitutes an acquiescence to liability. The Supreme Court has held that any consent to be sued under the Eleventh Amendment must be clear and unequivocal. The statute is not such an unequivocal statement of consent. It can easily be interpreted to allow liability only for private hospitals.

2. Does State Hospital owe Patrick a duty to protect him from Frank?

General Duty

By taking in Patrick as a patient, State Hospital assumed certain duties with respect to Patrick. In general, hospitals owe patients a reasonable standard of care in medical treatment. More generally, they owe patients a duty to act reasonably to protect them from foreseeable harms.

Here, whether State Hospital owed Patrick a duty to protect him from Frank likely turns on whether Frank's actions were foreseeable. Frank was a former patient. If Frank had a propensity to try to harm other patients and the hospital knew about it, or if Frank had come to the hospital in the past to harm other patients, then the hospital would owe its patients a duty to protect them from Frank. Even if the hospital was not aware that Frank, in particular, would likely attempt to harm its patients, but was aware that former patients or others in general have in the past tried to tamper with the hospital food, the hospital would have such a duty.

A minority of jurisdictions will find that the hospital had a duty to act reasonably to prevent harm that occurred, regardless of whether the harm was ultimately foreseeable (although the foreseeability of the harm affects proximate cause analysis in a negligence action).

Statutory Duty

But independent of the above analysis, a statute or other law can give rise to a duty. A statute may give rise to a duty to protect a certain class of plaintiffs against a certain class of harms. If the statute is silent as to tort liability, then most jurisdictions will allow a finding of negligence per se based on the violation of the duty laid out in the statute if: a plaintiff in the class of plaintiffs the statute was designed to protect is harmed, and the harm is in the class of harms that the statute was designed to prevent.

Here, the state health code provides that food served in a hospital must never be left unattended before, during, or after meal service, in order to prevent contamination or tampering. The statute was likely designed to protect consumers of the food, e.g. the patients. Here, Patrick was such a patient who ordinarily consumed the hospital's food. So, Patrick was in the class of plaintiffs the statute was designed to protect. Second, the statute was likely designed to protect against poisoning or other effects caused by "contamination or tampering." Here, Patrick suffered an allergic reaction, and this is likely in the class of harms that the statute was designed to protect against. So, the Hospital likely owed Patrick a duty to protect him from food contamination, whether from Frank, or someone else. This duty is also likely non-delegable (see above for analysis).

3. What defenses may Davis reasonably assert against the claim that she was negligent for her decision to reassign the security guard?

Eleventh Amendment

The Eleventh Amendment prohibits suits by citizens against a state without a state's consent. However, state officials performing official duties may be sued under the stripping doctrine. But this doctrine only allows suits for an injunction, applying prospectively, and not for retrospective damages.

Davis will argue that since she is the CEO of State Hospital, she is an employee of the state. Her decision to reassign the security guard was made as part of her official duties. She will therefore argue that a negligence suit against her is really a negligence suit against the state, that any damages would be paid out of state coffers since she was acting in her capacity as an employee of State Hospital (State Hospital is funded by the State), and that the Eleventh Amendment immunizes her against a suit for damages.

Public Necessity

Davis may further argue that her actions in reassigning the security guard was in response to a public necessity. Where a party has a reasonable belief that actions need to be taken to protect the public interest, and reasonable actions are taken in response to such a belief, the doctrine of public necessity is a complete defense against negligence (as opposed to private necessity, which only provides a partial defense).

Here, Davis received email messages threatening to carry out "a massive attack" at the hospital. Davis will argue that there was a public need to re-assign the security officer to prevent or mitigate the consequences of such an attack. The harm arising from "a massive attack" could far exceed food contamination or tampering. And the re-assigning of a security officer was a reasonable response to such a threat.

However, Patrick will counter that the threats were all anonymous and therefore Davis' belief of a massive attack was not reasonable. Moreover, Patrick will argue that it is much more likely for food contamination or tampering to occur, since such occurrences are more frequent than "massive attacks."

It is unclear how a court would rule on this defense, but the court will likely side with Davis.

No Breach of Duty

A breach of duty requires that the benefits of an action are outweighed by the risk and magnitude of the harm caused by the action. Using similar reasoning to the public necessity argument above, Davis can argue that she did not breach any duties at all. The benefits of preventing a "massive attack" likely outweighs the risk of re-assigning a security officer, because presumably the people from Cook's Caterer would still be in the hospital kitchen. Moreover, any harm from food tampering is likely to be small. So, Davis did not believe she was leaving the hospital unattended and was justified in acting reasonably in doing so.

Comparative Fault

Davis can also further argue Cook's Caterer was contributorily negligent. Most jurisdictions allow a reduction of damages for the comparative fault of another party, e.g. if that party's negligence contributed to the damages. Davis' re-assigning of the security guard was not the sole contributor to Patrick's injury, Cook's Caterer also contributed by leaving the hospital kitchen unattended. In fact, Cook's Caterer was found negligent. Davis may therefore be able to seek contribution against Cook's Caterer against any award against her.

Davis can further argue that Frank's intentional tort constitutes an intervening action that was not foreseeable. If anything, Frank was the most culpable, having committed an intentional tort, while David and Cook's were only negligent. Most jurisdictions will allow a reduction for an intervening intentional tort, and some jurisdictions will eliminate negligence liability altogether for another's intervening intentional tort if it was not foreseeable. Because Frank intentionally contaminated and tampered with the food, leading to Patrick's injury, Frank is at least partially, and possibly fully liable.

Q4 Criminal Law and Procedure

Detective Anna was about to subject David, who was lawfully in custody, to interrogation because she had received a tip from an anonymous informant that David was involved in transporting heroin. Detective Anna advised David of his Miranda rights and asked him if he knew anything about heroin shipments. David replied, “I am not sure if I need a lawyer or not.” Detective Anna next asked David how he was transporting the heroin. David responded, “If I had anything to do with it, I would use my car.” Detective Anna released David from custody when he refused to answer any more questions. Detective Anna then sent a message to all police officers, describing David’s car, stating that it was believed to be involved in transporting heroin.

Later that day, Officer Baker, who had heard Detective Anna’s message, saw the car described in the message. Officer Baker decided to follow the car to see if the driver would do anything that could justify stopping the car. When the car ran a red light, Officer Baker stopped the car and ordered the driver, who was in fact David, out of the car. Officer Baker then did a pat-down search of David and found a cell phone in his pocket. Officer Baker turned on the cell phone, saw a text message icon, clicked on the icon, and found a message to David stating, “The heroin is in the trunk; deliver it to the warehouse.” Officer Baker then searched the trunk of the car, where he found 30 pounds of heroin. He arrested David and arranged for the car to be taken to the police impound lot for processing.

David is charged with transportation of heroin. David moves to suppress:

1. His statement, “If I had anything to do with it, I would use my car”;

2. The text message that stated, “The heroin is in the trunk; deliver it to the warehouse”; and

3. The heroin found in the trunk of the car.

How should the court rule on each of the motions to suppress? Discuss.

Answer A

The defendant in a criminal case may bring a motion to suppress evidence asserting a violation of his Fourth, Fifth or Sixth Amendment rights. These amendments are incorporated against the states through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The exclusionary rule provides that evidence obtained in violation of these constitutional rights in inadmissible in the state's case-in-chief against the defendant, unless an exception to the exclusionary rule applies. The purpose of the exclusionary rule is to deter illegal police conduct and the Supreme Court has decided there are certain exceptions to the exclusionary rule where the social costs to society outweigh the deterrence value in prohibiting illegal police conduct. The exclusionary rule prohibits the admissibility of all evidence directly obtained in violation of a defendant's constitutional rights and evidence later derived from such evidence as "fruit of the poisonous tree."

1. Statement, "If I had anything to do with it, I would use my car"

Fifth Amendment

At issue is whether David had a viable argument for suppression of his statement under the Fifth Amendment. The Fifth Amendment protects the right of defendants to be free from compelled self-incrimination. The Supreme Court has decided that Miranda warnings are necessary to protect this right so that a defendant is made aware of his right to invoke his privilege against self-incrimination and his right to counsel. Waivers of a defendant's Miranda rights must be knowing and voluntary. Miranda attaches at "custody." A defendant is in custody based on the "freedom of movement" test, or when a reasonable person would not feel that he is free to leave police custody. Here, the facts state that David was "lawfully in custody," so we must accept that David was in custody for Miranda purposes, and we will not analyze whether that custody was lawful.

Miranda only applies to interrogations. Interrogations include express questioning by police officers as well as any statements or conduct by the police that may reasonably lead to inculpatory statements by a defendant. However, statements that are spontaneous or voluntary by the defendant are not obtained in violation of Miranda.

In analyzing whether a defendant has properly invoked his Miranda rights, the critical question is whether he did so unequivocally. To assert his right to maintain silent, the defendant must unequivocally state that he wishes to maintain silent; even sitting there in silence for long periods is insufficient to expressly invoke. To assert his right to counsel, a defendant must unequivocally assert his right to speak to a lawyer.

Here, it appears that David was lawfully in custody and was about to subject David to interrogation, so both prongs of Miranda apply. Detective Anna properly advised David of his Miranda rights so there was no problem with the advisement. Once she did that, she did not need to wait for David to invoke his rights; she could ask him a question and then in response, David could waive or assert his right to silence or counsel. Therefore, asking David if he knew anything about heroin shipments was valid. David then replied, "I am not sure if I need a lawyer or not." While it is possible to suggest that David was uneasy about engaging in interrogation, that was almost certainly insufficient to invoke his right to counsel, because it was an equivocal statement. He would have needed to say something like, "I would like to speak to a lawyer" or even "I'm not sure it's a good idea to speak to you so let me talk to a lawyer first." Detective Anna then properly asked him another question because she was allowed to do so since David had not yet asserted his right to counsel or silence and thus waiver was still in effect. David then made the inculpatory statement at issue here. Therefore, because David had waived his Miranda rights and not asserted his right to counsel or silence unequivocally, the statement is inadmissible both in the prosecution's case in chief and for impeachment purposes. (Evidence obtained in violation of Miranda is still admissible for impeachment purposes but that's not at issue here since it's admissible in the prosecution's case in chief, too).

The fact that David then said he did not want to answer any more questions does not retroactively make his earlier inculpatory statement involuntary or inadmissible and so it is still properly admissible in court. The court should deny the motion to suppress the statement.

Sixth Amendment

A defendant has the right to counsel at all critical stages of the criminal case. The Sixth Amendment right to counsel attaches when a defendant is formally charged with a crime. Here, the facts state that David was only in custody and do not suggest that he had been charged with a crime at the time that he was interrogated. Therefore, even though interrogations are a critical stage, the right to counsel only applies to interrogations conducted after formal charges have been filed against the defendant, and so no Sixth Amendment rights were violated here.

2. Text message, "The heroin is in the trunk, deliver it to the warehouse"

At issue is whether the text message that Office Baker saw on the cell phone was admissible against David.

At the outset, we will note that any possible fruit of the poisonous tree argument that the stop was actually made as a product of the knowledge Detective Anna earlier obtained illegally should be denied because a) the police did not violate David's rights earlier in the interrogation and so it was totally proper for Detective Anna to tell her fellow police officers about the car and the information concerning it and b) the Supreme Court has actually said that information obtained in violation of Miranda, unless the police do so intentionally, is not subject to the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine.

Stop of car

The first issue is whether the stop of the car was valid. A stop of a car is a "seizure" under the Fourth Amendment, because a reasonable person under the circumstances would not feel free to leave when he is pulled over by the police, generally until the police tell him he is free to go. The Fourth Amendment protects the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. The warrant requirement is the heart of the Fourth Amendment and the Supreme Court has held that warrantless searches and seizures are presumed to be unreasonable unless an exception to the warrant requirement applies.

To begin, we must note that a defendant only has standing to assert violations of his own constitutional rights in a suppression motion. When a car is stopped by the police, the driver (and actually the passengers, too) will have standing to challenge the validity of the stop. Here, David is the driver of the car, so he has standing to challenge the stop.

One of the canonical exceptions to the warrant requirement is that the police may pull over a car without a warrant provided they have at least reasonable, articulable suspicion that an offense has been committed or is being committed. This can include any traffic violation. The point of this exception is that cars freely move throughout the world and so it would be wholly impractical for the police to obtain warrants to stop and search cars of automobiles. That is the rationale behind the basis for stops of cars as well as searches for cars that we will get to shortly.

Under Whren, a police offender's subjective intent for conducting a search or seizure is irrelevant; as long as the officer had an objectively reasonable basis for the search or seizure, whatever subjective motivation he had in addition, would not make it unreasonable. Additionally, people do not have a reasonable expectation of privacy when they drive around the world in their cars, so David can't claim that Officer Baker tailing him for some time already violated his right to privacy.

Here, Officer Baker heard Detective Anna's message and then saw the car described in the message. He therefore decided to follow the car for as long as it took for the driver to commit some kind of violation that would justify it. This is a pretext stop and as mentioned is completely valid provided that the officer had an objectively reasonably basis for the stop. Here, the car ran a red light, which is obviously an objectively reasonable basis for stopping the car, giving rise to far more than reasonable suspicion that an offense had been committed (in fact, probable cause). Therefore, the stop was reasonable.

Search of David

The next question is whether the pat-down search of David was reasonable. Again, David has standing to assert a violation of his rights here because he personally was searched. Officer Baker had a right to order David out of the car, so that is okay. The facts suggest that Officer Baker then did a "pat-down search of David." Under the Terry doctrine, a Terry stop is valid if the officer had reasonable suspicion that the person has committed a crime or is committing a crime or is about to commit a crime. The pat-down search is only valid if the officer had reasonable suspicion based on specific, articulable facts that the defendant was armed and dangerous. Here, the facts that are known to Officer Baker are that 1) there is an anonymous informant who said that David was involving in transporting heroin. Tips of anonymous informants alone do not give rise to reasonable suspicion unless they are corroborated by other evidence indicating their reliability. 2) That corroboration was likely sufficient because of the inculpatory statement David made about the transportation of heroin which indicated that he probably had something to do with transporting heroin and that if he did, he would use his car. So, there was reasonable suspicion that David was transporting heroin at the time and it was possible that that heroin or some other illegal material may have been contained in his pockets. The bigger problem is that the officer may not have had reasonable suspicion that David was armed and dangerous. There are no specific facts about guns here. The best the officer can likely say is that heroin traffickers are very likely to carry guns in their pockets because drug trafficking is a violent industry.

That may be sufficient for some courts and maybe not for others.

The even bigger problem for the officer is that a Terry frisk only allows the officer to seize material that he "immediately" recognizes as contraband or evidence of a crime. The officer here simply felt a cell phone, which would clearly not be immediately recognizable as contraband. Therefore, it was likely illegal to take the phone at all at this point.

An alternate theory for which this search could be justified is a search incident to an arrest. An officer may search the person's body and the area within one lunge of his body, but the search incident to arrest exception only applies when the officer has actually made an arrest. Here, the officer actually could have arrested David at this point under Atwater because he's got probable cause that David just ran a red light. But he clearly did not arrest David at this point so that is not a valid basis for justifying the search. Therefore, the pat-down exceeded the scope of Terry, which means the evidence obtained thereafter would be illegally obtained, too.

No other exception to the warrant requirement applies so far.

Search of phone

Even if the officer's conduct so far had been reasonable, what he did next violated David's rights. David has a reasonable expectation of privacy in his phone because he is the owner of the phone and it was on his person at the time of the search.
Under Riley, officers need to get a warrant to search the electronic contents of a cell phone because people have an astonishing amount of private information stored on their cell phones and thus have a reasonable expectation of privacy in them. Warrants must be based upon probable cause, or sufficient facts to convince a reasonably prudent person that a crime has been committed by the defendant and that evidence or instruments of the crime will be obtained in the place to be searched. However, officers do not need to get a warrant to simply physically handle the phone or to analyze the physical properties of the phone; e.g. an officer could pull off a phone case and see if there was any cocaine hiding in between the phone and the case. But here, Officer Baker did far more than that: he turned on the cell phone, saw the text message icon, clicked on the icon, and then found the message at issue here. That went far beyond physical examination of the phone because he began to scrutinize the electronic contents of the phone.

David did not consent to this, so that would not be a basis for searching the phone.

Therefore, the statement obtained on the phone was obtained illegally and should be suppressed under the exclusionary rule.

3. Heroin found in the trunk of the car

At issue is whether the officer could validly search the car after finding the text message. David has standing to challenge the search of the car because it's his car - he owns it.

Automobile exception

If the search of the phone had been legal, there is no doubt that the search of the car would then be legal. Under Carroll, a core exception to the warrant requirement is that cars may be searched based upon probable cause, or sufficient facts to convince a reasonably prudent person that evidence of a crime or contraband will be found within the car to be searched. The parts of the car that can be searched depend on what the probable cause is for, analogous to the "particularity" requirement of the warrant requirement: PC to search for machine guns will not justify opening up a tiny container in the car because machine guns can't fit in tiny containers. There is no doubt that once the officer has seen the text message he has probable cause to search the trunk; the text message says that heroin is in the trunk. It's hard to get much more probable than that.

However, under the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine, evidence obtained from an illegal search cannot then be used to find other evidence of a crime, subject to certain exceptions. Various exceptions to this rule under Wong Sun include attenuation (where the illegal police conduct that led to discovery of the originally illegally obtained evidence is very far removed in the causal chain from the subsequent search or seizure at question) or independent source, where the police could have independently obtained the evidence from a different source. Those do not apply here because the search of the phone was immediately followed by the search of the trunk. Additionally, there is no independent source for the information that would give rise to searching the trunk.

Search incident to arrest

Another possible exception here would be search incident to arrest. Under Gant, when a police officer searches a car after arresting a defendant, the police officer may also search the passenger compartment of the car if 1) the defendant is unsecured and capable of reaching into the car or 2) the officer believes that evidence of the offense of arrest may be found in the car. Here, though, the exception does not apply because David again was not arrested; he was only arrested after the heroin was found. Additionally, the search incident to arrest exception only applies to the passenger compartment of the car, not the truck, which is where the heroin was found. So that exception is not valid either.

Inevitable discovery / impound search

Because the search of the car was likely illegal based on the above arguments, the prosecution could argue that the heroin found in the car would have been inevitably discovered by the police. The police arrested David after finding the heroin and then the car would have been taken to a police impound lot for processing. When cars are taken to police impound lots, the police conduct an "inventory search" which is meant to protect the police from allegations that any material that has gone missing was done by the police. The police look through the car and write down the items found in the car on an inventory search. Inventory searches are valid as long as they are conducted according to routine, they are based on valid authority to actual impound the car in the first place, and they are not actually abused by the police in a "pretext" to search for evidence.

Here, the car would have inevitably been subjected to an inventory search, where the police would have almost certainly found 30 pounds of heroin in the truck. Therefore, the prosecution could argue that evidence would have been inevitably discovered. The problem for the prosecution is that there likely was not probable cause to search the car until the illegal search of the phone, and so it was not inevitable that the evidence would have been discovered. However, if a court found that there was probable cause to search the car for heroin even before the text message was discovered, that would be a basis for not suppressing the evidence under the inevitable discovery rule.

If a court did not reject the suppression motion on that basis, the heroin found in the trunk of the car should be suppressed as it was obtained in violation of David's Fourth Amendment rights.

Answer B

1. David's Statement "If I had anything to do with it, I would use my car."

Fifth Amendment Privilege Against Self-Incrimination

The Fifth Amendment of the US Constitution guarantees people the right against self-incrimination. Miranda is a judicially-made doctrine that requires certain warnings when a defendant is in a situation of custodial interrogation. The Sixth Amendment guarantees criminal defendants the right to assistance of counsel and attaches at the time a defendant is formally indicted or charged. Here, David (D) can challenge the introduction of his statement on Fifth Amendment grounds, but the facts do not indicate that he has been formally charged with transportation of heroin. A only has an anonymous tip that he was involved in transporting heroin, which does not suffice for probable cause. Moreover, the facts do not indicate that he has been formally arrested, but rather that he is simply in lawful custody of the detective agents. Therefore, D must look to the Fifth Amendment when seeking exclusion of the elicited statement.

Miranda Rights

Miranda warnings must be given when a defendant is (1) in custody and (2) being interrogated by police or government agents. Custody is given a functionalist definition: a court will ask whether a reasonable person under the circumstances would have felt his freedom of movement restricted to the degree we associate with a formal arrest. Interrogation is the deliberate elicitation by the government of incriminating information. Here, D was "lawfully in custody" at the time that Detective Anna (A) was about to subject him to interrogation. These facts are sufficient to trigger Miranda. A discharged her Miranda duties when she advised D of his Miranda rights, and then proceeded to ask him if he knew anything about heroin shipments.

Invocation of Miranda Rights

After a defendant is Mirandized, he must either invoke his Fifth Amendment right to silence or his Fifth Amendment right to an attorney. Invocation must be clear and unambiguous, as the Supreme Court held in Davis, and must clearly indicate that the defendant intends to either (a) remain silent, or (b) seek counsel.

Invocation of Edwards Right

If the defendant clearly and unambiguously invokes his right to counsel, this right must be scrupulously honored under Edwards: the interrogation must cease until defendant has an attorney present. If the interrogators fail to scrupulously observe invocation of this right, the interrogation will be the fruit of an Edwards violation, and inadmissible under the exclusionary rule. Here, after D was Mirandized and interrogated, he replied, "I am not sure if I need a lawyer or not." This is an ambiguous statement and is not a clear invocation of the right to counsel. A court will likely find that D did not invoke his Fifth Amendment right to counsel. A's persistence in interrogating D, given the ambiguity of D's statement, was not an Edwards violation. D's response that "If I had anything to do with it, I would use my car, was therefore not the fruit of an Edwards violation. It is admissible against him.

Invocation of Moseley Right

If the defendant clearly and unambiguously invokes his right to silence, this right also must be scrupulously honored. The interrogation must cease unless either the defendant voluntarily re-initiates contact, or a reasonable break in Miranda custody has occurred such that the coerciveness of the interaction has dissipated due to lapse of time and custody. Here, D refused to answer any more questions only after his statement, "If I had anything to do with it...". Detective A ceased the interrogation at this point. A has therefore not violated D's Moseley rights, and the statement is not the fruit of a Moseley violation, because D said it voluntarily before invoking his right to remain silent.

Waiver of Miranda Rights

A defendant's waiver of Miranda rights must be knowing and voluntary, meaning it must be the product of his free will rather than the coerciveness of the interrogation setting. It is not necessary here to inquire as to whether D waived his Miranda rights, because he failed to clearly invoke his right to counsel or silence at any point prior to giving his statement that he now seeks to exclude. In the "grey space" in between invocation and waiver, interrogation is not prohibited.

In conclusion, A did not violate Miranda, Moseley, or Edwards, and so D's statement is not subject to the exclusionary rule.

2. Text Message Stating, "The heroin is in the trunk; deliver it to the warehouse."

The Fourth Amendment

The Fourth Amendment grants people the right to be secure from unreasonable search and seizure of their person, homes, papers, and effects; and provides that no warrant shall issue except on probable cause, supported by oath and affidavit, and describing with reasonable particularity the place to be searched and the people or things to be seized. When challenging the admission of evidence on Fourth Amendment grounds, a defendant must show (1) state action; (2) that he has standing to challenge the search; (3) that a Fourth Amendment search or seizure occurred; and (4) that the search was conducted without a warrant and probable cause, and no exception to the warrant requirement applies.

State Action Requirement

The Fourth Amendment requires state action, which is official conduct by the government or governmental agents. Here, the detectives are agents of law enforcement, so the state action requirement is met.

Standing

A defendant has standing to challenge a search when he has a reasonable expectation of privacy in the place searched. Here, the text message was found by means of a pat-down search of David's person. The Constitution confers the greatest protection upon an individual's person (their body), and so D has challenging to challenge this search.

Search or Seizure

Supreme Court caselaw provides two methods of defining a Fourth Amendment search or seizure. The first involves a two-pronged inquiry, set forth in Harlan's opinion in Katz. First, the court asks whether the individual had a subjective expectation of privacy in the place searched. Second, the court asks whether this expectation of privacy is one which society is prepared to accept as reasonable. The second method is a property-based approach, whereby the court asks whether there was an intrusion into a constitutionally-protected area. Here, there are two searches: Officer Baker's pretextual stop and pat-down of D, and his search of D's cell phone. Each will be analyzed in turn.

(1) Pretextual Stop and Pat-Down

Under the Fourth Amendment, pretextual traffic stops are permissible. A court will not inquire into the officer's subjective motivations when conducting traffic stops and policing traffic violations. Here, Officer Baker (B) saw the car described in A's message, decided to follow the car and conducted a pretextual arrest of D. He had probable cause to stop the car, because he witnessed the car running a red light. This was sufficient evidence of wrongdoing to allow B to pull D over and order D out of the car. D can therefore not challenge the introduction of the cell phone evidence on the grounds that it was the fruit of a pretextual stop.

A pat-down of a person, however, requires reasonable suspicion that the individual has weapons on his person. Reasonable suspicion is articulable facts that would lead a reasonable officer to believe that the person possessed a dangerous weapon, but is a standard short of probable cause. Here, B based his pat down on a message he received from A, describing D's car and stating that it was believed to be involved in transporting heroin. This message in turn was based on an anonymous tip, and D's statement he made in interrogation. These facts likely fall short of probable cause, because they do not suffice to create a reasonable probability that D has been or is guilty of possessing or transporting heroin. However, they do suffice to create reasonable suspicion for the pat-down. Heroin dealers are often armed due to the nature of the trade. B could point to his personal experience that those who possess and deal drugs often are armed, and justify his pat-down of D on this basis.

Given that B's pat-down of D's person was permissible under the Fourth Amendment, the issue at this point was whether B could seize the cell phone. An officer conducting a reasonable pat-down can seize items that are evidently contraband under the "plain feel" doctrine. Here, however, B felt a cell phone in D's pocket. A cell phone is not contraband, and it feels markedly different from a gun or packet of drugs. The plain feel doctrine therefore does not operate to justify B's seizure of the cell phone. This was a Fourth Amendment violation.

(2) Cell Phone Search

The issue was B's search of the cell phone after he had seized it wrongfully. The Supreme Court held in Riley that certain types of information are entitled to greater protection under the Fourth Amendment. In Riley, the Court held that Cell Site Location Information, obtained by means of cell phone searches by officers, were a type of information that was so broad, of such depth, and of such a personal nature that it was entitled to extra protection under a property-based conception of the Fourth Amendment. Officers need probable cause and a warrant in order to search a suspect's cell phone. Here, Officer B took a number of actions that together constitute a search: he (a) turned on the phone; (2) saw a text message icon, (3) decided to click on the text message icon; and (4) read the message therein. This is the message D now seeks to exclude from evidence. These actions are an unreasonable intrusion on D's Fourth Amendment rights under Riley, because a cell phone contains a great degree of highly personal information that is entitled to Fourth Amendment protection.

In conclusion, B violated D's Fourth Amendment rights when he wrongfully seized D's cell phone from his pocket, and when he proceeded to search the contents of his cell phone. D has standing to challenge the fruit of this search--namely, the statement found in the text message.

3. Heroin found in trunk of car

D seeks to challenge the evidence of 30 pounds of heroin found in the trunk of his car. We must first ask again whether has standing, and also whether the heroin was the fruit of a Fourth Amendment violation.

Standing

See above rule for standing. D has standing to challenge the search, because he had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the trunk of his car.

Fourth Amendment Violation

When an officer seeks to search an automobile in the course of a lawful traffic stop, he may search the person and "grabbable area" around the driver and passenger compartments, provided that (1) the suspect is unsecured and could reach said areas; and (2) the officer has reasonable suspicion that these areas contain weapons. He may not search other inaccessible areas of the car unless he has probable cause to believe that they contain weapons or evidence of criminal wrongdoing. Here, B proceeded from searching D's person and cell phone to searching the trunk of the car. B will claim that he had PC at this point to believe that the trunk of the car contained either weapons, or more likely, evidence of heroin. However, this probable cause was based on an unlawful search of D's cell phone (see above). Therefore, even if B had probable cause to search the trunk, which is all that is required for an automobile search (as automobiles are an exception from the warrant requirement), D can challenge the heroin as the fruit of an unlawful search.

Fruits Doctrine

The exclusionary rule is a judicially-crafted remedy that seeks to enforce the Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable search and seizure. Courts have also crafted the "fruits" doctrine. Under this doctrine, fruits of unlawful searches and seizures are to be excluded from evidence. Evidence does not qualify as "fruit" of an unlawful search if (1) it is significantly attenuated from the wrongful search or seizure; (2) there are independent intervening acts, including voluntary acts by the defendant, that cut off the chain of causation; (3) law enforcement would have inevitably discovered the evidence; (4) law enforcement had an independent source to discover the evidence.

Here, D seeks to challenge the heroin found in the trunk as the fruit of the unlawful search of his cell phone. Indeed, but for the search of his cell phone and discovery of the incriminating text message, B would not have had probable cause to search the trunk. However, B may contend that law enforcement would have inevitably discovered the evidence, because it is common practice to impound a vehicle and conduct an inventory search of its contents upon arrest of the driver.

Inevitable Discovery and Inventory Searches

An inventory search is a search done to account for the defendant's property; it must not be conducted pretextually for law enforcement purposes. However, evidence discovered in a lawful (non-pretextual) inventory search is admissible against the defendant. Here, B would have arranged for the car to be taken to the police impound lot for processing, and law enforcement would inevitably have uncovered the thirty pounds of heroin in the trunk. B therefore has a strong argument for the inevitable discovery of the heroin. D therefore will be prevented from invoking the fruits doctrine to exclude evidence of the drugs.

Conclusion

In conclusion, D cannot challenge the first statement because it is not the fruit of a Miranda or other violation. The second statement will be excluded, because it was the fruit of an unlawful Fourth Amendment search. Finally, the third piece of evidence (the drugs) will not be excluded even though they are the fruit of an unlawful search, because of the inevitable discovery doctrine.

Q5 Wills / Community Property

In 2016, while single and living in State X, Hank downloaded a form will and filled it out, stating, “Because I have no children, I leave all my property to Sis.” Hank signed his will in the presence of only two disinterested witnesses. Hank did not realize that a valid will in State X requires three witnesses.

In 2017, while still living in State X, Hank married Wendy. After the marriage, Hank kept land he had inherited from his mother titled in his name alone. Hank started working at a construction job, and kept all of the wages he received from the job in a bank account that he opened in his own name. Daughter was born to Hank and Wendy while they lived in State X.

State X is not a community property state.

In 2021, Hank and Wendy moved to California. Hank suffered a fatal injury on the first day of his new job in California. Hank never wrote any will after the State X will.

At the time of Hank’s death, there was $100,000 from his wages in his bank account, and he still owned the land inherited from his mother. In the probate of Hank’s estate in 2021, claims have been made by Sis, Wendy, Daughter, and Son, a ten-year-old child who has proved by DNA testing that he is Hank’s son, although Hank never knew of Son’s existence.

1. Is Hank’s will valid? Discuss.

2. What rights, if any, do Sis, Wendy, Daughter and Son have in Hank’s estate? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

Answer A

1. Is Hank's will valid?

California courts will probate a will that was 1) validly executed as per the laws of California, 2) validly executed as per the laws of the state where the decedent was present at the time the will was executed, 3) validly executed as per the laws of the state where the decedent was domiciled at the time of the will's execution or death.

Here, opponents of this will might argue that the will should not be probated because it was not validly executed as per the laws of State X, which was the state where Hank was living at the time the will was executed. Note that nothing in the fact pattern tells us that Hank was not domiciled in the state where he was living in 2016, when the will was executed, so we can assume that the state where Hank was living in 2016 was also his state of domicile.

However, even if the will was not validly executed as per the laws of State X, California courts will probate it if the will was validly executed as per California law.

Was the will validly executed as per California law

A will is validly executed according to California law if: 1) the testator has testamentary capacity, 2) the testator has present testamentary intent and 3) the will complies with applicable formalities.

Testamentary capacity?

The testator has testamentary capacity if (1) the testator was at least 18 years or older, 2) the testator understands the nature and situation of her property, 3) the testator understands the natural objects of her bounty, and 4) the testator understands the significance of the testamentary act.

1) The testator was at least 18 years old – here, Hank is likely to be over the age of 18 in 2016 because we are not told otherwise and usually a person does not leave his property to his sister because he has no children if he himself is a child. The presumption people under the age 18 have is that they might have children later on in life. Also, people under the age of 18 rarely ever care about their own mortality enough to make a testamentary disposition of their wealth, assuming they have any wealth.

   Thus, Hank is likely over 18.

2) The testator understands the nature and situation of her property-here,

   Opponents of the will might argue that Hank does not mention any of his property and so we cannot really be certain that he understood what property he owned. However, the bar for testamentary capacity is not that high and the fact that somebody will, who had not children, might want to simply leave all his property to his sister would suggest that he knows that he has property and wants to leave it to a sibling.

   Thus, this requirement is likely satisfied.

3) The testator understands the natural objects of her bounty – Here, Hank displays that he understands natural objects of his bounty because generally we think of our family members, especially our children, as the people who we want to leave something to after we die. Since Hank states that he has no children at the time he is executing the will, it is fairly natural that he would leave his property to his sibling.

   Thus, this requirement is likely satisfied.

4) The testator understands the significance of the testamentary act. Here, Hank downloaded the form and filled it out, assuming it was a will-writing form, rather than something silly with the fact pattern would likely inform us of, it would be fair to presume that he understood that he was making a will. Furthermore, Hank had two disinterested people witness the signing of his will, suggesting that he knew that he was doing a solemn testamentary act rather than just writing something out for fun.

   Thus, this requirement is also likely satisfied.

   Based on the above, I would conclude that Hank had testamentary capacity.

Present testamentary intent.

Present testamentary intent exists if the testator intends to presently make a disposition of his property that will be effective upon his death.

Here, Hank downloaded a form will and signed it in the presence of two disinterested witnesses. In that form, he also stated that since he has no children, he is leaving all his property to Sis. This suggests that he does have the intention to make a will and leave his property to Sis upon his death.

Thus, Hank had present testamentary intent.

Compliance with applicable will formalities

In California, you can have an attested will or holographic will. California does not allow you to make an oral will.

Attested will?

An attested will is what we think of as a formal will or witnessed will, and it requires 1) a writing that is 2) signed by the testator or by someone at the testator's direction and presence, 3) in the simultaneous presence of two disinterested witnesses, 4) who understand the testamentary nature of the act, and 5) the witnesses sign the document within the testator's lifetime.

A writing that is signed by the testator.

Here we are told that Hank downloaded a form, filled it out, and signed it. Thus, we have a writing that was signed by the testator. Note that there is no subscription requirement in California, which means that the testator can sign anywhere on the will.

Thus, both of these requirements are satisfied.

In the simultaneous presence of two witnesses.

The rule is that the testator must either sign in the simultaneous presence of two witnesses or the testator can acknowledge his signature in the simultaneous presence of two witnesses.

Here, Hank signs in the presence of two disinterested witnesses.

Thus, this requirement is satisfied.

Witnesses who understand the testamentary significance of the act.

The witnesses must understand that what they are witnessing is the execution of the will. It is not required that the witnesses know exactly what is in the will, as long as they know that it is a will.

Here, Hank downloaded the form will, filled it out, and signed it in the presence of two disinterested witnesses, so even though we are not expressly told that the witnesses knew that they were witnessing the execution of a will, it is likely that Hank would've informed him that is what he was up to. Having two people standing in front of you watching you sign the document will likely make the two people ask what exactly are you citing and why are we there to watch it. The answers to those questions would likely be provided by Hank.

Thus, this requirement is likely satisfied.

The two disinterested witnesses sign the document within the testator's lifetime.

The two disinterested witnesses do not have to sign the document right after they witness the ceremony or in each other's presence; however, they must sign it while the testator is still alive.

There is no mention of this happening and none of the facts were actually leading us to presume that the two disinterested witnesses signed anything. Just because you're witnessing something being signed does not mean that you will naturally want to sign it yourself.

Thus, this requirement is likely not satisfied.

California clear and convincing evidence standard.

For deaths that occur on or after 1/1/2009, California allows a will that was not perfectly executed to still be probated if the proponent can show by clear and convincing evidence that the testator intended the document to be his will. For deaths prior to that date, California had a substantial compliance standard for an attested will to be probated.

One might argue that the fact that the disinterested witnesses did not sign the document creates a significant risk that this is not really Hank's will. However, here there is fairly strong evidence that Hank intended the document he executed in 2016 to be his will. He not only took the effort to download the form, fill it out, state why he was leaving his property to Sis, but also went into the trouble of getting two disinterested witnesses to be present while he signed it. The proponent can further strengthen his case and likely satisfy the clear and convincing evidence standards if he can get the two witnesses who witness the signing of the will to either testify to that or submit a sworn affidavit to that fact. Thus, there is likely to be clear and convincing evidence that the document is the will.

Therefore, it is likely that the will may be produced in California.

Holographic will?

In California, a holographic will is a will that is not witnessed by two witnesses but it is 1) in writing, 2) with material terms handwritten by the testator (e.g. gifts and recipients), 3) is signed by the testator, and 4) expressly states the present testamentary intent of the testator.

If he had failed to establish that the will complied with the formalities of an attested will, then we might want to have considered whether it would comply with the formalities for a holographic will.

However, we don't know whether Hank wrote out the beneficiary's name and the fact that she would be receiving all his property by hand or whether he typed it. Thus, it is unlikely to meet the requirements of a holographic will.

The overall conclusion is that the will is likely to be probated by the court in California as an attested will.

2. What rights, if any, do Sis, Wendy, and him and his daughter and Sam have in Hank's estate?

California is a community property state and so community property law applies. Community property is all property acquired during marriage, other than separate property, while domiciled in California. Separate property is all property acquired either before marriage or after the end of the marital economic community. Separate property also includes all property acquired during marriage through gift, devise, bequest or descent. All profits, rents and issues of separate property also remain as separate property. All wages earned during marriage while domiciled in California is community property.

Quasi-community property is all property acquired during a valid marriage while not domiciled in California, that would have been community property had the acquiring spouse lived in California at the time of acquisition. During the lifetime of the acquiring spouse, quasi-community property is treated like separate property. However, upon the death of the acquiring spouse, quasi-community property is treated like community property.

Hank's estate

As Hank's is that we are told that he had $100,000 from his wages in his bank account and that he also owned the land that he inherited from his mother.

Character of the $100,000

See above for rule regarding community property and separate property.

Here Hank died while on the first day of his new job after moving to California. This means that all the wages he had earned were earned while he was living in a non-community property state. As per the rules above, that makes this quasi-community property because had Hank been domiciled in California all the wages would be community property. The fact that Hank kept all the wages in a bank account that was in his name alone does not defeat the community property character of his wage income.

Thus, the $100,000 is quasi-community property.

Character of the land inherited form his mother

See above for rule regarding community property and separate property.

Here, the land was an inheritance; this means that it is Hank's separate property and moving from a non-community property to a community property state does not change this. Furthermore, the land was always held in Hank's name so there is no issue as to whether Hank gifted the property to the community or whether he took any action that would lead to a transmutation, which is a change in the nature of the property from community property to separate property or vice versa.

Thus, the land is Hank's separate property.

Is Wendy an omitted spouse?

An omitted spouse is the spouse who was married after the execution of the last testamentary instrument by the testator and the spouse is not mentioned or provided for in those testamentary instruments. An omitted spouse will receive an intestate share of the decedent's estate- half of the community property and an interstate share of the separate property not to exceed 50%. However, an omitted spouse will not receive an interstate share if 1) if the omission was intentional and appears on the face of the instrument, 2) the spouse is provided for outside of the testamentary instruments, or 3) there was no voluntary and knowing waiver by the spouse.

Here, Hank executed the will in 2016 and married Wendy in 2017. There is no mention of Wendy anywhere in the will and there is nothing telling us that he provided for her outside of the testamentary instrument. There is also nothing in the will that tell us that the omission was intentional. In fact, there is no mention of Wendy at all in the will. As for whether there was voluntary and knowing waiver by Wendy, we don't know anything about that. What it appears from the facts is that Hank made a will in 2016, and forgot all about it, so he never updated the will.

Thus, Wendy is an omitted spouse and will receive an intestate share as described above.

Is Daughter a pretermitted child?

A pretermitted child is one who was born after the execution of the last testamentary instrument and is not mentioned or provided for in the testamentary instrument. A pretermitted child receives an interstate share of her parent estate unless: 1) the omission is intentional and appears on the face of the instrument, 2) the child is provided for outside of the testamentary instrument or 3) the testator had other children at the time of the execution of the will and transferred substantially all of the assets to the child's other parent.

Here, Hank executed the will in 2016 and Daughter was presumably on board after 2017 since that is the year when Hank and Wendy got married and Daughter is their child. As with Wendy, there is no mention of Daughter in the testamentary instrument and omission does not appear intentional but seems to be due to Hank forgetting to update his will. The fact that Hank died from a fatal injury that must have happened suddenly probably is the reason why Hank had not updated his will before dying since a lot of people think that they have more years to live than they actually do and don't plan for really bad accidents happening. There is also no mention of Daughter being provided for outside of the will and as mentioned above, the will transfers everything to Sis, and not to Daughter's other parent.

Thus, Daughter is likely to be a pretermitted child as described above.

Is Son a pretermitted child?

See above for rules regarding pretermitted children. Additionally, note that the child born before the execution of the last testamentary instrument may still qualify as a pretermitted child if the testator did not know about the child's existence.

Here, some would argue that Son is not a pretermitted child because he was born in 2011 and Hank executed his will in 2016. However, the rule mentioned above is likely to result in Son being classified as a permitted child since Hank never knew about his existence. As well as the court is satisfied that the DNA evidence establishes son as Hank's child and declares it so, then son will likely qualify as a permitted child and take a pretermitted child share.

Thus, Son is likely a pretermitted child.

Share of the following individuals:

Wendy

A spouse's intestate share includes the half of the community property plus and intestate share of the separate property, not to exceed 50% of the separate property. In a situation where the decedent leaves more than one issue, the spouse takes one third of the separate property.

Here, since quasi-community property is treated as community property at death, Wendy will end up with the entire $100,000 since she already owns $50,000 as her share of the community property and will get the remaining half as well. As for Hank's separate property, Wendy will end up with one-third of the land.

Daughter and Son

When there are two children and a surviving spouse, intestate share of the child will be half of the separate property that is left after the spouse takes her one-third share of the decedent's separate property.

Thus, here, Daughter will take one-third of the land and Son will take the other one third of the land.

Sis

Here, unfortunately Sis ends up with nothing because of abatement. The intestate share of the spouse and both the children will come out of her share and she ends up with nothing.

Answer B

1. Is Hank's will valid?

The issue is whether Hank's (H) will is valid. California, through the full faith and credit clause, will recognize a will that is validly executed in the state in which it is executed or the state in which the testator is domiciled when he makes the will. If the will is not valid under the state laws in which it was executed or in the state in which the testator was domiciled, CA will still recognize the will as valid if the testator is domiciled when he dies and the will conformed to CA requirements.

Here, H executed the will in State X and was domiciled in State X at the time. If the will is valid under the laws of State X, H's will will be treated as valid in CA probate. However, the facts clearly tell us that H signed his will in the presence of two disinterested witnesses, and that State X law requires three witnesses. Thus, the will is not valid under the laws of State X. However, because H was domiciled and died in CA, CA will recognize the will as valid if it conformed to CA requirements.

CA requirements for a valid will.

In order for a will to be valid in CA, it must be written and signed by the testator (T). It also must be witnessed by two disinterested witnesses. Finally, the T must have a valid testamentary intent when executing the document.

Written and Signed by T

The will must be in writing and signed by the testator, who has capacity. There is no question that H signed the will as the facts tell us this. It also appears that H had capacity, which means that he is at least 18 and of sound mind. Although the facts don't tell us he is definitely 18, the circumstances of him creating a will and the fact he married the next year means he probably was and, thus, this analysis will assume it. There are also no facts indicating that he was not of sound mind, suggesting he has capacity.

The main issue with this requirement is whether the fact H downloaded a form will and filled it out meets the written requirement. Although handwriting or typing a will counts as written, form wills are a closer call. However, even if it does not quite meet the written standard, CA adheres to the substantial compliance doctrine. That means that if the testator substantially complies with the wills formalities but does not quite adhere to them, a court will still allow the will to be probated if it was in substantial compliance with the wills' formalities. As a result, the court will likely recognize that this at least met the substantial compliance, if not the written requirement on its own

Two Disinterested Witnesses

CA wills, to be properly attested, require the signature of two disinterested witnesses. The witnesses do not need to be aware of the actual contents of the will, such as which people get which devices, but they must be generally aware that the document they are signing is a testamentary instrument and that the T has signed it. This is known as the conscious presence test, that the witnesses are generally aware that what they are signing is a testamentary instrument.

Here, H signed his will in front of the witnesses, so there is no question of whether they knew he had signed it (if he had signed it previously, he would have had to acknowledge his signature to the witnesses). Although the facts do not quite indicate whether the witnesses knew it was a will, the fact they were in H's presence when he signed and they signed it themselves, is likely satisfactory evidence that they were consciously present of the fact that the instrument was a will and that they were signing it.

Testamentary Intent

The final element that a will needs in CA is that it is signed by the T with testamentary intent. The fact H downloaded a will and filled it out and went to the trouble of getting two disinterested witnesses to sign it is pretty clear evidence that he knew he was signing a testamentary instrument. He also wrote that he was giving his property to his sister, which is further evidence he knew he was signing a testamentary instrument.

Based on the analysis above, the will appears to have met all of the CA requirements. Even though it would not have been valid in State X, a CA court will recognize it as valid because it met the CA requirements and he died in CA while domiciled in CA.

Holographic Will

In the unlikely event a CA court finds that the will was not valid (potentially because a form will may not have met the written requirement) and that substantial compliance doctrine will not save it, it may be viewed as a holographic will. A holographic will must have the material provisions in the testator's handwriting and be signed by the testator. There is no witness or date requirement. There is a requirement that the testator intend the document constitute a testamentary instrument.

Although H downloaded a form will, it appears he handwrote the material provisions, such as how to dispose of his property. He also signed the will. As discussed above, his testamentary intent is also obvious. As a result, even if the court found it was not a valid will (although as explained above, this is very unlikely), it could still be probated as a holographic will.

Conclusion

Because the will likely conformed to CA standards and H was domiciled in CA when he died, the will is valid. In the unlikely instance that it is not considered valid, a court can still probate it as a holographic will.

2. What rights do Sis (S), Wendy (W), Daughter (D), and Son (S) have in H's estate?

California is a community property (CP) state. The marital economic community begins at marriage and ends upon divorce, death of a spouse, or permanent separation (constituted of one spouse indicating to end the marriage permanently and conduct consistent with that intent). Earnings, property, and debt acquired during the marriage are presumed CP. Earnings acquired before the marriage, by gift or inheritance during the marriage, or after divorce, death, or permanent separation are considered separate property (SP). Property that would have been classified as community property had the couple been domiciled in CA at the time they acquired it is considered quasi-community property (QCP).

Effect of moving to CA on the classification of property

H's Land

Presumption and tracing: Because the facts appear to show that H had already received the land from his mother via inheritance before his marriage, the presumption is that the land is H's SP. In addition, there is a special title presumption at death. If the land is only in one spouse's name, there is a special presumption the property was intended to be that spouse's SP. W may try to argue that the property should be QCP, or property that would have been considered CP if they had been domiciled in CA when H received it. However, because the land was inherited, the land would have been classified as SP. Absent a transmutation or act of titling the property jointly, the property will remain H's SP. There is no indication a transmutation occurred, because there is no writing signed by H, the adversely affected spouse, either converting it to CP or W's SP.

As a result, H's land is SP. As discussed below, it will be devised to W, Son, and Daughter in equal shares. Because co-tenancy is the default type of co-ownership, they will each receive a 1/3 share as co-tenants.

H's Wages

Presumption and tracing: Because H did not start the job until after he married W, all of his wages he earned during this time are presumed to be QCP. H's estate may try to argue that the wages should be considered SP, because he put it in a bank account in his name alone. However, the mere fact the bank account was titled in H's name alone is not enough to change the nature of the property from QCP to SP. There is also no indication H and W entered into a premarital agreement that would have changed the nature of their earnings. As a result, all of the wages he earned during are considered QCP, because they would have been CP had they been living in CA. The fact the account was titled in his name only is not enough to change the source, and tracing clearly shows all of this money is wages from during the marriage, and thus is QCP.

Conclusion

H's entire bank account, consisting of $100,000, is QCP.

Assuming will is valid:

Sis

Assuming the will is valid, it clearly leaves all of his property to Sis (S). However, as discussed below, Sis will end up receiving nothing, because W, Son, and Daughter will be treated as omitted spouses and children. As a result, they will all receive an intestate share, which will leave nothing for Sis.

Wendy

Omitted Spouse: A spouse who does not take under a will is considered an omitted spouse, unless the omission was intentional, or the testator substantially provided for the spouse outside of the will. Because H never made another testamentary instrument after the 2016 will, the omission was not intentional, because he was not married at the time. In addition, H did not provide for W outside of the will. As a result, W will be treated as an omitted spouse. An omitted spouse is entitled to receive what they would have had the testator died intestate. When a decedent dies intestate in CA, the spouse is entitled to the decedent's 1/2 of the CP and QCP (meaning that the spouse will receive all of the CP/QCP) and 1/2 of the decedent's SP if the decedent has one lineal descendant and 1/3 of the decedent if the decedent has more than one lineal descendant. As discussed below, Son and Daughter will each be treated as omitted children, and thus W will receive 1/3 of H's SP and Son and Daughter will split the remaining 2/3 of H's SP.

Conclusion

Because the wages are QCP, W already owns half of that as her share of QCP. Because she receives an intestate share, she will receive the remainder, so she will get all $100,000. She will also receive 1/3 of H's SP, which means she will get 1/3 of H's property that he inherited from his mother and take it as co-tenants with Son and Daughter.

Daughter

Omitted child: A child who is omitted under a will is entitled to an intestate share, unless the omission was intentional, the decedent had other children when the will was made and left substantially all of his assets to their surviving parent, or provided for the child outside of the will, or did not know the child existed. Here, the omission was not intentional for two reasons: first, in his 2016 will, H prefaced his devise to his sister based on the fact "because I have no children." Second, he never made another testamentary instrument after D was born. If he had, and then omitted D, it might be considered intentional, but because she was not alive at the time, it is pretty clear that the omission was not intentional. In addition, because H only had one child that he knew of, the exception that occurs when the decedent had other children at the time the will was made and left substantially all of his assets to the surviving parent does not apply. (plus he did not leave anything to W in his will). Finally, he did not provide for D outside of the will.

Because none of the exceptions apply, D will be treated as an omitted child and will receive an intestate share. As discussed above, when a decedent in CA dies intestate, the decedent's 1/2 of CP/QCP goes to the surviving spouse. If there is more than one lineal descendant of the decedent, the spouse receives 1/3 of the decedent's SP and the lineal descendants split the remaining 2/3 of SP. As discussed below, Son will also be treated as an omitted child, and thus H had two lineal descendants at the time of his death. Therefore, D will split the 2/3 of H's SP with the son, leaving them each with 1/3 of H's SP.

Conclusion

Daughter will receive 1/3 of H's SP, or 1/3 of the property he inherited from his mother. Daughter will take the land as a co-tenant with a 1/3 interest.

Son

Omitted Child. See rule above. W, D, and Sis may claim that Son should not be considered an omitted child because it appears he was born before the will was written in State X, and they will therefore argue he was intentionally excluded. However, the facts make it clear that H never knew of Son's existence. The facts also make it clear that Son has established by a paternity test that H is the father, so he will be treated as his child. Because H never knew of Son's existence, Son will be treated as an omitted child. There is also no indication that either of the other exceptions apply, because H did not leave substantial assets to whoever Son's mother is, since his only will left it all to his Sis. Therefore, Son will be considered an omitted child and entitled to receive an intestate share. As described above, because the decedent has two lineal descendants (Son and Daughter), W will get 1/3 of H's SP and Son and Daughter will split the remaining 2/3 of H's SP, leaving them with 1/3 of H's SP total.

DRR: Dependent Relative Revocation--alternatively, Son could argue that H had a mistake of fact when he made the will because he wrote "because I have no children," when in fact he did, and that if it weren't for this mistake of fact H would have devised his property differently. However, he won't need to make this argument.

Conclusion

Son will receive 1/3 of H's SP, or 1/3 of the property he inherited from his mother. Son will take the land as a co-tenant with a 1/3 interest.

If the will were not considered valid:

Even if the will were not considered valid, the disposition of property would remain the same. Because W, Son, and Daughter are all treated as omitted spouses or children, they receive intestate shares. In this circumstance, as described above, the spouse is entitled to all of the QCP/CP plus 1/3 of the H's SP if more than one lineal descendant. Son and Daughter are then entitled to split the remaining SP. As a result, the disposition would be the same regardless if the will were valid, and in neither case would Sis take anything.

Q1 Evidence

On January 15, Paul fell down the stairwell of Dell's Department Store ("Dell"). Paul sued Dell for personal injuries, alleging he fell because one of the steps was broken. The following occurred at a jury trial in the California Superior Court while Dell's manager, Mark, was being examined by Dell's attorney:

QUESTION: Where were you when Paul fell down the stairs?

ANSWER: I was standing nearby with my back to the stairs talking to Carol, a store customer, when I heard the noise of the fall.

(1) QUESTION: Has Paul sued Dell before?

ANSWER: Yes, five times that I personally know about.

(2) QUESTION: No one saw the accident. Right?

ANSWER: That's right. A thorough investigation was unable to find anyone who saw Paul fall on the stairs.

Mark was then cross-examined by Paul's attorney as follows:

(3) QUESTION: Isn't it true that you used to be employed by Paul as a cashier in his grocery store and that he fired you for stealing money from the cash register?

ANSWER: That is what he claimed.

(4) QUESTION: The stairs were repaired the day after Paul fell. Weren't they?

ANSWER: Yes.

(5) QUESTION: Didn't Carol, the store customer, exclaim at the time of the accident: "Oh no! A man just fell on that broken step"?

ANSWER: So, what?

QUESTION: Is this the report that Dell's insurance company prepared following an investigation of the accident?

ANSWER: Yes. That is the report the insurance company gave me. They always prepare a report in case we get sued.

Paul's attorney then moved to enter into evidence the insurance company's report. The report states: "Steps on the stairs at the store are in very poor condition."

A. What objections could Paul's attorney and Dell's attorney reasonably make to the questions or answers to Mark's testimony numbered (1) to (5) above, and how should the court rule on each objection? Discuss.

B. What objections could Dell's attorney reasonably make to the motion to enter the insurance company's report into evidence and how should the court rule? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

Answer A

Relevance

Under California law, evidence is admissible if it is relevant and competent. Evidence is relevant if it pertains to an element of a claim or defense and is probative of that element. Probative means that the evidence has some tendency to prove or disprove a particular element of a claim or defense. Evidence is competent if it is not otherwise barred by some exclusionary rule. A court may nonetheless exclude otherwise relevant and competent evidence if there is a risk of prejudice to the party against which the evidence is being offered and the prejudice substantially outweighs the evidence's probative value.

Q1

The question is relevant in that it tends to prove that Paul has a prior motive for suing Dell other than the cause of his personal injury. Moreover, Mark is asserting that he has personal knowledge of the prior suits, which means that this testimony is competent, because a witness must generally have personal knowledge of the matters to which they are testifying.

Character Evidence

Paul's attorney should object to this question on the grounds that it is inadmissible character evidence. Character evidence is evidence that tends to establish a particular trait of one party. Character evidence may take the form of reputation testimony about the party's reputation in the community, the testifying witness's opinion of the party's character, or prior acts of the party. Generally, character evidence is inadmissible unless character is directly in issue. Here, the question appears to be establishing that Paul's prior suits against Dell were frivolous or lacked some sort of sound basis. Moreover, because this is a personal injury tort claim, Paul's character is not directly in evidence. Therefore, under the general rule, the question should be objected to on the basis that it is improper character evidence.

There are several exceptions to the general rule against the introduction of character evidence. These exceptions include (1) establishing motive; (2) establishing the identity of a party; (3) establishing lack of mistake; (4) establishing intent; or (5) demonstrating a common plan or scheme. Here, Dell's attorney should argue against the objection that the question establishes Paul's motive for suing Dell; that it also establishes Paul's intent to sue Dell, thereby undercutting the argument that Dell was negligent in maintaining its stairs; and that Paul's previous suits establish a common plan or scheme against Dell through the use of multiple, potentially frivolous suits. It appears that potentially multiple exceptions to the general rule against character evidence apply to this question, and the court should therefore overrule the objection that this is impermissible character evidence.

The court should also weigh in favor of admitting the evidence because its probative value tends to outweigh its prejudicial conduct. The evidence is clearly prejudicial to Paul, but the fact that Paul has sued this particular store five times in the past is highly probative of Paul's intent to sue the store and perhaps contributory negligence or recklessness. Therefore, the court should overrule this particular objection.

Paul's attorney should object to this question on the grounds that it is irrelevant and leading. Paul's attorney should also object to the part of the answer that affirms that "no one" saw the fall actually happen.

Relevance

As noted above, evidence must be relevant to be admissible. Here, while Paul's attorney could argue that the question is not relevant, he likely will fail on this point. The fact that no one else saw the fall happen is not relevant to the issues in a personal tort claim. Dell's attorney, however, should argue that this testimony is relevant because it tends to undercut the validity of Paul's claim, i.e. that there are no corroborating witnesses to the fall.

Leading Questions

An attorney directly examining a witness may not ask leading questions unless the witness is hostile. A leading question tends to assume its answer in the form of the question. Here, the question assumes that no one saw the fall happen and then asks the witness to confirm this. Moreover, Mark is being directly examined by Dell's attorney and is clearly not hostile to Dell's attorney. Therefore, the form of the question was improper. The proper remedy here would be to strike the leading question for Dell's attorney to rephrase the question in a way that is not leading.

Lack of Personal Knowledge

Paul's attorney should object to the portion of the answer that asserts that "no one" saw the fall actually happen. In order for a witness's testimony to be admissible, he must have personal knowledge of the matter being testified to. Here, it is likely impossible that Mark could identify all possible bystanders in a department store. Therefore, this portion of the answer is outside the scope of Mark's knowledge and therefore should be inadmissible. The proper remedy here would be to strike the offending portion of the statement.

The remaining portion of the statement is admissible, because Mark has personal knowledge of the investigation and can attest that the persons interviewed in the investigation.

Dell's attorney should object to this question because it improperly references the consequences of a prior bad act by Mark.

The question is relevant because it tends to undermine Mark's credibility for truthfulness and a possible motive against Paul. The court should not exclude the testimony under the normal balancing test because Mark is a key witness and his truthfulness is probative of the validity of the rest of his testimony.

As noted above, character evidence in the form of prior bad acts is generally inadmissible. A witness's credibility may be impeached, however, by an attorney asking a good-faith question about a prior bad act if the act is probative of the witness's truthfulness. Extrinsic evidence of the prior bad act is not admissible, and the attorney may not reference any consequences of the prior bad act. The act in question here is theft, which is probative of truthfulness. Paul's attorney likely has sufficient grounds to ask the question in good faith, because Paul is his client and likely mentioned Mark's firing to the attorney. The form of the question, however, is improper, because the attorney references the fact that Mark was fired for stealing from Paul. Dell's attorney should object, and the question should be stricken. Paul's attorney may, however, rephrase the question to remove the reference to the consequence.

As noted above, the form of the question here is not objectionable because Paul's attorney is cross-examining a witness for the opposing party. Therefore, a leading question is permissible.

Answer to Q3

At issue in Mark's answer is whether his statement constitutes hearsay. Hearsay is an out of court statement that is offered as proof of the matter asserted. Here, Mark is repeating a statement made by Paul ("That's what he says."). The statement is being offered as proof of the matter asserted because the question is whether Mark stole money from the cash register. Therefore, the statement is hearsay under the general rule.

A hearsay statement may be nonetheless admitted under one of the exceptions to the hearsay rule. An admission by a party-opponent is admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule in California. Here, Paul is an opposing party and therefore his statement may be admitted under this exception to the hearsay rule.

Dell's attorney should object that this question is impermissible because it includes subsequent remedial measures.

The evidence here is relevant because it tends to show that the stairs were, in fact, broken, thereby establishing a breach of duty by Dell.

While nonetheless relevant, public policy excludes evidence of subsequent remedial measures, except in cases of products liability. Here, there is no products liability question involved, and the question falls squarely within the subsequent remedial measures rule. Therefore, the question should be objected to and stricken from the record.

Q5

Hearsay Objection

Dell's attorney should object to this question because it is clearly hearsay. The statement by Carol is an out of court statement and it is being offered as proof that Paul fell and that the stairs were broken. Therefore, under the general hearsay rule, the testimony is not admissible. Note that the statement is relevant because it is probative of both breach (the stairs are broken) and causation (Paul fell down the stairs).

Paul's attorney could potentially argue that the statement constitutes an excited utterance and is therefore admissible as a hearsay exception. An excited utterance is one that is made by a person who is still under the stress of an exciting event and for which there is no time to reflect on the statement. Here, seeing a person fall down broken stairs likely qualifies as a startling event and the statement was made contemporaneously with the event in question. Therefore, the question and its answer are likely proper under this exception to the general rule against hearsay.

Note that Paul's attorney cannot successfully argue that the statement is a present sense impression. In California, a present sense impression is only admissible when the hearsay declarant makes a statement about her actions while she is performing the act. Here, there is no action by the hearsay declarant and therefore this exception does not apply.

Lay Opinion Objection

Paul's attorney could object to the answer in the question because it constitutes a lay opinion that goes to one of the ultimate issues in the case (whether there was a breach of duty because of the broken stairs). In California, a lay witness may testify to her opinion as to sensory matters, speed of an automobile, whether a person is drunk or insane, or other matters within her personal knowledge. Note that California also allows a lay witness to testify as to scientific or technical knowledge that the lay witness has. Here, it is likely within the lay witness's knowledge that the stairs are broken because Carol can observe that the stairs were broken. Therefore, this objection should likely be overruled.

Insurance Report

Dell's attorney should object that the insurance report is (1) privileged work product; (2) that it is hearsay; (3) that it is improper evidence of liability insurance; and [sic]

The first issue is whether the work product privilege would attach. The work product privilege is a qualified privilege that allow documents made in anticipation of litigation to be excluded from discovery and evidence. Here, the work product doctrine likely applies because an insurance company making a report likely anticipates that its insured will be sued because of an accident that happened on the store's premises. Moreover, Mark indicated that the report was prepared "in case we get sued." Paul's attorney could argue here that the work product doctrine should not apply because there is substantial need for the document. This argument may succeed because the stairs were repaired shortly after the fall, and therefore Paul's attorney could not inspect them or have an expert inspect them.

The second objection would be that the document constitutes hearsay because it is an out of court statement being offered to prove that the stairs were in fact broken. This argument will fail because the report likely constitutes an exception to the hearsay rule known as the business records rule. Where a business normally keeps a particular type of record within the ordinary course of business and the record is made by a person with knowledge of the event and a business duty to record the event, the business record may be admitted under an exception to the hearsay rule. Here, the insurance company always prepares a report when there is an accident and the insurance company likely has a duty to keep such records for when it is required to issue liability payments. Therefore, the business records exception to this evidence applies and the report will not be excluded on the grounds that it is inadmissible hearsay.

Finally, Dell's attorney may attempt to argue that the report is inadmissible evidence of liability insurance. Generally, evidence of liability insurance is not admissible to prove guilt or ability to pay. Here, however, the report is not being offered to prove guilt. Instead, it is likely being offered to show the condition of the stairs at the time of the accident. Therefore, the liability insurance exclusionary rule likely does not apply.

The court should also balance the introduction of the report against unfair prejudice to Dell. While the report is prejudicial to Dell, it does not appear to be unfair to Dell.

Moreover, the insurance company likely has an interest in accurately representing the material in its reports. Therefore, the balancing test weighs admission.

The court may consider excluding the evidence on the grounds that it is protected work product, but should likely rule for its admission on the ground that there is substantial need for the report.

Answer B

Under Proposition 8 of the California Constitution (Prop 8), all relevant evidence is admissible in a criminal trial. Prop 8 makes an exception for California Rules of Evidence Code Section 352, which prohibits the introduction of evidence whose relevance is substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury. As this is a civil case, Prop 8 will not apply.

A.1. Prior suits

Logical relevance

To be admissible in CA, evidence must be relevant to an issue in dispute. Here, Paul's previous lawsuits against Dell are relevant because they show potential bad faith by Paul (P) in constantly bringing lawsuits against Dell (D). This fact makes it more likely that the lawsuit is without merit, and may have been brought for the purpose of harassing D.

Legal Relevance

In CA, evidence should be excluded if its relevance is substantially outweighed by the risk of undue prejudice. Here, the evidence is prejudicial in that it does not address the issue here - D's negligence for P's injuries, but instead seeks to introduce extraneous evidence about P's previous actions against D. This must be weighed against the relevant bias that this evidence introduces. In balance, it is likely that the court would find that the relevance would not be substantially outweighed by the prejudice of this statement.

Form of the question

Assumes facts not in evidence

The question states that Paul fell down the stairs. This has not been established in the fact pattern. If there is no basis for the statement, it is improper to include this fact in the question. However, if it has previously been established that P fell down the stairs, then the question is proper.

Personal knowledge

To testify, a witness must have personal knowledge about the facts being described.

Here, although Mark (M) may not have been involved in the previous lawsuits, he has testified that he is personally aware of five previous lawsuits. Therefore, this testimony is based on personal knowledge.

Character evidence

Character evidence is evidence about a party's previous actions or dispositions that are introduced to establish that the party acted in conformity with their purported character. Character evidence is generally inadmissible. Character evidence is inadmissible in civil cases unless a party's character is part of the cause of action.

This case, a negligence suit does not have a party's character at issue. The question and answer introduce evidence about P's previous actions in suing D. This does not relate to the suit, but instead relates to P's previous actions with respect to D. Therefore, it will be inadmissible character evidence, and should be excluded for substantive purposes.

Habit

Although character evidence is inadmissible, habit evidence is admissible. Habit evidence are a party's actions that always occur with respect to certain stimulus. Habit evidence may be introduced to show that a party acted in conformity with the habit.

Here, P's prior suits do not rise to the level of a habit. They are isolated instances of actions that P has taken, but they are not a reaction to a stimulus. Therefore, this evidence is not admissible as habit evidence.

Impeachment

Although character evidence may be inadmissible for substantive purposes, it may be used to impeach a party or witness. Bias may always be raised to impeach a party to a suit.

Here, P's previous suits show a pattern that may indicate bias against D. Therefore, this evidence is admissible to impeach P, but may not be used for substantive purposes.

A.2. No witnesses

Logical relevance

See rule above. This evidence is admissible because it shows that there were no witnesses to the accident. This makes it less likely that the accident occurred since no other person can corroborate P's version of events. Therefore, it is logically relevant.

Legal relevance

See rule above. As stated above, the statement is relevant. It is not unfairly prejudicial to P. P can contradict this testimony by producing a witness.

Form of the question - leading question

Leading questions are questions that contains the answer. It is improper to ask a leading question in direct examination.

Here, this question is a leading question. D's attorney states that no one saw the accident, and merely asks for concurrence. M is an employee of D and is being called as D's witness. Because this is D's witness, and this is direct examination, this question is an improper leading question. P's attorney should have objected to this question as leading, and the court should sustain that objection.

Personal knowledge

See rule above. M's answer talks about a thorough investigation but does not state who engaged in the investigation. It is unclear whether M has any personal knowledge about this testimony. Therefore, P's attorney should object to the response, and the court should either (1) sustain the response, or (2) order some clarification to identify M's basis for the statement.

A.3. Mark's firing

Logical relevance

See rule above. The question is relevant because it tends to show a potential basis for M's bias. This evidence throws into question M's previous testimony. Therefore, it is logically relevant.

Legal relevance

See rule above. The question is relevant as described above. It is prejudicial in that it does not precisely go to a disputed fact, but merely throws into question M's truthfulness. Still, the court will likely find it more relevant than prejudicial.

Form of the question - leading question

See rule above. While leading questions are not allowed in direct examination, they are allowed in cross examination. Here, P's attorney is cross examining M. Therefore, this question form is appropriate.

Form of the question - compound

When questioning a witness, a lawyer may only ask one question at a time. Compound questions are disallowed.

Here, this question is composed of two questions: (1) did P fire M, and (2) was the firing for stealing money. Because it is a compound question, D's lawyer should object, and the court should sustain the objection.

Form of the response - nonresponsive

A witness must respond to the question asked. A response that does not answer the question can be stricken, and the witness will be instructed to answer the question.

Here, M's response does not respond to the question. P's attorney asked M if P fired M for stealing money. M does not answer the question, but instead states that M claimed these things. Therefore, P should object to the answer, and the court should sustain the objection and order M to answer the question.

Character evidence

See rule above. This evidence is a past act being introduced to show that M's testimony is false because he was previously fired by P, and therefore has an axe to grind. As this is character evidence it is inadmissible as substantive evidence.

Impeachment

See rule above. This evidence is proper impeachment evidence because it shows M's bias. Therefore, it will be admitted for impeachment purposes.

A.4. Repair of the stairs

Logical relevance

See rule above. The fact that the stairs were repaired after the accident tends to show that there was something wrong with the stairs previously - during the time of the accident. Therefore, it tends to show that the stairs were negligently maintained by D, and that P's claim has merit. Therefore, this evidence is logically relevant.

Legal relevance.

See rule above. As stated above, this evidence is relevant. However, it is prejudicial because it uses a subsequent repair against D. The prejudice of this use is the reason for the rule against its use, as described below. Therefore, it is prejudicial. The court may exclude it on these grounds, but there is a specific rule on point.

Subsequent remedial measure

Where a defendant makes a subsequent repair, such repair may not be used to show the fault of the defendant. This is because it would make it less likely that defendants would make subsequent needed repairs. Subsequent repairs may be used to show ownership or control over the property.

Here, the ownership or control of the stairs does not appear to be at issue. Instead, this is being introduced to show that the stairs were in bad repair at the time of the accident. Therefore, it is inadmissible because it is a subsequent remedial measure. D's attorney should object to this line of questioning, and the court should sustain it.

A.5. Store customer's statement

Logical relevance

See rule above. Here, this statement tends to show (1) that P in fact fell on the stairs and (2) that the step was broken. Therefore, it shows both that P fell, and that D was potentially at fault. As such it is logically relevant.

Legal relevance

See rule above. Here, the evidence is relevant as described above. There is little risk of prejudice because M can say whether this did or did not occur.

Form of the answer - nonresponsive

See rule above. M does not respond to the question either affirmatively or negatively, and instead questions the relevance of the question. As M did not respond to the question, P's attorney should object to the response. The court should sustain the objection and order M to respond.

Hearsay

Hearsay is an out of court statement being introduced for the truth of the matter asserted. Hearsay is generally inadmissible.

Here, Carol's statement, made out of court, is being introduced for the truth of the matter asserted. It is being introduced to show that P fell on D's broken step. Therefore, it is hearsay, and D's attorney can object to it on those grounds. It will be inadmissible unless an exception applies.

Contemporaneous statement

A contemporaneous statement is a statement that a witness makes while an event is occurring. A contemporaneous statement is admissible as an exception to hearsay.

Here, Carol's statement was made immediately after the event. It was not made while the event was occurring, but a contemporaneous statement may be admissible if the statement was made immediately after the event. Here, it is likely that the court would find that this is admissible as a contemporaneous statement.

Excited utterance

An excited utterance is a statement made while a person is under the stress of an exciting event. Such a statement is admissible as an exception to hearsay.

Here, Carol's statement was made while witnessing a person fall down the stairs. This is an exciting event and would startle a reasonable person. Therefore, this statement was made due to a startling event. In addition, it was made immediately after the event, and likely while Carol was still under the stress of the event. Therefore, it will be admissible as an excited utterance.

B. Insurance company's report

Logical relevance

See rule above. The insurance report describes an investigation of the accident. It likely provides background and a determination of fault. Therefore, it will be logically relevant.

Legal relevance

See rule above. The insurance report is relevant as described above. It will likely not be deemed to be prejudicial. There are no facts that indicate that the report is prejudicial to D.

Authenticity

To be admissible, the proponent of tangible evidence must establish that the thing is what it purports it to be. This may be done through the testimony of an individual with knowledge of the evidence.

Here, M was able to identify that the report that P proffered was what it purports to be - an insurance report that D's insurance company prepared. Therefore, it has been properly identified.

Hearsay

See rule above. The insurance report, a report that was prepared and contains statements made out of court, is being introduced for the facts set forth in the report. Therefore, it is hearsay, and will be admissible unless it is non-hearsay or an exception applies.

Vicarious statement

A statement that a party's agent makes out of court may be imputed to the party. A party's out of court statement is always admissible as non-hearsay. Similarly, a vicarious statement made by a party's agent may similarly be admissible. Admissibility will depend on whether the agent is an employee or an independent contractor, and whether the statement is made in the course of employment.

Here, the insurance company is not an employee of D, but is instead an independent contractor. The insurance company provides insurance to D, and D does not control the insurance company's actions. Therefore, statements that the insurance company makes cannot be imputed to D. Therefore, the insurance report will not qualify as a vicarious statement.

Business record

A record made in a business's regular course of business is admissible as an exception to hearsay. The record must be part of a regularly conducted activity, must be regularly recorded, and must be made at or near the time by a person with knowledge of the items being recorded.

Here, the insurance company's report may be a business record. However, P's attorney has failed to establish a foundation for its status as a business record. P's attorney has failed to show that it was the insurance company's regular practice to prepare these reports, and that it was made at or near the time of the events by a person with knowledge of the items being recorded. Instead, P's attorney is seeking to introduce the record through M, who did not prepare the report. While M stated that the insurance company always prepares the report, he does not know how or by whom it was prepared.

In addition, if a record is created in anticipation of litigation alone, it is not a business record. Here, the record is only created when the insurance company believes that D will be sued. Therefore, it does not constitute a business record.

Q2 Contracts / Remedies

Bright Earth Solutions ("Bright"), an agricultural services business that employed 10 people and had over 100 clients, purchased a new commercial tractor mower (not suitable for personal, family or household purposes) from Stercutus Mowers ("SM") for $15,000. In concluding the sale, SM presented a one-page contract that contained the following language:

> SM undertakes, affirms and agrees that this mower is free of defects in material and workmanship at the time of its delivery to the buyer. If the mower or one of its component parts fails within one year of delivery to the buyer because the mower or its component part was defective when installed, SM shall repair or replace at its sole option any such mower or component part at its own cost or expense. Other remedies are excluded.

The contract also stated in bold, 12-point font:

> THERE ARE NO WARRANTIES EXPRESSED OR IMPLIED AND PARTICULARLY, THERE ARE NO WARRANTIES OF MERCHANTABILITY OR FITNESS FOR A PARTICULAR PURPOSE MADE BY SM IN CONNECTION WITH THE SALE OF THIS MOWER.

Authorized representatives of Bright and SM signed the contract and Bright took delivery of the mower.

Over the next six months, Bright experienced numerous problems with the mower. The bolt holding the mower blade in place broke five times under normal usage. The steering system was faulty, causing unsightly and uneven lines in mowing jobs. The gas tank installation was defective, causing intermittent gas leaks. Several times the mower would not start due to various electrical faults and Bright had to cancel planned jobs. As a result, Bright lost clients and $5,000 in profits.

Bright took the mower to SM each time it malfunctioned. SM effected repairs and the mower would work for a while and then malfunction again. Sometimes the replacement part would fail, other times a different part would fail. The mower was returned to SM for repairs 12 times in the first six months after purchase.

At the beginning of the seventh month after purchase, the mower's steering wheel came off during a job. At that point, Bright communicated to SM that it wished to return the mower and be refunded the purchase price. SM refused, pointing to the clauses above in the original contract. Bright then sued SM for breach of contract and warranty.

1. Is Bright likely to prevail in its suit against SM? Discuss.

2. If Bright prevails, what remedies, if any, would likely be available? Discuss.

Answer A

1. Success of Bright in its suit against SM

Governing Law

Contracts for the sale of goods are governed by Article 2 of the UCC. All other contracts are governed by the common law. Goods are things moveable when identified in the contract. Here, we have a contract for the sale of a commercial tractor mower, which is moveable. Because the tractor is a good, the contract is governed by Article 2.

Statute of Frauds

While contracts generally need not be evidenced by a writing, some contracts require a writing if they fall within the Statute of Frauds. A contract for the sale of a good over $500 falls within the Statute of Frauds and requires a writing signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought, and expressing the quantity involved.

Here, the contract is for the sale of one $15,000 commercial tractor mower. The contract is in writing and signed by both parties, so it complies with the formalities of the Statute of Frauds.

Breach of Contract

A contract for the sale of goods (governed by Article 2) requires that the seller of goods tender perfect goods. This means that goods have to be exactly what the buyer contracted to purchase under the terms of the contract. If the seller fails to tender perfect goods, the buyer is entitled to not accept delivery of the defective goods. However, once acceptance is made, a buyer cannot revoke the acceptance unless there is a latent defect later arising (whereby the defect was not easily identified, but with subsequent use becomes clear).

Here, the contract is for a commercial mower, and the mower has to run perfectly and like an ordinary good of that type operates. After the contract was signed, Bright took delivery of the mower. The assumption would be that the mower, at first glance, seemed to conform to the good that was purchased and as such it was accepted. However, over the next six months, Bright experienced numerous problems with it. The bolt holding the mower blade broke five times under normal usage, the steering system was faulty, the gas tank installation was defective, and on several occasions the mower failed to start due to electrical faults.

Because these defects were latent and could not have easily been discovered the buyer, Bright, is entitled to revoke its acceptance of this nonconforming good by stating that the defect was a breach of the contract.

With this type of defect and breach, Bright would be entitled to a refund of the full contract price of the mower - $15,000.

Express Warranty and its Disclaimer

Moreover, Bright will be able to argue that the contract included an express warranty which stated, "this mower is free of defects in material and workmanship at the time of its delivery to the buyer." An express warranty is one which sits on the face of the contract and entitles the buyer to rely on such warranty. Express warranties cannot be disclaimed by a subsequent statement in the contract saying that there "are no warranties expressed or implied."

Here, SM made an express warranty in promising that it would be free of defects at the time of delivery and failure to abide by such warranty will subject SM to damages. There is no direct evidence that mower was defective at its delivery but it is unlikely that all the problems that arose were a result of negligence on the part of Bright (especially given that it malfunctioned under "normal usage"). Rather the logical inference is that the mower was defective at delivery and SM will be liable for violating the express warranty - the disclaimer will be irrelevant.

SM might argue that the express warranty was specific to defects in material and workmanship and not related to defects in the component parts or in installation. However, where there are vague terms in express warranties, they will be read in favor of the non-breaching party and as such, Bright will win in arguing that the types of defects that occurred were a result of defects in material and workmanship - in breach of the express warranty.

 Note: SM's disclaimer of an implied warranty of merchantability or fitness for a particular purpose was likely proper. It was in bold and on the same page as other contractual terms.

Limits to Relief

While disclaiming express warranties is improper, SM was able to limit the relief that could be sought if the mower was not defective upon delivery. Here, a term of the contract stated that in bold 12 point font that "If the mower or one of its parts fails within one year of delivery to the buyer because the mower or its component part was defective when installed, SM shall repair or replace at its sole option any such mower or component at its own cost or expense. Other remedies excluded."

Accordingly, SM properly limited Bright's relief to repairs or replacement at its sole discretion.

The facts state that Bright took the mower to SM each time it malfunctioned and SM effected repairs. Thus, SM would argue that it was abiding by its contractual duty to repair the mower and was under no obligation to replace the mower or offer a refund. Further, SM would argue that the fact that the mower would work for a while and then malfunction again is of no relevance, because SM was willing to repair each time as evidenced by the fact that the mower was returned to SM for repairs 12 times in the first six months after purchase and repairs were made each time.

Note: If the suit was for personal injuries sustained by the defective condition, then the limit to relief would not be abided by and the plaintiff would be entitled to damages for his/her injuries. Here, the suit is not for personal injuries so the limit to relief would have been proper but for the express warranty saying the mower would be free from defects.

Conclusion

Bright will be successful in its suit against SM both on a contractual and express warranty suit. Contractually, SM breached by failing to tender perfect goods, and under the express warranty by failing to deliver a mower free of defects in material and workmanship.

2. Remedies available for Bright

Damages

Compensatory Damages

Bright is entitled to recover the purchase price of the defective mower. The mower was purchased for $15,000 and based on the breach of contract, Bright will argue that he is entitled to a full refund of the purchase price. Assuming the court finds that SM did in fact breach by providing a defective product, then the breach will entitle Bright to a refund of the purchase price plus any other damages sustained as a result of the breach.

Incidental Damages

Bright will also be able to recover any incidental damages that resulted from SM's breach. Incidental damages are those that arise in dealing with the breach. Here, Bright took the mower to get repaired a total of 12 times. He will be able to recover any costs associated with taking the mower to get repaired such as the cost of the salary for the employee who had to go take it in or the gas money spent, etc.

Consequential

Bright will also argue he is entitled to consequential damages for the lost profits he sustained as a result of the breach. Consequential damages will be awarded if both parties (especially the breaching party) was aware of the lost profits that would be incurred as a result of a breach and that those losses were foreseeable.

Here, as a result of the mower being so defective (that sometimes it wouldn't even start), Bright had to cancel planned jobs and lost both clients and $5,000 in profits. Bright has a good claim here because SM knew that Bright was an agricultural services provider and that if the mower failed consistently it would cause Bright to lose both clients and profits. As such, the court should award the consequential damages. SM will argue that it was not foreseeable that the losses would be incurred as a result of the breach because it was not foreseeable that Bright would not have other mowers it could use while the mower they purchased was being repaired. Assuming it was clear that this is the only mower Bright owned, the consequential damages will be awarded at least in the amount of $5,000.

Conclusion

Bright will likely be able to recover the initial purchase price, anything expended as incidental damages, and at least the $5,000 in consequential damages.

Defenses

SM might argue that Bright is not entitled to the tender of perfect good because it was a contract for goods not suitable for personal, family or household purposes. However, this argument will fail because nothing indicates that the goods were made specifically for Bright.

Additionally, SM might say that Bright consented to the repairs or took too long to demand refund. Also fails.

Answer B

Governing law is UCC Art. 2

Where a contract is for a sale of goods, Article 2 of the UCC applies. For all other types of contracts, the common law applies. Here, the contract was for Bright Earth Solutions (A) to purchase a commercial tractor mower from SM. This is a contract for a sale of goods, therefore Art. 2 of the UCC applies to the contractual analysis set out below.

1. Is B likely to prevail in its suit against SM?

The issue here is whether B has a claim against SM for breach of contract and breach of warranty.

Valid contract

The Statute of Frauds requires that any contract for the sale of goods worth more than $500 be in writing and signed by the party against whom it is sought to be enforced, and UCC Article 2 requires that the essential term of quantity be included. This is not an issue here as a contract was entered into in writing and signed by both representatives of B and SM and it referenced "this mower", being the particular mower that B purchased from SM. There is, thus, a valid written contract for SOF and UCC purposes.

Breach of contract

Article 2 of the UCC requires a perfect tender where sale of goods is concerned; this means that the seller must tender the right number of conforming goods as required under the contract. The standard for determining "conforming goods" is that they are fit for their ordinary purposes. Failure to delivery conforming goods entitles the buyer to reject all the goods, accept some and reject the rest, or accept all and sue for damages. However, Article 2 also permits a buyer to reject a good after acceptance, where there are defects that are subsequently discovered. Acceptance of defective goods does not preclude a buyer from subsequent rejection where (i) the defect could not have been discovered at the time of delivery and the buyer relied on the seller's assurance that there were no defects; or (ii) the defect was apparent but the buyer accepted in reliance on seller's assurance that the defect would be cured.

Here, B took delivery of the mower upon signing the contract and there is nothing on the facts to suggest that the mower was not conforming at the time of delivery. However, B can argue that it was not possible to detect any defects at the time of delivery because of the nature of the good (i.e. that any defects could be discovered only after operating the mower for some time) and additionally that B relied on SM's undertaking that the mower was "free of defects in material and workmanship at the time of its delivery". In addition, B could argue that SM's undertaking to repair or replace any mower or component part that failed within 1 year of delivery constituted an assurance to cure a defect discovered after delivery. As such, B will be able to argue that the subsequent defect constituted a breach of the perfect tender rule thereby allowing it to remedies (discussed in part 2 below).

Breach of warranties

B may also argue that SM breached the express warranty set out in the contract.

Express warranty

An express warranty is a statement of fact, description of a good, or a sample or model relating to the quality of the product, where such statement, description, sample or model formed as part of the bargain into and made at such time that the buyer could have relied on the same when entering into the bargain. Here, B will argue that the statement in the contract where SM affirmed that the mower was "free of defects in material and workmanship at the time of its delivery" constituted an express warranty, that was breached when the mower subsequently broke down multiple times over the next 6 months. It is clear that this statement constituted an express warranty. On the other hand, SM will argue that the contract also contained a disclaimer that "there are no warranties express or implied...in connection with the sale of this mower", which precluded B from being able to sue on the express warranty. However, SM's argument is likely to fail. The general rule is that it is very difficult to disclaim express warranties because of the nature of the inconsistency between the disclaimer clause and the express warranty, and the court is likely to construe the interpretation of both in favor of B, the consumer who acted in reliance on the express warranty by entering into the agreement.

As such, B will be able to sue for breach of the warranty if it can be shown that the numerous problems experienced were a result of a defect in material and workmanship at the time of delivery. On the facts, it is stated that the bolt holding the blade in place broke 5 times under normal usage, the steering system was faulty, and that the gas tank installation was defective. It will be for a trier of fact to determine if this evidence shows that the defects existed at delivery, but on balance it seems like this is the case here such.

Implied warranties

B may also sue for breach of implied warranties of merchantability and fitness for particular purpose. A warranty of merchantability is provided by a commercial seller of the goods in question and warrants that the goods are fit for their ordinary purpose. A warranty of fitness for particular purpose can be provided by any seller and provides that the goods are fit for the particular purpose of the buyer, where the seller knew of the buyer's purpose and that buyer was relying on the seller to help select a suitable good. Here, SM is a commercial seller of mowers and thus can provide both types of implied warranties. B will argue that on the facts, the mower was not fit for ordinary purpose (given that the blade broke down 5 times on normal use, as well as the gas leaks and steering issues). B will also argue that it was not fit for the particular purpose which was for B to use on customers' lawns which required that the mowing lines be satisfactory, since the steering system was faulty and caused unsightly and uneven lines in mowing jobs) and that SM knew of B's particular purpose as B was an agricultural services business.

However, SM will likely be able to succeed that the implied warranties were validly disclaimed by the language. The rule is that a disclaimer must be fair and in conspicuous font and writing so that it is clear to the buyer. Here, the disclaimer clause was stated in bold and 12- point font and will likely meet this requirement. As such, B is unlikely to succeed in arguing breach of implied warranty.

2. B's remedies

If B prevails, it might be entitled to damages or rescission, provided it can argue against the validity of the disclaimer clause.

Validity of limitation of remedies clause:

A commercial contract may include a clause limiting the remedies available, provided that such clause is not unconscionable. A limitation clause may not purport to limit remedies for personal injury or operate in such a way where it limits the remedy to a one that is essentially unworkable under the circumstances. Here, the contract seeks to limit B's remedies to repair or replacement by SM, at its sole option, any mower or component part. However, B can show that the mower simply could not be repaired; on the facts, the mower was returned to SM for repairs 12 times in the first 6 months after purchase and finally that at the beginning of the 7th month, the steering wheel came off during a job, As such, B can argue that the limitation of remedies clause was unfair and should not be enforceable to limit the types of remedies available to B.

Damages

As B can demonstrate breach of contract and express warranty (discussed above), B can sue for damages, namely expectation damages, consequential damages, and any incidental damages. The expectation damages are to place B in a place it would be in had the contract been properly performed (i.e. receiving a mower that functions for ordinary purposes) and would be the cost of cover or market cost of a functioning mower. In addition, B can sue for any consequential damages (the lost $5000 in profits) as it was reasonably foreseeable to SM that any defect in its mower would cause a loss in business to B (being an agricultural services company) and lost profits. Finally, B can sue for any incidental damages such as the cost of sending the mower back and forth to SM for repair.

Rescission

B may also look to sue for rescission and obtain its money back. To succeed, B will need to show grounds for rescission such as mistake, misrepresentation, undue influence, duress and further that SM has no valid defenses such as laches, unclean hands etc. Here, B may argue that there was a misrepresentation of statement by SM as to the mower being free of defects. Misrepresentation is an untrue statement of fact regarding the product, that the buyer was objectively justified in relying on and actually relied on. If the statement was made intentionally to induce the buyer's reliance, then it is intentional misrepresentation. Here, B can show that it was justified in relying on SM's statement regarding the defect free nature of the mower and did actually do so. This serves as grounds for rescission. In addition, SM has no valid defenses in equity such as laches (e.g. that B did not sue within a reasonable time thereby causing prejudice to SM) or that B had unclean hands (i.e. acted wrongfully in relation to the matter at hand). As such, B can sue for rescission of the contract, which would entitle it to unwind the contract as if it had not been entered into, and to obtain a refund of the purchase price paid.

Q3 Community Property

Prior to her 1990 marriage to Hal in California, Wendy helped operate an antiques and rare book business owned by her father.

During the marriage, Wendy continued to work with her father in operating the business. Over the years, Wendy and her father jointly operated the business and in 1995, they signed an agreement whereby Wendy became the owner of a ½ interest in the business. Wendy had developed an exceptional talent for buying antiques and took over that part of the business in 1995. The business doubled in value from 1995 to 2000. In late 1999, Wendy's father died and by his will left his interest in the business to Wendy, including all of the business's real property and inventory.

Wendy and Hal separated early in 2014. They have lived separate and apart since then and are now involved in divorce proceedings.

How should the court allocate the value of the business between Hal and Wendy? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

Answer A

California is a community property state (CP). In a CP state, the marital economic community begins at the time of marriage and ends with (a) separation, (b) divorce or (a) the death of a spouse. Income, property and debts acquired during the marriage are presumed to be CP. Income, property and debts acquired (a) prior to marriage, (b) during marriage but pursuant to a gift or inheritance and (c) after separation or divorce are presumed to be separate property (SP). Property acquired while the couple are living in another state that would be CP if the couple had been living in a CP state is called quasi-CP and is distributed according to CP principles upon divorce or the death of a spouse.

Marriage: In California, marriage requires the consent of two individuals with the capacity to enter into the contract of marriage, along with adherence to certain formalities. Here, the facts indicate that that H and W married in California in 1990. We presume that they met all of the above requirements. As the marriage took place in California and it appears that H and W still live in California, the entirety of their marital economic community is subject to CP principles.

Separation: In California, separation requires (1) an expression of intent by one or both spouses to end the marital relationship and (2) action in conformity with that intent. Prior to 2017, a valid separation ending the marital community also required that the spouses live separate and apart. That requirement no longer holds, and this applies retroactively. Here, the facts indicate that W and H separated early in 2014 and that they have been living separate and apart since. Though the separate and apart element is no longer necessary, it certainly evinces an intent to end the marital relationship. There has therefore been a valid separation since 2014 and that is when their marital economic community ended.

1990-1995: Prior to marriage W helped operate an antiques and rare book business owned by her father. During the marriage, W continued to work with her father in operating the business.

Presumptions: As noted above, income acquired during marriage is presumed to be CP. During this period, though the business was owned by W's family, W did not own it. Therefore, it was not W's SP business. Rather, she worked for her father and probably derived an income from her work. W's income during this period would be CP but would not be incorporated into the calculations further discussed below.

Distribution: As with any other income accrued during the marriage, W's income from this period would be CP and, as such, would be split 50/50 with H upon divorce.

1995-1999: In 1995, W and her father signed an agreement whereby W became the owner of a 1/2 interest in the business.

Presumption: Property acquired during marriage is presumed to be CP. As the 1/2 interest in the business was acquired during marriage, it is presumed to be CP. However, it is not clear that W paid any consideration for her 1/2 interest. If she did not, then the 1/2 interest would be considered a gift and therefore W's SP. Though the business was SP, W's efforts invested in the business would be considered CP and therefore the community would have an interest in the business and be allotted a portion at divorce using either the Pereira or Van Camp formula. The following discussion assumes that the business was SP.

Pereira Formula: The Pereira formula applies to the allotment to CP when the increase in the value of the SP business comes from the efforts of the spouse. Here, the Pereira formula fits because the facts indicate that W had developed an exceptional talent for buying antiques and took over that part of the business in 1995, so her efforts probably contributed to the subsequent increase in the value of the business.

Under the Pereira formula, the SP is calculated as (fair market value (FMV) of the business at marriage) + [(FMV of business at marriage) * (fair rate of return) * (years of marriage)]. Here, we do not have the numbers to do the calculation. While we know that the value of the business doubled from 1995 to 2000, that is not necessarily reflective of the actual fair rate of return. Note also that the years of marriage would be 1990 to 2014, at time of separation, rather than 1990 to now.

The CP is then calculated by subtracting the SP calculated above from the FMV at time of separation.

Van Camp: The Van Camp formula applies to the allotment of CP when the increase in the value of the business is due to reasons other than the spouse's efforts, such as market forces or characteristics inherent in the business, rather than the efforts of the spouse. Here, the Van Camp formula may fit because (1) the facts indicate that the entire value of the business doubled, but we know W was only involved in 1/2, so her father's efforts probably also contributed and (2) antiques and rare books naturally go up in value over time.

Under the Van Camp formula, the CP is first calculated as [(FMV of spouse's efforts in business) minus (family expenses paid from business)] multiplied by years of marriage. Again, we do not have the numbers to do the calculation but note that the years of marriage are 1990 to 2014.

SP is then calculated as the FMV of the business at separation minus the CP calculated above.

If the spouse was under-compensated - that is, the salary she drew was lower than the actual value of her work - then the court may choose to calculate CP by removing family expenses from actual salary paid on the theory that the community has already been compensated for the spouse's efforts.

Disposition: Assuming the 1/2 interest in the business was a gift, then the formulas above would apply. If W paid consideration for her 1/2 interest, however, then she would have likely used CP and therefore the 1/2 interest would be CP. This is because the concept of tracing dictates that property takes on the character of the property used to acquire it.

1999-2014: In late 1999, W's father died and by his will left his interest in the business to W. Presumably this would be the book end of the business.

Presumptions: Property acquired during marriage is generally considered CP. However, property acquired during marriage by gift or inheritance is presumed to be SP. Here, H and W had not separated at the time W's father died. However, as W's father left W his 1/2 interest in the business by will, the interest would be S's SP.

Disposition: As this 1/2 interest in the business was definitely SP, the formulas outlined above would apply again to the CP allotment.

2014-2021: During this period H and W were separate, which ended the marital economic community.

Presumptions: Property acquired after separation is presumed to be SP. Any earnings W had from the book side of the business would then be entirely SP. If the antiques side of the business is SP, then any earnings from that side of the business would also be SP. If, however, W paid for that interest and used CP, then that interest would be CP. This is because the property acquires the character of the property used to buy it; so property acquired using CP would continue to be CP. If the antique side of the business is CP, then the community would be entitled to allotment even after separation. The following calculations presume that the antiques side of the business was CP.

Reverse Pereira: As with the regular Pereira formula, the reverse Pereira formula applies to the allotment of CP when the increase in the value of the business comes from the efforts of the spouse. Again, the reverse Pereira formula would apply because the facts indicate that W's knack for the antiques business contributed to the business's earlier success.

Under the reverse Pereira formula, the CP is calculated as (FMV of the business at separation) + [(FMV of business at separation) * (fair rate of return) * years of separation)]. Here, we do not have the numbers to do the calculation. Note also that the years of separation would be 2014 to 2021, or 2020 since it is so early in 2021.

The SP is then calculated by subtracting the CP calculated above from the FMV at time of divorce.

Reverse Van Camp: As with the regular Van Camp formula, the reverse Van Camp formula applies to the allotment of CP when the increase in the value of the business is due to reasons other than the spouse's efforts, such as market forces or characteristics inherent in the business, rather than the efforts of one spouse. Here, this may fit because antiques and rare books naturally go up in value over time.

Under the Van Camp formula, the SP is first calculated as [(FMV from spouse's efforts from business) minus (family expenses paid from business)] multiplied by years of separation. Again, we do not have the numbers to do the calculation but note that the years of separation are 2014 to 2021, or 2020 since it is so early in 2021.

CP is then calculated as the FMV of the business at divorce minus the SP calculated above.

Disposition: The book side of the business, which W inherited from her father at death is definitely SP and W will be able to keep it. It is not clear whether the antique side is SP or CP, and the court will allocate the value of the business as discussed above. If it is CP, there may be a question as to whether H will be able to maintain a 1/2 interest in it (i.e., a 1/4 interest in the whole business). It is possible that he will and that W will have to buy him out. She will be able to keep the business for herself, however, despite the usual rule of equitable division at divorce. The court will consider that the business is identified more with her than with H and that her means of income would be severely affected if she lost it.

Answer B

General Community Property Principles

California is a community property (CP) state. All property and earnings that are acquired during marriage that do not come from inheritance, gift, or devise, is considered CP. Property that a spouse acquires before marriage, after divorce or permanent separation, or during marriage via gift, inheritance, or devise is considered separate property (SP). Property acquired in a non-CP state that would be CP if the spouses were living in California is considered quasi-community property (QCP) and treated like CP upon divorce or death.

Here, Hal (H) and Wendy (W) were residents of California and married in California, so the general CP principles of California would apply to this case.

Marital Economic Community

The marital economic community is defined as the time between the formation of a valid marriage and ending with death, divorce or permanent separation. Property acquired during the marital economic community is CP, as discussed above.

Here, H and W were married in 1990 and separated in early 2014. They have lived separate in the interim and now have initiated divorce proceedings. The community begins in 1990 when the marriage was entered into, and potentially ended in 2014 if there is the requisite intent attached to their separation to not re-instate the marital economic community. Seemingly their separation in 2014 was permanent because the facts mention they lived separate and have been apart since, which has led to their divorce proceedings. There's no other mention of them rekindling any romance in between or making any other remedial measures to re-instate the marital economic community, so likely the community ended in 2014 upon their permanent separation.

Thus, the community lasted between 1990 when they got married and 2014 when they permanently separated.

VALUE OF THE BUSINESS

Character / Source of the Business

As discussed above, property acquired before marriage or during marriage through a gift, inheritance or bequest is considered SP. Property acquired during marriage or acquired from CP assets, is considered CP.

Here, W helped operate the antique business owned by her father before she and H got married. However, she did not acquire the property until after they got married and she took jointly with the operations in 1995. W would argue that the business is her SP because the business was owned by her father and her father granted her 1/2 of the business in 1995. There's no mention of her father granting H any stake in the business and no mention of H even working there. Further, W would argue that the business is hers because in 1999 when her father died, she inherited the entire business through his will. So while she and H were married in 1999 at the time she inherited the business, because the business was hers through inheritance and not through purchase or any other acquisition, means that would result in it being CP, that the business is her SP and her SP alone.

H would likely counter this and say that even though W acquired her father's interest in the business through his will in 1999, that her becoming owner of 1/2 of the business in 1995 means that the business is a CP asset. The 1/2 interest was not a result of any inheritance or gift, and seemingly the inheritance in the will only was to give her the other half she didn't own already. While the 1/2 she inherited in 1999 would be her SP because it came from an inheritance, the fact that he obtained a 1/2 ownership to the business during marriage would result in 1/2 of the business being a CP asset. However, the court would have to determine the exact circumstances surrounding the 1995 acquisition and whether it was a purchase with CP funds, SP funds or a gift.

There's no mention of whether W paid for this 1/2 interest or whether the business was a gift from her father, but all the facts mention is that they "signed an agreement" where W became 1/2 owner of the business and took a 1/2 stake. Depending on whether W paid for this 1/2 stake and where the money came, potentially this could result in 1/2 of the business being a CP asset. If she paid for the 1/2 interest with her earnings during marriage, then that 1/2 stake would be a CP asset because funds earned during marriage are a CP asset and anything bought with them would also be considered a CP asset. If the court finds that this was a gift from her father to W, then potentially this is an SP asset because it could be a gift in lieu of money or some other repayment that was specifically directed at W and not at H and gifts acquired during marriage are the SP of that spouse. While the facts are ambiguous as to what the 1/2 ownership stake came from, W clearly owns 1/2 of the business as her own SP from the inheritance from her father because inheritance during marriage is an SP asset.

Thus, depending on whether the court finds the 1/2 ownership interest W took in 1995 via the agreement with her father was purchased or a gift, potentially that 1/2 interest could be a CP asset, or an SP asset. The other 1/2 interest W took in 1999 under her father's will would be considered an SP asset because property acquired via inheritance during marriage is an SP asset.

CP Contributions to SP Business

When one spouse owns an SP business and there are CP contributions to the business, the CP acquires an interest in the SP business. The court has discretion to apply one of two formulas when determining how to apportion the CP share of the business: the Pereira formula, and the Van Camp formula.

Here, W would likely argue that the court should apply the Van Camp formula to apportion the CP share because the increase in the business was not due to her own work, but rather the work of her father and the inherent value of the business itself. The business was an antique shop that also sold old rare books. Her father owned the business and started it and even though she continued to work there, her father was really what got the business off the ground. There's no mention of how long W's father owned it, but potentially he was a mainstay in the community and someone that was very valued in the community. He could have had the business for a very long time before W began helping him out in 1990 and potentially the business was already on an upwards trajectory before she joined the team and started helping him out. Further, depending on where they live in California, W could also argue that the business was successful because of the local area. Potentially people in that area were attracted to the store because of its items and because the local population valued such a store in their community and not because of W's own contributions to the store. Even though W worked there, she would argue that the value of the business and the increase was due to her father and the business that he created and not any of her own doing.

H would certainly counter this and say that the increase in the business between 1995 and 2000 was due to W's contributions. She developed "an exceptional talent for buying antiques" and took over that part of the business in 1995. Even if the local community valued the store, it was because of W's own contributions. She had worked at the store for over 5 years and had been helping her father out with running the business. He would argue that potentially she did not have this skill before they were married because she hadn't been working there for that long, but rather developed the skill after they were married through her continued work, and the fact that she developed it after they got married would result in it being a CP asset. She did not come into the marriage with this, but because of her constant work and time spent with her father she learned these skills and trained her eye for antiquing which increased the value of the business based on her work alone and her own time spent developing her craft. That much experience and that much exposure contributed to her having an eye for antiquing and for collecting valuable items and it was this eye and expertise that increased the value of the business. Even if the 1/2 stake W acquired in 1995 was a SP interest, her own contributions through her labor and time and expertise increased the business, so much so that she solely took over the antiquing part of the business from her father because she was so good in that area and had such a skill set that H would argue she developed during the marriage meaning it is a CP asset. She was married during that time so her labor would be a CP asset and the exceptional and business savvy labor was the reason that the business doubled in value from 1995 to 2000 and no market forces could have pushed that drastic increase in value.

Likely the court would apply the Pereira formula to determine the CP share of the increase in value. While there's no mention of any outside market or economic factors that drove the increase in the business from 1995 to 2000, seemingly W's own acquired skill and expertise in this area had a huge impact on the business. While it is in the court's discretion to apply either formula, likely they would apply the Pereira formula to determine the CP share of the business.

Pereira Formula

The Pereira formula attributes the increase in value of the SP business to the labor, skill, and work of the spouse, which is considered a CP asset. The Pereira formula is more favorable to the CP because it views the labor and skill and work of the spouse as the factor behind the increase and the reason the business is doing so well.

Here, as discussed above, if the court applies the Pereira formula to determine the CP share in the SP business, it would determine that the increase in the value of the business was due to W's own experience, skill, and mastery in the area of antiquing. The SP would still have its ownership interest, but the CP share would likely be greater because the Pereira formula is more favorable to the CP interests. Thus, the court would determine the CP and SP share of the business as shown by the formula below.

Formula

Under the Pereira formula, the court determines the two shares as follows: SP = value of business at marriage + (value of business at marriage X fair rate of return [10% in California] X years of marriage). CP = fair market value of the business at divorce - the

SP share.

Here, there are no specific numbers to determine the value of the business when W started working there or acquired her interest. The two were married for 24 years so that would be applied at the end of the formula, and presumably the fair market value at marriage versus at divorce would be different because of the increase in the business during marriage, but without the specific monetary figures it is all speculative. Dependent on the discussion above and whether the interest she acquired in 1995 was an SP or a CP interest, potentially the value at marriage would be different because those were four years apart. Without the numbers and actual concrete monetary figures of the increase it is impossible to know the actual numerical figures associated with the business value, but likely the CP would have a sizable stake based off of W's contributions because her contributions seem to have drastically increased the value of the business.

Thus, if the court applies the Pereira formula, likely the CP interest would be greater because of Pereira's favoring of the CP interest.

Van Camp Formula

The Van Camp formula attributes the increase in the value of the business to market forces, the economy, the inherent business value, and all other factors not related to the hard work of the spouse. Because this formula does not consider the work of the spouse to be the reason for the increase, this formula and approach tends to favor the SP of the business owner spouse.

Here, if the court determines the Van Camp formula applies, it will be because the increase in the value of the business was due to the market forces and inherent business qualities of the business and not of W's hard work or expertise. Thus, the court would determine the CP and SP share based on the formula as described below.

Formula

Under the Van Camp formula, the court determines the shares as follows: CP = (reasonable rate of services - annual family expenses) X years of marriage. SP = fair market value of the business at divorce - CP share.

Here, as discussed above, there are no corresponding monetary values to show the actual expenditures. Likely W's reasonable rate of services was substantial because she seemingly was the sole operator of the business outside of her father and was the only person running it as there is no mention of any other employees or any other helpers, especially after her father died. There's also no mention of the family expenses or no other mention of them having any children, but depending on how much they spent annually on the family expenses, this would be factored in. Further, they were together for 24 years, so the interest would be determined by multiplying that figure at the end. Presumably the fair market value at divorce would be substantial because the business doubled in value from 1995 and 2000 and there's no mention of any other decrease in value. Without any other facts to support the numbers it is pure speculation, but likely the SP would have a more favorable interest here because the Van Camp formula more heavily favors the SP interest.

Conclusion

Likely the court would find the Pereira formula to be more appropriate for determining the SP and CP interest of the business, but without any concrete monetary values it is impossible to determine the actual percentage of both interests.

Goodwill of CP Business

Goodwill of a CP business refers to its community reputation and future business prospects and earning potential. If the goodwill of the business is earned during marriage, then it will be a CP asset.

Here, potentially the goodwill of the business could be a CP asset. If the court finds that W's acquisition of the business in 1995 was a CP acquisition and that 1/2 was a CP asset, then any other increase in goodwill from the business from there on out could be a CP asset as well. The business seemed to be doing well, saying it increased in value substantially from 1995 to 2000 and W had seemed to develop quite a specialty in that area. W's own expertise and the business's success would likely result in high projected future earnings and a good reputation throughout the community. If this comes from W's own hard work and labor, which is a CP asset, then the resulting growth of the goodwill of the business would also be a CP asset. There's no mention of any future contracts or earnings or deals that the business has lined up, but if the business is successful in the community which it seemingly is, then the goodwill and local good reputation of the business would be a CP asset and the court would have to attribute a value to this in order to distribute it evenly at divorce.

Thus, the goodwill of the business could also be factored into its value and be distributed at divorce between H and W if the court finds that the goodwill comes from CP contributions.

Distribution

W owns at least 1/2 of the business as her own SP from when her father devised it to her in his will. An increase in the business and its value would at least be half of her own SP as attributed to that 1/2 of the business. Depending on whether the court determines the 1995 acquisition of the other 1/2 was a purchase with CP funds or an SP acquisition through a gift or other SP funds purchased, then potentially 1/2 of the business is CP or SP. Further, the CP will have an interest in the SP business and its increase because of W's work there while they were married. The court will likely apply the Pereira formula to determine this interest because of the mention of W's expertise and growing skill in antiquing. However, the court has the discretion to apply either the Van Camp or Pereira formulas and the resulting CP or SP share will be different depending on which formula is applied. Further any earnings W had from her time at the business while married would be CP assets.

Q4 Professional Responsibility

Linda Lawyer is just starting out in practice. She arranges with Chiro, a chiropractor, to give Linda's name to his patients who have been in car accidents or falls. When Linda recovers money in contingent-fee lawsuits for Chiro's patients, she gives Chiro a gift, which they have agreed will be 5% of Linda's fee. If Linda recovers nothing, Chiro receives no gift. They also form a partnership, in which Chiro's services are described as "marketing."

Pete is one of Chiro's chiropractic partners. Chiro sends Pete to Linda because Pete is seeking a divorce from his wife Alice.

Pete tells Linda he can never forgive Alice because she was unfaithful. Pete tells Linda that he's having money problems and asks that she take the case on a contingency basis. Linda tells him she'll consider it if he'll have drinks with her. Pete feels he has little choice, and goes out with her. Linda initiates a sexual relationship with Pete, and agrees to take the case. Linda is increasingly distracted from Pete's case by her desire to spend time with him, sometimes filing papers hurriedly and narrowly avoiding deadlines.

Tom, Alice's divorce lawyer, calls Linda one day and says, "I know you're having sex with Pete. Either you settle this case cheaply, or I'll report you to the Bar." Linda decides to beat Tom at his own game and, without telling him, calls the Bar herself and reports his threat.

1. What ethical violations, if any, has Linda committed with respect to her:

    a. Financial arrangement with Chiro? Discuss.

    b. Partnership with Chiro? Discuss.

    c. Relationship with Pete? Discuss.

    d. Accepting Pete's case on a contingency basis? Discuss.

2. What ethical violations, if any, has Tom committed? Discuss.

Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

Answer A

Q1. What ethical violations, if any, has Linda committed with respect to her:

a. Financial arrangement with Chiro?

Fee for referral

Under ABA and California rules, a lawyer may not arrange referral agreements with non-lawyers for a fee unless it is a qualified reciprocal referral service.

Here, Linda made an arrangement with Chiro, a chiropractor who gives Linda names of his patients who have been in car accidents. This is not a qualified referral service and it involves procuring clients from a chiropractor who would see patients who come following car accidents. Their names would then be given to Linda who would then presumably contact the clients.

Thus, Linda violated the rules by engaging a non-qualified referral arrangement.

Gifts

Under ABA rules, lawyers are not permitted to solicit substantial gifts. Under California rules, gifts for past referrals are permitted as long as there is an understanding that the gift is not a consideration for future referrals and the gift is "fair".

Here, Linda gives the gift of 5% for the names. They do have an understanding that Chiro will continue to receive "gifts" if he keeps giving her name and she recovers fees from those representations. Thus, the arrangement with "gift" is prohibited under California rules.

Solicitation

Under ABA rules, solicitation, whether personally or through an agent, is prohibited. Solicitation is direct communication with a person in order to gain representation for a financial gain. Under California rules, direct solicitations in hospitals and medical facilities are presumed unethical.

Here, Chiro is referring the clients to Linda. In effect, Linda is soliciting injured clients directly after she gets their names from Chiro, knowing that they might need a lawyer following an accident for a financial gain of representing them in a case for a fee. This is especially egregious as recognized by California rules because the clients are vulnerable in these situations when they were involved in a car accident and are easily manipulated, especially when the clients are not aware of the arrangements.

Thus, Linda violates both ABA and California rules by soliciting these patients.

b. Partnership with Chiro?

Partnership with a non-lawyer

Under both ABA and California rules, a partnership with a non-lawyer is strictly prohibited to avoid any improper influence on a lawyer.

Here, Linda has formed some sort of partnership with Chiro, who is a non-lawyer that they call "marketing" whereby Chiro would provide Linda with the names of the patients that Linda would then contact in order to win representing them. Because partnership would involve both partners having a say in a strategy of the law firm, influencing strategic and legal decisions and otherwise influencing legal services, such arrangements are violative of ethical rules.

Thus, Linda violated both ABA and California rules by engaging in such partnership.

Sharing fees with non-lawyers

Under both ABA and California rules, sharing fees with non-lawyers is prohibited, unless it is for employees within a firm as part of a compensation plan.

Here, as Linda is sharing a fee with Chiro, a non-lawyer, whereby he acquires 5% of the fee for giving her names of the clients. Because Chiro is not an employee of Linda and it's not part of a compensation plan and is otherwise for an improper purpose, such fee sharing is prohibited under both ABA and California rules.

Thus, Linda violated both ABA and California rules by sharing fees in this "partnership".

c. Relationship with Pete?

Sexual relations with a client

Under ABA rules, sexual relations with a client are prohibited, unless they pre-date the lawyer-client relationship. Under California rules, lawyer is prohibited from coercing or otherwise unduly influencing a client into sexual relations.

Here, Linda started dating Pete after she took him on as a client. Their relationship started at the same time and did not pre-date the lawyer-client relationship. Additionally, Pete felt like he "had no choice" indicating that there was a coercion and the relationship was not entirely voluntary. This is especially egregious because she knew that Pete and Alice were divorcing, and he would be in a vulnerable situation from his wife being unfaithful. These circumstances in total show that sexual relations resulted from an improper influence and coercion.

Thus, under both ABA and California rules, sexual relations with Pete was a violation of ethical duties by Linda.

Competence

Under both ABA and California rules, a lawyer must represent a client and act with a skill, effort, preparation and diligence of a reasonable attorney in the like circumstances. If the lawyer cannot competently represent a client, s/he must 1) withdraw from representation, 2) acquire knowledge and skill before performance arrives, or 3) associate him/herself with a competent lawyer or seek advice from an experienced lawyer.

Here, Linda let her relations with Pete affect her performance as an attorney. She was distracted by Pete and because she wanted to spend more time with him, she frequently underperformed, filing papers in a hurry and only narrowly avoiding deadlines. That would be below what a reasonable attorney would do under the circumstances. Thus, Linda violated her duty of competently representing a client. Additionally, she likely should not have taken the case in the first place. She is a new attorney, she is taking accident cases and Pete's case was a divorce case. Ordinarily, it would not be a violation if she acquired the knowledge and expertise. However, she is frequently missing deadlines and otherwise not engaging in an exemplary competence.

Thus, Linda violated her duty of competent representation under both California and ABA rules.

Current conflict

Under ABA rules, a current conflict exists if 1) representation is adverse to one of the clients, or 2) representation is materially limited by responsibilities to other clients, third parties, or lawyer's own interests. Lawyer may still continue to represent despite a conflict, if 1) the lawyer reasonably believes that s/he may still competently represent a client, 2) obtains written consent from a client. California rules are similar but do not have a "reasonableness" requirement.

Here, Linda's own interest in sexual relations with Pete are likely in conflict with Pete's divorce case. Her own interest in him is likely to be in conflict with a representation in a divorce case where she would have to be impartial. She has a personal interest in the case, creating a conflict.

Thus, Linda likely violated her duty to Pete under both California and ABA rules.

d. Accepting Pete's case on a contingency basis?

Contingency fee agreements

Contingency fee agreements are agreements whereby a lawyer recovers a percentage fee of the recovered amount. Generally, contingency fee agreements are permitted. They must be in writing and clearly indicating how the fee is calculated. However, contingency fees are prohibited in domestic relations cases for policy reasons because there is a danger that such agreements would promote divorces. There are certain exceptions such as recovering alimony judgment due.

Here, Linda said that he would take a case on a contingency basis because Pete is having money problems. Because the case involves divorce, such arrangement is prohibited.

Thus, Linda violated ethical rules under both ABA and California rules.

Q2. What ethical violations, if any, has Tom committed?

Threatening with administrative action to gain advantage in a current litigation

Under California rules, threatening with administrative action or any other civil action or prosecution to gain advantage in a current litigation is prohibited. Under ABA there are no such rules.

Here, Tom threatened that he would report Linda to the Bar about her relations with Pete in order to gain advantage in the current divorce proceedings where Linda is an adversary attorney. Such threat is strictly prohibited under California rules.

Thus, Tom violated California rules by making such threats.

Reporting violations of the rules to the authorities

Under ABA, a lawyer must report violations of the ethical rules. Under California, there is no such reporting requirement. However, under California rules, the lawyer him/herself must report to the bar of any own professional misconduct.

Here, it would be a violation for Tom not to report Linda's misconduct to the bar under the ABA rules but not under California rules.

Thus, Tom violated ABA rules by not reporting the misconduct.

Answer B

1. Ethical Violations of Linda

In California, lawyers are obligated to comply with the ethical rules promulgated by the Rules of Professional Conduct (RPC) and the State Bar Act (SBA). The ABA also promulgates the Model Rules (MR) which CA will take under advisement in conjunction with the CA rules.

a. Financial arrangement with Chiro

Referral fees

Under the MR, lawyers are prohibited from engaging in exclusive referral arrangements that result in a pecuniary gain for the lawyer, absent participation in an approved attorney referral program. Here, L has made an agreement with C to give L's name to his patients when they suffer personal injuries and when L recovers for these patients, she will pay him a gift of 5% of Linda's fees. Under the MR, referral fees are strictly prohibited and as such, L is in violation of the rules regarding referral fees as they are prohibited under the MR.

Under the CA rules, lawyers may not engage in straight referral fee arrangements; however, they may provide a gift as a gesture of thanks when a referral is provided. The gift must be given as purely a gesture of thanks and not for the purpose of a quid pro quo or for securing future referrals. Here, L has arranged with C to give him a gift that amounts to 5% of L's fee in contingent fee lawsuits. Even though they call this a gift, it is clearly not a gift. There is a clear quid pro quo arrangement whereby L is paying C for referring business. L is likely to argue this as well. She will argue that it is a gift pure and simple and she has called it as such, but this argument will not succeed. A referral fee disguised as a gift is not permitted under the CA rules. As such, L has violated the CA ethical rules by agreeing to pay a referral fee to C in exchange for his referral of clients.

Additionally, any referrals cannot be exclusive. It is not clear that the arrangement is exclusive, but to the extent that it is, it is not permitted. L may also attempt to argue that there is no quid pro quo because she is not offering to send patients to C, but this will fail because the exchange of money for the referral of patients is the quid pro quo and thus, is a violation of the rules.

Fee Splitting

Under the MR and the CA rules, lawyers are strictly prohibited from splitting fees with non- lawyers. The exception to this rule is where fees are paid to non- lawyers for compensation, as retirement benefits, and the like. Here, L is purporting to split the fees she earns as a lawyer with a non- lawyer, the chiropractor, C. This is strictly prohibited under the MR and the CA rules. L will likely attempt to argue that she is permitted to compensate staff for wages and earnings resulting from the work they perform on behalf of her and in assisting her in her cases, but this argument will fail. C is a chiropractor and even though it seems that L and P have agreed to form a partnership, it does not change the fact that lawyers are not permitted to split fees with non- lawyers.

Solicitation

Under the MR and CA rules, solicitation is prohibited when it is in person or live direct telephone or internet chat in nature. Here, the facts indicate that C's services are described as marketing services, meaning that C is likely conducting in person solicitation of L's services as a result of the in person patients C meets as part of his job as a chiropractor. While L might argue that C is merely a conduit and there is no guarantee that C's clients will turn to L for legal services, C will be deemed to be engaging in solicitations on L's behalf. As such, this marketing/solicitation agreement will be another of L's violations of ethical rules.

b. Partnership with Chiro

Formation of Law Partnership

Under the MR and CA rules, lawyers are not permitted to form law partnerships with non-lawyers. Here, the facts indicate that L and C formed a partnership and C's services are described as marketing. While law firms do typically have marketing departments whereby they market themselves outside of the firm, a law partnership between a lawyer and a non-lawyer is strictly prohibited.

Here, the facts indicate that C is a chiropractor, not a lawyer. There is no information to suggest that C is a lawyer and as such, the joining of L and C as partners as a lawyer and marketer is a violation of the ethical rules under both MR and CA analyses.

Splitting Fees

As discussed above, L and P's partnership, which by implication means they are sharing in the profits and losses of their respective businesses, is a violation of the fee splitting rules promulgated by the CA rules and the MR. C and L's partnership is improper between a lawyer, and also due to the fact that C is sharing in the profits of L's cases potentially, L's partnership arrangement is a violation of the ethical rules under both CA and MR.

c. Relationship with Pete

Duty of Loyalty

A lawyer has a duty of loyalty to act in the best interests of their clients and exercise independent professional judgment. When a personal conflict of a lawyer may materially limit their ability to represent a client to the best of their ability, they may be in violation of their duty of loyalty. A lawyer may represent a client when there is a personal conflict if he or she believes objectively and subjectively that he can provide representation that is not limited, it is not prohibited by law, it is not in violation of the ethical rules, and the client gives informed written consent (CA) or informed consent, confirmed in writing (MR). Here, while it is highly unlikely that a lawyer engaged in sexual relationship with a client can give objectively solid representation, this representation is likely in violation of the ethical rules that prohibit sexual relationships with clients.

Sexual Relationships with Clients

Under both the MR and CA rules, lawyers are prohibited in engaging in sexual relationships with their clients, unless the sexual relationship existed prior to the attorney client relationship. California also has a specific exclusion that applies to lawyers who are married. The conflict of interest that arises due to a sexual relationship with a client is not waivable.

Here, the facts indicate that L met P through a referral from C. As such, P and L did not have a relationship prior to commencing their relationship as attorney and client. They clearly were not married; in fact, L was hired by P to help him secure a divorce and as such, the married couple exception is not applicable. Additionally, L may argue that P will agree to sign a waiver and indicate that he is fine with the concurrent sexual relationship and representation, but this prohibition cannot be waived by client consent. As such, L will be in violation of the ethical rules by engaging in a sexual relationship with her client that began after the representation had started.

Start of Attorney Client Relationship

The attorney client relationship begins when the client reasonably believes that the attorney client relationship begins. Attorneys and clients may meet prior to deciding to formally engage as attorney and client, but to the extent that the relationship is confirmed, the conversations that took place prior to a formal engagement will likely be deemed to comprise the start of the attorney client relationship.

Here, the facts indicate that P confided in her regarding his relationship with his former spouse, A. This initial meeting whereby P clearly gave L confidential information and conducted himself such that the relationship was likely to have started, would probably be deemed to have begun the attorney client relationship between L and P. Although L states that she'll consider the case if he has drinks with her, P's actions indicate that he believed the attorney client relationship had already begun. After the drinks outing, L initiated a sexual relationship with P, who at that point, after drinks and an initial consultation, likely believed he was her client, even though those acts occurred before she agreed to take the case.

L will attempt to argue that she began her relationship with P prior to the attorney client relationship, but this argument will likely fail. The facts seem to indicate that P likely believed the relationship had already begun and, thus, the exception for preexisting sexual relationships is likely not applicable. As such, L likely abused her position of power and is in violation of the ethical rules to not engage in a sexual relationship with a client.

Even if L was successful in arguing that the attorney client relationship began after the sexual relationship, there are no facts indicating that P, as the client, disclosed in writing that he was comfortable to continue with the representation in light of their sexual relationship. As such, L is likely in violation of the ethical rules.

Duty to Decline Representation

A lawyer is under a duty to decline representation if the representation would lead to a violation of the ethical rules of conduct. Here, by representing P, a client L is in a sexual relationship with, L is violating the rules of professional conduct under MR and CA principles as discussed above. As such, L is under an obligation to decline representation in accordance with the expected violation of ethical rules. L is in violation of her duty to decline representation when she is in a sexual relationship with P before, in her mind, she formally undertakes the representation. She should not have undertaken the representation of P and has violated her ethical duty by doing so.

d. Accepting Pete's case on contingency basis

Interest in Cases

Under the MR and CA rules, an attorney may only obtain a financial interest in a case to the extent that it doesn't involve criminal or divorce matters. Here, the case is a divorce matter and this i [sic]

Contingency Fee Arrangements

Under the MR and CA rules, contingency fee arrangements are permissible so long as they are not unreasonable or unconscionable and they are not for compensation related to criminal cases or conditioned upon fees that would be awarded in securing a divorce. To be valid in CA, a contingency fee arrangement must be in writing, must include the duties and responsibilities of the lawyer and the client, must set forth the details regarding the calculation of the fee, and the fee must be reasonable. Here, L has agreed to take P's divorce case on a contingency fee basis and as such, this is a violation of the MR and CA rules. P's case is a divorce case and L is clearly working to secure a favorable divorce settlement.

L might argue that P having money problems and as such, she agreed to take on his case on a contingency fee basis to help him, but under CA rules, this is not permissible. Under CA rules, lawyers may not advance costs or fees. As L has engaged in a contingency fee agreement for P's divorce, this is a violation of both CA and MR.

Duty of Competence

Under the MR, a lawyer is under a duty to represent a client with the appropriate knowledge, skill, and experience such that they can provide the client with competent representation. A lawyer may become competent by putting in the time necessary to gain competence or by associating with a competent lawyer. In CA, a lawyer must not knowingly, recklessly, or intentionally fail to represent their client with competence. Here, all of the other relationship issues aside, it is necessary that a lawyer be competent in the representation of the client. Here, the facts indicate that L is just starting out in practice and she seems to have perhaps some experience in the field of personal injury. She agreed to take on P's case for a divorce and it is not clear that she has any experience in this field. The facts are silent as to whether she had undertaken any steps to gain competence in the field of divorce law and whether she has associated with an experienced lawyer. Unless L becomes competent in this field or associates herself with a competent lawyer in this field, she will be in violation of her duty of competence to P under both MR and CA rules. Additionally, L is being distracted by her relationship with P, which means she is not providing the most competent representation possible. She clearly is not undertaking time and efforts necessary to competently represent P.

L might argue that P doesn't mind and will waive her incompetence, but unfortunately, waiver of competence is not permitted under either CA rules or MR. L has clearly violated the duty of competence to her client, P.

Duty of Diligence

Under the MR, a lawyer is obligated to perform their duties in a diligent and timely manner such that the lawyer is a zealous advocate for the client. Under CA rules, a lawyer is obligated to not knowingly, recklessly, or intentionally fail to act with diligence. Here, the facts indicate that L is increasingly distracted by her desire to spend time with P and files papers hurriedly and narrowly avoiding deadlines. Due to her inability to act as a zealous advocate for P, filing his papers in a concerted manner and giving his case the appropriate time needed to ensure he is adequately represented, L is breaching her duty of diligence under both the MR and CA rules.

2. Ethical violations of Tom

Duty Not to Threaten

In CA, lawyers are not permitted to threaten opposing parties or other clients with a claim that lacks merit to gain some kind of strategic advantage. Here, T, who is A's divorce lawyer, has called L and threatened to report her for having sex with her client, P. This is forbidden under the ethical rules as it is clearly based on T's statements that he is intending to use this information to induce L to convince her client that he should settle the case. As such, T is in violation of his ethical duty not to threaten with the prospect of influencing the result of a case.

T will likely argue that he is threatening L with a meritorious breach of duty, L's personal relationship with P that she has engaged in with her client. And while this may be true, it is an inappropriate use of the information as it is clearly being used to threaten L and P regarding the outcome of the case. As such, T has violated his ethical duties by threatening L.

Duty to Report

Under the MR, lawyers are under a duty to report misconduct of other lawyers when it pertains to matters of clear and weighty importance, like truthfulness or honesty, that would impact a lawyer's ability to practice law. Under the CA rules, there is no such duty to report misconduct of others. Rather, there is a duty to self-report conduct. Here, under a MR analysis, it must be determined whether L's relationship with T is a matter of clear and weighty importance that weighs on L's ability to practice law. While it is certainly a violation of ethical duties for L to engage in a sexual relationship with her client, as discussed above, she will likely argue that it does not in any way relate to her ability to practice law or her truthfulness or honesty. T will likely argue that any violation of the ethical rules is of clear and weighty importance and L's behaviors are report worthy. It is possible that under the MR, T violated his duty to report by not reporting L's misconduct to the state bar.

In CA, as discussed above, only lawyers have a duty to self -report their ethical misgivings. As such, under CA law, T is not under a duty to report L's relationship with P.

Q5 Real Property

Ed owned a parcel of land on the north side of a rural highway. A lane connected the highway to the small country inn Ed operated on the land. Ten years ago, Ed entered into a signed written agreement conveying a right-of-way easement over the lane to Fran, his neighbor north of his parcel. Fran operated a commercial farm with a small bunkhouse for farm workers on her land. She often used Ed's lane to access the farm and bunkhouse from the highway.

Recently, Fran announced that she was converting her farm into a 50-lot residential subdivision and the bunkhouse to a computer server center. She informed Ed that she wanted to run new electric lines and a fiber optic cable along the lane.

Fifteen years ago, Ed and Gloria, his then-neighbor on the south side of the highway, had entered into a signed written agreement in which Gloria covenanted that she and her successors in interest would use her property only as a commercial organic garden and, in exchange, Ed would purchase produce from Gloria for use in his country inn. Soon thereafter, Gloria sold her land to Henry. Ed continued to buy produce from Henry.

Recently, Henry informed Ed that the more intense development Fran had planned for her parcel and the increased traffic along the highway justified the conversion of Henry's garden into a combination truck stop and diner.

Ed objected to Fran's and Henry's intended changes and decided to sue both of them to enforce his rights.

1. What rights and interests do Ed and Fran each have in the lane, and may Fran, over Ed's objection, carry out her plans for the lane? Discuss.

2. What rights and interests do Ed and Henry each have in the garden property, and may Henry, over Ed's objection, carry out his plans for that property? Discuss.

Answer A

Easements

An easement is a property right that grants the use of land to someone who does not otherwise own the property. It can either be tied to anther parcel of land (appurtenant) or be tied to the person who has the easement (in gross). Typically, easements are appurtenant, but it does not appear to matter for the controversy here.

Ten years ago, Ed and Fran entered into an agreement for an express easement. Fran's property benefited from the easement, so it is the dominant estate, while Ed's was burdened, so he has the servient estate. This was a signed document, so it appears that it has satisfied the requirement that it comply with the Statute of Frauds. There is a valid express easement.

With that easement, Fran has the right to use the lane as she has been doing for the past ten years (as they agreed). She also has the right to make minor changes to her use so long as it is reasonable under the circumstances. Her right to use the lane is not exclusive (Ed can use it too). And Fran has the obligation to pay or make repairs necessary to the easement.

Change in use

When easements are established, they are typically limited to the use that was agreed upon. Establishing the use of the lane does not give Fran the absolute right to use it however she sees fit. A court will judge whether a change in use of an easement is allowable based on a test of reasonableness.

Fran says that she needs to run new electric lines and a fiber optic cable along the lane because she is converting her farm into a 50-lot residential subdivision. While needing the additions to the lane, given the changes to the property she is making, is reasonable for Fran, the court will question whether it is a reasonable accommodation based upon the agreement that was made between the parties.

Given these circumstances, it does not appear to be reasonable. This is transforming the use of the easement into something it never was before. Before it was used to access the small farm and bunkhouse from the highway. Now Fran wants to install significant electrical infrastructure. Importantly, this is inconsistent with how Ed, one of the signatories to the easement, uses his land. He runs a small country inn. While Fran's old farm and bunkhouse, along with a path used to reach it, did not affect Ed's enjoyment of his land, his inn will be materially hurt if he is forced to place cables and electric lines along the path. Ed does not have a right to tell Fran what she does with her property (changing the farm and bunkhouse into large residential lots), but he will convince the court that her attempt to add the lines (and potentially the cable, although it may be allowed if the court believes it can be underground and not an eyesore, resulting in minimal harm to Ed) is not reasonable under the circumstances.

Ed will be able to enforce his rights to maintain the easement as to its current use with Fran.

Real Covenants

Real covenants occur when owners of property covenant to engage or refrain from certain behaviors with their property regarding one another. That is what appeared to happen between Ed and Gloria 15 years ago. Here, Ed now seeks to enforce the rights under the covenant to prevent Henry, a successor in interest from Gloria, from changing his land into a truck stop and diner, in violation of the agreement Ed had struck with Gloria.

While Ed could have simply enforced his contractual rights with Gloria, since Henry is not a party to that contract, Ed will try to enforce his rights under a real covenant. In order to enforce the burden of a covenant you must show that there is privity, intent for the covenant to run with the land to successors in interest, notice, the covenant touches and concerns the land, and that it complies with the Statute of Frauds. I will address each below.

Privity

While for the benefit to run with the land in a real covenant, it only requires minimal vertical privity, for the burden to run with the land, there must be horizontal and complete horizontal privity. Here, the burden is running because it is Ed who is trying to enforce the rights, or burden, under the real covenant on Henry, who was not a party to the original contract (and therefore is only subject to the covenant if it runs with the land).

Horizontal privity occurs when the covenant was involved in the actual establishment of the horizontal transaction of the real property between the landowners. A common way to see if this is the case is to see if the covenant is in the deed. Here, Ed and Gloria simply entered into an agreement to use their property in specific ways, without the required transaction relating to the land. Therefore, the requirement for horizontal privity is not met.

Complete vertical privity is also required to enforce the burden of a real covenant. Complete vertical privity means that the entire property interest, nothing short of that, must be passed along to the successor in interest against whom the burden is sought to be enforced. Here, it appears that Gloria sold her entire interest, so vertical privity is met.

While complete vertical privity exists, horizontal privity does not. Therefore, the requirement of privity has not been met.

Intent

It must be the intent of the parties to the contract that the covenant run with the land. Here, the facts state that the agreement stated the covenant applied to Gloria and her successors in interest. This is sufficient evidence to show that the requirement of intent is met.

Notice

A purchaser of land, such as Henry, must be on notice that the covenant exists as well, or else it will not be enforceable. Here, the facts are unclear. On one hand, they state that Ed did continue to buy fruit from Henry and Henry informed Ed, giving him a chance to evaluate his legal obligations, before going ahead with the change. On the other, Henry may have simply been giving a kind of heads up to Ed, and Ed's actions do not serve as evidence to what Henry knew. These facts do not cut one way or the other definitively, but it seems likely that Henry was indeed aware of the agreement between Gloria and Ed.

The requirement of notice is met.

Touch and Concern

Real covenants must also touch and concern the land. That means that each party enters into the agreement to benefit their land, rather than entering into unrelated contractual relations regarding personal conduct that have nothing to do with the property. Here, Ed benefits from having a consistent supplier of produce to serve his country in, while Gloria benefits by having a consistent buyer of goods for her business. These are both tied to the pieces of property.

The touch and concern requirement is met.

Statute of Frauds

As will all contracts regarding real property, the contract must comply with the Statute of Frauds. Here, the facts state that they entered into a signed written agreement, demonstrating compliance with the Statute of Frauds.

Conclusion re Real Covenant

As the above demonstrates, Ed has satisfied the requirements of intent, notice, touch and concern, and Statute of Frauds that are necessary to enforce his rights against Henry. However, he has fallen short of establishing the final prong of privity necessary, meaning he will not be able to enforce his rights as a real covenant. However, the remedy available when enforcing a real covenant is damages. Ed appears to want to maintain the status quo, meaning he may have another option.

Equitable Servitude

An equitable servitude is similar to a real covenant but has two important differences. First, while it requires a showing on intent, notice, touch and concern, and compliance with the Statute of Frauds (things Ed has shown), it does not require privity. Privity is the one issue Ed was missing, meaning that he will be able to enforce his rights under an equitable servitude.

Second, while damages are not the available remedy under an equitable servitude, an injunction is. Here, Ed objects to Henry's change, and an injunction preventing Henry from changing the land from its use as an organic garden is exactly what he wants. Therefore, Ed will be able to prevent Henry from carrying out his plans for the property.

Changed Circumstances Doctrine

Henry may counter that he should not have to abide by the contract because of the changed circumstances doctrine. This applies in situations where there have been drastic changes to the land and the surroundings such that it makes it unreasonable to comply with the former restrictions placed by covenants/equitable servitudes/implied reciprocal servitudes. However, this is a very high bar to establish. The facts do not suggest that it is infeasible, or even close to it, for him to continue operating as a commercial organic garden. Rather, it appears that due to external factors, he may have a better commercial option if he switches to being a truck stop and diner. The existence of a better commercial opportunity on its own is not sufficient to release Henry from his legal obligation.

Ed will still be able to enforce his rights via injunction under the equitable servitude.

Answer B

Easements

Express Easement

An easement is the right to enter the property for a particular purpose, but it does not grant any right of possession or enjoyment in the land.

An express easement is an easement given in writing signed by the party to be charged in order to satisfy the Statute of Frauds.

Here, Ed gave signed written agreement to Fran over the lane going to the highway. Therefore, this was a valid express easement.

Termination of An Easement

Easements are presumed to last forever. However, they can be terminated by a writing, oral statement, and act of abandonment, selling of the servient estate to a bona fide purchaser without notice, or merging of the dominant and servient estate (the benefited and burdened estate, respectively).

Here, there is no indication that there has been any attempt to terminate this express easement. Fran did not say or write that she was abandoning the easement and Ed (the servient owner) has not sold his land.

Therefore, Fran will successfully argue that the easement is still valid.

Use of an Easement -- Surcharging the Easement

An easement can be used in a reasonable way for the purpose that it has been given. If the dominant estate owner exceeds the reasonable use of the easement and thus surcharges the easement, the servient estate holder can sue to enforce an injunction and prevent the use beyond what is reasonable.

Additionally, the user of the easement can do what is reasonably necessary for the maintenance of the easement even if it burdens the servient estate owner.

Here, Ed will argue that he gave Fran this right of way easement so she could access her farm and bunkhouse from the highway, not to run electrical lines and cables across it. Therefore, she is surcharging the easement by going beyond the scope of its use. Additionally, these additions of cables are not maintenance of the easement, that would be adding something to the easement.

Here, Fran will argue that the right of way easement was not conditioned on the fact that she continue to use the property as a farm and bunkhouse. Therefore, running the cables along the lane is now reasonable for the use of her property and thus the easement should still apply to it.

Here, the court will likely find that the right of way express easement was intended for the use of Fran having access to her property, not to run lines and cables across it or along it. Therefore, by wanting to install cables along the lane, Fran is exceeding the reasonable use of the easement. Therefore, Ed can likely get an injunction to prevent Fran from carrying out her plans with the lane.

Covenants and Servitudes

A covenant or servitude is a condition on the use of land. A covenant is when the person seeking to enforce the covenant is seeking damages. An equitable servitude is when they are seeking an injunction.

Here, Ed and Gloria entered into an agreement when Gloria covenanted that she and her successors would use the property as a garden and Ed would purchase produce from her in exchange. However, Gloria sold the land to Henry, but Ed continued to be able to buy produce from Henry.

Now, Henry wants to get out of this covenant.

Covenants

Burden to Run

For there to be a valid covenant to enforce for damages the subsequent owner of the burdened estate must have 1) notice 2) in writing 3) horizontal privity 4) vertical privity 5) intent 6) and the covenant must touch and concern the land.

Notice

The owner must have notice (actual, constructive, or inquiry).

--Actual

Actual means that the new owner has actual knowledge of the covenant at the time of conveyance.

Here, it appears that Henry has actual knowledge of the covenant because he continued to sell Ed produce after he bought the land and there are no facts suggesting that he learned this later. It is likely that Gloria informed Henry of this in the sale of the land considering her contract with Ed that her successors in interest would also be bound.

--Constructive

Constructive notice means that the covenant is recorded in the chain of title.

There is no indication here that anything is in the title to the property because this covenant was just in a signed written agreement, not the deed itself.

--Inquiry

Inquiry notice is when there are facts or circumstances that would lead a reasonable person to further inquire about the property.

Here, Henry is selling product to Ed, so he seems to be aware of the covenant and thus inquiry notices doesn't apply.

Thus, Henry had actual notice of the covenant.

Writing

Here, the covenant was set out in a signed writing.

Horizontal Privity

Horizontal privity means that the covenant was set out in the conveyance of the land between the original grantor and grantee.

Here, there is no indication of that.

Facts indicate that Ed and Gloria were merely neighbors who signed a written agreement. Thus, this was not a covenant set out between a grantor and grantee, but just a contract between to neighbors, so there is no horizontal privity.

Vertical Privity

Vertical privity means that the new owner owns the same interest as the original owner. Here, it appears that Gloria sold all of her land to Henry and there are no facts to the contrary.

Thus, Henry likely has the same interest in the property that Gloria did and therefore there is vertical privity.

Intent

Intent means that there is an intent that the subject matter of the covenant be affected.

Here, there was clearly an intent for Gloria/Henry's land to be subject to this produce covenant that limited her use to a garden in exchange for Ed buying her produce because they explicitly put that in the written agreement.

Touch and Concern

Touch and concern means the covenant is valuable to the benefitted party.

Here, the covenant is valuable to Ed, who is the benefitted party because, he gets to buy organic produce for his country inn which he runs on his property. Additionally, it also benefits Ed's "country inn" by being right next to a garden which is likely more appealing to guests out in the country than a truck stop/diner combination would be.

Thus, this covenant touches and concerns the land.

However, since there is no horizontal privity, Ed does not have a right to seek damages for breaching this covenant.

Benefit to Run

To determine if the benefit to run for a subsequent owner of the benefitted parcel requires 1) notice 2) intent 3) vertical privity 4) and for it to touch and concern the land.

Here, Ed was the original party to the covenant, and he is the one trying to enforce it; therefore, there is no need to analyze whether the benefit runs. That only applies to subsequent owners of the benefitted estate.

Here, Ed can seek to enforce the covenant without showing this.

Equitable Servitude

Burden to Run

Ed may also seek an injunction for this equitable servitude and prevent Henry from changing the land from a commercial organic garden into a truck stop and diner.

For the burden to run for an equitable servitude there must be 1) notice 2) a writing 3) intent 4) and it must touch and concern the land. There is no requirement for privity.

Notice

See above for rule statement.

See above for discussion as to why Henry likely had actual notice of the covenant.

Writing

See above for discussion how this equitable servitude is in writing because it was set forth in the written agreement between Gloria and Ed.

Intent

See above for rule statement.

See above for discussion on why there was intent.

Touch and Concern

See above for rule statement.

See above for discussion for why this equitable servitude likely touches and concerns the land.

Therefore, since all four of these elements are likely met, Ed is able to enforce this equitable servitude and get an injunction that prevents Henry from operating the land as anything other than the commercial garden.

Benefit to Run

For the benefit to run for an equitable servitude it requires 1) notice 2) intent 3) and that it touch and concern the land.

Here, see above for discussion as to why Ed does not need to show the benefit to run because he is the original party to the servitude.

Termination of a Covenant/Servitude

A covenant or equitable servitude can be terminated based on abandonment, change in circumstances, estoppel, written release, and merger of the dominant and servient estates.

Change of Circumstances

Here, Henry is asserting that this covenant/servitude is terminated and thus cannot be enforced because of change of circumstances. Henry will argue that Fran's change to her parcel and increased traffic change the circumstances of the area such that this covenant no longer should apply.

Fran used to use the land as a farm and bunk house, but now, Henry will argue, she is changing that to 50 residential homes and a computer server center, thus changing the nature of the area from agricultural and farmland. Thus, since there will be more people and less farms. a truck stop and diner now fit within these new circumstances. Additionally, many more people will be in the area because instead of one farm with some workers on Fran's land, it will be 50 residences with people living in them.

Ed will argue back that she is changing her land into majority residential housing which is different in nature to a truck stop or diner which are entirely different types of establishments for commercial uses. Ed will argue that keeping the garden is still applicable and should be enforced because this is an agricultural area and thus a truck stop and diner do not fit in the area. This is a "rural" area, even with additional residential homes.

Here, because of the likely massive construction changes that will take place on Fran land, the increase in traffic due to 50 residential houses being used, and the change from using the land for agriculture/farming to a different use, the court could likely find that the circumstances have changed enough that the covenant/servitude should no longer apply to Henry's land even it was previously enforceable.

Therefore, Henry can likely carry out his plans over Ed's objections.

ESSAY EXAMINATION INSTRUCTIONS

Your answer should demonstrate your ability to analyze the facts in the question, to tell the difference between material facts and immaterial facts, and to discern the points of law and fact upon which the case turns. Your answer should show that you know and understand the pertinent principles and theories of law, their qualifications and limitations, and their relationships to each other.

Your answer should evidence your ability to apply the law to the given facts and to reason in a logical, lawyer-like manner from the premises you adopt to a sound conclusion. Do not merely show that you remember legal principles. Instead, try to demonstrate your proficiency in using and applying them.

If your answer contains only a statement of your conclusions, you will receive little or no credit. State fully the reasons that support your conclusions, and discuss all points thoroughly.

Your answer should be complete, but you should not volunteer information or discuss legal doctrines that are not pertinent to the solution of the problem.

Unless a question expressly asks you to use California law, you should answer according to legal theories and principles of general application.

Q1 Professional Responsibility

Mary is a lawyer and represents Peg in a lawsuit alleging sexual harassment against Doug. Doug's lawyer is Len and the case is set for trial in Superior Court. Mary and Len dated and were intimate in the 1990s while in law school. They remain good friends, but are no longer romantically involved. Mary has not told Peg anything about her relationship, past or present, with Len.

Mary has determined that Doug will have to pay Peg damages after trial and that the primary issue in the litigation is the amount of damages. Mary estimates that, at trial, a court could award as little as $50,000 or as much as $150,000.

Doug testified in a deposition a month ago that he had never been unfaithful to his wife. Peg confided to Mary that she has solid evidence confirming that, for the past year, Doug has been engaging in an extramarital sexual affair about which his wife is unaware. Peg instructed Mary to use the information about the affair as leverage in settlement discussions to get the maximum amount in damages.

Mary agrees that, if she uses the fact of the affair in her negotiations with Len, the case will likely settle for a larger amount to Peg than if she doesn't mention the affair. Mary, however, strongly dislikes the idea of using that information. She is especially uncomfortable using this tactic in a case involving her good friend, Len.

1. What ethical violations, if any, has Mary committed by not telling Peg about her past and present relationship with Len? Discuss.

2. Should Mary use the fact of Doug's affair in settlement negotiations? Discuss.

3. If Peg persists, can Mary ethically withdraw from representing Peg? Discuss.

Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

Answer A

Mary's Past and Present Relationship with Len

Duty of Loyalty

Under both the ABA rules and the California rules, an attorney has a duty of loyalty to her client. This duty includes an obligation to avoid conflicts of interest between current clients, current and former clients, clients and third parties, clients and the attorney herself, and organizational conflicts when representing an entity such as a corporation. There are two duties relevant to Mary's past relationship with opposing counsel. First, an attorney cannot represent a client when one of her personal interests materially conflicts with an interest of the client in a way that could impair the attorney's representation of the client. However, if the attorney reasonably believes -- that is, subjectively believes in an objectively reasonable way -- that she can diligently and competently represent the interests of the client, she can still represent the client as long as she discloses the issue and receives informed consent. Under the ABA, informed consent may be oral and confirmed in writing, while under the California rules there must be written informed consent. Second, there is a specific duty with respect to relationships involving opposing counsel. If the attorney has a close personal relationship with opposing counsel such as a familial relationship or close friendship, the attorney must disclose that potential conflict to the client. As with the general rule, in order to press forward with the representation, the attorney must reasonably believe that she can adequately represent the interests of the client. Under the ABA, the attorney must receive informed consent, while under the California rules the attorney must provide the client with a written disclosure of her relationship to opposing counsel.

Here, Mary previously dated Len and was intimate with him during law school. She also considers him a "good friend." Under both the ABA and California rules, this arguably qualifies as a close personal relationship with opposing counsel akin to a familiar relationship or close friendship. As a result, out of an abundance of caution in attempting to comply with the "close relationship with opposing counsel" rule, Mary should provide Peg with written disclosure of this potential conflict under the California rules and receive informed consent under the ABA rules. Further, even if her former relationship with Len does not constitute a close relationship with opposing counsel (say, because it is less close than a best friend or parent), Mary must still receive informed consent under the broader and more general personal interest rule. Under the broader rule, she must receive informed consent confirmed in writing for the ABA rules, or informed written consent for the California rules.

Another problem worth mentioning is that Mary may not be permitted to represent Peg in this matter whatsoever, as it appears she may not be able to competently and diligently represent Peg. The problem states that Mary is deeply uncomfortable with mentioning Doug's affair even though this maneuver would likely lead to a better settlement award for her client. Specifically, it says she doesn't want to use this tactic against her good friend, Len. This suggests that even if Mary does believe that she can adequately represent Peg, that belief may be objectively unreasonable. Unless she is able to overcome her personal misgivings and zealously represent Peg, then Mary should withdraw from the representation. Further, given that litigation is ongoing, Mary would need to seek approval from the court in order to withdraw from the representation.

Using Doug's Affair In Settlement Negotiations

Candor to the Tribunal

Under both the ABA rules and the California rules, an attorney owes a duty of candor to the tribunal. This means that an attorney may not knowingly offer false evidence and must correct any material misstatements or misrepresentations on the record. While an attorney may offer evidence to the tribunal if they worry, but are not certain, that the evidence may be false, in general an attorney should strive to represent their clients with candor and honesty to the court. That said, an attorney must balance this obligation against a duty to zealously represent the interests of their client within the ethical bounds of the law.

Here, it is possible that Peg's claim about the affair is true. It does not appear that Mary has investigated the truth of this claim. This means that Mary does not know for certain that the evidence is false, and she likely can offer the evidence to the tribunal without violating her duty of candor to the tribunal. That said, some courts interpret the duty of candor to the tribunal to include properly investigating the factual basis for any assertions. If so, Mary would need to look into the validity of Peg's assertion before bringing it up in court in order to comply with her duty of candor to the tribunal.

Duty of Fairness

Under both the ABA rules and the California rules, an attorney owes a duty of fairness to opposing counsel. This means that the attorney may not suppress evidence she is required to disclose, and ought not to lie to opposing counsel or make dishonest representations to opposing counsel with the goal of misleading opposing counsel.

Here, as mentioned, there is no reason to think that Peg's discussion of Doug's affair is false. As a result, it would not violate the duty of fairness to bring up the affair during settlement negotiations. Thus, discussing the affair during settlement negotiations would not violate the duty of fairness to opposing counsel (unless there is reason to think Peg is lying, or Mary investigates the claim and discovers it is false).

Duty of Honesty

Under both the ABA rules and the California rules, an attorney owes a general duty of honesty to those they interact with in their role as an attorney. This means the attorney must not make material misrepresentations or state falsehoods within the scope of their role as an attorney.

Here, Mary needs to investigate the foundation of Peg's claim that Doug has had an affair. Once she investigates the claim and determines whether it is certainly false or may be true, she can rely on the evidence during settlement negotiations without violating the duty of honesty. But if it turns out that Doug is not having an affair, then Mary could not rely on this assertion without violating the duty of honesty.

Duty to Avoid Frivolous Claims

Under the ABA rules, an attorney ought not press a claim or argument unless there is a good faith basis in the law (or a good faith argument for extending or changing the law) in support of the claim or argument. In contrast, under the California rules an attorney must not press a claim when she lacks probable cause for the claim and has a purpose of harassment for pressing the claim. Part of this duty is investigating claims to ensure that they have a proper foundation under the law.

As mentioned above, Mary needs to investigate the foundation of Peg's claim about Doug having an affair. If it turns out that the alleged affair is not real and Peg's allegation is false, then pressing this claim in order to increase a potential settlement award would be a frivolous claim or an argument without a good faith basis. That would violate the ABA rules. It may also violate the California rules, if the court believes that Mary lacks probable cause (given that she did not investigate the claim or she did or that she did and it turned out to be false or highly unlikely) and that she had a purpose of harassing opposing counsel in order to raise the settlement award. Thus, Mary needs to investigate the claim and ensure she has a good faith basis and probable cause to support bringing up the alleged affair during settlement negotiations.

Duty of Competence

Under both the ABA rules and California rules, all attorneys have a duty of competence to their clients. This includes having the relevant skills, knowledge, and preparation to adequately represent the client. In California, this also includes having the relevant mental and physical capacity, and an attorney must not recklessly, intentionally, grossly negligent, or repeatedly violate this duty.

Here, the idea that Mary must investigate Peg's claims goes in two directions. If she fails to investigate the claim, then she is not competently representing the client under the ABA rules and she is arguably reckless or grossly negligent with regard to her duty to investigate, and is thereby failing to adequately represent Peg under the California rules as well. On the other hand, if she investigates the claim and it does have a factual foundation in the truth, then Mary would arguably be incompetent if she did not raise this claim during settlement negotiations as she would be failing to zealously represent the interests of her client within the bounds of the ethical rules. Thus, Mary must investigate Peg's claim and if it is true, she must press the claim in order to avoid violating the duty of competence.

Scope of Representation

Under both the ABA rules and California rules, an attorney must follow the bounds of the scope of representation. Some issues are solely up to the discretion of the client, including whether to accept a settlement offer, whether to testify, and whether to waive a jury trial right. The client also has full control over the goals and ends of the representation. However, the attorney has control over the means of representation, subject to a duty to consult with the client and communicate with the client about the means of the representation.

Here, whether to bring up the affair during settlement negotiations is arguably a "scope of representation" issue that falls within the means of representation, much like what questions to ask during a deposition and what witnesses to call during a case. However, Mary must consult with Peg and must communicate with Peg about this strategic issue. Thus, in order to comply with her ethical duties, Mary must discuss and consult with Peg regarding this issue.

Duty of Communication

Under both the ABA rules and the California rules, an attorney has a duty to communicate with the client. This includes keeping the client apprised of any developments in the case, letting them know about written settlement offers or other major settlement offers, and generally consulting with the client and keeping in regular contact.

Here, Mary must communicate with Peg regarding whether to disclose the affair during settlement negotiations, as this is a strategy that she must discuss with Peg and consult with Peg given her duty of communication.

Duty Involving Leverage in a Civil Case

Under the California rules, an attorney must not threaten criminal or disciplinary action in order to obtain an advantage or leverage in a civil case. Here, if it is possible that Doug's affair could subject him to disciplinary or criminal risk, then Mary must not leverage that risk in order to obtain a larger settlement award for Peg. On the other hand, if the affair would not subject Doug to criminal or disciplinary risk, then Mary must leverage these facts in order to fulfill her duty to zealously represent her client.

Duty to "Tattle" On Opposing Counsel

Under the ABA rules, if an attorney has actual knowledge that another attorney has violated the ethical rules or has taken some action that materially reflects poorly on their fitness as an attorney, they must disclose these facts to the state bar association or other ethical authority. In contrast, the California rules do not have a similar provision except that an attorney must disclose certain issues related to their own ethical standing. For example, an attorney must disclose if three or more malpractice suits have been filed against them within one year, or if they have been convicted of fraud or a felony involving moral turpitude.

Here, Mary has not violated the California rule, but she may violate the ABA rule if she thinks that Len allowed his client to knowingly lie during his deposition testimony when he said that he had never been unfaithful to his wife. If Mary knows that Len was aware of Doug's affair, then she also knows that Len violated his duty of candor to the tribunal and his duty of fairness and honesty, and she must disclose that fact to comply with her duty to "snitch" or "tattle" on other attorneys.

Withdrawal From Representation

Mandatory Withdrawal

Under the ABA and California rules, an attorney must withdraw from representation in a few circumstances. First, an attorney must withdraw from representation if their health impairs their ability to represent the client. Under the California rules, that impairment must make the representation "unreasonably difficult," while under the ABA rules it must materially impair the attorney's ability to represent the client. Second, an attorney must withdraw from representation if the representation would necessarily lead to or facilitate a crime or fraud. Third, an attorney must withdraw from representation if the representation would violate an ethical rule (in California) or would violate an ethical rule, a civil law, or a criminal law (under the ABA). Fourth, an attorney must withdraw if they are fired by the client. Finally, an attorney must withdraw if the client is asking them to press a frivolous claim, under the definitions provided above (e.g., probable cause and harassment in California, or lack of good faith under the ABA).

Here, none of the mandatory bases for withdrawal have arisen as of yet unless Mary cannot competently represent Peg given her prior relationship with Len, in which case she must withdraw from representation. Additionally, if Mary investigates Peg's claim about the affair and it turns out to be false, but Peg insists on raising it during settlement negotiations, then Mary must withdraw if continuing would lead to fraud. She must also withdraw if continuing would violate the duty to avoid frivolous claims, or any other ethical duty (under California rules) or ethical duty, criminal law, or civil law (under the ABA rules). If any of those scenarios occur, then Mary must withdraw from representation.

Permissive Withdrawal

Additionally, there are circumstances where an attorney may withdraw from representation permissively. These include when the client materially violates the retainer agreement and the attorney provides a warning that they will withdraw if the client does not cease their violation, lesser forms of crime or fraud such as if the client is seeking to commit a crime or fraud in the future or if the client is trying to force the attorney to engage in a crime or fraud, if the attorney's health impairs the representation to a lesser degree, if there is good cause shown, if representing the client has become unreasonably difficult (including under the ABA if the client and attorney have a fundamental disagreement), and for a variety of other reasons. Under the ABA, an attorney can withdraw for financial reasons or for any reason that won't materially harm the client, and under the California rules an attorney can withdraw if they have a serious disagreement with co-counsel such that withdrawing is in the best interest of the client, or if the client wants to press an unwarranted claim or argument.

Here, even if the mandatory withdrawal criteria outlined above are not met, Mary could withdraw from representation if she feels too morally conflicted about raising the affair during settlement negotiations, assuming this is a fundamental disagreement (under the ABA) or means that the client has made representation unreasonably difficult (California rules). She can also withdraw if she investigates the affair claim and believes it does not have a strong basis in the truth and may therefore represent a crime or fraud. If she is so overwhelmed with her own guilt, she might also be able to withdraw permissively if she feels her personal mental health is so affected that her ability to represent Peg has been impaired. She also might be able to withdraw from representation if the court believes that a disagreement on this point with the client represents "good cause." And under the ABA, if she can show that withdrawal would not harm Peg, then she can also permissively withdraw on that basis alone.

Steps After Withdrawal

After withdrawing from representation, an attorney must take four steps under both the ABA rules and the California rules. First, an attorney must return any unearned fees, although in California they may retain any true retainer fees or referral fees. Second, an attorney must return all of the client's personal property and papers, which they must have carefully safeguarded in the meantime. Third, an attorney must mitigate any potential harm to the client. Finally, an attorney must give the client proper notice and a reasonable amount of time to find new counsel.

Further, during ongoing litigation, an attorney must seek leave from the court before withdrawing. If the court denies the request, then the attorney must continue to zealously represent the client.

Here, if Mary does withdraw from representation, then she must comply with these requirements.

Answer B

Mary and Len's Relationship

Duty of loyalty--conflict of interest in accordance with both the ABA and CA rules

A lawyer owes their client an undivided duty of loyalty. This includes the duty to avoid conflicts of interest. A conflict of interest can be actual or potential, and arises when the representation is directly adverse to the interest of another client whom the lawyer represents in the same or substantially similar matter, or when there is a significant risk that the representation will be materially limited by the lawyer's own personal interests, the interests of a former client, or a third person.

Significant risk of material limitation--Mary and Len's Past relationship

Here, the case does not involve a situation where Mary is representing one who has an interest directly adverse to another client of hers, but rather there is a situation where there could be a significant risk of material limitation in Mary's ability to represent Peg due to Mary's own personal interests with having previously been romantically involved with Len.

Because Mary could be inhibited by her prior romance with Len by not representing Peg with the utmost loyalty, and because it could potentially cause issues with Mary's ability to effectively represent Peg, Mary had a duty to disclose the conflict to Peg.

Significant risk of material limitation--Mary and Len's current relationship

In addition to the prior romance, there is also likely an actual conflict of interest here and thus likely an actual significant risk of material limitation in her ability to represent Peg as the facts tell us that despite not being romantically involved anymore, Mary and Len remain "good friends". The facts further evidence this later on by Mary's discomfort in using the facts and tactic that Peg is suggesting (to be discussed further below) due to the case involving her "good friend Len."

Once again, because Mary's relationship with Len is likely impacting her ability to zealously represent Peg and causes her to not have her sole focus and attention on loyally and faithfully representing Peg, Mary had a duty to disclose the conflict to Peg.

Waiving the conflict--ABA rules and CA rules

Even though a conflict persists, a lawyer still may be able to represent the client if they take the proper measures in addressing the conflict and waiving it. The lawyer may only continue the representation if: (1) they reasonably believe they can diligently and competently represent both clients; (2) the representation is not prohibited by law; (3) the claims do not involve a direct assertion by one client against the other; and (4) the client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing. The California rules are the same, except that it requires both the disclosure and the consent to be in writing, as opposed to just 'confirmed' in writing like the ABA.

Here, Mary may argue that she was able to diligently represent both clients since she was still assessing the case, determining that Doug would have to pay Peg damages after trial, and that the primary issue was the amount to be given, and was making estimates etc. Although, there is also a counter to this in the sense that Mary was considering how Len would feel when considering tactics to use in settlement negotiations (to be discussed more below.)

Although there are no facts that the representation is prohibited by law, regardless, Mary had a duty to disclose the actual and potential conflicts to Peg and to get her informed consent, confirmed in writing (ABA) or to disclose in writing and get Peg's consent in writing. Mary failed to do this.

Conclusion

Mary violated the ABA rules and committed an ethical violation when she did not disclose her past and current relationship with Len and did not get Peg's informed consent, confirmed in writing, to continue the representation.

Mary violated the CA rules for not disclosing the same issues, as well as not disclosing in writing and getting Peg's consent in writing.

California duty to disclose despite no significant risk of material limitation

California has a specific rule that despite when there is no significant risk of material limitation in the representation, the lawyer still must disclose, in writing, to the client, when they or someone at their firm, has a personal, professional, financial or business relationship with another party or witness, or the lawyer of the other party or witness is a family member, spouse, or lives with the lawyer, or the lawyer has an intimate or sexual relationship with the other party or lawyer.

Here, even if Mary wanted to argue that her past or current relationship with Len did not raise any significant risk of material limitation in her representation of Peg, under the CA rules, because Mary has a past and current relationship with Len, this constitutes a 'personal relationship' with the other party, specifically the other party's lawyer, and in addition she had a prior intimate relationship with him.

Thus, regardless of what Mary felt about the risk, she still had a duty to disclose her relationship with Len, in writing, to Peg.

Conclusion

Because Mary did not disclose her relationship with Len in writing to Peg, she committed an ethical violation of the CA rules.

Mary's use or non-use of the facts of Doug's affair in settlement negotiations

Duty of care/diligence in accordance with both ABA and CA rules

A lawyer has a duty to pursue a case with the care and diligence that one would bring to their own personal matters. This includes the duty to: (1) research facts; (2) investigate matters; and (3) put in the time needed to present an adequate representation of their client's case.

Here, Mary would have a duty to investigate the facts of the evidence that Peg is presenting to her. Mary should not ignore what Peg is saying to her, as discussed below. Mary has a duty to pursue all legally available avenues in the representation, and because Mary has a duty not to present dishonest or frivolous or lies to opposing parties, Mary should look into what Peg is disclosing to her in order to make sure she is doing her due diligence.

Mary agrees that the fact of the affair would help Peg in settlement negotiations, and further, as discussed below, Doug alleged under oath that he has not been unfaithful to his wife which goes directly to the claim of his sexual harassment of Peg because that could be construed as the same thing as him saying he did not sexually harass Peg.

Mary had a duty to research the facts that Peg is presenting to her and investigate it, and take the time needed to adequately prepare the case for Peg.

Conclusion

Mary should take the care and diligence to pursue the use of the facts of the settlement negotiations, and as long as she has no reason to believe it is something made up by Peg in order to just humiliate and embarrass Doug (something which would be in violation of the professional rules), Mary should use the facts in settlement negotiations.

Scope of representation

A lawyer has a duty to pursue all legally available avenues in representing the client and defending their case. The client has authority to decide whether or not to accept a settlement, whether or not to take a plea deal in a case, etc. The client controls the objectives of the case, while the lawyer decides the tactics and the strategic moves of the case.

Here, Peg is telling Mary that she has 'solid' evidence confirming that, for the past year, Doug has been engaging in an extramarital sexual affair about which is wife is unaware. The facts tell us that this is a claim about sexual harassment by Peg against Doug, and in addition, the facts tell us that Doug testified in a deposition (thus under oath) that he has never been unfaithful to his wife. This statement by Doug goes directly to Peg's allegation because if Doug had never been unfaithful, that means he would have never sexually harassed Peg. Thus, the fact regarding whether or not Doug has been unfaithful to his wife is relevant. Mary has determined that Doug is going to owe Peg damages, but it is just a matter of how much, and agrees that using the facts of the affair in her negotiations with Len will likely result in a larger amount, which as the lawyer for Peg, should be what Mary wants to pursue.

Further, because the facts are actually relevant to the litigation, it would not be unethical for Mary to use the facts. Doug put it at issue by stating under oath he has not been unfaithful to his wife. Although Mary has the authority to control the tactics for litigation, Peg as the client determines the objectives and the theory of the case and Mary should be pursuing all legally available matters, and it is not a violation to use the facts.

Conclusion

Mary should use the facts (subject to the above conclusion that she reasonably believes there is some merit to them) since it is a legally available avenue that would help defend her client's case and provide her with the best results in a way that does not violate the rules.

Mary's ability to withdraw if Peg persists

Withdrawal

One only needs to mandatorily withdraw from representation, in accordance with both ABA and CA rules, if the representation will result in a violation of the ABA or CA rules or statute, if the lawyer's physical or mental ability will impair the representation, or if the lawyer is discharged. In addition, in CA, a lawyer must withdraw if they know the client does not have probable cause for their case and it is solely malicious.

Here, none of those facts are present so we must look to permissive withdrawal. Permissive withdrawal

Under the ABA, a lawyer may withdraw if they reasonably believe the representation will result in an ethical violation, if the client has already used their services to commit a crime or fraud, if the client has failed to substantially fulfill an obligation to the lawyer, such as pay their fee, if the client is insisting on pursuing a matter in a way the lawyer finds morally repugnant or fundamentally disagrees with, or if they can do so without material adverse effect on the client, or any other good cause.

California is similar except it does not allow withdrawal solely because the lawyer fundamentally disagrees with the way the client wants to pursue the case, or even if they can do so without causing material adverse effect on the client. However, it does allow the lawyer to withdraw for good cause.

Here, Mary agrees the facts would help the settlement negotiations, but she strongly dislikes the idea of using that information, and especially feels uncomfortable because of her relationship with Len. “Strongly disliking” is likely not sufficient under the ABA rules as it has to be a fundamental disagreement or something she finds morally repugnant, and it is certainly not sufficient for withdrawal under CA rules. Further, the fact that she is especially uncomfortable because of her friendship with Len is not grounds under either rule.

There are not a lot of facts about whether Mary can withdraw without causing Peg material adverse effect, which is only allowed under ABA, however, it seems they are already well into litigation and have already taken depositions and Mary has already determined what is needed for the case, it would likely be difficult for Peg to find effective new and efficient representation.

Further there is ultimately no good cause to withdraw at all.

Conclusion

Mary likely cannot ethically withdraw under either ABA or CA rules as there is no good cause to withdraw under either rule, and Mary disliking a course of representation is not sufficient under the ABA rules.

Q2 Business Associations

Acme Inc. is a corporation that has been profitable for several years and now holds $20 million cash in its treasury.

Acme's board of directors consists of Brown (Acme's Chief Executive Officer), Chase (Acme's Chief Financial Officer), and ten other non-employee ("outside") directors.

Acme's board of directors recently met to consider the best course of action with regard to the cash in its treasury. At this meeting, Brown and Chase strongly recommended that Acme pay a dividend to its shareholders. The board then heard a report from an outside consulting firm regarding the favorable prospects for Acme's expansion into a new line of business. After a lengthy discussion, the ten outside directors voted in favor of a resolution not to declare a dividend and instead to hold the accumulated cash for the corporation's future use. Brown and Chase voted against this resolution. The entire board of directors also voted unanimously to make a $100,000 cash contribution to a private university. Brown is a graduate of this university and a member of its board of trustees. The other Acme board members knew these facts at the time the board unanimously authorized the contribution.

One of Acme's many shareholders, Davis, is upset about the board's decision not to declare a dividend. He sent a letter to Acme's board demanding inspection of Acme's records relating to this decision.

Another Acme shareholder, Evan, filed a lawsuit against Acme and its board seeking orders that Acme pay a dividend to its shareholders and be enjoined from contributing $100,000 to the university.

1. Did Acme's outside directors possess the authority to reject Brown's and Chase's recommendation to pay a dividend from cash in the treasury? Discuss.

2. Does Davis have a right to inspect Acme's records relating to the board meeting described above? Discuss.

3. Is Evan likely to prevail in his suit for an order that the corporation pay a dividend? Discuss.

4. Is Evan likely to prevail in his suit to enjoin Acme from paying $100,000 to the private university? Discuss.

Answer A

A corporation is an entity distinct from its owners, the shareholders. A corporation can sue or be sued.

Here, Acme Inc. is a corporation and can sue and be sued.

Pay Dividends:

The first issue is whether Acme's outside directors possessed the authority to reject Brown's and Chase's recommendation to pay a dividend from cash in the treasury.

The board of directors in a corporation manages the internal affairs of the corporation. In order to make decisions, the board must either call a meeting with the required quorum and vote on the matter, decide using unanimous written consent, or they must ratify the matter after the fact with proper board approval. A board meeting either occurs annually, at which the time and place and date are set out in the articles or bylaws, or through a special meeting, which requires at least two days' notice stating the time, date, and place of the meeting. A director can be an officer or shareholder, but they are not required to be.

Here, Acme's board of directors recently met to consider what to do with their cash in the treasury. Brown and Chase recommended that Acme pay a dividend to its shareholders, but then ten outside directors voted in favor of a resolution not to declare a dividend instead. It is unclear whether this was an annual meeting or a special meeting, but assuming that the proper notice was given if it was a special meeting, the next issue is whether the decision was properly voted on.

In order for the board to make a valid decision, there must be a quorum. Unless the bylaws or articles of incorporation state otherwise, a quorum is a majority of the directors on the board. In addition, for a proper vote, there must be a majority of the quorum voting in favor of the decision.

Here, there are twelve directors, including Brown and Chase. It appears that all of the directors were present at the meeting, and thus had a proper quorum. Next, ten of the outside directors voted in favor of a resolution to not declare a dividend and instead hold the cash for the corporation's future use. This vote was ten out of twelve directors, and thus was a proper board approval.

Therefore, this decision by the outside directors was proper. The fact that they were outside directors does not affect their ability to vote.

In addition, the decision as to whether or not to declare a dividend is in the complete discretion of the board, subject to limitation rules pertaining to the corporation's solvency. A dividend is a distribution that is given to shareholders who have rights to dividends. The board may not permit a dividend distribution if either the corporation would not be able to pay their debts as they come due, or if the corporation's assets are lower than their liabilities, including the preference payment required to be given to preferred shares upon dissolution.

Here, the board decided to not give dividends out and thus the limitation rules do not apply. The decision to not give dividends was in the board's sole discretion, absent an abuse of discretion. This decision was proper and the directors possessed the authority to reject Brown and Chase's recommendation to pay a dividend from cash in the treasury. Although Acme had $20 million in its treasury, the board was not required to give out a dividend. Davis's inspection Rights:

The next issue is whether Davis has a right to inspect Acme's records.

A shareholder has an unqualified right to inspect the corporation's books and records in regards to the bylaws and articles, the communications that the board has made to the shareholders in the last three years, the annual report that the corporation files in the last three years, the minutes at shareholder meetings, and other ordinary records pertaining to their rights as a shareholder. In addition, a shareholder, with five days written notice, may request to inspect other books and records relating to the finances and other records of the corporation upon a showing of a proper purpose. This proper purpose must be related to their rights and duties as a shareholder. Typically, after showing a proper purpose, the board should approve the request. Either the shareholder may inspect the records or have an attorney inspect the records for them.

Here, Davis is requesting a right to inspect Acme's records relating to the board meeting described above. The board's minutes from the meeting likely relates to Davis' rights as a shareholder, because as described below, Evan may assert that the board violated its fiduciary duties to the corporation in the meeting. A shareholder has a right to bring a derivative suit on behalf of the corporation if they satisfy the required procedures and the court finds that the suit should go forward. Therefore, having these minutes from the board meeting where the board decided to not declare a dividend can be offered as proof that thee directors possibly violated their duties as directors. However, shareholders do not have a right to demand a dividend distribution. Therefore, if Davis is simply upset about the dividend distribution, then getting these records may not relate to his rights as a shareholder. Davis may argue that the board abused its discretion. Nevertheless, if Davis does in fact show a proper purpose then he must make a written demand to the board with five days' notice.

Dividend:

The next issue is whether Evan is likely to prevail in his suit for an order that the corporation pay a dividend.

A shareholder may sue a corporation either in a direct action in order to obtain judgment personally or a derivative suit in which the shareholder sues to vindicate a claim on behalf of the corporation. In a derivative suit, the corporation collects the judgment.

Here, Evan would be suing in a direct action because he is suing on behalf of his right to receive a dividend.

However, as described above, the decision as to whether or not to declare a dividend is in the complete discretion of the board, subject to limitation rules pertaining to the corporation's solvency. The board may not permit a dividend distribution if either 1) the corporation would not be able to pay their debts as they come due, or if 2) the corporation's assets are lower than their liabilities, including the preference payment required to be given to preferred shares upon dissolution.

Here, Acme Inc.'s cash in the treasury amounts to $20 million. Therefore, Acme Inc. likely would be able to give out a cash dividend to its shareholders. However, as described, this decision is within the board's discretion and the board decided to not make distributions. Therefore, Evan would likely fail in his suit against the corporation for not giving out a distribution.

However, Evan may assert in a derivative action that the directors violated their duty of care in making the decision.

Derivative Action:

In order to file a derivative action, the shareholder must be a shareholder at the time of commencement of the suit, and a shareholder at the time of the alleged wrongful conduct or a shareholder by operation of law.

Here, Evan is currently a shareholder. Further, it appears that Evan was a shareholder when the decision was made to not distribute dividends. Therefore, standing is satisfied.

Further, a shareholder must make a written demand on the board to bring suit on behalf of the corporation. The shareholder must then wait 90 days before bringing the suit unless the shareholder can show that the corporation will suffer irreparable injury or the board has already objected to bringing suit. Further, some jurisdictions permit a shareholder to not bring demand if it would be futile. A demand may be futile where the majority of the directors are interested in the transaction.

Here, it is unclear whether Evan made a demand on the corporation. There is no indication that it would be futile to bring a written demand in relation to the dividend distributions because there do not seem to be interested directors in the decision to not declare dividends. Further, there is no indication that the board has objected to bring suit. Further, there likely would not be irreparable injury to the corporation in waiting 90 days to bring suit because the suit is solely based on the decision to not make a dividend distribution, which as described, is in the board's discretion.

Therefore, Evan must first make a written demand and must wait 90 days to bring suit.

Duty of Care:

Evan may assert that the board breached its duty of care in deciding to not distribute dividends. Each director has a duty of care to act in good faith, act as a reasonably prudent person would under the circumstances, and act in a manner that a reasonable director would believe is in the best interest of the corporation. Where there is no indication that there is a lack of good faith or self-dealing or conflicts of interest, the burden is on the shareholder to prove that this duty was breached. Further, directors are permitted to rely on outside reports in making their decisions where they are prepared by officers of the corporation, attorneys, accountants, or other professionals that the director believes is competent.

Here, Brown and Chase strongly recommended that Acme pay the dividend but the outside directors decided that it was not in the corporation's best interest. While the ten directors did not go with their recommendation, they did not have to. The ten directors made a reasonable inquiry into the decision after hearing a report from an outside consulting firm regarding the favorable prospects for Acme's expansion into a new line of business. Therefore, as long as the directors reasonably believed that the firm was competent, the ten outside directors could reasonably rely on this outside consulting firm in making the reasonable decision that the corporation should instead hold the accumulated cash for the corporation's future use, including expanding to a new line of business. Further, it states that there was a lengthy discussion before the directors decided to not vote in favor of the distribution which indicates reasonable diligence in their decision-making procedures. Further, there is no indication of a lack of good faith. Therefore, the court will defer to the board's decision in the matter based on the business judgment rule - the board made a reasonably inquiry into the facts related to making the decision to not distribute the funds, there was no bad faith or conflict of interest, or self- dealing. Therefore, the burden was on Evan to prove the duty of care standard was breached. As described above, he likely cannot prove that it was breached, especially because the decision to declare a dividend is in the board's discretion.

Therefore, Evan's suit will likely not succeed against the board for the dividend decision.

Payment to the Private University:

The next issue is whether Evan is likely to prevail in his suit to enjoin Acme from paying $100,000 to the private university.

As described above, this would be a derivative action in which Evan would be bringing the suit on behalf of the corporation due to the directors' breach of their fiduciary duty. The board makes the managerial decisions as to the internal affairs of the corporation. Therefore, this decision was solely in the board's discretion and Evan does not have a personal direct suit against Acme Inc.

Duty of Loyalty:

Evan may assert that the board breached its duty of loyalty when it decided to give a cash contribution to a private University that Brown graduated from and is a member of the board of trustees.

Each director of the board owes a duty of loyalty to the corporation to act in the corporation's best interests. A breach of the duty of loyalty may occur where a director engages in self-dealing. Self- dealing occurs where the corporation enters into a transaction where a person or entity on the other side of the transaction is a director, or a director's family member, someone the director has a personal or professional relationship with or an organization in which the director is a director, shareholder, or officer.

Here, the private university that Acme gave the money to was a university in which Brown graduated and is a member of the board of trustees. Therefore, there may be a duty of loyalty violation. Where there is a self-dealing transaction, the director that is interested, here Brown, may satisfy his duty of loyalty by disclosing all material facts fully and adequately to the board and the board votes in a proper board vote to engage in the transaction. The quorum required for the board vote excludes any interested directors and there must be a proper vote based on disinterested directors. In the alternative, the interested director may fully and adequately disclose the information to the shareholders who must conduct a proper vote with the disinterested shareholders voting in favor of the transaction with more votes in favor than against. In the alternative, the terms must be fair to the corporation.

Here, Brown graduated and is a member of the board of trustees and is also on the board of Acme Inc. Therefore, Brown would be considered an interested director. There is no indication that there was a shareholder approval of the decision to make the contribution. However, it states that the Acme board members knew of these facts at the time that the board unanimously authorized the contribution. Therefore, Brown may have fully and adequately disclosed his interests in the contribution before the board voted. However, Brown was not permitted to vote in the transaction because he was an interested director. However, without Brown counted in the quorum or in the vote, the quorum would have been 11 out of 12 directors for a proper quorum - more than the majority. Further, the vote required would be a majority of the disinterested directors. Here, all 11 of the disinterested directors voted in favor of the contribution. Therefore, there is an adequate vote in favor of the transaction.

In the alternative, the terms of the transaction may be fair to the corporation, even if the decision was not validly disclosed and voted on. The court will consider alternatives, the corporation's assets, the corporation's need to engage in the transaction, and other factors. There are no facts here that indicate that this transaction to the university was not fair to the corporation. A corporation is permitted to make charitable contributions and all of the directors unanimously agreed that the decision was a good decision.

Therefore, if the fact that Brown actually voted in the transaction does not defeat the validity of the vote, the contribution was validly approved. Further, Brown did not violate his duty of loyalty to the corporation because Brown disclosed the facts of his interest and board voted with the proper amount of disinterested votes. Further, the terms appear fair to the corporation.

Therefore, Evan likely will not prevail in a suit against the Acme directors for paying $100,000 to the private university.

Duty of Care:

Evan may also assert a derivative action on behalf of the corporation alleging that the directors violated their fiduciary duty of care to the corporation in giving the distribution to the university. Using the standard described above, there is no indication that there was a lack of good faith on behalf of the board of directors. Further, the duty of loyalty does not appear to have been breached. Further, under the circumstances it may have been reasonable to give $100,000 to the university under the circumstances. This amount of money is not much compared to the $20 million that Acme has in its treasury. All of the directors voted unanimously which indicates that a director would reasonably believe that this decision was in the best interest of the corporation.

Therefore, the duty of care was likely not breached.

Improper Distribution:

Evan may also assert that the $100,000 contribution was an improper distribution due to the solvency standards described above. However, as indicated, $100,000 out of $20 million in the treasury does not appear to be enough money that would make the corporation unable to pay its debts as they come due. Further, it likely will not make it so the corporation's liabilities outweigh its assets, including the preferences required upon dissolution.

Therefore, Evan likely will not succeed in asserting that the distribution to the corporation was an improper distribution.

Answer B

1. Did Acme's outside directors possess the authority to reject Brown's and Chase's recommendations to pay dividend?

The board

In a corporation, the board of directors run the big picture of the corporation. They appoint the officers and managers as well as vote on major corporate transactions. Board of directors can be comprised of two types of directors. Inside directors and outside directors. Outside directors are those who are otherwise disinterested in the day to day operations because their only relationship to the corporation is their board position. Inside directors however are directors that work in the corporation as managers. These are often the CEO and CFO as the case is here with Brown (B) and Chase (C).

Power of the board

The board of directors votes on major corporate transactions. These include mergers, acquisitions, partial or whole assets sales, dividend distributions, and new large investments. The board of directors, unless specified otherwise in the bylaws, must approve all the matters before it by a majority vote. Inside directors and outside directors votes are equal. In order to have a proper vote, there must be quorum.
Quorum requires a majority of disinterested directors. Disinterested directors are those directors that do not have a personal stake in the matter at hand.

Quorum

Here, Acme has 12 directors. Two inside and two outside directors. The vote at issue is a vote regarding the distribution to pay a dividend. Since all 12 directors voted, we assume that quorum was met as all 12 were present.

Majority vote

In order to pass a vote, the board must pass it by a majority. 10 voted against the dividend and 2 voted for the dividend. A majority clearly voted against the dividend. Therefore, the dividend was properly rejected. The fact that the outside directors voted is of no consequence. An outside director possesses the same amount of voting power as any inside director.

Conclusion

The board properly voted on a corporate transaction that was within its power to either institute or reject. The board had quorum to vote on it because all 12 directors were present. Finally, the board rejected it by a majority vote. The fact that dividend was the recommendation of the CEO and CFO means nothing. The entire point of the board is that they are people unrelated with the day to day operations of the corporation that give an outside view. The CEO and CFO salaries may depend on stock price. Issuing a dividend may increase stock price. Therefore, the CEO and CFO have an incentive to increase the stock price via dividend. The board was under no requirement to accept their recommendation and properly rejected it with a majority vote.

2. Does Davis have a right to inspect Acme's records relating to the board meeting described above?

Shareholder inspection rights are a keystone right of shareholders. Shareholders, if certain conditions are met, have the right to inspect the books and records of the corporation including board meeting minutes. In order for a shareholder to have inspection rights, they must show that they are indeed a shareholder and that they have a proper purpose in asking for inspection.

Shareholder

Only a shareholder can inspect a corporation's records. The amount of shares held is irrelevant. The only requirement is that the person is a current shareholder of the corporation. Here, Davis is a shareholder of the corporation. Therefore, this requirement is met.

Proper purpose

A shareholder must have a proper purpose. A proper purpose can be many things including investigating potential fraud, reviewing financial statements, making sure corporate formalities were followed properly. A proper purpose is anything that has to do with a shareholder's interests in the health of the corporation as it relates to their ownership of the corporation. An improper purpose arises when a shareholder is attempting to inspect the records for personal benefit or with the goals to harm the corporation.

Here, Davis is upset about the board's decision not to declare a dividend and wants to inspect the records. Davis will argue that he has a proper purpose because he wants to know the reasons why a dividend was not declared. Perhaps once he looks at the meeting minutes and realizes that the money was saved for better business opportunities later on he will be satisfied. Also, Davis may argue that he wants to make sure the board was properly informed or had no conflicts. The corporation may argue that Davis is just trying to harass them. However, there is no indication of any ill will on the part of Davis. Davis has a right to understand how and why the board came to its decision. Overall, Davis likely has a proper purpose.

Conclusion

Davis has a right to inspect the corporation's records. Davis is a shareholder of the corporation and he has a proper purpose related to his interests as to why a dividend was not declared.

3. Is Evan likely to prevail in his suit for an order that the corporation pay a dividend?

Evan is suing the corporation in an attempt to order the corporation to pay a dividend. Evan may be able to do this through either a direct suit or a derivative suit.

Direct suit

In a direct suit, Evan is suing the board of directors himself as a shareholder. A direct suit involves a board infringing on the rights of individual shareholders. Evan will argue that the board is infringing on his right as a shareholder to pay him a dividend. On the other hand, the board will argue that they are under no obligation to pay out dividends. Evan will argue that the corporation has $20 million in cash reserves and the shareholders are entitled to see some of that profit. The board however will ultimately prevail. The board will be correct in that the board has ultimate power to make decisions for the corporation. This includes whether to give dividends or not give dividends. The board has complete discretion and Evan's direct suit will fail.

Derivative suit

A derivative suit is a lawsuit where a shareholder demands that the corporation sue the board of directors directly for some violation. Usually a fiduciary duty violation. Here, Evan may argue that it was a violation of the duty of care not to issue a dividend and improper for the board of directors to use an outside consulting firm and therefore the money should be distributed to shareholders instead of saved for later.

In order to bring a derivative suit, a shareholder must make a demand on the board, be a shareholder at the time of the harm, hold shares throughout the suit, and adequately represent all the shareholders. There is no evidence if demand was made but to proceed it must be made or shown to be futile. Evan was a shareholder at the time of the harm and the assumption is that he will hold throughout the suit. Finally, there is nothing to indicate that Evan does not adequately represent the shareholders.

Duty of care

The duty of care requires a director to act as a reasonably prudent director under the circumstances. The duty of care requires that a director act with the requisite skill, knowledge, and care of an ordinary director and employ their personal skills in their care. As part of the duty of care, directors must make sure that they are properly informed in regard to the corporate decisions that they make. Evan will argue that the directors violated the duty of care when they followed the recommendation of an outside consulting firm in deciding to save money instead of giving a dividend. The board however will argue that they are entitled to rely on outside sources such as attorneys, consultants, and accountants in coming to informed decisions. The whole purpose of those outside sources is to provide directors with better knowledge and understanding. Additionally, the directors will stress that they are under no obligation to give the dividend even if using an outside consultant was a violation. Overall, the directors are unlikely to be in violation of the duty of care in this situation.

Business Judgment Rule

The business judgement rule (BJR), is a presumption that directors acted in an informed matter in the best interests of the corporation. The BJR presumes that directors acted in good faith and protects them from liability for basic corporate decisions. For a shareholder to succeed in arguing the duty of care violation, they must rebut the BJR. The BJR can be rebutted through a showing of bad faith, self-dealing, gross negligence towards their duties, and more. Here, Evan will argue that the BJR should be rebutted because the directors failed to make their own decision and therefore acted in bad faith. The directors on the other hand will argue the opposite that bringing in the consultants was in good faith because it helped them make an informed decision. Overall, the BJR is unlikely to be rebutted here because there is no bad faith.

Conclusion

Evan is unlikely to succeed in any suit against the corporation. Evan will not succeed in a direct suit because the board is under no obligation to issue a dividend. He will also not succeed in a direct suit because the board acted in good faith and did not breach the duty of care.

4. Is Evan likely to prevail in his suit to enjoin Acme from paying $100K to the private university?

Derivative suit

In this case, Evan will only be suing via derivative suit because he is challenging a corporate transaction that doesn't independently involve shareholders. See rules above for derivative suit. Here once again, Evan held the shares during the harm, will likely hold throughout, and will adequately represent the shareholders. Once again, Evan will have to make a demand on the board or show that demand is futile. We have no evidence that he made demand but to proceed with the suit he will have to.

In the derivative suit, Evan will be alleging that the board violated their duty of care by giving $100,000 to a university and also the duty of loyalty by giving it to the university of the CEO.

Duty of care

See rule above. Evan will argue that the directors failed to act as reasonably prudent directors because they are spending money outside of the company. The $100,000 could have gone to shareholders but instead it went to a university. Assuming that the university is not within the business ACME runs, Evan will argue that this was equivalent to setting corporate funds on fire. The board will argue that it is well accepted that a corporation may make donations where it sees fit without violating the duty of care. The board will argue that there are a lot of intangible benefits of donating money, especially to a university. It helps with recruiting and getting good new employees.

Additionally, public image of being a caring corporation is important. Finally, the board will argue that it has been ruled by courts that general corporate donations purely out of good will are within the board's discretion. Finally, the board will argue that $100,000 out of $20 million is a very small amount that is not going to create a negative financial impact on the corporation. Overall, the board will succeed in arguing that the donation was valid.

Business judgment rule

See rule above. Evan will argue that the board should not be protected by the business judgment rule because of the conflict of interest since the CEO wanted to give money to his alma mater where he is a member of the board of trustees. The board however will argue that they did not act in bad faith because a majority of disinterested directors approved the transaction. There was no self-dealing here because 11/12 directors who did not go to the school voted in favor of it. Further, 10 of those 12 directors were outside directors. Overall, Evan may have some ground arguing that the business judgment rule should not invoke protection because of the interest of the CEO. However, the board also has a strong argument that they acted in good faith.

Conclusion

The board likely did not breach the duty of care. Even if Evan can rebut the BJR, Evan is unlikely to show that the actions actually amounted to a duty of care violation given the circumstances.

Duty of loyalty

Under the duty of loyalty, a director has to act in the best interests of the corporation. Evan will argue that the Brown violated the duty of loyalty by giving money to his own school. Evan will further argue that the board overall violated the duty because money given outside the corporation and outside their corporate interests is a waste of money. Similar to the discussion above for duty of care, directors had valid, corporate and moral reasons for giving money outside the corporation. The board will argue that the directors were actually acting in the best interests of the corporation by giving money to the university. Overall, the board is unlikely to have failed to act in the best interests of the corporation. However, Brown may have violated the duty of loyalty because of his conflict of interest.

Conflict of interest

A director may not enter into the transaction that the director has a conflict of interest with. Here, Evan will argue that Brown has a conflict of interest in the transaction and therefore the transaction is improper. The conflict of interest arises because Brown is attempting to give money to an organization that he is not only affiliated with, but that he sits on the board of. Brown will likely concede that this in fact a conflict of interest because Brown sits on one board that is giving money to another board. However, Brown will argue that a safe harbor applies.

Safe harbor

A conflicted transaction may nonetheless be valid if the conflict is disclosed and either 1) a majority of disinterested shareholders approve 2) majority of disinterested directors approve or if the transaction is fair.

Here, the second two both apply. The fact pattern indicates that the entire board knew of the conflict of interest. The entire board then unanimously voted to approve it. That means that 11 directors voted in favor of it. All those 11 directors are disinterested so the transaction is valid under the safe harbor.

Additionally, Brown is likely to argue that the transaction is fair. A corporation has a lot to gain from donating to universities as discussed above and $100K for a corporation that has $20 million in cash reserves is an insignificant amount.

Conclusion

Evan will likely fail in his suit because the board did not violate any fiduciary duty to the shareholders by giving $100K to the corporation.

Q3 Real Property

Andrew, a widower with three adult children (Bobby, Carol, and Dylan), owned a forty- acre parcel of wooded land called Havenwood. In 1988, Andrew by written deed validly conveyed the north half of Havenwood to his brother Elmo.

In 1989, Andrew died, leaving a valid will that gave “all my real estate to Bobby, Carol, and Dylan as joint tenants with right of survivorship.” Carol and Dylan lived out of state. Bobby lived near Havenwood.

In 1990, without permission from anyone, Bobby cut down some trees and prepared a number of campsites on both the north and south halves of Havenwood. He sometimes used one campsite himself and rented out the other sites during the spring and summer each year. Bobby paid taxes on the entire property using the rental fees he collected, keeping the remaining profits.

In 2017, Dylan asked Bobby about the land and Bobby told Dylan that it was none of his business. Bobby said, “I’ve improved the land and, anyway, I’m the youngest and it will be mine in the end.” Dylan then by written deed validly conveyed his interest in Havenwood to Fred, his friend, as a gift. Dylan told Carol what had happened, and she had a written deed drawn up validly conveying her interest in Havenwood “from Carol as a joint tenant to Carol as a tenant in common.”

In 2018, Bobby died leaving a valid will that gave his entire estate to Sam, his son. Sam continued renting the campsites and paying taxes, keeping the remaining profits, and occasionally using one campsite himself, just as his father had done.

1. What right, title or interest in Havenwood, if any, are currently held by Elmo, Fred, Carol and Sam? Discuss.

2. Are any claims available to or against Sam for payment of taxes or recovery of rental fees? Discuss.

Answer A

Will Requirements

An attested will must be (1) in writing, (2) signed by the testator with testamentary capacity and intent, and (3) jointly witnessed by 2 witnesses who understand the testator's act.

Here, the facts state that A's and B's wills were valid. These requirements are met.

Deed Requirements

To be valid, a deed conveying real property must (1) be in writing, (2) be signed by the grantor, (3) identify the land to be transferred, (4) identify the grantee, (5) contain language of the grantor's present intent to transfer, and (6) be delivered to and accepted by the grantee.

Here, the facts state that all of the deeds at issue were valid, so there is no problem with the above requirements.

Adverse Possession (AP)

An individual may acquire ownership of land through AP if (1) their possession of the land is exclusive; (2) their possession is continuous for the statutory period; (3) their possession is hostile, i.e., under a claim of right; and (4) their possession is open and notorious. These elements are discussed below.

1) Interests in Havenwood (H)

The parties' interests in H changed as a result of several events from 1988 to 2018. Each event is discussed in turn.

1988 - Transfer of North Half (North H) to Elmo

In 1988, A - who appeared to own H in fee simple, executed a written deed validly conveying North H to his brother Elmo.

After this action, A held the southern half of H (South H) in fee simple. Elmo held North H in fee simple.

1989 - A's Transfer to Bobby, Carol, and Dylan

In 1989, A transferred "all of [his] real estate to Bobby, Carol, and Dylan as joint tenants with a right of survivorship."

As discussed above, all A had to transfer was his fee simple interest in South H.

Joint Tenancy

A joint tenancy is a form of joint ownership of property. To create a joint tenancy, the tenants must have the unities of possession, interest, time, and title. The deed conveying the property must also state that it is with the right of survivorship.

Unity of possession exists when all joint tenants have an equal right to possess the land. Here, A's will gave Bobby (B), Carol (C), and Dylan (D) the land and did not indicate that they would have anything but equal possessory rights, so this unity is met.

Unity of interest means that all joint tenants have the same interest in the land. Here, A's will conveyed the land to Bobby, Carol, and Dylan equally so they each have the same interest in the land as joint tenants.

Unity of time and title require that the joint tenants' interests must have been created at the same time and in the same conveyance. Here, Bobby, Carol, and Dylan all received their interest at the same time via the same conveyance in A's will.

Finally, A's will expressly stated that the joint tenancy would have a right of survivorship. Thus, A's will created a valid joint tenancy.

Conclusion

At the end of 1989, A had no interest in H. Bobby, Carol, and Dylan held South H as joint tenants.

1990 - Bobby's Actions

In 1990, Bobby cut down some trees and prepared campsites on North H and South H. He sometimes uses one campsite himself and rented out the others during spring and summer.

North H

As stated above, Elmo owned North H at this time, so Bobby had no right to enter into North H absent an easement (a nonpossessory right to enter property) or profit a prendre (a nonpossessory right to enter property and remove specific natural resources from the land). As discussed below, B's use of the land was thus hostile at this point, which is important for purposes of adverse possession (AP).

South H

As a joint tenant of South H, B had the right to equal possession of South H. His cutting down the trees and earning rental fees was relevant for purposes of contribution (discussed in Question #2). But because B's entrance and use of the land was not hostile to Carol and Dylan's rights, it did not have an effect on their rights of possession and ownership.

2017 - Bobby's Statement to Dylan

A joint tenant's use of property, although usually not hostile to the other joint tenants, may become hostile if the joint tenant denies the other joint tenants access to the land. This is called ouster.

Here, one could argue that B's statement to Dylan that the land was "none of his business" and that it would be B's land in the end because he was the youngest was sufficient to make B's use and possession of the land hostile to C and D. But as discussed below, to be hostile, an adverse possessor's possession must be under a claim of right. Here, B was probably just being rude to D by saying the land was "none of his business" and by saying it would eventually be his (which actually did not turn out to be true). B never claimed that South H was his at that time. Thus, B's statements were not sufficiently hostile to put D or C on notice of an AP claim.

2017 - D's Conveyance to Fred

Also in 2017, D conveyed his interest in South H to Fred (F). A joint tenancy is severed as to a joint tenant whenever that joint tenant conveys his interest to a third party. At that point, the third party becomes a tenant in common. A tenancy in common requires only unity of possession. Here, D severed the joint tenancy in South H as to himself when he conveyed his interest in it to Fred.

Thus, at this point, B and C held 2/3 of South H as joint tenants; F held 1/3 of South H as a tenant in common.

2017 - C's Conveyance to Herself

Finally, in 2017 C conveyed her interest in South H to herself as a tenant in common. Some jurisdictions permit an individual to convey land to themself via a deed. If so, then C would become a tenant in common under the rules stated above. But if not, the severance was ineffective and the ownership interests remained unchanged. But under the general rule that a property owner may do what they please (subject to some exceptions) with their property interests, C's conveyance was likely valid. This is bolstered by the fact that the facts state that C drew up the deed validly conveying her interest as a joint tenant to herself as a tenant in common.

Assuming that C's conveyance was valid, it severed her joint tenancy with B. Thus, at this point, B, C, and F each held a 1/3 interest in South H as tenants in common.

2018 - B's Death - North H

In 2018, B died and left his entire estate to his son Sam (S). Sam continued to rent the campsites and pay taxes, keeping the profits and occasionally using the site himself.

At this point, B had been operating a campsite on North H at least seasonally since 1990, or for 28 years. This raises the issue of whether B had acquired North H through adverse possession. If he did, then his will conveyed that interest to S.

See rule above for adverse possession.

Exclusive

First, Sam will argue that B's possession was exclusive. To be exclusive, the possession cannot be shared with the rightful owner. Here, there is no evidence that Elmo ever even visited the property or shared possession with B in any way. Elmo will respond that B's possession was not exclusive because he rented out the campsite to other campers. But B did so based on his belief that North H was his exclusively to rent out. Thus, this element is met.

Continuous

Second, Sam will argue that B's possession was continuous for the statutory period. The facts do not list a statutory AP period, but in most jurisdictions it is between six and twenty years. Here, B's possession was for 28 years, so it probably satisfies this requirement.

If not, S can continue to possess the property under a claim of right via his inheritance from B. Under the rule of "tacking," a court would then "tack" the time of B's possession to S's possession because he was B's successor in interest. The court would then conclude that the continuity element was met if S and B's combined possession satisfied the statutory period.

Elmo may respond that B's possession wasn't actually continuous because B only sometimes used the campsite himself. But courts have held that if a property is of the type that is appropriate for seasonal use, then seasonal use is sufficient to satisfy the continuity requirement. Here a campsite is not something that is used year round. Thus, assuming that B used the campsite seasonally, this requirement is met.

Hostile

S will next argue that B's possession was hostile. To be hostile, the possession must be made under a claim of right. Here, B used North H like it was his own, cutting down trees, building a campsite, and renting out the site to campers. Thus, B acted as though North H was his and his only. This requirement is met.

Open and Notorious

Finally, S will claim that B's possession was open and notorious. There is no evidence that B attempted to hide his possession of the land. Elmo will argue that he didn't have notice of the possession. But if Elmo had visited North H, he would have seen the chopped-down trees and the campsite. His failure to visit doesn't make B's possession less open. This element is met.

Conclusion

B adversely possess North H. He thus obtained Elmo's fee simple interest. After B's death, because B's valid will gave his entire estate to Sam, Sam had a fee simple interest in North H.

2018 - B's Death - South H

As stated above, B had a right to possess South H as a joint tenant and then as a tenant in common, so his use of the property was not exclusive or hostile for AP purposes.

It could be argued that his possession became hostile in 2017, when he told Dylan that the land was none of his business and B would get it anyway in the end. But as discussed above, this statement was not sufficiently hostile to meet the AP requirements.

Thus, after B's death, his 1/3 interest in South H as a tenant in common will pass to Sam. The right of survivorship that applies to joint tenancies will not preclude this because, as discussed above, the joint tenancy was completely severed before B's death.

CONCLUSION

Based on the above events, Elmo has no interest in Havenwood. Sam owns North H in fee simple. Fred, Carol, and Sam each have a 1/3 interest in South H as tenants in common.

Claims Regarding Taxes and Fees

North H

As discussed above, S now owns North H in fee simple. Because none of the other parties has no interest in North H, S is not liable to them for any rental fees that B earned. S also cannot seek payment for taxes that B paid on North H.

South H

South H is different. The parties may have claims against each other based on events during the joint tenancy and during the tenancy in common.

Joint Tenancy

From 1989 to 2017, B, C, and D held South H as joint tenants. Joint tenants are all responsible for payment of taxes and entitled to the profits on the land they jointly hold. Thus, S can seek reimbursement on behalf of B's estate for the parties' pro rata share of taxes paid. B and C can also seek their pro rata share of the profits that B earned on South H from 1989 to 2017.

Tenancy in Common

From 2017 to 2018, F, C, and B held South H as tenants in common. When B died, his tenant in common interest went to S.

A tenant in common is entitled to possession of the premises. However, a tenant in sole possession of the land is required to pay taxes on the land to the extent that the land produces income. Here, B paid taxes on the entire property using the rental fees he collected and kept the remaining profits. Thus, S cannot seek reimbursement from any parties for the taxes B paid.

With respect to the rental profits, F and C can seek contribution from S for a pro rata share of the net profits that B received from 2017 to 2018 as a result of running the campsite on South H.

Partition

If F and C do not wish to be tenants in common with S anymore, they may also seek a partition. This will not require S's consent: any tenant in common may unilaterally partition the property. Courts prefer a partition in kind as opposed to a forced sale of the property.

Here, C lives out of state. Given that D also lives out of state and is friends with F, it is likely that F lives out of state, too. Thus, a court may partition the property to give the campsite portion to B and split the other 2/3 between C and F, since they live out of state and evidently do not wish to use the campsite portion of the land -- or even visit the land.

Upon partition, the court can order S to pay contribution for C and F's pro rata share of B's after-tax profits from the property.

C and F may also argue that B owed them a duty as a tenant in common and seek damages for his renting out their property for their involvement. But given the partition and contribution remedies outlined above, this argument will fail.

Conclusion

S is probably not entitled to any net payments from C or F because the income B, as sole possessor, derived from the property exceeded the taxes that he paid. However, C and F can seek contribution from S for their pro rata share of B's net profits from renting out the land as a campsite.

Answer B

Havenwood Property

A property is held in fee simple absolute if it is fully under the control of an individual, with no interests of reverter or reentry. Property owned in fee simple absolute may be freely transferred according to the wishes of the property owner. A property owner may transfer part of their property pursuant to a valid deed, creating two estates.

Andrew conveyed the northern half of Havenwood, pursuant to a valid deed, to his brother Elmo. Elmo was the owner, in fee simple absolute, of the northern half of the parcel as of 1988.

Joint Tenancy

Joint tenancy is the holding of a property by multiple parties with equal rights to possession of the entire property and a right of survivorship. Thus, if any of the joint tenants die, their heirs will not receive their share, but instead will go to the surviving joint tenants. A joint tenancy is created by the express intention of the creator in a valid document. Under the common law, devise of property in common ownership was automatically presumed to be a joint tenancy. Under modern law, devise of a property in common ownership is presumed to be a tenancy-in-common unless there is evidence of the grantor's intent to convey a valid joint tenancy. Creation of a right of survivorship alone is usually not enough to show an intent to create a joint tenancy. Instead, the words joint tenancy are usually required. Creation of a joint tenancy requires traditionally the four unities, that of time, title, interest, and possession. First, the joint tenants must take at the same time. Second, the joint tenants must take title through the same document. Third, the joint tenants must take the same interest in the property. Finally, the tenants must have equal right to possession of the entire property. If a joint tenancy fails the four unities, it will instead be a tenancy-in-common. Any conveyance of an interest in property requires satisfaction of the statute of frauds. A valid written will satisfies the Statute of Frauds, as it requires the signature of the testator (whether attested or holographic).

Andrew created a valid joint tenancy in Bobby, Carol, and Dylan as of 1989. Andrew's express intent was demonstrated in his valid will that gave "all my real estate to Bobby Carol and Dylan as joint tenants with right of survivorship." The use of the term "with right of survivorship" and "as joint tenants" clearly demonstrated this intent. The conveyance met the four unities. The parties took at the same time, at Andrew's death in 1989. The parties took through the same document, the will. The parties took the same interest, an equal third share. Finally, the parties took an equal right to possession of the entirety of the property. Because the joint tenancy met the four unities and was created with the express intent to create a joint tenancy, a valid joint tenancy existed in 1989. There is no issue with the statute of frauds because the will was valid and thus signed by Bobby.

Ouster

Tenants may commit ouster when they take possession of the entire property that was once in common ownership with an intent to oust the other tenants. Ouster requires notice to the ousted tenants, whether that be constructive or actual notice, and intent to oust the other parties, and the taking of full possession of the property. Once ousted, the ousted parties may seek to partition the property. The ousted parties also lose their right to possession of the property.

Bobby's actions do not amount to an ouster, as he did not demonstrate a clear intent to oust both Bobby and Carol. While Bobby and Carol may have been put on notice of a potential ouster in 2017, when Bobby told Dylan that Havenwood was none of his business and when Dylan told Carol about the encounter, Bobby did not demonstrate enough of an intent to oust his siblings. He simply stated that the land was none of Dylan's business and that he both improved the land and would eventually get it anyway. These statements are consistent with Bobby simply telling Dylan that, though he is a joint tenant, he has not been around to manage the property and should just trust Bobby. At no point did Bobby exclude either Dylan or Carol from entering the property. As such, he has not met the requirements for ouster.

Tenancy-in-Common

A joint tenancy is terminated and replaced by a tenancy-in-common upon the severance of the joint-tenancy arrangement, such as by the conveyance of a joint tenant’s possession to another. Severance of a joint tenancy does not require the consent of both parties and can be done unilaterally. A tenancy-in-common exists when multiple parties hold equal interests to a property and have the right to possession of the entire property. A tenancy in common gives the right to possession of the entire property but does not include a right of survivorship. The interests can be transferred without breaking the tenancy in common. If a tenant-in-common conveys their interest to another, a new tenancy-in-common is created with the owner of the conveyance. Creation of a tenancy in common does not require the four unities.

Dylan terminated the joint tenancy by conveying his interest in the property to Fred. Thus, Fred took a 1/3 interest in the southern half of Havenwood, and Carol and Bobby maintained a joint tenancy for the other 2/3. Carol attempted to also convey her interest but did so to herself. Because severance of a joint tenancy does not require the consent of all parties, and can be done through voluntary acts like conveyance to a third party, Carol likely severed the joint tenancy and took a 1/3 share of the southern half of Havenwood as a tenant in common. She indicated an intent to sever the joint tenancy and did so through a conveyance to herself as a tenant-in-common, which does not require compliance with the four unities. Thus, she now has a 1/3 interest as a tenant in common.

Adverse Possession

A party may establish adverse possession, in which they obtain legal title to the land of another, when they meet the requirements. First, their possession must be open and notorious. Second, the possession must be hostile. Third, possession must be exclusive. Fourth, they must show continuous use. Finally, possession must meet the statutory period (many states have a 7- year or 10 -year period). The possession period of a predecessor in interest may be tacked onto the claims of a successor in interest to meet this statutory period if there is privity of estate. Some states also require that an adverse possessor pay taxes on the property they claim. If a party can establish the elements of adverse possession, they may obtain title to the entirety of the land they have openly and notoriously possessed through a quiet title action. To adversely possess land held in common or by joint tenancy, one must first oust the other tenants, otherwise they have not established exclusive possession.

Bobby has not established a claim for adverse possession against his siblings. Because he has not ousted the other siblings (or even if he had ousted in 2017, he would not have met the statutory period starting then), he has no claim of adverse possession for the southern half of Havenwood. However, Sam has likely established a valid claim to adverse possession of the northern half of Havenwood. Sam and Bobby's possession was open and notorious, as Bobby cut down trees and prepared several campsites on the northern half of Havenwood. He also paid taxes on the entire property. Elmo had constructive notice that Bobby was adversely possessing his property and should have discovered it through reasonable inspection. Second, neither Sam nor Bobby received permission to construct campsites and thus possessed with hostile intent. Third, they had exclusive possession because they collected rents from others who used the property, and thus did not allow others to maintain possession without permission and license. Fourth, there are no facts suggesting they did not continuously use the property. In fact, the facts suggest that Sam continued to rent the campsites, use his own, and pay taxes. Finally, their possession would likely meet any statutory period.

Sam, as a successor in privity through devise, may tack Bobby's period of possession onto his own. Thus, they have established 28 years of possession, which is enough to meet the statutory period in most states. The facts suggest that Sam and Bobby used the entire northern half of Havenwood. As such, Sam is not only owner of a 1/3 share of the southern half of Havenwood, but also the total owner of the northern half of Havenwood.

Remaining Interests as of the Present

Because Dylan and Carol severed the joint tenancy in 2017 through their conveyances, Carol maintains a 1/3 interest in the southern half of Havenwood. Dylan validly conveyed his interest to Fred, and thus Fred maintains a 1/3 interest in the southern half of Havenwood. Sam retains the other 1/3 interest in Havenwood through devise from Bobby, using a valid will that conveyed his entire estate. Sam has also established a full claim to the northern half of Havenwood by adverse possession, which he may exercise through quiet title. As such, Elmo has no interest remaining.

Payment of Taxes or Rental Fees

Joint tenants and tenants in common have an equal right to possession of the entirety of the property. Thus, they are equally responsible for the payment of taxes, maintenance, and other obligations arising from possession of the property. They are also entitled to the profits from the property, including any rental fees accrued. Tenants will not be reimbursed for improvements made to the property, though they may recover the increase in value from those improvements if the property is sold. Tenants may sue for contribution to recover payments they made in excess of their obligations or to recover payments not properly distributed to them.

Sam may seek contribution from Dylan and Carol for the payment of taxes by Bobby for their shared property. Sam may also seek contribution from Fred, as a new tenant-in-common for payment of taxes he made after conveyance of the interest to Fred in 2017. Dylan and Carol may seek contribution from Sam for the profits from the property, namely the rental fees for their period of ownership. Fred may seek payment of rental fees beginning in 2017, when he took possession.

Q4 Criminal Law and Procedure

Needing money and willing to do anything to get it, Don, who is tall, and Al, who is short, set out for Vic's house around midnight to steal from him. On the way, Al said that he did not want to get involved, but Don slapped Al's face and responded: "If you don't come along now, I will break your legs tomorrow." At Vic's house, Don opened the unlocked front door and he and Al went inside. Don took a wallet on a table in the foyer, and he and Al ran away.

Wanda, who happened to be walking in front of Vic's house at the time, caught sight of both men running out of the house. That night, Wanda described the taller man to police as clean-shaven with short hair, but couldn't describe the shorter man.

Don and Al were soon arrested. The next day, a newspaper printed a recent photo of Don, showing him with a large beard and long hair. When Wanda saw the photo in the newspaper, she immediately went to the police station and told Officer Oliver that she was concerned that Don might be the wrong man. Officer Oliver told Wanda that Don had Vic's wallet in his pocket when he was arrested. Before Don was arraigned, Officer Oliver arranged for Wanda to view a lineup of six bearded men with long hair, including Don. After viewing the lineup for 20 minutes, Wanda identified Don as one of the men she saw running out of the house. At trial, Al stipulated that he had run out of Vic's house with Don.

1. With what crime or crimes, if any, may Al reasonably be charged; what defenses, if any, may he reasonably assert; and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

2. Under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution, on what basis, if any, may Don move to suppress evidence of Wanda's identification at the lineup, and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

Answer A

Al's (A) crimes

Conspiracy

There is a conspiracy when two or more people agree to commit a crime with the specific intent to commit the crime. Under the common law, there must bilateral conspiracy, whereby both parties to the agreement specifically intend to commit the crime. There is also no overt act requirement under the common law. However, more recently, the MPC, federal law and majority of jurisdictions all require that there be an overt act in addition to the agreement for a conspiracy to be found. The MPC also allows for there to be unilateral conspiracy, when a party can be guilty of conspiracy for a crime even though the other party did not actually want to commit the act (i.e. in the case of an agreement with an undercover police officer.) Conspiracy does not merge with the actual crime committed -- and thus, even if the substantial crime is performed, a person could also be guilty of conspiracy of that crime.

Here, the facts indicate that D and A intended to commit the crime of stealing from V. D and A agreed to steal from V and "set out for V's house" together at midnight to steal from him. Thus, under the common law, A was guilty of conspiracy for larceny and burglary (the substantive crimes will be analyzed in more detail below), when A agreed with D to steal from V.

Then under the majority/federal/MPC rule, there was also arguably an overt act performed when D and A set out for V's house. A could argue that simply going towards V's house was insufficient to constitute an overt act. A could argue that they didn't have special equipment or tools on them with the intent to break in. However, here, D and A set out towards V's house around "midnight." Heading to someone's home at midnight (well passed reasonable hours) would probably be sufficient to show that there has been an overt act sufficient to find conspiracy.

Pinkerton

Under the Pinkerton Rule, all co-conspirators are responsible for all substantive crimes that are committed by co-conspirators that are foreseeable and are in furtherance of the crime.

So, here, A would also be liable for all substantive crimes that D committed in the process of committing the theft crime that they intended to commit together. Therefore, even though it was D who opened the unlocked door and then took the wallet on the table in the foyer, A would also be liable for those crimes, even if A argued that he himself did not commit those crimes. Opening a door and taking a wallet are all foreseeable crimes in furtherance of the crime of stealing from someone's home.

Accomplice Liability

Accomplice liability will attach when an accomplice aids a principal in performing a crime with the specific intent that the crime be performed. (Note: under the common law, the accomplice needs to only aid intentionally and knowingly.) An accomplice will also be liable for all the substantive crimes that the principal has done.

Here, A may try to argue that he wasn't a principal in the crime because he didn't commit the actus reus for the crimes. However, based on the facts, the court would likely find that he was very much a principal to these crimes -- given that he went to V's house and also entered the property.

Larceny

Larceny is the taking and moving of another person's property without their consent with the intent to deprive them of it permanently.

Here, D took and moved the wallet from the table on the foyer, with the intent to deprive V of the wallet permanently. After D took the wallet, both D and A ran from the home. And there is no indication that D or A intended to return the property. In fact, quite to the contrary, at least D intended to keep the money given that he was in need of money and "willing to do anything to get it."

As such, absent any defenses (discussed below) D and W would both be guilty of larceny here.

Robbery (no threat of force)

Robbery is larceny from another person's presence or person through threat or intimidation. Though the taking of the wallet happened in the person's home (and maybe arguably in the person's presence if V were there) -- there was no threat or intimidation and thus, there was no robbery here.

Burglary

Burglary is the breaking and entering into a dwelling at nighttime with the intent to commit a felony inside. The requirements for dwelling and nighttime have been relaxed in many jurisdictions.

Here, D broke and entered into V's home at nighttime with the intent to steal from V. All the elements are met. They "broke" into the house when they unlocked the door. Even though the door was unlocked, this was not a place open for the public (but someone's home) and thus the court would find that there was a breaking. Then, they entered into the place of the home ("entering"). The building they broke into was indeed V's home (and thus a dwelling). And then broke in with the intent to steal from V (and thus commit a felony inside).

As such, there was burglary here. And thus, A could be charged with burglary. A's defenses

Withdrawal

A co-conspirator could withdraw from a conspiracy depending on the jurisdiction. Under the common law, a co-conspirator cannot withdraw from a conspiracy because the conspiracy occurs when the agreement is made. However, even under the common law, a co-conspirator could withdraw from the conspiracy even after the agreement is made so as to not be held responsible for future crimes. However, such withdrawal must be made clearly to the other co-conspirator or also typically requires informing the police.

Under the majority rules, a co-conspirator can withdraw from a conspiracy provided that it is before an overt act has taken place -- and the co-conspirator either makes an affirmative declaration of intent to withdraw to the co-conspirator or alternatively, informs the police. Under the MPC/minority rule, a co-conspirator could withdraw even after the overt act, provided that they take actions to thwart the crime.

Here, A would argue that he properly withdrew from the conspiracy. He would argue that he withdrew from the conspiracy when he told D that he did not want to get involved. However, the court is unlikely to be receptive to his argument in any jurisdiction. Under the common law, he could not withdraw at that point because he had already agreed to the commit the crime with D. And under the majority rule, he had already committed to the overt act of walking to V's home at midnight D and thus could not withdraw at that point. Even under the minority rule, A could not have effectively withdrawn because he did nothing to thwart the crime. Instead, he actually "went inside" the home after D had unlocked the front door.

Duress

Duress is a defense whereby the defendant argues that they had to commit a crime because they or a third party were under an imminent threat that threatened serious bodily harm or death.

Here, A would argue that he was forced to commit these crimes because of duress. He would argue that D slapped him on the face and told him that he would "break [his] legs" if he didn't come along. However, A is unlikely to win on this defense. For a defense of duress, the threat must be imminent. In this case, D did threaten A but said that D would break his legs tomorrow. Also, there is no indication that A, if he wanted to, couldn't have run away or left the scene after he decided that he did not want to get involved. As a result, the court is unlikely to find for A on his defense for duress.

For these reasons, A could reasonably be charged with the substantive crimes of larceny and burglary and with conspiracy to commit those crimes. His defenses for duress and withdrawal are unlikely to be successful in any jurisdiction.

Question 2

State Action

The 5th and 14th Amendment of the US Constitution protects people against state action. In this case, there is clear state action. The issue here involves police action and thus there is state action.

Exclusionary Rule

Under the exclusionary rule, all evidence that is obtained in violation of the 4th, 5th, or 6th amendments must be excluded from evidence. There are a few exceptions to the exclusionary rule (i.e. knock and announce, attenuation and the causal chain, etc.) but they are not relevant here.

Lineup

D's strongest argument would be to move to suppress the evidence of Wanda's (W) identification on the basis that it was impermissibly suggestive. Under the rules concerning lineups, police cannot use lineups that are impermissibly suggestive that have a substantial likelihood of resulting in misidentification.

Impermissibly Suggestive

D could present a strong argument that the lineup was impermissibly suggestive. He would argue that by the time the W was shown the lineup, she had already seen his picture in the newspaper. Moreover, he would argue the lineup was impermissibly suggestive because when W went to the police after seeing his picture in the newspaper, the police confirmed that they had the correct person because they had found V's wallet on D. As a result, not only had W seen his picture in the newspaper, but also had confirmation from the police that the person in the picture was the person who had committed the crime.

Substantial likelihood of resulting in misidentification

D would then argue that the above caused a substantial likelihood of resulting in misidentification. He would argue that, in fact, had W not seen the picture (and had the picture not been confirmed by Officer Oliver) she would still be looking for a taller man that was "clean-shaven with short hair." He would argue that it was only because she had seen the picture and heard the police officer's statement that she identified him.

In response, the police would argue that they ensured that the lineup was not impermissibly suggestive. They would argue that they purposefully only chose six bearded men with long hair (presumably, all tall too) -- and that they provided W a lot of time to inspect each. Indeed, they would argue that W only identified D after 20 minutes.

Despite the police's efforts, D could probably successfully move to suppress evidence of W's identification at the lineup on the basis that it was impermissibly suggestive. Even though the police had chosen other tall, bearded men -- the police had already prejudiced W by confirming that the person in the newspaper picture was the person who had committed the crime.

Answer B

Al's Crimes

Crimes

Principal and Accomplice

Al may be liable for Don's crime as an accomplice to his crimes as the principal. The principal of a crime is the one who performs the actus reus of the crime, the perpetrator of the crime in other words. Here, Don is the one who actually opened the front door and picked up the wallet and took it with him. Therefore, Don is the principal of the crime. An accomplice is one who aids or abets the principal in the completion or cover- up of a crime. An accomplice is liable for all crimes he aided and abetted the principal in. Here Al went along with Don, entered Vic's house, watched Don take the wallet, and ran away with Don. Presumably, Al was serving as a lookout for Don and not merely tagging along. Therefore, to the extent any of Don's actions while Al was there are crimes, as discussed above, Al will be liable for them, unless he can claim withdrawal as discussed below.

Conspiracy

A conspiracy is an agreement between two or more persons to commit an unlawful act. Although at common law, an overt act was not required for the agreement to be a conspiracy, the modern law also requires an overt act. The agreement for a conspiracy may be written or oral and may be assumed from circumstantial evidence if there is a common plot or scheme among the potential co-conspirators. Here, although the facts are silent as to any written or oral agreement between Al and Don, the evidence suggests there was a common scheme. Al and Don were both desperate for money and willing to do anything to get it and they set out together to enter Vic's house and steal from him. Therefore, unless Al can argue that he withdrew from the conspiracy, as discussed below, Al will be liable for conspiracy. He will also be liable for the substantive crimes committed in furtherance of the conspiracy and any additional crimes if they were the foreseeable result of the conspiracy under the majority Pinkerton rule.

Larceny

Larceny is the trespassory taking and carrying away of another's personal property with the intent to permanently deprive them of it at the time of the taking. Don likely committed larceny and therefore under accomplice and conspiracy liability, Al will also be guilty of larceny, subject to the defenses below.

Trespassory

In order to be trespassory, the taking must have been without the owner's permission. Here, Al and Don took Vic's wallet from his house without his knowledge at night. Therefore, it seems very unlikely that they had Vic's permission to take the wallet and no facts suggest that they did. Therefore, this element is met.

Taking

The taking is any action that removes the personal property from the possession of the owner. Here, the wallet was in Vic's house and therefore in his possession before the time of the taking. When Don picked it up, he satisfied the taking requirement by removing it from the possession of the owner into his own possession. Therefore, this element is satisfied.

Carrying

Carrying away is any movement even slight movement away from where the property was taken. Here, this element was clearly met because Don took the wallet and ran out of the house and away from the house.

Another's Personal Property

The property must also be in the possession of another. Here, the wallet was in Vic's possession before the taking and therefore this element is met.

Intent to Permanently Deprive

The person committing larceny must have the specific intent at the time of the taking to permanently deprive the owner of the property. Here, Don and Al were desperate for money. Therefore, it is unlikely that Don took the wallet with the intent to give it back to Vic and therefore likely intended to permanently deprive Vic of the property. Therefore, this element and all elements required for larceny have been met.

Robbery

Robbery is larceny from the person of another by force or intimidation. Here Don's actions did not amount to robbery and therefore Al will not be liable for robbery even through accomplice and co-conspirator liability.

Larceny

As discussed above, larceny has been committed by Don.

From the Person of Another

Here, the wallet was taken off a table in the foyer not off of Vic's person. There is no evidence that Vic was even aware or present when the wallet was taken and therefore this element is not met.

By Force or Intimidation

To be a robbery, more force than is necessary to effect the taking is necessary or there must be intimidation through threat of imminent bodily harm. Here, neither of these is met. Don took the wallet off the table with only the force necessary to take the wallet and Vic was nowhere to be found so there was no intimidation through threat.
Therefore, because the taking was not from the person of another or by force or intimidation, Don did not commit robbery and therefore Al cannot be liable for it as an accomplice or co-conspirator.

Burglary

Burglary is the breaking and entering into a dwelling at night with the intent to commit a felony at the time of the entering.

Breaking

Breaking is use of force, for example breaking a window or kicking down a door. The force used must be more than required to enter. Here, Don opened an unlocked front door. This is sufficient to be considered a breaking because there was more force than necessary to enter, ie the door was not wide open and force was used to open it, however slight.

Entering

Entering is physically crossing the plane into the dwelling. Here, Don and Al both entered the house by going inside.

Dwelling

A dwelling is a structure regularly used for habitation. It does not have to be currently inhabited, but it cannot be abandoned. All states have statutes now that expand the common law definition to other structures and buildings and some to cars. Here, this was a dwelling because it was Vic's house. It is unclear whether Vic was home at the time, but he is not required to be at home if it is a place he regularly inhabits. Thus, this element is satisfied.

Night

Night is the time between sunset and sunrise. Modern statutes eliminate the need for a burglary to be at night but may impose higher penalties when it is at night. Here, Al and Don went at midnight to steal from Vic's house so the nighttime element is clearly met.

Intent to Commit a Felony

At the time of the breaking and entering, the person must have had the specific intent to commit a felony inside to be a burglary. Here, Al and Don went to Vic's house with the clear purpose of stealing from him. This is a felony and therefore at the time of the entry, they had the requisite intent. Therefore, Don is guilty of burglary and Vic is guilty as his accomplice or co-conspirator unless one of the defenses below applies.

Defenses

Duress

Duress is an improper threat that meaningfully deprives a person of actual choice. In the criminal context, the threat must be of imminent serious bodily injury or death to the person asserting duress or to another person that the person knows. Here, Al will argue that when Don slapped his face and said "If you don't come along now, I will break your legs tomorrow" that he was deprived of any meaningful choice and can assert the defense of duress. However, the threat to Al was that Don would break his legs tomorrow not at the time. Therefore, the threat was not imminent and Al cannot assert duress as a defense. Al will also argue that the fact that Don slapped him was an imminent threat; however, Don slapped him before he made the threat and a slap is not imminent serious bodily injury or death and it was done before the threat so it was not a threat of serious bodily injury or death.

Withdrawal as Accomplice

The common law did not allow any withdrawal when a person had already aided and abetted a principal. The modern law allows withdrawal and therefore relief from liability only when the accomplice clearly states that he does not want to help anymore and attempts to thwart the principal in the commission of the crime. Here, Al will argue that he withdrew from the accomplice liability when he said he did not want to get involved anymore. However, Al still went along with Don and served as a lookout and therefore he cannot escape accomplice liability.

Withdrawal from Conspiracy

Al will also try to argue that he withdrew from the conspiracy. At common law the conspiracy was achieved when there was an agreement to commit a crime without an overt act. Under this standard there is no withdrawal from the conspiracy once the agreement has been made. Here, Al has already set out with Don to steal from Vic so the agreement has already been made. Under the modern law an overt act is required before there is conspiracy liability. An overt act may be lawful or unlawful. Setting out at midnight to go somewhere may be lawful, but in this case it was an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy to steal from Vic. Therefore, Al had already committed conspiracy before he said he did not want to get involved. In addition, he continued aiding Don and finished carrying out the crime so he will still be liable for conspiracy. A conspirator may be able to escape liability for substantive crimes, but only if he attempts to thwart the success of the conspiracy. Here, Al did not do that so he will also still be liable for the underlying crimes.

Don's Motion to Suppress

Under the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, a court will take two steps in deciding whether a police lineup violates the defendant's rights. First, the court will decide whether the lineup was impermissibly suggestive. Second, the court will decide whether even if the lineup was impermissibly suggestive if the identification is still nonetheless reliable.

Impermissibly Suggestive

A lineup is impermissibly suggestive if the form or substance of the lineup unduly biases the person making the identification. Here, Wanda described to the police that the taller man, presumably Don, was clean-shaven with short hair, but could not describe the shorter man. When Don was arrested with a large beard and long hair, Wanda thought Don might be the wrong man. Officer Oliver told Wanda that Don had Vic's wallet in his pocked when he was arrested. Officer Oliver than arranged for lineup of six bearded men with long hair including Don. After 20 minutes, Wanda identified Don as the man.

Four aspects of this lineup are impermissibly suggestive. First, Wanda saw Don's picture in the newspaper before the lineup. Thus, she already knew that he was the man that the officers thought was the one who came out of the house. Second, Officer Oliver told Wanda that the man they had arrested, Don, had Vic's wallet in his pocket. In addition to having seen the picture in the newspaper, now Wanda has been told Don had the wallet on him. These facts would make Wanda seriously doubt her description the night of the crime that the taller man was clean-shaven and had short hair. Third, the police lineup only included long haired and bearded men. Wanda believed the man she was looking for had short hair and was clean shaven, but Officer Oliver only provided her options with long hair and beards to choose from. As such, Wanda may have felt limited to those choices that were impermissibly suggestive.

Still Reliable

If it nonetheless is still reliable, then it can be used still. Here, it is likely not reliable because it is inconsistent with what Wanda said when the identification was fresh the night of and because it took her 20 minutes to identify Don.

Q5 Remedies

Daniel's house is for sale. In his living room are two valuable original paintings by Artist, one of the California coastline and the other of a field of Golden State wildflowers. Daniel recently refused an offer from Museum to purchase the paintings for $10,000 each.

Pam went to Daniel's house hoping to buy it before she left on a business trip. As Pam, Daniel and his real estate broker, Bill, inspected the house, Pam noticed the paintings in the living room, commenting that they were beautiful and seemed designed to fit in the house. Pam then offered $400,000 for the house and another $50,000 if the sale included the two paintings. Daniel agreed and asked Bill to draft a contract for the sale of the house and the two paintings for $450,000. Bill promised to have the contract ready before Pam left town the next day.

Bill drafted a written contract, which Daniel signed even though he noticed that Bill had mistakenly omitted from the sale the painting of the California coastline.

Daniel met Pam at the train station, as her train was about to depart. Daniel gave the contract to Pam, telling her, "This is what we agreed to and I've already signed it." Pam's train started to move, so she quickly signed the contract without reading it and jumped on board the train.

When Pam returned from her trip, she was horrified to find that the California coastline painting was not in the house. She immediately telephoned Daniel to ask about the painting, but he told her, "That's what the contract we signed provides," and hung up.

Six months after Pam moved into the house, she noticed in a local newspaper advertisement that Daniel was offering to sell the Artist painting of the California coastline to the highest bidder at an auction two weeks later.

1. What remedy or remedies can Pam reasonably obtain against Daniel? Discuss.

2. What defense or defenses can Daniel reasonably raise? Discuss.

Answer A

REMEDIES AVAILABLE TO PAM AGAINST DANIEL

In order for Pam successfully to seek a remedy against Daniel, she must first demonstrate that he was in breach of a valid contract.

Governing Law

Contracts for goods, that is, tangible moveable items, are governed by Article II of the Uniform Commercial Code. All other contracts, including contracts for the sale of real property, are governed by the common law. Where a contract covers both goods and real property, courts look at the primary purpose of the contract to determine whether the UCC or the common law applies. Here, the primary purpose of the contract was the sale of Daniel's home. Accordingly, this contract will be governed by the common law.

Formation

A valid contract requires mutual assent, in the form of an offer and acceptance, and bargained for consideration.

Offer

Here, when Pam went to inspect Daniel's home, she offered to purchase Daniel's home for $400,000 and the paintings for $50,000. To be valid, an offer must be directed to a particular offeree and contain the essential terms of the deal. Under the common law, the essential terms are the parties, the subject matter, the quantity, and the price. Pam's offer to purchase the home with the paintings at a total of $450,000 constituted a valid offer because it was made to an identifiable offeree, Daniel, and it contained the essential terms of the deal, including the subject matter (the home and paintings), price ($400,000 + $50,000), parties (Pam and Daniel), and quantity (1 home and 2 paintings).

Acceptance

A party accepts an offer by objectively manifesting an intent to be bound by the terms of the offer. Here, when Pam made the offer, Daniel agreed to it and asked his real estate broker, Bill, to draft a contract in accordance with the parties' agreement. By taking these actions, Dan manifested intent to be bound by the terms of Pam's offer and, thus, there was an acceptance.

Consideration

Consideration is bargained for legal benefit or detriment. Courts do not typically look to the value of the consideration. Here, Pam offered consideration in the form of $450,000: $400,000 for the home and $50,000 for the paintings. Daniel offered consideration in the form of conveying Pam the home and the paintings.

Because there was an offer, acceptance, and consideration, the parties formed a contract.

Terms of the Contract

The issue is what the terms of the contract are. Even though the parties orally agreed that Daniel would provide the home with the two paintings, the written terms of the contract omitted the requirement that Daniel convey the painting of the California Coastline. It is the written contract that the parties signed.

Remedy for Unilateral Mistake - Reformation of Contract

Where a contract is based on the mistake of one party, sometimes the party may seek reformation of the contract to correct the mistake. Thus, if Pam can demonstrate the required elements of unilateral mistake, then she may seek the remedy of reformation.

To persuade a court to reform a contract based on a unilateral mistake, the plaintiff must show the following: (1) that the plaintiff was mistaken about the terms of the contract; (2) that the mistake went to a material term that was a basic assumption of the contract; (3) that the defendant-party knew of the plaintiff's mistake; and (4) the defendant failed to correct the mistake or even took advantage of the mistake.

Plaintiff Was Mistaken

Here, Pam mistakenly believed that the written contract conformed to the terms orally agreed to, specifically, that the contract conveyed to Pam both the painting of the California coastline and the painting of the field of Golden State wildflowers.

Material Term

This mistake was a material term of the contract. To be material, the mistake must be about an issue that affected whether the parties would agree to enter into the contract. Here, Pam made clear that she thought the paintings were beautiful and were a perfect fit for the design of the home. Indeed, she was "horrified," when she saw that the California coastline painting was missing. Moreover, she was willing to pay an extra $50,000 to have the two paintings. Without the paintings, she would have paid much less for the home. Accordingly, this was a material term.

Defendant Knew of the Mistake and Took Advantage of It

The next issue is whether Daniel knew of and took advantage of Pam's mistake. Here, the facts show that Dan noticed Bill's drafting mistake. When Dan met Pam at the train station, he assured her that the contract reflected the terms Daniel and Pam had agreed to. Thus, not only was he aware of the mistake, Daniel told Pam that the mistake did not exist. He likely told her this in order to obtain her signature on the contract and avoid having to convey the painting of the coastline. Indeed, Dan took advantage of the fact that Pam was in a hurry to get on a train that was about to depart. The fact that her train was about to depart made Pam feel as though she needed to sign quickly without reading, and Dan took advantage of this situation and told Pam the contract conformed to their oral discussion.

Conclusion

Because Dan took advantage of Pam's unilateral mistake and that mistake went to a basic assumption of the contract, Pam can seek reformation of the written contract as a remedy.

Reformation

Reformation is an equitable remedy that courts provide when a party has shown the elements of unilateral mistake. When a party successfully seeks reformation, the court will re-write a contract in order to conform to the parties' intent sans the mistake. Thus, based on the foregoing discussion of unilateral mistake, Pam may seek a court order reforming the contract to convey the house with both paintings.

Mutual Mistake

It should be briefly noted that Pam would not be able to base a claim on mutual mistake. The elements of a mutual mistake claim are similar to those of a unilateral mistake, except that both parties must be mistaken. Here, the facts make clear that Dan was not mistaken. Accordingly, there was no mutual mistake.

Fraud

Pam might also be able to show that Dan committed fraud. A party commits fraud when, with scienter, he lies about a material term of a contract in order to induce reliance on that lie. Here, as discussed above, Dan knowingly told Pam that the contract contained the terms in accordance with their oral discussion even though he knew this was not true, and he did so with the intent to induce Pam to sign the written agreement. Accordingly, Pam might succeed in showing that Daniel committed fraud. As discussed above, one remedy for fraud would be reformation.

Specific Performance

Pam might seek specific performance of her contract with Dan, including that he convey both paintings. To demonstrate entitlement to specific performance, a plaintiff must show as follows: (1) that the subject of the contract is unique; (2) that legal damages would not suffice to remedy any breach of the contract; (3) that the conditions triggering the defendant's performance have been met; (4) that there are no defenses to formation; and (5) that the court can reasonably enforce the order of specific performance.

Unique Contract Subject Matter

Courts will almost always hold that land sales contracts are unique. The question is whether the paintings are also unique.

Here, the paintings are valuable. Indeed, Daniel recently refused to sell them to a museum at a price of $10,000 a piece, and Pam valued them at a total cost of $50,000, or $25,000 a piece. Moreover, demonstrating their uniqueness, Pam commented on the paintings' beauty and the fact that they seemed as if they were designed to fit in the house. Thus, they provide a unique design fit for the home. Accordingly, the paintings are unique.

Damages Are Not Sufficient

Next, Pam would need to show that money damages would not suffice to remedy her injury. Given the uniqueness of the paintings and the fact that these paintings seem specifically well-suited for the design of her home, this element is met.

Conditions for Performance Satisfied

The conditions to require Dan's performance were satisfied. Specifically, the contract was executed and Pam has presumably began making payments towards the agreed- upon price of $450,000.

No Defenses to Formation

Defenses to formation are discussed below, in the answer pertaining to Dan's defenses. For reasons explained below, Dan will not likely succeed on any defenses to formation.

Court Can Reasonably Enforce Order of Specific Performance

The last factor is whether a court could reasonably enforce an order requiring Dan to specifically perform the contract. Factors courts consider are whether the order would require ongoing supervision and whether it is a subject matter that is complex to oversee.

Here, performance would be simple. All that would be required is that Dan give Pam the painting. Accordingly, this requirement is satisfied.

Conclusion - Specific Performance

Because the requirements for specific performance have been met, provided that Pam can show that there are no defenses to contract formation (which is discussed in Part II below), Pam could seek specific performance.

Temporary Restraining Order

Pam found out that Dan is planning to auction off the painting in two weeks. To prevent this from happening, Pam should seek a temporary restraining order ("TRO"). The requirements of a TRO are as follows: (1) the plaintiff must show irreparable harm absent a TRO; (2) the plaintiff must demonstrate a likelihood of success on the merits;

> (2) the plaintiffs must demonstrate that the equities weigh in her favor against the defendant; and (4) the plaintiff must demonstrate that the TRO is in the public's best interest. A plaintiff should seek to notify the defendant that she is seeking a TRO, rather than proceed ex parte. If the plaintiff cannot reasonably contact the defendant first, she must certify to the court that she has made reasonable efforts to contact the defendant or that she would be injured by contacting the defendant.

Irreparable Harm

Here, Pam can show irreparable harm because if Daniel auctions the painting to a bona fide purchaser for value, it is unlikely that Pam will ever be able to obtain the painting. And, as described above, this painting is unique.

Balancing of Equities

Pam can show that the equities weigh in her favor, and not Dan's. Pam signed the contract innocently. Although she should have done her due diligence and read the contract before signing, she signed relying on Dan's representation that the contract conformed to their oral agreement. Dan, on the other hand, caused Pam to be mistaken about a material element of the contract and he took advantage of her mistake. Accordingly, the equities weigh in Pam's favor.

Likelihood of Success on the Merits

The inquiry of whether a plaintiff is likely to succeed on the merits at the TRO stage is lower than at later stages in the litigation, such as whether she should receive a preliminary injunction. Here, Pam will likely succeed on the merits because, for reasons explained above, she can show that Dan caused a unilateral mistake or even fraudulently induced her to sign the contract.

Public's Interest

The public has an interest in contracts being enforced fairly and according to the terms that the parties assented to. The public also has an interest in preventing fraud. Accordingly, Pam can meet this element.

Notice to Defendant

Although, as explained above, it is not always required, Pam should seek to give Dan notice of her application for a TRO so that he can be heard, unless she can show that he might try to get rid of the painting if he is aware of her application for a TRO, which would cause irreparable harm.

Length of TRO

TRO's typically can only last for fourteen days. The auction is 14 days away. Accordingly, Pam should also seek a preliminary injunction.

Preliminary Injunction

Pam should seek a preliminary injunction, which can last for the duration of the litigation. The requirements are similar to that of a TRO. The difference is that Dan must be given notice and an opportunity to be heard. For reasons described above, Pam is likely to obtain a preliminary injunction.

Permanent Injunction

The difference between the requirements for a preliminary injunction and a permanent injunction is that the plaintiff must actually succeed on the merits. Because Pam will likely succeed on her fraud and undue influences, a court should order a permanent injunction against the sale of the painting at an auction.

Damages

If, for some reason, the court finds that the painting is not unique and that damages would suffice, Pam should seek damages.

Restitution

One form of damages P could seek is restitution. Restitution gives back a plaintiff the value she conferred on a defendant. Here, that amount is $25,000, which represents the value of one painting.

Consequential Damages

In lieu of restitution, she can seek consequential damages.

DAN'S DEFENSES

Statute of Frauds

Under the Common law, contracts for the conveyance of real property must be in writing, signed by the party to be charged, and must contain all essential terms of the deal. If this contract were governed by the UCC, the UCC requires that any conveyance of goods for over $500 must also satisfy the Statute of Frauds. Here, the paintings were valued by the parties at $25,000 each. Thus, regardless of the governing law, the contract must satisfy the statute of frauds.

The contract is in writing and signed by the party to be charged, Dan. However, the essential term of the deal at issue here, the conveyance of the coastline painting, is not included. Dan will thus argue that this term does not meet the Statute of Frauds.

Exceptions to Statute of Frauds - Partial Performance

However, there are some exceptions to the Statute of Frauds. One is partial performance. In a sale of real estate, courts usually require two of the following three types of partial performance: (1) payment for the property; (2) possession of the property; and (3) making improvements to the property. Here, the disputed portion of the contract pertains to a painting, not real estate. Pam will argue that by paying the price for the paintings, she has fully performed and thus, the exception to the Statute of Frauds has been met. Moreover, she has moved into the house and has taken possession of one of the paintings. However, she has not yet taken possession of the coastline painting. Thus, this is a close call, and a court might find for Dan if it finds that Pam's performance is not sufficient to trigger this exception to the Statute of Frauds.

Exceptions to the Statute of Frauds - Unique Goods

There is an exception to the Statute of Frauds for unique goods. Here, the paintings were unique and the price paid for the goods supports a reasonable inference that Pam paid for two of the paintings. Moreover, depending on the character of the paintings, it may appear that they were painted as a set that would reasonably be bought and sold together.

However, this exception to the Statute of Frauds typically only applies when the unique goods were manufactured for the buyer. Here, Pam purchased the goods well after the paintings had been created, and this exception is unlikely to apply.

Parol Evidence Rule

Dan might also argue that the parol evidence rule ("PER") bars any external evidence of the terms of the contract. For the PER to ban all external evidence, there must be a fully integrated writing. Where there is a partially integrated writing, courts will consider external evidence that supplements the contract. Here, it is not clear whether there was a "merger clause" stating that the writing was fully integrated or whether the contract contained all of the necessary terms, which might lead a court to conclude that it was fully integrated.

Pam will argue that the contract was only partially integrated and that the conveyance of the coastline painting is only an additional term that merely supplements the contract. Courts usually make this determination with reference to the four corners of the agreement, asking whether the disputed term is one that would naturally be left out of the agreement. It is unlikely that the conveyance of the coastline painting would naturally be left out of the agreement, as it is a material term. Thus, the contract is likely fully integrated. But, to satisfactorily make this determination, we would need to know more about the contents of the written contract.

However, courts will consider evidence that the parties did not actually make a contract because there was no meeting of the minds, or that the contract as written does not conform to the mutual meeting of the minds. Thus, courts will consider evidence of fraud in the inducement of a contract or unilateral mistake because this is a defense to formation, that is, fraud and unilateral mistake are an argument that the contract is not valid as written because where was no meeting of the minds. Accordingly, a court is likely to hear evidence of the agreement that Daniel convey the painting of the coastline.

Laches

The defense of laches applies when a plaintiff who seeks relief in equity has delayed bringing her cause of action in such a substantial fashion that it causes prejudice to the defendant.

Here, Pam learned of the fact that Dan kept the coastline payment six months before she saw Dan's newspaper advertisement. Dan will argue that Pam waited so long that he now has relied on her not pursuing an action and has set up an auction in reliance on that fact.

However, having to cancel an auction is not likely to amount to serious prejudice to Daniel because, if Daniel were to win on the contract claim, he could simply hold an auction later. And while Pam probably should have brought the action sooner, six months is not an unreasonably long time.

Accordingly, Dan's defense of laches will not succeed.

Answer B

GOVERNING LAW

The UCC governs contracts for the sale of goods, while all other contracts are governed by the common law. When a contract is mixed, the law that governs is based on the predominant purpose of the contract. If the predominant purpose of the contract is a sale of property, the common law governs, for example.

Here, the contract between Daniel and Pam included both goods (the paintings) and property (the house). However, it appears that the predominant purpose of the contract was the house, as Pam went to the house with the purpose of buying it and only happened to notice the paintings. Thus, the common law governs this contract.

PAM'S REMEDIES

Pam and Daniel signed a contract which, by its terms, only contained the sale of the house and the artwork of the Golden State wildflowers. Thus, Daniel was bound to deliver possession of those things to Pam. The facts imply that he did so, as Pam was in the house when she discovered the California coastline painting wasn't there.

However, Pam will argue that the contract also included the California coastline painting, even though it was not in the writing. Pam will likely posit two theories as to why the California coastline painting should be included in the contract: mistake and misrepresentation.

Mistake

Contracting parties can obtain remedies on a contract such a rescission or reformation if they show that the contract as written does not embody the full, actual terms of the agreement. To prevail on mistake, a party must be able to show either a mutual mistake or a unilateral mistake. A mutual mistake occurs when both parties were mistaken as to a material fact of the underlying subject matter of the contract, or the parties themselves. In addition, the party suing on mistake must not have assumed the risk of the mistake. Mistakes as to collateral facts will not support reformation or rescission of a contract.

Here, no mutual mistake was made. Daniel was not mistaken as to the contents of the contract, he knew that the contract did not include the California coastline painting. Pam, on the other hand, did not. Thus, this is not a mutual mistake.

Traditionally, a unilateral mistake, even to a material term of the contract, did not allow for relief. However, if the other party knew or should have known of the mistake then a unilateral mistake provides sufficient cause for relief--as long as the mistaken party did not assume the risk of mistake. To be clear, if reformation is sought as a remedy, the non-mistaken party must have known that the other side was mistaken; but for rescission, the non-mistaken party can either have known or should have known of the mistake.

Here, there was a unilateral mistake. Pam believed that the contract included the California coastline painting -- a material mistake as to the subject matter of the contract. But, according to the facts, Daniel knew of the mistake but did nothing to prevent it. Furthermore, nothing in the facts tends to show that Pam assumed the risk of the mistake as that was not bargained for by the parties and she took no other actions showing that she assumed the risk -- her negligence in not reading the contract is not sufficient to show assumption of the risk of mistake (see immediately below).

Additionally, it should be noted most courts will not find that a party's negligence in failing to read a contract will void their argument of unilateral mistake. Thus, the fact that Pam did not read the contract carefully before signing will not affect her argument for mistake.

Given that a sufficient unilateral mistake exists here, one that Daniel knew about, Pam will be entitled to multiple remedies such as reformation, rescission, and specific performance.

Misrepresentation

Contracting parties can also obtain remedies like reformation and rescission where one party made a material misrepresentation to another, such as altering a contract so that it does not contain the same language as was originally agreed upon. Although usually mere nondisclosure of a material fact is not enough to rise to the level of actionable misrepresentation, affirmatively altering a contract and representing it as unaltered is sufficient for actionable misrepresentation.

Here, although the omission of the California coastline painting was originally accidental, Daniel's knowledge of that fact and subsequent representation that nothing had changed in the contract likely rises to the level of an actionable misrepresentation. Daniel's statement that "This is what we agreed to" lends further credence to Pam's argument that the misrepresentation was intentional and more than just a mere omission.

Thus, although not as clear of a case as the "mistake" analysis above, a court would likely find that Pam could also obtain remedies like reformation, rescission, and specific performance on a misrepresentation theory

Preliminary Injunction

Since Daniel is attempting to sell the California coastline painting in two weeks, Pam should attempt to obtain a preliminary injunction against the sale of the painting. Preliminary injunctions are meant to keep the status quo in place while the merits of the case are adjudicated. Pam could request a Temporary Restraining Order (TRO) which has the same requirements as the preliminary injunction but can issue quickly and last for two weeks (in federal court). The TRO can be obtained ex parte if the lawyer for Pam shows that he attempted in good faith to notify Daniel of the TRO or that notice wasn't practicable in this case.

To obtain a preliminary injunction, a plaintiff must show (1) irreparable harm if the injunction isn't issued, and (2) a likelihood of success on the merits. Courts usually require the plaintiff to post a bond to cover costs for the defendant if the preliminary injunction was wrongfully issued. Courts will also often balance the hardships between defendant and plaintiff, weighing the costs of the injunction to the defendant and the public, against the benefits of the injunction to the plaintiff.

Here, Pam will likely be able to show irreparable harm since the piece of art she is seeking to obtain from Daniel is unique. The facts aren't too specific on this point, however the fact that a museum is attempting to buy the two paintings suggests that they in high demand. It is unlikely that just awarding Pam damages will allow her to obtain the painting or a substitute painting, since this painting is an original, as stated in the facts. However, there is a small chance that if Pam was awarded enough damages that she would be able to buy the painting from the person that won it at Daniel's auction. Practically speaking, this is an incredibly small chance as the buyer at the auction is not likely to part with it so soon. On balance, the hardships clearly favor Pam as she will lose the painting if the injunction doesn't issue, while Daniel will only lose the opportunity to sell the painting immediately, as opposed to after the case has been settled.

Pam must also show a likelihood of success on the merits. Here, Pam has a clear argument for mistake and a possible argument for misrepresentation. Either way, she is almost certainly entitled to the painting under the contract. See analysis above. Thus, she is likely to convince a court that she will succeed on the merits in showing that the California coastline painting was part of the original contract.

Thus, if Pam is able to post a bond covering the cost of issuing a mistaken injunction, she will likely prevail in obtaining a preliminary injunction barring Daniel from selling the painting at auction until the merits of the case are resolved.

Reformation

A contracting party can obtain reformation based on mistake if an enforceable contract existed first, but that did not include the entirety of what the parties agreed to because of a mistake in typing up the contract. Usually a contract is reformed in such cases when there is a mutual mistake but can be reformed when there is a unilateral mistake that the non-mistaken party knew about and did nothing to prevent.

Here, the contract between Pam and Daniel was enforceable as written but did not include the entirety of the bargain. Pam's unilateral mistake as to the California coastline painting is sufficient to allow for reformation of the contract to include the painting since the facts show that the California coastline painting was clearly a part of the original agreement between the parties and was only left out by a mistake in transcribing the contract.

Thus, Pam can reasonably obtain reformation of the contract to include the California Coastline painting.

However, once that is included in the contract, she must be able to claim the property itself. She can do this by either specific performance or replevy.

Specific Performance of Reformed Contract

To obtain specific performance, a contracting party must show five factors: certain, valid and definite terms, the plaintiffs contract conditions are fulfilled, inadequacy of legal remedies, feasibility of enforcement, and lack of defenses.

Certain, Valid and Definite Terms

To allow for specific performance the court needs to be able to understand the exact terms of the contract in order to be able to issue orders as to how the contract is to be carried out. Thus, the contract must have terms that are more certain than what it required in a case for damages.

Here, the contract between Pam and Daniel, as reformed, clearly states the amount of consideration, the parties, and the pieces of property at stake, including the California coastline painting. Thus, the court should have no problem in ordering specific performance based on these terms.

Plaintiff's contract conditions fulfilled

A plaintiff must show that she is either ready and willing to perform, has already performed, or is excused from performing.

Here, the facts imply that Pam has already tendered her payment since she is in the house that used to be Daniel's. However, even if she has not tendered performance, she is clearly willing and able to do so based on these facts.

Inadequacy of Legal Remedies

A plaintiff must show that compensatory damages are not enough to remedy her injury.

Here, since the property -- the painting -- is original and apparently unique, as well as being sought after (as shown by the museum's prior bid to Daniel) it is unlikely that compensatory damages will suffice since it is very unlikely that Pam would be able to take her monetary award and purchase the exact same painting on the market.

Feasibility of Enforcement

Although mandatory injunctions, as would be the case here, can present enforcement problems since they are requiring a person to do something, such problems likely won't be present here. Daniel is likely under the personal jurisdiction of a court with contempt power and thus can be forced by the court to transfer the painting to Pam without much effort.

Defenses

Defenses to specific performance include unclean hands, laches, Statute of Frauds, and hardship/sharp practices. None of these equitable defenses really apply here. The contract is in writing and signed by the party to be charged, as required by the Statute of Frauds. Pam has taken no wrong actions towards Daniel with respect to this transaction as to constitute unclean hands. Pam has not unreasonably delayed in bringing a suit so as to prejudice Daniel and give rise to a claim of laches. Finally, sharp practices and hardship usually require an unconscionable contract coupled with inadequate consideration. Neither of those things are present here.

Thus, given that Pam can easily fulfill all five factors for specific performance, a court will likely grant her specific performance of the reformed contract between her and Daniel, forcing Daniel to transfer Pam the California Coastline painting.

DAN'S DEFENSES

Pam's Negligence

Dan will likely raise the defense of negligence on the part of Pam for failing to read the contract. He will argue that Pam should be charged with the knowledge of whatever contracts she signs and therefore, her mistake in thinking that the contract included the California coastline painting is only attributable to her own negligence. Additionally, he will argue that Pam was not forced to sign the contract right then as the train was leaving but could have read it and then returned it to him later, and that she was negligent to not do so.

This defense is unlikely to succeed. As mentioned above, most courts find that for mistakes and misrepresentations entitled to reformation and other remedies, a plaintiff's failure to read the contract does not prevent them from obtaining remedies like reformation.

Parol Evidence Rule

Daniel will also likely assert the parol evidence rule as a defense. The parol evidence rule bars introduction of evidence of prior or contemporaneous oral or written statements that were not included in a fully integrated contract.

Daniel will argue that the written contract was fully integrated since he told Pam that it included what "we agreed to" and both parties signed it. However, firstly, a court would be unlikely to find that this contract was a fully integrated agreement since it was hastily written down and forced on Pam as she was leaving on a train.

More importantly, however, the parol evidence rule does not apply to cases where a mistake in the transcription of the contract allows for reformation.

Here, the mistake of Bill in transcribing the original agreement between Pam and Daniel -- which included the California coastline painting -- was the sole cause of it not being included in the contract. This allowed for reformation and also precluded the parol evidence rule from applying. If the parol evidence rule was allowed to apply in cases like this, no contracts could ever be modified for mistake or misrepresentation since the parol evidence rule would bar the evidence of the original agreement. Thankfully, this is not how the parol evidence rule is applied by the courts.

Therefore, Daniel's defense of the parol evidence rule will fail here.

Daniel's other possible equitable defenses to specific performance were discussed above.

Since Daniel has no viable defenses to reformation or to specific performance, a court will most likely reform the written contract between Pam and Daniel to include the California coastline painting, and force Daniel to perform by transferring the painting to Pam.

ESSAY EXAMINATION INSTRUCTIONS

Your answer should demonstrate your ability to analyze the facts in the question, to tell the difference between material facts and immaterial facts, and to discern the points of law and fact upon which the case turns. Your answer should show that you know and understand the pertinent principles and theories of law, their qualifications and limitations, and their relationships to each other.

Your answer should evidence your ability to apply the law to the given facts and to reason in a logical, lawyer-like manner from the premises you adopt to a sound conclusion. Do not merely show that you remember legal principles. Instead, try to demonstrate your proficiency in using and applying them.

If your answer contains only a statement of your conclusions, you will receive little or no credit. State fully the reasons that support your conclusions, and discuss all points thoroughly.

Your answer should be complete, but you should not volunteer information or discuss legal doctrines that are not pertinent to the solution of the problem.

Unless a question expressly asks you to use California law, you should answer according to legal theories and principles of general application.

Q1 Torts

Paul, an actor, had small but memorable roles in two recent Hollywood blockbusters. Paul was also a first-year law student. He began having difficulty keeping up with his studies and became increasingly anxious about failing. He told his Legal Research and Writing professor, Dan, about his anxiety and doubts about his ability to timely complete a research paper Dan had assigned. Dan noticed that Paul appeared unusually anxious and suggested he go see the school counselor.

Paul returned to the apartment that he shared with Jack, who was also enrolled in Dan's Legal Research and Writing class.

The day before the research paper was due, Jack looked for his paper in his room but could not find it. Later, after Jack returned home from school, he found the paper on his desk where he thought he had originally placed it. After submitting the paper, Jack became suspicious that Paul might have copied parts of Jack's paper on the day that it seemed to be missing. Jack went to Dan's office and told him about his suspicions. Dan pulled from a stack of submitted papers what he thought was Paul's paper. When Jack saw the paper, he recognized the footnotes and said that Paul had "copied all of the footnotes from my paper."

The next day, Dan told Jack and Paul's class that "I hope no other student has copied his footnotes from another student's paper like that two-bit actor Paul." Paul was in class and heard the statement. Deeply humiliated, Paul suffered a severe panic attack, but did not seek medical treatment.

Dan later discovered that he had inadvertently shown Jack his own paper and not Paul's paper and that Paul had not copied Jack's or any other person's materials.

Paul has sued Dan based on his statement to the class.

What claim(s) may Paul reasonably raise against Dan; what defenses may Dan reasonably assert; what damages, if any, may Paul recover; and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

Answer A

Paul's Claims Against Dan, Dan's Possible Defenses, and Paul's Potential Damages for Each Claim

Defamation

Paul (P) may bring a defamation claim against Dan (D). To prevail on a defamation claim, the plaintiff must prove: (1) defamatory statement; (2) concerning the plaintiff; (3) published to a third party. Additionally, if the defamation claim involves a matter of public concern or a public figure, there are two additional elements that the plaintiff must prove in order to not run afoul of the First Amendment. The plaintiff must also prove: (4) the statement is false; and (5) the intent of the defendant, which will vary depending on the type of plaintiff.

Here, D will argue that the two additional elements—falsity and intent—must be proven because P is a public figure. D will point to P's memorable roles in the two recent Hollywood blockbusters. On the other hand, P will argue that he is not a public figure. P will point to the fact that his roles were small. P may also argue that he's going to law school, which shows that his acting career is not taking off, and, thus, he is not a public figure. Other factors may also impact the court's analysis—the media coverage of P generally, whether P is a household name, and other things about the nature of P's status as a celebrity.

There are no facts to indicate that P's cheating was a matter of public concern. It is not that P has cheated to win a Nobel peace prize or nationally recognized marathon, which might constitute a matter of public concern. Whether P qualifies as a public figure is likely a close call, but given that P was in two blockbuster movies, the court will likely find that P is a public figure, which means that P will need to prove the two additional elements to prevail on his defamation claim.

Defamatory Statement

A defamatory statement is a statement that is reasonably likely to harm another's reputation. The statement generally must be one of fact. Statements of opinion may be actionable if they imply facts about the plaintiff.

Here, D said "I hope no other student has copied his footnotes from another student's paper like that two-bit actor Paul." P will argue that D's statement is a factual statement where D indicates that P copied another student's footnotes. P will argue that this statement constitutes a defamatory statement. P will argue that in the legal profession where honesty and integrity are essential, an allegation of plagiarism and cheating are extremely damaging to one's reputation. P may also try to argue that referring to P as a two-bit actor was also defamatory because it is a disparaging comment about P's acting skills, which impacts P's reputation.

In response, D will argue that the two-bit actor comment is his opinion and, thus, cannot be a defamatory statement. D has the stronger argument here and will likely prevail. D will also argue that his statement, which implied that P cheated, was just that—an implication that is not sufficient to give rise to a claim for defamation. However, D's statement implies the assertion of facts that P cheated. P has the stronger argument here and a court is likely to find that the party of D's statement that implies that P cheated constitutes a defamatory statement.

Concerning the plaintiff

A defamatory statement does not need to name the plaintiff specifically, as long as a reasonable person would know that the statement is referring to plaintiff.

Here, D used P's name in the sentence. And, although D did not specifically say P cheated, he said that he hoped no other student copied another student's paper like Paul. D also made this statement during Jack's and P's class, so the students in the class reasonably knew that D was referring to P. Additionally, although D did not use P's last name, D did refer to P as a two-bit actor, making it even more clear who D was referring to. This is sufficient to notify a reasonable person that D was referring to P. Thus, P is likely to succeed on proving this element.

Published to a Third Party

The defamatory statement must also be published to a third party, which means that a third party must hear or read or perceive the statement. There are two types of defamation: libel and slander. Libel is when the defamatory statement is in a permanent format. Traditionally, libel included defamatory statements that were printed, but modernly, statements that are captured on television or the radio are also considered libel. Slander are spoken statements, not captured in a permanent format.

Here, D said the defamatory statement to the class. If P heard the statement, it is reasonable to conclude that other students in the class also heard the statement. Because the statement was not in a permanent format, like in print or on television, it is considered Slander.

Falsity of Statement

When the plaintiff is a public figure or the statement concerns a matter of public concern, then plaintiff also needs to prove falsity of the defamatory statement. As discussed above, P will likely be considered a public figure.

Here, P will argue that the statement was false. P can prove this through a comparison of P and Jack's paper. The facts indicate that D mistakenly showed Jack Jack's own paper, so there are no facts that definitively prove P copied Jack's footnotes.

D may argue that he had a reasonable belief that the statement was true, so that is sufficient to defeat this claim. However, while that may be relevant for the intent element, as discussed below, it is irrelevant to the falsity of the statement. There could also be an argument that although P did not copy Jack's footnotes word for word, he did use ideas from Jack's paper. D could call Jack as a witness to discuss Jack's missing paper on the day in question and D could testify about P's anxiety and doubts about finishing the paper.

However, the issue will likely come down to a comparison between the two papers. Since there are no facts to indicate that P actually copied Jack's footnotes, it is likely that P will prevail on proving that the defamatory statement was false.

D's Intent

If the person is a public figure or the matter is of public concern, the plaintiff will need to prove that the defendant acted with malice, which means that the defendant intentionally made the false defamatory statement or made it with reckless disregard for the truth. If the plaintiff is a private figure and the matter is of public concern, the plaintiff will need to prove that the defendant acted negligently when making the false defamatory statement. Here, as discussed above, since P is a public figure, P will also have to prove that D acted with malice—intentional or reckless disregard for the truth.

P may argue that D's defamatory was intentionally false, but the stronger argument is that P acted with reckless disregard for the truth. P will argue that D was reckless because he did not take the care to show Jack the proper paper. P will also argue that D was reckless for not conducting any further due diligence to determine whether P actually did copy Jack's footnotes. D simply took Jack's word for it, after briefly showing Jack the paper in D's office. Based on this inadequate amount of information, D then accused P in front of the whole class of cheating. P will also try to highlight how reckless D was by highlighting how it would have been very simple for D to confirm that P cheated: D could have simply compared P's paper to Jack's paper. And, because D did not take this simple step, D acted with reckless disregard of the truth when he made the false defamatory statement.

On the other hand, D will argue that he was not reckless, but rather had a good faith belief that P cheated. D will say that Jack's statement was sufficient to cause him to believe that P cheated. D will also point to the fact that he knew P was anxious about the assignment and did not think he would be able to complete, which gives P motivation to cheat. D will also point to the fact that Jack explained his suspicions of why he believed P cheated off of Jack's paper to D, which supported Jack's claim that P copied his footnotes. In sum, D will argue that based on the totality of the circumstances, he reasonably believed that P copied Jack's footnotes, and, thus, the statement was not in reckless disregard of the truth.

P has the stronger argument here given that it would have been so simple for D to determine whether P actually copied Jack's footnotes but D did not do that. Such a failure is a gross deviation from what a reasonable professor would do, and, thus, it is likely the trier of fact would find that D acted with reckless disregard of the truth when making the defamatory statement.

Damages

There are different rules regarding pleading of damages for libel and slander. General damages are presumed for libel. For slander, special damages are presumed where the defamatory statement falls into a slander per se category: (i) about the person's profession or trade; (ii) infers that plaintiff suffers from a loathsome disease; (iii) accuses a woman of being unchaste. Otherwise, if the statement does not fall into the slander per se category, the plaintiff must specifically plead and prove damages.

Here, P will argue that D's statement falls into a slander per se category of being about the person's profession or trade. P will argue that the statement refers to his profession of actor, but since that statement is not considered a defamatory statement, that argument will likely be unsuccessful. P will also argue that the statement about cheating, although not directly about P's ability to be an attorney, is essentially about P's soon-to-be profession.

D, in contrast, will argue that the statement does not fall into the slander per se categories because P is not yet a lawyer so the statement was not about P's profession. And even if P's attending of law school makes lawyering his profession, the statement was not about P's ability to be a lawyer necessarily, but about P's cheating on a paper. This is a close call, but because the statement involves cheating on a law school paper, it seems that would be sufficiently close to pertaining to P's profession to fall into slander per se, and, thus damages will be presumed.

Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress (IIED)

To prevail on an IIED claim, the plaintiff must prove: (1) defendant's outrageous and extreme conduct; (2) caused the plaintiff to experience severe emotional distress.

D's Conduct

Conduct qualifies as extreme and outrageous if a reasonable person would find that it is offensive and it would cause severe emotional distress in the reasonable person. Additionally, if the defendant has reason to know about the plaintiff's particular sensitivities, then the defendant's conduct even if not offensive to a reasonable person may still qualify as extreme and outrageous behavior.

Here, P will argue that D's behavior was extreme and outrageous because falsely accusing someone of cheating would be offensive to the reasonable person and would cause emotional distress for the reasonable person. Additionally, P will argue that even if the reasonable person standard is not met, D's behavior was extreme and outrageous considering P's particular sensitivities which D knew about. P will point to the fact that he told D about his anxiety and doubts about completing the paper and he was having increasing anxiety about failing. The fact that D noticed P appeared unusually anxious and suggested that P go see the school counselor will support P's argument that D knew of his particular sensitivities, thus making D's behavior outrageous even if not outrageous to the reasonable person. P may also try to compare D's behavior to the behavior of a typical professor and argue that D was acting unprofessionally by announcing P's alleged cheating to the class rather than following the formal channels of reporting a student's cheating.

D, in contrast, will argue that his behavior was not outrageous and extreme because it would not cause a severe panic attack in the reasonable person. D will argue that he made the statement to a small class of people, not to a wide audience, so it was not reasonably likely to lead to severe emotional distress. P will argue that telling his classmates is even worse than telling a large group of people who don't know P well because his classmates' opinions are even more important than strangers.

D may also argue that he did not know of P's particularities that would make D's conduct particularly outrageous. D may argue that although P appeared unusually anxious, D assumed that P had heeded his advice and gone to see the school counselor. Based on D's belief that P sought treatment, D will argue he reasonably assumed that P no longer suffered from his anxiety.

This is a close call because it does seem that P's reaction may not be the reaction of a reasonable person. But given that D knew of P's increasing anxiety about failing, it is likely a trier of fact would conclude that D's conduct qualified as extreme and outrageous.

P Suffered Severe Emotional Distress

For an IIED claim, the defendant's conduct must not only cause emotional distress in a reasonable person, but plaintiff must have also experienced emotional distress.

Here, the facts indicate that P suffered a severe panic attack. This will likely be sufficient to qualify as severe emotional distress. Although P did not seek medical treatment, so he does not have medical records to back up his claim, P's testimony, if believed, about his panic attack will be sufficient to satisfy this element. However, since there are no medical records, that leaves P open to D's claims that the severe panic attack did not occur.

D's Conduct Caused P's Severe Emotional Distress

For causation to exist, there must be both actual and proximate causation. Actual cause means that the defendant's conduct was either the but for cause or substantial factor. But for cause means that but for defendant's conduct the injury to plaintiff would not have occurred. Substantial factor occurs when there are multiple contributing factors, so it is impossible to determine the but for cause and the plaintiff's injury and defendant's conduct was a substantial factor in causing the injury. Proximate cause exists when the plaintiff's injury was a reasonably foreseeable result of defendant's conduct.

Here, P will argue that D's defamatory statement was the actual cause and proximate cause of his severe panic attack. P will argue that but for D's false statement about cheating, he would not have been deeply humiliated which triggered his severe panic attack. P will also argue that P's panic attack was a foreseeable result of D's statement. P will make similar arguments about why the panic attack was a foreseeable result of making such an outrageous defamatory statement.

In response, D may try to argue that P was prone to anxiety so D's statement could not have been either the but for cause or the proximate cause of P's severe panic attack. D will point to P's increasing anxiety which P stated and D observed. But, that will not be enough to defeat P's claim. Under the eggshell doctrine, a defendant takes his plaintiff as they come. That P may have been prone to panic attacks will not defeat P's causation element. Thus, it is likely a trier of fact will find that D's statement caused—both actual and proximate—P's severe panic attack given that it occurred close in time to D's statement and D's statement was outrageous. and would either produce a similar result in a reasonable person or D knew or should have known it would produce such a result in P given P's particular sensitivities.

Damages

If P is successful in proving his IIED claim, which is a close call but likely, then P will be able to recover damages from D. In a tort action, the plaintiff may recover compensatory damages, consequential damages and incidental damages. These types of damages must be reasonably certain, caused (both actual and proximate) by defendant's conduct, and unavoidable. A plaintiff has a duty to mitigate damages.

Here, P did not seek medical treatment for his panic attack. Seeking medical treatment is considered a necessary means of mitigating damages that a plaintiff must take if reasonable under the circumstances and would not result in undue burden or humiliation. If D can show that P's damages would have been reduced had P sought medical treatment, then D may successfully be able to reduce P's damages by the amount they would have been reduced had P sought medical treatment.

Negligent Infliction of Emotional Distress (NIED)

To prevail on an NIED claim, the plaintiff must prove that (1) defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous; (2) plaintiff was in the zone of danger; and (3) although plaintiff did not suffer physical harm from defendant's conduct, plaintiff suffered physical harm as a result of emotional distress. (There is also another circumstance in which a plaintiff may bring an NIED claim that involves harm to the plaintiff's family member, but that is not applicable under these facts.)

Here, there is no evidence that P's severe panic attack caused him physical harm so it is unlikely he will be able to bring an NIED claim.

Conclusion

P will bring a defamation and IIED claim against D. D will argue against the specific elements of those claims as discussed in above in defense of P's claims. If P prevails in his claim, P will be able to seek damages subject to the arguments that D can make to decrease the amount of those damages.

Answer B

PAUL'S CLAIMS AGAINST DAN

Defamation

Paul (P) may assert a claim of defamation against Dan (D) based on Dan's statement. Defamation requires that (i) a defamatory statement was made, (ii) of or concerning the plaintiff, (iii) that was published to a third party, and (iv) that harms P's reputation.

(i) Defamatory statement

A statement is defamatory if it would cast the plaintiff in a negative light or to subject him to public ridicule.

Here, D's statement contains two aspects that would likely be defamatory. First, he states that P has copied the footnotes of another classmate, which is a negative imputation on P's character and would likely subject him to public ridicule as a person who cheats. Second, he directly calls P a "two-bit actor", which demeans and belittles P's acting career and talents, and is likely to subject to him to public ridicule as a bad professional actor.

(ii) Of or concerning P

The statement must be of or concerning the plaintiff such that they are identifiable.

Here, this requirement is met because D identifies P by name as the student who has copied another student and as the "two-bit" actor.

(iii) Published to a third party

In order to prevail, the defamatory statement must have been published to a third party.

In this case, Dan openly said the statement in front of his entire class, in which P was present. Even if P was not present, the statement is considered published to a third party because all of P's classmates in D's class would have heard the statement and understood that D intended to communicate that statement to each of them.

(iv) Harm's P's reputation

The statement must be such that it could harm P's reputation. P does not have to show that it actually harmed his reputation, only that the statement could have done so.

Here, D's statement insinuating that Paul copied another student is likely to be very harmful to his reputation. This is so because Paul is a first year law student, and truthfulness and honesty are critical attributes for law students wishing to join the legal profession. By casting him as a cheater, D is directly attacking P's character for honesty and therefore may impact his reputation in the university and among his peers and professors.

Further, D's statement that P is a "two-bit actor" also harms P's professional reputation. Since P has made a living acting in two small, but memorable roles in Hollywood blockbusters, it is reasonable that P would consider his reputation as a professional actor important. By calling him a two-bit actor, Dan also directly attacked P's professional reputation.

Therefore, Paul is likely to establish the elements of defamation in relation to Dan's statement.

Matters of Public Concern

If the statement concerns a matter of public concern, then in order to prevail on a defamation claim, P must further show the relevant standard of fault of the publisher. A matter of public concern is one that the public or community would at large be reasonably expected to have an interest in learning about.

Here, D's statement may be of public concern because of P's standing as a Hollywood actor. He may be on the way to achieving celebrity. Therefore, the public may have an interest in how P carries himself and P's character as an honest person.

Assuming the matter is one of public concern, the standard that D will be held to as the publisher of the statement depends on whether P should be considered a public or private figure.

Public vs Private Figure

If the plaintiff is a public figure, the statement must have been made with malice. Malice requires an intention to publish a false statement, or reckless disregard for whether the statement was true or false. A person is considered a public figure if they are generally known to the public or performing a public function. If the plaintiff is a private figure, the standard is negligence such that the defendant is not guilty of defamation if the defendant reasonably believed that the statement was true.

Arguably, P is a public figure because of his status as a movie star in Hollywood blockbusters. Since he had memorable roles, he would likely be known to the public. If so, D's statement must have been made with malice. P might argue that D acted recklessly by failing to properly check whether Jack's paper was actually his. However, D could have the stronger argument if he reasonably believed that Paula's paper was the one he pulled from the stack of voluminous papers. For example, if he had hundreds of papers and Jack and P had very similar student numbers/surnames, it may be reasonable for D to have misidentified the papers.

On the other hand, P may be a private figure because the circumstances of the statement related to his performance as a law student, not a big Hollywood actor. The events occurred at university while P was attending school privately. Thus, P may also argue that P was a private figure and D acted negligently and unreasonably by making that statement without checking all the facts. However, since D knew that P was feeling anxious about failing, and since another student Jack had alerted D to his suspicions, a court may find it reasonable for D to form the opinion that P was at risk of cheating. However, since D had inadvertently shown the wrong paper to Jack, P would have a stronger argument as a private figure and D's negligence. This is likely to be a stronger claim for P, since the standard for D to meet is lower.

DAN'S DEFENSES

Truth

Truth is a complete defense to defamation.

Here, D's statement was not true because P in fact had not copied Jack's or any other person's materials. Further, there is nothing to show that P was a poor actor, so D's statement as to Paul being a "two-bit" actor is also unlikely to qualify for the truth defense unless D can put on additional evidence to show this.

Consent

Consent by the P is a defense to defamation.

Here, P did not give D any consent, express or implied, to say the things that D said. Therefore, this is inapplicable.

Qualified Privilege

A qualified privilege exists if the publisher had a legitimate interest that it was furthering, or if he made the statement as part of a genuine public comment. This privilege usually applies to newspaper or broadcasters who have an interest in pursuing the truth.

Here, D may argue qualified privilege on the basis that he made the statement under a legitimate interest to discourage other students from cheating. However, this is not a particularly strong defense because it was not necessary to attack Paul in order do so.

DAMAGES RECOVERABLE FROM DAN

Slander

Slander is defamation via spoken word. Generally, special damages need to be proven by the P in order to prevail on a slander claim. Special damages require a showing of pecuniary damage.

Here, P has not suffered any pecuniary damage. He did not seek medical treatment so did (should he be added before did?) not incur any medical expenses. There is also nothing to show that he lost any income from acting based on the statement.

Slander per se

Slander per se are categories of slander where damages are presumed. This includes where a defamatory statement was spoken about P's business or profession.

Here, P may seek damages based on slander per se because D's statement defamed P's profession as an actor.

COMPENSATORY DAMAGES

Compensatory damages are awarded for personal injury or property damages, and aim to place the plaintiff in a position as if the tort had not occurred. These damages will be limited by foreseeability, causation, unavoidability and certainty.

P will likely obtain compensatory damages caused by D's defamatory statement by application of slander per se (see above).

NOMINAL DAMAGES

Nominal damages are awarded when there is no quantifiable specific loss or injury suffered, so it is awarded to the plaintiff as nominal. P would likely seek nominal damages because of his personal injury suffered by the panic attack.

PUNITIVE DAMAGES

P may also seek punitive damages if D's statement is found to be willfully malicious and wanton. A court may likely find that disparaging P's reputation as an actor was willful and wanton, since it was completely unjustified.

CAUSE OF ACTION: INVASION OF PRIVACY

False Light

P may argue that D breached P's privacy by intentionally casting a statement to put P under a false light and misattributing a characteristic of dishonesty to him. False light requires that the act be highly offensive to a reasonable person. The same standard of fault of publisher applies as in defamation (malice vs negligence) where the matter is of public concern.

Here, P would argue that, as a private person, D attributed a false character to him by saying he was a cheater and a bad actor. As a private person, D acted unreasonably and negligently when making the statement. Therefore, applying the standard of fault of a private person, D has breached P's privacy by acting negligently and unreasonably.

CAUSE OF ACTION: INTENTIONAL INFLICTION OF EMOTIONAL DISTRESS

Intentional IED

P may claim D caused intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) when he made the statement. IIED occurs when the defendant has made an extreme or outrageous conduct that causes severe emotional distress to the plaintiff. No physical injury is required for P to succeed in a claim for damages. The intention element is met if the defendant acted intentionally (with substantial certainty) that emotional distress would be caused, or if he acted with reckless disregard.

Here, P suffered a severe panic attack when hearing about D's statement. P would argue that D acted intentionally because D knew that P was in the room when he made that statement. He also knew that P had anxiety already about performing poorly on the paper. At the very least, P would argue that D acted recklessly because he should have double checked which paper he showed Jack before making such an allegation against P. The fact that P didn't seek medical treatment would not prevent him recovering damages against D.

Negligent IED

P may also argue that D negligently inflicted emotional distress. Negligent infliction occurs where D has negligently made a statement, which causes severe emotional distress. However, in most jurisdictions, the emotional distress must be accompanied or caused by some physical impact or injury.

Here, P suffered a panic attack directly as a result of D's statement. He did not appear to suffer any physical impact or injury, as proven by the fact that he did not seek medical advice. Therefore, this is unlikely to be established by P.

Conclusion

P is most likely to succeed on a claim for defamation by D. He may also bring claims of invasion of privacy (false light) or intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress. Since P suffered no pecuniary damages, he may be able to seek compensatory damages based on slander per se. Given the nature of D's allegations, P may also be able to convince a court to award punitive damages.

Q2 Professional Responsibility

Linda is a lawyer with experience in representing small businesses, both for-profit and nonprofit. Nonprofit, Inc. (Nonprofit) is a newly formed California nonprofit corporation with few assets and limited income. Nonprofit is governed by a volunteer board of three directors, one of whom holds the position of board chair. Nonprofit's only employee is Ellen, who has no official title.

Ellen contacted Linda and said that Nonprofit would like to retain Linda to help it develop a formal employment agreement with Ellen, to make Ellen officially the Executive Director of Nonprofit. Ellen's position as Executive Director would be as an officer of the company, but not as a board member. Linda agreed to accept the matter. Linda did not memorialize her retainer agreement in writing.

Ellen drafted an employment agreement that included a proposed salary and sent the agreement to Linda. Ellen told Linda that her proposed salary was data-driven from a survey of similar positions, but based in the for-profit field. Ellen asked Linda not to tell the Board about the source of the survey data. Linda saw many other provisions in the draft agreement that were more favorable to Ellen than those in a typical employment agreement. Linda arranged a meeting with the Nonprofit board to discuss the terms of Ellen's employment agreement. The board chair asked Linda to invite Ellen to attend the board meeting and join their discussions.

1. With whom did Linda establish an attorney-client relationship and what ethical violations, if any, did Linda commit at the time the attorney-client relationship was created? Discuss.

2. What are Linda's ethical obligations with regard to:

    a. Ellen's employment agreement? Discuss.

    b. Ellen's request for confidentiality regarding the source of the survey data? Discuss.

Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

Answer A

1. In order to have an effective attorney-client relationship, particularly when dealing with business associations, identification of the client is critical. The fact pattern is unclear as to the identity of the client. The potential clients are (1) Ellenindividually, (2) Nonprofit, Inc., and (3) both.

Based on the facts presented, it is likely that Linda was representing Nonprofit only. Ellen said "Nonprofit would like to retain Linda to help it develop a formal employment agreement with Ellen." At the same time, Linda has experience representing "small businesses," and it does not indicate that she has experience representing employees individually in negotiations with such businesses.

Importantly, a lawyer representing a corporation does not represent that corporation's employees, including senior officers and even if there is only one employee. The corporation is a distinct legal entity entitled to independent and zealous counsel. Therefore, on the facts presented, Nonprofit is probably the only client at the inception of the attorney-client relationship.

It does not matter that Ellen was the company's only employee, because there is no merger in such a situation—not even when the sole employee is also the sole shareholder. Here, it was a nonprofit, and therefore it is all the more clear that the attorney-client relationship was with Nonprofit only.

A very important (but missing) fact is Linda's fee. The client can often (but not always) be identified based on who is paying the fee. There is no reference to any fee arrangement. It thus appears that Linda is doing this work pro bono. The ABA does not require written fee agreements. If Linda was receiving a fee and more than $1000, she might have violated the California rule requiring such agreements to be in writing if not for the fact that Nonprofit is a corporation, because that is an exception to the rule on written fee agreements (other, inapplicable exceptions include when the client in writing says it does not want a written fee agreement or there is a prior relationship and an exigent circumstance arises requiring prompt action by the lawyer to protect the client's interests). If Ellen paid the fee personally, however, that would materially alter the analysis and suggest either (1) an unethical dual representation of parties with an actual conflict without a waiver (which would have had to be obtained from members of the Nonprofit board since Ellen couldn't authorize that herself due to her own conflict), and also it would have required the fee agreement in writing as to Linda if over $1,000, or (2) improper payment of legal expenses by a third party, without taking adequate precautions to ensure independent representation and preservation of confidentiality.

Despite the fact that the representation is for the company and, the absence of a written retainer agreement clearly identifying the client and the scope of representation is problematic. Indeed, it is clear that Ellen is receiving personal legal advice from Linda. Ellen also asked Linda to advance her personal interests and withhold information from the board. Although this happened after the initial attorney-client relationship was formed, it could arguably have created a reasonable expectation by Ellen that Linda was her personal lawyer, too. To the extent that this rose to the level of creating an attorney-client relationship with Ellen individually, as noted above, that would be unethical. It is an improper dual representation of clients with actually conflicting interests in the absence of an effective disclosure and consent. The ABA rules apply a reasonable lawyer standard that prohibits representing actually conflicting clients unless the lawyer reasonably believes that it will not materially impair their ability to perform the required legal services competently and diligently. That conflict waiver must be confirmed in writing by both clients affected by the joint representation, after receiving complete disclosure of the risks from the lawyer. In California, there is no reasonable lawyer standard; the rule applies to both potential and actual conflicts; in case of conflicts between clients (as here), the disclosure must be in writing as well as the clients' consent to it; and in case of personal and professional conflicts, the disclosure must be in writing. Here, no such waiver occurred. Again, Ellen could not have authorized it herself on behalf of the corporation, even though she was the only employee, because she was conflicted. Consent to the dual representation could only have come from the board (since it's a nonprofit, there are no shareholders to potentially consent instead).

Moreover, Linda should have advised Ellen to retain independent counsel (though Ellen was free not to do so if she chose). From the fact that Ellen drafted an employment agreement, it is unclear whether Ellen herself was a lawyer but it certainly suggests that she did not believe she needed a lawyer of her own. Still, especially in this situation, Linda should have told Ellen this suggestion.

In conclusion, on the facts presented (though some important ones are missing), the client was Nonprofit only and Linda did not clearly violate any ethical rules at the point when the relationship was created. Based on Linda's subsequent discussions with Ellen, however, it seems clear that Ellen did not understand the scope of Linda's duties and may have believed Linda to be her personal attorney, and therefore under the circumstances, Linda should have disclosed the scope of representation more clearly and ideally had a written retainer agreement making that clear to Ellen.

2.a. With respect to the employment agreement, Linda was obligated to zealously and competently represent Nonprofit's interests.

The fact that Ellen drafted the employment agreement is not necessarily unethical in and of itself. A lawyer is entitled to rely on their employees and independent contractors to perform services subject to their supervision. A lawyer can also allow a client (or in this case, the employee of a client) to prepare documents so long as the lawyer exercises diligent and competent review and independent legal judgment in rendering advice. Here, because Ellen was on the other side of the transaction, it was essentially her opening offer to Nonprofit.

Upon receiving the draft from Ellen, Linda was required to review the document carefully and to attempt to revise and negotiate the terms to benefit Nonprofit. Because it was drafted by a nonlawyer (presumably), Linda was also required to review the draft to ensure compliance with all applicable laws. (The most significant issue presented in these facts is the salary, based on the source of the info, and that is discussed in part b.)

When Linda recognized that the terms were unusually favorable to Ellen, she should have pushed back on those provisions and attempted to at least get them to conform to what is standard in the typical employment agreement.

At the minimum, if Linda did not seek to negotiate or revise the draft herself, Linda was right to call for a board meeting because she is obligated to tell the board about the provisions that she has recognized as too favorable to Ellen. A lawyer has the duty to communicate with the client, and where, as here, the only employee is in an adverse position, the board represents the interests of the corporation.

As a lawyer, Linda is not obligated to make business decisions for her client. The decision about the terms and how much ultimately to pay to Ellen is one for the board, not Linda.

Linda is also required to inform that board that it cannot have a privileged conversation with her about the employment agreement if Ellen is present. Accordingly, Linda should probably recommend that the board chair retract his invitation to Ellen, or at the very least ensure at the outset of the meeting that they all understand that there will be no privilege between them.

2.b. The duty to communicate includes the duty of candor and honesty to the client. Here, Linda could not honor Ellen's request for confidentiality because Nonprofit is her client, not Ellen. Linda is obligated to ensure that Nonprofit has all material facts relevant to the contract when deciding whether to agree to Ellen's requested salary.

Even if this were a dual representation situation, where Linda represented both Ellen and Nonprofit, she would have a duty to disclose this fact to Nonprofit's board because the fact is material to the representation. It is one of the reasons why disclosures in such situations are so critical, because it puts the duty to protect confidentiality in tension with the duty to communicate, and in a joint representation, that means disclosing all facts material to the representation.

Linda should have told Ellen that she could not honor her request.

Linda would not have to tell the board that Ellen violated her duty of loyalty to Nonprofit, however, because the duty of loyalty is not implicated when negotiating employment agreements. That said, Linda should tell the Board that Ellen asked her to keep the information secret, as that is important for the board to know when making the decision about whether to expand Ellen's current untitled role.

Answer B

1. With whom did Linda establish an attorney-client relationship, and what ethical violations did Linda commit at the time the Attorney-client relationship was created

Attorney Client Relationship

Organizational Client

When a lawyer is hired to represent a corporation or organization, the lawyer's fiduciary duties are to the organization and not to the individual members, directors, or officers. A lawyer has a duty to act on the best interests of the organization and can, therefore, not engage in conduct which would benefit any individual or group of individuals at the expense of the organization.

Here, Linda was contacted by Ellen, who said that Nonprofit would like to hire her. Linda was further told that this was for the purpose of creating a formal employment agreement with Ellen, to make her the Executive Director of the Nonprofit. Therefore, Linda was hired by Nonprofit and as such, owed fiduciary duties to Nonprofit and not to Ellen.

Linda's Ethical Violations

Fee Agreement

Under ABA, a lawyer who agrees to represent a client must not put the agreement in writing, unless it is for contingency fees. However, California Rules of Professional Conduct, mandate that lawyers must put the agreement in writing if it is over $1000. However, when the client is an organization, or a repeat client (or if there is an emergency) a lawyer does not have to write up the agreement.

Here, since Linda is representing Nonprofit, which is an organization, Linda did not violate the ABA or CA rules by failing to put the retainer agreement in writing for the purpose of the fees.

Duty of Loyalty

A lawyer owes her client a duty of loyalty, which includes the duty to avoid a conflict of interest. A conflict can arise where the lawyer knows that her client's interest will be materially adverse to that of the lawyer's own interest, or another client. When such a conflict arises, a Lawyer might still be allowed to represent the clients so long as there is no claim by one client against the other, such representation is not prohibited by law, and the lawyer's lawyer gets the informed written consent of both clients. California also allows a lawyer who has a potential conflict of interest to continue to represent the clients so long as there is informed written consent.

Here, Linda is not officially representing Ellen. However, the fact that Ellen is the one who reached out to Linda, and the fact that the representation was for the purposes of drafting up an employment agreement between Nonprofit and Ellen, suggests that Linda was at least informally also representing Ellen. This would create a concurrent conflict of interest. As such, Linda should have sought the informed written consent of the board of Nonprofit, before she agreed to represent t Nonprofit in the manner Ellen asked. There are no facts to suggest that Linda did this and therefore, she was likely in violation of her duty of loyalty to Nonprofit.

Duty of Diligence

Under both ABA and CA, a lawyer has to promptly, adequately and zealously represent her client.

Here, Linda failed to adequately represent her client, Nonprofit, when she failed to inform Nonprofit of the potential conflict of interest that could arise. Given the fact that Linda had experience in representing businesses, both nonprofit as well as for profit, further gives rise to the fact that she should have sought t the written consent of Nonprofit before agreeing to representing them in the matter regarding Ellen's employment agreement.

At this point, Linda should have informed both Ellen, as well as the Board of Nonprofit, that this might give rise to some conflict of interest issues as she was retained by Ellen, but to work on Nonprofit's behalf in forming a formal agreement with Ellen.

2.a. Linda's ethical obligations with regard to the Employment agreement

Duty to Report (loyalty)

When a lawyer represents an organization, and learns of conduct made by an individual in the corporation which materially harms the organization in terms of financial harm or even reputation harm, the lawyer has a duty to report up. Under ABA, the lawyer has to first report the individual's conduct up to a higher authority in the company, such as the board of directors. If the board does not do anything to remedy the harm, the lawyer has to report to a relevant authority outside of the corporation. CA rules differ slightly. Under CRPC a lawyer has the duty to first report up the chain to the board of directors ,for example. If the board fails to act, the lawyer may not report out but rather should seek withdrawal.

Here, the employment agreement which Ellen prepared would clearly cause financial harm to the nonprofit because it would pay Ellen based on the appropriate payment for a for-profit company. Linda's client, will therefore be forced to pay more than they should for Ellen's job. Linda should immediately report this to the board of directors. Although Linda did set a meeting with the board to discuss Ellen's financial compensation. she should refuse to allow Ellen to attend so that she could discuss the fact that the employment agreement contained a number of provisions that were more favorable to Ellen than those in typical employment agreements.

Duty to Communicate

Under both ABA and CA rules, a lawyer has a duty to communicate important material matters regarding the representation to her client.

Here, Linda has a duty to tell the board about the fact that Ellen drafted up the employment agreement herself. Furthermore Linda must tell the board that there are provisions in the agreements that are more favorable to Ellen than usual. These are all things that are material to Linda's representation because she is representing Nonprofit for the purpose of drafting up the employment agreement.

Linda's failure to promptly notify the board as to these matters will surely result in her committing an ethical violation.

Duty of Competence/ Diligence

(See rules above)

Under ABA, a lawyer must be competent, in terms of skill, knowledge and experience to represent her client. Under California rules, a lawyer may not intentionally, recklessly represent a client. California punishes repeated acts of incompetence in representing clients.

Here, although Linda seems to have plenty of experience representing businesses, she seems to have failed to.

(See rule above)

In addition to the rule above, a lawyer owes her client the absolute duty to act in the clients' best interest. A lawyer may not benefit herself or anyone else at the expense of her client

Here, Linda is allowing Ellen to draft up the agreement. She should not allow Ellen to do this as this would constitute a violation of her duty of competence and diligence because 3

2.b. Ellen's request for confidentiality regarding the source of thesurvey data

Duty to Report (loyalty)

When a lawyer represents an organization, and learns of conduct made by an individual in the corporation which materially harms the organization in terms of financial harm or even reputation harm, the lawyer has a duty to report up. Under ABA, the lawyer has to first report the individuals' conduct up to a higher authority in the company, such as the board of directors. If the board does not do anything to remedy the harm, the lawyer has to report to a relevant authority outside of the corporation. CA rules differ slightly. Under CRPC, a lawyer has the duty to first report up the chain, to the board of directors for example. If the board fails to act, the lawyer may not report out but rather should seek withdrawal.

Here, Linda should certainly not keep the source of the date confidential from her own client. As discussed above, she is representing the Nonprofit and, as such, owes it her duties of loyalty. Linda should immediately report the source of the data to the board. If, for some reason, the board decided not do anything with the information, then under ABA, Linda would have to report this to a relevant agency, such as the Secretary of the State in this case. Although the nonprofit might not have shareholders, it is a 501c3 corporation which is in essence not paying taxes precisely because of its nonprofit nature. Ellen, is seeking to have the nonprofit pay her the salary that she would have earned had it been a for profit. This would potentially be a violation of the nonprofit's tax obligations and could devastate the nonprofit if was caught doing it (not to mention the harm it causes on the taxpayers as a whole). Therefore, Under ABA authorities, Linda should have reported this first to the board, and if it failed to act,. to the Secretary of State. Under CA authorities, however, Linda would not be allowed to go the extra step of reporting outside of the organization if the board fails to act. She should then seek to withdraw from representing the nonprofit.

Duty to Communicate/Duty of Diligence

Under both ABA and CA rules, a lawyer has a duty to communicate important material matters regarding the representation to her client.

Here, again, Linda should communicate the source of Ellen's survey data to the board. Failing to do so will result in her being in violation of her duty to communicate as well as loyalty and diligence.

Q3 Contracts

Barn Exports hired Sam, an up-and-coming artist whose work was recently covered in Modern Buildings Magazine, to paint a one-of-a-kind artistic design along the border of the ceiling in its newly renovated lobby. After discussing the work, Ed, the president of Barn, and Sam signed a mutually drafted handwritten contract, which states in its entirety:

> Sam shall paint a unique design along the entire ceiling border of all public areas of the first-floor lobby. Barn shall pay $75,000 upon completion of the work.

When Sam began work, he was surprised that the new plaster ceiling in the lobby had not been sanded and sealed. Sam complained, but was told by Ed that preparation was part of his responsibilities. Although Sam disagreed, he spent four days sanding and sealing the ceiling. When Sam finished painting, he submitted a bill for $78,000, having added $3,000 for labor and supplies used in preparing the ceiling. In response, Barn sent a letter to Sam stating that, because he had not painted the borders in the two public restrooms in the lobby, no payment was yet due. Barn's letter also stated that it had recently spoken to several artists who perform similar work and learned that "surface preparation" was typically the responsibility of the artist.

According to Sam, before the contract was signed, he told Ed that the restrooms could not be included because his paints were not suitable for the high humidity in those locations.

Sam sued Barn for breach of contract in the amount of $78,000.

Barn countersued for specific performance to have the borders in the bathrooms painted.

1. Is Sam likely to prevail in his breach of contract lawsuit against Barn and if so, what damages will he likely recover? Discuss.

2. Is Barn likely to prevail in its lawsuit seeking specific performance against Sam? Discuss.

Answer A

I. Applicable Law

Contracts for the sale of tangible goods are governed by Article II of the Uniform Commercial Code. All other contracts, such as those for services or real property, are governed by the common law. Here, the contract between Barn and Sam (S) is to "paint a one-of-a-kind artistic design," Hence, this is a services contract. Accordingly, it will be governed by the common law.

II. Sam's Breach of Contract Claim

Valid Contract

In order to bring a successful breach of contract claim, there must first be a showing of a valid contract. To form a valid contract, there must be an offer, acceptance, and consideration. Additionally, there must be no grounds for a valid defense to formation.

(1) Mutual Assent

Parties to a contract must manifest mutual assent to be parties to the contract. This is typically shown through offer and acceptance. Here, there are no facts regarding a traditional offer and acceptance between Barn (through its president, Ed) and S. Instead, after discussing the terms, the parties entered into a "mutually drafted" handwritten contract that states "Sam shall paint a unique design along the entire ceiling border of all public areas of the first-floor lobby. Barn shall pay $75,000 upon completion of the work." This is likely enough to show mutual assent between the parties and, thus, this element is satisfied.

(2) Consideration

Consideration is necessary for there to be a valid contract. Typically, a showing of consideration is done by facts evidencing the parties have obtained a legal benefit or detriment through the contract. Some states, however, only look to legal detriment. In either regime, the consideration requirement is satisfied here: Barn's legal detriment is having to pay $75,000 when the work is completed; meanwhile, S's detriment is having to do the work.

(3) Mutual Mistake

A mutual mistake occurs when both parties have a belief not in accord with the facts as to a material fact underlying the contract which causes a material change in performance of the contract and for which neither party held the risk of mistake. Here, Barn may argue that S cannot recover because there was a mutual mistake as to what "all public areas" meant in their contract. Barn claims it includes the public restrooms, while S claims it does not. Because this outlines S's only obligations under the contract, this would have a material effect on performance. As such, under Barn's theory, no valid contract was formed.

This argument is likely to fail, however. There was no indication that parties had different understandings as to facts that exist out in the world. Instead, there is a dispute as to the obligations required under the contract. There is still a basis for a court to find the terms of the contract and can afford the parties the performance they anticipated under their original agreement.

Hence, because there is an agreement, consideration, and likely no valid defense to formation, S can show that a valid contract was formed.

Performance Due

Next, S will need to show establish the performance due under the contract so that a court may determine whether a breach has occurred. Barn's performance due under the contract is simple. It must pay S upon completion of the artwork. S's performance due, however, is less certain. There are two main disputes: whether S was obligated to perform surface preparation and whether S was obligated to paint the bathrooms.

(2) Surface Preparation

(A) Plain Meaning

Generally, when a court examines what is required under the contract, it looks to the plain meaning of the words therein. Traditionally, a court could not examine any extrinsic evidence to give meaning to those terms unless they were ambiguous. Here, the contract indicates simply that S "shall paint a unique design." On its' face there is nothing ambiguous about this statement. Barn will argue that the ambiguity arises when you consider that "several artists who perform similar work" stated that "'surface preparation' was typically the responsibility of the artist." The court will need to decide whether it really believes that the words as found in the contract are uncertain enough to consider this extrinsic evidence of trade usage. On balance, a court could find that the word "paint" could contain multiple obligations and so extrinsic evidence is required. Thus, a court could consider this trade usage in determining the scope of S's obligations. Because there is no evidence of course of performance or course of dealings between S and Barn, this would be the most dispositive evidence as to S's obligations.

(B) Modification

Under the common law, a good faith modification requires consideration to be valid. Here, Barn may argue that even if "paint" is not deemed to include surface preparation, the parties modified the contract after it was formed. Here, the modification would have placed an additional burden on S's performance and, thus, to be valid requires an additional burden on Barn. However, there is no indication that Barn took on that additional performance. Although S did submit a bill which included $3,000.00, Barn is claiming that it need only pay the originally agreed $75,000. Hence, there was likely no consideration for this modification to be valid.

On balance, however, because "paint" is likely to be found sufficiently ambiguous, S's obligations included the surface preparation.

(3) The Bathrooms

(A) Parol Evidence

See above rule. Here, the parties argue that "all public areas of the first-floor lobby" include the two public restrooms. However, S states that "before the contract was signed, he told Ed that the restrooms could not be included because his paints were not suitable for the high humidity in those locations."

Under the parol evidence rule, when there is a written contract, the parties may generally not present evidence of prior or contemporaneous agreements made before the writing. If the writing is meant to be a the full and final expression of the parties' agreement, then no extrinsic evidence is permitted absent a finding that the term would have been "naturally omitted." The contract is said to be a complete integration. If, instead, the writing is simply part of the full agreement, then only extrinsic evidence that does not contradict the written terms may be admitted. Such a writing is said to be a partial integration.

Here, the parties' agreement is likely to be a partial integration. Firstly, there is no merger clause, which indicates that the agreement is the final and complete expression of the parties' contract. Although the existence or lack of a merger clause is not the sole factor in this analysis, it is a substantial one. Additionally, the brevity and lack of formality of the agreement (being handwritten) also support that this is merely a partial integration.

If the court finds a partial integration, then it must ask whether S's conversation with Ed before the contract was signed contradicts the written terms of the contract and should be excluded. Barn may argue that it does because the contract covers "all public areas" of the lobby, of which the bathrooms would be included. On the other hand, S will argue that the term does not contradict but merely delineates the meaning of "all public areas." S may also argue that "all public areas of the first-floor lobby" generally mean just the lobby area itself and not any rooms or hallways attached to it. Weighing the two, a court is likely to side with S and find that the term does not conflict with the contract.

Accordingly, S's performance likely did not include the bathrooms.

Breach

When a party fails to perform as contemplated by the contract there has been a breach. However, a breach does not necessarily excuse the other party's obligation to perform. When there has been substantial performance, i.e., the nonbreaching party has received the substantial benefit of its bargain, the nonbreaching party must still perform its obligations under the contract. Only when there has not been substantial performance, will the obligations of the nonbreaching party be suspended.

(1) S's Obligations

As noted above, S's obligations likely included the surface preparation but not the bathrooms. Because of this he has not breached his duties under the contract. However, even if he was required to paint the bathrooms, he has likely substantially performed. According to Barn's letter, S has painted everything in the lobby except "two public restrooms." This is likely to be a very small part of the overall size of the lobby and so Barn is likely to have received the substantial benefit of the bargain. Thus, under either interpretation, S has substantially performed.

(2) Barn's Obligations

Based on the constructive condition of exchange, once one party's obligations under a contract become due or are excused, the other party's obligations also become due (or must be excused). Here, because S likely completed his obligations under the contract, Barn's obligation to pay was incurred. Because he refused to do so, he breached the contract.

Damages

(1) Expectation Damages

Expectation damages are the default damages in contract. They are meant to place the nonbreaching party in the same position it would be in had the breaching party performed. Here, if Barn had performed under the contract, it would have owed S $75,000.00. S's injury here—the lack of payment—is caused solely due to Barn's breach. Thus, S is entitled to $75,000 in expectation damages under the contract.

(2) Consequential Damages

Consequential damages are those that arise as a result of the breach that are foreseeable to the parties (either expressly or when the parties contemplated the contract), caused by the breach, and reasonably certain. Here, S is not claiming anything that could be considered consequential damages; so he will not recover for these.

(3) Incidental Damages

Incidental damages are those damages that flow from the breach. This includes damagesfor expenses incurred to inspect goods, ship back nonconforming goods, or to warehouse nonconforming goods. Here, S is not claiming anything that could be considered incidental damages, so he will not recover those.

(4) Restitution

If the court finds that the surface preparation was not originally part of the contract, then S may be able to recover damages related to that under a unjust enrichment theory. Restitution is available when a plaintiff confers a benefit to the defendant, without gratuitous intent, and it would be unjust to allow the defendant to keep that benefit without compensation. Here, if S did not have to prepare the surface of the lobby under the contract, then Barn benefited in not having to find another worker to do that for it. There is no indication that S intended to do this gratuitously, particularly because S charged Barn $3,000 for the labor and supplies used.

Restitution can be calculated either by the value of the benefit conferred on the defendant or the cost to the plaintiff in conferring that benefit. Here, there are no facts as to how much it would have cost Barn to hire someone else to do the surface preparation. Yet, we do know that Sam submitted a bill of $3,000 for labor and supply. Assuming this is a reasonable estimate of the labor involved with the surface preparation, S will likely be able to recover this amount.

(5) Duty to Mitigate

When a plaintiff suffers a breach, they have a duty to mitigate their damages. Here, there was no indication that S could mitigate his damages so this does not apply.

(6) Saved Costs

If the court does find that the bathrooms were part of the deal, then the court should offset S's damages award for any costs he saved by not painting the bathrooms as well.

(7) Conclusion

In total, S will likely be entitled to $75,000 in compensatory damages under the contract. If the court finds that he did not need to do the surface preparation, then he will also be entitled to $3,000 for restitution. Finally, S's compensatory damages should be reduced by any costs saved in not painting the bathrooms if the court finds that he was obligated to do so.

II. Barn's Claim for Specific Performance

To obtain specific performance, a claimant must show (1) a valid contract, (2) the contracts terms are certain, (3) there are no conditions precedent, (4) inadequacy of the legal remedy, (5) practicality of legal enforcement, and (6) the lack of equitable defenses.

Valid Contract

As analyzed above, there is likely a valid contract between S and Barn. Thus this element is satisfied.

Certainty of Terms

Although there is some ambiguity as to what "paint" and "all public areas" mean in the contract, the ambiguities are not so great as to make it impossible for the court to discover what performance was due under the contract, as analyzed above. Hence, this element is likely satisfied as well.

Condition Precedent

Here, Barn will need to show that it is willing and ready to pay the $75,000 required under the contract for S's performance. There is no indication in the facts that it is not able to do so; thus there are likely no outstanding conditions for performance.

Inadequacy of Legal Remedy

Specific performance is typically a rare remedy in contract. For most contracts, damages will be sufficient. S may argue that there is no inadequacy of legal remedy because Barn could simply obtain damages for the left over performance and hire another artists to do it. Barn will counter that it hired S because he is "an up-and coming artist" and he was hired to paint a "one-of-a-kind artistic design." These factors weigh in favor of Barn's argument.

That being said, Barn will still likely fail in its quest for specific performance because courts are loathe to award such relief in services contracts. Such a remedy would likely amount to indentured servitude in violation of the Thirteenth Amendment. Thus, even though S is an up and coming artist, Barn will likely be unable to require him to perform.

Practicality of Enforcement

Generally, practicality of enforcement in services contracts is another issue. The court does not want to be in charge of determining if performance is adequate. In this case, however, that is not likely to be an issue because the court can just match the work done on the lobby to that done in the bathrooms. Thus, this element will likely be met.

Defenses

(1) Laches

Laches occurs when the defendant unreasonably delays bringing suit and that delay prejudices the plaintiff. Here, there is no indication that Barn delayed in its request. It filed the countersuit as soon as S sued it for nonperformance, so this will not apply.

(2) Unclean Hands

Unclean hands occurs when the plaintiff has engaged in immoral or otherwise inappropriate behavior in relation to the contract. That again is not present here. S may argue that Barn's failure to perform constitutes "unclean hands" but generally more is required, such as intentionally making performance more difficult. Thus, that is not an element here.

Conclusion

Although most elements are found, because this is a service contract, Barn will not be successful in its countersuit.

Answer B

Governing Law

Common law generally governs contacts. The Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) however, governs contracts for the sale of goods, and has special rules for merchants. Goods are movable, tangible objects and merchants are those who deal regularly in the goods of the kind or hold themselves out as having special knowledge or skill regarding the goods.

Here, the contract (K) is a service K that requires Sam, an artist, to paint designs on Barn Exports' ceilings. As a service K, common law will govern.

Sam v Barn Exports

Formation

A K is a legally enforceable agreement between two or more parties. There must be a valid showing of offer, acceptance, and consideration for a K to be valid. Here, the facts state they entered into a mutually drafted handwritten K. The issue revolves not around whether a K was formed, but rather its exact terms and the respective parties' performance.

Breach of Contract

A breach of contract occurs when one fails to perform their obligation under the K. A breach can be material or minor. A minor breach is one where a party has substantially performed and the nonbreaching party gained a substantial benefit of the bargain, but the breaching party did not fully perform every obligation under the K. A minor breach does not dismiss the nonbreaching party from performing, but the nonbreaching party may recover damages caused by the minor breach, including cost to finish the performance. A material breach occurs where a party to a K does not substantially perform, and the nonbreaching party does not substantially gain the benefit of the bargain. A material breach dismisses the nonbreaching party from performing and the nonbreaching party can sue for damages, and specific performance in some instances.

Here, according to the written K, Sam was supposed to paint a unique design along the entire ceiling border of all public areas of the first-floor lobby. Barn shall pay $75k upon completion of the work. Sam finished the work, but Barn refused to pay, claiming Sam did not paint the border in two public restrooms in the lobby, so payment was not due. Barn's payment of $75k was conditional on Sam performing his end of the K, and whether Barn is excused from performing depends on whether Sam's alleged breach was a breach, and if so, if it was material or minor. Whether Sam breached the K depends on if the bathrooms were part of the K or not.

Parol Evidence

The parol evidence rule makes evidence of oral or written communications between K parties, made prior or contemporaneous to the written K, inadmissible if they contradict the K and the K was meant to be a complete integration of the K. Typically, to show a complete integration, the parties to the K will include a merger clause or specifically state in the K that the K is meant to encompass the entirety of their agreement.

Exceptions to the Parol Evidence rule include prior or contemporaneous statements that clarify terms of the K or show that conditions precedent exist. Statements made after the written K are also admissible.

Here, the written K does not include any mention of Sam painting the public restrooms in the lobby. Rather, it states that he will paint a unique design along the entire ceiling of all public areas of the first-floor lobby. Sam tries to introduce evidence that, before the K was signed, he told Ed the president of Barn, that the restrooms could not be included because his paints were not suitable for the high humidity in those locations. Because evidence of that conversation between Sam and Ed is offered to clarify or explain what is meant by "all public areas of the first-floor lobby" it may be admissible despite parol evidence.

Vague/Ambiguous Terms

Courts typically construe terms in the K in their plain and simple meaning. When there are multiple ways to construe a certain term, then the courts will look first to the prior history between the contracting parties, if any, to define how they treated the meaning of those vague and ambiguous terms in the past. If there is no contractual history between them, the courts will look to custom and usage in the industry to determine what was meant by the terms in questions.

Here, there are two parts of the agreement that are in dispute between the parties—whether or not the restrooms were included in the "all public areas of the first-floor lobby" and whether or not surface preparation is the responsibility of the artist or an extra that increases the Kprice.

Meaning of "all public areas of the first-floor lobby"

As mentioned above, Barn claims that the two public restrooms on the first floor were part of the public areas of the first-floor lobby, and Sam's failure to paint them constituted a breach of K. Strictly construed, there is some ambiguity or question regarding whether all public areas of the first floor lobby include bathrooms. Are bathrooms part of the lobby? Sam will argue they are not, and further, the conversation between he and Ed evidenced that the bathrooms were not intended to be part of the K. There is no prior history between Sam and Barn, so the courts cannot look to how they construed the meaning in the past. If Barn can introduce evidence showing that it is custom in the industry for all public areas of the lobby to include bathrooms connected to the lobby, he has a good argument that the bathrooms were part of the painting agreement.

Who has the responsibility of surface preparation?

Another issue with the terms/nonexistence of terms of the K include whether the added cost of surface preparation—$3k—was part of the contract or an unforeseen extra that Sam should be reimbursed for. In Barn's letter to Sam after they refused to pay on the K, they claimed that they had recently spoken to several artists who perform similar work and learned that surface preparation was typically the responsibility of the artist. As discussed above, there is no history between Sam and Barn to reference to see how they handled surface preparation in the past—this is the first time Sam has worked for Barn. As such, evidence of how the situation is traditionally and customarily handled in the industry will probably govern. The courts will look to the validity of Barn's claim that other artists shoulder the responsibility of surface preparation, and unless Sam has evidence to the contrary, he will likely not be reimbursed for the $3k he spent preparing the surface. It will come from the money he makes on the K.

Substantial Performance/Minor Breach

As discussed above, a minor breach does not excuse the nonbreaching party from performance. If Sam fails in his assertion that the bathrooms were not part of the K, and the court determines they were, then his breach is likely a minor one. He completed painting the rest of the ceiling of the lobby, conferring a substantial benefit of the bargain on Barn. The two bathrooms are likely small in comparison to the rest of the lobby that was painted, and not everyone who enters the building is guaranteed to go into the bathrooms. Everyone who enters will, however, enter the lobby and see the one-of-a-kind artistic design along the border of the ceiling of the newly renovated lobby. Sam has a good argument that failure to paint the bathrooms is minor compared to the work done in the lobby and Barn is not excused from performance—they owe him for the work he did in the lobby.

Barn's Breach

A party must perform their obligations under a K, and failure to do so is a breach. Here, as discussed above, the bathrooms likely were not part of the K, which would render Sam's performance complete. As such, Barn breaches by failing to pay the $75k K price.

If however, the restrooms were included, Sam breached by not painting them, but his breach was minor and Barn is not excused from performance. Barn will still be required to pay for the work done, minus the cost of having the bathroom painting completed by someone else.

Sam's Expectation Damages

Expectation damages are money damages awarded to the nonbreaching party that would put the nonbreaching party in the position they expected to be in had the breach. Here, if the bathrooms are not part of the agreement, then Sam is entitled to the full $75k from Barn. He will likely not get an additional $3k he spent on surface prep because evidence shows custom in the industry is for the artists to shoulder responsibility for surface prep.

Conclusion

Sam should be allowed to introduce evidence of his conversation with Ed prior to the K, where he told Ed the bathrooms were not part of the K. As such, his painting of the lobby is full performance and he is entitled to $75k, the K price, from Barn. He will likely not get an additional $3k.

If the courts conclude the bathrooms were part of the agreements, Barn still received the substantial benefit of the bargain and, to avoid unjust enrichment, the court should award Sam the fair market value of the work rendered.

Barn v Sam

Specific Performance

Specific Performance is an equitable remedy available to a nonbreaching party that would order the breaching party to perform on the K. Specific performance is only appropriate where there is an inadequacy of legal remedies, the nonbreaching party complied with any conditions to performance they were required to and were ready to perform, and enforcement of specific performance is feasible. Specific performance is only available on contracts for the sale of land, or for the sale of goods that are rare or unique. Specific performance is never an available remedy on a services contract.

Here, we have a services contract, so specific performance is not a remedy available to Barn. The courts will not force Sam to finish painting, even though his skills may be rare or unique. Barn will argue that he cannot find another up-and-coming artist whose work was recently covered in Modern Buildings Magazine to paint a one-of-a-kind artistic design along the border of the ceiling in the bathrooms in the lobby, but Barn's argument will be in vain. Again, courts will not specifically enforce a services K, nor should Barn want a begrudging Sam to complete the work, as there is a high likelihood he would not do his best work if forced to work against his will.

Q4 Evidence

Des is on trial in a California superior court for possession with intent to distribute hundreds of pounds of cocaine from January through October in 2019.

At trial the prosecution called Carol, a severed co-defendant, who had pleaded guilty to reduced charges in exchange for testifying against Des. Carol testified that through 2019, she had acted as a "distributor" for a ring of cocaine dealers. In that role, Carol had sold hundreds of pounds of cocaine to many people, including Des, during the period of the charged crime. Carol further testified that all her customers agreed to sell cocaine. The prosecutor asked Carol to identify a notebook, which Carol testified was hers, and which she used to keep track of income and expenses related to the cocaine sales as each occurred. Carol testified that on pages 1–2 of the notebook were notations of sales of cocaine from January through April of 2019 by Carol to various people other than Des. She further testified that on pages 3–4 were notations of sales from May through October in 2019 to various people, including Des. The court admitted pages 1–4 into evidence.

On cross-examination, Des's attorney asked Carol if the prosecutor, Pete, had offered her a reduced sentence in exchange for her testimony. Carol answered, "No." Des's attorney then called Carol's attorney, Abe, to the stand and asked him the same question. Pete asserted attorney-client privilege. The court denied the assertion of privilege, and Abe testified that the reduction of charges against Carol had been in exchange for Carol agreeing to testify against Des.

Des took the stand and denied the charge. On cross-examination, Pete asked Des if it was true that eleven years earlier he had been convicted of forgery, a felony. Des answered, "Yes."

1. Assuming all credible objections were timely made, did the court properly admit:

    a. Pages 1–4 of the notes? Discuss.

    b. Evidence of Des's conviction for forgery? Discuss.

2. Did the court properly deny the assertion of attorney-client privilege? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

Answer A

To be admissible, all evidence must first be relevant. Evidence is relevant if it has any tendency to make a fact of consequence, which is in dispute, more or less likely.

Furthermore, the court has discretion to exclude evidence under CEC 352 if the unfair prejudice, confusion, or waste of time it would create, substantially outweighs its probative value.

In California, Prop 8 amended the California Constitution and makes all relevant evidence admissible in criminal cases. Prop 8 did not change, however, the rules of evidence relating to: (1) the U.S. Constitution; (2) hearsay; (3) character evidence; (4) the secondary evidence rule; and (5) CEC 352.

(1(a))

Relevance

The threshold question is whether this evidence is relevant. These pages are relevant because they show that Carol has knowledge of the ring of cocaine dealers, Des was involved in this ring and purchased cocaine from her. It also shows that Carol's oral testimony is more likely to be true, because it supports it.

Authentication

Nontestimonial evidence must be authenticated. Authentication requires the evidence's proponent to adduce sufficient evidence for the trier of fact to conclude that the nontestimonial evidence is what it purports to be.

These pages are nontestimonial evidence and thus, for them to be admitted, they have to be authenticated.

Here, Carol testified that the notebook the prosecutor showed her was her notebook and that it was the notebook she used to keep track of her cocaine business. This is sufficient evidence for the trier of fact to conclude that this notebook is, in fact, Carol's record of her cocaine sales and, thus, it has been properly authenticated.

Hearsay

Hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered for the truth of the matter asserted. Hearsay is inadmissible unless a hearsay exception applies. It does not matter whether a person is currently testifying at trial; what matters is whether the statement was made in or out of court. Thus if a witness seeks to testify about something she said earlier, out-of-court, for the purposes of proving the truth of that statement, it is hearsay.

Here, Carol's notations of sales in pp 1—4 of the notebook are hearsay. They are out-of-court statements: Carol wrote them in the book out-of-court and now the prosecutor is seeking to introduce them in-court. Moreover, the prosecution is introducing them to show that Carol sold the amount of cocaine to the people as she described in the notations. Thus, they are being offered for the truth of the matter asserted.

These statements, therefore, must fall within a hearsay exception to be admissible.

Statement of a Co-Conspirator

Des is accused of possessing cocaine with the intent to distribute from January through October 2019. In pp 1—2 of Carol's notebook, she notes sales to people other than Des from January through April 2019. In pp 3—4 of the other notebook, she makes notes of sales from May to October 2019, including to Des.

Statements made by a co-conspirator in furtherance of the conspiracy, offered against the opposing party, are exceptions to hearsay. The proponent of the hearsay must show by a preponderance of the evidence that there was a conspiracy between the hearsay declarant and the opposing party and that the statements offered were made in furtherance of that conspiracy. The hearsay itself can be used to show the conspiracy. (A conspiracy is an agreement between at least two people to commit a crime and at least one overt act in furtherance of that intent.)

Here, the notations in Carol's notebook are in furtherance of the conspiracy between her and the ring of cocaine dealers, including Des, to distribute drugs. She did not make these statements when she was cooperating with the police, but rather beforehand when she was working to further the conspiracy's goal of cocaine distribution.

The prosecution will be able to show sufficient evidence to establish that between May and October 2019, Des and Carol were co-conspirators. Carol's testimony about the ring of cocaine dealers, Des's involvement in the scheme, and everyone's agreement to sell cocaine, as well as the notes on pp 3—4 show that the two of them were part of a conspiracy to distribute cocaine. Thus, the notes on pp 3—4 fall within this co-conspirator exception to hearsay.

It is a closer call whether the notes on pp 1—2, which cover the time period from January to April 2019, fall within this exception. They do not mention Des and so cannot be used to showa conspiracy standing alone. However, Carol testified that she sold cocaine to many people including Des "during the period of the charged crime," i.e. starting in January 2019. This testimony may suffice to show a conspiracy existed between Des and Carol beginning in January, 2019. On the other hand, Des can argue that the fact Carol did not record any sale of drugs to him until May shows that they were not co-conspirators until that time (if at all), and thus this is a not a statement made by a co-conspirator falling within an exception to hearsay. Absent other evidence showing that Des entered into a conspiracy with Carol prior to April 2019, or Carol's explicit testimony about when she sold cocaine to Des or when he agreed to sell cocaine, the statements in pp 1—2 were not made in furtherance of the conspiracy between Carol and Des and therefore are inadmissible hearsay.

Business Records

These notes may also fall within another hearsay exception: business records.

Business records are excepted from the prohibition against hearsay. A business record is: (1) a record of facts, events, and/or activities of the business; (2) regularly recorded as part of the business's ordinary course; (3) by an employee with personal knowledge, or by an employee who learned of the information by an employee who had a duty to report this information; (4) is certified the business; and (5) there are no indications of untrustworthiness.

Arguably, Carol recorded the notations in her notebook as part of her business: selling cocaine. She did so based on personal knowledge and as a regular part of her business activities.

This exception will probably not work, however, because there is no indication the notebook was certified as accurate and there are indications of untrustworthiness: it is a record of an illegal enterprise and thus there is a strong incentive not to accurately record everything incriminating.

***

In sum, pp 3—4 are not hearsay because they fall within an exception but pp 1—2 most likely are inadmissible hearsay not falling within an exception.

CEC 352

Finally, the court must decide if the unfair prejudice, confusion, or waste of time caused by this evidence substantially outweighs its probative value.

With respect to pp 3—4, this evidence is highly probative of Des's involvement in this ring of cocaine dealers and therefore intent to distribute, and thus the prejudice arising out of it is not even unfairly prejudicial, let alone substantially outweighed by unfair prejudice. All evidence is prejudicial to some degree, but just because evidence shows that a defendant is more likely to have committed the charged crime does not make it unfairly prejudicial.

If pp 1—2 do fall within the co-conspirator exception, they should probably have been excluded as unfairly prejudicial. They are about sales to people other than Des and thus they may cause the jury to believe unfairly that this evidence shows that Des distributed more cocaine that he bought from Carol than he actually did. Furthermore, it may cause confusion about the conduct of these other dealers, who are not even defendants in this case, and Des's case.

Thus, the court correctly admitted pp 3—4 of the notes, but erred in admitting pp 1—2.

(1(b))

Relevance

Des's conviction was for forgery. Forgery is a crime of moral turpitude because it is a crime reflecting on the dishonesty of the defendant. Here, Des is being charged with intent to distribute cocaine. He has also testified in his own defense.

Thus, this evidence is relevant for two purposes. First, it shows that he is a convicted criminal and it thus has a tendency to show that he may have been more likely to have convicted another crime. Second, this evidence is relevant because it tends to show that Des is untruthful and, because he is testifying, his truthfulness is relevant.

This first potential relevance is impermissible, as discussed below. But the threshold question of whether this evidence is relevant is satisfied.

Character Evidence

Character evidence is evidence of a person's character that is being used to show that the defendant acted in conformity with this character in the present case. If the conviction forgery is admitted for the purposes of showing that Des committed this crime because he acted in conformity with his "criminal tendencies," then it is character evidence.

In a criminal case, a prosecutor generally cannot introduce evidence of a defendant's character unless the defendant opens the door. California recognizes several exceptions: (1) in a sexual assault/child molestation case; (2) in a domestic violence case; (3) in an elder abuse case; and (4) where the defendant has put on evidence of the victim's violent character, the prosecution can put on evidence of the defendant's violent character.

Here, Des has not opened the door to character evidence because he has not testified that he has any particular character trait, let alone one for being law-abiding. Furthermore, none of the exceptions apply.

Thus, this evidence is not admissible for the purposes of showing that, because Des was previously convicted of forgery, it is more likely he committed this crime.

Impeachment Evidence

The second purpose for which this evidence may be admitted, however, is to show that Des is a liar.

If someone testifies, then the opposing party can impeach the witness's testimony and show there is a reason for the jury not to trust his testimony.

Impeachment by conviction is permissible under certain circumstances. First, a party may introduce evidence of a prior felony conviction for a crime of moral turpitude. Additionally, under Prop 8, the prosecutor may also introduce evidence of a prior misdemeanor conviction for a crime of moral turpitude in a criminal case. Unlike under the Federal Rules of Evidence, California does not impose a specific time limit for determining remoteness.

Here, Des testified and thus exposed himself to impeachment. The prosecutor then was able to introduce evidence of Des's prior felony conviction for forgery, which is a crime of moral turpitude, by asking Des whether he had committed the crime. (The prosecutor could have introduced extrinsic evidence instead of asking Des, but did not have to). This was proper impeachment evidence.

In addition, this was also proper impeachment via evidence of a prior bad act. In a criminal case, a prosecutor can ask a defendant if he previously committed a prior bad act in the past, that reflected the defendant's moral turpitude, if the prosecutor has a good faith basis for doing so. Prop 8 also allows the prosecutor to admit extrinsic evidence of this prior bad act. Here, Des's conviction for forgery is evidence of his prior bad act that reflects his moral turpitude, and thus was improper impeachment evidence under this rule as well.

CEC 352

Thus, this evidence was admissible to impeach Des and show that he was not a credible witness. The final gatekeeping question for the court was whether the unfair prejudice of this evidence substantially outweighed its probative value.

The age of the conviction—eleven years—weighs against admission because it is remote. However, it is quite probative of Des's credibility and he is denying the charge on the stand.

Thus, on balance, the unfair prejudice does not substantially outweigh its probative value and the court properly admitted the evidence.

Attorney-client privilege protects confidential discussions between a client and her attorney for the purposes of providing the client legal advice. If the privilege applies, absent waiver by the client, the attorney cannot reveal communications protected by this privilege. There are some exceptions to the privilege: (1) the client was using the attorney's services as part of criminal or fraudulent activity; (2) the client was in a joint representation with another client and the two clients are now suing each other over the subject matter of the joint representation; (3) the client and attorney are involved in a malpractice suit against one another about the representation; and (4) the attorney reasonably believes that the client is going to commit a criminal act resulting in death or serious bodily injury and the attorney could not talk the client out of it and told the client that she would reveal this privileged communication.

Here, Des's attorney asked Carol if the prosecutor had offered her a reduced sentence in exchange for her testimony. Carol said no (which was a lie).

Abe, Carol's attorney, was required to testify about the reduction of charges and the court denied his assertion of attorney-client privilege. This reduction was offered by Pete the prosecutor. Pete's offer to reduce the proposed sentence in exchange for her testimony and Carol's acceptance of the deal would not be covered by the attorney-client privilege.

First, Pete is not Abe's client or an agent of Carol, so his statement does not fall within the privilege. Second, Carol's response was presumably communicated to Pete because the deal was reached. Thus her acceptance was not confidential or for seeking the provision of legal services. Thus, her acceptance of Pete's offer is not protected by the privilege either. In sum, the attorney-client privilege does not protect the fact that Carol and Pete entered into an agreement.

Carol's discussions with Abe in confidence about whether to accept this deal would fall within this privilege, but Abe was not required to testify about this. The question was whether Pete had offered Carol a reduced sentence and not about Carol and Abe's confidential discussions.

Thus, the court did not err in denying the assertion of attorney-client privilege.

Answer B

1. Admission of Evidence

Relevance. As a starting point, all relevant evidence is admissible in a criminal trial, subject to certain exclusions and privileges. Relevant evidence is that which has a tendency to make any fact at issue in the case more or less likely to be true.

Authentication. For documentary evidence, in order to be admissible the party offering the evidence must make a showing that the document is authentic—that it is in fact what it purports to be.

Here, Carol's notes were properly authenticated by the prosecutor before they were offered into evidence. It appears the prosecutor showed Carol the notebook and inquired whether she recognized it; Carol testified that she did, and that it was her own notebook, thus establishing Carol's basis of knowledge for authenticating the notebook.

Prop 8. In criminal trials in California state court, the law known as Prop 8 acts as a victim's bill of rights, and provides that all relevant evidence shall be admitted, subject to certain restrictions and exclusions, including hearsay rules, constitutional principles, evidentiary exclusions in place before 1982, and any exclusions adopted after 1982 that were ratified by a 2/3 vote of the legislature. Absent an applicable exclusion under Prop 8, evidence that is relevant will be admitted.

a. Pages 1—4 of Carol's Notes

Relevance. Pages 1—2 of Carol's notes are arguably not relevant to Des, because, as we are told, they reflect records of cocaine sales by Carol to various people other than Des. The sales do fit the time period with which Des is charged, however, including January through April of 2019. And the standard of relevance is fairly low. Does the fact that Carol sold drugs to many other people in a pattern that likely fits the later period, in which her records do reflect sales to Des, make any aspect of her narrative more probable? A jury could logically infer that laying a foundation of Carol's earlier sales makes it more likely that the pattern continued into the period in which she has records that include Des. By the same token, Des could well argue that because Carol's notes do not reflect any sales to him during this period, that there were none. (This strategy likely wouldn't do much good for Des, as it would tacitly acknowledge the potential credibility of the later sales records.) On balance, these records likely have some minimal relevance, although their probative value is not particularly strong, and will be subject to balancing under Section 352, as discussed below.

Pages 3—4 of the notebook are more clearly relevant to Des's alleged criminal conduct. They purport to reflect cocaine sales by Carol to him within the charged timeframe, and the sales from Carol to Des would show his possession of the cocaine. Carol's testimony further provided that those to whom she sold possessed the cocaine with intent to sell it themselves. Thus, pages 3—4 of the records would be highly relevant evidence, and would be important to corroborate the testimony of the cooperating witness, Carol.

Hearsay. The notebook, however, remains subject to a hearsay objection. Hearsay is an out of court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Here, the statements made in the notebook by the declarant, Carol, are offered as proof of what they purport to show—that Carol made cocaine sales in certain amounts and on certain dates to the defendant, Des. Thus, the statements are hearsay, and unless an exception applies, they will be excluded. As noted, the hearsay rules are an exception to Prop 8 and still apply.

Two primary hearsay exceptions are potentially applicable here. First, the statements may be deemed statements of a co-conspirator made during and in furtherance of a conspiracy. It bears mention that Des is not charged with the crime of conspiracy. That is no impediment to use of the evidentiary hearsay exception, however, so long as an adequate factual predicate for the exception is supplied. Here, Carol's testimony appears to have done so. She does not explicitly testify to an express agreement between the various retail drug dealers to whom she sold cocaine as a wholesaler. Therefore one could argue that no such agreement existed. More likely, however, a court could logically infer an implied conspiracy among the entire group, in which Carol acts as the hub of the conspiracy and the various retail dealers are the spokes. Courts have long acknowledged this type of hub and spoke conspiracy can exist, even when the individual spokes do not know each other directly and have their explicit understanding individually with the central hub, here Carol.

Were the statements during and in furtherance of the conspiracy? It appears that they were. Carol made the records to aid her in operating and keeping track of the business, and for the efficiency and effectiveness of the overall operation. Therefore they were likely "in furtherance" of the conspiracy's aims. And they reflect the time period for which Des is charged, and appear to have been contemporaneously made at the time of the events. For these reasons, if relevant, the pages are likely admissible as co-conspirator statements. As noted, the claim of relevance is stronger for pages 3—4, although the low standard of relevance may be met for pages 1—2 as well.

The pages could also potentially be admitted as records of regularly conducted business activity. This exception applies when records are made in the ordinary course of business, by one with personal knowledge, at our about the time of the recorded activity, and maintained by the business for a business purpose. Here, although Carol's business is unlawful, the requirements appear to be met here for the drug ledger, and therefore the records could properly be admitted as business records.

The records are likely not subject to exclusion under the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment. The records are not testimonial—they were not offered to law enforcement to assist them or in their effort to solve the crime—and hence they are not subject to exclusion and do not violate Des's right to confrontation.

The evidence is still subject to the overall balancing test that evidence can be excluded when the danger for unfair prejudice substantially outweighs its probative value. Here, the relevance of pages 1—2 is slight, and potentially it's prejudicial to Des in that it paints Des as being part of a large drug organization. But not unfairly so. On balance, the evidence is likely still admissible as more probative than prejudicial.

Because the evidence is admissible, Prop 8 would not need to be reviewed here.

b. Des's Prior Forgery Conviction

Under the CEC, Des's prior conviction for forgery was likely properly admitted. Forgery is likely considered a crime of dishonesty or moral turpitude. Des has placed his credibility at issue by testifying in the case, and therefore his credibility is something jury will need to assess. Admission of a prior conviction in this way, when the prior conviction is for a crime of moral turpitude in California, will likely be admitted, subject to balancing its probative value against its danger of unfair prejudice.

Under the FRE, a question would arise as to whether the conviction is too old to be admitted, given that it is more than ten years old. The time period would run from Des's release from any prison term he served. However, there is no similar time limitation under the CEC. The purpose of the federal rule, however, does point to a potential issue that the probative value of a prior conviction is slight after so much time has passed. Thus, a court could potentially decide to exclude the prior conviction if it found that the danger that the jury would give undue weight to the prior conviction—in effect, branding Des as a convicted criminal and not paying careful enough attention to the more direct evidence at hand. Indeed, the evidence is relevant for the limited purpose of Des's truthfulness, and not his propensity to engage in criminal conduct generally. The danger of the propensity inference would provide a sound basis for excluding the conviction here. Any such ruling, however, would likely be reviewed for abuse of discretion, and this is a close enough call that the judge likely did not abuse her discretion in admitting the evidence.

The balancing test discussed above is one of the recognized exceptions to Prop 8, so that would not become an issue in this circumstance either.

2. Attorney-Client Privilege

The attorney-client privilege is owned by the client, and protects from disclosure confidential communications between an attorney and a client made for the purpose of seeking or providing legal advice, and that are kept confidential (i.e., not disclosed to third parties).

Here, although Abe and his client Carol have likely had many privileged conversations, the communications between Carol and the prosecutor, or between Carol, Abe and the prosecutor, are not privileged, because the presence of the third party (the prosecutor) destroys the confidential nature of the communications.

Here, even if the conversation were privileged, the "crime/fraud" exception" may well apply. It appears that Carol has given testimony that is false, and that the attorney would know is false, by stating that the prosecutor did not offer her a reduced sentence in exchange for testifying against Des. It is possible, however, that as a result of privileged conversations with Carol, the attorney believes that Carol misunderstood this state of affairs, but under all the circumstances here that seems unlikely.

The duty of attorney-client confidentiality duty is broader than the attorney-client privilege. It is possible that if Abe had raised his professional duty of confidentiality to his client as an objection, and refused to testify on that basis, that the court would have viewed the matter differently. In California, Abe would not have been permitted to reveal client confidences unless the matter presented an imminent danger of serious bodily harm or death, circumstances not present here. But again, the conversations with the prosecutor are not privileged, and for the same reason not confidential—they took place with a third party present, and therefore it was likely Abe's obligation to testify truthfully to them after he had made the best valid objections he could. It does still raise the advocate-witness problem—by putting Abe in the position of being a witness and a lawyer in the same case—and unfortunately puts Abe in the difficult position of having to truthfully answer a question that will potentially be damaging to his client. For all these reasons, Abe should seek to withdraw from the representation, although he should do so in the way that is likely to be the least damaging to Carol'sinterests.

Q5 Business Associations

Andrew, Bob, and Christine are attorneys who formed a law firm. They filed no documents with the Secretary of State or any other state office. They equally share the firm's profits after paying all expenses and make all business and management decisions. Associate attorneys are paid a fixed salary, plus 25% of gross billings for any clients they bring to the firm. Senior attorneys are paid based upon the number of hours they bill plus an annual bonus if they bill more than 2,000 hours in a year. The senior attorney bonus pool is equal to 5% of firm profits, which is split equally by the number of qualifying senior attorneys each year. Andrew, Bob, and Christine agreed to bestow the title "nonequity partner" on senior attorneys even though senior attorneys have no management authority. The firm website and business cards for senior attorneys list their title as "partner."

Martha, a senior attorney, met Nancy at a social function. Nancy told Martha about her business's legal problems. Martha gave Nancy her business card. After looking at the card, Nancy asked Martha if as a "partner" she can agree to the firm handling her legal problems at a reduced hourly rate in return for a promise of future business. Martha was aware that the firm has a strict policy of not reducing hourly rates, but signed a written agreement for it to handle Nancy's legal matters at a reduced hourly rate.

1. What type of business entity is the firm using to conduct business? Discuss.

2. Are the associate attorneys employees, partners, members, or shareholders of the firm? Discuss.

3. Are the senior attorneys employees, partners, members, or shareholders of the firm? Discuss.

4. Is the firm bound by the agreement that Martha signed with Nancy? Discuss.

Answer A

(1) TYPE OF BUSINESS ENTITY

GENERAL PARTNERSHIP

A general partnership (GP) is formed when two or more persons associate to carry on a business for profit as co-owners. There are no formalities required to form a GP. The subjective intent of the parties to form a GP is also irrelevant. You don't even need a written or formal agreement. General partners are each personally and jointly and severally liable for the debts of a GP, whether arising in tort or contract. There is no limited liability for the partners of a GP.

A presumption arises that there is a GP and that the persons are partners when such persons share profits, unless those profits are shared due to being rent or repayment of a debt rather than true profit sharing. Other factors that may evidence a partnership (but these factors do NOT create a presumption) include the sharing of gross revenues, the sharing of losses, whether the persons call themselves "partners" and call their business a "partnership" and the extent of the business activities (greater extent of business activities suggests a partnership). Partners have no right to compensation (meaning wages/salary) absent an agreement to the contrary. Partners have equal rights to manage the business of the partnership and control its affairs.

Here, A B and C formed a law firm, so there is the intent to carry on a business for profit. They didn't file documents with the state, but that is not required for a GP. They share profits after paying expenses, which creates a presumption of a partnership and that they are partners. They also make all business and management decisions which evidences that they are running a business as co-owners. It is likely the firm is a GP.

CORPORATION

A corporation is formed when articles of association are filed with the Secretary of State. The articles need to have the name of the corporation, the names and addresses of the incorporators and registered agent, the authorized stock of the company and associated rights, and the purpose of the corporation which can be any lawful purpose. A de jure corporation comes into existence only when the secretary accepts the articles. There can also be a de facto corporation if the state has an incorporation statute, the persons make a good faith colorable attempt to comply with the formalities for forming a corporation (but fail to do so), and such persons assert the privileges of a corporation.

Here, there was no filing of articles with the state, so there is no corporation. Also, no de facto corporation because no good faith effort to file.

LIMITED PARNTERSHIP OR LIMITED LIABILITY PARNTERSHIP

In a limited partnership, there are general partners and limited partners. The limited partners have limited liability, meaning they are only liable to make their capital contributions. A limited partnership is formed when a certificate of limited partnership is filed with the state, executed (signed) by the general partners and stating the name of the limited partnership, which must have L.P. or LP or "limited partnership" in the name. An LP comes into existence when that public document is filed or on the deferred date for existence to take place, if any.

A limited liability partnership requires filing of a certificate of qualification executed by at least 2 partners, and must have "LLP" or "limited liability partnership" in the name. An LLP comes into existence when that public document is filed or on the deferred date for existence to take place, if any. All partners in the LLP have limited liability.

Here, there was no filing with the state so the firm is not a LLP or LP.

LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANY

An LLC is a hybrid organization. Its owners (members) have limited liability like a corporation. However, LLCs get the pass-through tax treatment that partnerships get. On the other hand, corporations are subject to double-taxation (taxed once at the corporation level and then again when distributions are made to shareholders). To form a limited liability company, a certificate of formation must be filed with the state. Here, there was no filing with the state so the firm is not an LLC.

CONCLUSION: The firm is a GP.

(2) ASSOCIATE ATTORNEYS

See rules above as to when persons are considered partners. Here, the associate attorneys are paid a fixed salary, they do not share profits, so no presumption of being partners. They are not given the label or title of partners nor is there any indication they participate in management or control of the business, which would have been evidence of being partners. They get 25% of gross billings for bringing clients to the firm. The fact that this is only a share of gross billings, rather than net billings (which would be profits) is evidence they are not partners. Also the fact that they only get 25%, a relatively small percentage, of such gross billings also evidences they are not partners because this shows the firm is simply providing them with an incentive to bring in new billings. If they were co-owners (partners), they wouldn't need such incentive. Given all of this, the associate attorneys are not partners.

The owners of an LLC are called members and the owners of a corporation are called shareholders. Since the firm is neither an LLC or corporation (see above), the associate attorneys are not members or shareholders.

An employee is someone who is hired by an employer to provide services to the employer regarding the employer's business. An employee is an agent of the employer, who is the principal. Evidence of an employee-employer relationship can be found when the employee is paid a fixed salary or wages and where the employer has authority for managing the details and method of how the employee performs her job. Here, given the associates get a fixed salary, they are likely employees.

CONCLUSION: The associates are employees of the firm.

(3) SENIOR ATTORNEYS

See rules above as to when persons are considered partners. Here, the senior attorneys are paid a salary based upon the number of hours they bill, they do not share profits, so no presumption of being partners. Their salary is "fixed" in the sense that it is based upon a unit charge per hour (e.g. $600/hour) and then that unit charge is multiplied against the number of hours the senior bills in every year. The annual bonus is part of the compensation package, but it is contingent—only applies if the senior bills more than 2000 hours a year, so such bonus does not take away from the fact that the senior is paid a "fixed" salary based on number of hours billed. While it is true that the bonus is equal to 5% of profits, split equally among the number of qualifying seniors, this is not evidence of the sharing of profits in the sense that it is not all seniors who get to participate in this share of profits—just the ones who are eligible for the bonus having billed the requisite number of hours. Put another way, it is not as though the position of being a senior automatically provides the right to share in the profits. While it is true that that the seniors have the title "nonequity partner" and that the website and business cards say "partner", the label or title of "partner" is not conclusive. The facts say that A, B and C "agreed to bestow" the title nonequity partner, which makes it seem as though this was just a concession on A, B and C's part to make the seniors feel their position in the firm was one of seniority or importance, rather than an intent for them to actually be partners in the firm. The fact that A, B and C had the power to decide what title seniors get also shows that A, B and C are in a superior position compared to the seniors rather than them all being equal partners. Furthermore, the seniors do not participate in management or control of the business, which would have been evidence of being partners.

The owners of an LLC are called members and the owners of a corporation are called shareholders. Since the firm is neither an LLC or corporation (see above), the senior attorneys are not members or shareholders.

See above for rules as to employees. Here, given the seniors do not get to participate in the management of the firm, and that all such business and management decisions are made exclusively by A, B and C, it is likely that seniors are simply employees of the firm.

CONCLUSION: The senior attorneys are employees of the firm.

(4) THE AGREEMENT WITH NANCY

A partnership is bound by the contracts entered into by its partners and employees (both of whom are considered agents) where such agents had actual authority, apparent authority or where the partnership ratifies the agreement.

Actual authority can be express or implied. Express actual authority is where the partnership expressly by words or writing provides authority. Implied actual authority exists where based on the manifestations (words or conduct) of the partnership, the agent reasonably believes she possesses authority.

Apparent authority exists where based on the manifestations of the partnership, third parties reasonably believe the agent has authority to bind the partnership. The partnership statute says that apparent authority exists where the partner is acting within the scope of the partnership business or business of a kind conducted by the partnership, unless the partner lacked actual authority and the person knew or received notification of such.

Ratification is where the partnership agrees to the contract after it has been entered into, either formally and expressly through a formal decision or impliedly by accepting the benefits of the contract.

Here, Martha is an employee of the firm and thus is an agent of the firm. She does not possess actual authority (express nor implied) to bind the firm to a contract providing for reduced hourly rates because the firm has a strict policy of not allowing for reduced rates and Martha knows this is so (therefore, she could not have reasonably believed she had such authority).

It is questionable whether Martha possessed apparent authority. On the one hand, she did because the firm gave her a business card that refers to her as a "partner". A third party in the shoes of Nancy upon seeing such an official business card bestowed upon Martha by the firm, and that Martha was given the title "partner" on that card, would reasonably believe that Martha possesses the authority to bind the firm into contracts regarding legal business and to negotiate rates for legal services in exchange for future business. Those kinds of matters are apparently within the regular business of a law firm. Most people would believe that the title "partner" carries with it great seniority and authority. A reasonable third party in Nancy's shoes would have no idea or knowledge of the behind-the-scenes compensation package of persons like Martha which would otherwise reveal that such persons are not really partners. They also would have no idea of the firm's strict policy of not allowing reduced hourly rates because it is likely that policy is just internal and not disclosed to the public. Furthermore, the fact that the website also refers to Martha as a partner also would give third parties the reasonable belief that senior attorneys had authority to negotiate fees and fee agreements with prospective clients.

In addition, Nancy specifically asked Martha if she could agree to the reduced hourly fee arrangement and in response Martha went ahead and signed a written agreement. Presumably, therefore, Nancy responded to Martha in the affirmative and represented that she did in fact possess authority. She might even have signed her name as "partner" on the agreement or used official firm letterhead. However, it should be noted that under agency-principal law, apparent authority exists based on the actions of the principal, not the agent, so here the unilateral actions and representations of Martha alone would not be enough to imbue Martha with apparent authority as those are not actions or manifestations of the firm.

While it is true that Nancy and Martha met a social function, this is of no moment to the issue of whether the firm is bound by the agreement. Persons regularly form business relationships at social functions. It is not as though the agreement was signed at the social function. Probably it was signed afterwards in the office of the law firm.

As to ratification, there is no indication that the law firm ratified the agreement.

CONCLUSION: The firm is bound by the agreement Martha signed with Nancy because Martha possessed the apparent authority to enter into such agreement on behalf of the firm.

Answer B

2. Business Entity

First, we assess what type of entity the firm is.

Limited Partnership

A limited partnership is formed when it is filed with the Secretary of State, signed by all general partners. A limited partnership has general partners, which manage the partnership and are personally liable for the partnerships acts, and limited partners who are not liable for the partnerships acts, do not have management duties, and are only liable for their contribution/investment. Here, the business filed no documents with the Secretary of State or any other state office, and none of the partners signed such agreement. Therefore, it is unlikely that the firm is a limited partnership.

Limited Liability Partnership

A limited liability partnership must also be filed with the Secretary of State. In a limited liability partnership, all partners have limited liability and are not liable for the acts of the partnership. Here, nothing was filed with the Secretary of State, and there are no facts that suggest that they, Andrew, Bob, and Christine are limited partners or that anyone in the firm is a limited partner.

LLC (Limited Liability Company)

A limited liability company is also filed with the Secretary of State, with an agreement, and agents for service selected. Here, no facts suggest an LLC was formed or anything was filed with the Secretary of State, therefore, it is unlikely that the firm is an LLC.

Corporation

A corporation is formed when its articles of incorporation arefiled with the Secretary of State, stating the corporation's purpose. Here, there were no articles of incorporation filed with the Secretary of State with anything related to the purposes of a corporation, so the firm is not a corporation.

General Partnership

A general partnership is the default form of partnership, where partners share profits, co-own, and manage the business together. No writing is required and it does not need to be filed with the Secretary of State. Here, Andrew, Bob, and Christine equally share firm profits after paying all expenses and make all business and management decisions together. This is likely a general partnership as they are co-owners of a business they run and manage together, and they share profits.

3. Classification of the Associate Attorneys

Next, we assess the classification of the associate attorneys

Employees

An employee is a person who works for the company that does not share profits, and works under the management and direction of partners/directors. At this firm, associate attorneys are paid a fixed salary, plus 25% of gross billings for any client they bring to the firm. It could be argued that associate attorneys are employees as they receive a fixed salary and are paid for their performance, 25% of gross billings for anyone they bring to the firm. They do not share profits or partake in any management of the firm, so it is likely that the associate attorneys are employees.

Partners

As mentioned above, partners run and manage a business and share profits. The associate attorneys do not have management authority and they do not share profits, two of the most crucial factors that determine whether someone is a partner. Likely, they are not considered partners.

Members

Members are people who are part of an LLC. Here, an LLC is not established, so it is unlikely that they would be considered members.

Shareholders

Shareholders are people who own stock or equity in a corporation. Here, no facts suggest they own any stock or shares in the firm or if the firm is a corporation. Likely, they would not be considered shareholders either.

4. Classification of the Senior Attorneys

Another issue is what the senior attorneys are classified as.

Employees

As mentioned above, an employee is a person who works for the company that does not share profits, and works under the management and direction of partners/directors. Here, senior attorneys are paid based upon the number of hours they bill plus an annual bonus if they bill more than 2000 hours in a year. The senior attorney bonus pool is equal to 5% of the firm's profits, which is split equally by the number of qualifying senior attorneys each year. In addition, Andrew Bob, and Christine agreed to bestow the title nonequity partner on senior attorneys even though they have no management authority. Also, the firm website and business cards for senior attorneys list their title as "partner." Here, the senior attorneys are paid upon the numbers of hours they bill, a bonus if they reach more than 2000 a year, and an attorney bonus pool is equal to 5% of the firm's profits. They are paid based on their performance, but they do get their bonus from 5% of the firm's profits. It could be argued that the senior attorneys share profits, which is something not in the realm of what employees get to do. However, they do not have management authority. If this was a limited partnership, it could be argued that the senior associates are limited partners because they have no management authority but get to share some profits. However, no limited partnership was established here, and even though the senior attorneys have titles as partner, and share a small sum of profits, they have no management authority and are paid based on performance, so it is likely that the senior attorneys are also employees of the firm.

Partners

Here, senior attorneys are paid based upon the number of hours they bill plus an annual bonus if they bill more than 2000 hours in a year. The senior attorney bonus pool is equal to 5% of the firm's profits, which is split equally by the number of qualifying senior attorneys each year. They also have the title of partner on the firm website and agree to bestow the title of nonequity partner. However, they have no management authority, and only share as mentioned above, they lack management authority and are paid on performance rather than share all of the profits, so it is likely that the senior associates are still employees. The title and small share of profits are not enough to rule them as partners as they cannot make decisions for the partnership. If this was a limited partnership, the traits of the senior associates mirror limited partners, but as mentioned above, an LLP was not established and therefore they are likely employees of the firm.

Members

As mentioned above, members are people who run an LLC, and an LLC was not established in the facts so the senior attorneys are not members.

Shareholders

As mentioned above, shareholders own stock or equity in a corporation, and make decisions and vote for corporate issues regarding the corporation. Nothing in the facts suggest the senior attorneys are shareholders.

5. Whether the firm is bound by Martha's Agreement with Nancy Last, we assess whether the firm is bound by the agreement Martha signed with Nancy. In order for a partnership to be liable for the acts of the partner, authority must be established. A partner is essentially an agent of the partnership and can act on behalf of the partnership to enter into agreements and conduct business.

Actual authority

First, we assess whether there was actual authority. Actual authority can either be express or implied.

Actual Express Authority

Actual express authority is when the partnership/principal gives actual express authority through an agreement, conduct, or words expressly granting the partner/agent to conduct an act. Here, Martha, a senior attorney, met Nancy at a social function and Nancy told Martha about her business legal issues. Martha gave Nancy her business card, and after looking at the card (which showed Martha as a "partner") she can agree to the firm handling her legal problems at a reduced hourly rate in return for future business. Martha was aware that the firm has a strict policy of not reducing hourly rates, but signed the agreement for it to handle Nancy's legal matter at a reduced hourly rate. Here, Martha did not have express authority to enter into an agreement with reduced hourly rates, it was strictly against firm policy and therefore Martha lacked express actual authority to enter into the agreement.

Actual Implied Authority

Actual implied authority is formed when the partner/agent reasonably believes that he/she is allowed to act in a certain way based on conduct of the partnership/principal. Here, there is no evidence of conduct that would make Martha reasonably believe she had the authority to enter into such agreement. The firm has a strict policy of not reducing hourly rates, and Martha acted against that. There was no implied authority for Martha to enter into the agreement.

Apparent Authority

Last, we assess apparent authority. Apparent authority is given when a third party reasonably believes that the partner/agent has authority to act on behalf of the principal/partnership. Here, the firm’s website and business cards for senior attorneys stated that they are "partners." Nancy saw Martha’s business card that stated she was a partner, and asked if she can agree to the firm handling her issues for a lower rate, in capacity as a partner. Nancy reasonably believed that Martha had authority to act in such way and enter into the agreement, and no facts suggest she could not reasonably believe so. Even though it was against firm policy, it is likely that the firm will be bound to the agreement by apparent authority.

Q1 Civil Procedure

In 2015, Priscilla was shopping at Grocery when a very large display of bottled soda products fell on her, bruising her head and entire body. She filed suit in federal district court against Grocery for negligently maintaining the display, and sought damages for medical expenses, pain and suffering, and lost wages. Grocery recognized that jurisdiction was proper and filed an answer denying liability.

Accompanying the complaint was a set of 26 interrogatories, which read in part:

25. Please provide the names and addresses of every Grocery employee who worked on construction of the soda display and every soda company employee who did so.
26. Please provide copies of every training manual Grocery has used in training its employees.

Grocery responded: “Objection. These interrogatories are flawed.” Upon receiving the reply, Priscilla filed a motion to compel further responses.

Grocery made two discovery requests asking for:

a. An order requiring Priscilla to submit to mental and physical examinations.
b. All of Priscilla’s tax returns since 1995.

Priscilla opposed both discovery requests and Grocery filed motions to compel.

Before Priscilla filed her lawsuit, Grocery hired Xavier, an expert on grocery store displays, to investigate the accident. His findings were unfavorable, and Grocery has not identified Xavier as a witness. Xavier is an independent contractor, but he works exclusively for Grocery.

Included in Priscilla’s original set of interrogatories was a question seeking the names and opinions of all experts Grocery had hired for the litigation. In response to that interrogatory, Grocery replied: “Objection. Privileged.” No information about Xavier was disclosed by Grocery.

1. How should the court rule on Priscilla’s motion to compel further responses to her interrogatories to Grocery? Discuss.
2. How should the court rule on each of Grocery’s motions to compel? Discuss.
3. Was Grocery’s response to Priscilla’s interrogatory about its experts proper? Discuss.
4. Should the court sustain Grocery’s assertion of privilege with regard to Xavier? Discuss.

Answer A

Priscilla's motion to compel further responses to her interrogatories to Grocer.

PROPER SCOPE OF DISCOVERY

A threshold issue is whether Priscilla's ("P") interrogatories were proper in scope. Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, a litigant is entitled to discover all non-privileged information relevant to the subject matter of the litigation so long as the requests are not disproportional to the needs of the litigation. Relevance is defined broadly and is not limited to evidence that will be admissible at trial. To obtain relevant information, a litigant may use several discovery devices, including interrogatories, to another party. The party responding to interrogatories must provide written responses, under oath, within 30 days of service of the interrogatories. However, a responding party need only provide information within its possession, custody, or control after a reasonably diligent search or inquiry.

Here, P has asked for the names and addresses of every Grocery ("G") employee who worked on construction of the display. The identification of such employees is relevant to determining who created and maintained the display and, therefore, is relevant to P's negligence claim. However, the request is overbroad in seeking the addresses, if P is seeking home addresses. The disclosure of such information would likely be an unwarranted invasion of the employees' privacy, irrelevant and disproportional to the needs of the case. The part of that request is improper and should not be compelled.

P also has asked for the name and address of every soda company employee who worked on the display. A party responding to written discovery requests need only provide information within its possession, custody or control. G does not need to obtain information from the third-party soda company, unless G has the right to request that information from the soda company. The facts here do not indicate that G had that right, and, therefore, the request should not be compelled as to that part of the request.

In addition, P has requested copies of every training manual G has used in training its employees. On the one hand, G's training with regard to the construction and maintenance of such displays as the one at issue is relevant and therefore discoverable. P's request is not limited to any particular type of training or particular time period. G may have training materials from many years ago entirely unrelated to the creation of product displays, and the request would be overly broad and unduly burdensome as to those requests given the issues dispute. The court should not compel such unrelated materials.

TIMING OF WRITTEN DISCOVERY

In issue is whether the timing of P's interrogatories is proper. Under the Federal Rules, a party cannot serve written discovery, except for requests for production, before the Rule 26(f) conference. Here, P served her interrogatories with the complaint. This was premature, and G is not required to answer them, and the Court should not compel answers at this point.

PRESUMPTIVE LIMIT ON INTERROGATORIES

Another issue is whether P served too many interrogatories. Under the Federal Rules, there is a presumptive limit of 25 interrogatories, including discrete subparts, unless a party receives leave of court. Here, P served 26 interrogatories, with the complaint. Accordingly, she has exceeded the presumptive limit without leave, and G is not required to answer interrogatory #26. The court should not compel an answer to that interrogatory.

NEED TO MEET AND CONFER

In issue is whether P met and conferred with G before filing her motion to compel. Under the Federal Rules, a party must attempt to meet and confer with the responding party in good faith in an effort to resolve any discovery disputes before moving to compel further responses. Any motion to compel must contain a certificate or statement of compliance with this requirement. Here, upon receiving the reply from G, P filed a motion to compel. There are no facts indicating that she tried to meet and confer, or that G was unwilling to do so. Accordingly, P's motion was improper or, at least premature, and the court should not grant it.

ADEQUACY OF OBJECTIONS

A party responding to written discovery requests, including interrogatories, must state his objections specifically. If an answer is only in part objectionable, a responding party must specify the part objectionable and answer the remainder. In this matter, G simply stated that "These interrogatories are flawed." This was not a proper objection to the relevance, scope, burden, or objectionable basis of the interrogatories. Having failed to make proper objections, G has likely waived his objections.

2. Grocer's motions to compel two discovery requests.

TIMING OF DISCOVERY

As noted above, written discovery cannot be served until after the Rule 26(f) conference. As such, G's two discovery requests may also be premature, but the facts do not clarify when G made his requests.

NEED TO MEET AND CONFER

As also noted above, a party must meet and confer before seeking to compel discovery responses. The facts here do not indicate whether G tried to meet and confer with P before filing his motions.

GOOD CAUSE FOR EXAMINATIONS

An issue is whether G properly requested mental and physical examinations of P. Unlike other discovery requests, obtaining a mental or physical examination of a party under the Federal Rules requires a court order based on a showing of good cause, unless the party consents. In this case, G did not seek a court order but appears to have served a request for an order directly on P. She opposed the request, implying her lack of consent. Accordingly, G was required to file a motion seeking an order for examination. In this context, the court may treat G's motion to compel as requesting such an order if good cause is shown.

G is likely to show good cause as to the physical exam. P has filed a negligence lawsuit seeking medical expenses and pain and suffering. By seeking such damages, she has put her physical condition at issue, and G should be entitled to obtain an independent medical opinion as to P's prior physical condition and the extent of her injuries. While P may argue that such an exam is unduly intrusive that argument is unlikely to succeed for a physical exam, and the court should allow the exam. P would be entitled to have her attorney attend the examination to help protect her interests.

G is unlikely to show good cause as to the mental exam. While P has asserted pain and suffering, she has not expressly asserted emotional distress. G does not need to inquire into her emotional state to present evidence that would allow a jury to determine the amount of pain and suffering. Therefore, given the highly intrusive nature of such an exam, the court should not allow it here.

SCOPE OF DISCOVERY

Another issue is the scope of G's request for P's tax returns. While G is entitled to information about P's past earnings because she has claimed lost wages, thereby putting her earning capacity at issue, G's request for tax returns goes back 20 years. Requesting documents dating back that far has little probative value and the burden on P of obtaining and producing them is likely disproportional to the needs of the case.

3. Grocer's response to Priscilla's interrogatory regarding experts.

DISCOVERY OF EXPERT EVIDENCE

An issue is whether P is entitled to the names and opinions of G's experts. Under the Federal Rules, a party has an affirmative obligation to disclose basic information about its testifying experts, including the identity of the expert, the opinions to be offered, the factual basis for those opinions, and the expert's qualifications. Here, if G intends to offer X's testimony he must disclose this information, and P's requests for it would be proper.

PROPRIETY OF OBJECTIONS

As noted above, a party objecting to discovery requests must make its objections specific. Here, G has not provided sufficient information to know the basis of his objection. Merely stating "privileged" does not indicate whether he is asserting attorney-client privilege, work product protection, or some other basis. To assert a privilege, a responding party must provide sufficient information for the requesting party to test the validity of the assertion, usually by providing a privilege log. G has not provided any information. Accordingly, his objection is likely inadequate and risks waiver.

4. Grocer's assertion of privilege regarding Xavier.

In issue is whether G's expert, X, is merely a consulting expert. Information about a party's consulting expert, meaning one who is not going to testify at trial, is generally not discoverable except in very limited circumstances. Here, G hired X before the lawsuit was filed to investigate the accident and has not identified X as a witness. These facts tend to indicate that G obtained X merely as a consultant, and information about his opinions would not be discoverable. The court should deny discovery if merely a consulting expert.

Another issue is whether the attorney-client privilege applies to communications with X. To assert the attorney-client privilege, G must show a confidential communication between a lawyer and client made for the purposes of requesting or receiving legal advice. The privilege extends to agents, including independent contractors, of both the attorney and the client, if their communications are made in connection with the attorney-client relationship. In this matter, G has not shown the involvement of any attorney or that any communications with X were in connection with requesting or receiving legal advice. Accordingly, the court should not sustain G's assertion of attorney-client privilege here.

Answer B

Priscilla's motion to compel

Scope of discovery

Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (FRCP), the scope of discovery extends to relevant evidence, or evidence that is reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of relevant evidence. Further, discovery requests must be proportionate to the matter.

Here, Priscilla (P) has sought, in her interrogatories, the names and addresses of every Grocery (G) employee who worked on construction of the soda display. This information is relevant because P has sued G for negligently maintaining the display; employees of G who worked on construction of the display will very likely have relevant information regarding the methods used to construct the display and whether reasonable care was used. Therefore, this portion of the request falls within the scope of discovery.

Priscilla also sought the names and addresses of every soda company employee who worked on the display. Since this request was directed at G, and not the soda company itself, G may claim that it does not have possession or access to this information, or alternatively that it would be unduly burdensome to produce. If this is the case (i.e. G does not have this information in its possession), the court should not compel G to produce it.

Finally, P sought copies of every training manual G has used in training its employees. This is relevant because it speaks to whether G used reasonable care in training its employees to erect soda displays, thus bearing on its liability for negligence. G may argue that the request is overly burdensome or beyond the scope of discovery because it seeks "all" training manuals and not just manuals related to erecting displays. Overall, the court would agree that at least training manuals regarding the displays are within the scope of discovery.

Interrogatories

After mandatory disclosures have been made, a party may direct interrogatories to another party. The FRCP limits the number of interrogatories to 25.

Here, there are two issues regarding P's interrogatories. First, the facts state that she filed the interrogatories "accompanying the complaint." This was premature, as mandatory disclosures had not yet taken place--and indeed, at this point G had not filed an answer.

In addition, P sent 26 interrogatories. This exceeds the maximum number of 25, and there is no indication that P sought leave from the court to send additional interrogatories. For these reasons, the court can find that the interrogatories were procedurally improper, and need not compel G to respond to them (or at least to interrogatory 26).

Objection

A party may object to an interrogatory. In so doing, the party must explain the basis for the objection.

Here, G simply responded "Objection. These interrogatories are flawed." It did not explain the basis for its objection or why it believed the requests were improper. Thus, G's objection itself was flawed and the court need not sustain it.

Motion to compel

If a party fails to comply with a good faith and permissible discovery request, the other party may file a motion to compel. Typically, courts request that the parties meet and confer to attempt to resolve the dispute before the motion to compel stage. A motion to compel will ultimately be granted in the court's discretion.

Here, there is no indication that the parties met and conferred. Rather, it appears P filed her motion to compel immediately after receiving G's reply.

Because both the interrogatories and the objection were improper as discussed above, and because the parties did not meet and confer, the court should not grant the motion to compel at this stage, but rather should order the parties to attempt to cure the procedural flaws discussed above and come to a resolution.

[2] Grocery's motions to compel

[2][a] Mental and physical examination

A mental or physical examination may be ordered against a party to the case, when that party's physical or mental condition is at issue, and for good cause shown.

Here, P is a party to the case. In addition, her physical condition is at issue; she has alleged that as a result of G's negligence, her head and body were bruised when the soda display fell on her. Further, she is seeking damages for medical expenses and pain and suffering. A physical exam would be relevant in helping to determine the scope and extent of P's injuries and the proper amount of damages. Thus, the court should grant G's motion to compel the physical examination.

As to the mental examination, it is not clear whether P's mental condition is at issue. She has sought damages for pain and suffering, so G will argue that a mental examination is necessary to corroborate the extent of her pain and suffering. P will counter that she can testify about this at trial, and an invasive mental examination is beyond the permissible scope of discovery. Without further information, a court could go either way. On balance, without further facts as to P's allegations of pain and suffering, a court would probably allow P to testify at trial about her pain and suffering, and should not grant G's motion to compel on this point.

[2][b] Tax returns

Production of documents

After mandatory disclosures have been made and as part of the discovery process, a party may request the production of documents and information relevant to the claim.

Here, G has sought "all of Priscilla's tax returns since 1995." Since P has sought damages for lost wages, G will argue that the tax returns are relevant to determining the amount of lost wages. P will counter that producing tax years for the 20 years before the injury (which occurred in 2015) is unduly burdensome and not relevant to determining her lost wages now. Her wages in 1995 would very likely be different than her wages in 2015. Overall, a court would probably agree. The court may compel P to produce some tax returns for recent years to the extent necessary to determine lost wages, but would probably not order the production of 20 years of tax returns.

[3] Grocery's response to Priscilla's interrogatory about experts

Disclosure of experts

A party is required to disclose the names and identities of all expert witnesses who will testify at trial. Disclosure of experts hired simply to prepare for litigation (but who will not testify at trial) is not required.

Here, G hired Xavier (X), an expert on grocery store displays, to investigate the accident. Since his findings were unfavorable, G has not identified X as a witness. Since there is no indication that G is planning to call X to testify at trial, disclosure of X's identity is not required.

Privilege log

In response to a discovery request, a party may produce a "privilege log" that describes the privileged nature of information sought. The privilege log must identify with specificity the basis for asserting the privilege, so that the other side can properly assess whether the privilege was properly invoked.

Here, in response to the interrogatory, G simply replied, "Objection. Privileged." G did not explain the basis for the asserted privilege (work product, attorney-client etc.) or why it believed the information to be privileged. As such, P and the court cannot properly determine whether G's privilege assertion was proper. On these facts, the court should not sustain G's bald objection, but rather should order G to explain the basis of the asserted privilege.

[2] Grocery's assertion of privilege regarding Xavier

Disclosure of experts

The rule is as above. As analyzed above, because X was not retained to testify at trial, disclosure of his identity was not required by the discovery rules.

However, G need not disclose the information if it is protected by a privilege. While it is not clear what privilege G is asserting, G may attempt to assert work product privilege.

Work product privilege

Under the work product privilege, materials prepared by counsel in preparation for litigation may be protected from disclosure. Some materials, such as investigative reports, are discoverable if (1) the information cannot reasonably be obtained through other means, and (2) the party seeking disclosure will suffer substantial prejudice if the information is not disclosed. However, the mental impressions of an attorney, are absolutely protected.

Here, P has sought not only the name of all experts, but their opinions. G will argue that X's opinion is covered by the work product protection. This argument will not likely prevail, as X's findings were not work product prepared by a lawyer. There is no indication that X was working with a lawyer or that counsel had a hand in drafting X's findings. Instead X is simply an independent contractor working exclusively for G. Thus, P will argue that X's findings constitute an investigative report that does not qualify as privileged work product. A court will probably agree.

G will argue that P has not shown that the information cannot reasonably be obtained by other means. Instead, G will say that P can hire her own expert in grocery store displays. Further, there is no indication that P will suffer substantial prejudice, as P again can hire her own experts. However, this does not matter, as X's findings likely do not qualify as privileged work product in the first place.

Overall, the court should not sustain G's assertion of privilege. At a minimum, for the reasons discussed above, it should require G to explain the basis for any privilege in a more fulsome way.

Q2 Remedies / Constitution

Clear City is home to 50 churches, one of which burned down earlier this year. Fire investigators suspected that the cause was a burning candle.

Clear City has enacted an ordinance that prohibits burning candles in any church and authorizes the fire marshal to close down any church in which candle burning occurs. The Mayor told the press that Clear City would vigorously enforce the ordinance and that the fire marshal would randomly visit churches during their Sunday services to close down violators.

The fire marshal visited six churches last Sunday, but did not visit the Clear City Spiritual Church ("SC"). Two of the six churches visited were burning candles, but were only issued warnings, not shut down. Immediately after visiting the last of the six churches, the fire marshal publicly announced that it was likely no further warnings would be issued to churches caught violating the ordinance. The fire marshal also announced that, due to a lack of personnel, these random visits would not resume for "at least eight weeks."

The members of SC burn candles during Sunday services to signify spiritual light in the world. The day after the fire marshal's announcements, SC gave notice to Clear City's attorney that it would immediately sue Clear City in federal court seeking: (1) a temporary restraining order and a preliminary injunction to enjoin Clear City from enforcing the ordinance during the pendency of the lawsuit; and (2) a declaration that the ordinance violates the First Amendment.

Clear City's defense is that it has not taken any action and there is no controversy.

1. What is the likelihood of SC's success in obtaining a temporary restraining order? Discuss.

2. What is the likelihood of SC's success in obtaining a preliminary injunction? Discuss.

3. What is the likelihood of SC's success in obtaining declaratory relief in its favor?

Answer A

This question triggers issues of Freedom of Religion under the First Amendment, associational standing, mootness, ripeness, and potentially conduct as speech under the First Amendment.

Preliminary Issues

A necessary prerequisite to SC's ability to obtain any form of relief is that standing exists and that ripeness and mootness can be cleared. Article 3 courts (federal courts) are courts of limited jurisdiction. Under the Constitution, they are not permitted to issue advisory opinions and may only issue opinions where cases or controversies exist. The defense of Clear City ("CC") is essentially that standing does not exist here--that there is no live action or controversy that may be appropriately assessed and provided a remedy. Each of the three questions below will require that there is standing before the remedy may be addressed. Thus, we must tackle the issues of standing, ripeness, and mootness before proceeding to the three questions below, as each of these has the ability to remove the "case/controversy" requirement and thus preclude Art. 3 jurisdiction over the case.

Standing

The issue here is whether there is either individual or associational standing. In order to have standing, one must have suffered a concrete and particularized injury in fact, there must be causation between the defendant's conduct and the plaintiff's injury, and redressability by a favorable decision of the Art. 3 court must exist. In addition, we should note that the association bringing the lawsuit here is exactly that--an association and not an individual. There are additional rules in order to find associational standing. First, the individual members who make up the organization must have standing. Second, the lawsuit at issue must accord with the organization's purposes. Third, the association must be able to sue in its own right without requiring the active participation of its individual members.

Here, we should find that both individual standing and associational standing are satisfied. The requirement of injury in fact is probably the most tenuous link. SC has not been visited, issued a warning, or shut down. However, they engage in activity that is now prohibited under the ordinance and did so previous to the ordinance's creation. As such, the possibility that they will be reprimanded for their use of burning candles should constitute an injury in fact, as it interferes with the free exercise of their religion. (This finding is bolstered by the lurking First Amendment issues. It might not be so convincing in a non-religious context. See below.) We should note that the fire marshal's statement that they probably wouldn't keep issuing warnings is ambiguous. This could either indicate that the ordinance will not be enforced going forward, or that it will be enforced strictly and to the full extent of its reach. It is more likely that the latter is the correct response because it accords with the Mayor's press announcement that the ordinance would be vigorously enforced. This also increases the likelihood of an actual injury in fact occurring to SC directly.

Additionally, the causation between the defendant's conduct and plaintiff's injury is clear. Here, the defendant's action was to pass an ordinance that prohibits the burning of candles in churches, a religious activity. Without the passing and enforcement of that ordinance, SC would have been permitted to continue burning candles in their church at their leisure.

Additionally, redressability is within the power of the court. Here, if the court finds the ordinance to be unconstitutional (as requested in the prayer for declaratory relief), the injury in fact imposed on churches in CC will cease.

Thus, we can conclude that an individual member of the church would likely have standing. We should then consider associational standing. In addition to the requirement that the individual members who make up the organization would have standing (satisfied directly above), the lawsuit in question must accord with the association's purpose. Here, the purpose of the association is not directly stated, but one could conclude that it is "to signify spiritual light in the world," the reasoning given for the burning of candles during Sunday services. Realistically, it is probably broader than this. The church's purpose is to provide spiritual guidance and so on, and one part of that is to signify spiritual light in the world to others who might consider joining and so on. Regardless, the nexus between the association's purpose and the lawsuit should be sufficient to satisfy this requirement.

The final requirement is that the association must be able to represent itself in the lawsuit without requiring the individual input of any of the particular members. There are no facts in the pattern that indicate otherwise. Thus, I assume this element is satisfied.

As such, there is both associational and individual standing here. Because SC is bringing the lawsuit, associational standing is most pertinent to our purposes. It is satisfied.

Ripeness

The issue here is whether the case or controversy here is actually ripe. The conclusion should be yes, but CC will argue that it is not. In order to be ripe, a lawsuit must be capable of actually being determined. Issues of ripeness arise with respect to proposed legislation, ordinances that have not yet been enacted, laws that have not yet been violated, and so on. In short, the injury is essentially to come, and the plaintiff is seeking a declaration that the ordinance (or otherwise) is invalid before harm can occur.

Generally, ripeness questions can also arise when there is a dearth of appropriate facts such that the court cannot appropriately answer the question. A case is less likely to be unripe when the question is essentially one of law. Here, the question is essentially one of law--is the ordinance compatible with the First Amendment? Thus, there is no need for a slew of facts before judicial review can be appropriately had.

SC will also point out that the ordinance has actually been enforced (at least in part), because the fire marshal has begun to make random visits and has begun to issue warnings. The ambiguity of the fire marshal's statement is again in issue here, because it is not entirely clear whether he means to ramp up or down enforcement after the eight weeks have passed. Because of the threat of interference with religion, and because the question here is mostly one of law, the court should find the issue to be ripe and to take up the case.

Mootness

The issue here is whether the case or controversy in question has been mooted. CC could claim that there is no controversy, because the fire marshal publicly announced that they would not seek any further warnings to issues caught violating the ordinance.

Additionally, he announced that the random visits would not occur for the next 8 weeks because of a lack of personnel. Thus, CC might claim that there is no longer any live issue in the case as there is no risk that SC will be caught burning a candle during a Sunday service and being closed down. If there is no live controversy, then a federal court cannot act on the issue.

However, there are two exceptions to the mootness doctrine. One exists where the problem in the lawsuit is capable of repetition, yet evading review. The best example of this is abortion. By the time a decision is made in federal court, typically 9 months have passed and the live issue has been resolved. However, if this standard were strictly followed, there would never be an opportunity to adjudicate on the issue. Here, SC could raise this exception, perhaps arguing that the fire marshal might just cease enforcement activity whenever a lawsuit is threatened. However, this doesn't exactly accord with the facts, as SC informed CC of its intent to sue the day after the fire marshal's announcements.

The better argument for SC is that this is an example of the voluntary cessation mootness exception. Where the conduct complained of by defendant pauses or is halted, such that the live controversy disappeared as a result of defendant's own free will, the case cannot be said to have been resolved. Rather, it is wholly possible that upon dismissal of the case the defendant will begin to once again engage in the conduct complained of. As such, voluntary cessation is an exception to the mootness doctrine. Here, voluntary cessation neatly fits the facts. The fire marshal indicated that there was a lack of personnel, so the random visits would stop for at least eight weeks. However, if many new personnel signed up the very next day, random visits could start again immediately. Additionally, the fire marshal's decision to "likely" not issue any further warnings is voluntary. The ordinance giving him the authority to do so has not been repealed; this is simply a policy decision on his behalf. As such, this is a good case of voluntary cessation that should prevent the mootness doctrine from disposing of this case.

Potential Remedies

Above we have ensured that the case is an appropriate case or controversy under Article 3 such that it is permissible for a federal court to hear it. Now we must assess the remedies issues assigned.

One preliminary issue with respect to remedies is that the suit is being filed against Clear City, a municipality. Municipalities are not entitled to state sovereign immunity under the 11th amendment, and at any rate it appears that CC has not attempted to fight the suit on an immunity basis, so I will not consider that potential defense further.

(1) Temporary Restraining Order

The issue here is whether a temporary restraining order is appropriate. Temporary restraining orders are devices that are intended to be available only when there is a serious threat of immediate, irreparable injury to the plaintiff. Temporary restraining orders require the showing of two elements (1) likelihood of success on the merits for plaintiff, and (2) likelihood of irreparable injury to the plaintiff if not granted. Temporary restraining orders ("TROs") are also allowed to be issued before a hearing occurs--thus ex parte--and in some cases without notice to the other party. Notice is not required if the plaintiff can show that provision of notice would potentially lead to the destruction of the item in question in a goods case or some other good reason why it might be inappropriate to furnish the defendant with a warning. Another good reason can also include simply documented unavailability of the defendant. Temporary restraining orders in federal court are good for 14 days. They can be extended for another 14 days with a showing of good cause, but all reasonable efforts must be made to secure a preliminary hearing before that point. When a preliminary hearing occurs, the court will determine whether or not to issue a preliminary injunction. If the court does not hold a hearing before both 14 day periods have passed, the TRO effectively morphs into a preliminary injunction.

Here, there is probably not a compelling case for a TRO. First, there is probably a likelihood that plaintiff can establish a likelihood of success on the merits (see section 3 below). However, it is unlikely that irreparable injury would occur without a TRO. The fire marshal's statement indicated that there would not be any random visits for eight weeks. Eight weeks consisting of 7 days is 56 days. A TRO would be good for, at maximum, 28 days. As such, there is no pressing need that requires a TRO be granted in order to prevent the SC church from being shut down.

SC's likelihood of success in obtaining a temporary restraining order is low, unless they can demonstrate some increased likelihood of irreparable injury (i.e., if the fire marshal suddenly hired 50 new employees and could carry out the ordinance in full).

(2) Obtaining a Preliminary Injunction

The issue here is whether SC will be able to obtain a preliminary injunction. The test for a preliminary injunction is much the same as that of a TRO. The plaintiff must establish a likelihood of success on the merits; a likelihood of irreparable injury if a preliminary injunction is not granted; and a balancing of the hardships of plaintiff and defendant/the public in plaintiff's favor in order to succeed. We should also note that in the case of a preliminary injunction it is appropriate to provide a bond, such that if a preliminary injunction is inappropriately awarded, the defendant can be compensated for the time in which he was precluded from acting in a particular way/possessing a particular good. We will assess each element below in turn.

Likelihood of success on the merits. See section (3) on declaratory relief.

Likelihood of irreparable injury if preliminary injunction not granted. Here, there is an increased chance of irreparable injury if the injunction is not granted, because the reality of litigation/trial is that the process is lengthy. The likelihood is that litigation will exceed 8 weeks of preparation and trial. Again, the ambiguity of the fire marshal's statement is pertinent. If they intend to ramp up ordinance enforcement when the 8 weeks end, then the likelihood of irreparable injury via the closing down of the church is significant. We should also note that the manner of enforcement of the ordinance is rather extreme. Rather than fining a church, they will be shut down. Shutting down surely gives rise to an inference of irreparable injury--even if the ordinance is later declared unconstitutional and the church is permitted to reopen, there is a likelihood that congregation members will have gone elsewhere and the ability of the church to attract new members will have been greatly diminished. Because of the widened time scope of the preliminary injunction, likelihood of irreparable injury is probably satisfied here.

Balance of hardships between plaintiff/defendant and public. Here we must assess how the ordinance and its enforcement affect parties on either side of the case. If the ordinance is not enforced, the hardship imposed on the defendant and public is that occasionally a church (potentially) burns down. (Note that fire investigators weren't even sure if this was the cause of the church burning down.) While the loss of a church to a community is likely impactful, the fact remains that CC is home to 50 churches, so the public and the city are unlikely to be devastated by the loss of one. By contrast, to the plaintiff--an actual church--the potential for them to be shut down as a result of burning a candle imposes a significant hardship. This is so because of the likelihood of irreparable injury as discussed above (loss of congregation members, inability to attract new members). The balance of hardships thus comes out strongly in favor of plaintiff.

Because we aren't given facts about SC's financial situation, I will presume that they could afford to post the appropriate bond.

The likelihood of SC's success in obtaining a preliminary injunction is thus high.

(3) Obtaining Declaratory Relief

The issue here is whether declaratory relief is appropriate. Declaratory relief is that relief provided by a court that does not change the rights of a party but merely delineates those rights. Declaratory relief is an appropriate way to handle the question of whether or not an ordinance is constitutional, and is especially appropriate in the context of a municipality because it does not run into any 11th amendment state sovereign immunity issues that might be implicated by a damages analysis.

To determine whether declaratory relief is appropriate, we must assess the merits of the constitutional challenge to the ordinance. Here, the challenge is that the ordinance violates the First Amendment. There are at least two ways in which this could violate the First Amendment under freedom of religion and potentially one under freedom of speech--regulation of symbolic conduct.

It should be noted that here the municipality is a government actor whose actions might be violating the First Amendment.

Freedom of Religion - Free Exercise Clause

The issue here is whether the ordinance inappropriately restricts SC's ability to freely exercise their religion. Under free exercise jurisprudence, a general statute of neutral applicability is valid even if it incidentally burdens religion. However, where it appears to regulate only religion, then the governmental conduct in question must pass strict scrutiny. Strict scrutiny requires the government to show that the law in question was necessary to achieve a compelling governmental purpose, and that there was no less restrictive alternative available.

Here, the law in question does not appear to be neutral and general. Rather, it is directed toward religious entities (churches) alone. As such, it must pass strict scrutiny. One could argue that there is a compelling purpose here in ensuring that churches are not burnt down. (This may not be an appropriate governmental purpose, as it could be argued under the Establishment Clause/Lemon test that this constitutes inappropriate excessive entanglement of government and religion.) Another potential purpose the government could put forward is fire suppression/prevention for the health, safety, and welfare of their residents. Assuming arguendo that this is considered an appropriate government compelling purpose, then we must ask whether it was necessary--that is, whether it was the least restrictive means for accomplishing that purpose. CC is very unlikely to be able to fulfill this burden, because there are a variety of other ways a church could undertake to ensure its candles didn't lead to its burning down. Increased fire safety measures, the installation of sprinklers, the placement of fire extinguishers within the church, repositioning of candles in un-flammable areas, etc.--there are a variety of less restrictive alternatives as compared to shutting a church down entirely.

The ordinance probably violates the free exercise clause.

Freedom of Religion - Establishment Clause

The issue here is whether the ordinance inappropriately establishes or interferes with a religion. Generally, the Establishment Clause analysis proceeds by consideration of the Lemon test, which asks: (1) Was there a secular, non-religious purpose in enacting the law? (2) Was the primary effect of the law to advance or inhibit religion? (3) Was there excessive entanglement between the government and religion? Here, there was clearly a secular purpose in enacting the law--prevention of loss of churches through accidental burning down from unattended candles. This is not religious in nature merely because the place in which the government seeks to stop burning buildings is candles. There is probably a general compelling governmental interest in fire suppression/prevention for the health, safety, and welfare of its constituents.

The primary effect of the law, however, probably inhibits religion. Because a common religious practice, burning candles, is here being prohibited by the government upon pain of being shut down entirely, the law seems to be overbroad in attempting to achieve its legitimate non-secular purpose. Because if the law were fully enforced many churches would be shut down, there is probably a failure on prong 2.

Third asks whether there is excessive entanglement between government and religion. This is a close call. It is possible that there is excessive entanglement here because the fire marshal seems to have an inordinate amount of discretion in deciding whether he is going to issue a warning or shut the church down entirely. For example, if the churches issued warnings were Catholic, but future Lutheran churches were immediately shut down, this would appear to be excessive entanglement of government and religion because it seems to send a message about the content of church services. This makes exercise of discretion very dangerous. Presuming that the fire marshal is going to strictly enforce the law going forward and decline to exercise discretion, this prong is probably not problematic, but from the fact pattern, the conclusion is unclear.

Because the second prong of the Lemon test is failed, the ordinance is probably improper under the Establishment Clause as well.

Freedom of Speech Issue - Symbolic Conduct

The issue here is whether the ordinance is permissible governmental regulation of conduct speech. This is probably permissible governmental regulation of conduct speech. The test for permissible conduct speech is a hybrid test closest in nature to intermediate scrutiny. It requires that the regulation of speech not be overbroad; that the purpose for regulating the speech not be purely to regulate the speech content, but for another unrelated governmental purpose; that the government have an important purpose in regulating the speech; and that the regulation be narrowly tailored; and that it directly advance the government purpose.

Here, the regulation of symbolic speech--prohibiting candle burning--is not merely to regulate the content the speech communicates (signifying spiritual light in the world), but to prevent buildings within a municipality from burning down. The interest in fire suppression/prevention is probably an important government purpose because it affects the health, safety, and welfare of its residents. The question of whether the regulation is narrowly tailored is arguable--again, the enforcement mechanism seems somewhat strict--but it seems appropriate as it merely prevents open flame within the church while the point of the regulation is to prevent fires. Because of this, the regulation is probably not overbroad, though its enforcement mechanisms may be. The government purpose of fire suppression is probably directly advanced by eliminating the most likely source of flame/fire within the buildings in question.

The ordinance probably does not constitute a violation of the freedom of speech with regard to regulation of speech by conduct.

It is likely that SC will be successful in obtaining declaratory relief in its favor under a first amendment freedom of religion theory. The best theory for SC is probably a violation of the free exercise clause as strict scrutiny is extremely unlikely to be satisfied here. An establishment clause argument would probably also succeed. A first amendment freedom of speech argument would probably not succeed, so one of the other two should be used.

Answer B

Whether Clear City Spiritual Church ("SC") is Entitled to a TRO to enjoin Clear City ("CC") from enforcing ordinance

Standing

The first issue is whether SC has standing to bring an action against CC. A party meets the elements of constitutional standing by showing (a) injury in fact (b) causation, and (c) redressability.

Injury in fact

Injury in fact means that the injury is concrete, not abstract, and is particularized. In other words, the plaintiff must show that they were actually harmed.

Here, SC can likely argue that it has suffered injury in fact. SC's practice is to burn candles during Sunday services to signify spiritual light in the world. CC is effectively trying to put that light out by prohibiting burning candles in any church. This has a concrete effect on SC in particular. This element is met.

Causation

But for CC's ordinance, SC would not be in a position where they are afraid to engage in one of their regular religious practices. This element is met.

Redressability

If the court prevents SC from enforcing the ordinance and eventually overturns the ordinance, it will provide SC with exactly the relief it seeks, allowing SC's members to continue lighting candles. Redressability is met.

Organizational Standing

CC might argue that SC's members are required to bring the action rather than SC. Indeed, it is SC's members who burn the candles. However, even if it were true that SC's members are the ones that suffer harm, SC likely has organizational standing here.

An organization has standing to bring a suit on behalf of its members where the members can be adequately defined and the organization can show that it adequately represents the members' interests. Here, the members are SC's churchgoers, and, as SC is the organization that leads the congregational worship and oversees Sunday services where candle burning takes place, it can represent the interests of its churchgoers effectively. SC has organizational standing.

Ripeness

A court may only hear a live case or controversy. That is, there must be an actual dispute over the rights and obligations of parties, such that resolution will clarify those rights and obligations. A court may not issue advisory opinions. Ripeness may exist even if one party voluntarily curtails their conduct where there is the ongoing possibility of a violation.

Here, CC argues that there is no controversy, likely because it is not currently enforcing the ordinance. The facts show that due to a lack of personnel, random visits to enforce the ordinance are delayed "at least eight weeks." Nonetheless, the ordinance is still in effect, and it is highly likely that at some point in the near future, SC will be paid a "visit" by the fire marshal. SC's argument holds considerable weight in light of the public statements made by the Mayor and fire marshal. The Mayor told the press that CC would "vigorously enforce the ordinance," and the fire marshal announced that churches will likely no longer get the benefit of a warning if caught violating the ordinances. Accordingly, while SC may not have to worry about a fire marshal "visit" for at least eight weeks, the concern is still very much live. Furthermore, there is nothing to say that the fire marshal is true to his word. The Mayor's announcement to the press suggests that the CC has almost an inquisition-like desire to shut down churches burning candles. There's nothing to suggest that the fire marshal may gain personnel to start the sweeps earlier.

Accordingly, there is a live case or controversy such that ripeness exists.

Entitlement to a TRO

A temporary restraining order ("TRO") is a form of injunctive relief that a party may obtain with or without notice, which, if granted, immediately enjoins a party from taking a contested action until the parties can be heard on a preliminary injunction motion. In essence, TROs and PIs are designed to preserve the status quo during the pendency of an action. When a court grants a TRO, it will generally set the preliminary injunction hearing shortly thereafter (usually within 10 days). TROs are obtained ex parte upon a showing that giving notice to a party is likely to frustrate enforcement. Here, the TRO appears to be with notice as SC gave notice to CC's attorney that it would seek a TRO.

A TRO is only granted upon a showing of immediate harm. In determining whether to grant a TRO, the court looks at (i) whether the party will suffer irreparable or immeasurable harm if injunctive relief is not granted, (ii) the likelihood of success on the merits. (iii) the balance of the harm to the movant if the TRO is not granted against the burden to the nonmoving party in complying with the injunction, (iv) the public interest in granting a TRO.

i. Irreparable harm

SC can meet this element because it is not seeking monetary relief, but rather declaratory relief declaring that the ordinance violates their First Amendment rights. A monetary value cannot be placed on the harm SC will suffer if its members are prohibited from practicing their religious beliefs. This element is met.

ii. Likelihood of success on the merits

This factor is explained below in the discussion of declaratory relief. The short answer is that this element will be met because CC would be considered a state actor, and has passed a law that facially discriminates against religion, and does not meet strict scrutiny.

iii. The balance of harms

This factor also favors SC. The harm SC will suffer due to a violation of the free exercise clause is profound, as its members would have to give up one of their regular religious practices, or otherwise practice secretly, in fear of government intervention, which evokes Soviet Union-type concerns. On the other hand, CC would be prohibited from enforcing an ordinance that may be unconstitutional, and even if it is not, the harm is small. Indeed, SC can point to the fact that the fire marshal has already explained that they will have to postpone random visits due to lack of personnel. If enforcement of the ordinance was that important to the city, then CC would find another way to continue enforcement, such as moving over personnel from other departments.

iv. Public interest

The public interest in allowing persons in the United States to exercise their First Amendment rights is paramount. On the other hand, there is no interest in allowing a government actor to enforce a questionable ordinance.

Immediacy of harm

While SC will easily satisfy the four-factor test for injunctions, the court may still refuse to grant the TRO because SC may not be able to show a risk of immediate harm. The fire marshal's announcement that random visits will not resume for at least eight weeks means that there is plenty of time to seek a preliminary injunction prior to any harm befalling SC. If the court accepts CC's statement that they will not enforce the ordinance for at least eight weeks, then it will likely not grant a TRO.

Accordingly, while the factors for a TRO all favor SC, SC still may lose its TRO application based on a lack of immediacy of harm.

2. Whether SC is Entitled to PI to enjoin CC from enforcing ordinance

On the other hand, SC is likely entitled to a PI.

Courts use the same four-factor analysis in determining whether to grant a PI. Additionally, a PI does not require a showing of immediate harm; only a showing that the harm is likely to occur if an injunction is not granted during the pendency of the action.

For the reasons stated above, SC can meet the four-factor test. Furthermore, if CC begins its sweeps in the next eight weeks, then the risk of harm is likely to occur during the pendency of the action, such that the PI is necessary to preserve the status quo.

3. Whether SC is likely to obtain declaratory relief

Government Action

The First Amendment applies only to government action. The First Amendment is couched on Congress not making any law that violates a person's rights. It is extended to state and local government through the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause.

Here, CC appears to be a state actor because it is a city. It has a Mayor, a fire marshal, and enacts ordinances that it seeks to enforce. The alleged First Amendment violation directly relates to one of those ordinances. Accordingly, government action has occurred raising First Amendment issues.

Free Exercise

A person has the absolute right to their religious beliefs, but religious conduct may be limited in some circumstances. The government may pass laws that limit religious conduct, but they are more likely to be upheld where the laws only incidentally limit religious conduct. Where a law is facially neutral, such that the prohibited conduct applies equally to religious and secular conduct, absent a showing or discriminatory motive, the law must merely meet rational basis scrutiny. This requires the proponent to prove that the law is not rationally related to a legitimate government interest. On the other hand, where a law is facially discriminatory, such that it is aimed at tailoring religious conduct, it is subject to strict scrutiny. This requires the government to show that the law is narrowly tailored to meet a compelling government interest.

The ordinance is facially discriminatory

Here, the ordinance applies only to burning candles in any church. On its face, it appears to target religious conduct because it only affects churchgoers.

The city could argue that the ordinance is not aimed at religious conduct, but is instead aimed solely at regulating burning or candles. But if that's the case, then CC could have drafted the ordinance to say that. The ordinance could have applied to burning candles in any building, or any place where members of the public meet, or similar. It does not say that; rather, it applies only to burning candles in churches.

Because it is facially discriminatory, strict scrutiny applies. The government must show the law is narrowly tailored to meet a compelling government interest.

Compelling government interest

The government can likely meet this because CC is home to many churches, and one of those churches burned down earlier this year, with the suspected cause being a burning candle. It can be presumed that people go to these churches, and CC has a compelling interest in protecting the safety of its citizens. Accordingly, CC meets this element.

Narrowly tailored

CC will lose on this element because the ordinance is not narrowly tailored. To be narrowly tailored, the government generally must use the least restrictive means. Here, CC completely prohibits the use of candles, and has invoked draconian enforcement measures and sanctions to enforce the ordinance. CC could have regulated in a less restrictive way, such as by regulating where candles are placed in churches, or the type of candle used, or required other safety measures, such as burning candles over a non-flammable service. CC instead issued a blanket prohibition. CC fails this element.

Accordingly, the law does not meet strict scrutiny.

Rational basis

On the chance that the law is considered facially neutral, it is more likely to be upheld. SC would have to show that the law is not rationally related to the legitimate government interest. Courts generally give the state wide discretion under rational basis scrutiny. Accordingly, the ordinance would likely survive on the unlikely chance that the ordinance is found to be facially neutral.

Establishment Clause

The First Amendment also prohibits the government from favoring one religion over others or favoring religion over non-religion. The government must show (1) the law has a secular purpose, (2) its primary aim is not to advance or inhibit religion, and (3) the law does not excessively entangle government with religion.

Here, even if the law has a secular purpose, and even if the primary aim is to not to advance or inhibit religion, the government would fail on the third factor because it excessively entangles government with religion. As mentioned above, these draconian sweeps are Soviet-Union like. Because the ordinance applies only to churches, the practical effect is that the government is engaging in random, chilling sweeps of churches and churchgoers. The government's willingness to crash Sunday services is strong evidence that the government is excessively entangled in religion.

Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, SC is likely to succeed on its declaratory relief action because CC likely violated the First Amendment by passing and enforcing the ordinance.

Q3 Criminal Law and Procedure

Delia entered a coin shop, pulled out a toy gun that appeared to be a real gun, and pointed it at the owner, Oscar. Oscar handed her a set of valuable Roman coins and she fled. Neither said a word.

Subsequently, the police received an anonymous email that stated, “Your coin robber is Delia, and she is trying to sell the stolen coins.” Detective Fong followed Delia and saw her using a payphone in a public alley. The payphone was not in a phone booth. As he walked past her, he heard her say softly, “I have a set of ‘hot’ Roman coins for sale that need to go to a discreet collector. I will call you back at 9:00 p.m. tonight.”

Detective Fong then bought a “Bird Song Microphone” from a pet store, a parabolic microphone that promised to enable a listener to hear the chirping of birds from a distance of 150 feet. He went to Nell’s house, which had a deck that overlooked the alley, and lied to Nell saying that he needed to go on the deck because he was investigating a terrorist plot and “lives are at stake.” Nell let him onto the deck at 9:00 p.m. that night. He aimed the microphone at Delia, who was using the same payphone in the alley, and heard her say softly, “Fine, call your buyer and let me know if we have a deal for the hot coins.”

The next day, Detective Fong put all of the above information into an affidavit for a search warrant for Delia’s house, obtained a signed search warrant from a judge, searched Delia’s house, and recovered the coins. Delia was arrested and charged with robbery.

Prior to trial, Delia filed a motion under the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution seeking to suppress her statements and the coins.

1. What arguments may Delia reasonably raise in support of her suppression motion, what arguments may the prosecution reasonably raise in response, and how should the court rule with regard to

    a) Delia’s statement, “I have a set of ‘hot’ Roman coins for sale that need to go to a discreet collector. I will call you back at 9:00 p.m. tonight.” Discuss.

    b) Delia’s statement, “Fine, call your buyer and let me know if we have a deal for the hot coins.” Discuss.

    c) The Roman coins. Discuss.

2. Is Delia guilty of robbery? Discuss.

Answer A

Delia's Motion to Suppress

OF = Officer Fong.

State Action

For a motion to suppress based on constitutional rights, there must be state action. All the actions here were undertaken by Fong, a police officer, so there was state action.

The Fourth Amendment

The Fourth Amendment states "the right of the people to be secure, in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, except upon probable cause, supported by oath and affirmation, and particularly describing the places to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

The requirements of particularity and probable cause facially apply only to searches which are conducted pursuant to a warrant. However, the Supreme Court has held that, because it would not make sense for a warrantless search to be conducted to a lower standard than a search conducted with a warrant, the same requirements of particularity and probable cause apply both to warrantless searches and searches conducted pursuant to a warrant. Probable cause is slightly more stringent for a warrantless search, and in a marginal case, a warrantless search will be found not to be based on probable cause (US v. Ventresca). A warrantless search is presumptivelyunreasonable, unless an exception to the warrant requirement applies.

a) Delia's First Statement

The statement made by Delia was overheard by Officer Fong without a warrant. Therefore, assuming that a search took place, it would be presumptively unreasonable. I analyze this issue below.

Standing

Standing is a threshold inquiry which is not jurisdictional, but may nevertheless bar a defendant from arguing a suppression motion. A defendant must show that their own reasonable expectation of privacy was violated (that they have standing) in order to bring a constitutional claim.

Delia here has standing - the words she seeks to suppress are her own.

Probable Cause Based on Informants

In Illinois v. Gates, the Supreme Court relaxed the relatively strict constraints placed on information obtained from the informants which previously was codified in Aguilar/Spinelli. Originally, under Aguilar/Spinelli, information from an informant was evaluated on a two prong test: first, corroborating circumstances confirming the information contained in the warrant was required, and secondly, the informant's reliability, as well as the reliability of the information, would be evaluated. Probable cause could not be established unless the state could meet both prongs. Illinois v. Gates modified this test, holding that a strong showing on one of the prongs could compensate for a poor showing on the other. Furthermore, the facts would be evaluated based on the totality of the circumstances, rather than in a prong-specific manner.

Here, OF's investigation was undertaken based on an informant's anonymous, uncorroborated tip. This would fail both Aguilar/Spinelli and Illinois v. Gates because, at the time the tip was received, there were no corroborating circumstances available to OF, other than the fact of the robbery. Presumably, Oscar would have provided a description of the robber which could be matched with Delia's appearance, but the facts are silent on whether this was actually available to OF. Regardless, the informant's reliability was not established, nor was the accuracy of the information ascertainable on anything other than innuendo.

However, Illinois v. Gates only governs whether probable cause could be established based on an informant's tip. It does not govern whether police may investigate based on the tip when there is no probable cause, in order to follow up on information that may or may not be true. Therefore, the information from the tip would not support probable cause by itself, but it is completely admissible to support further action by OF which does not violate any constitutional provision - which is, in fact, what happens.

Delia's Use of the Payphone

Is Katz Implicated?

In the seminal case of US v. Katz, the Supreme Court ruled on the constitutionality under the Fourth Amendment of police using technology to overhear a conversation inside a telephone booth. The relevant holding, in Justice Harlan's concurrence, stated that action under the Fourth Amendment is a search if it 1) violates a subjective expectation of privacy by the defendant 2) which society is prepared to recognize as reasonable.

OF's actions here took place without a warrant. Therefore, if the actions were a search, it would be presumptively unconstitutional. We must therefore determine whether a search took place at all.

Subjective Expectation of Privacy

Delia will certainly argue that she has a subjective expectation of privacy in the contents of her own conversation. She certainly did not want her conversation to be overheard by OF. However, subjective expectations of privacy are based on the conduct of the parties, not their subjective thoughts. Delia's speech was in an alleyway which was "a public alley", where anybody could go. The payphone she used was not enclosed. Delia could argue that her actions manifested an intention on her part to be especially careful about being overheard (she spoke "softly"). But this will not be enough to establish a subjective expectation, given that the conversation took place in a public space.

Objective Expectation of Privacy

Furthermore, Delia's conduct is not one which society is prepared to recognize as reasonable. It took place in a public thoroughfare, and the law is settled that police officer may conduct investigations from locations where they have a right to be.

Furthermore, it is unclear whether Delia has a recognizable expectation of privacy in her conversations in the first place. When a party speaks to another, they run the risk that the other party will disclose the contents of their conversation (Hoffa v. US). However, it could be argued that this only applies to disclosures from that party, such as when the party wears a wire. In this case, Delia's conversation was overheard by a third party, OF. If OF had taken special measures to overhear the conversation (considered in Part II) it might be argued that Delia had an objectively reasonable expectation of privacy, but against this will be held the fact that the entire conversation took place in a public space. Although, in some cases, courts have been willing to hold that an objective expectation of privacy was violated when listening devices were surreptitiously placed in a public space, this is not the case here - OF simply walked past Delia. Therefore, there is no objectively reasonable expectation of privacy, and OF's overhearing Delia was not a search at all.

Because OF's behavior was not a search, it does not matter that the informant's information could not establish probable cause. Nor does it matter whether the overhearing of the conversation was a "fruit" of the original informant's tip. Because there was no action subject to the Fourth Amendment at all, there can be no constitutional challenge to OF's action here.

Conclusion

The motion will fail with respect to the first statement.

b) The Second Statement

The second statement raises a number of different issues from the first.

Standing

Rules above. Delia has standing; the statements are her own.

Use of a Listening Device

OF uses a "Bird Song Microphone" to listen in on Delia's conversation, presumably because Delia might be suspicious if he listens in on her again.

The Supreme Court precedent most closely on point, with respect to technology assisted searches, is Kyllo v. United States, which holds that when police use technology which is not in general public use, to obtain information from the interior of a home which they would otherwise not be able to obtain unless they made a physical intrusion, then there is a search.

However, Kyllo is not entirely on point here. The technology here is in general public use, because it was purchased from a pet store. Furthermore, there was no intrusion into a constitutionally protected area through the use of the bird microphone, because Delia was not at home when she used the payphone. (It is possible that there was a search, however, and that there was a reasonable expectation of privacy. I consider this below).

Another relevant precedent is Dow Chemical, which considered the constitutionality of an aerial search using a high powered camera. The Supreme Court in that case did not hold that a search had taken place at all, although it was willing to grant that the use of the camera in that case could, in some cases, transform action which did not otherwise violate the Constitution into a constitutional search.

Since the microphone here was in general public use, it is likely that the use of the microphone would not transform the search into a constitutional violation by itself. Persons in a public space can generally be held to assume the risk that other private individuals, using generally available technology, might listen in on their conversations. Therefore, the use of the microphone, by itself, will likely not raise a constitutional violation.

Pretextual Entrance Into Nell's House

A different issue is raised by the location from which OF conducted the search.

Consent

Consent, for purposes of the Fourth Amendment, is governed by Schneckloth v. Bustamonte. A court will evaluate the totality of the circumstances in determining whether consent was voluntary or not. However, consent is not a waiver - it need not be knowing or intelligent in order to be valid.

Here, two separate issues are raised by OF's entry into Nell's home. First, Delia will need to argue that the consent was invalid because it was procured by a lie on the part of OF. It does not matter that OF stated that he was "investigating a terrorist plot" or that "lives were at stake" - although these raise issues of exigency, the entry here would not be justified by exigency, but rather by consent. Besides, entry based on exigent circumstances is only unconstitutional when police gain entry via an actual or threatened violation of the Fourth Amendment, and there was no violation here because Nell's house was not searched by OF.

Rather, Delia will argue that the consent was not voluntary because it was procured falsely. Police are allowed to lie when they obtain consent, however, so the entry here will likely not be held to be have been obtained through involuntary consent. It is possible, however, that the egregiousness of OF's assertions to Nell could change this result.

A larger problem is raised, however, by standing. Even if Delia were to argue that the entry into Nell's house is somehow improper, Delia does not have standing to object to an entry into Nell's house because only Nell can assert a possessory interest in her own home. Therefore, for purposes of challenging the later search, Delia will likely have to presume that OF was where he had a right to be, and that when he aimed the microphone at Delia, Delia's rights with respect to OF are the same as if Nell had aimed the microphone at her.

Subjective Expectation of Privacy

I next turn to whether, given a police officer on the deck of a nearby house aiming a device which is in general public use at the defendant, such action constitutes a search.

The rules are the same as before (Katz).

The analysis for the subjective expectation is before. Delia will argue that she "spoke softly", but this alone cannot establish a subjective expectation of privacy, given that the conversation took place in a public alley.

Objective Expectation of Privacy

The analysis for an objective expectation of privacy differs here, however. The listening in on Delia's conversation took place not through OF listening to her as he walked by her, but through his use of a microphone at a distance of 150 feet. This could change the objective analysis.

Courts have sometimes been willing to hold that action by the police transforms activity which would not be a search in one context into a search in a different context. For example, installing a listening device in a public area can be held to violate an objective expectation of privacy, on the theory that an individual who has a conversation in a public place may assume the risk that bystanders will be listening to him, but if the conversation takes place in the public space when no bystanders are nearby, the expectation of privacy may be different.

In this case, the conversation which was overheard was still taking place in a public alley, but Delia was presumably not aware, at the time of the call, that any individual was in the vicinity. This presents a slightly more difficult argument than before, but a court will still likely hold that OF"s activity here was not a search.

If OF's activity was a search, however, it would be presumptively unreasonable, because there was no probable cause based on the informant's tip. There is no exception which applies here - there was no consent, nor was this a search incident to arrest or a search justified by exigency.

Fruits

As before, whether probable cause can be based on the informant's tip need not be considered if the activity in question by the police is not a search at all, since police are entitled to investigate wrongdoing even on the basis of speculative tips. However, if OF's action is considered a search, the fruits doctrine may apply.

The fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine bars evidence which was obtained as the result of an earlier illegal action if the "taint" from the previous illegality is not held to be cleansed. Assuming that probable cause could not be established from the informant's tip, then the "taint" from the tip would extend to any searches which were conducted as a result. It would not matter whether the actual listening in by Fong was reasonable or not.

There are three exceptions to the Fruits doctrine: attenuation, independent source and inevitable discovery. Because Fong’s actions depend entirely on the tip, there is no independent source, and there is no argument that Fong would eventually have discovered Delia's wrongdoing. There is no argument for attenuation, either, since there is no intervening event or large lapse of time between the tip and Fong's action. Therefore, if Fong's action is considered a search, then the fruits doctrine could result in suppression.

Conclusion

It is likely that Fong's activity was not a search, and, thus, suppression will fail. There is a very weak argument that a search took place; if one did take place, then the statement could be suppressed.

c) The Roman Coins

Leon* - Searches Pursuant to a Warrant

The doctrine of United States v. Leon holds that a search conducted pursuant to a warrant will not be held unconstitutional if the warrant is later held to be unsupported by probable cause. There are some exceptions to Leon, such as where the police knowingly uses false information to support the warrant, or if the magistrate abandons their neutral and detached role.

Here, it could be argued that the information from the informant did not support probable cause. However, the subsequent actions by OF did not depend on the warrant, because they were arguably not searches, and they do support probable cause (which is that quantity of suspicion which would justify a reasonable person, using nontechnical standards, to conclude that evidence of wrongdoing can be found, for a search, or that the defendant has committed a crime, for an arrest.)

There is no bad faith underlying the warrant here, and no facts indicate that the magistrate was biased. Therefore, Leon will bar the suppression of the Roman coins.

II. Delia's Liability for Robbery

Robbery

Robbery is aggravated larceny - a trespassory taking (caption) and carrying (asportation) of the personal property of another, from the person's presence, by force or fear, with the intent to deprive the owner of it permanently.

Here, Delia entered the shop and took Roman coins from Oscar. There was, thus, a taking and carrying away of the property, and Delia can be presumed to have had the intent to deprive Oscar of the coins permanently, since she was making arrangements to sell the coins. The primary issue is whether the coins can be held to have been taken via force or fear.

Delia pointed a gun at Oscar. Although this was a toy gun, it "appeared to be a real gun", and there are no facts indicating that Oscar subjectively knew that the gun was false (otherwise he would not have given the coins to Delia). Furthermore, it was objectively reasonable for a person in Oscar's position to believe that the gun was real. Therefore, Delia used a threat of force to take the coins, and meets this requirement. It does not matter that the threat was not verbalized - pointing the gun would reasonably have been understood to mean a threat of force, without words being used.

Delia is, therefore, guilty of robbery.

Answer B

1. Suppression Motion

4th Amendment

The 4th Amendment protects the person, property, and effects of individuals from unreasonable and unlawful searches and seizures. The 4th Amendment has been incorporated to apply to states through the 14th Amendment. The remedy for a violation of the 4th Amendment is suppression of the information received that is a fruit of the invalid search and seizure, known as the fruit of the poisonous tree. There are exceptions to when the remedy applies.

Here, Delia (D) is alleging that three pieces of evidence were collected in violation of her 4th Amendment protections and is seeking suppression.

State Action

State action is when the state or an agent of the state acts. Here, the action taken is by a police and a detective; thus all are employees of the state and state action is met.

A. "I have a hot set..."

Standing - Reasonable Expectation of Privacy

A person must have standing to bring a suppression claim. They must have a reasonable expectation of privacy (REP) in the item searched or they must be subject to a seizure. A person can have a reasonable expectation in a private conversation. Persons do not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in Open Fields or for information in Public View.

Here, Fong (F) follows D into a public alley. Persons do not have a reasonable expectation in alleys that are public. There is no evidence that this alley is within the curtilage of P's home, which a person does REP for, because it is public.

The Supreme Court (SCOTUS) has found that person does have REP for a conversation in a public telephone booth if the booth is enclosed and the conversation could not otherwise be heard. In that case, the dispositive fact was that the police bugged the telephone booth and the person was attempting to keep the conversation private. Here, the facts are very different, the payphone was not in a phone booth, but was out in public view and anyone passing by could hear. The fact the conversation was spoken in low tones does not matter for this determination.

Thus, there is no REP and the remedy of Suppression is unavailable for the comment "I have a set of hot Roman coins. .. "

Warrant Requirement

In the unlikely event SCOTUS expanded the definition of REP to include this case, the police would only be able to collect this information through a valid warrant (discussed below) or warrant exceptions. Exceptions include searches made incident to valid arrest, searches for weapons in a Terry stop, and searches in plain view.

There is no warrant here, so F would need an exception.

Plain View

An officer may search and seize evidence that is in plain view when they are lawfully present, the item is in plain view, and its illegality is readily apparent.

Here, the officer could argue that the conversation was in plain view, anyone in the alley could hear it. The officer was legally in this public place. And the illegality of the conversation was readily apparent.

Thus, this exception would apply.

Conclusion: There is no REP in this public conversation in a payphone without a phone booth, thus suppression is not merited.

B. Fine, call your buyer...

REP

See rule above. A person does not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the home of another when they are not an overnight guest. A person does not have REP when they consent to a search. A person does have a reasonable expectation of privacy from searches to an otherwise private place when the search is effected through technology not available to the public and which enhances natural senses (Kyllo).

N's Home

Here, the first issue is that F is on the property of Neil's house. He gained access to this property by lying, however, an officer is permitted to lie in order to access a premise through consent so long as the lie is not based on a show of authority. For example, an officer is not permitted to lie about having a warrant. But they are permitted to pretend to be a drug buyer to gain consent and enter the home of a drug dealer. Here, it is unclear if F's lie is a lie based on authority. However, regardless of the validity of the consent, the officer is on N's deck. D has no expectation of privacy in a home that is not her own (See Rakas).

Thus, she has no REP based on this objection.

The Bird Song Microphone

Here, the second issue is that F uses a Bird Song Microphone from a pet store to listen to the conversation of D in the public alley. In Kyllo, the court found that the use of a thermal heat detector was impermissible when it was used to access the movement of people in a home. Here, D will say that like in Kyllo, F is using an object that enhances his natural perception to search D. The microphone is parabolic and enables a listener to hear birds (and all things) from a distance of 150 feet. However, this argument will fail because the microphone is readily available to the public.

Furthermore, unlike in Kyllo, the microphone is being used to search D in a place she has no REP. Kyllo was a search in a home. See discussion above. D is in the same alley as the first comment and because it is in public and there is no booth, she has no expectation of privacy for the conversation she puts out into the public.

Thus, there is no REP.

Warrant Requirement

See rule above.

In the unlikely event SCOTUS finds this is a search, there is no warrant and an exception must be applied.

Plain View

See rule above.

For similar reasons, F will argue that they validly heard the conversation. However, in this instance, D may be able to challenge the lawfulness of F's presence when he heard the conversation because he was on N's property. See discussion above under N's Home, because this is likely a consensual permission to enter the property of N, and F is likely validly on the premises when he sees the conversation.

Thus, Plain View would likely work.

Exigence

A officer may make an otherwise unlawful search when there is an emergency or a hot pursuit of a felon.

Here, there is no emergency. F lied about the terrorist plot and the fact that lives are at stake.

This exception will not apply.

Conclusion: no REP for this conversation, thus it is not suppressible.

C. Roman Coins Physical Evidence

REP

See rule above. A person has REP in their home. The home is sacred under the 4th Amendment.

Here, F searches D's home. Thus the search must be pursuant to a warrant or an exception.

Warrant Requirement

See rule above. A warrant must be supported by probable cause, a signed affidavit, state the place and items to be seized with particularity, and it must be approved by a neutral magistrate.

There is an affidavit, and the warrant is signed by a judge. If they are a neutral magistrate, this is valid. The items to be seized and place searched are particular. The search identifies D's home and identifies that the coins should be seized.

Probable Cause

Probable cause requires sufficient facts that would lead a reasonable officer to believe that the commission of a crime was probably happening or has happened. The officer can use their own personal knowledge, lawfully obtained evidence, and the evidence of a reliable and verifiable informant to have grounds for probable cause. Facts alone may not be enough, but taken together, can lead to probable cause.

Here, the police received an anonymous email that stated D is the coin robber and she is trying to sell stolen coins. The informant is anonymous so the reliability and verifiability of the information are hard to obtain. SCOTUS has allowed such informants when the information is particular and the officer verifies it through independent investigation. Here, this is likely a valid tip, as F follows up on the tip by following D in public and overhearing her conversation which confirms the tip.

Furthermore, F has the other evidence, that was validly obtained as described above. F has the phone conversation that was in public about the "set of hot Roman coins for sale that need to go to a discreet collector. I will call back at 9..."and "Fine, call your buyer and let me know if we have a deal for hot coins." Both are likely independent grounds for a warrant as they are strong evidence of the crime of possessing and selling stolen goods, as the "hot coins" indicate. An officer may use their experience and expertise; thus, an officer who knows that hot coins may be a sign of stolen goods can rely on this information.

There is probable cause.

Thus, the search of D's home was pursuant to a lawful and valid warrant. The search does not appear to exceed the scope of the warrant.

Exceptions

Good Faith Reliance on Warrant

In the event that the court finds the statements to be collected in violation of the 4th Amendment, the probable cause would be undercut as the information would be fruits of the poisonous tree of suppressed evidence. However, an officer may rely on a warrant if a reasonable officer would not find that there is no reasonable belief, but that there is probable cause. An officer may not rely on this exception if they acted in bad faith.

Here, as described above, all of F's conduct is within the bounds of the 4th Amendment; thus if new law makes the searches invalid that support the warrant, the officer will still be relying in good faith upon a warrant that a reasonable officer would believe is not wholly lacking probable cause. There is no indication that F acted in bad faith, even the fact that he lied is something that officers routinely do as part of investigations, although this lie seems more egregious.

Thus, this exception would apply.

Conclusion: The roman coins are not suppressible, because they were collected pursuant to a valid warrant.

2. Robbery

Robbery is the crime of larceny by physical force or threats of imminent physical force to the person of another.

Threats of Force to the Person of Another

The threats of force must be imminent and create the apprehension of the fear of physical force; economic force is not enough. The force must be directed at another person's person.

Here, D threatens O with a gun. It is a toy gun, but a reasonable person would have the fear of imminent physical force because it appeared to be a real gun. D did not use words to threaten, but actions are sufficient and pointing a gun at someone would certainly be threatening. The gun was directed at the person of O because D points the gun at him.

Thus, the larceny was achieved through threats of force to O's person.

Larceny

Larceny is the trespassory, taking, carrying away, the property of another, with the intent to permanently deprive.

Trespassory

Trespassory is the interference with another's property; it does not request permanent deprivation like conversion does.

Here, D enters a coin shop and takes the valuable Roman coins. Thus, D is interfering with the coin shop’s ownership of the coins by taking them without permission. The owner Oscar (O), only gives them in response to the threat of violence.

Thus, the taking is trespassory.

Taking and Carrying Away

The D must physically take the personal property and carry it away, the slightest movement suffices as carrying away, including putting it in one's purse or taking something from a shelf.

Here, D takes the coins and leaves the stores.

Thus, she takes it and carries it away.

The Personal Property of Another

Personal property is a removable object and includes objects and money.

Here, D takes a valuable set of Roman coins. Coins are tangible objects and they belong to another, to O.

Thus, this element is satisfied.

Intent to Permanently Deprive

A D must specifically intend at the time of the taking to permanently deprive the true owner of their property. This intent may be later negated and still be found to be intent so long as the intent was held at the time of the actus reas. Intent may be inferred from the circumstances.

Here, D entered the shop, pulled out a toy gun and pointed it at O, takes the coins and then flees. These facts create the inference that she intends to permanently at the time. Furthermore, there is subsequent evidence from the telephone booth conversation that she has a set of hot coins that she wishes to sell. This is strong evidence that at the time of the taking she meant to permanently deprive.

Thus, all of the elements of larceny are met.

Conclusion: D is guilty of robbery

Q4 Professional Responsibility

Larry is an associate lawyer at the ABC Firm (ABC). Larry has been defending Jones Manufacturing, Inc. (Jones) in a suit brought by Smith Tools, Inc. (Smith) for failure to properly manufacture tools ordered by Smith. XYZ Firm (XYZ) represents Smith. Larry has prepared Jones' responses to Smith's discovery requests.

Peter is the partner supervising Larry at ABC in the Smith v. Jones case. Peter has instructed Larry to file a motion to compel discovery of documents that Smith claimed contains its trade secrets. Larry researched the matter and told Peter that he thought that the motion would be denied and may give rise to sanctions. Peter, who had more experience with trade secrets, told Larry to file the motion.

Larry also told Peter about a damaging document that Larry found in the Jones file that would be very helpful to Smith's case. Larry knows that the document has not been produced in discovery. The document falls into a class of papers that have been requested by Smith. Larry knows of no basis to refuse the production of the document. Peter told Larry to interpose hearsay, trade secrets, and overbreadth objections and not to produce the document.

Larry recently received an attractive job offer from XYZ.

1. May Larry ethically follow Peter's instructions to file the motion? Discuss.

2. What are Larry's obligations in relation to the damaging document? Discuss.

3. What ethical obligations must Larry respect with regard to XYZ's job offer? Discuss.

Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

Answer A

An attorney owes his clients the duty of loyalty, confidentiality, competence, and financial responsibility. A lawyer also owes third parties, the public, and the court the duties of fairness, dignity, and candor.

I. FOLLOWING PETER'S INSTRUCTIONS TO FILE THE MOTION

FILING THE MOTION

The issue here is whether Larry, who is an associate lawyer at ABC, must follow the supervising partner Peter's instructions to file a motion to compel discovery of documents that Smith claims contains trade secrets. The second issue is whether there is a questionable issue of law as to whether it is proper to file the motion to compel.

A lawyer owes the duty to supervise attorneys and staff that work under the lawyer and ensure they do not commit any ethical violations. A lawyer who is being supervised still must follow the ethical rules despite being told otherwise from supervising attorneys. If there is an arguable question of law/duty regarding the ethical violation, then the lawyer may rely on supervising attorneys for advice and instruction. If there is no questionable issue of law or duty, the attorney must adhere to the ethical rules of the ABA and California, even if it goes against what the partner says. If the attorney violates the rules, both the associate lawyer and the partner will have committed ethical violations. Here, Peter has instructed Larry to file a motion to compel discovery of documents that Smith believes contains trade secrets. Larry believes that the motion would be denied and may give rise to sanctions. It appears that Larry is less experienced in trade secrets than Peter, who is a partner and has likely been a practicing attorney longer than Larry. Thus, there appears to be a questionable issue of law; therefore, Larry can rely on Peter's advice as a supervising attorney and file the motion to compel.

If Larry does further research and discovers that there are no grounds to file the motion, and therefore no questionable issue of law, then Larry must not file the motion to compel despite Peter's instructions. If Larry does further research and learns that there are no grounds to file the motion to compel, he will be violating the duty of competence to Jones. The duty of competence requires an attorney to act with the legal knowledge and skill necessary to perform for the client. In California, the duty of competence is looked at under a reckless standard; a lawyer will not violate the rules for a single issue that breaches the duty of competence. Here, if Larry knows the motion to compel should not be filed, and files it anyway because of Peter's instructions, he is violating his duty of competence to Jones. He is also violating the duty of fairness to Smith, the opposing party, and the duty of candor and dignity to the court.

Because there likely is a questionable issue of law, Larry may rely on Peter as the supervising attorney and file the motion. However, if Larry further learns that the motion to compel discovery is unwarranted and may give rise to sanctions, then he cannot rely on Peter's instructions and must not file the motion; if he does, he will have committed an ethical violation.

RESEARCHING TRADE SECRETS

There is a possibility that Larry has violated the duty of competence for failing to familiarize himself with trade secret law adequate enough to represent Jones. The duty of loyalty requires an attorney to act with the legal skill and knowledge necessary to represent the client. If the area of law is unfamiliar to the attorney, they have a duty to familiarize themselves with the area of law in order to adequately represent the client. Though Larry is an associate, he still must familiarize himself with trade secret law in order to competently represent Jones, or must associate with a lawyer who has sufficient experience in trade secret law. Here, Peter appears to have adequate knowledge of trade secret law to assist Larry. However, Larry may need to speak with someone else at the firm or conduct further research to ensure that the trade secret law is properly followed in relation to filing the motion to compel. Under California rules, Larry likely has not violated the duty of competency since California follows a reckless standard and does not punish for a single isolated event of incompetency.

Additionally, there is a possibility that Larry will violate his duty of competency if he files the motion, knowing that sanctions are likely, and the court imposes trade secrets, thus hurting his client Jones. This may give rise to reckless behavior. As such, Larry could violate the duty of competency under both ABA and California rules for filing a motion he thinks will bring sanctions.

II. LARRY'S OBLIGATIONS IN RELATION TO DAMAGING DOCUMENTS:

PRODUCING DAMAGING DOCUMENTS

Here, the issue is whether Larry will commit an ethical violation if he fails to produce the damaging document he has discovered.

A lawyer owes a duty of fairness, dignity, and candor to the court and opposing party. Simultaneously, a lawyer owes the duty of confidentiality and loyalty to their client. A lawyer has a duty to follow court orders, including discovery request, and to not assert frivolous litigation claims or defenses. Here, Larry has found a damaging document that has not been produced in discovery. The document is damaging to Larry's client, Jones. However, the document falls into a class of papers that have been requested by Smith. Larry has a duty to turn over the document to Smith because it has been requested by Smith. This does not violate the duty of loyalty to Jones because the duty of loyalty does not ask an attorney to withhold evidence from a proper discovery request. Additionally, while the duty of competency requires attorneys to fight zealously for their clients, it does not allow an attorney to assert false, misleading or frivolous defenses. Here, there does not seem to be a reason for Larry to claim hearsay, trade secrets, or any other defense to keep the document from being produced to Smith.

Thus, Larry has a duty to turn over the document to Smith. If Larry were to assert these frivolous claims to try and avoid turning over the document, Larry will be violating his duties of candor, fairness and dignity to the court and Smith. Additionally, asserting a false claim is likely considered reckless, as it could lead to sanctions on Larry, Peter, ABC, and Jones. As such, Larry will likely be violating his duty of competence to Jones if he asserts a frivolous and false defense to try and protect the document. Therefore, Larry must turn over the document.

As explained above, if there is a questionable issue of law, an attorney may rely on a supervising partner to determine how to proceed. Here, Larry knows of no basis to refuse the production of the damaging document. Even though his supervising attorney, Peter, is ordering Larry to refuse to produce the document, Larry must go against Peter's wishes and produce the document in order to avoid committing an ethical violation.

DUTY REPORT VIOLATIONS OF OTHER LAWYERS

The issue here is whether Larry must report Peter's ethical violation to the bar.

The ABA rules require that an attorney report any ethical violations of another attorney or judge to the bar. Here Peter has committed an ethical violation by refusing to produce the document and making up frivolous and meritless defenses to avoid producing the document. Therefore, Peter has breached his duties of fairness, candor, and dignity to the court and to Smith. Thus, Larry must report Peter's actions to the bar. California does not follow the same rule, so Larry will not need to report Peter's violations to the California bar. However California has a duty to self-report violations, malpractice claims, or other ethical violations/cases that may arise. Larry may need to self- report if he commits any ethical violations under California rules.

III. XYZ'S JOB OFFER

At issue here is whether Larry must disclose his job offer from XYZ to Jones in order to avoid committing any ethical violations.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST - DUTY OF LOYALTY

A lawyer owes their current clients the duty of loyalty. A conflict of interest may give rise to breaching the duty of loyalty. A conflict of interest exists when a lawyer represents two clients in the same suit as adverse parties or when there is a significant risk that the lawyer's personal life, duties to current clients, or duties to former clients may materially limit the attorney's ability to act in the best interests of his client. If there is a conflict of interest, an attorney may still represent the client if the attorney reasonably believes he can still represent the client without breaching any duties and acting in the client's best interests and the client is aware of the conflict and gives informed, written consent. The attorney cannot represent the adverse clients in the same case in a tribunal, and the representation cannot be prohibited by law. In California, the client's consent must be in writing.

Here, Larry is representing Jones in a suit against Smith. Larry works for ABC, who is representing Jones, and Smith is represented by the firm XYZ. Larry has received a job offer from the law firm XYZ, which is directly adverse to his client Jones in a current case. This creates a conflict of interest for Larry. Even if Larry decides not to take the job from XYZ, he still must disclose the job offer to Jones, as it gives rise to a conflict of interest. Here, a conflict of interest has occurred because there is a significant risk that Larry's personal life will impact his duty of loyalty to Jones. (Additionally, there is the potential that, should Larry accept the job with XYZ, it could impact his duty of confidentiality to Jones.) Larry may reasonably believe that he can still represent Jones competently and diligently without violating his duties of loyalty and confidentiality despite the job offer from XYZ. Even if he reasonably believes this to be the case, Larry must still disclose the conflict of interest to Jones. He must get Jones' informed, written consent before proceeding with the representation. Additionally, in California, the disclosure must be in writing and the client must confirm in writing that they are consenting to the representation. It is unlikely this conflict of interest would be prohibited by law. If Larry does not reasonably believe that he can continue representing Jones due to the job offer, even if he does not take the job offer, then he must cease representing Jones and allow another attorney at his firm to take over the case. He will likely need to be screened off from the case, and not share in a portion of fees earned from the Jones v Smith case.

In California, an attorney must disclose, in writing, to his client any personal relationship the attorney may have with another party, witness or lawyer in the case. Here, Larry has created a personal relationship with XYZ because of the job offer. Because of this personal relationship, he must disclose, in writing, the relationship to Jones.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST - DUTIES TO FORMER CLIENTS

At issue here is what duties Larry will breach if he accepts the job offer from XYZ. If Larry leaves ABC and goes to XYZ, he will now be adverse to former client Jones and ABC. This gives rise to a conflict of interest. A lawyer owes the continuing duty of confidentiality to former clients. A lawyer's conflict may be imputed to the firm if it is not personal in interest. Here, if Larry took the job, Larry's conflict with Jones at his new firm XYZ would not be personal and would therefore be imputed to the firm since he worked significantly and substantially on the case Jones v. Smith. Larry has learned significant confidential information from Jones about the case. If Larry were to go to XYZ, then he must be screened off from the case, not share in any fees earned from the case, and XYZ must give notice to ABC. Under the ABA rules, Larry may be allowed to take the job if he is properly screened, shares no fees from the Jones v Smith case, and does not give any confidential information about Jones to XYZ or Smith; additionally, notice must be given to Jones. In California, if an attorney has worked on the same matter in a substantial way, the conflict cannot be cured from screening off the client. Therefore, in California, Larry would likely not be able to take the job because XYZ would have to stop representing Smith, since Larry's conflict would be imputed to the firm.

Answer B

May Larry Ethically Follow Peter's instructions to file the motion

Associate attorney's duties with regard to following a supervising attorney's instructions

Under both the ABA Model Rules (MR) and the California Rules of Professional Conduct (RPC), an attorney that is working under the supervision of a partner or other attorney has a duty to abide by the instructions that the supervising attorney gives, while still maintaining her duty to maintain independent professional judgment and to avoid committing a clear ethical violation.

Here, it could be argued that, by filing this motion to compel, L is bringing a frivolous claim in violation of the MR and RPC.

Duty to avoid frivolous claims

Under both the MR and the RPC, an attorney must not bring a cause of action or claim that has no basis in law or fact, or where the attorney has no good faith argument for an extension of existing law or a change in existing law.

Here, Peter (P) is instructing Larry (L) to file a motion to compel discovery documents that Smith (S) claimed contain trade secrets. It could be argued that if L files this motion after doing the research and believing that the motion will be denied, filing that motion would constitute a frivolous claim and would thus violate both the MR and the RPC. However, on the other hand, L could argue that he only "thought" that the motion would be denied and "may give rise to sanctions," not that it absolutely would be denied. He could note that, because it wasn't absolutely clear that this would be denied, there is a basis in law for obtaining the discovery and that the claim is therefore not frivolous. He can further note that P is much more experienced with trade secrets, and he told L to file the motion. Note that the efficacy of following P's instructions in this instance is discussed in more detail below.

On balance, a court is likely to find that this is not a frivolous claim because there is some basis in law for making the request.

Duty with regard to following P's instructions

This balance between following the instructions of the supervising attorney and maintaining that independent professional judgment turns on whether the action sought by the supervising attorney is clearly an ethical violation or whether it is a reasonable question of law or fact. If the reasonable minds of attorneys would differ as to whether the action ordered by the supervising attorney would constitute a violation of an ethical duty, then the attorney must abide by the supervising attorney's instructions and will not be liable for an ethics violation. If no reasonable minds would differ as to the propriety of an action, or if it is clearly a request for a violation of an ethical rule or law, then the associate attorney must refuse to take the action.

Here, Larry (L) has been instructed to follow through with filing this motion to compel. As noted above, this may constitute a violation of the duty to avoid frivolous claims.

However, L has an argument that reasonable minds could differ as to whether this is a frivolous claim, as well as whether this request could lead to sanctions. Furthermore, he could note that, because reasonable minds could differ, in this instance, he was under a duty to follow his supervising attorney's instructions.

Conclusion

On balance, a court is likely to agree that this is an arguable question of law in which reasonable minds could differ, and L therefore did not violate any ethical duties by following P's instructions and filing the motion to compel.

Duty to report ethical violations

Under the MR, an attorney has a duty to report any ethical violations that they know another attorney has committed. The RPC does not have a corresponding duty to report ethical violations of others, but it does impose a duty on attorneys to self- report when they know that they have committed ethical violations.

Duty to report others under MR

Here, it could be argued that L violated MR's duty to report by not reporting P for ordering him to file this motion to compel, a possible frivolous claim. However, as discussed above, this is likely not a frivolous claim, and if it is, he did not know it with a certainty, so he is not under a duty to report.

Duty to self-report under RPC

Furthermore, under the RPC, it could be argued that L has a duty to self- report after filing the possibly frivolous claim. However, again, this is a close call, and likely not a frivolous claim, so L was not under a duty to report.

As such, L has not violated his duty to report ethical violations under the MR or under CA.

Larry's obligations in relation to the damaging document

Duty of Confidentiality

Generally speaking, under both the MR and the CA, an attorney must not disclose any information relating to the representation of a client unless authorized by the express written consent (informed written consent in CA, informed consent confirmed in writing under the MR), or unless impliedly authorized in order to carry out the representation.

Here, L has discovered a document that contains information relating to the representation of Jones. However, this information has likely been legitimately requested in discovery, and one situation in which an attorney is impliedly authorized to disclose such information in order to carry out the representation is in response to a discovery request.

Therefore, L would not be violating his duty of confidentiality to Jones by turning this document over in disclosure.

Duty of Diligence

Under both the MR and CA RPC, an attorney owes a client a duty to provide reasonably diligent and prompt representation. Under the RPC, an attorney must be committed and dedicated to their client's cause. However, this duty does not require an attorney to press for every available advantage. And as discussed below, an attorney must not violate the duty of fairness in an effort to zealously advocate for their client.

Here, L may need to balance the need to protect his client's interests against disclosing this information. He must be dedicated to protecting his client's interests. However, this duty may give way to the duty of fairness to opposing counsel, as discussed more below.

Duty of Fairness

The duty of fairness requires that an attorney act with fairness to opposing counsel during the courts of litigation. This requires that an attorney not knowingly obstruct another party's access to evidence, nor alter, conceal, or destroy evidence, or counsel or instruct another to obstruct access to evidence, or conceal, alter, or destroy evidence in the course of litigation.

Here, L has discovered a damaging document in the Jones file. He knows that the document has not been produced in discovery, but he also knows that it falls into the class of papers that have been requested by Smith, and he knows of no basis for refusing to produce the document. It could therefore be argued that, by failing to disclose this document, and by "interposing hearsay, trade secrets, and overbreadth objections" in order to not produce the document, he is intentionally and knowingly obstructing Smith's access to evidence. Although L could argue that P told him to do this and that he should trust P's judgment on this issue, it should also be noted that L himself "knows of no basis to refuse the production of the document."

A court is therefore likely to find that L has violated his duty of fairness by obstructing Smith's access to the evidence.

Duties following a supervising attorney's instructions

See rule above.

Here, claiming hearsay, trade secrets, and overbreadth with regard to this document could be a frivolous claim. L can only avoid liability for violating an ethical duty if this is a question of law in which reasonable minds would differ. If they would not, then L has a duty to avoid committing the ethical violation.

Duty to avoid frivolous claims

See rule above.

Here, L clearly "knows of no basis to refuse the production of the document." When P instructed L to "interpose hearsay, trade secrets, and overbreadth," L likely should have executed some research to determine whether this would be an adequate basis for claiming that they should not be required to turn over the document. If not, then no reasonable minds could differ as to whether or not they had an obligation to do so. Following P's instructions in this instance would constitute making a frivolous claim, and therefore violating both the MR and CA RPC.

For this reason, L must either turn over the document or refuse to offer those objections.

Duty of candor

Under both the CA RPC and MR, an attorney owes a duty of candor to the court, and must not knowingly make a false statement of law or fact to the court. If such a false statement is made and the attorney learns of it, an attorney must promptly correct such false statements.

Here, if L files these objections, or raises them in opposition of a motion to compel, then it is possible that he is violating his duty of candor to the court. This would be the case if the documents do not legitimately contain hearsay, trade secrets, or if the request for the document is not overbroad. In such a case, making those claims would be false statements of law and fact, and L will have violated his duty of candor to the court.

For this reason, L should exercise great caution in ensuring that he does not violate his duty of candor.

Duty to report

See MR and RPC rules above.

MR duty to report

Under the MR, L may have a duty to report P if L refuses to file those objections and P follows through with them, because they may constitute a violation of the duty of candor and the duty of fairness.

CA duty to self- report

Under the RPC, L will not be under a duty to report P if P files such objections, but L would be under a duty to self- report if he does so.

Larry's ethical obligations with regard to XYZ's job offer

Duty of loyalty

Under both the MR and the RPC, an attorney owes all clients, past and present, a duty of loyalty and independent professional judgment. When there is a substantial risk that the attorney's representation will be materially limited due to their own interests, or the interests of past or present clients, then a conflict of interest may exist that could hinder the attorney's ability to provide competent and diligent representation. If a conflict of interest exists, then the attorney may be in breach of their duty of loyalty.

Duties of loyalty and confidentiality of past clients

An attorney owes continuing duties of both loyalty and confidentiality to past clients, even after the representation of those clients has ceased. The duty of confidentiality to past clients means that an attorney may not reveal information relating to the representation of that client, regardless of the source, unless authorized by the express written consent of the client. The duty of loyalty to past clients means that the attorney may not participate in an action against that client, or use information relating to the representation of the client, unless under the MR, the client provides informed consent confirmed in writing, or under the CA RPC, the client provides informed written consent.

Here, L has been in the process of representing Jones in a suit between Jones and Smith. L is now entertaining an offer to join XYZ, the firm that is currently representing Smith in the same suit against Jones. Regardless of whether L takes on the case or works on it personally, L is under an absolute duty not to use or disclose any information relating to his representation of Jones.

Conflict of Interest - When moving to new firms Past and Present Client Conflicts

Under both the MR and the RPC, where an attorney has worked on the same or substantially similar matter for one client, and then moves to a new firm that is working on the same or substantially similar matter for the adverse party of that representation, a conflict of interest exists. That conflict of interest is imputed onto the other attorneys in the firm, and the firm must not take on the case, regardless of who works on it, unless (1) the former client gives informed written consent (under CA) or informed consent confirmed in writing (under the MR), or (2) the new attorney is properly screened.

Informed Written Consent/Informed Consent Confirmed in Writing

Note while informed consent confirmed in writing only requires an attorney give full disclosure orally before the client provides written notice of consent, informed written consent requires that the disclosure of the conflict is in writing, and the client's consent is also in writing.

Screening procedure

An alternative for the firm exists where the new attorney is properly screened. This requires that the new attorney with the conflict does not work on the case in any way, does not have access to the case files nor discuss the case with any of the parties working on the case, and is not apportioned any fee for that case. Additionally, the firm must provide notice of the decision to screen and the screening procedures put in place to the former client, and must certify compliance with those screening procedures if requested by the former client.

Here, if L wants to take the job at XYZ, he should let them know that this is a likely consequence of taking the new work. The firm will either need to inform Jones of the new conflict or implement appropriate screening procedures. However, as discussed in more detail below, this will not work under the CA RPC.

California exception for personal and substantial work

Under the CA RPC, a new lawyer's conflict is imputed into the entire firm, and the entire firm may not take on or continue a case, even with appropriate screening procedures or informed written consent, if the new and conflicted attorney worked substantially and personally on the same matter for the other client.

Here, it could be argued that L worked personally and substantially on the Jones v. Smith case. Although just an associate, "he has been defendant Jones" and prepared Jones's responses to Smith's discovery requests. He has consulted significantly with P, the partner, on issues involving sensitive materials.

It is therefore likely that L's conflict will be imputed to XYZ, and he should inform XYZ that this could cause problems with their representation. The best course of action would be to seek a delay in hiring until after the conclusion of the case.

Duty of confidentiality

See rule above. The duty of confidentiality applies to past clients as well as present ones.

Therefore, L will have a continuing duty to maintain confidentiality to Jones, even if he is able to take on the new work at XYZ.

Q5 Contracts

Sam owned a classic 1965 Eris automobile. Only 500 such cars were made and they are considered highly valuable.

Sam and Art, a classic car specialist, signed a valid written contract. The contract stated in its entirety:

> Art will serve as Sam's exclusive agent in selling his Eris car. Upon successful sale, Art will earn a commission equal to 10% of the sale price.

A few days later, Sam showed his Eris to Bob, who had learned of the car when he saw a "For Sale" sign Sam had decided to place on it while parked in his driveway. Bob, wanting to add the Eris to his personal collection, mailed Sam a signed letter later that day offering to pay $250,000 for the car. When Sam received the letter, he telephoned Bob and said he accepted the offer. They agreed to meet the following week for payment and exchange of title. Sam then called Art and said he was terminating their agreement.

The next day, Charlie saw an advertisement for Sam's Eris in a classic car trade publication. Art had placed the ad prior to Sam terminating their agreement. Charlie drove to Sam's house and offered $300,000 for the car and said he would mail a written contract to Sam that day. Sam said he would "think about it." He did not inform Charlie of his agreement with Bob. When Charlie's contract arrived, Sam signed it, placed it in a stamped envelope addressed to Charlie, and dropped it in the mailbox.

Sam died in his sleep that night. His will left all his property to his only relative, a nephew named Ned.

Ned wants to keep the Eris. As a result, Bob and Charlie filed timely claims against Sam's estate seeking title to the car. Art filed a timely claim seeking a 10% sales commission.

What contract rights and remedies, if any, do each of the following parties have against Sam's estate:

1. Bob? Discuss.

2. Charlie? Discuss.

3. Art? Discuss.

Answer A

Bob's Rights and Remedies

Applicable Law

Contracts for the sale of goods are governed by the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). Goods are defined as movable, tangible things identifiable at the time of delivery. All other contracts are governed by the common law. Here, B attempted to contract for the sale of a 1965 Eris automobile (the car). The car is a tangible movable thing and so the UCC governs this contract.

Formation

This raises the issue of whether Bob (B) and Sam (S) entered into a contract. The formation of a contract requires mutual assent and consideration.

Mutual Assent

Mutual assent requires offer and acceptance. An offer must evince an objective intent to enter into an agreement, lay out sufficiently certain and definite terms such that the contract is capable of being enforced, and must be communicated to the offeree. Under the UCC, the key term for an offer to be sufficiently definite is the quantity term, and all other terms may usually be filled in by the court. Advertisements are not typically treated as offers.

Here, S had posted a sign on the car stating it was for sale. This was not an offer but rather an invitation to deal, that is a solicitation for offers. B responded to this solicitation by mailing a signed letter "offering" to pay $250,000 for the car. We do not know if "the car" was the language used, so it is possible the offer does not describe the subject of the agreement with sufficient definiteness. However, it probably does in context, since all that is required is a sufficiently clear intent to agree. Since S was not selling any other cars this language would probably suffice. The letter was actually received by Sam, so this constitutes a valid offer.

An acceptance of an offer may be made by any means reasonable prior to the offer's termination. Here, after receiving B's offer, S called B and accepted the offer orally over the phone. The parties then agreed on the location where the final exchange would occur. This oral acceptance was sufficient to create a contract, even though the initial offer was in writing (but see the statute of frauds discussion below).

Consideration, the final element of contract formation, requires that there be (1) a bargained for exchange (2) of legally valuable detriment. A bargained for exchange requires the promise induce the detriment and the detriment the promise. To be of sufficient value, the detriment need not be economic, or even very large. Here, S agreed to relinquish title to his car and B agreed to pay $250,000. It was sufficiently bargained for in that each promise induced the other. Therefore, there was sufficient consideration.

B and S entered into a contract for the sale of S's car for $ 250,000.

Defenses to Formation

This next raises the issue of whether the contract is enforceable, and particularly whether it satisfies the Statute of Frauds.

Statute of Frauds

Even where a contract is formed, it may not be enforceable if it falls within the Statute of Frauds and no exception applies. Among the contracts covered by the Statute of Frauds are goods sale contracts where the price paid is $500 or more. Here, the contract was for the sale of a car at a price of $250,000, well in excess of the minimum to be covered. Therefore, to be enforceable the Statute of Frauds must be satisfied or some exception must apply.

To satisfy the Statute of Frauds, there must be some writing evidencing the existence of a contract and its essential terms, which is signed by the party against whom it is being enforced. Here, B sent a signed letter to S offering to purchase the car at a stated price. Had S sued B for breach of contract this would have satisfied the statute, however S never signed the letter, nor any other document. Rather, he accepted the contract over the phone. The "For Sale" sign is insufficient, both because it does not suggest a contract between S and B and was not signed. B might argue that S's contract with A shows he intends to sell the car, but that contract does not prove that S had a contract to sell the car to B (indeed it probably shows the opposite). Therefore, there is no writing which appears to satisfy the Statute of frauds and make the agreement enforceable against S.

The UCC contains certain exceptions to the Statute of Frauds which B may argue make the agreement enforceable. These exceptions include (1) where one party has partially performed on the agreement (but only to the extent of that partial performance) (2) where promissory estoppel applies (3) where the contract is for specially manufactured goods, after substantial performance has begun and the goods cannot reasonably be resold and (4) a merchants' confirmatory memo.

Here, the first three exceptions clearly do not apply. The part performance exception only applies to the extent goods have already been either paid for or delivered, and only for the goods actually paid for and delivered. Here, there was an agreement but no delivery of goods or payment, so the exception does not apply. The facts do not suggest any detrimental reliance has taken place, so estoppel will not save the agreement. Finally, the contract was for the sale of unique goods, not for the manufacturer of such goods. Additionally, even if this did apply, it would protect S, not B.

The only possible exception is the merchants' confirmatory memo. Under the UCC, where one party sends a signed writing memorializing their oral agreement, and the counterparty does not object within 10 days, the counterparty will be deemed to have accepted and the writing may be used to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. If the party orally accepts, this will also satisfy the statute. Here, the memo was sent and S replied by accepting over the phone, so the confirmatory memo exception might apply.

However, the exception only applies where both parties to the agreement are merchants. The UCC defines as one who deals in goods of the kind sold, or otherwise holds himself out as possessing specialized knowledge, skill or expertise in such goods. Here, B might be a merchant, but there are no facts to suggest S is. B has some expertise in classic cars, since he has a personal collection. However even this might not suffice since it is personal, and he does not deal in the goods of the kind (here classic cars). Nor did he appear to hold himself out as having specialized knowledge, and he may not have such knowledge simply by owning a classic car collection. S is even less likely to be a merchant. There are no facts suggesting he knew more than most about cars. The fact he hired an agent to sell his car affirmatively suggests he is not a merchant. Therefore, the confirmatory memo exception does not apply

Because the contract falls within the Statute of Frauds and cannot satisfy it, the agreement between S and B is unenforceable.

Dead Man Act

The facts do not state if the jurisdiction in question has a Dead Man Act. This kind of act generally precludes the use of oral statements of a deceased against the descendant’s estate to prove the existence of an agreement. Here, the only evidence of B's contract with S was S's oral statement over the phone. Therefore, if the jurisdiction had such an act, B would be further barred from proving the existence of his contract with S in a subsequent suit against Ned (N).

2. Charlie's Rights and Remedies

Applicable Law

For the same reasons discussed above, the UCC is applicable to Charlie's (C's) contract with S.

Formation

The threshold issue is whether S and C formed a contract. The rules governing formation are discussed above.

Mutual Assent

Here, the advertisement placed by Art (A) was merely an ad, and did not constitute an offer. However C's subsequent oral statement to S offering to buy the car for $300,000 would constitute an offer. It specifies the quantity (the car) and was communicated to S.

S did not immediately accept, but said he would "think about it." Later, he received a contract from C. He signed the contract and placed it in the mailbox.

Under the mail box rule, an acceptance is deemed effective when it is mailed. At this point, a valid contract is formed even if the offeror has not yet received the acceptance. By placing the contract in the mail box, S has accepted the offer and it became effective when he did so.

N might try to argue no contract was formed because S's initial response, that he would think about it, terminated the initial offer, because it constituted a rejection. However, this was not a rejection but rather a deferral of a response. Even if it were, the subsequent written contract would constitute a new revived offer that S accepted.

N might next argue that the offer terminated prior to acceptance. An offer is assumed to be valid for a reasonable time if it does not specify a particular date on which it terminates. An offer terminates by operation of law upon the death of either the offeror or offeree. Here, S died immediately after mailing his acceptance. Had he not mailed his acceptance his death would have terminated the offer, but by mailing the acceptance a contract was formed.

A contract, unlike an offer, does not terminate at the death of one of the contracting parties unless the contract is for specialized services. A sale of goods contract certainly does not. Here, the death of S did not terminate the acceptance or the formation of S's contract with C.

For the same reasons stated above, consideration exists for the agreement between S and C. Therefore, a contract was formed between them.

Defenses to Formation

Statute of Frauds and Dead Man's Acts

The Statute of Frauds is equally applicable to the contract between C and S. However, unlike the contract between B and S, this contract likely satisfies the statute. S signed the written agreement and accepted. Assuming the contract C sent contained all the essential terms (quantity, a description of the subject matter, the parties), which there is every reason to think it did, this writing will satisfy the statute and the agreement will be enforceable.

Because the agreement is in writing and signed by S, any Dead Man's Act would not preclude enforcement of the obligation.

There are no other defenses to either formation or performance which appear in the facts, therefore, C will be entitled to some remedy should N refuse to deliver the car.

Remedies

This raises the issue of what remedies C may be entitled to.

Replevin

Replevin is a legal restitutionary which allows a party to obtain a court order (even before trial in certain circumstances) allowing the party to retake chattels to which he has a lawful right. To be available under the UCC, the chattels must have been identified in the contract, the amount of time between contracting and the order being sought must not have been too great, and damages must be an inadequate remedy. Damages are inadequate where the subject matter of the contract is unique. The order must also be able to be enforced by the Sheriff.

Here, the car is an identifiable good to which C has a contractual right. The contract was formed mere days before, so the amount of time which has elapsed is not too great. The car is also unique, since there are only 500 in the world. Therefore, C will likely be able to replevin the car from N should N refuse to perform.

C may be able to do this even before a full trial on the merits is had. If N is given notice and a hearing before the order is issued (and potentially even if not), and C posts a bond ensuring against losses incurred by N if the taking is wrongful, C may obtain the order before the case is decided. However, N may post a bond in response ensuring against the disappearance or loss of the car and may then keep the car until the merits are resolved.

Specific Performance

Specific performance is a court order requiring a party to perform on a contract or face contempt proceedings. To obtain specific performance on a contract, the party must show (1) certain and definite terms (2) that legal remedies are inadequate (3) that enforcement would be feasible and (4) that the party has, or is willing to, fully perform its obligations under the contract. Here, the contract is, presumably sufficiently clear, as discussed above. If C tendered the purchase price he has performed. The remedy would be enforceable, since it would simply require transfer of the car. The only question is whether legal remedies are inadequate. If the court were willing to make replevin available as a remedy, then legal remedies would not be inadequate. If replevin was unavailable for some reason, for instance the sheriff could not locate the car, then the car would be considered sufficiently unique to award specific performance.

Damages

C might alternately seek damages. Expectation damages are intended to place the non-breaching party in as good a place as they would have been had the contract been performed. Here, assuming C could not cover, the damages would be equal to the difference between the contract price and the market price of the car, plus incidental damages and consequential damages, less expenses saved. There is no evidence in the facts of what the market price would be, or of any incidental or consequential damages, however C would be able to recover whatever was avoidable and foreseeable at the time of contracting.

3. Art's Rights and Remedies

Applicable Law

Unlike the above contracts, the agreement with A is governed by the common law. The contract is for the service of selling a car. While the underlying object is a good, the agreement's primary focus is the services rendered, especially since A is not the one actually buying the car. Therefore, the common law applies.

Formation and Defenses

The facts state that a valid contract was formed between S, so presumably mutual assent was present. The agreement was in writing so the Statute of Frauds would be satisfied (and is not applicable in any event because it could be complete in less than a year). There are also no obvious other defenses to formation, save consideration.

Consideration

N will argue that he is not obligated to pay A because the contract is illusory. For consideration to exist, each party must have obligations under the agreement. Future contingencies are sufficient to support consideration.

Here, A agreed to serve as S's exclusive agent in selling the car. He would receive a 10% commission for his services. S clearly incurred legal detriments, both by making A his exclusive agent and offering to pay him if there was a successful sale. N will argue that A was not obligated to do anything under the agreement.

Where parties enter into an agreement where one will act as the selling agent of another, courts typically do not find them illusory. Instead, they imply a term that the agent must use their best reasonable efforts in carrying out the agency to save the contract. Here, a court would likely reach a similar conclusion regarding the contract between S and A, and find it enforceable.

Breach

Length of Employment

This raises the issue of whether A was an at will employee or was to work for S until the car was sold. The key term in an employment or services contract is duration. Without such a term a contract is created, but will be deemed an at will employment relationship terminable by either party at any time. Here, the agreement did not state a specific term. N will argue this means S did not breach by ending the relationship. A will respond that the term was for the completion of a particular task, and that he was employed until that task was complete. He will point to the fact that the relationship was exclusive to support this conclusion. It is unclear how a court would rule on this point. Given how short the contract is, the court would likely permit parol evidence concerning prior performance to assess, and may also look to industry custom.

If the court found it was an at will employment arrangement, S, by terminating A, ended it and is not entitled to payment because a "successful sale" had not occurred. However, even if this is the result, A will still probably be able to recover under a quantum meruit theory for the amount of time and money he has already put into selling the car.

Anticipatory Repudiation

If the court instead found that the contract lasted until the task was completed, S would have anticipatorily repudiated the contract and would be in total breach. A party materially breaches a contract when they unambiguously give notice to the other party that they will not perform, and the agreement is executory. If this happens the counterparty need not perform further and may sue. Here, S told A that he was not going to honor the contract. Neither party had completed performance and the repudiation was unambiguous, therefore S likely breached the contract.

A might alternately not accept the repudiation and instead seek his portion of the compensation for the sale to C. A party may elect not to accept the repudiation but instead keep performing under the contract and wait until performance is due. Here, C came to S because of A's efforts (through an ad A placed). A will argue that he acquired a buyer for the car and so, under the terms of the contract, even absent a repudiation, S's duty to perform (now N's) became absolute upon signing the enforceable contract with C.

N might argue that no "successful sale" occurs until the car is actually transferred. Even if this is true, N cannot wrongfully prevent the occurrence of a condition precedent.

Remedy

Damages

As discussed above, expectation damages, which are the default, place the party in as good of a position as they would have been in had the breach not occurred. To be recoverable damages must be sufficiently certain and calculable. Finally, a party must take reasonable steps to mitigate damages, although in a services contract they need not accept substantial.

Here, A will be entitled to whatever 10% of what the sales price would have been equal to, assuming he can prove with sufficient certainty both that amount and that a sale would have occurred. A's costs saved after the repudiation would be deducted from this, but if he received the 10% he is entitled, past advertising expenses would not be recoverable.

He may also seek to recover on a reliance measure of damages if expectation damages are too uncertain. Reliance damages seek to place the party in as good of a position as they would have been in had the contract not been made. Here, A would be entitled to the expenses he has incurred up to this point in trying to find a buyer. This includes the cost of the advertisement he placed in the newspaper, as well as any similar efforts, and the reasonable value of the time he has worked on the project.

Answer B

Applicable Law

In contracts, contracts that are for the sale of goods are governed by the UCC, while contracts for anything else (i.e. services) are governed by the common law. Only one of these can be applied (all or nothing rule) and when the contract is mixed, the one that is applied is determined by the primary purpose test.

1. BOB v. SAM'S ESTATE

Applicable Law

See rule above. Here, Bob is asking for a claim based upon an alleged contract for the purchase of a car from Sam. A car is a tangible good, thus this contract is governed by the UCC.

Contract Formation

In order to form a valid contract, there must be the following: mutual assent (offer and acceptance), consideration, and no defenses.

Offer - Sam's Sign

An offer requires that the offeror objectively manifest terms that indicate to a third party the intent to be bound by the contract, such that the offer creates in the offeree the power of acceptance. Under the UCC all essential terms must exist, which would only be the quantity. A court will gap fill the rest of the provisions.

Advertisements are typically not considered offers, but are usually considered offers to deal.

Here, the ad was a for sale sign that had been placed in the car when parked on the driveway. This is not going to be considered an offer, but is instead an invitation to deal. This is clear because Bob understood it as such as demonstrated by the fact that he actually went to speak with Sam and sent Sam an acceptance. As such, this was not an offer, but simply an invitation to deal.

Offer - Bob's Letter

See above for offer rule. Further, the type of offer matters as to the type of contract that exists. A bilateral contract is the exchange of promises, while a unilateral contract is asking for the other party to perform

Here, Bob sent Sam a signed letter that offered to pay $250k for the car. This is clearly a valid offer under the UCC as it contains the subject matter of the deal (the car) and even includes the price and the parties. Therefore, there is nothing left even for the UCC to gap fill. One could argue that simply offering for the "car" may not make the quantity term specific enough, but based on the prior interactions that the parties had between each other, this was a clear term and thus this was a proper offer.

In addition, this was an offer for a bilateral contract as Bob was asking for a promise from Sam to give him the car, in exchange for a promise from Bob to give Sam money.

Acceptance - Sam's Phone Call

An acceptance requires an intent by the offeree to be bound by the terms of the offer. There must be a clear manifestation of assent to properly accept an offer. In the case of a bilateral contract, the offer can be accepted by either a return promise or by beginning performance.

Here, Sam accepted the contract over the phone by saying "he accepted the offer" and promising to perform, which is a proper way to accept a contract.

Therefore, this was a proper acceptance.

Consideration

Consideration is evidenced by a bargained-for exchange between two parties. It is usually evidenced by a detriment to the promisee or a benefit to the promisor.

Here, there was clearly bargained for consideration between these two parties as Sam (offeree) was incurring a legal detriment by giving his car to Bob and Bob (offeror) was getting a benefit by receiving Sam's car.

Therefore, there was consideration.

Defenses

However, in order to be a valid contract, there must be no defenses to the formation of the contract. Here, there might not have been a proper contract because it may need to satisfy the Statute of Frauds.

Statute of Frauds

When the Statute of Frauds applies, it requires that the contract be in writing, signed by the party to be charged and contain the terms of the deal. The Statute of Frauds applies in several situations, including in the UCC for sales of goods that exceed $500.

Here, the contract was for the sale of goods, and was for $250k, which far exceeds the amount required to apply the Statute of Frauds. Therefore, the Statute of Frauds applies.

Next, the Statute of Frauds requires that the contract be in writing, signed by the party to be charged and contain the essential terms of the deal. Here, this is not satisfied because the only writing that exists between Bob and Sam was Bob's offer to Sam. While this certainly contained the essential elements of the deal, it fails because it doesn't have the other requirements.

First, it is not signed by Sam. It is necessary that Sam be the one to sign it as Bob is trying to enforce this contract. Thus, Sam is the one to be charged under the contract. Sam could argue that his letter offer to Bob was signed, but that doesn't help him as 1) that was just an offer, not the contract, and 2) Bob is not the party to be charged here. In fact, there is no writing at all other than the offer that would be the contract between these parties.

Therefore, this contract violates the Statute of Frauds and should fail.

Statute of Frauds Exceptions

The Statute of Frauds can be overcome in limited circumstances where perhaps this was an order for specialty goods, one party has already performed, or there was promissory estoppel.

Here, however, none of those things occur here as there is no indication that the car was ever delivered to Bob and while this is certainly a special car, this was not a specialty ordered good, but one that was already in existence when the order was placed. Finally, promissory estoppel doesn't apply as there is no evidence that Bob did anything in terms of relying on the promise (i.e. setting up a person to get the car, finding a storage space, etc.).

Therefore, because the Statue of Frauds exceptions don't exist, this will not be an enforceable contract.

Conclusion

In sum, Bob and Sam did not enter into an enforceable contract because it did not conform with the Statute of Frauds and no Statute of Frauds exceptions exist.

2. CHARLIE v. SAM'S ESTATE

Applicable Law

See rule above. Here, Charlie is asking for a claim based upon an alleged contract for the purchase of a car from Sam. A car is a tangible good, thus this contract is governed by the UCC.

Contract Formation

See rule above.

Offer - Ad in Publication

See rule above on ads and offers. Here, this was still clearly not an offer as it was just an invitation to deal with an indication that the car was for sale. Further, this is shown by the evidence that Charlie simply saw the ad and went over to Sam's house in order to see the car and make an offer. Therefore, this was not an offer (note that it doesn't matter that Art put the ad in the paper as that was done by Art while he was Sam's agent).

Offer - In Person

See rule above for offers.

Here, we clearly have an offer that satisfies the UCC requirements as the car is clearly identified (quantity term). In addition, the offer indicated a willingness by Charlie to enter into a deal and even contained a money term. Therefore, this was a proper offer.

Offer - Written Contract

Note that this written contract actually just restated the oral offer that Charlie had made earlier and therefore, it is also a continuation of the same offer.

UCC Firm Offer?

In the UCC world, a merchant can have an irrevocable offer held open for a stated number of days (not to exceed 90) if they send the offer in writing and sign it. A merchant is one who deals in the goods at issue regularly. Here, there is no evidence that Charlie is a merchant. Rather, it appears that Charlie is just a collector who wanted to buy this particular car. Therefore, this was not a firm offer that could be held open.

However, that does not mean that the offer lapsed or anything by the time acceptance became an issue. Rather, the offer was still good and was in the power of Sam to accept.

Acceptance - Think About It

See rule above for acceptance. When Sam said that he would "think about it," this was not an acceptance. Rather, this was an indication that he was open to the offer and that he would like to think more about it. Further, this was not a rejection that would terminate the offer, but rather was just an expression that he needed more time to think about whether or not to accept. Therefore, no contract had formed at that point.

Acceptance - Mailbox

See rule above for acceptance. Under the mailbox rule, an offer is accepted when placed in the mailbox by the offeree. The actual receipt of the acceptance by the offeror does not make a difference under this rule.

Here, Sam received the contract from Charlie and decided to accept it. He accepted it by signing it, placing it in an envelope, and then putting it in the mail to send back to Charlie. The offer was therefore accepted when Sam placed the offer into the mail and the receipt of the acceptance is of no consequence.

Further, it does not matter that Sam died in his sleep that night. The offer was accepted when he placed it in the mail and that is when the contract came into existence. A good contract is not terminated imply because one of the parties dies (this is of course subject to various exceptions).

In sum, when Sam placed the signed letter in the mailbox, a valid acceptance was sent and his death does not impact that.

Consideration

See above for consideration. Here, the analysis is the same. Sam (offeree) is incurring a detriment by sending his car to Charlie, while Charlie is incurring a benefit by receiving the car. There was clearly a bargained for exchanged here as evidence by the fact that Sam even indicated that he wanted to think about whether or not to accept the offer.

In sum, there was consideration for the contract.

Defenses

See rule above. Again, here, there is a Statue of Frauds question as this applies here.

Statue of Frauds

See rule above. Here, contract again is subject to the Statute of Frauds as this is a UCC contract with a price of $300k, which far exceeds the $500 minimum. Therefore, SOF applies.

Further, here, the requirements are met. First, we have a writing as we know that Charlie mailed a copy of the contract to Sam which contained the essential terms of the deal (car, price, parties, etc.). In addition, as the party to be charged, Sam needed to sign it and, here, Sam did sign it before sending it out. Therefore, this is a contract in writing with the essential terms and the party to be charged signed it.

Therefore, this does not violate the Statute of Frauds.

Conclusion

In sum, Charlie and Art entered into a valid contract for the sale of Sam's Car. However, the remedies are now an issue provided that Sam's estate does not honor the sale.

Remedies

Specific Performance

Charlie may want to sue for specific performance of this contract in order to receive the car provided that S's estate does not follow through with the contract. Specific performance is an equitable remedy that allows a court to force that the contract be performed.

Specific performance requires: (1) a valid contract; (2) no defenses; (3) clear/definite terms; (4) all conditions precedent are satisfied; (5) it is possible for the court to enforce; and (6) legal remedy inadequate.

Valid Contract

Here, this exists as discussed above.

No Defenses

This is satisfied as no valid contract defenses exist. See above.

Clear/Definite Terms

This is satisfied as the contract concerns a specific car that exists and which we know where it is. Therefore, this will be found to exist.

Conditions Precedent

This will be found to exist provided that Charlie pays Sam's estate the amount that he owes. That is likely considered a concurrent condition (C gets the car and pays at the same time). Therefore, no condition precedent exists.

Enforcement

This is feasible as the court will simply need to oversee the transfer of the car from S's estate to C. This is entirely possible and easy as it only needs to happen once.

Inadequate Legal Remedy

In order to grant specific performance, the legal remedy (money damages) needs to be inadequate. This will most often be granted in situations in which the subject matter is rare or unique.

Here, C will argue that simply getting money will not be enough as what he really wants is this car. Further, this is a rare/unique car as there were only 500 of these particular cars made and they are extremely valuable to collectors. Further, C can point out that it is rare that these cars even come on the market, therefore, the odds of this coming on the market again may be unlikely and this may be C's only chance to get this particular car. S could try to argue that 500 cars means that they aren't all that rare and that C can just be compensated with expectation damages, but this is likely to fail due to the unique nature of the car and that fact that it is so rare and may not come on the market again.

Conclusion

In sum, the court should grant specific performance to C.

3. ART v. SAM'S ESTATE

Applicable Law

See rule above. Here, this contract is for a service (i.e. Art will help Sam to sell his car), thus this contract is governed by the Common Law.

Contract Formation

See rule above. Here, the facts state that there was a valid agent contract between Art and Sam. Therefore, that contract is good.

Revocation

A contract can be revoked by a party and that means their relationship ends and the non-breaching party can sue for damages. However, a revocation is only good going forward and can't be revoked in a services contract for services already provided.

Here, since Art had already placed the ad in the paper before S terminated the contract, and Art's ad led to the sale of the car, a court will likely find that the contract was not properly revoked at that time and that therefore, the contract is in existence.

Performance - Condition Precedent

Generally, under the common law, a party performed by providing "substantial performance." However, a condition precedent to a contract means that it must be strictly met in order for performance on the contract to be required. Courts typically construe provisions in a contract as promises rather than express conditions. However, an express condition can exist if it is clear that is what the parties intended per the contract language.

Here, the contract between Art and Sam contained an express condition -- "upon successful sale" that triggered Sam's duties to Art. Therefore, this condition needed to be strictly met before S owed anything on the contract to Art.

Here, the successful sale occurred (as discussed above) between C and S. Therefore, this condition has been properly met and this triggers S's duty to perform on his end of the contract. Therefore, S will have to pay the 10% of the sale price to Art.

S's estate should pay Art 10% of the $300k purchase price - $30k.

Damages

If S's estate refuses to pay the 10%, Art will be able to request expectation damages that would give him the benefit of the bargain. Here, Art expected to get per the terms of the damage 10% of the purchase price - $30k. This means that Art could properly sue S's estate for that amount.

Q1 Wills and Trusts / Community Property

In 2006, while Hank and Wendy were married and living in State X, a non-community property state, they purchased a house in State X and a condominium in California with money from Hank's salary. Hank took title to both the house and the condominium in his name alone.

In 2008, Hank executed a will leaving whatever he might own at death to Wendy. As allowed by State X law, only one witness signed the will.

In 2016, Hank and Wendy retired and moved to California. Hank conveyed the condominium to himself and to Sid, his son from a prior marriage, as joint tenants with right of survivorship, doing so as a gift to Sid. Hank then put $100,000 he obtained from an inheritance into a valid revocable trust, the income to be paid to him for life, then to Wendy for life, remainder to Sid.

In 2017, as a result of a skiing injury, Hank lost all mental capacity and was on the verge of death. In accordance with Hank's prior wishes, Sid was appointed as Hank's conservator. Sid prepared a codicil to Hank's will, giving a one-half interest in the State X house to Hank's best friend, Bill. Sid signed the codicil as conservator, and had it properly witnessed.

In 2018, Hank died. Sid found that Hank owed various creditors more than the value of the State X house and California condominium combined.

1. What rights, if any, do Wendy and Sid have in the California condominium? Discuss. Answer according to California law.

2. What rights, if any, do Wendy and Bill have in the State X house? Discuss. Answer according to California law.

3. Will Hank's creditors be able to reach the assets in the trust? Discuss.

Answer A

Community Property Basics / Overview

General Community Property Rules; Quasi-Community Property Concept

California is a community property state - a married couple is seen as forming a marital economic community (MEC) and property acquired by the couple or either spouse during the MEC (which exists from time of valid marriage until the earlier of permanent separation (which may be affected unilaterally by a spouse by the communication of the intent to permanently separate together with conduct in conformity with such intent) or death) while domiciled in CA is presumptively community property, unless it fits into specific categories of so-called "separate property". Separate property includes property acquired by either spouse prior to (or for that matter after) the MEC, or during the MEC if: (1) by gift, inheritance, or bequest; (2) as income, issue, or rents on SP; or (3) by the expenditure of SP funds (i.e., property traceable to SP).

California's system also captures so called "quasi-community property" - property that would have been CP if the couple had been domiciled in CA at the time of acquisition. QCP is treated like SP until the death (or dissolution) of the MEC, when it is subject to treatment like CP.

Default Division upon Death of Spouse; Right of Decedent Spouse to Make Will; Surviving Spouse Rights to Take Against Will

At death, in the absence of a valid will (i.e., decedent spouse dies intestate), CP and QCP owned by the decedent spouse will generally all be inherited by the surviving spouse (anywhere from 1/3 to all of decedent spouse's SP will also be inherited by surviving spouse - it would be 100% if decedent spouse left no issue or surviving parents or issue of parents; but if as here decedent spouse was survived by 1 child, then surviving spouse would take 1/2 SP)

However, a spouse may make a valid will - and CA will probate a will that was validly made pursuant to the laws of another jurisdiction where decedent spouse testator was domiciled at the time (even if the will would not be valid under CA law). However, if the will attempts to gift away CP / QCP owned by the surviving spouse, the surviving spouse can (at the cost of rejecting all gifts under the will), "take against the will" and claim all such CP / QCP (i.e., decedent testator spouse can only will away all of his SP and his 1/2 of CP / QCP without surviving spouse consent / acquiescence)

Application to Hank and Wendy

Here, Hank and Wendy were validly married in 2006 and living in State-X (a non-community property state) until 2016, when they moved to CA - Hank then died while the couple was domiciled in CA. So, all property acquired by the couple from 2006 to 2016 is generally QCP (unless it qualifies as SP - burden of proving SP would be on the SP proponent)).

Furthermore, Hank's 2008 will (which was validly made under State X law) can be probated under CA law (effect of 2017 codicil to be discussed below)

With these basics in mind, we now turn to each Q1.

California Condo

Original Characterization of Condo

When a couple ultimately is domiciled in CA at the time of death of one spouse or dissolution of the MEC, property acquired while domiciled outside of CA is QCP if it would have been CP if the couple had been domiciled in CA at the time the property was acquired. This is true even if the purported QCP is real property located in CA. Wages / salary of each spouse during the MEC are CP - and property acquired using such CP funds is also CP, regardless of whether title to the asset is taken in the name of one spouse.

Here, even though Hank took title to the condo in his own name, he used CP funds (his salary during the marriage) to purchase, so the condo would have been CP -- since the couple was domiciled in State X at the time, and Hank is dead now, it is treated as QCP.

Effect of Inter Vivos Conveyance

QCP is generally treated as the acquiring spouse's SP until the time of the acquiring spouse's death (or, irrelevant here, the dissolution of the marriage). However, that does not mean that the acquiring spouse is completely free to make inter vivos transfers of the QCP -- if the acquiring spouse transfers QCP during his life for less than fair value while retaining an income right, a right to revoke the transfer, or a right of survivorship, the other spouse has a right to clawback 1/2 of the value of the transferred QCP from the transferee.

Here, Hank transferred the QCP condo while retaining a right of survivorship - so Wendy has a right to 1/2 of the condo under this clawback rule. Sid does not have the right to own the entire condo (even that would otherwise be the result, due to the right of survivorship - if not for the QCP system, Hank's death would have extinguished his ownership rights in the condo, leaving nothing to pass by his will to Wendy, and giving Sid 100% ownership of the condo). Note that this is not "taking against the will", since this was a separate inter vivos transfer of QCP - so Wendy doesn't need to repudiate any rights under the will to assert this right to the CA condo.

2. State X House

Original Characterization of State X House

See above for rules.

Here, Hank also purchased the State X house using CP funds (his salary), so the State X house is also QCP.

Validity and Effect of 2017 Codicil

Under California law, a will can be amended, revoked or otherwise modified in whole or part by a subsequent codicil, provided it is validly executed. A validly appointed conservator can make a will or codicil for a now-disabled / incompetent person.

Here, Sid was properly appointed as conservator (when Hank become incapacitated from the skiing accident), signed the codicil, and had it properly witnessed (i.e., 2 witnesses who witness the will signing simultaneously and then sign the will) - so this a proper testamentary instrument that modifies Hank's 2008 will, even though Hank was not mentally competent. Furthermore, there are no facts that would allow Wendy to argue that Sid abused his power as conservator to improperly benefit himself. Instead he gave a gift to a close friend of Hank's, and Hank expressly designated Sid to be his conservator, so there are no "bad facts" for Wendy to attack.

Wendy's Rights

See rules above

Because the will and codicil together only dispose of 1/2 of the State X house, and provide that Wendy receives the other 1/2, Wendy has no grounds (or reason) to "take against" the will here.

3. Creditor Rights with respect to Trust Assets

Trust Basics; Characterization of Trust Res

A Trust is fiduciary relationship in respect of property, where one party - the Trustee - is given legal title to certain property by another - the Settlor / Trustor; the Trustee holds the property subject to fiduciary duties, for the benefits of certain beneficiaries, who have equitable rights in the property.

A trust requires trust property and ascertainable beneficiaries, an act of creation (including an inter vivos transfer to a Trustee) by the Settlor with the intent to create a Trust, and a Trustee with duties (who can be selected by agreement between Settlor and Trustee, or Trustee can be designated by court if Settlor does not name or intended person declines to serve as trustee). Trust must also have a valid purpose

Settlor can name self as beneficiary and can reserve right to revoke trust. Providing income to a person (including Settlor) during lifetime is a valid trust purpose.

Here, Hank created a valid trust, with himself and Wendy as successive lifetime income beneficiaries, and Sid as the remainderman beneficiary. Since he funded the Trust with inheritance, this was SP, and there is no CP issue with Hank putting the money into trust (or designating Sid as remainderman) without Wendy's consent.

Rights of Creditors to Reach Assets In Revocable Trust; Rights of Creditors to Reach Assets in Trust After it Becomes Irrevocable

When Settlor puts money or other assets into trust and reserves the rights to revoke, creditors of the Settlor can generally reach these assets. However, a trust that that is revocable inter vivos becomes irrevocable upon death.

Here, Hank's creditors could have reached the trust assets during his life - if they obtained a judgment against him, they could have moved against his various assets (including his interests in the State X House and CA Condo, for that matter). But here the creditors have not acted promptly - Hank's estate does not have an interest in the trust; Wendy has an income interest for life, and then Sid has the remainder. Accordingly, Hank's creditors cannot reach the trust res.

As discussed above, however, the State X house is owned by Hank's estate, and due to go 1/2 to Wendy and 1/2 to Bill. Creditors could presumably move against that asset.

Answer B

1. California condominium - Wendy & Sid's rights

Valid Will

A will is considered valid in California if it complies with the law of either: (i) California, (ii) the state where the will was executed, or (iii) the state of the decedent's domicile at death. H's will was executed in State X. Under the law of State X, which allowed only one witness to sign the will, the will was valid. Therefore, Hank (H)'s 2008 will is valid in California because it complied with the law of the state where it was executed (State X), even if it would not be valid under CA law, which requires two witnesses.

Community Property Law

California is a community property state. Under community property law, the marital economic community (MEC) begins with a valid marriage and ends with the death of a spouse, divorce, or permanent separation. Any property obtained during the marriage, as well as any labor and wages of the spouses during the marriage, is community property (CP). Property obtained prior to marriage, or after permanent separation, is considered separate property (SP). Property obtain by gift, inheritance or devise before or during the marriage is also considered SP. Property that is obtained with SP only will also be considered SP, because a change in form will not result in a change in characterization. Quasi-community property (QCP) is any property obtained by the spouses during marriage while living in a non-CP state, that would have been considered CP had the spouses been living in California. QCP will receive that classification on the death of the titled spouse or on divorce, prior to which the property will be governed by the law of the non-CP state. QCP will be divided on divorce just as CP is.

Hank (H) and Wendy (W) married in 2006 in State X, a non-CP state. Thus, the MEC was formed by at least 2006, when H and W were living together in State X. The California condo was bought after H and W married, thus during the marriage. Although H and W were living in a non-CP state when they bought the California condo, the property would have been considered CP had the spouses been living in California because it was obtained during the marriage. Therefore, on H's death in 2018, the condo became QCP. However, prior to H's death, H and W's rights to the condo remained governed by State X law.

H took title to both the house and the condo in his name alone. Assuming this was valid in State X, H could then transfer his interest in the property to himself and Sid during life because the property was not yet classified as QCP. However, once H died, the property became classified as QCP, and will be treated as community property for the purpose of W's rights if she elects to take her CP law share instead of taking under the terms of the will.

a) SID

Joint Tenancy

A joint tenancy is characterized as having four unities: unity of possession, unity of transfer, unity of interest, and unity of time. This means that for a valid joint tenancy to be present, the tenants must have the right to possess all of the property together, they must receive those interests in the same instrument of transfer, and in equal shares, at the same time. A right of survivorship can only be created by express language in the deed. Consideration is not necessary to transfer an interest in real property. A right of survivorship vests the entire interest in the property to the surviving tenant after the other has deceased.

H transferred the condo to himself and Sid (S) as joint tenants with right of survivorship. H created these interests at the same time in the same transfer. Therefore, assuming also H granted Sid half, and himself the other half interest in the property, H and S had a valid joint tenancy with right of survivorship, as long as H also included express language that this was to be a joint tenancy with right of survivorship.

If W decides to take under the terms of the will, instead of her intestate share, S would receive the entire interest in the property because an interest in a right of survivorship cannot be devised by will. S would own the condo in fee simple absolute as the surviving joint tenant because H's interest would vest in S upon H's death. The creditors will not be able to take the property in this case because S is not part of the MEC and not otherwise liable for H's debts.

However, if W decides to take her forced intestate share under CP law, she will be able to take the condo, but it will likely be subject to the claims of H's creditors as discussed below, because the CP is liable and the condo would be QCP, effectively treated as CP for the purposes of distribution and satisfaction of creditors.

b) WENDY

Spouse's Share

On the death of a spouse, a spouse can elect to either take under the terms of the deceased spouse's will, or take an intestate share. There is no elective share of the will in California. Rather, community property law provides for the distribution.

Electing under Community Property Law

Under California intestacy law, the spouse takes an intestate share that includes: the deceased spouse's 1/2 interest in the community property, in addition to the surviving spouse's own 1/2 interest in the CP, totaling to all of the CP. In addition, if the deceased spouse is surviving by one issue, parent, or issue of parent, the surviving spouse takes half of the deceased spouse's separate property.

H was survived by only one issue, his son, S. Therefore, if W chooses this option, W is entitled to all of the CP and half of H's SP. As discussed above and below, both the condo and the State X house will be considered QCP on H's death. Therefore, W can decide to take all of the CP, including both the State X house and the condo, as well as 1/2 of the interest in the trust as H's SP ($50,000 worth).

Under the Will

If W decides to take under the terms of the will, she will not receive any interest in the condo because it would vest entirely in S due to the right of survivorship.

Spouse's Homestead Rights

In probating a will, a spouse can petition the court to allow for a homestead for the surviving spouse, essentially allowing the spouse to continue living in the family home.

If the California condo was H and W's family home, W could petition the court to allow it as her homestead. However, if W does not take her CP share, S will have a valid interest and claim to the condo and the court would not grant the petition.

2. State X house - Wendy & Bill's rights

a) Classification as Separate Property

(i) Community Property Presumption

See rule above.

H and W bought the house during their marriage while living in a non-CP state. Therefore, the State X house will be presumed QCP on H's death, because H, the titled spouse, has died. Unless H's estate is able to rebut this presumption by a preponderance of the evidence by tracing the funds used to purchase the house to H's earnings before marriage, the State X house will be properly presumed QCP because a spouse's earnings during marriage are CP. Any property obtained with CP funds will also be considered CP.

However, a general presumption, such as the general community property presumption, can be overridden by application of a special presumption, such as those listed below. H's estate, or Bill, or both, will likely argue that the special title presumption should apply such that the court should presume the property is H's SP.

(ii) Special Community Property Presumption

W might argue, fruitlessly, that under the special community property presumption, property that is held jointly at divorce or the death of a spouse is presumed to be CP. This presumption can be rebutted by clear and convincing evidence. However, because H and W did not own either the State X house or the California condo jointly at H's death, this presumption will not apply.

(iii) Special Title Presumption

On divorce or death of a spouse, property will be presumed to be held as stated in the title. This presumption can only be rebutted by clear and convincing evidence. In California, it must be rebutted by clear language in a deed or other document that indicates the spouse's intent to hold the property as not stated in the title, such as CP.

Because the property was held only in H's name, a court will presume that this is how the spouses intended to hold the property absent clear language otherwise. Because there is no clear language in the deed or other document indicated H and W's intent to hold the property in both of their names, or as CP, W will not be able to rebut this presumption, and the property will be considered H's SP.

Thus, the court should presume that the State X house was H's SP, and therefore could be properly devised by will without W's consent or knowledge. However, if W elects to take her forced share under CA community property law, she is still entitled to 1/2 of H's SP.

b) Devised by Will as Separate Property

2017 Codicil

A prior will can be revoked in whole or in part by subsequent instrument, such as a codicil.

By a Conservator

If the testator does not have capacity to make a will, a conservator can make a will if ordered to do so by a court. A conservator has fiduciary duties towards the incapacitated person. An incapacitated person can nominate someone to serve as their conservator prior to becoming incapacitated.

H nominated S, as part of his prior wishes. Thus, the appointment of S was valid. As conservator, S was required to act in H's best interests as to the disposition and care of H's property. In accordance with this role, S executed a codicil to H's prior will. H's 2017 codicil to his 2008 will transferred a 1/2 interest in the State X house to Bill. However, S was not ordered by a court to do so. There are no facts to suggest that S's action in changing H's prior will are supported by H's likely intent, as Bill was also likely H's best friend before he became incapacitated. This codicil impliedly revoked H's prior will in part by inconsistency because the prior will left all of H's property to W, and now Bill is being given a 1/2 interest in the State X house.

If W decides to take her intestate share under CP law instead of under the will, Bill will not be granted his 1/2 interest because the State X house will be considered QCP, as discussed above.

However, if W decides to take under the terms of the will, B will receive the 1/2 interest in the State X house.

Undue Influence - Confidential Relationship

A presumption of undue influence arises when a person in a confidential relationship with the testator participates in making a will, and an unnatural devise results. W could argue that S was in a confidential relationship with H when he became incapacitated, as S owed H fiduciary duties. S participated in making the codicil because he "prepared" and signed it as conservator for H. However, S will correctly counter-argue that no unnatural devise resulted because the devise of 1/2 of the interest in the State X house to Bill was natural, since Bill was H's best friend.

Therefore, W is unlikely to succeed in convincing the court to reject the codicil on this basis.

Conclusion - W's Rights Under the Will

A remainder beneficiary takes whatever is left in the testator's estate once all other devises have been satisfied.

If W does not choose to force her share under community property law, she will not own the California condo, but she could receive the other 1/2 interest in the State X house that was not transferred to Bill. If the court finds that the codicil is unenforceable, W will receive the State X house in fee simple absolute because she is the remainder beneficiary under the will. However, it is more likely that the condo and house will be taken by H's creditors in order to satisfy H's debts. Therefore, unless some portion of the trust remains after the debts have been satisfied, H is actually likely to get nothing.

3. Hank's creditors - Ability to reach the assets in the trust

Source of the Trust: Separate property

See rule above. Because H obtained the $100,000 from an inheritance, even though he obtained it during the marriage, the $100,000 will be considered H's SP. Therefore, interests to be given in the trust were subject to H's discretion because although spouses owe each other the highest duty of good faith and fair dealing in managing and controlling community property, the same is not true of a spouse's separate property.

Liability for Debts

The MEC is liable for debts of the spouses incurred both before and during the marriage. However, the SP of a spouse will not be liable for debts incurred by the other spouse prior to the marriage.

The facts state that H owed various creditors more than the value of the State X house and California condo combined. The MEC, and hence all of the community property, will be liable to pay these debts. Furthermore, in settling an estate, creditors are paid first, and any devises will abate proportionally to satisfy the testator's debts accordingly. Therefore, the creditors will be able to obtain both the State X and the California Condo. If this is the case, the devise to Bill will not occur because it will either abate or be eliminated due to the debt.

S's interest would not be reachable, and thus the California condo would not be reachable by the creditors, because H's 1/2 interest vested automatically in S on his death. If any debt related to the condo itself, such as a mortgage, S would take on that debt.

Ability to Reach Trust

A creditor can reach the interest of a person in a trust if it is freely alienable, if the settlor retained a right to revoke the trust, or if the assets of a trust are subject to the demand of a current beneficiary.

Because H retained a right to revoke the trust, H had an interest in the trust that his creditors could reach upon his death. However, as discussed above, the MEC is also liable for the debts incurred by Hank and thus the creditors can reach the CP. If W elects to take her intestate share under CP law instead of under the terms of the will, she will be entitled to $50,000 of the $100,000 in the trust as 1/2 of H's SP. If her SP is also liable for the debts, such as if some of the debts were incurred for necessaries of life or for the benefit of the community, the creditors could reach her interest because as a life tenant, she would be entitled to payment from the trust.

Q2 Torts

Dan, a dog breeder, had some eight-week-old puppies to sell. Bob and Carol went to his house to look at them. Dan invited them into the living room where the puppies were located and said, “Whatever you do, don’t go into the room at the end of the hall.” As they were examining the puppies, the largest puppy, without warning, gave Carol a nasty bite on her hand. Dan told Bob to go to the bathroom near the end of the hall to retrieve some bandages.

Forgetting Dan’s earlier admonition, Bob opened the door at the end of the hall, thinking it was the bathroom, and entered a darkened room where Dan kept an enormous pet chimpanzee. The chimpanzee jumped between Bob and the door, beat its chest and made menacing hoots. Frightened, Bob stood still.

In attending to Carol’s bite, Dan mistakenly grabbed a bottle of heavy-duty solvent, thinking it was a bottle of antiseptic. When Dan rubbed its contents into Carol’s wound, she began to scream and shout in pain. Hearing Carol’s cries, Bob barged past the chimpanzee, which gave him a deep gash to his head as he passed. Shaken and sore from their injuries, Bob and Carol fled Dan’s house.

Bob and Carol filed a lawsuit against Dan to recover for their injuries.

1. What claims may Carol reasonably raise against Dan, what arguments may Dan reasonably make, and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

2. What claims may Bob reasonably raise against Dan, what arguments may Dan reasonably make, and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

Answer A

1. Carol v. Dan

Strict Liability - Puppy Bite

Carol could claim that Dan is strictly liable for the injuries caused by the puppy who bit her hand. The owner of a wild animal is strictly liable for any injuries caused by the animal's dangerous propensities. A puppy would likely not be considered a wild animal for strict liability purposes. However, the owner of an animal with known dangerous propensities is also strictly liable for any damages caused by the animal's dangerous propensities. An owner will not be charged with knowing the dangerous propensities unless some circumstances exist which would give him reason to know of the animal's dangerous propensities, such as a prior incident of biting. Here, Carol will argue that Dan should have known that the largest puppy had dangerous propensities. However, this is unlikely to be successful, because the facts indicate that the puppy bit Carol "without warning." Further, it is generally known that puppies have a tendency to nip and chew, but they do not bite hard enough give "nasty bites" often enough that a reasonable person would know of a dangerous propensity to give nasty bites. Thus, Carol will not succeed in showing that Dan should be strictly liable on the basis of a known dangerous propensity. Carol will need to claim for her damages under a theory of negligence.

Negligence - Puppy Bite

Prima Facie Case

Carol can claim that Dan owes her damages for her hand injuries because he was negligent in allowing her to become bitten by the puppy. A prima facie case of negligence requires a showing of duty, breach, proximate and actual causation, and damages.

Duty

Carol must prove that Dan owed her a duty of care. A duty of care is owed to all foreseeable plaintiffs. Where defendant's conduct poses a risk to the plaintiff, his duty of care will run to her. Under the majority view, a plaintiff is foreseeable if she is within the zone of danger created by the defendant's conduct. Under the minority view, a plaintiff is foreseeable if she is injured by defendant's conduct, regardless of whether she was in the zone of danger. Here, Dan's conduct was in showcasing puppies for sale in his living room. Under either test, Carol was a foreseeable plaintiff because she was in the living room, and because she was injured while present there. Thus, Dan owed Carol a duty of care. His specific standard of care is determined by the surrounding circumstances.

Standard of Care

The standard of care applicable to the defendant is based on the circumstances. The default standard of care is to act as a reasonably prudent person would under the circumstances. The defendant's standard of care can be increased based on the setting and his relationship with the plaintiff. Owners or possessors of property are subject to stricter standards of care with respect to entrants upon their property. The specifically applicable standard depends upon the nature of the entry, and the nature of the entrant. Licensees are those who enter onto the land of another with permission, for social purposes. Invitees are those who enter with permission, either to bestow an economic benefit upon the owner, or because the premises are held open to the general public. Here, Carol entered into Dan's living room, and onto his property, with Dan's permission, and for the purpose of looking at the puppies that Dan was selling. It is unclear whether Bob and Carol were looking at the puppies with the intent to potentially purchase one, but because of the nature of the setting, the intent to evaluate for purchase can probably be assumed. In any case, Dan allowed them into the living room for the purpose of potentially selling his puppies. Thus, Carol and Bob were invitees and Dan owed them the duty of care required for invitees.

A landowner's duty of care owed to a business invitee requires him to: make reasonable inspections of the premises, warn of any concealed dangers, and make the premises safe for invitees. Here, Dan allowed Carol to be bitten while she was on the premises. Dan would be required to have inspected not only his premises, but to have observed the puppies and known whether any of them had a propensity to bite. Dan would also be required to take the necessary steps to ensure that business invitees would not be bitten by any of the dogs.

Breach

A defendant breaches his duty of care by failing to live up to the requisite standard of care. Carol will argue that Dan breached his duty of care by failing to observe the dogs sufficiently to determine if any of them posed a risk to the potential buyers who would be entering onto his land. Further, Carol will assert that Dan breached his duty by failing to warn Carol that one or more of the puppies was dangerous. Additionally, Carol will claim that Dan breached his duty by failing to remove the dangerous puppies from the pen where the rest of the puppies were, and where they were available for inspection. Dan will counter that he had no reason to know, despite dutifully watching the dogs, that any of them would bite or would bite hard enough to give a "nasty bite," and further, that the dog who bit Carol did so without warning. However, because Carol was bitten on Dan's premises by Dan's dog, it is likely that Carol can demonstrate that Dan breached the duty of care owed to her as a business invitee. Indeed, Carol can demonstrate that Dan should not have allowed the dogs to be in an open pen where Bob and Carol could freely access them because there was a potential for the puppies to pose a biting risk to invitees.

Actual Cause

Actual cause, or legal cause, is determined under the "but for" test. A defendant's breach will be the actual cause of the plaintiff's injuries if the plaintiff can demonstrate that but for the defendant's breach, her injuries would not have occurred. If the court finds that Dan did indeed breach his duty of care to Carol, this test will be easily met. But for Dan's failure to warn Carol of the puppy's dangerous propensities, or failure to sufficiently observe the puppies to determine whether any of them had such propensities, as well as his failure to separate the dangerous puppy from the rest of the puppies which were available for inspection and sale, Carol would not have put her hands near the biting puppy such that she would have been bit. Indeed, even if the court finds that Dan breached his duties by leaving the puppies in an open pen where visitors could freely access the puppies, and put their hands near the puppies' mouths, but for this breach, Carol would not have been able to put her hands near the puppy's mouth and would not have been bitten. Thus, Dan's negligence was the actual cause of Carol's injuries.

Proximate Causation

The defendant's conduct will be the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries where the injuries suffered were within the increased risk created by the defendant's conduct, and were a foreseeable result of the defendant's conduct. The risk that a person would be bitten, and thus injured, was a foreseeable result of Dan's failure to adequately secure the puppies or ensure that they posed no danger to humans. Dan's failure to secure the dogs or ensure that they were not dangerous clearly created an increased risk that someone would be injured by a biting dog. Thus, Carol's injuries were a foreseeable result of Dan's alleged negligence.

Damages

Any personal injury or property damages are sufficient to support a claim of negligence. Here, Carol's hand injury will be sufficient to support her negligence claim.

In conclusion, if the court finds that Dan was negligent in his failure to ensure a safe premises for visitors who came to inspect his dogs for purchase, and as such breached his duty to business invitees, Carol can demonstrate that Dan's negligence resulted in her dog bite and as such that Dan is liable for tort damages.

Negligence - Solvent Injury

As explained above, negligence requires a showing of duty, breach, causation and damages. Here, Carol will argue that Dan is also liable for whatever increased damage she incurred as a result of Dan's mistaken cleaning of her wound with heavy duty solvent.

Duty

In general, there is no duty to act affirmatively to come to a person's aid when they are injured. However, a land owner owes a duty of aid to injured business invitees on the premises. Further, where one does begin to render aid, he is under a duty to carry out the rendition of aid reasonably. Where a rescuer acts negligently in giving aid, he will be liable for damages caused by his negligence. Here, Dan's duty of care would be to reasonably render aid.

Breach

Dan failed to act reasonably when he mistakenly cleaned Carol's wound with solvent as opposed to antiseptic. This was not reasonable even under the circumstances. Dan will argue that it was a chaotic and hectic emergency situation, and thus that he did not breach his duty of care. However, any minor inspection of the bottle presumably would have led him to realize that it was solvent, and thus Dan failed to render aid reasonably under the circumstances.

Causation and Damages

But for Dan's using solvent instead of antiseptic, Carol would not have suffered any further aggravation of her injuries. Thus, Dan's negligence was the actual cause of her aggravated injuries. Further, Dan's negligence in failing to care for Carol's wounds created an increased risk that her injuries would be aggravated, and the aggravation of her open wounds was a foreseeable result of Dan's exposing them to corrosive solvent. Thus, the element of causation will be met. As discussed above, Carol's injuries (as aggravated by the solvent) are sufficient to demonstrate damages. Dan will be liable to Carol for failing to render aid reasonably and exacerbating her injuries as a result.

Defenses-

Contributory Negligence

A plaintiff is also required to act reasonably to prevent her own injuries. Contributory negligence will bar the plaintiff from recovery if the defendant can demonstrate that the plaintiff failed to live up to her own standard of care. Here, Dan will argue that Carol was unreasonable in reaching into the puppy pen without consulting Dan as to whether the puppies were dangerous. If they are in a contributory negligence jurisdiction and the court agrees that Carol was negligent in so doing, she will be barred from recovering. However, it is unlikely that Carol was negligent in failing to inquire, because a reasonable person would not assume that puppies, especially those on open display and available for sale, posed a risk of biting such that it would cause a nasty injury. Thus, Dan will probably not succeed under a defense of contributory negligence.

Assumption of the risk

A plaintiff is similarly barred from recovering if the defendant can demonstrate that the plaintiff subjectively knew of the risk and proceeded anyway, despite that knowledge. Dan will argue that Carol knew there was a risk of being bitten in inspecting puppies. However, there is no indication that Carol knew that by inspecting the puppies she risked incurring a "nasty bite" like the one that she suffered. Dan did not warn of any such risk. Thus, Dan will likely fail to show that Carol was subjectively aware of the risk of being bitten with such severity. This defense will not succeed.

Comparative Negligence

Most jurisdictions have abandoned the harsh results of contributory negligence and assumption of the risk in favor of a comparative negligence regime. Under comparative negligence, if the jury finds that the plaintiff was at fault in causing her injuries, the jury will assign a percentage of fault to the plaintiff and her recovery will be reduced proportionately to her percentage of fault. Under pure comparative negligence, a plaintiff will still be able to recover some damages, so long as the defendant is also negligent, regardless of the percentage of fault assigned to her by the jury. Under partial comparative negligence, when the plaintiff's degree of fault exceeds a certain amount, (usually 51%), she will be barred from recovering.

Dan will argue that Carol was comparatively negligent in handling the puppies despite failing to inquire as to whether they were dangerous. As discussed above, it is unlikely that the jury will find Carol's actions to have been negligent under the circumstances. However, if the jury does so find, her recovery will be decreased accordingly.

In conclusion, Carol will likely succeed in suing Dan for damages for his negligence in failing to make his premises safe for business invitees, and for negligently tending to her wound with solvent instead of antiseptic.

2. Bob v. Dan

Strict Liability

As discussed above, the owner of wild animals is strictly liable for all injuries that occur as a result of the animal's dangerous propensities. Dan owned a chimpanzee, which is considered a wild animal. A chimpanzee's wild nature poses a risk of injury from contact inflicted by the chimpanzee. Here, the chimp inflicted a gash on Bob's head as Bob passed it. Thus, Dan will be held strictly liable for the gash that Bob suffered in moving past the chimpanzee.

Defenses

In jurisdictions that apply contributory negligence, contributory negligence is generally not a good defense to strict liability. However, recovery will be reduced according to the plaintiff's degree of fault in comparative negligence jurisdictions. Further, assumption of the risk may bar recovery under strict liability.

Dan will argue that Bob assumed the risk by entering the room that Dan had instructed him not to go into under any circumstances. However, Dan will not be able to show that Bob assumed the specific risk of the chimp attack because Dan told Bob to go into the bathroom "near the end of the hall," without any further instructions, and because Bob was not warned specifically of what was lurking in the room at the end of the hall. Indeed, a reasonable person would not know that Dan was warning of the danger lurking behind the door, a reasonable person could easily assume that Dan warned not to go into the room because it was messy, or because someone was sleeping inside. Thus, because Bob did not subjectively know there was a chimpanzee behind the door that he opened, he cannot be said to have assumed the risk of injury caused by the chimp under the circumstances.

Dan will also argue that Bob was comparatively negligent in going into the door that Dan had told Bob and Carol not to enter. Bob will counter with the fact that Dan's warning was not sufficiently serious to make Bob aware of the dangerous chimp in the room. Further Bob will argue that Dan's later instructions, to go to the bathroom "near the end of the hall" were so unclear as to nullify his prior warning. Indeed, Dan's failure to instruct Bob as to exactly which room was the bathroom will likely prevent a jury from finding that Bob acted negligently under the circumstances. Further, it was an emergency situation, so a reasonably prudent person under the circumstances would not have paused to question which door "at the end of the hall" was the bathroom and which was the one he was warned not to enter. Thus, Dan will not succeed in arguing that Bob was contributorily negligent and will be strictly liable for the damages Bob suffered.

Negligence

As discussed above, Dan owed a duty to inspect the premises, warn of any dangers, and make the premises safe, to both Bob and Carol. Bob will successfully argue that owning a vicious chimp and not securing the chimp, or warning Bob and Carol of its existence breached this duty of care. However, land owners owe no duty to business invitees where invitees exceed the scope of their invitation, i.e. by entering an area marked "do not enter," or "employees only." Dan will argue that when Bob entered the room, he exceeded the scope of his invitation because Dan had previously told both Bob and Carol not to enter the room with the chimp, "whatever [they did]."

Bob will counter that when Dan told Bob to go to the bathroom near the end of the hall, Dan's prior warning ceased to be effective. Indeed, Bob did not intend to exceed the scope of the invitation, and he was genuinely confused as to which door led to the bathroom. Dan's instructions were confusing and incomplete. Bob did not act unreasonably under the emergency circumstances in exceeding the scope of the invitation. Dan negligently failed to ensure that his premises were safe for visitors, and failed to warn Bob as to what danger lurked behind the bathroom door. Thus, Bob can also assert a successful claim for negligence against Dan.

Dan will argue the same defenses as under strict liability, with the addition of a contributory negligence defense, but for the reasons discussed above, they are unlikely to succeed.

So long as the jury does not determine that Bob exceeded the scope of his invitation, Dan will be liable for Bob's injuries under a theory of negligence. Dan will also be found liable for Bob's injuries under a theory of strict liability because a chimpanzee is a wild animal.

Answer B

1. Claims of C against D

Strict Liability

An animal owner is strictly liable for injuries caused by a domestic pet, only if the owner had prior notice of a dangerous propensity by the animal. Some jurisdictions impose strict liability on owners for dog bites. Here, C received an injury caused by the puppy in the form of a nasty bite that required medical attention. However, it does not appear that D had notice of the puppy's propensity to bite. D is selling eight week old puppies. The puppies are domestic animals. They were very young, giving little opportunity for D to notice if the puppies had any dangerous propensities. The largest puppy bit C "without warning." Thus, it is unlikely that D had notice of the puppy's tendency to bite and D will not be held liable for strict liability in a majority of jurisdictions. D may be liable in a jurisdiction that imposes strict liability on owners for dog bites.

Negligence

A negligence action requires (1) duty; (2) breach of duty; (3) causation; and (4) harm.

Dog Bite

Duty

A landowner or possessor of land has a duty to invitees to inspect for dangerous conditions and take reasonable steps to cure any concealed dangers or warn the invitee of the danger. The landowner must also carry out activities on the land with due care to invitees. In some jurisdictions, a landowner owes a reasonable duty of care to all persons who enter the property. The standard of care depends on what a reasonably prudent landowner would do under similar circumstances. A person with special knowledge or expertise must use that knowledge and skill in exercising their duty of care. Here, C and B were entering onto D's property as invitees to buy puppies that D had for sale. Thus, D owed a duty of care to C and B.

D also owed a duty of care to C and B as an animal owner. Under the majority (Cardozo) view, D has a duty to all foreseeable plaintiffs within the "zone of danger" created by D's animal ownership. Under the minority (Andrews) view, D had a duty to all plaintiffs. A person who is injured by a dog bite when interacting with a dog is a foreseeable plaintiff within the "zone of danger" of the dog's mouth. Thus, under both views, C was a foreseeable plaintiff.

Breach

Here, D had a duty of care to inspect for dangerous conditions and cure any concealed danger or properly warn C and B. The puppies were not obvious dangers, because puppies are generally considered to be "cute," friendly, and small. Here, D is a dog breeder. D must use his knowledge and skill as a dog breeder in exercising care. If D has learned that some puppies are dangerous, then D must exercise reasonable care in keeping the puppies behind a gate or in a kennel and bringing out puppies one at a time to meet potential buyers so the puppies do not become overexcited. Further, D could have warned C and B how to act around the puppies and how to take care in case the puppies do something unexpected. However, if the dog bite was truly unexpected, then D may not have breached his duty. However, the average dog breeder would likely take steps to keep the puppies calm and warn buyers of potential dangers. Thus D likely breached his duty of care.

Causation

The breach must be both the direct cause and the proximate cause to be the causation of the harm.

Direct Causation

A breach is the direct cause of an injury if the injury would not have occurred "but for" the breach. Here, C's injury would not have occurred if the puppy had been properly restrained. Thus, D's breach is the but for cause of C's injury.

Proximate Causation

Proximate causation requires that the injury not be too remote or attenuated from the breach that is the" but for" cause of the injury. For proximate causation, the harm must be of the type that is foreseeable or a natural or probable cause of the breach. Here, C was bitten by a dog. A dog bite is a foreseeable result of a dog owner's negligence.

Harm

Generally, the harm must be physical or property damage, rather than simply economic harm. Here, C suffered a physical injury in the form of a nasty bite to her hand. Thus, the element of harm is satisfied.

Negligent Rescue

See rules above re negligence cause of action.

Duty

Generally, a person has no affirmative duty to act to assist an injured person. However, a person who originally puts another in peril or who elects to assist a person in peril has a duty to assist the victim non-negligently. The rescuer must avoid any unreasonable harm to the victim by acting as a reasonably prudent person under the circumstances. Here, D arguably put C in peril by allowing her to interact with the puppies without restraints or proper warnings to C. Regardless, D elected to come to C's aid once he saw the dog bite. Thus, D owed a duty of care to C.

Breach

See rule above. Here, D grabbed a bottle of heavy duty solvent thinking it was a bottle of antiseptic and applied it to C's injuries. A reasonably prudent person would check the label before applying the chemical to C's wounds. Further, a reasonably prudent person may not have stored dangerous chemicals next to first aid agents in the first place to avoid such a situation. Thus, D did not act as a reasonably prudent person under the circumstances and breached his duty of care.

Causation

See rule above.

Direct Causation

Where there are two causes of an injury, a cause is a direct cause if it is a substantial factor in the injury. Here, C's initial injury was from the dog bite. D's application of chemical solvent to the wound caused C considerable additional pain and may cause additional damage because it is not meant to be applied to skin, let alone broken skin. Thus, D's action was a substantial factor in C's injury that satisfied direct causation.

Proximate Causation

See rule above. Here, it is foreseeable that application of chemical solvent to a wound will create extreme pain and will likely cause additional damage because it is not meant to be applied to human skin. Thus, causation was proximate.

Harm

See above. This element is satisfied.

In conclusion, C likely has a valid claim for negligence with respect to the dog bite and the subsequent negligent aid by D. C is unlikely to have a valid claim for strict liability due to the lack of notice to D of the particular puppy's dangerous tendencies, unless they are in a minority jurisdiction that holds owner's strictly liable for dog bites.

Defenses

Contributory Negligence

In a jurisdiction that applies contributory negligence, a plaintiff is barred from recovery if the plaintiff's own negligence contributed to her injury. Here, C had no warning the puppy would bite her or that she was in danger. C likely did not have an opportunity to see or object to the application of the solvent. Thus, this defense is unlikely to apply.

Comparative Negligence

In a majority of jurisdictions, the plaintiff's own negligence only reduces the plaintiff's total recovery in the case by the percentage of the plaintiff's own negligence compared to the defendant's. As noted, C likely did not contribute to her own injury. Thus, this defense is unlikely to apply.

Assumption of the Risk

A person who knowingly and voluntarily assumes the risk of her activity will be barred from recovery. In a comparative negligence jurisdiction, assumption of the risk usually only reduces the plaintiff's recovery. Here, C had no warning regarding the puppy's tendency to bite. As described above puppies are considered non-threatening to the average person. Thus, she could not have knowingly assumed the risk. This defense will fail.

Damages

A plaintiff in a tort action is entitled to damages that put them in the position they were in before the harm. Here, C will be entitled to medical expenses, pain and suffering, and lost past and future earnings if the dog bite causes her to miss work or reduces her ability to work.

2. Claims of B against D

Strict Liability

The owner of a wild animal is strictly liable for injuries cause by an unrestrained wild animal. Warnings will not suffice to prevent liability to the owner. Here, D owns a chimpanzee, a wild animal. The chimpanzee was confined to the back room in which the chimpanzee was unrestrained. Confinement to the back room is not restraining the chimpanzee because the door was not locked. As a result Bob, and probably the chimpanzee, was easily able to open the door. Thus, unless a defense applies, D will be strictly liable for the injuries the chimpanzee caused.

Negligence

See rules above. Here, D had a duty to B as a chimp owner and landowner. D breached that duty because D did not give Bob a proper warning because he simply told Bob not to go in the back room without informing him of the presence of a wild animal, which would have made more of an impression on Bob. D could have also locked the door to prevent access to the chimp. Thus, D breached his duty of care which caused B's gash by the chimp. In conclusion, D was negligent.

Defenses

Trespassers

An owner is not strictly liable for injuries by a wild animal to trespassers. Further, a landowner is generally not liable for injuries to an undiscovered trespasser. A trespasser physically invades property without the owner's consent, or exceeding the scope of the owner's consent. Here, B was told not to go into the back room, but he did so anyway. B exceeded the scope of D's consent and was therefore a trespasser. Thus, D is not liable to B because B trespassed into the back room.

Assumption of the Risk

See above. Assumption of the risk is generally not a defense to strict liability for wild animals. Further, Bob did not know about the concealed chimpanzee. Thus, this defense will not apply to either cause of action.

Contributory Negligence

See above. B went into a back room where D told him not to go. B's contribution is likely minimal, given B did not understand why he should not go into the back room. Thus, this defense is likely not to apply.

Comparative Negligence

See above.

Damages

See above.

Q3 Real Property

Lois rented a furnished apartment in her building to Tammy, a medical student, for nine months, beginning June 1. Tammy prepaid the first month's rent. When Tammy arrived at the apartment on June 1, Ralph, the prior tenant, was still there despite the fact Ralph's rental term had ended on May 15. Tammy complained to Lois and Lois was able to evict Ralph by June 15. Tammy took possession of the apartment on June 16.

The apartment above Tammy's was occupied by Coco, a member of an up-and-coming band, The Gyrations. The band's daily rehearsals interfered with Tammy's studies so much that she complained repeatedly to Lois about the continuing noise. On July 15, The Gyrations were arrested at Coco's apartment for disturbing the peace. After that Tammy was spared the noise from rehearsals.

Beginning July 16, the shower in Tammy's apartment delivered only cold water. Tammy complained, and Lois promptly hired a plumber to fix the problem. The repair only worked for a week. Tammy was too busy with her studies to tell Lois.

On August 30, Tammy's stove in her apartment stopped working. On August 31, Tammy, disgusted with all these events, knocked on Lois's door, gave the key to Lois, and said, "This place is a zoo; I wouldn't live here if you paid me!" Lois took the key and said, "Sure, okay, if that's how you feel." Tammy stopped paying rent and never returned to the apartment.

Lois commenced a lawsuit against Tammy for breach of her lease and special damages for past due and prospective rent.

What arguments may Lois reasonably raise in support of her lawsuit, what counterclaims and defenses may Tammy reasonably assert, and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

Answer A

Rights and Duties of Lois and Tammy

Duties of Landlord

In general, landlords owe tenants a duty to deliver possession. Although the traditional rule required only the delivery of constructive possession, such as by providing a key to the property, most states follow the modern rule of requiring the delivery of actual, physical possession. Lois has therefore breached this duty by failing to evict or otherwise remove Ralph, the prior tenant who became a holdover tenant after the term of his lease ended. Although Tammy was able to take possession by June 16, her lease started on June 1. Ralph's lease had ended on May 15, and Lois failed to evict him for more than two weeks before Tammy's lease began. Tammy therefore has a valid claim/defense against Lois for being constructively evicted from her apartment from June 1 through June 15. Tammy should not be liable for payment of rent during this period.

Landlords in residential leases also generally have a duty to make repairs. Even if a lease places this duty on the tenants, courts will still find that it rests with the landlord. Landlords are permitted to engage professionals to make repairs - there is no obligation that they do so themselves. Lois likely satisfied this duty with respect to the hot water issue by immediately hiring a plumber. Lois was not made aware of the faulty stove (as discussed below) and therefore could not have reasonably arranged for its repair, such that she should not be found to have violated this duty.

Please see below (implied warranty) for further discussion of repairs.

Covenant of Quiet Enjoyment

Landlords also generally are required to comply with the covenant of quiet enjoyment. This doctrine requires that landlords not interfere, or permit others (such as other tenants in a multi-unit property) to interfere, with one's right to use, possess and enjoy their possessory interest. Tammy will argue that Lois breached this covenant by permitting daily band rehearsals in the upper floor apartment, as Lois had the right to stop such rehearsals in her capacity as landlord. Although Lois may respond that Tammy suffered only because of her unique study requirements as a medical student, such that Lois did not cause or permit the Gyrations to surpass an objective level of loudness so as to interfere with Tammy's quiet enjoyment of her property, this is a failing argument because the Gyrations were all arrested in the upper apartment during a rehearsal for disturbing the peace. In general, a tenant can suffer a breach of the covenant without giving rise to an arrest for disturbing the peace, but that should be completely sufficient for Tammy's claim. Moreover, Lois was on notice of the issue because Tammy had repeatedly complained to her.

Because Lois likely breached this covenant, Tammy could seek remedies. A tenant that has suffered a breach of this covenant must give notice to the landlord to take remedial action. Failing any remedial action, the tenant is permitted to give notice of her constructive eviction and cease paying rent. See below for discussion of damages. Although Tammy may be likely to reduce her rent during this period, the grounds for constructive eviction ceased once the Gyrations were arrested.

Implied Warranty of Habitability

Residential leases only are subject to an implied warranty of habitability. This requires that the landlord deliver the property in a condition fit for ordinary residential use. This implied warranty generally requires landlords to provide electricity, heating, hot and running water. A tenant must give notice to the landlord if a breach has occurred, and they may either refuse rent during the period of breach, make repairs and deduct the costs from their rent, or vacate the premises until remedied. Here, the hot water failed in Tammy's apartment on July 16. T promptly gave notice to Lois as required, and Lois promptly hired a plumber to repair the problem. The problem, however, occurred again in one week. Again, Tammy was obligated to give Lois notice of the issue. Tammy failed in this regard because she was too busy with her studies. Because Lois was not on notice of the problem (that she reasonably would have believed had been solved the previous week), Lois should not be found to have violated the implied warranty with respect to the water.

Tammy may also allege that Lois violated the implied warranty because the stove failed. This is not as critical a failure as a lack of heating or electricity, and the implied warranty does not typically extend to include household appliances, even those useful for making food. Further, although the stove did break, Tammy never informed Lois of that fact. Rather, Tammy instead moved out the next day without mentioning the stove, such that Lois should not be found to have violated the warranty.

Duties of Tenant

In general, a tenant has two key duties: pay rent and not commit waste. Lois may bring a claim against Tammy on both grounds.

Waste

First, Lois may argue that Tammy committed waste by failing to inform her of the second time the hot water failed. There are three types of waste: affirmative (tenant intentionally destroys or reduces value of property), permissive (tenant's negligence causes damage or otherwise reduces value of property), and ameliorative (tenant alters the property, even in an economically valuable way, without landlord's permission). Here, Lois may claim that Tammy committed permissive waste because Tammy was aware that the hot water did not work but did not take any steps to inform Lois or otherwise fix the issue because she was too busy. Her alleged negligence may cause potential and ongoing problems with the water if it remains unfixed. Lois may therefore seek damages to satisfy this waste claim.

Rent

As noted, a tenant has the duty to pay rent. As discussed above, however, there are instances in which a tenant may refuse to pay, reduce, or otherwise withhold (such as in an escrow account) rent.

General

The facts indicate that Lois and Tammy entered into a lease or tenancy for years. Despite its name, this lease is simply a lease for a fixed period, such as nine months in this case. (Leases, because they are interests in real property, must generally be in writing to satisfy the statute of frauds even if under one year in length). This lease is different from a periodic lease, such as month-to-month, because it has a definite end-point that the parties have agreed upon.

Termination of Lease

A tenancy for years will automatically terminate at the expiration of its term. Continued tenancy following the lease can give rise to a periodic tenancy or a holdover tenancy. A lease can also terminate through an action for eviction or by mutual agreement of the parties. Here, Tammy will allege that the lease terminated instead on August 31. Tammy will assert that because she made evident her desire to end the lease by saying the "place was a zoo" in which she could not be "paid" to live, and because Lois responded by saying "sure, okay" and taking back the key, the parties mutually agreed to terminate the lease on August 31. Lois may aver that her expression was not an affirmative agreement to end the lease but rather a surprised reaction to "how [Tammy] feels," such that the lease should not be viewed as terminated. But in light of Tammy's express statement that she would not continue living there and turning over the key, Lois's actions may be seen as an agreement by silence, such that any reasonable landlord would challenge it if they wanted to. Because Tammy stopped paying rent and never returned to the apartment, she will argue that she does not owe any more rent. Regardless of the ultimate disposition of Tammy's defense, Lois is required to mitigate damages by taking reasonable steps to rent out the property once Tammy leaves, but Lois will not be responsible if she cannot find a suitable renter after taking reasonable steps.

Damages

As discussed above, Tammy was within her rights to withhold rent because of her constructive eviction during Ralph's holdover tenancy. Tammy would then be responsible for rent from June 16 onward. But because Tammy also has a valid claim for breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment from June 16 through July 15. Tammy's rent obligations would thus begin on July 15 instead. Tammy would not have a claim to breach of the implied warrant with respect to the water or stove as discussed, so her obligation to pay rent would continue from July 15 through the end of her lease. The lease ended at earliest on August 31 as discussed above. But because Tammy paid only one month's advance rent, she is still at least a half-month behind in her rental payment. Further, Tammy's claim to being constructively evicted appears either irrelevant or moot on August 31: the hot water does not work likely as a result of Tammy failing to inform Lois; Tammy never gave notice to Lois about the stove; and the issue with the Gyrations stopped more than a month previously. Tammy's constructive eviction claim has been resolved after which she continued living in the apartment, and Tammy has no other grounds to terminate the lease. But if the lease is found to have mutually terminated, Lois can still claim back rent but not prospective rent.

Answer B

Lois's Claim Against Tammy

Type of Lease

A term of years lease is one that terminates on a specific date.

Here, the lease was for a specific nine month period starting on June 1. This makes it a term of years lease.

Duties of Tenant

In a term of years lease, the tenant is obligated to pay rent for the period of the lease unless that duty is relieved by some breach of duty by the landlord. Traditionally, the duties under a lease were independent of each other such that a breach of one duty would not relieve the other of their obligations. However, modernly, the duties under a lease are dependent on each other. Therefore, if the landlord breaches her duties under a lease, that may relieve the tenant of her obligation to continue paying rent. If, however, the tenant breaches her duty without an appropriate reason, the landlord is entitled to damages for the unpaid rent for the remainder of the lease term, subject to the landlord's duty to mitigate losses by re-letting the premises.

Here, Lois will argue that Tammy breached the lease improperly and without justification and therefore, Tammy is liable to Lois for the rent for the remainder of the lease term. Tammy paid rent for three months until her abandonment of the lease on August 30. This would leave a remaining 6 months of rent that Tammy would owe to Lois.

Surrender

When a tenant breaks a lease and surrenders, it generally must be in writing if the lease term was over 1 year. Because this lease was for only nine months, the surrender did not need to be in writing.

When a tenant surrenders the lease, and the landlord accepts the surrender, the landlord owes a duty to mitigate losses. Here, Lois responded to Tammy's surrender by stating, "sure, ok, if that's how you feel." This would imply acceptance of the surrender, and would obligate Lois to mitigate her damages by attempting to re-let the premises.

Tammy's Defenses

Tammy's duty to pay rent for the remainder of the term may be mitigated or eliminated if she can show that Lois breached her duties under the lease.

Duties of Landlord

Duty of Possession

A landlord owes a duty to deliver possession of the premises to the tenant. Traditionally, this simply required providing the right to possession, but not actual possession. However, modernly, the landlord is required to deliver actual possession of the property and is required to remove any holdover tenants prior to the commencement of the lease.

Here, Lois did not provide possession of the premises at the beginning of the lease. Instead, Ralph was in possession of the property at commencement of the lease. Lois did finally remove Ralph 15 days later and Tammy was able to possess the premises. Technically, Lois was in violation of her duties under the lease by failing to provide possession. This could have given Tammy the opportunity to break the lease, however, she did not pursue this action.

Duty to repair

Generally, there is no general duty of a landlord to repair or maintain the property. However, there are special duties in relation to the duty of habitability and quiet enjoyment as discussed below which may create a duty to repair.

Implied Warranty of Habitability

In every residential lease, a landlord owes an implied duty of habitability to make the premises suitable for human habitation.

Here, Tammy may be able to establish that Lois breached this duty when the shower started delivering only cold water, or when the stove stopped working. However, it is unlikely that either of these issues would render the apartment unsuitable for human habitation. In addition, when Tammy notified Lois of the shower issue, she promptly sent a plumber to fix the problem. And, when the fix did not work, Tammy failed to notify Lois again of the issue.

With regard to the stove, Tammy never notified Lois of the problem so she had no opportunity to repair

Because the issues were minor and likely did not render the facility unsuitable for human habitation, and because Tammy failed to pursue the issue and notify Lois of the continuing problems, it is unlikely that a court would find that Lois was in breach of the warranty of habitability in such a way that it would allow Tammy to terminate payment of rent.

If, a court did find these issues to be sufficient, however, Tammy's obligation to pay rent may have been terminated, or Tammy could have remained and sued for the cost or repair, or withheld the cost of repair from her rent.

Implied Warrant of Quiet Enjoyment

Implied in every lease is a warranty of quiet enjoyment where the landlord will not disturb the tenant from their ability to use and enjoy the property. A breach of this covenant may exist when the landlord fully or partially evicts the tenant, or if the landlord fails to repair a condition that significantly impairs the tenant's ability to use and enjoy the property.

Constructive Eviction

There are no facts to show that there was an actual eviction of Tammy, such that Lois prevented Tammy from using all or part of the property. However, Tammy may argue constructive eviction under two theories. Constructive eviction exists when 1) there is a wrongful action by the landlord such as a breach of duty, 2) the tenant timely notifies the landlord of the issue, 3) the breach or issue significantly interferes with the tenant's use and enjoyment of the property, and 4) the tenant abandons the property.

The Band

First, Tammy may argue that the band practices of The Gyrations significantly interfered with her use and enjoyment of the property because the practices interfered with her ability to study. However, it is unlikely that Tammy will succeed on this claim because, although Tammy complained repeatedly about the issue to Lois, it is not totally apparent that Lois breached her duty to Tammy. The band was removed from the premises only one month after Tammy moved in. It is not immediately clear whether their removal was instituted by Lois or another tenant. However, it is not immediately clear from the facts that Lois failed to heed Tammy's complaints about the band. In addition, even though the band interfered with her use and enjoyment of the property, Tammy failed to abandon the property at the time. She did not abandon the property until a month and a half later, after the band had been removed and her enjoyment was no longer disturbed.

Therefore, it is not likely that Tammy can show constructive eviction due to the band's noise because she did not abandon the property in a sufficient time, and the issue was remedied shortly after it began.

Issues in the Apartment

Second, Tammy may assert constructive eviction due to Lois's lack of repairs of the issues in the apartment which substantially interfered with her use and enjoyment of the property. However, this theory is also not likely to succeed because, as discussed above, Tammy failed to notify Lois of the fact that the shower continued not to work, or that the stove was broken. When the stove stopped working, she simply moved out without notifying Lois or giving her an opportunity to fix the issue. Without proper notice, Lois could not have breached her duty to Tammy because she did not know of the issue.

Because there was lack of notice and lack of a breach of duty by Lois, it is unlikely that Tammy will succeed on a claim of constructive eviction against Lois.

Lois's Damages

Here, the damages to which Lois is entitled are based on her duty to mitigate. Contract damages must be causal, foreseeable, certain, and unavoidable. Under a lease contract, the landlord owes a duty to mitigate damages by re-letting the premises. In addition, the landlord is only entitled to those damages that are certain and unavoidable.

Therefore, Tammy should not be liable for any future rent on the premises if Lois was able to re-let the premises to someone else in order to mitigate her damages, and she definitely is not liable for any prospective rent that she did not owe under the lease because those prospective rent damages were not foreseeable from the lease contract. In addition, the prospective rent damages are likely not certain.

The facts do not indicate whether Lois attempted to re-let the premises. However, if she failed to do so, Tammy may assert this as a defense in order to reduce the damages that she owed to Lois under the lease.

Statute of Frauds

The statue of frauds requires that contracts creating interests in land, including leases over one year, must be in writing.

Because this lease is for nine months, it is not subject to a statue of frauds defense. Therefore, if it was not in writing, this defense could not be asserted.

Q4 Evidence / Civil Procedure

Dave is domiciled and owns a house in California on the state line adjacent to Petra's house in Nevada. Petra is domiciled in Nevada.

Dave installed a large rainwater tank near the property line, which leaked. One day, the water tank fell over onto Petra's property, landing on her retaining wall, which buckled. Petra sued Dave for negligence in federal court seeking $100,000 to replace the retaining wall, claiming it failed because the water tank, weakened by leaks, landed on it.

At the jury trial, Petra testified that she had complained to Dave several times over the prior decade that the water tank leaked and that he had done nothing. She also testified that the retaining wall was only a couple of years old.

Petra then called Walt, a water tank repairman, who testified that when he repaired Dave's water tank after it fell over, Dave instructed him to caulk all the joints so that it wouldn't leak. Petra rested her case.

Dave called Gwen, Petra's gardener, who testified that she had met with Petra the day before the water tank fell and, while they inspected the retaining wall at issue, she saw it was old and had structural cracks that could cause it to fail, pointed this out to Petra, and told her that it would cost at least $100,000 to replace it. Gwen testified that Petra had replied, "You're right. It's at least 30 years old."

The jury returned a verdict in favor of Petra and awarded her $20,000 in damages. Dave filed a motion to dismiss based on lack of subject matter jurisdiction, which was denied. Dave properly appealed the verdict.

Assume all appropriate objections and motions were timely made.

1. Should the court have admitted:

    A. Petra's testimony about her complaints to Dave about the leaks? Discuss.

    B. Walt's testimony that Dave instructed him to caulk all the joints so that the water tank wouldn't leak? Discuss.

C. Gwen's testimony

i) That the retaining wall was old? Discuss.

ii) That the retaining wall had structural cracks that could cause it to fail and that it would cost $100,000 to replace it? Discuss.

D. Gwen's testimony about Petra's reply, "You're right. It's at least 30 years old." Discuss.

2. Did the court properly deny Dave's motion to dismiss based on lack of subject matter jurisdiction? Discuss.

Answer all questions according to federal law.

.

Answer A

A.) PETRA'S TESTIMONY ABOUT HER COMPLAINTS TO DAVE

In order to be properly admitted all evidence must be relevant and not be excluded under the Federal Rules of Evidence.

RELEVANCE

All evidence must be logically and legally relevant. Logical relevance means that the evidence tends to make a material fact more or less likely. Legal relevance refers to a judge’s discretion to exclude evidence if its probative value substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice, confusion to the jury, or unreasonable delay.

Here, the evidence is relevant because the issue in the case is whether Dave was negligent in maintaining the water tank that landed on Petra's retaining wall. Petra also contends that the failure of the water tank was due to leaks. The fact that she notified him of the leaking would tend to make it more likely that Dave was negligent in not repairing the tank before it fell. Thus, the evidence is logically relevant. There also does not appear to be any obvious risk of unfair prejudice to the defendant, so it would not be excluded under legal relevance balancing.

HEARSAY

Hearsay is an out of court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. This applies even to the testifying witness's own statements if they were made out of court. If a statement offered by a witness is offered to prove something other than the truth of the matter asserted, it will be admitted as non hearsay. Otherwise, if it is hearsay, it must fall within an exception to be admissible.

Here, Petra is testifying that she had complained to Dave several times over a decade that the water tank leaked. If offered to prove that the tank did in fact leak, then it would be hearsay and would need to fall under an exception. However, if it is not offered for that purpose, it may be admissible for the other limited purpose.

EFFECT ON THE LISTENER

Statements offered to show the effect on the listener are classified as non hearsay under the FRE. However, the defendant has a right to request a limiting instruction so that the jury does not use the statement to prove the truth of the matter asserted (i.e. inadmissible hearsay).

Here, Petra's complaints can be offered to show that Dave knew about something and did not act in response; thus it is offered to show the effect it had on Dave.

CONCLUSION

Therefore, the testimony is admissible for this purpose and if Dave requested a limiting instruction, it should have been granted. The court did not err in admitting this testimony.

B.) WALT'S TESTIMONY THAT DAVE INSTRUCTED HIM TO CAULK THE JOINTS SO THAT THE WATER WOULDN'T LEAK

RELEVANCE

See rule above. Here the testimony is relevant because it tends to make it more likely that there was problems with the water tank and that Dave requested to have the leaking joints repaired. There also does not appear to be any significant risk of unfair prejudice here. Thus, the evidence is relevant.

HEARSAY

See rule above. Here, Walt is testifying regarding what Dave said to him in requesting repair of the water tank after it fell over. It is being offered to prove that the water tank was in fact leaking, which is at issue in the case. Therefore, it is hearsay and must fall within an exception.

PARTY ADMISSION

A statement by a party opponent is admissible as a hearsay exemption when offered against that party. Here, Dave is a party opponent and his statements are being used against him in this testimony. Thus, the party admission exemption would apply.

SUBSEQUENT REMEDIAL MEASURES

There is a public policy exclusion for evidence of subsequent remedial measures taken when offered to show fault. Here, Dave's statements ordering Walt to caulk the joints so that it wouldn't leak after the water tank fell over onto Petra's property is evidence of a subsequent remedial measure taken in order to show fault. Thus, it should be excluded under the public policy exclusion.

CONCLUSION

The court erred in allowing Walt's testimony, as it should have been excluded as evidence of a subsequent remedial measure.

C.) GWENS TESTIMONY

i) TESTIMONY THAT THE RETAINING WALL WAS OLD

RELEVANCE

See rule above. Here the evidence is relevant because it tends to make show that the wall was old and fell due to that, rather than due to Dave's negligence. As with the previous evidence, there does not appear to be a risk of unfair prejudice that the judge should have determined inadmissibility based on those grounds.

EXPERT WITNESS TESTIMONY

In order to properly admit testimony as expert witness testimony, the following must be met: (i) it must be helpful to the jury, (ii) the expert must be qualified in the field, (iii) the expert must have a proper factual basis, (iv) and the expert must have used reliable methods and applied them reliably.

Here, Gwen is a gardener who is testifying about her inspection of the retaining wall with Petra. While the testimony would be helpful to the jury in determining whether the wall fell due to its age, it is unlikely that Gwen can meet the other requirements to qualify as an expert witness. There is no evidence offered that shows that Gwen had a proper factual basis for her testimony, nor that she is qualified in determining the age of the wall. Thus, the testimony would not be properly admitted as expert witness testimony.

LAY WITNESS TESTIMONY

In order for a witnesses testimony to qualify as lay witness opinion testimony, it must be (i) helpful to the jury, (ii) be reasonably ascertainable based on the perceptions of a layperson, and (iii) not based on any scientific fact or specialized knowledge.

Here, Gwen is stating that she saw the wall was old. This is helpful for determining the quality of the wall and whether the wall fell due to its age or Dave's negligence. The age of a wall would be reasonably ascertainable by an average person, as plenty of signs can signal a wall's age, such as cracks, or growth of ivy, and the like. The opinion does not appear to be based on any specialized knowledge. Thus, it is lay witness testimony.

CONCLUSION

The court properly admitted the testimony regarding the wall's age as lay witness testimony.

ii) TESTIMONY THAT THE WALL HAD STRUCTURAL CRACKS AND IT WOULD CAUSE $100,000 TO REPLACE IT

RELEVANCE

See rule above. Here, the testimony is relevant for the same reasons as the testimony regarding the age of the wall above. Thus, it is relevant.

EXPERT WITNESS TESTIMONY

See rule above. Here, again, Gwen does not appear to have the qualifications to be able to speak authoritatively on the structural soundness of the wall or the price to repair it. If Gwen was in fact a builder of retaining walls, then she would be qualified. However, this qualification was not established in the facts given.

Therefore, Gwen likely doesn't qualify as a proper expert witness on these issues.

LAY WITNESS TESTIMONY

See rule above. Here, Gwen's testimony is helpful for the same reasons as the age of the wall. However, the structural soundness of the wall and the cost to replace it are not matters that would be reasonably ascertainable by a layperson. If this perception was in fact based on some kind of specialized knowledge, that it definitely does not qualify as lay witness testimony.

CONCLUSION

The court erred in admitting the testimony regarding that structural cracks and cost to replace the wall, as a proper factual and qualification basis was not established for expert testimony and it does not qualify as admissible lay witness testimony.

A. GWEN'S TESTIMONY ABOUT PETRA'S REPLY TO HER

RELEVANCE

See rule above. Here, the testimony is relevant as it tends to discredit Petra as a witness since she claimed in her testimony that the wall was only a couple of years old. It also tends to prove that the wall was in fact old, which could have led to its collapse and would reduce Dave's liability in negligence. There does not appear to be any risk of unfair prejudice. Thus, the evidence is relevant.

HEARSAY

See rule above. Here, the testimony regarding Petra's statement, if offered to prove both the age of the wall and that Petra knew the wall was old and needed replacing, would be hearsay as it would be offered to prove the matter asserted. Thus, it must fall under an exemption or exception, or be used for a non hearsay purpose.

PARTY ADMISSION

See rule above. Here, Petra admitting that the wall was old is being offered against her by the defendant. Thus, it would be admissible under this exemption to hearsay.

PRIOR INCONSISTENT STATEMENT

A witness can be impeached based on prior inconsistent statements, however, the witness must be available and they must be given a chance to explain the statement.

Here, Petra is an available witness who testified that the water tank was only a couple of years old. The statement she said to Gwen is inconsistent with this statement. However, since the other statement was not given under oath, it cannot be used for substantive purposes. It can only be offered for the limited purpose of impeachment. However, the statement falls under a party admission, so it can be admissible for both.

CONCLUSION

The court properly admitted the testimony regarding Petra's statement as a party admission and an impeachment based on a prior inconsistent statement.

2) MOTION TO DISMISS BASED ON LACK OF SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION

A party can file a motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction at any time. In order to determine whether the motion was denied improperly, it must be determined whether the court, in fact, had subject matter jurisdiction over the case at issue.

SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION

In order for a federal court to have subject matter jurisdiction, it must either have federal question jurisdiction or diversity jurisdiction.

Federal Question Jurisdiction

Federal question jurisdiction exists when the claim arises out of federal law, including Constitutional rights, treaties, and the like. Here, the claim is based on negligence which is based on state tort law. Thus, federal question jurisdiction is not present and there must be diversity jurisdiction in order to hear the case.

Diversity Jurisdiction

Diversity jurisdiction requires (i) complete diversity between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and (ii) an amount in controversy exceeding $75,000.

Complete Diversity

Complete diversity means that each plaintiff is a resident of a different state than each defendant. Residency is determined by domicile which is shown by a physical presence in a state and an intent to remain there.

Here, Dave is domiciled and owns a house in California. Although it is on the state line, the facts state that it is in fact in California, thus he is a California resident for the purposes of diversity. Petra is domiciled in Nevada.

Thus, there is complete diversity between the plaintiff and the defendant.

Amount in Controversy

The amount in controversy must exceed $75,000. This only requires that it be legally plausible that the defendant could receive those damages based on the injury. The actual amount of damages awarded has no bearing on whether the amount in controversy is satisfied for purposes of diversity jurisdiction.

Here, the amount in controversy is $100,000. There appears to be evidence supporting the legal plausibility of this claim, given that Petra's gardener stated that it would cause $100,000 to replace to retaining wall when called by Dave on the stand. Given that there is no reason to doubt that there is a legal plausibility of Petra's claim, the amount in controversy is also satisfied.

CONCLUSION

The court properly denied Dave's motion to dismiss based on lack of subject matter jurisdiction, as the federal court had diversity jurisdiction over the claim.

Answer B

1A. PETRA'S TESTIMONY

Relevance

All evidence must be logically and legally relevant to be admissible. Evidence is logically relevant if it has any tendency to prove or disprove a material fact. Otherwise relevant evidence may be excluded for lack of legal relevance, where its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, waste of time, or confusing the jury. Here, Petra's testimony that she had complained to Dave several times over the prior decade that the water tank had leaked and that he had not done anything is relevant because it makes it more likely that Dave was negligent in not repairing the water tank. Therefore, the testimony is relevant.

Personal Knowledge

A witness must have personal knowledge regarding what the witness wishes to testify to. Here, Petra has personal knowledge because she is testifying to what she has observed and commented on to her neighbor, Dave. Thus she has sufficient personal knowledge.

Hearsay

Hearsay is an out of court statement made by a declarant, and offered in court to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Generally, hearsay is inadmissible, unless it is not offered for its truth, qualifies for an exemption, or an exception. Here, Petra is offering evidence that she had "complained" to Dave several times over the prior decade. If offered to show the truth of the matter asserted, namely that she did in fact complain to Dave, then the testimony is hearsay and will not be admissible, unless an exception applies.

Non-Hearsay Purpose - Notice

An otherwise hearsay statement may qualify as non-hearsay if offered to show the effect on the listener or the declarant's state of mind. Here, Petra will argue that she is offered the evidence to show the effect on Dave, namely that he had notice that the water tank had been leaking. As such, the evidence is admissible as non-hearsay to show the effect on the listener.

Admission

An admission constitutes an exemption to the hearsay rule and is considered non-hearsay. An admission is a statement by a party and offered in court against that party. Here, Petra may argue that the statement is an admission. However, Petra is the declarant and the evidence is not being offered against her. Therefore, the statement would not constitute an admission.

Conclusion

Petra's testimony is likely admissible as non-hearsay to show the effect on the listener.

1B. WALT'S TESTIMONY

Relevance

Walt's testimony is relevant because it has a tendency to prove that Dave's water tank did in fact fall over, and that it had previously leaked. Therefore, the testimony is relevant.

Personal Knowledge

Walt has personal knowledge because he is testifying to what Dave told him. Therefore, he has sufficient personal knowledge.

Public Policy - Subsequent Remedial Measure

As public policy, generally evidence of subsequent remedial measures are not permitted, except to show ownership or where the defendant has claimed that there was no way to make something more safe. Here, Petra would like to admit into evidence Dave's instruction for Walt to caulk all the joints so that it wouldn't leak, which is likely evidence of a subsequent remedial measure showing that it did in fact leak before. There is no dispute that Dave owned the water tank. Additionally, there is no evidence that Dave has testified or asserted that the water tank was as safe as possible. As such, none of the exception would apply and Walt's testimony that Dave instructed him to caulk the joints would be inadmissible for public policy reasons.

Hearsay

This testimony constitutes hearsay because Walt is testifying to what Dave told him when he was repairing the water tank. The testimony is likely offered to show that Dave did in fact instruct Walt to caulk all the joints, so therefore, unless an exemption or exception applies, this testimony will be inadmissible.

Admission

An admission constitutes an exemption to the hearsay rule and is considered non-hearsay. An admission is a statement by a party and offered in court against that party. Here, Walt is testifying as to what Dave - the declarant and defendant - said outside of court. Petra is offering the statement against Dave in court. Thus, the statement would be permitted as an admission of a party opponent.

Conclusion

While the statement qualifies as an admission, since it constitutes a subsequent remedial measure, the court would not admit Walt's testimony.

1C. GWEN'S TESTIMONY

Retaining Wall Was Old

Relevance

Gwen's testimony that the retaining wall was old is relevant because it has a tendency to prove that the wall was not only a couple years old, and that it is possible that the water tank was not the reason for the wall failing. Thus, the evidence is relevant.

Personal Knowledge

Gwen has personal knowledge because she is testifying as to what she told Petra, and what she observed when she was at Petra's house. Therefore, Gwen has sufficient personal knowledge.

Lay Opinion

A lay witness is permitted to give opinion testimony which is helpful to the trier of fact, and not based on scientific or specialized knowledge. Here, Gwen seeks to testify that she noted that the retaining wall was old. This is helpful to the trier of fact because it would help the trier determine whether the falling of the water tank was the cause in fact of the failure of the retaining wall. Additionally, an observation that a wall is old, while an opinion, is not based on scientific or specialized knowledge because it is simply an observation that any person could make. As such, Gwen will be permitted to testify that the wall was old.

Retaining Wall Structural Cracks

Relevance

Gwen's testimony regarding the retaining wall having structural cracks is relevant because it has a tendency to prove that the wall did not fail simply because the water tank fell on it. Therefore, the testimony is relevant.

Personal Knowledge

As discussed above, Gwen has personal knowledge because she is testifying to what she observed and what she told Petra. Therefore, she has sufficient personal knowledge.

Lay Opinion Testimony

A lay witness may give opinion testimony where it is helpful to the trier of fact, and not based on scientific or specialized knowledge. Here, the testimony that the wall had "structural cracks" that could cause it to fall and that it would cost $100,000 to replace, is not something a lay witness would be permitted to testify to because whether a retaining wall has structural cracks, and the amount to replace is based on specialized knowledge. Therefore, for this testimony to be admissible, Gwen would need to be qualified as an expert witness.

Expert Witness Testimony

To qualify expert witnesses, the federal courts use the Daubert standard, which requires that the expert have sufficient expertise and training, rely on commonly used treatises and materials relied on in that field, and that the expert's opinion is based on such knowledge. Here, Gwen is a gardener and therefore, it is unlikely that Gwen would be qualified as an expert to render an opinion on structural integrity of retaining walls and the cost to replace them because that is outside of the knowledge and purview of a gardener. While a gardener may have a working knowledge of retaining walls based working around them or with them, it is unlikely such experience would qualify Gwen as an expert witness. Thus, Gwen would not be qualified as an expert witness.

Conclusion

Since Gwen does not qualify as an expert witness, she will not be permitted to testify as to her opinion that the retaining wall had structural cracks and would cost $100,000 to replace. As such, Gwen's testimony regarding those issues would be inadmissible.

1D. GWEN'S TESTIMONY ABOUT PETRA'S REPLY

Relevance

Gwen's testimony that the Petra said the retaining wall was 30 years old is relevant because it has a tendency to prove that the wall was not only a few years old, as Gwen had testified, and that it was susceptible to damage because it was old. Thus, the testimony is relevant.

Personal Knowledge

Gwen has personal knowledge because she is testifying as to what Petra said to her. Therefore, Gwen has sufficient personal knowledge.

Hearsay

Gwen seeks to testify as to what Petra told her, which is hearsay, and is likely offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, namely that the wall is in fact old. Thus, to be admissible, the statement must qualify for an exemption or an exception.

Admission

Here, the statement was made by Petra, a party, and is being offered against Petra in court. Therefore, the statement qualifies as an admission of a party opponent and will be admissible substantively.

Impeachment - Prior Inconsistent Statement

A party may be impeached with a prior inconsistent statement. Here, Petra had testified in court that the wall was only a couple of years old. Thus, Gwen's testimony that Petra told her it was at least 30 years old, is admissible as a prior inconsistent statement to impeach Petra's testimony.

Conclusion

Gwen's testimony regarding Petra's statement will be admitted to impeach and substantively to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

2. DAVE'S MOTION TO DISMISS BASED ON LACK OF SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION

The issue is whether the court properly denied Dave's motion to dismiss based on lack of subject matter jurisdiction. A motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction should be granted where the court lacks subject matter jurisdiction. A federal court must have subject matter jurisdiction to hear a case. Federal courts are courts of limited subject matter jurisdiction, and are authorized to hear federal questions, or diversity of citizenship cases. A federal question is a cause of action which arises under federal law. A diversity of citizenship case is where the plaintiff is completely diverse from all defendants, and the amount of controversy exceeds $75,000, exclusive of interests and costs. An individual's citizenship for diversity purposes is based on their domicile, or where the individual is physically present with the subjective intent to remain.

Timing

A motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction can be brought at any time, including for the first time on appeal. Here, Dave brought the motion after the jury rendered the verdict. While a claim of lack of subject matter jurisdiction is not barred, the proper remedy would be to base the appeal on lack of subject matter jurisdiction, since the jury had already rendered the verdict. However, as discussed below, the court had proper subject matter jurisdiction, so the motion to dismiss was properly denied, regardless.

Federal Question

Here, the claim is for negligence, so there is no federal question.

Diversity of Citizenship

As noted, all plaintiffs must be diverse, or of different domiciles, from all defendants. Here, Petra is domiciled in Nevada. Dave is domiciled in California. Therefore, Petra and Dave are of different domiciles and are completely diverse.

Amount in Controversy

The amount in controversy must exceed $75,000, exclusive of interests and costs, based on the plaintiff's well-pleaded complaint. Here, Petra has plead $100,000 in damages, which exceeds $75,000. It does not affect the amount in controversy where the recovery is less than $75,000, as long as the amount was plead in good faith. Therefore, the amount in controversy element has been met.

Since Petra and Dave are completely diverse, and the amount in controversy is met, the action qualifies for diversity of citizenship jurisdiction. As such, the federal court had proper subject matter jurisdiction and the court properly denied Dave's motion to dismiss based on lack of subject matter jurisdiction.

Q5 Professional Responsibility

Attorney Anne shared a law practice with Kelly representing professional athletes. In the past Kelly represented professional athlete Player, but Kelly was disbarred several months ago. Kelly immediately resigned from the firm, and was re-hired by Anne as a litigation support clerk. Anne now represents Player.

Player is currently involved in a dispute with the professional team that employs him. Despite a valid and enforceable contract, Player refused to play because he wanted to re-negotiate his salary. The team obtained a preliminary injunction requiring Player to play under the terms of his current contract. Player sent Kelly an email asking for advice as to his next move.

Kelly referred Player to Anne who told Player to ignore the court order and to continue to refuse to play. To put pressure on the team to re-negotiate Player's contract, Anne also called the team owner, and implied that she could file a discrimination complaint against the team with a federal administrative agency that handles civil rights matters. Anne and Kelly agreed that there wasn't really a basis to file this complaint.

After the team refused to re-negotiate Player's contract, Anne filed a counterclaim drafted primarily by Kelly so as to "get the team owner's attention" for "tortious interference with contractual relations."

As part of the civil lawsuit, the team owner (Owner) was deposed. Before the deposition, Kelly drafted questions for Anne to ask Owner. During the deposition, Kelly sat next to Anne and passed her notes with further suggested questions for Owner.

What ethical violations, if any, has Anne committed? Discuss.

Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

Answer A

The issue is whether Anne committed any ethical violations. Based on the facts, Anne has in fact committed several violations.

Hiring and Use of Kelly's Services

Under both the ABA and California rules, a lawyer may not assist another in the unauthorized practice of law. This rule extends to the hiring and employment of disbarred attorneys. Here, Anne engaged in several activities involving Kelly, who was disbarred several months ago. Thus, these actions must be examined to determine whether Anne violated any ethical obligations.

Hiring of Kelly.

A lawyer may employ a disbarred lawyer as a clerk or paralegal to assist in certain activities that do not involve the practice of law, However, the lawyer must take care to prevent the disbarred attorney from conducting activities that constitute the unauthorized practice of law. For example, a disbarred attorney can conduct research, draft documents reviewed and supervised by the lawyer, and conduct other administrative tasks such as communicating with the client concerning billing. The disbarred lawyer may not engage in counseling of the client, appear before any tribunal, or communicate with the client or adversaries concerning substantive matters that constitute the practice of law.

Here, Kelly previously shared a law practice with Anne but, after being disbarred, Kelly resigned from the firm (as required). Anne hired Kelly as a litigation support clerk. There is nothing inherently improper about Anne's hiring of Kelly. However, under the California rules, where a lawyer retains a disbarred attorney as an employee, the lawyer must notify the state bar of the employment, as well as the client. Here, there are no facts indicating that Anne notified the bar that Kelly was employed by Anne, or disclosed to Player that Anne had retained a disbarred attorney to perform clerical duties. To the contrary, Player appears to have believed that Kelly was still a lawyer because he emailed Kelly for advice regarding the preliminary injunction. Anne should not have permitted Kelly to communicate with Player directly about substantive legal advice, although it appears that Kelly properly referred Player to Anne to answer his question. Nevertheless, Anne should have made it clear to Player that Kelly was disbarred and that all substantive communications should be directed to Anne.

Therefore, although Anne's retention of Kelly did not itself constitute an ethical violation, Anne failed to notify the bar and the client of Kelly's involvement. This constituted an ethical violation under California law.

Filing of Counterclaim Drafted by Kelly

After the team refused to renegotiate Player's contract, Anne filed a counterclaim that was drafted primarily by Kelly. As a disbarred attorney, Kelly cannot engage in activities that constitute the unauthorized practice of law.

As stated above, a lawyer may allow a disbarred attorney to draft documents so long as the attorney properly reviews, supervises, and takes ownership of the activity. Here, it appears that Kelly primarily drafted the counterclaim, but it is not clear whether Anne provided appropriate supervision and review of Kelly's work. If Kelly was the sole drafter and Anne did not review or supervise her work, which is possible given that they were formerly partners and/or co-workers, then Anne will have committed an ethical violation by allowing Kelly to engage in the unauthorized practice of law. If, however, Anne closely reviewed, edited, and supervised Kelly's work, and had the ultimate authority over the filing of the counterclaim, she will not likely have committed any ethical violations by permitting Kelly to engage in the drafting.

Based on the facts, it appears that Anne may have also committed an ethical violation if Kelly was primarily responsible for the filing.

Kelly's presence at deposition

As part of the civil lawsuit between Player and the professional team that employs him, the team owner (Owner) was deposed. Kelly assisted Anne in preparing for the deposition by preparing draft questions for Anne to ask Owner during the deposition. Here, Kelly's assistance in drafting deposition questions may have violated the ABA and California rules depending on the level of supervision and management by Anne, similar to the drafting of the counterclaim. A lawyer may use a non-lawyer (including a disbarred lawyer) to draft documents and conduct research. However, the disbarred lawyer may not engage in activities that constitute the practice of law. Drafting deposition questions requires legal skill and judgment and would likely constitute the unauthorized practice of law unless Anne merely used Kelly's work for reference and supervised and edited her work. However, it is not clear from the facts the extent to which Anne played a part.

Kelly also attended the deposition, and sat next to Anne and passed her notes with further suggested questions for Owner. This likely constituted an ethical violation under the ABA and California rules because Kelly was participating in the deposition, even though she was not directly asking questions. Depositions are typically limited to counsel, the witness, and the court reporter; the parties also typically make their appearance on the record, and the opposing side would have understood Kelly to be second-chairing the deposition on the facts. Therefore, Kelly's appearance at - and passing of notes to Anne during - the deposition likely constituted an ethical violation. Even though she was not directly asking questions, Kelly's feeding of questions to Anne and serving as the second chair would likely be deemed to be the unauthorized practice of law.

In short, it is likely that Anne did not violate any ethical duties in using Kelly to prepare for the deposition, but her presence and assistance at the deposition likely constituted an ethical violation.

Filing of Counterclaim

A lawyer may not assert a legal claim for the purpose of harassing another party or gaining an unfair litigation advantage. Here, after the team refused to re-negotiate her client's contract, Anne filed a counterclaim with the purpose of "get[ting] the team owner's attention" for "tortious interference with contractual relations."

Accordingly, because the purpose of the claim was solely to get the team's attention, Anne likely committed a violation when she filed the counterclaim for tortious interference with contractual relations.

Advising Player to Ignore the Court Order

Here, after the team obtained a preliminary injunction requiring Player to play under the terms of his current contract, Anne told Player to ignore the court order and to continue to refuse to play. This likely constituted a violation of both the ABA and California rules.

A lawyer must not counsel a client to violate a court order. Although Anne could have counseled Player to push back on his contractual obligations if she had a good faith basis for doing so, here the court had imposed a preliminary injunction requiring Player to perform under the contract. Thus, Anne directly advised her client to violate the court order without any good faith basis for doing so.

In addition to breaching her duty to the tribunal, this likely constituted a breach of her duty of competence owed to Player because a reasonably prudent lawyer would not counsel their client to disregard a court order that is likely to subject them to contempt charges.

Accordingly, Anne likely committed an ethical violation when she advised Player to ignore the court order.

Threatening to file a discrimination complaint

In order to put pressure on the team to re-negotiate Player's contract, Anne called Owner and implied that she could file a discrimination complaint against the team with a federal administrative agency that handles civil rights matters. Anne knew that there was not a legal basis to file the complaint but made the threat in order to put pressure on the team.

Under California rules, a lawyer may not threaten to report another person for disciplinary purposes in order to gain an advantage in a litigation. Where the lawyer has a good faith belief that a violation has occurred, the lawyer may advise the party that they might file a complaint. But the lawyer must not do so in order to gain a litigation advantage.

Here, Anne knew that there was no basis to file a discrimination complaint, yet made the complaint in order to put pressure on the team. This constituted a violation of the California rules because Anne lacked any good faith basis for making the complaint and did so solely in order to advance her client's position in the contractual negotiations.

Answer B

Anne (A) has committed several ethical violations, as discussed below.

Disbarred Attorney/Resigning

A disbarred attorney must resign from their law firm and cannot associate with that firm as an attorney.

Here, A and K shared a law practice. Thereafter, K was disbarred and immediately resigned from the firm. Assuming that the firm name was changed to recognize that K was no longer associated with the firm then A did violate the ABA or CA RPC.

Employing Disbarred Attorney

The issue is whether it is permissible to hire a disbarred attorney to work in one's law firm. In CA, a disbarred attorney can be hired to work as a litigation support clerk or in a similar support. The disbarred attorney can only work in this limited capacity; moreover, the CA State Bar must be notified if an attorney seeks to hire a disbarred attorney. Additionally, the disbarred attorney is prohibited from interacting with clients in a manner that would reasonably lead the client to believe the disbarred attorney was an attorney. Therefore, their client contact must be minimal.

Here, A hired K to work as a litigation support clerk. A did not notify the CA bar that she had hired K, who was a disbarred attorney. A was required to notify the CA State Bar, but failed to do so. Therefore, she violated her duties under the Cal RPC.

Also, the facts indicate that K's former clients may have still been contacting her for legal advice. As a disbarred attorney, K is prohibited from providing legal advice and can only interact with clients in an administrative capacity. Because K referred Player to A after he emailed her, this conduct would likely not create separate grounds for an ethical violation.

Telling Client to Ignore Court Order

A lawyer has a duty to the court and the profession to act with integrity, in good-faith, and ethically. Failure to do is a violation of both the CA and ABA RPC.

Here, A told Player that he should ignore the court order that required him to play under the terms of his current contract. This advice by A was in direct contravention to a legitimate court order. There are no facts - such as a stay of the court's order - that indicate that Player was bound by the court order and obligated to comply with. The fact that he disagreed with what it required, or that A may have believed that his noncompliance would create leverage in the negotiation of his contract are not sufficient bases for not complying with a lawful court order. Moreover, a litigant is liable to be held in contempt for failing to comply with a preliminary injunction. Therefore, A's legal advice to Player was to ignore a court order, the consequences of which could result in her client being ordered to jail or to pay a fine until he begins to comply with the order. Consequently, A did not act with integrity because she told her client to ignore the court's order without a legitimate basis for doing so.

This conduct by A violated both the ABA and CA RPC.

A lawyer also has a duty of competence. A lawyer must act with the knowledge and skill reasonably necessary to provide competent and diligent legal services. Under the ABA, the standard for a breach of this duty is reasonableness. In CA, a lawyer breaches their duty of competence if they act intentionally, recklessly, or with gross negligence.

Based on the above facts, A acted intentionally when she told Player not to comply with the order. Because failure to comply with a lawful order of a preliminary injunction has the consequences of contempt, it seems grossly negligent by A to give her client legal advice that would result in him violating the law.

As a result, A breached her duty of competence under both the ABA and CA RPC.

Calling and Threatening Team Owner

A lawyer cannot have contact with an opposing party that the lawyer knows is represented by counsel, unless opposing counsel consents.

Here, A called Team Owner and spoke with him without his lawyer present. A likely knew that Team Owner had retained counsel since he was engaged in a contract dispute with Player. There are also no facts that show that Team Owner's counsel consented to this call without him.

A also threatened Team Owner that she would file a civil rights complaint against him. The purpose of this threat was to create leverage in her dispute with Team Owner, as A and K "agreed there wasn't really any basis for the complaint." A lawyer must not threaten to bring an administrative complaint against a lawyer or non-lawyer absent a good-faith basis for filing the complaint. It is unethical to threaten or pursue such a complaint purely for the purposes of harassing the subject of the complaint.

As a result, A violated her ethical duties under both ABA and CA RPC by talking with an opposing party who has counsel and also by threatening someone with filing an administrative complaint against solely as a means of negotiating.

Duty of Good-faith/Candor re Counter Claim

A lawyer must have a reasonable, good-faith basis for pursing a legal claim. In other words, they must have a reasonable belief in the merits of the claim and they must be pursuing the litigation for a legitimate basis (i.e., remedying a legal right and not to harass)

Here, A filed a counter claim against Team Owner. Presumably, this counter claim was filed as part of strategy by A and K to be in a better position to negotiate Player's contract dispute. Generally, such a counter claim would be permissible and not constitute an ethics violation. However, it is not clear that A believed the claims asserted had merit. The fact that the court ruled in the PI in Team Owner's favor weighs against a finding that this counter claim had merit. Moreover, if the only purpose for bringing the claim was to "get the team owner's attention", then it seems likely that A's motivation was not to necessarily vindicate Player's contract rights, but to impermissibly harass and create leverage in negotiating a better contract for Player. In sum, it is not clear that A had a good faith basis in prosecuting this action.

Therefore, A may have committed an ethical violation if she filed this counter claim with a good faith based as to the merits of the case. If it was done purely to harass, then A committed an ethical violation under both the ABA and CA RPC.

Duty to Supervise

A lawyer may delegate tasks to their nonlawyer employees. However, the lawyer must closely supervise the nonlawyer's work and the lawyer remains ultimately responsible for the work product.

- Drafting Complaint

Here, K was primarily responsible for drafting the complaint. For the reasons discussed above, the filing of this counter claim could be the basis for a violation of the ABA and CA RPC. If so, then A clearly failed to supervise K. If she had done so, they would have thoroughly discussed the theory of the counter claim and whether the facts support that theory. A should not have filed the counter claim if this was not satisfied. Moreover, because an attorney is ultimately responsible for the work delegated to a nonlawyer, A can argue as a defense that K was "primarily responsible."

Therefore, A may have breached her duty to supervise her nonlawyer employee.

- Drafting deposition questions

Here, A's nonlawyer employee K drafted questions for A to ask during the depositions. The facts do not indicate how closely, or whether at all, A supervised K in this process. It is likely that A provided limited oversight over K in this process since she probably reasoned that this was something that K had experience doing and could be trusted. It is not impermissible for the nonlawyer to provide a draft of deposition questions to the attorney. A likely exercised supervision by using her discretion as to which questions drafted by K she chose to ask. However, if A did not do this and simply followed K's deposition outline without exercising her own independent judgment and, as a result, she asked impermissible questions, there could be a basis for finding that A breached her duty to supervise. Moreover, although K is a disbarred attorney, this type of conduct is not impermissible for a disbarred attorney. A litigation support clerk, under the supervision of an attorney, can draft deposition questions to help the attorney prepare for a deposition.

Therefore, it was likely permissible for A to allow her non-lawyer employee to draft the deposition questions.

K's participation in the Depo

A lawyer is liable for ethical violations of their employees. Moreover, as discussed above, a disbarred attorney is limited in the type of employment that they may engage in as it relates to working for a law firm.

Here, A and K jointly participated in the deposition of Team Owner. K is carrying on in the capacity as a licensed attorney would during a deposition - actively participating and thinking of additional questions to ask the deponent. This type of conduct would lead a reasonable person to believe that K was an attorney. However, it is not clear that a nonlawyer cannot participate and assist during a deposition.

As a result, this conduct may have violated the CA RPC because the CA state bar was not notified that a disbarred attorney was being employed by A and A allowed her to work in a capacity greater than administrative.

If your answer contains only a statement of your conclusions, you will receive little or no credit. State fully the reasons that support your conclusions, and discuss all points thoroughly.

Your answer should be complete, but you should not volunteer information or discuss legal doctrines that are not pertinent to the solution of the problem.

Unless a question expressly asks you to use California law, you should answer according to legal theories and principles of general application.

Q1 Contracts

In January, Stan, a farmer, agreed in a valid written contract to sell to Best Sauce-Maker Company (Best), 5,000 bushels of tomatoes on July 1, at $100 per bushel, payable upon delivery. On May 15, Stan sent Best the following e-mail:

"Heavy rains in March-May slowed tomato ripening. Delivery will be two weeks late."

Best replied:

"Okay."

On May 22, an employee of Delta Bank (Delta), where Best and Stan banked, told Best that rains had damaged Stan's tomato crops and that Stan would be unable to fulfill all his contracts. Best called Stan and asked about the banker's comment. Stan said:

"Won't know until June 10 whether I'll have enough tomatoes for all my contracts."

Best replied:

"We need a firm commitment by May 27, or we'll buy the tomatoes elsewhere."

Stan did not contact Best by May 27. On June 3, Best contracted to buy the 5,000 bushels it needed from Agro-Farm for $110 per bushel.

On June 6, Stan told Best:

"Worry was for nothing. I'll be able to deliver all 5,000 bushels."

Best replied:

"Too late. We made other arrangements. You owe us $50,000."

Concerned about quickly finding another buyer, Stan sold the 5,000 bushels to a vegetable wholesaler for $95 per bushel.

Stan sued Best for breach of contract. Best countersued Stan for breach of contract.

Has Stan and/or Best breached the contract? If so, what damages might be recovered, if any, by each of them? Discuss.

Answer A

Applicable Law

Contracts for goods are governed by Title 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code. All other contracts are governed by common law.

Goods

Goods are qualified as movable, tangible objects. As this contract is for bushels of tomatoes, which are movable, tangible objects, this contract will be governed by the UCC.

Merchants

The UCC additionally has special rules for merchants. A merchant is someone who regularly deals with the types of goods that are the subject matter of the contract, someone who has special knowledge of such subject matter, or a business person involved in the transaction.

This contract is a contract between Best, a sauce making corporation, and Stan, a farmer, who appears to be a commercial farmer, but even if he is not, he would have special knowledge of the goods involved, and therefore both parties qualify as merchants, and the UCC rules for Merchants will apply.

Possible Breaches of Contract

Valid Contract

In order to have a valid contract there must be an offer with clear and definite terms, acceptance, consideration, and no defenses to contract. Here, the facts indicate, that Stan and Best have entered into a valid contract. There appears to have clearly been an offer and acceptance. The only essential terms under the UCC are parties, subject matter, and quantity, but this contract also included price and timing. Both have exchanged valuable consideration, tomatoes for money, and as it's a valid contract, there should be no defenses to formation.

Anticipatory Repudiation

Anticipatory Repudiation is when one party to a contract clearly and unambiguously informs the other that they will not or cannot perform the performance required by the contract. Upon an anticipatory repudiation, the non-repudiating party may either (i) treat the repudiation as a breach and sue immediately, (ii) treat the contract as rescinded, (iii) suspend performance until the repudiating party indeed performs, (iii) or wait and sue when a breach occurs.

Best will argue that Stan repudiated his contract when he sent Best the May 15th email saying Delivery will be two weeks late. While under the common law, a time is of the essence clause is not typically enforced as a material breach of contract unless this has been specified when the contract was formed, the UCC requires Perfect Tender, which applies to goods, quantity and time of delivery. The UCC does not allow for substantial performance unless under an installment contract, which this is not. Therefore, Best will argue, by saying that there was going to be a 2-week delay in the delivery of Stan's tomatoes, Stan had anticipatorily repudiated the contract, and Best was allowed to treat such anticipatory repudiation as a breach.

Contract Modifications

While under the Common Law, a modification to a contract must be supported by consideration, the UCC only requires good faith to modify the contract.
Stan will argue, therefore, that the initial May 15th communications between Best and Stan were not a repudiation of the contract, but instead a good faith modification. Stan will argue that the only reason he was delayed in delivering the tomatoes was due to the heavy rains, a condition completely out of his control, and that therefore his attempt to change the delivery date will be a good faith effort to modify the contract. He will point to Best's response, an "Okay", as further proof that Best also viewed this communication as a modification of contract.

Because Best did not treat Stan's informing them of the delay as a breach of contract, or as a rescission, but instead answered in the affirmative, “Okay”, a court will most likely treat this as a modification rather than a repudiation as of May 15.

Request for Assurances

Under the UCC, when a party has a reasonable suspicion that the other party may not perform, they may make a request for assurances in writing from the other party that they will indeed be able to perform as promised under the contract. Upon receiving a request for assurances, the other party must respond within a reasonable period of time (typically not to exceed 30 days), also in writing, with assurances that they will be able to complete their portion of the agreement. If a party fails to respond to a request for assurances, the requesting party may treat this failure as an anticipatory repudiation and take any of the options discussed above.

Best will argue that the phone call on May 22nd was a request for assurances. Best will argue that due to the information shared with them by their and Stan's bank, they had a reasonable suspicion that Stan may be unable to perform and were therefore within their right under the contract and the UCC to make such a request. Best will argue that Stan's further uncertainty, about not knowing until June 10, would be even more support for their request for assurances. Best will argue that because Stan failed to respond to their request, he breached the contract by implicitly repudiating the contract, and Best was therefore within their rights to search elsewhere for their tomatoes to cover any losses. Stan will argue that he did not breach the contract through the May 22nd conversation. First, Stan will argue that because the request for a "firm commitment" was in a phone call rather in writing, that this was not an enforceable request for assurances. Stan will also argue that as Best only gave him 5 days, from May 22nd to May 27th, to respond to such assurances, with the date of performance still a month away, that this was not a reasonable time for him to respond in. Stan will further point out that even if this was a viable request for assurances, Stan gave the assurances on June 6th. Stan will argue that despite the fact that Best had demanded assurances be given by May 27th, as mentioned above, this was an unreasonable amount of time, and Stan did give them assurances within a reasonable amount of time. June 6, 2 weeks later, is well within 30 days, and still well before the date of performance. Stan will further argue that the fact that he had told Best that he wouldn't know until June 10th is even more evidence that the required date of May 27th was unreasonable.

Because Best's request was not in writing, and because they gave Stan less than a week to respond, most likely a court will not find that Sam breached his contract by failing to respond by May 27th.

Revocation of Repudiation

In the event of an anticipatory repudiation, the breaching party may revoke their repudiation any time before the date of performance agreed upon on the contract provided (i) the other party has not rescinded the contract already, (ii) the other party has not materially changed their position in reliance of this repudiation, or (iii) the other party has not already filed suit for breach of contract.

Stan will argue that even if it were found that he repudiated the contract either on May 15th, or the May 22nd through May 27th communications, that he revoked that repudiation on June 6th when he said there was nothing to worry about, and he would deliver as promised.

Best will argue that by that point in time, they had already materially changed their position and contracted with Agro-Farm in order to ensure they were able to obtain the necessary tomatoes, and that therefore Sam's revocation came too late. Stan will argue that as there was not a proper request for assurances, and that despite this, Stan was still able to give assurances well before the July 1st date, that Best itself was breaching the contract by entering into the agreement with Agro-Farm and refusing to honor the contract.

Impracticability

A contract becomes unenforceable if the subject matter of the contract is destroyed, the performing party dies, or the performance becomes illegal; also if performance becomes impracticable due to an unforeseen occurrence, (i) the nonoccurrence of which was an essential assumption of the contract, (ii) that makes performance impracticable, and (iii) the other party was not at fault.

Finally Stan might argue that he was not repudiating the contract, that the rain made his performance impracticable. However, this would have been a foreseeable occurrence, the risk of which Stan would have assumed.

Possible Damages

Best's Damages Compensatory Damages

Compensatory Damages are damages meant to put the non-breaching party into the position they would have been in had the contract been fully performed. Typically these are determined by the difference of the market price and that of the contract, or the difference between price of goods purchased in the non-breaching party's attempt to cover and the contract price. A party only needs to put in an objectively reasonable effort in finding a reasonably priced product to cover.

Should it be found that Stan did indeed breach the contract, Best will be able to claim compensatory damages. These would be the difference between the price they paid to Agro-Farm, $110 per bushel for 5,000 equaling $550,000 minus the agreed upon price with Stan of $500,000, or $50,000.

Consequential Damages

Consequential Damages are any damages that rise naturally out of the breach of contract that are not compensatory damages. These damages must be (i) actually caused by the breach, but for the breach, these damages would not have been suffered, (ii) foreseeable, and (iii) relatively certain as to the amount.

As Best only requested $50,000 dollars from Stan, it does not seem that they suffered any consequential damages, but if for some reason production were stopped as a result of having to go through Agro-Farm or something of this nature, they would be able to recover such consequential damages.

Incidental Damages

Incidental Damages are damages suffered by the non-breaching party in trying to remedy the breach.

Again, it is unclear wither Best suffered any such damages, but if they did in their attempts to locate and contract with Agro-Farm, these damages too could be recovered from Stan.

Stan's Damages

Compensatory Damages

See Rule Above.

If Best is found to be in breach of contract, Stan also could recover compensatory damages. These would be the difference in the agreed upon price with Best with what he was able to sell them for to the vegetable wholesaler. As such, Stan's compensatory damages would be the $500,000 agreed upon price, minus the $475,000 he received from the wholesaler or $25,000.

Consequential Damages

See Rule Above.

If Stan suffered any consequential damages, such as costs in having to transport the vegetables further, or storage fees, lost profits if he couldn't replant soon enough, etc, so long as these were caused by the breach, foreseeable, and a relatively certain dollar amount, these damages too could be recovered.

Incidental Damages

See Rule Above.

If Stan suffered any incidental damages, like Best, he too could recover these.

Reliance Damages

Reliance damages are recoverable as the costs suffered by the party upon reliance of the contract and reliance that the other party would perform. Reliance damages and compensatory damages cannot both be obtained and as such a party must choose between reliance and compensatory damages.

Stan, therefore, could choose to take reliance damages that he suffered instead of compensatory damages

Duty to Mitigate

A non-breaching party must do all that is reasonably possible to mitigate damages and eliminate costs. The damages recoverable will be reduced by what has actually been mitigated, or what could have, should the non-breaching party fail to take steps.

Therefore, if Stan were to take reliance damages, they would be mitigated by his sale to the vegetable wholesaler and the costs such a sale would normally cost Stan.

Answer B

The main issue in this case is whether there was a breach of the contract when Stan did not reply to a request for assurance of performance. This is a case governed by the UCC since it deals with delivery between merchants.

Waiver of Delivery Date

It is likely a court will find that the May 15 email from Stan to Best is a proposed modification of the contract.

At common law, a modification requires consideration. However, as this concerns movable goods (i.e. tomatoes), the UCC allows for modification as long as it was in good faith. Here, the modification of the delivery was due to the heavy rains, which was not, arguably, the fault of Stan. As such, the assent of Best, although without consideration, was binding.

Moreover, considering that the contract dealt in goods with a value in excess of $500, the modification had to be in writing. Here, the modification was by email and constitutes a writing in accordance with the Statute of Frauds. As such, the proposed modification is binding.

Alternatively, this is construed as an express waiver of the delivery date. A waiver need not be supported by consideration, and the mere fact Best replied "okay" is sufficient for the waiver to be provided. As such, the delay in delivery is valid.

Anticipatory Repudiation on May 22

According to the facts, Best was informed by a bank employee (Delta) that rains had damaged Stan's crops, and that Stan would be unable to fulfill all of his contracts. Best in turn called Stan, who commented that he will not know until June 10 whether there will be enough tomatoes.

An anticipatory repudiation allows the other contracting party to treat the contract as breached when the other party unequivocally states he will not perform. It is likely that a court will find that the admission by Stan that he would not know until June 10 whether there will be enough tomatoes is not, by itself, a breach of contract as there is no such unequivocal assurance by Seller that he will be unable to perform. All he said is he will not know by June 10 whether there will be enough tomatoes for all of his contracts. There is a probability he will breach the contract, but it is not unequivocal amounting to a refusal to perform under the contract. As such, this statement alone is not sufficient to constitute anticipatory repudiation and therefore, at this point, there has been no breach by Best.

Assurance of Performance on May 22

As per the same facts, while it did not constitute an anticipatory repudiation, which would have allowed Stan to treat the contract as breached, Stan had reasonable grounds to require assurance of performance. If there are reasonable grounds for a party to doubt performance of the contract by the other party, a party may require the other party to provide reasonable assurance of performance. Until receipt of the reasonable assurance, the party is allowed to suspend performance.

Here, it was a Delta employee who told Best about the crops. There is no indication here of its reliability, although it may be reasonable for Best to rely on it since it came from a bank, and presumably came from a reasonable source. However, even if this fact alone was not sufficient, Stan himself admitted to Best that he will not know until June 10 whether there will be enough tomatoes. The information, coupled with the admission, allows Best to require the assurance of performance from Stan.

The main issue here is whether there was a reasonable request for assurance of performance.

It is arguable whether the telephone call by Best demanding a firm commitment by May 27 would be considered by the court as reasonable since it was not in writing. Moreover, as Best is aware, Stan would not know until June 10 whether there were enough tomatoes to comply with the contract. A court may find that it was unreasonable to make Best wait. However, Stan did secure, as discussed earlier, a valid waiver, of two weeks, which would move the delivery date from July 1 to say July 14. As such, demanding an earlier time for Stan to commit may be held as unreasonable since the delivery date has been delayed for two weeks anyway and therefore, waiting from May 22 to June 10 would not be unreasonable.

On the other hand, it may be argued that by Best that all Best wanted was for Stan to assure him by May 27 that he will deliver the tomatoes, failing which, he will buy tomatoes elsewhere. Best will also argue that he was not asking for anything else, other than an assurance that Stan will comply. It is likely that a court will agree that a firm commitment in this case is reasonable since all that Best is asking is that he will receive assurances that Stan will perform the contract. Considering that Stan did not reply, Best was entitled to treat the contract as breached.

The attempt on June 6 by Best to provide assurance may be treated by the court as being too late. In this case, Stan was aware on May 22 that Best intended to buy tomatoes from another supplier without adequate assurance of performance. As such, the failure by Stan to reply by May 27 would allow Best to contract for the tomatoes from Agro- Farm. At best, Best may argue that Stan's failure to commit led Best to reply on the assumption that performance is not forthcoming and therefore, Best may treat the contract as breached.

Moreover, even if the court found earlier that Stan anticipatory repudiated the contract, Stan is not permitted to retract his repudiation if Best has already detrimentally relied on the reputation. This is the likely result here since Stan is aware that Best will make other arrangements if Stan did not contact Best by May 27. As such, Stan took the risk that Best actually went through, as is here, with securing an alternative supply of tomatoes.

As such, it is likely that a court will find that this was reasonable and as such, the failure by the Stan to reply would be considered a breach. If a court finds that this was a breach, then Best was permitted to buy the other tomatoes from Agro-Farm. On the other hand, if the court finds that this was not a reasonable request, then Best is liable for the breach of contract.

Impossibility

It is possible that Stan will argue impossibility. Impossibility of performance will only be excused if it is not objectively possible for Stan to perform. However, it is likely this argument will fail because even if Stan's farm could not have produced the tomatoes, Stan could have easily performed by buying tomatoes from a different supplier, of equal quality. There is no indication here that Best only wanted Stan's tomatoes, or that Stan's tomatoes were of a unique quality that only Stan could provide. In fact, Best simply went to Agro-Farm for the other tomatoes, indicating that this was a generic purchase.

Impracticability

It is possible that Best will argue impracticability. Impracticability of performance will only be excused if its performance will be highly impractical. The mere fact it has become more expensive does not by itself make performance impractical. As stated earlier, even if Stan's farm could not have produced the tomatoes, Stan could have easily performed by buying tomatoes from a different supplier, of equal quality. As such, if he was not sure if he could deliver, Stan should have committed to delivering the tomatoes anyhow.

Damages

Applying the aforementioned, it is likely that a court will find that Stan had breached the contract, and as such, Best is entitled to damages.

As a preliminary matter, both parties had a duty to mitigate damages. Regardless of which party was at fault, both Stan and Best fulfilled their duty to mitigate damages by finding another customer, and supplier, respectively.

Best Damages

The general rule for damages here are expectation damages, which would put the non-beaching party at the same place as though the breach did not occur. Here, the contract price was 5,000 bushels at $100 per bushel (or total of $500,000). On the other hand, Best contracted to buy additional tomatoes at $110 a bushel. As such, the expectation damages here would be the difference between the original contract price and the new contract price, or 5,000 x ($110-$100) = $50,000.

Moreover, the non-breaching party is allowed to recover incidental expenses incurred by the breach. Here, there is no showing of incidental expenses.

Best is also entitled to recover special damages in the form of lost-profits if this was specifically pleaded and was a foreseeable loss due to the breach of the contract. Here however Best did not suffer any such damages.

As such, Best would only be entitled to recover the $50,000 from Stan, since Best did not make any down payment. Stan would not be entitled to recover any damages.

Stan Damages

On the other hand, if the court finds that Best breached the contract, then it will be liable to Stan for expectation damages and incidental damages as well. The same formula would be applied to compute the expectation damages, which would be the difference between the original contract price and the new contract price, or 5,000 x ($100-$95) = $25,000. As said earlier, the non-breaching party is allowed to recover incidental expenses incurred by the breach. Here, there is no showing of incidental expenses by Stan.

As such Stan would only be entitled to recover $25,000, as Best did not make any down payment.

Q2 Evidence

Deb was charged in a California state court with battery of a spouse or live-in companion. Vic, Deb's live-in boyfriend, was beaten when he stepped out of his car in their driveway. Vic called 911 about two minutes after the beating and reported that Deb, his girlfriend, had beaten him.

At trial, the prosecution called Vic as a witness. He reluctantly took the stand. He refused to identify Deb in open court as the perpetrator. He admitted making the 911 call in which he reported that Deb had beaten him. The parties stipulated that the 911 recording was a business record of the police department, but that Vic's statements on it were specifically not covered by the stipulation. The prosecution properly authenticated the 911 tape, moved the tape into evidence, and played it for the jury.

The prosecution also called Sam, a man who had been Deb's live-in boyfriend eight years earlier. All evidence pertaining to Sam's testimony had been properly disclosed to the defense before trial. Sam testified that Deb had threatened to choke him to death if he left her, and that she had beaten him several times during the time they lived together.

Deb took the stand in her own defense. She testified that she was working at her desktop computer in her office at the time of the assault, 20 miles away. She offered a print-out of a list of file names, which contained the dates and times they were created, indicating they were created on her computer at the time of the beating. She testified that her computer clock was set to the correct time and keeping time accurately on the day of the beating.

Assuming all appropriate objections were timely made, should the court have admitted:

1. The 911 tape? Discuss.

2. Sam's testimony? Discuss.

3. The computer print-out? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

Answer A

Battery

Battery is unlawful touching of the victim's person which results in harm or offense.

Proposition 8

As a preliminary matter, in California, Proposition 8 permits the admission of all relevant evidence in criminal cases, subject to certain exceptions. Hearsay rules and exceptions still apply, as do Constitutional requirements. To be relevant, evidence must be: 1) factually relevant, or make a material element of the case more or less likely, and 2) legally relevant, in that the probative value of a piece of evidence outweighs its prejudicial effect.

911 Call

The first issue is whether the 911 tape recording of Vic's statement is admissible.

Relevance & Authentication

The 911 call is likely relevant because Vic's statement on the 911 call claiming that Deb battered him, if true, makes it more likely that Deb is actually guilty of battery. The probative effect of such evidence would far outweigh its prejudicial value. Additionally, the facts state the recording has been properly authenticated.

Confrontation Clause

We must next determine whether admission of the 911 tape violates Deb's rights under the Confrontation Clause. The Confrontation Clause is a federal Constitutional requirement which requires all criminal defendants the opportunity to confront witnesses against them. It applies only to the admission of testimonial evidence. Testimonial evidence is generally determined under the "primary purpose" test, in which a statement is adjudged testimonial if the primary purpose of the statement is to assist law enforcement or give testimony. 911 recordings are generally not considered testimonial.

Here, Vic's primary purpose in calling 911 was to seek help, rather than to aid law enforcement. He did not intend to give testimony in his communications to the dispatcher. Thus, the call was likely not testimonial. Further, Vic has taken the stand as a witness, giving Deb the opportunity to cross-examine him as to the contents of the recording. Thus, regardless of whether the tape was testimonial, its admission does not violate Deb's Confrontation Clause rights.

Hearsay within Hearsay

The next issue is whether the tape presents a double hearsay problem. Hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered for its truth. It is generally inadmissible, subject to certain exceptions. When an item of evidence presents two levels of hearsay (as is the case with a recording), both levels must be subject to an exception to be admissible.

Here, the prosecution is trying to admit an out-of-court statement by Vic. The tape is a recording of his voice, which is itself another level of hearsay (Vic's statement is level 1, and the recording of his statement is level 2). Thus, the recording presents a hearsay within hearsay problem.

Level 1: Vic's Statement

Now we must determine whether Vic's statement falls under a hearsay exception.

i. Spontaneous Statement

In California, a spontaneous statement (under the FRE, an excited utterance) occurs when a speaker becomes frightened or excited by a startling event, and speaks during or shortly after that event while still experiencing the excitement. This type of statement is admissible as an exception to the hearsay bar, regardless of whether or not a declarant is available.

Here, Vic called the police two minutes after he was allegedly beaten by Deb. Though there are no facts which indicate Vic's mental state at the time of the call, being beaten is likely considered a startling event. The prosecution will likely successfully argue that two minutes is not enough time to recover from the stress or shock of such an experience, considering the physical and emotional ramifications. Thus, the first level of hearsay is likely admissible under the spontaneous statement rule.

ii. Contemporaneous Statement

A contemporaneous statement (under the FRE, a present sense impression) occurs when a speaker is describing events he is witnessing after they occur. This is broader than the federal rule, which permits a description shortly after the events occur. Such a statement is an exception to the hearsay bar, regardless of whether or not a declarant is available.

Given the narrowness of the rule, it is likely not satisfied by Vic's statement. He called the police two minutes after the alleged beating, and was thus not describing events as they occurred. Therefore, his statement is likely inadmissible as a contemporaneous statement.

Description of Past Physical Harm or Threat of Harm

California provides a hearsay exception which permits the admission of a statement describing past physical harm or threat of physical harm by a declarant who is unavailable. The statement must be made: 1) at or near the time the harm/threat occurred; 2) with circumstances suggesting reliability; and 3) be made to a police or medical professional, written, or recorded. In California, unlike under the FRE, a declarant is not "unavailable" merely because he refuses to testify.

Here, Vic is available because he has taken the stand. His refusal to identify Deb in open court is not sufficient to make him "unavailable" for purposes of the above hearsay exception. Thus, the exception likely does not apply

iii. Statement of Past Physical Condition

California also permits a hearsay exception when a declarant is making a statement describing a past physical condition, if it is at issue in the case. The statement need not be made for medical assistance; however, the declarant must be unavailable.

Because Vic is available, as discussed, his statement will not be admissible under this exception. Furthermore, Deb would likely argue that, even though the case concerns domestic violence, Vic's physical condition is not "at issue" in the case. Instead, she would likely be successful in arguing that her actions towards Vic are what is at issue.

In sum, the first level of hearsay - Vic's statement on the 911 call - is likely admissible as a spontaneous statement.

Level 2: 911 Recording

The next issue is whether the second level of hearsay is admissible under any exception.

i. Business Records Exception

A business record is admissible if: 1) it is not made in preparation for litigation; 2) it is made in the normal course of business; 3) it is made by someone with a duty to records; and 4) the recording party has personal knowledge or is transcribing on behalf of someone with personal knowledge.

Here, the recording 1) was not made in preparation for litigation; 2) was made in the normal course of police business; 3) recorded by one with a duty to record (here, the dispatcher); and 4) recorded on behalf of one with personal knowledge (here, Vic). The parties have furthermore stipulated that the 911 recording itself is admissible as a business record. Thus, the recording is likely acceptable under the business records exception to the hearsay rule.

The 911 call will likely be admitted if Vic's statement is considered a spontaneous statement, since the second level (the recording itself) has been stipulated admissible by the parties.

Sam's Testimony

The next issue is whether Sam's testimony is admissible.

Relevance

Sam's testimony is relevant because the fact that Deb has battered a partner in the past makes it more likely she would continue that pattern of behavior in the future. This is true even though the alleged battery occurred eight years prior. Domestic violence is a special exception to the presumption that past bad acts do not predict future behavior, likely due to the habitual behavior of domestic abusers. Though such testimony is also prejudicial, a court would likely find that its probative value outweighs its prejudicial effect, notwithstanding the time that has passed.

Character Evidence

Character evidence can take three forms: opinion testimony, reputation testimony, and prior bad acts. In a criminal case, character evidence of the defendant is typically not admissible unless the defendant first "opens the door" to such evidence by presenting testimony of her good character. However, California provides a special exception for character evidence in domestic violence cases: the prosecution may present evidence of opinion, reputation, and specific bad acts testimony to show a defendant's character for domestic violence.

Here, Sam lived with Deb as her boyfriend eight years prior. He testified that Deb had threatened to choke him to death if he left her, and that she had beaten him several times during the time they lived together. This is adequate "bad acts" testimony which is admissible as character evidence under California's rule pertaining to domestic violence. From Sam's testimony, a factfinder may infer that Deb is more likely to batter Vic, if they accept Sam's testimony as credible.

Deb's Statement

Statements of a criminal defendant, or a party admission, is admissible as a hearsay exception.

Here, part of Sam's testimony covers what Sam said in the past (that she would choke him to death). Since it is an out of court statement, it is hearsay. However, it is admissible, notwithstanding the above character evidence rule, as a party admission.

Computer Print-Out

The final issue is whether Deb's computer printout should be admissible. The computer print-out is not hearsay because it is generated by a machine (here, a computer). Hearsay only occurs if made by a person.

Relevance

Whether the computer printout is relevant is a close call. Evidence is likely inadmissible if it is likely to cause delay or confuse the issues of the case.

Here, a print-out would show that someone used Deb's computer at the time stated. There are no assurances that the person was Deb. However, such a fact likely goes to the weight of the evidence and not admissibility. Furthermore, the evidence is unlikely to be particularly prejudicial; thus, it is likely relevant to show that Deb might not have been near Vic at the time of the alleged battery.

Authentication

An item may only be admitted to evidence if the moving party presents enough circumstantial evidence to allow a jury to find that the evidence is what it purports to be. Here, Sam is testifying that a print-out list of file names, containing the dates and times they were created, is evidence of the state of her office computer on the day of the battery. Some documents are "self-authenticating."

Here, Deb has testified to the nature of the list, where she obtained it, and that her computer clock was accurate. Whether Deb's testimony is sufficient to authenticate will likely depend on the level of expertise required to create and identify such a list. If any person could create a printout of file dates/times, then it is likely common knowledge and able to be authenticated by a layperson. However, if obtaining such a list is complicated, authentication may require a computer expert to testify that the list is what it purports to be. Thus, the document's admissibility will depend on proper authentication. Furthermore, the document is likely not considered "self-authenticating."

Secondary Evidence Rule

California's secondary evidence rule (the FRE "best evidence" rule) requires that when a document is admitted to prove its contents, an original must be provided. This includes duplicates or written copies.

Here, Deb is attempting to admit a file list from her computer at the time in question. A print-out of the list is likely adequate to be considered a "copy" that will satisfy the secondary evidence rule.

Given that the printout is not hearsay and will likely satisfy the secondary evidence rule, it will be admissible to the extent it can be properly authenticated.

In sum, the 911 tape and Sam's testimony are likely admissible against Deb. Her computer print-out is likely inadmissible.

Answer B

RELEVANCE

Logical Relevance

Evidence must be logically and legally relevant. Under the California Evidence Code (CEC), logical relevance means that the evidence has any tendency to make a disputed fact of consequence to the determination of the action more or less probable.

Legal Relevance

Evidence must be legally relevant. Under CEC section 352, evidence is legally relevant when its probative value is not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, waste of time, misleading the jury, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence.

PROPOSITION 8

Under California's Proposition 8, in a criminal case, all relevant evidence must be admitted, subject to the court's balancing power under section 352, and subject to additional exceptions noted in my answer below. Because Deb (D) is charged with the crime of battery in California state court, Proposition 8 applies.

I. THE 911 TAPE

Relevance

The 911 tape is both logically and legally relevant. The tape has logical relevance because it is highly probative of whether D committed the battery. The tape has legal relevance because it has high probative value that is not substantially outweighed by the risk of any unfair prejudice or misleading the jury. Although any evidence tends to prejudice the D when it demonstrates guilt, that does not make the prejudice unfair. The 911 tape is also logically relevant to impeach V by a prior inconsistent statement (discussed below).

Authentication

All evidence must be properly authenticated, meaning that there must be enough evidence to support a jury finding that the evidence is what the proponent says it is. Here, the tape was properly authenticated.

Personal Knowledge

Testifying witnesses must have personal knowledge of what they are testifying about. Here, Vic (V) had personal knowledge of what D did to him and what he conveyed on the 911 call.

Secondary Evidence Rule

Any writing, tangible collection of data, or recording must satisfy the Secondary Evidence Rule when offered to prove its contents. In California, the original or a duplicate (including carbon copies, photocopies, and handwritten notes) must be admitted into evidence, unless it is reasonably unavailable (then testimony is allowed). Here, the actual tape of the 911 call was admitted into evidence, and it appears to be an original (or at least, an exact duplicate).

Hearsay

Hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Hearsay is generally excluded unless an exception warrants admissibility. Proposition 8 does not apply to or alter the hearsay rules.

Multiple Hearsay

The tape presents the problem of multiple hearsay. The recording itself is hearsay (the outer layer), and the statements contained within it, including V's statements, are also hearsay (the inner layer of hearsay). Both layers must fall within an exception to be admissible.

Outer Layer of Hearsay

The parties have stipulated that the 911 tape is a business record of the police department. The CEC recognizes an exception for business records. Thus, the outer layer of hearsay (the tape itself) is admissible under this exception.

Inner Layer of Hearsay

V's statements are hearsay because they are being offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, i.e. that D battered V. To be admissible, V's statements must be admissible under a hearsay exception. (They may also be admissible nonsubstantively as impeachment of V's credibility, as noted below).

Hearsay Exceptions

Prior Inconsistent Statement

The prosecution's best argument is that V's statement was a prior inconsistent statement of a testifying witness. Under the CEC, a prior inconsistent statement is admissible as a hearsay exception even when it was not made under oath at a prior proceeding. Here, V is the prosecution's testifying witness, and he refuses to identify D on the stand. Thus, the statements are admissible as a prior inconsistent statement. Moreover, these statements are admissible both substantively and as impeachment evidence.

Spontaneous Statement (Excited Utterance)

The prosecution will also succeed in showing that V's statement was a spontaneous statement. A spontaneous statement is one that describes a startling or exciting event and that is made when the declarant is still under the stress of that exciting event. Here, V was allegedly beaten by D as he stepped out of his car. He called 911 "about two minutes after the beating." Unexpected physical violence would constitute a startling or exciting event, and it is very likely that V was still under the stress of excitement of that event when he called 911 a mere two minutes later to report D as the perpetrator. Thus, V's statements are likely admissible as a spontaneous statement.

Contemporaneous Statement (Present Sense Impression)

The prosecution will argue that V's statements are admissible as a contemporaneous statement, but this argument will fail. Under the CEC, this exception only applies when the declarant is describing or making understandable his own conduct while engaged in that conduct. V's statements identified D's conduct. Thus, this exception does not apply.

Statement of Infliction of Violence

The CEC recognizes an exception for a statement made by a declarant that describes, narrates, or makes understandable an infliction of physical violence or a threat of physical violence. The statement must have been made at or near the time of the event; must be made under circumstances indicating trustworthiness; and must be in writing, recorded, or given to emergency personnel. The declarant, however, must also be unavailable at trial. Here, V's statement would likely meet all of the requirements for this exception (his statements were made 2 minutes after the beating, were recorded, and were communicated to 911), but V is a testifying witness at trial. Thus, because V is not unavailable at trial to testify, this exception does not apply.

Dying Declaration

The CEC recognizes an exception for a dying declaration. This exception applies in all cases (not just homicide cases or civil trials, as the Federal Rules require) when the declarant is dead and when the statement concerns the cause of death. Here, V is alive and testifying at trial. Thus, this exception does not apply.

Business Record

V's statements are not admissible under the business records exception. For the exception to apply, the statement must relate to an event or condition (not opinions or diagnoses under the CEC, but courts allow simple ones); must be made in the regular course of business; must be made at or near the time of the matter described; must be made by a person with personal knowledge or transmitted by a person with a duty to transmit the information; and must be authenticated by a custodian or record. It must also be a regular practice of the business to make such records. Here, V was not under any duty to transmit the information to 911. Thus, this exception does not apply to V's statements, the inner layer of hearsay.

No Marital Privileges

V is a live-in boyfriend of D. Thus, V could not invoke any spousal immunity, which is a privilege held by a non-defendant spouse in which that spouse can refuse to testify in any civil or criminal proceeding against the defendant spouse.

No Confrontation Clause Problem

The Confrontation Clause in the Sixth Amendment bars testimonial out-of-court statements by an unavailable witness when the criminal defendant had no opportunity to cross-examine the statement when made. Here, V testified at trial, and his statements were arguably in response to an emergency. So, they were likely not testimonial.

Conclusion

The 911 tape of V's statements are admissible.

II. SAM'S TESTIMONY

Relevance

Sam's testimony is legally relevant because it makes it more probable that D committed the battery. By showing that D committed a similar battery against a former live-in boyfriend 8 years before V's battery and that she committed several batteries during the time Sam and D lived together, this evidence would make it more probable that D has a violent nature and propensity to commit batteries against boyfriends, which in turn, would make it more probable that she battered V. The testimony, however, likely poses a risk of unfair prejudice because it is improper character evidence, as discussed below.

Character Evidence

Evidence of a person's character trait to prove that the defendant acted in conformity with that character on a given occasion, or that the person has a propensity to act in conformity, is referred to as character evidence. Proposition 8 does not apply to character evidence rules. Here, Sam's testimony is likely being offered by the prosecution to show that D has a character for violence and propensity to commit battery against boyfriends. Thus, this evidence is character evidence.

Defense Must Open the Door

In a criminal case, evidence of a defendant's character is not admissible in a prosecution's case in chief. The defendant, however, may present evidence of the defendant's pertinent good character, which the prosecution may rebut. Here, there is no indication that D had offered any evidence as to her peaceful nature or as to any other good character trait. Thus, Sam's testimony was inadmissible to prove D's character based on that justification.

However, the CEC recognizes an exception for character evidence in cases of sexual assault, child molestation, elder abuse, and domestic violence. Here, D is charged with battering her live-in boyfriend, which likely qualifies as domestic violence. Thus, under this exception, Sam's testimony should have been admitted.

Not Independently Admissible

At issue is whether Sam's testimony is offered for a non-character purpose. Evidence of a defendant's past acts may also be independently admissible if not offered to prove character or propensity. Evidence of past acts, for example, are admissible to prove motive, identity, absence of mistake, and a common plan or scheme. Here, the prosecution could argue that Sam's testimony is being offered to prove the identity of the assailant (Deb) or to prove that D has a common plane or scheme of using battery to prevent boyfriends from leaving her. Sam testified that D threatened to choke him to death "if he left her." As the prosecution would argue, this shows a common plan of D to coerce boyfriends into staying. Neither of these arguments are persuasive. First, evidence is usually allowed to prove identity when there is a unique modus operandi of the defendant. Here, the fact that someone committed battery in the past is indistinguishable from character evidence. Second, it is unlikely that a court, based only on D's threat to S, would find that D had a "common plan or scheme" to entrap boyfriends unless there is other evidence that could prove such a plan. Unfortunately, many people threaten significant others if they attempt to leave, and this by itself is not sufficient to show a scheme.

Impeachment of Deb

The prosecution may also argue that Sam's testimony is offered to impeach Deb's credibility, given that Deb has testified in the case. Under Proposition 8, prior acts of moral turpitude are admissible, subject to 352 balancing, as impeachment. Moral turpitude includes violence and would likely include these batteries against Sam. However, the court would likely exclude the evidence under its section 352 balancing power because of the high risk of unfair prejudice. Even with a limiting instruction, a jury would be hard-pressed not to view these past batteries as a form of character evidence.

Conclusion

Sam's testimony is likely admissible given that it is character evidence in a case involving domestic violence. However, if this exception did not apply it would otherwise be inadmissible for character purposes and would likely be inadmissible as impeachment evidence because of the high risk of unfair prejudice.

III. COMPUTER PRINT-OUT

Relevance

The computer print-out is legally relevant because it supports D's alibi, i.e. that she could not have committed the assault because she was working at her office 20 miles away. The evidence is legally relevant because of its high probative value and because it does not present a risk of unfair prejudice, waste of time, or misleading the jury.

Authentication

As noted above, evidence must be authenticated. In other words, there must be enough evidence to support a jury finding that the evidence is what the proponent says it is. Here, D testified that her computer clock was set to the correct time and that it was keeping time accurately on the day of the beating. This may be at least sufficient to show that a bona fide print-out of the activity from D's computer for that day would be accurate in terms of its time entries. But D's testimony does not actually provide any other evidence that the print-out came from D's computer (after all, many computers have accurate time-keeping) or that it was unaltered or unmodified. To reach a definitive conclusion, the court would need more evidence on what the print-out specifically entails (e.g. if it indicates D's user ID) and what other testimony is offered.

Secondary Evidence Rule

As noted above, the Secondary Evidence Rule would apply to such writings and tangible collections of data. A computer print-out of an original would suffice.

Not Hearsay

The computer print-out is not hearsay. Hearsay does not include print-outs of machine-created data that was not a result of human assertions. But hearsay would include a declarant's out-of-court statements even if recorded or transcribed on a computer. Here, D's computer likely automatically generated these time stamps and records of the activity and file names. Thus, these were not assertions by a human declarant, so the hearsay exclusion rules would not apply.

Conclusion

Assuming that authenticity objections can be overcome, the computer print-out should be admitted.

Q3 Professional Responsibility

Betty and Sheila, who have been friends for a long time, were charged with armed robbery, allegedly committed in a convenience store. They decided to hire Betty's uncle, Lou, as their lawyer. Lou is an estate planning attorney and has never represented defendants in criminal cases before.

Both Betty and Sheila met with Lou together. In that meeting, both of them emphatically denied that they robbed anyone. Lou agreed to represent them in their criminal cases and gave them a retainer agreement, which states:

> Scope of representation. Lawyer agrees to represent Clients through any settlement or trial.
>
> No conflicts of interest. From time to time, Lawyer may represent someone whose interests may not align with that of Clients. Lawyer will make every effort to inform Clients of any potentially conflicting representations.
>
> Fees and expenses. Lawyer will advance the costs of prosecuting or defending a claim or action or otherwise protecting or promoting Clients' interests, but Clients are ultimately responsible for repaying Lawyer for all costs that Lawyer advances. If Clients are unsuccessful at trial, Clients will owe only costs advanced by Lawyer and zero fees. If Clients are successful either before or at trial, Lawyer will be paid $10,000 plus any costs incurred.

Betty and Sheila each signed the retainer agreement.

Two days later, Lou represented both defendants at the joint arraignment. He angered the court during the arraignment because of his unfamiliarity with criminal procedure, and the court relieved Lou and appointed new counsel for Betty and Sheila. Betty and Sheila agreed to new counsel.

Although Lou had not incurred any costs by that point, Lou asked Betty and Sheila to pay him a total of $2,000, divided up however they wanted, to reimburse him for his time spent on the case.

What, if any, ethical violations has Lou committed? Discuss.

Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

Answer A

Lou (L) has committed a number of ethical violations that would subject him to discipline under both the CA and the ABA rules.

Duty of Loyalty

The first issue is L's breaches of the duty of loyalty. A lawyer has a duty to act in the best interests of their client, which means avoiding potential and actual conflicts of interest.

Potential Conflicts of Interest

L's representation raises a potential conflict of interest by representing two criminal co-defendants.

Representing two co-defendants raises the significant possibility that their interests will become adverse to each other in the future.

Under the ABA and CA rules, an attorney may represent two clients with a potential conflict of interest if he (1) reasonably believes that the representation of either client, the lawyer's own personal interests, or the interests of his family will not materially limit his duties to the other; (2) informs the client in understandable language of the conflict; and (3) obtains written consent. Under the CA rules, the belief that representation won't be materially limited doesn't have to be objectively reasonable (it can be subjectively reasonable based on what the attorney knew).

So under the ABA rules, an attorney must advise a client of any conflict of interest, and obtain consent, memorialized in writing (if the client consent was initially oral). CA requires written consent to all conflicts of interest. Additionally, CA requires the lawyer to advise on all potential and actual conflicts, and obtain additional consent if a conflict actualizes.

Here, L was representing two co-defendants in a criminal case. Even if both maintain innocence now, there's a strong possibility that one might want to testify against the other in exchange for favorable sentencing, or to mitigate their own culpability as compared to the co-defendant. A disciplinary board might view that as making representation unreasonable. L might point to the fact that Betty (B) and Sheila (S) have been friends for a long time, and both emphatically deny guilt, so they are less likely to become adverse. But that argument is weak, since L has a duty to convey to each client the best possible legal course of action, and it's very likely that B and S will have conflicting interests. Under the CA rule, L probably has a stronger argument that he subjectively believed it was possible, given his knowledge of B and S, and the defenses they were making.

More information about the strength of their relative cases might be useful here. But on the whole, under the ABA standard, it's probably a close call but representation is likely unreasonable, and under the CA rule, L can probably prevail under the subjective test.

But, L likely failed to adequately warn of conflicts. L's retainer contains general language about conflicts of interest. But he doesn't specifically warn B and S about the risk that his representation would be limited. Nor does he inform them that information between them won't be protected by attorney-client privilege if he represents both, so there's a real risk their statements to him would be used against them.

Because his retainer is wholly inadequate at advising B and S about the risk, the fact that they signed the retainer likely doesn't constitute consent. Therefore, L would likely be subject to discipline under both the ABA and CA rules for failing to get adequate consent to a potential conflict of interest.

Actual Conflicts of Interest

The next issue is that L failed to reveal an actual conflict of interest, because he has a personal conflict.

An actual conflict of interest is treated under the same standard as above. But under the CA rules an attorney just needs to advise a client of a personal conflict in writing. They don't need written consent.

Here, L is Betty's uncle, so they are close family. That raises an actual personal conflict of interest. L is much more likely to favor B's representation; he is likely to be uncomfortable with taking action that will harm B's position, and he likely faces family pressure to ensure that B gets the best possible outcome. He doesn't face similar pressure with S.

So that's an actual personal conflict of interest.

L failed to advise either client of that risk, let alone in writing, because the retainer is completely silent on that issue.

Therefore, L would also be subject to discipline under both ABA and CA authorities for failing to adequately disclose an actual, personal conflict of interest.

Duty of Confidentiality

L's representation also raises an issue with the duty of confidentiality.

A lawyer has an obligation to keep all of a client's non-public information private, and not to use that information against them. There are limited exceptions for: (1) when legally required to do so by a statute, ethical rule, or court order, when the client consents, when the representation is at issue (i.e. in a fee or malpractice dispute); when necessary to prevent death or serious bodily injury; or under the ABA to prevent your services from being used to commit a financial crime or fraud.

When an attorney represents co-clients, attorney client privilege and confidentiality is waived as between them. So B and S would be able to use the confidential information of the other against each other. An attorney may represent co-defendants, but must advise them of the risk from losing confidentiality, and obtain written consent.

Here, L made no mention of confidentiality. There's no indication, though, that L has yet disclosed any information, so this is probably more a violation of the duty of loyalty, than a direct violation of the duty of confidentiality: L failed to warn his clients about the risk, and adequately protect their confidentiality, and act in their best interests.

Therefore, L would likely be subject to discipline under the ABA and CA rules for failing to receive informed consent for this part of the arrangement as well.

Financial Duties

A lawyer also owes a client a number of financial duties. Here L would likely be subject to discipline for violations of these as well.

Improper Fee Agreement

The issue here is whether L entered into an improper fee arrangement, and made the appropriate disclosures, under the ABA and CA rules.

The ABA prohibits contingent fees in criminal and domestic cases. CA prohibits contingent fees in criminal cases, or in a domestic case where the contingent fee "promotes the dissolution of a savable marriage."

A contingent fee is a fee where payment depends on the outcome. Usually the lawyer is only paid upon the resolution of a favorable result.

Here, L entered into a fee agreement where he was only paid if they were successful at trial. L might argue that he wasn't recovering a percentage, just a flat fee for certain results. But since this is a criminal case, making the fee contingent on the outcome of the case seems like the only way to enter into such an arrangement. So the ABA and CA disciplinary boards would probably find this was a contingent fee.

Therefore, L entered into an impermissible contingent fee arrangement in a criminal case.

The next issue is whether L complied with the formal requirements for a fee arrangement. CA requires all fee agreements to be in writing, unless the client is a corporation, the fee is less than $1000, or the fee is for routine work for a regular client.

None of these exceptions apply, so the fee would have to be in writing signed by the client, with informed consent. Here, that information is contained in the retainer, and it was signed by B and S. But there is still a potential issue with the informed consent. It's unclear whether L went over the fee arrangement, and it's not clear the retainer is in sufficiently plain language.

So in all, the retainer could satisfy the writing requirement, but more information about the nature of the fee meeting would probably be necessary.

Next, both the ABA and CA require certain information in a contingent fee arrangement. The ABA requires the attorney's percentage of recovery; whether it's taken out before or after expenses; and who pays for which expenses. CA also requires the lawyer to advise the client how work not paid for under the contingency will be compensated.

Here, L arguably meets neither requirement. Specifically, he does not explain how work outside the contingency will be paid for. For example, the agreement is completely silent about how L will be compensated in the event that one of the clients pleads guilty. It's unclear whether that would be counted as success at trial, or whether L would recover nothing. That information would be highly relevant to the clients in determining the veracity of L's advice. Under the ABA, by analogy to a civil case, it's like L is only explaining what his percentage would be with the best and worst possible outcomes. Under the CA rules, he's failing to explain how work outside the contingency will be compensated.

Therefore, L is likely subject to discipline under both these rules as well.

Excessive Fee

The size of L's fee also raises an issue. Under the ABA rules a lawyer's fee must be reasonable in light of the experience of the lawyer, time and preparation required, nature of the case, and the result achieved. Under the CA rules the fee must not be unconscionable.

Here, a board might argue that L was unqualified for the case, and didn't plan on doing much work, $10000 is unreasonable. On the other hand L might argue that this is a complex robbery case, where he represents 2 defendants, and he is charging a flat fee, so $10,000 makes sense through trial. The outcome likely depends on more facts. Under the higher CA standard that's obviously a harder argument. But the board would likely look to the fees for similar work to see if this is unreasonable/unconscionable.

So this might be grounds for discipline depending on additional facts.

Request for Payment After Discharge

L also requested payment for $2000 for the work already performed. Generally, when a lawyer is discharged by a client they represent on contingency, they may recover through quantum meruit for the work already done. Here though, L appears to have added almost no value to B and S's case. Additionally, if a lawyer is discharged by the court they may not be able to recover. Finally, this was an unethical fee arrangement, so it's unlikely the court would enforce a portion of it to compensate L.

Therefore, although a lawyer might ordinarily be entitled to quantum meruit, L probably isn't entitled to the $2000, and demanding that payment is unreasonable.

Duty of Competence

Finally, L has violated his duty of competence. A lawyer has an obligation to competently represent his clients.

Under the ABA rules, a client must employ the time, preparation, skill, expertise, knowledge, and experience necessary to reasonably represent the client. If a client does not have those factors, he must learn the relevant material if possible without undue delay or associate with a competent attorney.

CA looks to a similar standard, but will only discipline a lawyer for repeated or reckless violations of the duty of competence.

Here, L was an estate lawyer, with no criminal experience. There's no indication he associated with a competent attorney. And it seems unlikely that he took time to prepare since the court was so frustrated with him they dismissed him as counsel. Under the ABA standard then, it's very likely that L failed to employ the requisite experience, skill, knowledge, time, and preparation in the case.

Therefore under the ABA rules, it's highly likely that L would be subject to discipline. Under the CA rules it's unclear whether this is L's first violation, so he might argue that his conduct is not repeated. But there's a strong argument he acted recklessly. An armed robbery prosecution has a potential to seriously and permanently harm the interests of the lawyer's client(s). Failing to act competently at any stage could waive issues on appeal, or cause a host of problems that lead to long-term incarceration, and a felony conviction. That risk would be apparent to any attorney undertaking a serious criminal case. Taking on such a case without apparently any preparation, or association when you have no prior background in that area is arguably disregarding a substantial and known risk.

Therefore, even under CA's standard, L probably not only violated the duty of competence, but would be subject to discipline for reckless conduct.

Duty of Decorum in the Court

A lawyer also owes duties to the court.

Among others, a lawyer has a duty to uphold decorum in the court, and behave professionally and appropriately at all times. They should act in a way that builds the confidence in the legal profession. Arriving at an arraignment with such serious lack of preparation that the court was forced to appoint alternative counsel, and discharge the lawyer arguably violates those duties.

The lack of preparation is clearly disruptive to the court proceedings, and inconveniences the court and the parties, so it violates the duty to uphold decorum in the court. Such flagrant lack of preparation also undermines public confidence in the judicial system, by appearing to undermine the integrity of counsel. That's particularly important in a criminal prosecution, where there's a strong interest in ensuring adequate representation on both sides.

Therefore, L may be subject to discipline for violating (some of) his duties to the court as well.

In all, under both the ABA and CA rules, L is likely subject to discipline for violations of the duty of loyalty, the duty of confidentiality, financial duties, duty of competence, and duty of decorum in the court.

Answer B

Duty of loyalty

A lawyer has a duty of loyalty to his clients. The duty of loyalty prohibits a lawyer from representing an individual with interests that are adverse to that of a current or former client. A lawyer may nevertheless represent parties with conflicting interests if he reasonably believes that he can provide adequate representation despite the conflict, if he can inform both clients of the conflict without breaching his duty of confidentiality, and if he obtains the consent of both clients to proceed. In California, the lawyer needs only a subjective belief that he can provide adequate representation. Additionally, California requires that the lawyer obtain written consent from the clients. Moreover, the California rules require a lawyer to get the consent of the clients when the potential is merely a potential conflict and again when the conflict ripens into an existing conflict.

Here, a potential conflict exists between the clients because they are co-defendants. During the course of the criminal trial, it is possible for the interests of Betty and Sheila to become adverse to each other. For example, Betty and Sheila might not agree on a defense to assert or they might not agree on plea deal. Because there is a potential conflict of interest, Lou is required to inform the clients of the conflict of interest and to get their written consent before proceeding. There is nothing in the facts to indicate that the clients consented to the potential conflict of interest. However, under the ABA rules, Lou has not breached his ethical duties because the conflict is merely a potential and not an existing conflict.

Therefore, it is likely that Lou breached his ethical duty in CA by not obtaining written consent from the clients. However, it does not appear that he has breached his duties under the ABA rules.

Personal conflicts of interest.

The duty of loyalty also requires that the lawyer disclose his clients of personal conflicts that he has. In California, personal conflicts simply require disclosure and not consent and personal conflicts are not imputed to other lawyers at the attorney's firm.

Here, Lou likely has a personal conflict of interest because Lou is Betty's uncle. The fact that Lou is Betty's uncle indicates that he might tend to act more in Betty's best interest rather than acting in the best interest of Sheila. This is purely a personal conflict of interest. In California, Lou is simply required to disclose the conflict to Sheila. Under the ABA rules, however, Sheila is required to consent to the conflict and the consent must be memorialized in writing. The facts here do not indicate that there has been disclosure and do not indicate that Sheila has consented to the conflict.

Therefore, Lou has breached his ethical duty by not disclosing her personal relationship to Betty to Sheila.

Lou's retainer agreement

The facts here indicate that L will make every effort to inform clients of potentially conflicting representations. This disclaimer is not enough to satisfy the consent requirement for a conflict of interest and does not relieve Lou of any liability for not receiving consent for conflicts of interest. This disclaimer has no effect on Lou's duty of loyalty to Betty and Sheila.

Moreover, the agreement states that the lawyer will make every effort to inform clients of any potentially conflicting representations. According to the CA rules, this is not sufficient and Lou must obtain written consent from the clients for any potential conflicts of interest.

Duty of competence

A lawyer has a duty of competence which requires him to provide competent representation to his clients by using the appropriate skills, knowledge, and thoroughness. A lawyer who is not competent in a particular area may nevertheless take a case in that area if he can either 1) become competent before trial through research and familiarizing himself with the area of law or 2) associating with a lawyer who is competent in the area. Additionally, in an emergency, a lawyer may act in an area in which he is not competent, as long as he stops the representation when the emergency is over. In California, a lawyer breaches his duty of competence only if he intentionally, recklessly, or repeatedly acts without competence.

Here, Lou is an estate planning attorney who has never represented defendants in a criminal case before. Lou has not breached his duty of competence merely by taking the case because he can potentially become competent in the area or he can associate with an attorney who is competent in the area. The facts, however, do not indicate the Lou has done either of these things. Lou clearly has not familiarized himself with the area of law because the court was angered during the arraignment with Lou's unfamiliarity with criminal procedure. Additionally, there is nothing in the facts that indicates that Lou has associated with a competent attorney. Therefore, under the ABA rules, it is likely that Lou has breached his duty of competence.

Under the CA rules, a lawyer breaches his duty of competence only if he acts incompetently intentionally, recklessly, or repeatedly. In this instance, Lou has not repeatedly acted without competence because there is no indication that it was Lou's normal practice to accept representation for clients in areas in which he is not competent. There is a strong argument that Lou has intentionally or recklessly acted without competence. If Lou has not made any effort to familiarize himself with the area of law, then he has intentionally acted incompetently. However, if Lou truly made an effort to become competent but nevertheless was unable to become competent, it is unlikely that he acted intentionally or recklessly.

Therefore, Lou has clearly breached the ABA rules by acting incompetently. His actions preceding the arraignment would indicate whether or not he has breached his duty under the CA rules by intentionally or recklessly acting incompetently.

Fee agreement

Contingent fees

In a contingent case, the lawyer must give the client a written fee agreement that states 1) the lawyers % of the recovery, 2) expenses to be paid out of the recovery, 3) whether the lawyer's fee will be taken before or after expenses are taken out, 4) other expenses that the client will be required to pay. Additionally, under both the ABA and CA rules, contingent fee agreements are not permitted in criminal cases.

Here, Lou clearly has a contingent fee agreement because his payment is contingent on whether or not the clients are successful either before or after trial. Additionally, this is a criminal case because Betty and Sheila were charged with armed robbery. Therefore, it was not proper under either the ABA or the CA rules for Lou to enter into a contingency agreement with Betty and Sheila because of the criminal nature of their case. Moreover, even if it were proper for Lou to enter into a contingency agreement with his clients in this instance, the contingency agreement would not meet the requirements under the ABA and CA rules because the agreement states that Lou will be paid $10,000, which is not a percentage of the recovery.

Non-contingent fees

If this is not a contingent agreement but rather is a fee agreement, certain requirements must be met. The agreement must state how the lawyer's fee is calculated, what the duties of the clients and the lawyer are, and what expenses will be paid out of the fee. In California, the agreement is required to be in writing unless it is for 1) less than $1000, 2) a corporation, 3) regularly performed services for a regular client, 4) it is impracticable, or 5) there is an emergency.

Here, the fee agreement does not indicate how L's fee is calculated: it merely states what the fee is, $10,000, and when the fee is incurred: if the client is successful in their case. Although the fee agreement is in writing in this instance as it was contained in the retainer agreement, it does not meet all the requirements for a fee agreement because it does not provide enough details about how the fee is calculated and it does not provide information about the lawyer's and client's duties.

Therefore, Lou has breached his ethical duties because he has used a contingent agreement in a criminal case. Even if the agreement were not contingent, he has breached his ethical duties because he did not include enough information about how the fee is calculated to satisfy the CA and ABA rules.

Fee amount

The $10,000 flat fee

Under the ABA, the fees that a lawyer charges must be reasonable. Under the ABA, a lawyer's fees cannot be unconscionably high. Some factors used to determine whether a lawyer's fees are reasonable are the time he spends on the case, his expertise and experience, the difficulty and novelty of the matter, and the result obtained.

Here, it is difficult to determine whether Lou's fee of $10,000 is unconscionable or unreasonable. Given that the fee is obtained only if the client is successful at trial, it could be considered reasonable. However given that it is a flat fee instead of a percentage of the client's recovery indicates that it might not be reasonable or conscionable, depending on what the client actually recovers at trial. Additionally, the fee does not take into account how much work that Lou puts in the case. Under the agreement, it is possible for Lou to get the $10,000 fee if the case is dismissed early on in the proceeding before Lou has performed any work.

Given all these facts, it is likely that the $10,000 flat fee is not reasonable or conscionable under the CA and ABA rules.

The $2,000 charge

The $2,000 charge that Lou eventually charged to Betty and Sheila likely is not reasonable or conscionable since he had not yet incurred any costs. Additionally, the arraignment was only 2 days after Betty and Sheila came to Lou for help. This means that Lou is seeking to be paid $1,000 per day. This fee is definitely unreasonable and unconscionable, especially given that Lou apparently made no effort to learn criminal procedure or criminal law since the judge was angered during the arraignment due to Lou's unfamiliarity with criminal procedure.

Therefore, Lou violated his ethical duty by asking Betty and Sheila to pay him $2,000 for a mere 2 days of incompetent work.

Loans to clients

Under the ABA rules, a lawyer is prohibited from making loans to his client unless 1) the loan is an advance of litigation costs to an indigent client or 2) the loan is an advance of litigation fees in a contingent case. Under the CA rules, a lawyer is allowed to make a loan to his client for any reason so long as the client and the lawyer enter into a written loan agreement. Additionally, in CA, a lawyer is prohibited from promising to pay a client's debts in order to persuade the client to agree to have the lawyer represent them.

Here, Lou has promised to advance the costs of prosecuting or defending a claim or action or otherwise protecting or promoting the client's interest. The facts here do not indicate that either Betty or Sheila are indigent, so this agreement would not be permitted on this grounds. However, the fee arrangement here is appears to be a contingent fee basis since Lou will recover only if the clients are successful at trial. Therefore, the lawyer could appropriately advance the litigation costs in this instance under the ABA rules.

This agreement is likely valid under the CA rules because the clients have entered into a written loan agreement with Lou. The agreement is written because it is contained in the retained agreement, which was signed by both Betty and Sheila.

Therefore, Lou has not breached his ethical duties under the CA rules because he has entered into a written loan agreement with the clients. Additionally, he has not breached his duties under the ABA rules if this agreement can validly be classified as a contingent fee agreement.

Withdrawal

A lawyer is required to withdraw from a case when he is fired or when continuing representation would violate a law or ethical duty. Upon withdrawal, the lawyer must return all materials related to the representation to the clients. In CA, the lawyer is prohibited from keeping the materials in order to persuade the client to pay the lawyer any fees owed.

In this instance, Lou has been removed from the case by the judge. This is likely akin to being fired. If this act is not alone enough to constitute Lou being fired, it is likely that the clients agreeing to representation by new counsel is enough for Lou to be considered fired, thus requiring that he withdraw from the case. The fact that Lou's retainer agreement states that the Lawyer agrees to represent Clients through any settlement or trial does not affect his ability to withdraw from or to be fired in the case. Here, Lou contends that Betty and Sheila owe him $2000 to reimburse Lou for the time that he spent on the case. Under the CA rules, Lou would not be permitted to hold the materials of the clients hostage while he waits for them to pay this amount. Under both the ABA and CA rules, Lou is required to give the materials related to the representation back to the clients.

Therefore, it is not clear that Lou has breached an ethical duty yet. But it is possible for him to breach an ethical duty by not withdrawing or by not promptly returning the clients' materials.

Q4 Community Property

Wilma, a California resident, was employed as an accountant for many years. She retired in 2010 and received a pension. Wilma received part of the pension as a lump sum and the rest in monthly installments deposited into an account in her name at Main Street Bank. She used the lump sum as a down payment on a townhouse. The title to the townhouse and the mortgage are in Wilma's name.

In 2011, Wilma met Harry, also a California resident, who worked in a local store. Wilma and Harry married in 2012. Harry opened an account at Valley Bank in his name and deposited his salary from the store into the account. Wilma did freelance accounting work and deposited the pay from that work into her Main Street Bank account.

During their marriage, Wilma and Harry used funds from Harry's account to pay the mortgage on the townhouse in which they both lived. They paid all their household expenses from Wilma's account. Wilma's pay from her accounting work did not cover all their expenses and her monthly pension installments paid the rest of their expenses.

In 2013, Wilma and Harry bought a motorboat using funds from Wilma's account. Although they would both use the boat, title was taken in Wilma's name.

In 2014, Harry was injured when a driver, Dana, negligently struck him with her car.

In 2016, Wilma and Harry permanently separated, and Harry moved out of the townhouse and stopped making mortgage payments.

In 2017, Harry settled his claim against Dana for $30,000.

In 2018, Harry instituted dissolution proceedings.

What are Wilma's and Harry's rights and liabilities, if any, with regard to:

1. The townhouse? Discuss.

2. The motorboat? Discuss.

3. The personal injury settlement funds? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

.

Answer A

California (CA) is a community property (CP) state. There is a community presumption, meaning that all property acquired during marriage is CP. This includes wages of either spouse and labor of either spouse during marriage. There are areas of separate property (SP): (1) property acquired before or after marriage, (2) property acquired during marriage by either spouse through gift, will, or inheritance, (3) Property acquired from SP funds, and (4) profits, rents, and issue of SP. The burden is on the spouse opposing SP to defeat the CP presumption. Courts use the source rule to determine the character of property by tracing the source of funds used to acquire the property.

The marital economic community (MEC) begins at marriage and ends at death of either spouse, divorce, or with the intent of either spouse to not resume the marital relationship coupled with conduct indicating that intent. If spouses maintain the facade of marriage the MEC has not ended.

Here, Wilma (W) and Harry (H) married in 2012. This is when the MEC began. The MEC likely ended in 2016 when W and H permanently separated. Although separation in and of itself is not sufficient to end MEC, it shows the intent of both spouses not to resume the MEC. The fact that Henry moved out is conduct that supports that intent. However, if Henry moved out for the intention of improving and coming back together, the MEC would officially end when H instituted divorce proceedings in 2018.

Generally, on divorce, CP is divided equally in kind, meaning on a per-item basis (not in the aggregate), unless a special rule requires deviation from the equal distribution requirement. Earning power is not generally not considered, other than considering spousal support or debt. Upon divorce, each spouse is entitled to their own SP. Upon death, one spouse's CP inures to the other spouse, such that the surviving spouse ends up with 100% of CP. The surviving spouse is entitled to at least 1/3 of decedent- spouse's SP, depending on how many, if any, heirs or issue the decedent left behind.

Note, that all CP is divided equally between the spouses. Thus, even if property below is awarded CP, it is still split between the two spouses upon marriage, with the exception of personal injury funds.

TOWNHOUSE

The issue is whether the townhouse is CP or SP. As stated above, property acquired before marriage is presumptively SP. Here, the townhouse was purchased by W prior to 2012 when H and W married. Additionally, wages of either spouse earned prior to marriage is SP. The court will trace the source of the funds used to acquire the townhouse to determine its character. Here, the source of funds is W's pension before she was married. To determine the character of pension, courts use the time rule. Courts consider the amount of time the spouse worked during marriage to get the pension divided by the amount of time total the spouse worked to get the pension. The rationale for the formula is that spouse's labor during marriage is CP and any funding earned from spouse's labor is CP. However, W received the pension before she met or married H. As such, the entire pension is her SP. As such, the townhouse was initially SP.

Spouses may alter the character of assets during marriage with an agreement known as a transmutation agreement. A transmutation agreement may alter the character of CP to SP, SP to CP, or one spouse's SP to another spouse's SP. A valid transmutation agreement must be in writing, accepted by the adversely accepted party (signed), and expressly state that ownership of the property is being transferred. One exception to the writing requirement is gifts of personal property given by one souse to another spouse that are not substantial in value and used in the home. Here, there were no transmutation agreements because there was no writing. Rather, after the MEC, the spouses began paying off the mortgage on the townhouse with funds from Harry's account, which is CP (as discussed below). Harry might argue that the fact that both spouses lived in the townhouse changed the character of the townhouse. However, that is insufficient. There was not a valid transmutation agreement. As such, using CP to pay the mortgage on SP did not alter the character of the townhouse from SP to CP.

When property is acquired in joint and equal form, there is a presumption that the property is CP and if any SP was used to purchase the property is subject to the Lucas and anti-Lucas statute. Here, the townhouse was solely in W's name alone. Therefore, the presumption that arises from joint and equal form and the anti-Lucas (which applies on divorce) and the Lucas (which applies on death) need not be considered.

Harry may argue that the fact that CP funds are used during marriage to pay off the mortgage on the townhouse makes the property CP. The funds used to pay down the debt constituted deposits of H's salary at the Main Street Bank. As stated above, wages earned during marriage by either spouse are CP. The fact that such wages are deposited into an account in the sole name of just one spouse does not alter the character of the funds. Therefore, the funds in Harry's account deposited after 2012 are CP. The funds beforehand are SP.

Here, the Court will trace back the funding used for the house. As stated above, the downpayment was W's SP, but for the reasons stated in the previous paragraph, the mortgage was paid with CP.

When CP funds are used towards SP property, the character of the property does not change. Rather, the community gets a pro rata ownership share in the property. Courts use the principal debt reduction method to discern the community's ownership share in the property. The community is entitled to the amount it expended to "feather the nest" of CP. Additionally, the community is entitled to the pro-rata increase in value of the property as to its pro-rata ownership share. As such, the townhouse is SP, and under the principal debt reduction method, the CP will receive a pro rata share as follows: amount of CP funds expended on paying down the debt divided by the total amount of SP and CP money used to pay off the debt X the increase in value. Furthermore, the CP is entitled to the funds expended on paying down the debt from H's account.

If the court finds that the property was somehow held in joint and equal form, upon divorce, under the anti-Lucas statute, the SP spouse is entitled to a refund for downpayment, and any improvements and principal payments. Under this unlikely theory, W will receive a refund for the downpayment.

With regards to the mortgage, the lender's primary intent when giving the loan determines the character of the loan. If the lender looks to SP as security, the mortgage is likely SP. However, if the lender looks to the spouse's standing in the community or CP property as security, the loan is likely CP. Here, the loan was given before marriage. Therefore, the mortgage is entirely SP. Upon divorce, W will be responsible for the mortgage unless justice requires otherwise.

MOTORBOAT

The issue is whether the motorboat is SP or CP considering that it was purchased during the marriage, but from funding from Wilma's account. As stated above, property purchased during marriage is presumptively CP. Here, the motorboat was purchased during the marriage and therefore is presumptively CP. W will urge the court to use the source rule to trace back the funds used to purchase the motorboat. Here, the funds used to purchase the motorboat were funds from Wilma's bank account. Funds from Wilma's bank account include the pension plan monthly installments as well as her pay from freelance accounting.

W may argue that the motorboat is SP because it was purchased in her name alone and with funds from a bank account held in her name alone. W will not prevail on this argument because depositing wages earned during MEC into an account held in the name of only one spouse does not alter the character of the asset. Additionally, holding property in the name of one spouse does not defeat the community presumption that arises when property is acquired during marriage. As such, W will not prevail on these arguments. For the reasons stated above, neither action is a valid transmutation agreement (no writing).

As stated above, the pension plan monthly installments are W's SP because she worked as an accountant for many years prior to the marriage and thus, under the time rule, none of her labor during the marriage (CP labor) was used to earn the pension. However, W also deposited her pay from the freelance accounting jobs into her Main Street account as well. After MEC, W did freelance accounting. Since these wages were earned during the marriage, W's bank account in Main Street is commingled with both CP and SP.

COMMINGLED FUNDS

H might argue that W's pension plan benefits are CP because they were commingled with CP. However, commingling SP and CP funds does not alter the character of either spouse. When CP and SP funds are commingled, the burden is on the spouse claiming that property acquired with funds from that account is SP to show that SP funds were used to acquire the property. Here, W may claim that her pension benefit funds only were used to purchase the motorboat and thus, under the source rule, the motorboat is SP.

W can satisfy the burden using two methods of accounting: (1) direct in-direct-out method and (2) the exhaustion rule. Under the direct-in-direct-out rule the spouse claiming SP must show that there were sufficient SP funds in the account and that the spouse had the intent to purchase the asset with SP funds. Alternatively, under the exhaustion rule, the spouse claiming SP must show that all the CP funds were used in the account and all that was left in the account was SP. Under the family expense presumption, expenditures for community items, such as living, rent, food, etc. are presumptively made from CP. However, inevitably due to commingling and inadequate records, SP funds may be used for family expenses. If there are not adequate records and commingling occurs, it is presumed the SP funds used for family expenses are a gift to the community.

Here, H and W paid all of their household expenses from Wilma's account - the account that has both SP and CP. Wilma's pay from her accounting work, which is CP, was not enough to cover all of their expenses and the monthly pension installments (SP) were used to pay the rest of the expenses. Under the exhaustion rule, W has a strong argument that only SP funds were used to purchase the motorboat because the CP funds were "exhausted," shown by the fact that Wilma's accounting work was not enough to pay for their expenses. This means that inevitably Wilma's separate property was used to pay for the living expenses. Under the family expense presumption, it is presumed that CP was used first to pay for the family expenses and that all the funds left to purchase the boat were Wilma's SP. H can argue some of W's SP was used for the family expenses and some of Wilma's accounting work (CP) was used for the motorboat. However, due to the family expense presumption, H is unlikely to prevail in this argument given the exhaustion method.

Under the direct-in-direct-out method, Wilma must argue that not only were SP funds available but also it was her intent that the motorboat remain SP. It is unclear from the facts when the motorboat was purchased - whether it was at a time when the Wilma's wages from accounting were exhausted and thus only SP funds were available for the rest of the expenses, or was it during the beginning of the month when both SP and CP funds were available. H may argue that Wilma's pension funds used for expenses is presumably CP because the funds were commingled. A court may have to seek more documents to see the status of the funds during the time the motorboat was purchased. However, it is likely that SP pension funds were available when the boat was purchased because SP funds were used by the "finish out the month" after the CP funds were exhausted. This means that generally SP funds were always available.

If court finds that SP funds were available, then with regards to the intent, W will argue that the spouses intended the motorboat to be SP because it was held in her name alone. H will argue that the intent was for the property to be shared because they both used the motorboat.

H may also argue that W violated her fiduciary duty to him as a spouse. Due to the close and honest relationship between spouses, courts find a fiduciary duty relationship. Where one spouse gains a better position in a transaction as compared to the other spouse, there is a presumption that the spouse in the better position breached that duty. Here, H may argue that W breached her duty using SP funds to purchase the motorboat and thus, the community does not have a stake in the property. H can argue that W was more sophisticated financially then H because she was employed as an accountant for many years and was working as a freelance accountant during the marriage. H can point out that he merely worked at a local store and did not have the financial knowledge held by W. H can argue that CP funds were available from his work at the store, as well. This is a strong argument for H and a court will strongly consider this fact when deciding whether W satisfied her burden from the commingled funds.

Accordingly, unlike PI and townhouse, it is unclear who has rights to the motorboat.

PERSONAL INJURY SETTLEMENT FUNDS

The issue is whether the personal injury (PI) funds are CP and SP considering the cause of action arose during the MEC, but the case settled after the MEC. Generally, all funds acquired during marriage are presumptively CP. With regards to PI settlement awards, if the cause of action arose during the MEC, the settlement award is CP, UNLESS the settlement award is from the other spouse when the other spouse is the tortfeasor. The rationale behind this is if the funds were CP, the tortfeasor spouse would be able to benefit from his own wrongdoing. Although PI funds awarded from a cause of action that arose during marriage are CP, upon the divorce the court usually awards the funds exclusively to the injured spouse as SP. However, this exception is limited and applies only if those funds are not spent. The court will attempt to trace back the funds to determine that.

Here, H was injured by driver (D) when she negligently struck him in 2014. H and W permanently separated in 2016 and divorced in 2018. As such, even if the MEC did not end at separation (as discussed above), the cause of action still arose during MEC. Although the funds were paid out afterwards, the funds were initially CP.

H will ask the court to provide the award solely to him because he was the victim of the accident. Here, the funds were paid out after the MEC and there is no evidence that supports an assertion that it would be difficult to trace the funds, given that they were awarded after MEC has ended. As such, H is likely to receive rights to the entire award at divorce because he was the victim and tracing is not an issue. While courts may split PI awards evenly if justice so requires, there are no facts here that suggest it is equitable to split the PI funds. Accordingly, H will receive the PI settlement award.

Answer B

California is a community property state. There is a presumption that all assets acquired during marriage are community property. California also recognizes the following forms of separate property: (1) property acquired before marriage, (2) property acquired through gift or inheritance, (3) expenditure of separate property, and (4) rents and profits of separate property.

Upon divorce, all community property assets are separated equally in kind, unless otherwise provided by a special rule of community property. Separate property remains separate property upon divorce.

THE TOWNHOUSE

There is an issue as to how the townhouse should be distributed upon divorce. Here, Wilma purchased the townhouse in 2010, prior to Wilma and Harry's marriage in 2012. Both title to the townhouse and the mortgage are in Wilma's name. The townhouse is presumptively Wilma's separate property since it was acquired before marriage.

Characterization of Funds From Harry's Account

There is an issue as to whether the funds used to make the payments on the townhouse mortgage were separate property or community property. Generally, all assets acquired during marriage, including any income earned, is presumptively community property. The fact that the funds are placed in a separate account, not a joint account, does not change the characterization of the property.

Here, the funds to pay the mortgage on the townhouse came from Harry's account. Harry opened the account only in his name and deposited his salary from his job into the account. The fact that the funds were put into an account in Harry's name does not change the fact that the funds were community property. Since the funds were acquired from a job during marriage, they were community property. The community therefore was responsible for paying down the mortgage on the townhome.

Proration Rule

Under the proration rule, when community property is used to pay an installment payment on separate property, the community gains an interest in the property. The community has a prorated interest in the property, calculated by the expenditure of community property towards the installment payment over the total purchase price.

Here, Wilma and Harry used funds from Harry's account to pay the mortgage on the townhouse. As discussed above, the funds from Harry's job are community property. Since community property was used to pay down the balance of the mortgage, the community has a pro rata interest in the townhouse. The community's interest in the townhouse is the ratio between the amount of community funds used to pay the mortgage, over the total purchase price.

Conclusion

The community has an interest in the townhouse, calculated by the ratio between the amount of community funds used to pay the mortgage over the total purchase price. Wilma and Harry will split the proceeds from the community's interest in the townhouse.

THE MOTORBOAT

There is an issue as to Wilma's and Harry's rights and liabilities in the motorboat. Since the motorboat was acquired during marriage, there is a presumption that the boat is community property, despite the fact that title was taken only in Wilma's name.

Characterization of Wilma's Pension

There is an issue as to whether the monthly payments from Wilma's pension are community property or are separate property. Generally, property acquired before marriage is separate property. However, property acquired during marriage, such as income, is considered community property.

Here, Wilma retired in 2010 and received a pension. Wilma received part of the pension as a lump sum and received the rest in monthly installments. She then deposited these funds into an account in her name at the Main Street Bank. Harry may try to argue that these funds are community property since Wilma gets funds each month, characterizing them as income. Wilma, however, will argue that the pension funds were earned and acquired before marriage. Wilma worked as an accountant for many years. Wilma had to work for many years prior to 2010 before receiving a pension. The work was already done, and Wilma earned her pension when she retired in 2010, despite the fact that it was paid over many months. Wilma will argue that unlike income, she did not perform any work during marriage to receive the funds. Wilma had a property interest in the pension prior to her marriage with Harry.

Wilma's pension will likely be considered her separate property, since it was earned prior to marriage. Wilma's pension was a result of her work as an accountant, from which she retired prior to the marriage.

Characterization of Wilma's Salary

Generally, all assets acquired during marriage--including income--are community property. Here, Wilma took a salary from freelance accounting work which she deposited into her Main Street Bank account. Wilma's salary was earned during marriage and is therefore community property.

Commingling of Funds

There is an issue as to whether Wilma's separate property or community property was used to purchase the boat. The commingling of separate property and community property does not transform the nature of the property. Wilma has deposited both her pension--separate property, and her salary--community property, into her account. The assets have been commingled and it must be determined whether separate property or community property was used to purchase the boat.

Family Expenses Presumption

There is a presumption that all family expenses are paid with community property. Any funds spent on household expenses exceeding the amount of community property is deemed to be a gift to the community.

Here, Wilma and Harry paid all household expenses from Wilma's account. Wilma's pay from the accounting work was not enough to cover their expenses, and her monthly pension paid the remaining expenses. There is a presumption that all these household expenses were paid using the community property assets.

Exhaustion

A spouse can show that a purchase was made with separate property from a commingled account if they show that the community funds were exhausted, and the only remaining funds were separate property.

Here, Wilma paid all household expenses with the commingled funds from Wilma's account. Based on the family expenses presumption, discussed above, the payment of these expenses is presumed to be from community property. Wilma can show that the community property funds in the account were exhausted, since Wilma's pay from her accounting work did not cover all their expenses. Wilma was required to use her monthly pension installments to pay the remaining expenses. Since the community property funds were depleted each month to pay for the household expenses, the only funds remaining in her account were her separate property funds from her pension. Wilma can therefore show that the separate property funds were used to purchase the motorboat. Since the motorboat was purchased with Wilma's separate property, the motorboat is Wilma's property, not subject to equal division upon divorce.

Tracing

Tracing is available when you can directly trace a deposit of separate property into a commingled account to a subsequent purchase. For example, if Wilma deposited $12,000 into her account, and then purchased the boat for $12,000, the court can trace the purchase to the deposit of separate property. Here, however, Wilma only deposited her salary and monthly pension installments into the account, and tracing is not available.

Joint Use/Transmutation

Harry may try to argue that the boat is community property since they agreed that they would both use the boat. Joint use does not change the character of the property. Here, the property was acquired through the expenditure of Wilma's separate property, making the boat her separate property.

A valid transmutation requires a writing signed by the spouse whose interest is affected, and must explicitly state that a transmutation in the form of property is being made. Here, there is no writing signed by Wilma. The fact that both parties agreed to use the boat does not transform the separate property into community property.

Conclusion

There is a presumption that the boat is community property since it was acquired during marriage. Wilma, however, can show that the motorboat was purchased with her separate property. Wilma purchased the boat from a commingled account containing community and separate property. The community property was exhausted each month to pay the family expenses, and the only remaining money was Wilma's separate property. This separate property was used to purchase the boat, making it an expenditure of separate property. The boat is separate property and not subject to equal division upon divorce--Wilma has a 100% interest.

PERSONAL INJURY SETTLEMENT FUNDS

There is an issue as to how Harry's settlement for his personal injury claim should be distributed upon divorce. Funds received from a personal injury settlement are community property if the cause of action arose during the economic community.

End of Economic Community

The economic community ends when the parties intend not to continue marital relations, and take action consistent with that intent.

Here, Wilma and Harry permanently separated in 2016, but did not file for dissolution proceedings in 2018. It is unclear whether the parties intended to divorce when they separated in 2016. If the parties intended to end marital relations in 2016, it does not matter that dissolution was not filed until 2018. The fact that Wilma and Harry permanently separated is sufficient conduct for the economic community to have ended in 2016 if they intended to permanently end marital relations at the time of separation.

Harry was injured in 2014, while the parties were still married. Harry, however, did not settle his claim against Dana until 2017--arguably after the end of the economic community. Harry may try to argue that the personal injury award should be his separate property since it was obtained after the economic community. His argument will fail, however, because his cause of action arose in 2014 when the parties were still married. The parties were married at the time the cause of action arose, and Harry's settlement funds are therefore community property.

Personal Injury Funds Upon Divorce

Generally, personal injury settlement funds are community property. The court will, however, award the entire recovery to the injured spouse upon divorce, unless the money has been spent or the interests of justice require otherwise. Here, although the funds are community property, the money does not appear to be spent, and it does not seem unfair to award Harry the entire settlement. Harry should therefore be awarded the entire $30,000 settlement upon divorce.

Conclusion

Although Harry settled the claim after the end of the economic community, the cause of action arose while the parties were married making the settlement community property. The court should, however, award the entire $30,000 settlement to Harry, the injured spouse.

Q5 Constitution

Five years ago, State X bought Railroad (RR), which was in bankruptcy and about to be liquidated. RR has always been the largest rail carrier in State X, presently carrying 70% of its rail freight. RR's transport rates are generally lower than other rail carriers. In signing the Act authorizing the purchase of RR, the governor stated that it would ensure continued freight rail service for State X industry.

The Act authorizing the purchase of RR provides that manufacturers with factories in State X shall have first choice of space on RR.

Peter, a citizen of State Y, which borders State X, grows melons in State Y for sale to grocers there and in State X. Before its purchase by State X, Peter exclusively used RR for shipping melons to his many State X customers. Peter has lost nearly all of his State X customers over the last 5 years because he cannot guarantee timely delivery of ripe melons because shipping space on RR is so uncertain.

Corporation manufactures refrigerators in State Y and sells them there and in other states, including State X. Corporation has lost retail customers in State X because it can no longer guarantee dates of delivery when using RR.

Peter and Corporation have repeatedly been forced to give up reserved space on RR because it is being used by State X manufacturers. They have now filed suit in Federal Court in State X.

1. What claims can Peter make under the United States Constitution and how should the court rule? Discuss.

2. What claims can Corporation make under the United States Constitution and how should the court rule? Discuss.

Answer A

1. PETER'S POTENTIAL CLAIMS

The issues are the claims Peter can make under the United States Constitution against State X.

Dormant Commerce Clause (Negative Implications of the Commerce Clause)

Whether State X's Act providing State X manufacturers priority choice of space on RR is a violation of the Dormant Commerce Clause (DCC).

Under the Commerce Clause in the US Constitution, Congress has the authority to regulate interstate commerce. This includes (i) the channels of interstate commerce (roads, railways, waterways), (ii) the instrumentalities of interstate commerce (trucks, boats, airplanes, the internet), and (iii) economic activities that, when aggregated, have a substantial effect on interstate commerce. However, this authority is not absolute. States are allowed to regulate commerce if such regulation is not preempted by federal law, and so long as the State regulation does not discriminate against out of staters. If the state regulation discriminates on its face against out of staters, it violates the DCC unless the regulation is necessary for a compelling state interest (strict scrutiny). If the regulation does not discriminate against out of staters, it usually will be upheld so long as it does not unduly burden interstate commerce. Citizens, including individuals and corporations, as well as aliens can sue on a cause of action arising under the DCC.

Here, State X purchased RR, which is the largest rail carrier in State X. The Act authorizing the purchase of RR, provides that manufacturers with factories in State X get first choice of space on RR. Peter grows melons in State Y for sale in both State Y and State X. Peter exclusively uses RR for shipping his melons to his many State X customers. Since State X purchased RR, Peter has nearly all of his State X customers because he cannot guarantee delivery due to uncertain availability of space on RR. State X manufacturers are given priority all the time so if they fill up all freight space, there is none left for out of state users. Peter will argue the State X Act discriminates against out of states because it gives priority to manufacturers in State X to the disadvantage of out of state business. In contrast, State X will argue that even if the Act prioritizes State X manufacturers it has a compelling interest in doing so. Prior to State X's purchase of RR, the railroad was in bankruptcy. The State X Act allowed the State to purchase RR to ensure its continued service as State X's largest rail carrier. Peter, on the other hand, can argue that although State X has a interest in continuing rail service, the provision in the Act giving priority to in-state business is not necessary to achieve this interest. Continued rail service is not dependent on giving priority space to in-state users and could be accomplished just the same if all shippers received the same access regardless of whether they were in state or out of state. Thus, although State X's interest is compelling, the methods used are not necessary and thus violate the DCC.

Therefore, because the State X Act discriminates against out of staters and the method used is not necessary to achieve the Act's purpose, State X has violated the DCC.

Market Participant Exception to DCC

Whether State X is a market participant.

Congress has provided two exceptions to the DCC: (i) consent by Congress, and (ii) when the state acts as a market participant.

Here, State X owns RR and RR presently carries 70% of State X's rail freight. Because State X owns the railroad, it is acting as a market participant and would fall under the exception to the DCC so long as there is not an undue burden on interstate commerce. Presently, 70% of RR's freight comes from State X. Further, the Act does not prohibit out of state users. It simply gives priority to its existing State X users which comprise the majority of its rail freight. Therefore, it is likely that the court would find that State X qualifies as a market participant.

Therefore, although State X's Act discriminates against out of staters in violation of the DCC, State X is a market participant and as such would be exempted. Peter would fail in a claim under the DCC and the court would rule in favor of State X.

Privileges and Immunities Clause of Article IV

Whether State X's Act violates the Privileges and Immunities Clause of Article IV (P&I Clause).

The P&I Clause guarantees that citizens of each state shall be given the privileges and immunities of citizens of all states. A state law which discriminates against out of staters as to a fundamental right or civil liberties, including the ability to earn a livelihood, violates P&I Clause unless a substantial justification exists.

Here, Peter will argue that the State X Act violates the P&I Clause because it discriminates against out of staters. Peter will specifically argue that the Act has impeded his ability to earn a livelihood as evidenced by five years of lost customers for lack of access to shipping on RR. Although Peter is able to earn his livelihood in State Y and sell his melons in State Y, the State X Act substantially interferes with his preexisting customer relationships in State X, hindering his ability to earn a living. Such discrimination will violate the P&I Clause unless a substantial justification exists. Here, State X will make the same arguments regarding RR as to its market participation and its need to continue the rail service in State X. Peter will again argue other means would be available to meet the state's purpose. Unlike under the DCC claim, Peter will likely succeed in his P&I claim. Although the need to save the bankrupt RR is a substantial justification for the Act, it is not a justification for discriminating against out of staters. Therefore, Peter will likely prevail in his P&I claim.

Equal Protection

Whether Peter has an equal protection claim.

The equal protection clause under the 14th Amendment to the US Constitution applies when the government is making a distinction between similarly situated people. If the classification is based on race or national origin, then the state must meet strict scrutiny. If the classification is based on gender, then intermediate scrutiny will be used. Any other classification will only need to meet a rational basis test.

Here, Peter will be unable to argue a fundamental right has been violated. The right to use a railroad for shipping is an economic right and Peter will need to prove State X has no rational basis for the Act. Because the Act rationally relates to the legitimate interest of preserving the State X railroad, State X will likely prevail, and the court will rule against Peter.

Therefore, Peter will not prevail in an EP claim and the court will rule for State X.

Due Process

Whether Peter has a due process claim.

The Due Process clause under the 14th Amendment prohibits the government from acting arbitrarily and unreasonably.

Here, Peter will argue his due process rights were violated when State X arbitrarily and unreasonably gave priority to State X manufacturers over out of state users of RR. Because Peter used RR exclusively, he will argue he was deprived of right without due process of law. However, Peter's right to use RR relates to an economic liberty and not a fundamental right. Thus, State X's Act must only meet a rational basis test. The Act must be rationally related to the achievement of a legitimate government interest. As the challenger, Peter will have the burden to prove the Act does not meet the rational basis test. Because State X can argue that preservation of the 70% of instate users is a legitimate interest and the Act's provisions rationally relate to this, Peter will likely lose this challenge.

Therefore, Peter will likely not prevail and the court will rule for State X on this claim.

2. CORPORATION'S CLAIMS

The issues are the claims Corporation can make under the United States Constitution against State X.

Dormant Commerce Clause (Negative Implications of the Commerce Clause)

Whether Corporation has a DCC claim against State X.

See rule above.

Here, Corporation will make very similar arguments as those by Peter above. However, Corporation will further argue that because he is an out of state manufacturer he is more directly impacted by the State X Act. The State X Act specifically discriminates against out of state manufacturers by giving priority to in state manufacturers. Additionally, because Corporation does not have any factories in State X, he is further impacted because he needs RR in order to get his refrigerators into State X to sell. Nonetheless, State X will again argue for a market participant exception and will likely prevail.

Thus, Corporation will lose on a DCC claim and the court will rule in favor of State X.

P&I Clause of Article IV

Whether Corporation has a claim under the P&I clause of Article IV.

See above. The P&I clause does not apply to corporations and aliens. Therefore, they cannot sue under it.

Here, Corporation is a state Y corporation. Thus it cannot sue under the P&I clause and would not prevail in such a claim.

Due Process (DP)

Whether Corporation has a claim under the DP clause of the 14th Amendment.
The due process clause provides that states may not act unreasonably or arbitrarily. Here, Corporation will argue that State X's Act unreasonably denies him due process because it deprives him of existing rights. Further, Corporation will argue that repeatedly being forced to give up on RR just because it is an out of state manufacturer is an arbitrary and unreasonable denial of his rights. However, Corporation's right to use RR relates to an economic liberty and not a fundamental right. Thus, State X's Act must only meet a rational basis test. The Act must be rationally related to the achievement of a legitimate government interest. As the challenger, Corporation will have the burden to prove the Act does not meet the rational basis test. Because State X can argue that preservation of the 70% of instate users is a legitimate interest and the Act's provisions rationally relate to this, Corporation will likely lose this challenge.

Therefore, Corporation will likely not prevail and the court will rule for State X on this claim.

Contracts Clause

Whether Corporation has a claim under the Contracts Clause of the US Constitution.

Under the Contracts Clause of the US Constitution, a state may not impair rights under pre-existing contracts. If the interference is with a private contract, intermediate scrutiny applies. If the interference is with a government contract, strict scrutiny applies.

Here, Corporation may argue that he has lost all retail customers in State X due to the fact that it can no longer guarantee delivery dates. If Corporation is engaged in existing contracts with these customers, then the State X Act giving priority to in-staters over out-of-staters would cause an impairment to Corporations' existing contracts. Corporation has shown that it has repeatedly had to give up space on RR for in state manufacturers. However, the facts do not indicate that Corporation has existing contracts in place. The facts only state Corporation has lost retail customers; there is no indication whether they are new or existing. Thus, if Corporation can prove the State X Act has impaired his rights under existing contracts, State X will have to prove its Act meets intermediate scrutiny--the provision in the Act is substantially related to an important government interest. If State X cannot do so, then Corporation may prevail on a contracts clause claim. Therefore, if Corporation can prove impairment of existing contracts under the contracts clause, it may prevail in this claim over State X.

Answer B

1. Peter's Claims

Standing

Injury in fact; causation/redressability; ripe; not moot

A plaintiff in federal court must have standing in order for the court to hear the case. In order to have standing the plaintiff must show (1) injury-in-fact; (2) causation: the P's harms were caused by the defendant's conduct; (3) redressability: a decision in the P's favor will redress the injury caused by D (e.g. a favorable decision will remedy the harm); (4) ripeness: the case must be ripe for judgment (e.g. a case is not ripe if the law has yet to be enacted and there is insufficient details in the legislative discussion on its enforcement or the law is unlikely to be enforced); and (5) not moot: a case is moot if the harm has already occurred and is not capable of repetition, but evading review (e.g. it is not a live case and controversy).

Injury: P's injury is the loss of nearly all of his State X customers over the last 5 years. Economic damages need not be proven to shown an injury in fact, but economic harms are sufficient if a P can prove them. P could easily demonstrate that the loss of this many customers led to a downfall in profits for his melon business.

Causation: P's injury was caused by the state law at issue (the Act that authorizes State X to purchase RR and giving manufacturers with State X factories first choice of space on the RR). P has been forced on many occasions to give up his space on the RR for his melons because a State X manufacturer needed the space. This priority given to State X manufacturer has caused P much uncertainty regarding whether or not he can ship his melons to customers in State X. Additionally, P exclusively used the RR for shipping melons to his many State X customers. Because of the uncertainty of shipping space on the RR, P cannot guarantee his customers timely delivery of ripe melons, which has caused him to lose nearly all of his State X customers. Thus, there is but-for cause (but for the Act, P would not have lost its customers) and proximate causation (foreseeability and fairness). Thus, causation is satisfied.

Redressability: Because the state X Act caused the P's injuries, a decision by the court in favor of P will redress P's injuries. By striking down the Act, a court would allow P to get space on the RR without being kicked out unexpectedly by an in-state manufacturer and, thus, he would be able to deliver melons to his customers in a timely manner while the melons are still ripe.

Ripeness: Here, the Act has been enacted. It was enacted 5 years ago. It has clearly been enforced by the State because it purchased the RR and it repeatedly kicked out P and Corporation (out-of-staters) to make room for in-state manufacturers. Since it is an enacted law that is fully enforced, the case is ripe for adjudication.

Not Moot: The state may argue that this case is moot because the harm has already been done to P, he has lost nearly all his customers. Thus, a favorable decision will not be able to get those customers back. There is no live case or controversy since the law has caused all the harm it can to P. However, P will rebut that he has not lost all of his State X customers. Thus, the court striking down the law would help him to not be further harmed by losing the rest of his State X customers. Also, this is a harm (like Roe v. Wade) that is capable of repetition but evading review. Although the harm has already been caused by D's acts, it is possible that P could get more state X customers and then lose them again because of the impact of the Act on P's timely delivery of melons.

Thus, the court will likely find that P has standing to challenge State X's Act.

Dormant Commerce Clause

The Commerce Clause grants Congress the power to make laws regarding interstate commerce (between states). This power includes the right to regulate (1) instrumentalities of interstate commerce (cars, trains, planes, buses); (2) channels of interstate commerce (roads, highways, etc.); and (3) intrastate (solely in one state) economic activity that has a substantial effect (in the aggregate) on interstate commerce. Where an intrastate non-economic activity is involved, the activity's effect on interstate commerce cannot be aggregated and courts generally require that Congress submit a finding that the activity has a substantial effect on interstate commerce.

The Commerce Clause also grants certain powers to the state. As part of the negative implications of the Commerce Clause (e.g. the dormant commerce clause), states are prohibited from unduly burdening interstate commerce and particular states may not discriminate between in-staters and out-of-staters without satisfying a level of scrutiny (discussed below). If a state's actions (law, regulation, act, etc.) violate the Dormant Commerce Clause (DCC), that state's actions will be deemed unconstitutional and the relevant law/regulation will be struck down. Both corporations and aliens can sue under the DCC.

Where a state both discriminates against in-staters and out-of-staters (treats in state citizens or corporations differently from those out of state) and burdens interstate commerce, the law will be deemed unconstitutional unless the state can demonstrate that the regulation is necessary to achieve an important government interest. Necessary means that there must be no less restrictive (e.g. no less burdensome or less discriminatory) means to achieve the stated ends. It is the state's burden to satisfy this level of scrutiny.

Where a state is not discriminating between in-staters and out-of-staters, but its regulation/law burdens interstate commerce, courts perform a balancing test to determine if the state's law unduly burdens interstate commerce. The court weighs the benefits to the state and the burdens placed on interstate commerce. If the benefits outweigh the burdens, then the state law does not unduly burden interstate commerce and is constitutional (e.g. does not violate the DCC). If the burdens outweigh the benefits, then the law does unduly burden interstate commerce and it is unconstitutional (e.g. violates the DCC) and will be struck down.

Burdens and Discriminates

Here, P will argue that the Act both unduly burdens interstate commerce and discriminates between in-staters and out-of-staters. The Act unduly burdens interstate commerce because it prevents companies and businesses from being able to have reserved space on railroad transportation. Businesses require shipment of their goods between states in a timely manner. If goods are kicked off a train because of a need for priority space for in-state manufacturers, it will lead to the goods to spoil (as in the case of melons) or it will cause the business to pay extra money to secure some emergency shipment of the goods. It also causes the loss of customers for the businesses and slows down and frustrates transportation of goods between states. All of this was shown with P's situation because the priority space has led P's melons to be taken off the train and he lost customers since he failed to timely deliver these perishable goods to the customer when he contracted/promised to do so. P will also argue that it discriminates between in-staters and out-of-staters because it gives in-state manufacturers priority space on the train and does not give priority space to out-of-state companies or citizens. The law treats similarly situated companies and people differently based on their state of citizenship.

State X may rebut that it is not discriminating against out-of-staters, as the manufacturers it is favoring are not necessarily solely State X corporation, rather it is favoring those manufacturers that have factories in State X. This argument will likely be unsuccessful, as they are still favoring entities that operate within the state and disfavoring entities that operate out of state.

P's argument will likely be successful. State X will have the burden of providing that the Act is necessary to achieve an important government interest. X will argue that the important government interest is ensuring that State X industries are guaranteed freight rail service. However, courts have found it to be not an important government interest to protect in-state companies and businesses at the expense of out-of-state ones. X will next argue that providing in-state manufacturers with first choice of space on the RR is necessary to ensure that these manufacturers with in-state factories are ensured and guaranteed railroad transportation for their goods. If RR had gone bankrupt and was not bought by State X, the in state manufacturers would have lost 70% of their source of freight services, which would have been disastrous for State X's economy and its in-state corporation. Also, this RR was less expensive than other rail carriers, so its bankruptcy would have led to less profits and revenues for in-state manufacturers since they would have to pay more for shipment costs and that would harm the job market and economy of State X. X would reason that stabilizing and ensuring the continuing profits of in-state manufacturers was an important interest.

P will rebut that necessary means least restrictive means and this law could be much more narrowly tailored. For example, the law could merely guarantee that a small percentage of all rail cars on a given RR train would be kept open only for State X manufacturers and if they are not filled, those spots can be used for out of state entities as well. This would be less discriminatory and less burdensome on interstate commerce because it would never kick out an out of state company's goods that had originally planned on being shipped to customers on that particular train. Thus, the Act is not necessary because there are feasible alternatives that cause less burden and are less discriminatory.

Thus, a court will likely find that the Act both discriminates and burdens and that the state will not be able to satisfy their burden of showing the Act is necessary to serve an important government interest. Thus, the law will be found to violate the DCC unless an exception applies.

DCC Exceptions

There are a few exceptions to the dormant Commerce Clause. Where there is Congressional approval for the law/regulation/act in question, the DCC does not apply. Where a state is acting as a market participant, the state's regulation/law is allowed under the DCC. A state acts as a market participant when it assumes the role of an entity in the market place, such as a corporation, and participates in the market itself.

This would include a state-owned company. Another exception to the DCC is the traditional public function exception. This is where a statement is performing a function traditionally given to the states under their powers. Examples of this include public universities that charge lower tuition to in-state citizens as opposed to out-of-state citizens.

Here, there is no Congressional approval and the state isn't performing a traditional public function. However, State X is acting as a market participant. X bought a public company (RR) after it went bankrupt and was about to be liquidated. X bought it so that the State's manufacturers did not lose 70% of their freight services. The Act authorized the State to buy the RR and take its place as a market participant. Since X was performing the services of a private company in the marketplace of freight shipping, a court will likely find that an exception to the DCC applies.

Thus, a court will likely dismiss P's DCC claim against State X because the market participant exception applies.

Privileges and Immunities Clause under Article IV

Under the Privileges and Immunities Clause under Article IV, states are prohibited from discriminating between in-state citizens and out-of-state citizens as to fundamental rights (important rights) or important commercial activities. This clause prevents states from denying out of state citizens the privileges and immunities it provides to its own state citizens. If a state law both discriminates and burdens interstate commerce, the level of scrutiny discussed above under the DCC applies.

If the state law discriminates but does not burden interstate commerce, then the court will first ask whether a fundamental right or important commercial interest/activity is involved. Courts have found the right to earn a living to be an important commercial interest. Laws have been struck down under the privileges and immunities clause (PIC) where they only allow in-state citizens to get licenses to practice law. Laws have been struck down for charging in-state shrimp fishermen a small fee for a shrimping license (like $100), but then charged out of state fishermen an extremely large fee ($20,000-30,000). However, courts have found no important commercial interest where mere hobbies are involved. Thus, state laws charging in-state golfers lower greens fees on golf courses than out-of-state golfers were deemed constitutional and did not violate the PIC. Also, a law making hunting licenses relatively cheap for in-staters, but very expensive for out-of-staters was also found constitutional.

If a court finds a fundamental right or important commercial interest is involved, then the burden is on the state to show that the law is necessary to achieve an important government interest.

If the state law does not discriminate between in-staters and out-of-staters (and does not unduly burden interstate commerce (DCC)), the law is presumptively valid.

Unlike the DCC, corporations and aliens cannot sue under the PIC.

Here, State X is discriminating between in-state manufacturers/entities and out-of-state ones. P is an out of state citizen from State Y. State X provides first choice of freight space benefits to manufacturers with State X factories, but not those, such as P, who are out of state. The same scrutiny analysis will apply (state's burden to show Act is necessary to achieve an important government interest). P has standing to file this suit because he is an individual and a US citizen presumably, not an alien or a corporation. See DCC analysis from above. Because PIC does not have any exceptions, a court will likely find that the state cannot show the law is necessary to achieve an important government interest since less restrictive means are available. Thus, the court will find the law invalid under the PIC under Article IV and strike the law down as unconstitutional.

Equal Protection Clause

Under the EPC, applied to the states through the 14 Amendment, states may not treat similarly situated persons differently. The level of scrutiny that applies depends on what classifications is used by the government to differentiate persons/entities. Corporations and individuals can sue under the EPC.

If the state is using a suspect classification, then strict scrutiny will be used to determine the constitutionality of the law. Thus, the state has the burden to show the law is necessary to achieving a compelling government interest (it must be the least restrictive means available). Suspect classifications include race, national origin, and alienage (for the states where it does not involve a job dealing with the democratic process, such as an elementary school teacher, police officer, etc.; this does not apply to the federal government, which has plenary power over immigration).

If the state uses a quasi-suspect classification, intermediate scrutiny applies. The state has the burden to show that the law is substantially related to an important government interest. This requires narrow tailoring, which does not require the least restrictive means, but requires there is a substantial relationship between the means and the ends). Quasi-suspect classifications include gender (where the state must show an exceeding persuasive justification) or illegitimacy.

If the state uses a non-suspect classification, rational basis review applies. The plaintiff (challenger of the law) has the burden to show that the law is arbitrary, e.g. that it is not rationally related to a legitimate purpose. The purpose need not be the actual one used, but rather need only be a hypothetical one that the court could come up with. Laws generally pass RBR. RBR applies to all classifications that are not those stated for SS and IS, which includes age, mental disability, wealth, education level, etc.

Here, the classification at issue under this law is whether the entity has an in-state factory or not. This is not a suspect or quasi-suspect classification. Thus, RBR would apply. P would not be able to show that this law is arbitrary and that it is not rationally related to a legitimate purpose. The legitimate purpose could be to protect the economy of State X and X's in-state factories and stabilize employment levels. The law achieves these ends by providing access to freight shipping to these in-state entities, so it is rationally related to those ends.

Thus, under the EPC the court would likely find the law is valid and constitutional.

Due Process

The Due Process clause of the 5th amendment applies to the federal government and applies to the states through the 14th amendment. Under the DP clause, states must not act unreasonably or arbitrarily. The government cannot deprive individuals of certain rights without a counter-balancing justification for doing so. Individuals and corporations can sue under the DP clause.

If the government is depriving individuals of a fundamental right, then SS applies (stated above). Fundamental rights include the right to contraception, marriage, guiding the upbringing of one's family, sex, privacy, right to vote, right to travel.

If the government is depriving other rights, such as the right to abortion (undue burden test for pre-viability), something below SS applies. For sex between members of the same gender, it is unclear what level of scrutiny applies.

IS applies when the government is depriving a member of the public's right to commercial speech.

Law depriving individuals of other rights need only satisfy RBR.

Here, the right to have goods shipped on a freight train is not a fundamental right. Thus, P has the burden to show the Act does not satisfy RBR. Since the law does satisfy RBR, the court will likely find the law is valid under the DP clause.

Conclusion: Thus, P's DCC claim will likely be successful and a court would likely strike down the State X act as unconstitutional on DCC grounds. However, none of P's other claims would likely be successful.

2. Corporation's Claims

Standing

Similar analysis as P. C manufactures refrigerators outside of State X (in State Y). C sells those fridges to customers in State X. C has injury because it lost retail customers in State X because it could not guarantee dates of delivery. This was caused by the Act since C was repeatedly forced to give up reserved space on RR to an in-state manufacturer. Redressability is also satisfied. The claim is ripe and not moot.

Privileges and Immunities

Because corporations and aliens cannot sue under the PIC, C will not be able to bring this claim because C is a corporation.

Dormant Commerce Clause

Same analysis as above. DCC can be used by corporations and aliens, so this would be available to C. C is an out-of-state manufacturer and the Act is discriminating between out-of-state and in-state manufacturers in providing the reserved freight space.

As above, the market participant exception likely applies and thus a DCC claim would be unsuccessful.

Equal Protection

This claim can be used by individuals and corporations, so would be available to C. Same analysis as above. Same conclusion as above (the analysis for P).

Due Process

Can be used by individuals and corporations. Same analysis as above. Same conclusion as above.

Conclusion: Thus, C will likely not have any successful claims against State X's Act and, thus, a suit by C would not lead a court to strike down the State X act as unconstitutional under any grounds (unlike P's DCC claim which would be successful).

Q1 Professional Responsibility / Contracts

Austin recently sold a warehouse to Beverly. The warehouse roof is made of a synthetic material called "Top-Tile." During negotiations, Beverly asked if the roof was in good condition, and Austin replied, "I've never had a problem with it." In fact, the manufacturer of Top-Tile notified Austin last year that the warehouse roof would soon develop leaks. The valid written contract to sell the warehouse specified that the property was being sold "as is, with no warranties as to the condition of the structure."

After Beverly bought the warehouse, the roof immediately started leaking. Beverly hired Lou, an experienced trial lawyer, and executed a valid retainer agreement. Beverly then sued Austin for rescission of the warehouse sale contract, on the bases of misrepresentation and non-disclosure.

At trial, Lou offered the expert testimony of Dr. Crest, a chemical engineer who had testified in other litigation concerning Top-Tile roofs. Lou knew that Dr. Crest had previously testified that, "Top-Tile roofs always last at least five years." Lou also knew from the manufacturer's specifications that Top-Tile roofs seem to last indefinitely, but not in some climates. On cross-examination, Dr. Crest testified that, "Top-Tile roofs never last five years," and that, "Climate is not a factor; Top-Tile roofs fail within five years everywhere in the world." During closing argument, Lou repeated Dr. Crest's statements and also said that Lou's own inspection of the roof confirmed Dr. Crest's testimony.

1. Will Beverly be able to rescind the contract with Austin on the basis of misrepresentation and/or non-disclosure? Discuss.

2. What, if any, ethical violations has Lou committed? Discuss. Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

Answer A

I. Contract dispute

The first issue is whether Beverly will be able to rescind the contract with Austin based upon misrepresentation.

A valid contract requires mutual assent (offer and acceptance) and consideration. Mutual assent means that there is a meeting of the minds as to the basis of the contract or bargain and the terms of the contract. Consideration requires a bargained-for exchange of legal detriment. Where the parties to a contract do not have a meeting of the minds, that is, there is no mutual assent, then the validity of the contract can be challenged. Put another way, if the parties do not have mutual assent then no contract was formed.

Rescission is a contract remedy available where one party seeks to void a contract. Lack of mutual assent is a basis for rescission of a contract where one party shows misrepresentation, mutual mistake or non-disclosure. The result is though the contract did not exist. A misrepresentation may make a contract unenforceable where one party makes a material misrepresentation, that was a basic assumption of the contract and the other party relies on that statement and was damaged. Non-disclosure arises where a party fails to disclose a material fact of the contract which forms the basis of the contract and the other party has no reason to know of the failure to disclose.

Generally, courts look to the terms contract in determining the terms of the contract. Moreover, parol evidence is generally not available to supplement or contradict the terms of a contract. However, the parol evidence rule against extrinsic evidence does not apply to evidence regarding the formation of a contract. Thus, oral statements made at the time of entering into a contract may be admissible to show a condition on performance or misrepresentation.

Here, the facts state that Austin and Beverly entered into a valid written contract to sell the warehouse. Thus, there is a valid contract that can be the subject of a rescission claim. We are told that during negotiations, Beverly asked if the roof was in good condition and Austin responded that he had never had a problem with it, despite having been notified a year earlier by the manufacturer of the roof tiles, Top-Tile, that the roof would soon develop leaks. Thus, Austin made a misrepresentation of fact regarding the condition of the roof in response to Beverly's inquiry on that exact topic. Finally, the parties agreement included an "as is" clause which stated that Beverly was buying the warehouse in its current condition. Austin will argue that Beverly did not rely on his misrepresentation, and that Beverly did not make it clear in her comments to Austin that the condition of the roof was a material fact of the contract, and that had the roof been in poor condition Beverly would not have purchased the warehouse. Beverly will argue that Austin's misrepresentation as to the condition of the roof certainly formed the basis of the bargain because the condition of a roof is quite important in the purchase of a warehouse, or any structure. It is likely that Beverly would succeed on this point that the misrepresentation was a basic assumption of the contract. Moreover, as Beverly is challenging the formation of the contract itself, parol evidence of Austin's oral statement to her is admissible.

If the court believes that Beverly should have inspected the roof independently of Austin's representations, then Beverly will be hard pressed to survive a claim by Austin that the contract stated the property was sold "as is". Where a contract states that property is purchased "as is" at common law, this was strictly construed. However, the modern trend is to relax the enforcement of "as is" clauses where one party misrepresented or committed fraud. That is the case here given that Austin was informed the prior year by the manufacturer that the roof would soon leak, though it does not appear from the facts that Beverly made her own independent inquiry into the condition of the roof. Again, Austin will argue that the "as is" clause is controlling and that it would be prudent for a purchaser of property to have an inspection done to inform the buyer of any potential defects in the property, including those that even the seller was unaware of. Finally, had the roof been of such a concern to Beverly, she could have made the condition of the roof a term of the contract and not executed an "as is" provision. Yet, given his misrepresentation of fact, which he clearly knew to be false as we know from the facts, a court may find that the misrepresentation was significant enough to void any mutual assent despite the "as is" provision in the interests of justice. Finally, Beverly can show damages in that immediately after she bought thewarehouse, the roof started leaking.

Thus, Beverly may be able to rescind the contract based upon misrepresentation.

With respect to the defense of non-disclosure, Beverly will be required to show that Austin did not disclose a material fact that formed the basic assumption of the agreement and that Beverly relied on his statement. Non-disclosure is different from misrepresentation in that with non-disclosure, the party makes no comment or disclosure with respect to a material fact that is known to be material to the other party. Moreover, Austin must not have any defenses.

Here, as stated above, Austin failed to disclose the actual condition of the roof in addition to misrepresenting the condition of the roof. Austin will make the same arguments as above that Beverly did not make it known - in words or actions - that the condition of the roof was a material fact of the contract that formed a basic assumption of the contract. Moreover, Austin will argue that the "as is" clause bars Beverly from recovery and that Beverly had a duty to do her own inspection of the property to discover the condition of the roof.

However, given the facts presented, and a court's ability to relax the strict construction of an "as is" clause where a party has misrepresented, or failed to disclose a material fact, or committed fraud, a court may rescind the contract. Thus, Beverly may have a successful claim of rescission based upon misrepresentation.

II. The next issue is what, if any, ethical violations Lou committed.

Under both the ABA and California ethics code (CA rules), a lawyer, as an officer of the court, has a duty of candor. Under both the ABA and CA rules, a lawyer also has a duty to disclose law that is contrary to the client's position. However, a lawyer is not required to disclose facts that are not helpful to the client. Moreover, a lawyer must not offer evidence that he knows to be false or misleading and must seek to rectify any false evidence presented. If a lawyer reasonably believes that a witness will testify falsely, the lawyer must try to convince the witness or client not to testify falsely. If that fails, the lawyer must not allow the witness or client to testify. Under ABA and CA rules, a lawyer may then seek to withdraw. If a witness or client does testify falsely, in addition to seeking to rectify the false evidence, under the ABA rules the lawyer may notify the court or appropriate tribunal.

Here, Lou was an experienced trial lawyer who entered into a valid retainer agreement with Beverly. Lou hired an expert who he knew had previously testified regarding Top-Tile roofs. Lou apparently knew that the expert, Dr. Crest, had previously testified that the roofs last at least 5 years. Lou also knew, based upon review of Top-Tile's specifications, that Top-Tile stated that their tiles do not last indefinitely in some climates. However, at trial Dr. Crest testified differently, testifying on Beverly's behalf, that Top-Tile never lasted five years. If Lou knew that Dr. Crest was going to testify falsely, Lou must not have permitted him to testify. If Lou reasonably believed that Dr. Crest intended to testify falsely he should have tried to convince him to testify truthfully. Finally, if Lou knew that Dr. Crest had indeed testified falsely he must rectify the false testimony. This is particularly the case here, which is a civil case and one in which Lou retained Dr. Crest as an expert. Lou likely could have found an expert who would testify in support of Beverly's claim. Thus, under both ABA and CA rules, if Lou knew that Dr. Crest was going to testify falsely and did nothing about it, then Lou is subject to discipline. Moreover, once Dr. Crest testified that Top-Tile roofs "never last five years", if Lou knew this to be false testimony, he had an obligation to neutralize the testimony.

This is also the case with respect to Dr. Crest's statement that "climate is not a factor." The fact that Lou was aware of Top-Tile's manufacturer's specifications that climate did affect the condition of the roofs does not mean under the ABA and CA rules that Lou was obligated to disclose that fact. This is a fact that is not in his client's favor, and under the ethical rules Lou was not obligated to disclose that. The obligation under ABA and CA rules is to disclose legal principles that are not in your client's favor. Thus, there is no ethical violation for failing to disclose that fact. However, if Lou knew that Dr. Crest's statement was false based upon the available data and his expert opinion, he had an ethical duty to clarify.

Thus, based on the facts presented, if Lou knew that Dr. Crest testified falsely, he has an ethical violation to clarify and rectify any false evidence, which he appears not to have done. Thus, he is subject to discipline.

Finally, with respect to Lou's closing argument. Lou would also be subject to discipline because he essentially ratified testimony which he likely knew was false. Thus, he did the opposite of what he is ethically obligated to do under ABA and CA rules. Moreover, Lou offered personal opinion and observation which was not the subject of evidence in the case. This was also unethical. Here, Lou inserted his own opinion and "evidence" that his inspection of the warehouse roof confirmed Dr. Crest's testimony. Lou was essentially giving testimony during his closing examination, based upon his own observations. A closing argument is not considered evidence and a lawyer is not permitted to raise issues, facts or evidence that were not presented at trial. Lou clearly violated this rule and is subject to discipline.

Finally, under both ABA and CA rules, when retaining an expert, a lawyer is required to get the client's informed consent (which must be in writing under the CA rules) which includes a clear statement of how the expert is going to be paid. The client is to be fully informed as to the terms of the retainer of an expert, before the expert is, in fact, retained. It does not appear from the facts that Lou did this. Thus, he is subject to discipline.

Answer B

1.) Applicable Law

There are two general bodies of law which apply to cases involving a breach of contract: The Common law, and the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). The UCC applies to all contracts with respect to the sale of goods, and the common law generally applies to all other contracts. "Goods" for the purpose of this determination are movable objects.

Here, Austin sold a warehouse to Beverly. A warehouse is real property, not a "movable good." Thus, the Common Law would apply to this transaction.

2.) Will Beverly be able to Rescind the Contract with Austin on the Basis of Misrepresentation and/or Non-Disclosure

As a result of the alleged misrepresentation, Beverly seeks to rescind her contract with Austin. Rescission is an equitable remedy which a court may grant under certain circumstances where a valid, enforceable contract has been created, but monetary damages would be inadequate, and equity requires a different remedy. If a court grants rescission as a form of relief, the contract is effectively cancelled, and parties are returned to the position they were prior to the formation of the contract (with possibly some form of incidental damages recovered).

A.) Mutual Mistake

The first ground on which Beverly may seek to rescind this contract is the grounds of mutual mistake. Generally, under the common law, a contract cannot be rescinded due to the mistakes of the forming parties. However, a court may grant the remedy if rescission if it can be shown that (1) there was a mistake as to a material fact, and (2) neither party bore the risk of that mistake.

Here, Austin told Beverly that he had "never had a problem" with Top Tile, indicating that the roof was in good condition. However, the roof ultimately leaked. Thus, there was a mistake as to whether the roof would leak. Moreover, this is a material fact as it substantially affects the value of the property. Thus, a court would likely find a mistake of material fact.

However, Austin appears to have known about the issue. The Manufacturer of Top Tile had recently reached out to him and informed him that the warehouse roof would soon develop leaks. Thus, Austin knew about the problem, so this would not be considered a "mutual mistake."

B.) Unilateral Mistake

While there is no "mutual mistake" which could have formed a basis for rescinding the contract, there has been a "unilateral mistake." A court allows rescission based on a unilateral mistake as long as (1) the mistaken party did not bear the risk of that mistake, (2) the mistake was as to something material, and (3) the other party had reason to know of that mistake.

Here, Beverly was mistaken about the quality of the roof. She believed that it was in good condition and would not break soon. As discussed above, whether or not it would break is a material fact. Thus, she was mistaken as to a material fact.

Moreover, Beverly likely did not bear the risk of that mistake. A court generally will find a party to have born the risk of the mistake only if they have some superior knowledge. Here, it was in fact the seller, Austin, who had better knowledge because he owned the property and had spoken with the Top-Tile manufacturer. Thus, Austin would have been the party to bear the risk of the mistake here.

Moreover, Austin had reason to know of Beverly's mistake. Beverly specifically asked if the roof was in good condition, and Austin induced that mistake by informing her that he had "never had a problem with it" while being fully aware that the manufacturer had warned him that it would start leaking soon.

Thus, a court would likely find that Beverly may rescind the contract on the grounds of a mutual mistake because (1) she was mistaken as to the condition of the roof, (2) she did not bear the risk as to that mistake, and (3) Austin had reason to know of that mistake.

C.) Misrepresentation

Courts may also grant rescission when a contract was formed based on a material misrepresentation. Under this rule, a court will rescind a contract if they can show that one party (1) intentionally, (2) made a misrepresentation of material fact, (3) intending that the other party rely on that misstatement, (4) the other party did in fact rely on that misstatement, and (5) damages were suffered as a result.

i. Intentional Misrepresentation

Here, a court would likely find that there was an intentional misrepresentation. As discussed above, Beverly specifically asked whether the roof was in "good condition." Despite knowing that Top-Tile, the manufacturer of the roof tiles, believed that the roof would soon develop leaks, Austin responded that he "never had a problem with it." While this was not a direct misstatement of fact, it was an omission.

While a seller of property generally has no duty to disclose issue on the property due to the common law doctrine of Caveat Emptor, a seller may not omit a material fact upon inquiry of the buyer. Thus, while he technically did not lie, he committed an intentional misrepresentation for these purposes.

ii. Material Fact

This omission was also material. A fact is "material" if a reasonable person would consider that information when deciding whether or not to enter into a contract.

Here, the omitted fact related to the quality of the roof. Because repairing roofs is expensive, a reasonable person would want to know that information when deciding whether or not to enter into a contract. Thus, this term would be deemed material.

iii. Intending That the Other Party Rely

Austin likely made this statement knowing or intending that Beverly would rely on it. He wanted to sell the property (possibly because it would soon start leaking). Thus, he would likely have intended that Beverly rely on that statement.

iv. Other Party Did In Fact Rely

It also appears that Beverly did rely on that misstatement. She ultimately purchased the property. The fact that she asked about the roof's condition prior to the purchase indicates that it was an important fact to her. Thus, she likely relied on that statement. Moreover, there is no evidence that she made an independent inspection, further lending credence to the idea that she relied on this misrepresentation.

v. Damages

Beverly was also damaged. She now has to pay for the repairs.

Because all of these elements are satisfied, a court would likely find that Beverly can rescind the contract on the grounds of a misrepresentation.

D.) Rescission Based on Non-Disclosure

A contract may also be rescinded on the grounds of non-disclosure if (1) there was a duty to disclose information, and (2) the seller failed to disclose.

As discussed above, there generally is no duty to disclose conditions on the premises due to the doctrine of caveat emptor. However, if a buyer makes an inquiry, a seller is not permitted to omit and fail to disclose a material fact related to that question.

Here, Austin would not have had a general duty to disclose the statement made by Top-Tile regarding the impending leak on the premises. However, Beverly asked if the roof was in good condition. This question created a duty for Austin to disclose known conditions in the roofing, which he failed to do when he deflected the question by stating "I've never had a problem with it."

Thus, Austin had a duty to disclose, and failed to do so. Thus, Beverly may properly seek rescission on the grounds of non-disclosure.

E.) The "As Is Warranty."

Generally, when property is sold, certain warranties are contained within the sale contract. These include warranties of habitability (in a residential property), covenants of quiet enjoyment, and warranties related to the condition of the property. However, parties are free to waive such provisions in the contract.

Here, Beverly purchased a warehouse from Austin. Thus, generally she would be granted certain warranties which would have protected against things such as a leaky roof. However, the parties waived those warranties. The written contract explicitly stated that the property was being sold "as is, with no warranties as to the condition of the structure." Thus, there appears to have been a valid waiver of warranties with regards to the condition of the structure. Such a waiver would be applicable even to express conditions.

Arguably, Austin gave an express warranty to Beverly when he implied that there were no conditions with the roof. Thus, generally, this would protect against Beverly's contemplated rescission claims. However, warranties cannot overcome explicit misstatements, omissions, and fraud used to induce into the contract.

As discussed above, Austin made a material omission. Thus, while the waiver generally would be considered valid, the waiver cannot be applied to the condition of the roof.

F.) Parol Evidence

Austin may argue that evidence of his Statements are inadmissible under the "parol evidence rule." This rule state that, when there is a written, "integrated" contract, statements not contained within the writing cannot be used to contradict terms in the writing.

Here, there is a written contract. Assuming there was a proper merger clause, the parol evidence rule would apply to this contract. Moreover, Beverly would be attempting to introduce Austin's statements regarding the roof. This would contradict the "no warranty" provision." Thus, it is being introduced to alter the terms of the writing.

However, this is being introduced not to change the terms, but to show that the contract is invalid. Thus, the parol evidence rule would not bar introduction of this evidence.

III.) What Ethical Violations has Lou Committed

Lou has committed multiple ethical violations related to this representation.

1.) Duty of Candor to the Court & Opposing Counsel

Under both the ABA and CA ethics rules, attorneys own a duty of candor and truthfulness to both the court and to opposing counsel. This means that, while an attorney is required to zealously advocate for the interests of their clients, they may not introduce testimony which they know to be false.

Here, Lou offered the expert testimony of Dr. Crest. Lou knew that Dr. Crest had previously testified that "Top-Tile roofs always last at least five years" and that the manufacturer's specifications indicated that Top-Tile roofs last indefinitely, except in certain climates. However, during cross examination, Dr. Crest testified that "Top-Tile Roofs never last five years" and that "climate is not a factor." Thus, Lou's witness introduced testimony which Lou knew to be false. Moreover, Lou chose to repeat those statements in his closing argument.

By doing this, Lou introduced facts known to be inaccurate to the court and to opposing counsel. This is impermissible. Thus, he violated his duties of candor under both the CA and ABA Rules.

Lou may argue, in his defense, that the testimony was elicited on cross-examination, not in the direct. This means that Lou did not directly induce the fraudulent testimony. However, his duties would require him to communicate this fact to the judge, and would prohibit him from referencing those facts in his closing arguments (which he did.) Thus, even though he did not personally elicit the fraudulent testimony, he will have been found to have violated this ethical obligation.

2.) Attorney as a Witness

Lou also violated his ethical duties when he effectively served as a witness in this case. Under the ABA rules, an attorney is not permitted to act as a witness in a case which they are litigating unless their testimony (1) relates to a non-disputed issue, or (2) the attorney is so critical to the case, that they cannot be removed as counsel, and their testimony is critical. Under the CA rules, an attorney may only testify if

Here, during his closing arguments, Lou testified that his "own inspection of the roof confirmed Dr. Crest's testimony." This is opinion testimony. Thus, while he was not technically called as a witness, he did serve as one. Therefore, this testimony is only permissible if one of the exceptions apply.

It is unclear if this is a disputed issue. The central issue in the case was the nature of the representation about the leaky roof. However, it does not seem to be in dispute whether the roof was leaking, just whether there was a warranty. Lou's testimony only seems to state that he confirmed there were leaks. It is unlikely that he was testifying about the chemical makeup of the roof, or its propensity to leak. Thus, arguably he was not testifying regarding a disputed issue. However, because what he is talking about comes so dangerously close to the central issue in the case, it is likely impermissible. Thus, by stating that he did his own inspection and confirmed the results, he violated the rule prohibiting attorneys from acting as witnesses.

1. Duty of Competence

Lou also may have violated his duty of competence. Under the ABA rules, an attorney must carry out a representation in a competent manner. Under the CA rules, an attorney must not repeatedly carry out a representation in a negligent, reckless, or incompetent manner.

Here, Lou hired an attorney who had regularly testified about the opposite of the position he sought to assert. This information would almost certainly come out in a proper cross examination. Thus, his witness would have been thoroughly discredited. A competent attorney does not hire an expert witness who will easily be discredited and impeached. Thus, under the ABA rules, he violated his duty of competence.

Under the CA rules, he likely violated no duties. There is no evidence that this was a repeated pattern. Thus, under the CA rules, he likely would not be found to have violated his duty of competence.

Q2 Constitution

County Jail has prominently posted in the inmate dining hall quotations from three of the Ten Commandments as follow: “You shall not kill.” “You shall not steal.” “You shall not give false testimony against your neighbor.” County officials thought these were “good moral principles” that would assist prisoners when they were released.

The Jail makes available to inmates copies of the Bible and the Quran (Koran), but no other religious books. Inmate Ivan requested a copy of a religious book central to his recognized, but relatively small, sect. This book urges the religious use of a hallucinogenic sacramental tea. Ivan has requested permission to have the hallucinogenic sacramental tea on a weekly basis as part of his religious observances.

Ivan’s request for the book was denied on the basis that it encourages illegal drug usage. His request for permission to have the hallucinogenic sacramental tea was denied for the same reason.

1. What challenges under the United States Constitution, if any, could Ivan reasonably raise to the dining hall quotations, and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

2. What challenges under the United States Constitution, if any, could Ivan reasonably raise to the denial of his requests for the book and the tea, and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

Answer A

Constitutional Law

In general, there must be a separation of Church and State.

Dining Hall Quotations

Establishment Clause

The issue is whether Ivan could assert a violation of the Establishment Clause with regards to the dining hall quotations.

First, to bring a claim under the U.S. Constitution and the Establishment Clause, there must be a government action. Here, the action of posting three of the Ten Commandments was done by the county jail. A county is considered a government actor. Thus, there has been a government action in this case.

Under the Establishment Clause, the government cannot take action or promulgate a rule that has the effect of establishing or inhibiting religion. In order to determine whether government action violates the Establishment clause, the court will apply the Lemon test. The Lemon test has three factors. To meet these three factors, the government must show that (i) the action has a secular purpose, (ii) that the action's primary effect is not to advance or inhibit religion, and (iii) there is not excessive entanglement between the government action and religion.

Secular Purpose

First, the government must show that its action has a secular purpose. Here, the county officials stated that the three commandments it posted were "good moral principles" that would assist prisoners when released. It appears that the county officials meant for the purpose of posting the commandments to be secular. Their goal was to assist prisoners when they are released from prison. Likely to ensure that they do not commit further crimes such as killing or stealing, and also telling them not to lie. If this was the sole purpose in posting those three commandments, that is likely considered a secular purpose.

Primary Effect

The primary effect of the action must not be to advance or inhibit religion. Ivan will likely argue that anytime someone posts all or part of the Ten Commandments, the primary effect is to advance religion. More specifically, that the Ten Commandments are inherently religious because they are from the bible. Thus, the primary effect is to advance the religions that believe in the Ten Commandments, while inhibiting the religions that do not believe in the Ten Commandments.

Conversely, the county officials will likely argue that they only posted three of the Ten Commandments. That, coupled with the purpose in posting the three commandments, indicates that the primary effect is not to advance or inhibit religion. Rather, it was intended as a way to help morally guide the prisoners. That the primary effect is to advance good morals.

This will be a close factor and something for the fact finder to decide. It is possible the fact finder could go either way on this particular issue.

Excessive Entanglement

Even if the county is successful on the first two factors of the Lemon test, it will likely fail on this factor. Under this prong, the government action cannot be excessively entangled with religion. Ivan will argue (successfully) that the Ten Commandments are inherently religious. And it does not matter that the county posted only three of the commandments, or that their purpose was not religious. Posting the Ten Commandments would likely be the same as hanging a cross or a prayer on the wall. The government's action of posting the ten commandments entangles itself with religion. Even if they do not intend to promote religion, the association of the ten commandments with the government action results in that entanglement. The county officials will have a hard time arguing that their action was separate from religion.

In sum, although a court could find that the county official's purpose in posting the three commandments was secular, and that the primary effect did not advance or inhibit religion, it is likely a court would conclude that posting those commandments resulted in an excessive entanglement between the government and religion. Therefore, Ivan will be successful in his claim that the county jail has violated the Establishment Clause.

Denial of Ivan's Book

Free Exercise of Religion Clause

The issue is whether the jail's denial of Ivan's request for his book violates the Free Exercise Clause of the U.S. Constitution.

Under the 1st Amendment of the Constitution, every person has the right to the free exercise of his or her religion.

Sincerely Held Religious Belief

The first issue here is whether Ivan's religious belief is protected.

Whether a religion is protected under the Constitution is not based on whether the particular religion is well known or well established. Rather, the court will look at whether the individual has a sincerely held religious belief. Put another way, the question is whether the individual's belief and whether that belief has a similar role in the individual's life as a typical religion would.

In this case, the facts state that Ivan was requesting a religious book related to his recognized, but relatively small sect of his religion. The fact that Ivan's sect is small does not mean that his belief is not protected. Based on the limited facts, it indicates that his sect is recognized, and that he holds a sincere belief in it. His sincerity is evidenced in his request for a book, as well as his request for the religious use of tea (analyzed below). This indicates that Ivan's religious belief, although based on a small sect, is sincerely held and thus subject to constitutional protections.

Free Exercise

The issue is whether the county jail's action of denying Ivan's book violates the Free Exercise Clause of the 1st Amendment of the Constitution.

When a government action or regulation is based on or discriminates against religion, it must pass strict scrutiny. Strict Scrutiny requires that the government action is necessary to achieve a compelling government interest.

Here, the government's stated interest is that the book encourages illegal drug usage. The reduction or elimination of illegal drug is likely considered a compelling government interest so they will have met this prong of the test. However, the actions necessary to achieve that is to outlaw or prohibit the actual use of drugs. In this case, the county jail is denying Ivan a religious book. The act of denying that book is likely not necessary to achieve the stated purpose of preventing illegal drug use. The action of not allowing illegal drug use is the action necessary to prevent illegal drug use (analyzed below).

As such, a court will likely consider the county jail's action of not providing Ivan his book to not pass strict scrutiny. Specifically because it is not necessary to achieve their purpose. As discussed below, they have other means to achieve their purpose.

Ivan will likely be successful in his challenge that the county jail has violated his 1st Amendment right to Free Exercise of his religion based on their denial of his religious book.

Equal Protection

The issue is whether the jail's failure to provide Ivan his religious book violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Constitution.

Citizens are entitled to equal protection of the laws of the United States. This applies to the federal government under the 5th Amendment, and is applicable to the states under the 14th Amendment.

Here, the jail provides copies of the Bible and the Quran (Koran) to prisoners, but it does not provide any other religious books. Providing religious books for some religions and not others is not equal. Under the Equal Protection Clause, an action or law that discriminates against a suspect class must pass strict scrutiny. Actions based on religion, as mentioned, must pass strict scrutiny. Thus, because the government action is not equal and it is based on religion, it must pass strict scrutiny.

Similar to the above analysis, failing to provide Ivan his book does not pass strict scrutiny. There is no stated basis for why the Jail provides inmates with copies of the Bible and the Quran, but not other books. The jail offers no reasons why it should be allowed to provide books based on some religions, while denying books for other religions. Although the jail's interest of preventing illegal drug use is compelling, denying the book is not necessary to achieve that purpose.

The jail is required to either provide all of the requested religious books (assuming they are sincerely held religious beliefs) or they can offer none. That is the only way that they can ensure equal protection of the laws to the various religions.

The county jail's offering of certain religious books and not others violates equal protection. The jail's action does not pass strict scrutiny, and thus Ivan would be successful on this claim.

Denial of Ivan's Tea

Free Exercise

The issue is whether the denial of Ivan's request for hallucinogenic sacramental tea violated his 1st Amendment right to free exercise of his religion.

As stated above, a government action that discriminated against religion must pass strict scrutiny. Unlike the book request, the jail's denial of Ivan's request for hallucinogenic tea will pass strict scrutiny.

As mentioned previously, the governments interest is to eliminate or outlaw the use of illegal drugs - a compelling government interest. That interest is no more compelling than in a jail setting. Illegal drug use is not allowed by the general public, and absolutely should not be allowed by prisoners in a jail. Here, Ivan is specifically asking to use hallucinogenic tea, which is assumed to be an illegal drug. As such, not providing that tea is necessary to accomplish its stated goal. The fact that the tea is sacramental does not matter. The Supreme Court previously upheld a similar government action that outlawed the use of drugs (i.e. peyote) by Native Americans. Although Native Americans are still allowed to practice their stated religions, use of sacramental drugs was not allowed. The same analysis applies here. Although Ivan is allowed to practice his religion, including use of a religious book, the county jail is not required to provide him with illegal hallucinogenic tea.

Denying Ivan his hallucinogenic sacramental tea is necessary to achieve the jail's compelling interest of outlawing and eliminating illegal drug use in its prison.

Ivan will not be successful in his challenge of the government's denial of his hallucinogenic tea.

Equal Protection

The issue here is whether the jail's denial of Ivan's tea violates equal protection. See above for the rules regarding equal protection.

Unlike the book situation, where the jail offers some religious books but not others, there is not the same issue here. There is no indication that the jail has offered the use of teas or other drinks for other religious. Thus, without more, the Equal Protection Clause is not invoked here. Even if it were, for the same reasons as the analysis under the Free Exercise Clause, the government's action passes strict scrutiny.

Ivan will not be successful in his claim that the jail's denial of his sacramental hallucinogenic tea violates equal protection of the laws.

Answer B

Ivan's Constitutional Challenges to the Dining Hall Quotations

Ivan can challenge the quotations on the dining hall as a violation of the Establishment Clause.

A. Establishment Clause

The Establishment Clause prohibits the government from engaging in actions that constitute an establishment of a religion. The clause is applicable to state (and county) officials through the Fourteenth Amendment. When government conduct potentially implicates the establishment clause, courts apply the Lemon test to determine if there has been a constitutional violation. The Lemon test is a three-step approach whereby government conduct will be found to violate the establishment clause unless it has a secular purpose, the primary effect neither advances nor prohibits religion, and there is no excessive entanglement with religion.

1. Secular Purpose

First, County will need to show that the quotations on the dining hall have a secular purpose. The dining hall quotations contain three quotes from the Ten Commandments: "You shall not kill"; "You shall not steal"; and "You shall not give false testimony to your neighbor." The Ten Commandments is a religious document, and thus appears to have a religious, not a secular purpose. The County will argue that the officials chose this quotes, however, because they emphasized "good moral principles." Ivan may argue that this reason is not a meaningful distinction because the moral principles it purports to support are Christian, and religious, not secular. However, because emphasizing good moral principles is arguably a secular purpose, the County may be able to succeed in showing that the first prong of the Lemon test is satisfied.

2. Advances or Prohibits Religion

For the second prong of the Lemon test, the primary issue is whether the quotes could be said to advance religion. There does not appear to be any real issue with the quotes prohibiting a religion. It's unclear from the facts if the dining hall quotations even make clear that the source of the material is the Ten Commandments. If the quotes are clearly attributable to the Ten Commandments, which as noted above is well-known religious text, then the quotations would clearly appear to advance a particular religion. If they do not, then arguably the quotes do not advance or prohibit a particular religion. The County may further argue that the quotes that were chosen do not reference a religion, nor do they expressly support a higher being. The first two quotes relate to common principles that are codified in the state law--all states prohibit killing and stealing. The last quote is arguably more specific to Christianity. While the law prohibits giving false testimony under oath, the actual quote relates to a more specific concept of not giving false testimony about your neighbor that appears to be more amorphous and arguably is readily identifiable as tied to a particular religion. Additionally, the quotes are prominently posted in the inmate dining hall, which suggests that the County is supporting these religious beliefs. While this issue is a closer call, Ivan may still prevail in showing that the primary effect of these quotes is to advance religion.

3. Excessive Entanglement

Finally, Ivan can argue that the quotes constitute excessive entanglement with religion. Many of the arguments discussed above with regard to prong two of the Lemon test would also be relevant as to whether the chosen quotes constitute excessive entanglement. However, if the County succeeds in arguing that the quotes relate to core principles of society that are not inherently tied to a religion, the County may succeed in arguing that there is no excessive entanglement.

In summary, for the reasons explained above, Ivan is likely to prevail on his Establishment Clause claim because it appears that the three prongs of the Lemon test have not been satisfied.

B. Government Speech

The County may respond to Ivan's Establishment Clause claim by arguing that the quotations constitute government speech. The Establishment Clause claim is part of the First Amendment, and the First Amendment does not generally apply to government speech. However, when the speech at issue involves religious issues, the Supreme Court has held that the government may not engage in conduct that appears to disproportionately favor one religion. For example, the Supreme Court has held that governments may place a display in a city hall that depicts a menorah and a Christmas tree, two well-known religious symbols, because there are multiple religions recognized, not just one. Similarly, the government may include a religious text in a display that includes other types of texts as well. This exception, therefore, would not appear to help the County here because the dining hall only contains quotations from the Ten Commandments. Because the County has chosen only to display quotations from a religious text, it will not be able to claim that this is acceptable government speech.

(2) Ivan's Constitutional Challenges to the Denial of Requests for Book and Tea

Ivan can challenge the denial of his requests for the book and tea under the First Amendment's Free Exercise Clause (incorporated against the states (and counties) via the Fourteenth Amendment), Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and Due Process Clause. For the reasons explained below, Ivan is likely to succeed in challenging the denial of his book, but not the denial of the hallucinogenic tea.

A. Free Exercise Clause

There are three potential issues that arise with Ivan's claim under the Free Exercise Clause: (1) whether Ivan's beliefs are religious, (2) whether Ivan's beliefs are sincere, and (3) whether the County's conduct is discriminatory. Each is discussed below.

1. Whether Ivan's Beliefs Are Religious

The Free Exercise Clause protects religious beliefs. An individual does not give up this right merely because he is in jail. The Supreme Court has never clearly defined what constitutes a "religious" belief protected by the Free Exercise Clause, but it has made clear that it extends beyond the traditional religions. The general test is whether the belief holds a place in the individual's life parallel to that of traditional religious beliefs.

We have very little information about Ivan's religion. We know that it is a relatively small sect with a religious book and that it has weekly religious observances, including use of a hallucinogenic sacramental tea. The Supreme Court has made clear that courts have very little power to question the validity of a religion. Here, it is likely that a court will find that Ivan's beliefs are religious, and thus he may bring a claim under the Free Exercise Clause.

2. Whether Ivan's Beliefs Are Sincere

Assuming Ivan's beliefs are "religious," the court may assess whether Ivan sincerely holds these beliefs. We again have very little information to determine whether Ivan's beliefs are sincere. But there are no facts indicating that Ivan's requests are some kind of ruse or that he does not sincerely believe in this religion. A court, therefore, would likely find that Ivan's beliefs are sincere.

3. Whether County's Conduct is Discriminatory

Because Ivan will likely be able to show that his requests were based on sincere, religious beliefs, the next issue is whether the County's conduct is discriminatory. The Free Exercise Clause affords strong protections for religious beliefs. Any government action that discriminates against religion is subject to strict scrutiny, meaning the government will have the burden of showing it is necessary to achieve a compelling interest. However, government action that is facially neutral may not be subject to strict scrutiny in the otherwise absence of an intent to discriminate. The Supreme Court has recognized as well that the government need not provide religious exceptions if a facially neutral policy incidentally burdens the exercise of a religion. For example, the Supreme Court upheld as constitutional a ban on illegal drugs that prohibited a Native American from using peyote as part of a religious ceremony.

Here, the stated reason for the denial of the book and the tea is that they promote illegal drug usage. We don't have any information as to whether this is an official policy, but since this is a County jail it seems safe to assume that the County would have a policy against illegal drug usage in the jail. The policy on its face appears to be neutral and there is no evidence that it was passed intentionally to interfere with Ivan's religion. While the policy does incidentally burden Ivan's ability to practice his religion, this seems to be a similar situation to the peyote case discussed above.

4. FEC Conclusion

In summary, as to the tea, a court almost certainly would find that the County does not have to make an exception for Ivan's religion, and would likely not find that the denial of the tea constitutes a violation of the Free Exercise Clause. As to the book, this is a closer call because the book itself is not a hallucinogenic. Ivan's stronger arguments, however, are probably based on the First Amendment and the Equal Protection Clause, for the reasons explained below.

B. Due Process Clause

Ivan may reasonably challenge the denial of his requests as a violation of the Due Process Clause, which prohibits the government from engaging in arbitrary and capricious conduct. Under the DPC, government action that infringes on a fundamental right must satisfy strict scrutiny, meaning the government must show that it is necessary to achieve a compelling purpose. If a fundamental right is not implicated, then the government action is subject only to rational basis review, meaning the burden is on the challenger (in this case Ivan) to show that the government action is not rationally related to a legitimate government purpose. As a practical matter, most government action will satisfy rational basis review.

Here, Ivan can argue that the County's conduct infringes on his fundamental rights of religious freedom. The County, therefore, would have the burden to show that its actions are necessary to achieve a compelling interest. The County has a strong argument that denial of the tea is constitutional. The tea is a hallucinogenic, and assuming hallucinogens are considered illegal drugs, then the County's denial seems to be necessary to uphold the policy against illegal drug usage (which a court would likely find is a compelling purpose).

However, the County would likely not prevail on the book. As noted above, preventing illegal drug usage in jail is likely to deemed a compelling purpose. But denial of the book is not necessary to achieve this purpose. While the book may urge the use of the tea, there are less restrictive means to prevent illegal drug usage (including denial of the illegal drugs). Reading the book in and of itself will not lead to illegal drug usage. The County, therefore, will likely not prevail in showing that denial of the book satisfies strict scrutiny.

Accordingly, Ivan is likely to prevail on his challenge that the denial of the book violates the Due Process Clause.

C. Equal Protection Clause

Ivan may also argue that the County's denial of the book violates the Equal Protection Clause because the County allows other inmates to have copies of the Bible and the Quran but will not make available Ivan's religious sect. The EPC analysis depends on whether a suspect, quasi-suspect, or fundamental right is implicated. Government conduct that discriminates on the basis of a suspect class (such as race or national origin), as well as government conduct that implicates a fundamental right, is subject to strict scrutiny, which means the government must show it is necessary to achieve a compelling purpose. Government conduct that implicates a quasi-suspect class (such as gender) is subject to intermediate scrutiny, meaning the government must show it is substantially related to an important purpose (and in the case of gender must also show an exceedingly persuasive justification). All other government conduct is subject to rational basis review, meaning the challenger must show that it is not rationally related to a legitimate government purpose.

Here, Ivan can argue that the County discriminates against his religion because the County allows inmates to have access to the Bible and Quran but not his religious text. Because freedom of religion is a fundamental right, the court is likely to apply strict scrutiny. In that case, the analysis would be the same as described above for the DPC, and County is unlikely to be able to show that the denial of the book was constitutional.

Finally, there does not appear to be an EPC argument based on the tea because we have no facts indicating that the County allows other inmates religious tea or the equivalent. Even if there was, as explained above, because the tea is a hallucinogenic, the County would have a strong argument that strict scrutiny is satisfied because denial is necessary to prevent illegal drug usage.

D. Establishment Clause

Because the County allows inmates access to the Bible and Quran, but denied Ivan access to his religious text, Ivan may also argue that the County's conduct violates the Establishment Clause. The test is discussed above. It is unclear whether the County has a policy of only allowing these two religious texts. If it does, we do not have sufficient facts to analyze whether there is a secular purpose for this policy (such as budgetary constraints). Thus, it is difficult to tell whether Ivan can prevail on this claim, and it is not as strong an argument as the ones discussed above challenging the denial of his book.

Q3 Real Property

Len, an excellent chef, installed a smokehouse in his backyard three years ago to supply smoked meats to his friends. Len's neighbor, Michelle, enjoyed the mild climate and spent most of her time outdoors. She found the smoke and smells from Len's property very annoying and stopped having parties outdoors after receiving complaints from some of her guests. She asked Len multiple times to stop using the smokehouse, but he rebuffed her requests.

Len has frequently invaded Michelle's patio to retrieve his dog when it wandered from home. Michelle put up a "no trespassing" sign and a wire fence between their parcels. After the dog dug a hole under the fence, Len cut some of the wires and entered Michelle's property anyway, telling her that he had been fetching his wandering dog from her patio for at least ten years and wouldn't stop now.

Last week, the Town filed suit to condemn Michelle's land for a public park. It tendered to the court as compensation a sum substantially exceeding the prices of comparable parcels recently sold in the neighborhood. Michelle argues that the amount is insufficient because it is substantially less than a sum she turned down for her parcel a few years ago and it does not include compensation for relocation costs.

1. If Michelle sues Len regarding his continued use of the smokehouse, what claims, if any, may she reasonably raise, what defenses, if any, may he reasonably assert, and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

2. If Michelle sues Len regarding fetching his dog, what claims, if any, may she reasonably raise, what defenses, if any, may he reasonably assert, and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

3. Is Michelle likely to prevail in her argument for additional compensation from Town? Discuss.

Answer A

Property/Tort (Nuisance), Torts (Trespass/SL), Property (easement by prescription), Con Law (Takings)

1. Smokehouse

a. Private Nuisance

A private nuisance is any substantial and unreasonable interference with the use and enjoyment of property.

i. Substantial

The interference must be substantial. An interference is substantial if it would be offensive or annoying to an average member of the community. This is an objective standard - there is no requirement that the plaintiff actually be annoyed nor is there any special allowance if he or she is actually annoyed or offended.

Here, M finds the smoke and smell annoying, so much so that she stopped having parties. This is, however, irrelevant.

It is unclear from the facts whether an "average" person in the community would be annoyed by a smokehouse. While many people find barbecue scents pleasant, just as many find them offensive. It is unclear how much smoke is produced by the smokehouse and how much of it blows into M's property. If the smoke is found to be of such volume that it makes it difficult or impossible for an average person to enjoy M's backyard, then there will be substantial interference. Given that M is annoyed to such a serious degree, it is likely that an average person would at least be annoyed or offended.

ii. Unreasonable

The activity causing the nuisance must be unreasonable. This is a balancing test. If the utility of the activity outweighs its interference with the plaintiff's property rights, it is reasonable. Otherwise, it is unreasonable.

Here, M will assert that the smokehouse is unreasonable because it prevents her from enjoying the outdoors in the way which she had done for years. Furthermore, it prevents her from having her parties, and likely depreciates her property somewhat.

However, L will counter that the smokehouse enables him to hone his skills as a chef and provide smoked meats to his friends. He will argue that these activities are of substantial benefit.

However, because L's activities substantially interfere with M's enjoyment of her property, and because only L and his immediate circle of friends substantially benefit from the smokehouse, the smokehouse will likely be found to be unreasonable.

iii. Interference/Trespass

The activity must actually interfere with the use of land. Generally, this has been expressed as requiring that the activity have a trespass component. Interfering with access to light traditionally has not met this standard. However, the introduction of any particulate matter or sound waves on the plaintiff's property satisfies this requirement.

Here, L will claim that the smoke is only offensive in that it blocks light, and that therefore there is no interference.

M will counter that the smell component of the nuisance is fundamentally particulate in nature, because of how noses work (discussion omitted). Additionally, she will contend that the smoke consists of particulate matter, and that some of that particulate actually invades her property.

Because there is some degree of physical trespass, M will succeed in demonstrating interference

iv. Use and Enjoyment of Property

The substantial and unreasonable interference must directly interfere with the use of private property. Interfering with public spaces does not create a private nuisance.

Here, L's activity is interfering with M's personal use of her own property. Therefore, it interferes with the use and enjoyment of her property.

Assuming that a reasonable person would be annoyed at L's smokehouse and its resultant effluence, M could succeed in an action for private nuisance. (see statute of limitations, below)

Remedy

Generally, the remedy for a private nuisance is an injunction. If the activity is essential to a community's economic health or otherwise of exceptional utility, money damages may be awarded instead.

Here, L's smokehouse serves limited economic purpose, and does not benefit the community as a whole. Therefore, M will likely receive an injunction.

b. Public Nuisance

Public Nuisance is any activity that interferes with the health or safety of the public at large.

i. Standing

Public nuisance has strict standing requirements. In order to collect under public nuisance, a private individual must demonstrate that they have suffered a harm that is different in kind than the general public. A harm different in degree is insufficient.

Here, M will claim that she has uniquely suffered from the smoke and odor, and that she has uniquely stopped having parties. However, it is extremely unlikely that the smokehouse only deposits smoke and odor on her property, and if it does, there is no effect on the community at large (and as such there is no public nuisance regardless). Furthermore, the inability to have parties is a result of that same harm, merely an intensifier, rather than a unique or different harm. Therefore, M lacks standing to bring a public nuisance cause of action.

c. Statute of Limitations

The statute of limitations serves as an absolute bar to legal action. For most causes of action, the statute of limitations is one year from the time the cause of action arises. However, continuous actions can be recovered for any violation within the previous year.

Here, L started using his smokehouse 3 years ago. While this initial use would be outside the statute of limitations, L has used the smokehouse continuously. M will still be able to obtain an injunction against current and future use.

2. Fetching the Dog

a. Trespass

A trespass is any physical occupation of real property without permission.

i. Intent

A trespass only occurs if the trespasser actually intended to occupy the land. The trespasser's knowledge about the ownership of the land is irrelevant. A mistaken belief that they had the right to enter the land is not a defense. In essence, trespass is a strict liability offense.

Here, L entered M's property past a fence with a no trespassing sign. L intended to enter the property, so the intent requirement is met.

ii. Physical Presence

The trespasser must be physically present on the property.

Here, L actually entered M's property. The physical presence test is met.

iii. Without Permission

The property owner must not have consented to the trespass, impliedly or expressly.

M did not expressly consent to the trespass. Any implied consent from the adjoining nature of their properties was withdrawn when M constructed the fence. M did not consent to the trespass.

iv. Damages

There is no requirement of actual harm. Nominal damages are recoverable.

Here, M can recover nominal damages for L's trespass. Additionally, she can recover from the actual harm she suffered when L cut the wires on the fence (cost of repairs).

b. Defenses

i. Necessity

a. Private Necessity

Private necessity exists when exigent circumstances cause the trespass. For example, docking a ship on a storm constitutes a private necessity, or swerving to avoid an obstacle on the road. Private necessity allows the avoidance of nominal damages and ejectment.

Here, L trespassed in order to retrieve his dog. L needed to trespass in order to ensure that his dog was safe and that it did not cause any damages to M's property without his supervision, since he could be held liable for such damages. As such, private necessity exists, and M cannot eject L or collect nominal damages.

I. Private Necessity - Limitations (Actual Damages)

Private necessity fundamentally involves a balancing of the risk of not trespassing and harm inflicted by trespassing. The trespasser has the ultimate decision on the balance of these factors. As such, the trespasser is traditionally held responsible for any actual damages that occur as a result of the trespass.

Here, L caused actual damages when he cut through M's fence in order to retrieve his dog. As such, L is responsible for actual damages despite the necessity.

b. Public Necessity

Public necessity exists when the trespass is necessary to prevent harm to the public at large. Unlike private necessity, the landowner cannot collect actual damages from public necessity.

Here, the necessity was solely to protect L's dog and prevent L's liability. There was no benefit to the public at large, and therefore no public necessity. L remains liable for actual damages.

ii. Easement

a. Implied Easement by Prescription

Easements grant the dominant estate (or a party in limited circumstances) the right to use the subservient estate for limited purposes. An implied easement has no writing requirement. An easement by prescription functions similarly to adverse possession of a property, but only for a limited use. In order to establish that there is an easement by prescription, the seeker of the easement must demonstrate (1) continuous use of the subservient estate, (2) for a statutory period, (3) that was open and notorious, and (4) hostile. Unlike in adverse possession, there is no requirement that the easement holder have had exclusive use over the property, since the easement does not eliminate the property owners' rights entirely.

i. Continuous Use

The use must have been continuous throughout the statutory period. It need not have been constant, but must have been reliable enough for the scope of the easement sought.

Here, L claims that he had been fetching his dog for 10 years. Because he did so "frequently", this is likely continuous use.

ii. Statutory Period

The use must have lasted the statutory period (usually 7-14 years)

Here, it is unclear what the statutory period for adverse possession is in the jurisdiction. It is likely 10 years or less just based on average AP statutes. As such, the statutory period requirement is met.

iii. Open and Notorious

The use must have been such that an observant landowner would be aware of it. In essence, the landowner must have been put on inquiry notice of the use.

Here, L invaded M's patio. For 7 of the 10 years, M regularly spent time outside and likely observed his actions. Furthermore, even after M abandoned the outside due to the smoke, she should have observed L walking on her patio. As such, the open and notorious requirement is met.

iv. Hostile

The use must have been without the permission of the landowner. Otherwise, there is a freely revocable license.

Here, it is unclear whether or not M consented to the use prior to erecting the fence.

b. Right to Protect Easement

An easement holder has the right to protect their easement from interference, even from the landowner. This includes the dismantling of any barrier erected as an impediment to that easement.

If L had not received permission to trespass on M's property at any point, then he likely has an easement (assuming the statutory period is met). However, if he had permission to retrieve his dog, then there will be no easement.

If there is an easement, L is not vulnerable to nominal damages or ejection for trespass, so long as the trespass is for the purpose of retrieving his dog. Additionally, L has the right to protect his easement by demolishing or circumventing barricades such as M's fence. As such, he is not liable for actual damages either.

3. Town's Suit

Government entities have the right to "take" property, providing that "just compensation" is provided. In order to take, the government must merely show that the taking is rationally related to a legitimate government purpose.

Town is a government entity.

a. Legal Taking

If the taking was illegal, than M may be able to retake her property or receive additional damage. As above, a taking must be rationally related to a legitimate government purpose. Here, T took the property for the purpose of building a public park. Building a public park is a legitimate purpose. Additionally

b. Just Compensation

Generally, the compensation must merely be equal to the full market value at the time of the taking, including the value of any improvements. Fair market value can be determined by appraisal or by the sale of comparative properties.

Here, the government determined the FMV by paying based on comparable properties in the area. Assuming that those properties actually were comparable, including the cost of any improvements, the compensation was just. If M can demonstrate that the other properties were defective, she can recover more.

However, the prior offer to purchase M's property is likely not relevant. Current FMV is the indicator for just compensation, not prior FMV. If the increased value was due to mineral rights or something, than M can likely recover more, but otherwise she is probably out of luck.

c. Relocation Costs

The government may be liable for losses resulting from reliance on the assumption that there would be no taking. For example, the government may be required to compensate a party for the cost of recent improvements. However, the government is not responsible for other costs, such as the costs of finding a replacement property.

Here, M is seeking relocation costs. However, these costs were not incurred on reliance of the assumption that her property would not be taken. Additionally, they were not incurred based on any recent improvement to her property. They are the types of cost incurred in almost every taking, and as such M is not entitled to additional compensation.

Answer B

1. Whether Michele may assert any claims against Len for his smokehouse.

Michelle is most likely to succeed against Len in a claim for private nuisance. To state a claim for private nuisance, the plaintiff must allege that the defendant's conduct constitutes a substantial and unreasonable interference with the use and enjoyment of her property. Interference is substantial if it would be annoying or offensive to an average member of the community. Interference is unreasonable if the harm to the plaintiff outweighs the benefit of defendant's activity. If there are other members in the community, Michelle may also make a claim for public nuisances. However, it is harder to plead these threshold elements. A claim for public nuisance requires that defendant's activity constitute a substantial and unreasonable interference with the use and enjoyment of the property of the public at large, and at least one homeowner suffers specific injury that is distinct from the common injury suffered by the community. Since the facts do not support a public nuisance claim and do not allege a community of homeowners, Michelle is best off bringing a claim for private nuisance.

What is the nuisance?

Michelle will argue that the smokehouse Len installed in his backyard is a nuisance because, while it smokes the meat, it produces smoke and smells that waft over to Michelle's property and prevent her use and enjoyment of it. Len installed the smokehouse three years ago and he uses it to supply smoked meats to his friends. Len is an excellent chef, so presumably his smoked meats are in high demand. Michelle enjoys the climate near her home and enjoys spending time outdoors. She used to have parties outdoors, but she stopped doing that after she received complaints from her guests. Even though she has asked Len to stop using the smokehouse, he has refused.

Based on these facts, Michelle should argue that the smoke and smells from Len's smokehouse are a substantial and unreasonable interference with the use and enjoyment of her property because they prevent her from spending time outside.

Is it a substantial interference?

Interference is substantial if the interference would be annoying or offensive to an average person in the community. Based on these facts, the smoke and smells from Len's smokehouse is substantial. An interference is not substantial if it is annoying or offensive to the plaintiff because of her particular traits or sensitivities. Here, nothing in the facts suggests that Michelle has specific sensitivities. Moreover, she has guests over and they also find the smells and smoke to be annoying and they find it unpleasant to be outside. The smokehouse not only prevents her from having outdoor dinner parties (which Len will argue are a specialized use of the property and do not give rise to nuisance) but from spending time outdoors as she enjoys.

It is important for Michelle to focus on the harm that she suffers as an average member of the community. If she alleges that the harm is that she cannot have outdoor dinner parties anymore, her claim for nuisance may fail because Len will argue that the nuisance arises from her particular circumstances. It is important for Michelle to show that having a few friends over for dinner is a regular part of being a homeowner.

Michelle's strongest argument is that the smoke and smells prevent her from being outside and enjoying her property. She should use her friends as evidence that the smoke and smells are offensive to an average person.

Is it an unreasonable interference?

Interference is unreasonable if the harm to plaintiff outweighs the benefit to defendant. Here, the harm Michelle likely outweighs the benefit to Len. Michelle can no longer enjoy the outdoors on her property, something that she enjoys doing. Therefore, she has been deprived of the use and enjoyment of her property. Michelle will argue that Len's harm is slight - she is merely asking him to stop using the smokehouse in his backyard. Although Len is a chef, the facts do not indicate that he's smoking the meat for commercial gain or as part of his livelihood. Len is merely providing the smoked meats to his friends, gratuitously. Accordingly, the harm to Len is slight if he has to stop using the smokehouse. Len will argue that the smokehouse cost a lot of money, and he will be harmed greatly, because he will not be able to reap the benefit of his investment. On balance, Michelle will probably prevail that the interference is unreasonable.

Defenses

Len will probably assert the defense of laches and argue that too much time has passed for Michelle to assert this claim. He will argue that he installed the smokehouse 3 years ago, and this is the first time that she is alleging it is a nuisance. In response, Michelle will argue that she tried to live with it, but after three years, it was clear that the smokehouse would permanently deprive her of the use and enjoyment of her property. She will also bring up that she asked Len, multiple times, not to use the smokehouse, and tried to arrive at a compromise. Len, however, rejected her attempts to deal. Since she and Len were not able to resolve it privately, she is finally bringing suit. Len will probably not prevail on his defense of laches.

Outcome

Michelle is likely to prevail on her private nuisance claim. Since the remedy for nuisance is often an injunction, or a court order telling a person to act or not act, the court may balance the harms. Instead of granting a complete injunction against Len using the smokehouse, the court may limit his use so that it does not substantially and unreasonably interfere with Michelle's use and enjoyment of her property. An injunction may permit Len to use the smokehouse for a certain number of hours or to give Michelle notice that he will use it. An injunction may also order Len to install some technology to limit the smoke and smells coming from the smokehouse. While Michelle will likely prevail on her claim, Len's own right to the use and enjoyment of his property will probably block her from obtaining a complete injunction.

2. Whether Michelle may assert any claims against Len for fetching his dog from her patio.

The issue here is whether Michelle may assert a claim against Len for trespass for fetching the dog (not for the dog itself), and whether Len has any valid defenses.

The elements of trespass are 1) intentional act, 2) entering the land of another, 3) causation, 4) damages. The interference with the property right is sufficient for damages. The facts state that Len's dog had been entering the property for years and that Len repeatedly entered the property to fetch the dog. Michelle will argue, on these facts, she has stated a valid cause of action for trespass. Len intentionally enters her land and retrieves her dog. Her damages/injury is the injury to her property right and her right to keep trespassers from her property. Len's conduct is the actual cause of her injury.

Len's Defenses

Privilege

Len will argue that his entrance onto the land was privileged because he was retrieving his property, the dog. However, when an animal is on another's property, the owner is not privileged to go and retrieve it himself without giving notice to the landowner. Len's entrance onto the land would only be privileged if he informed Michelle that his dog was on her property and he intended to retrieve. She would then be compelled to allow him to retrieve it at a reasonable time and in a reasonable manner. The facts state that no such communications occurred. Therefore, Len's entrance onto land was not privileged.

Prescriptive easement

Len will argue that he has an easement by prescription to enter Michelle's property and retrieve the dog from the patio. An easement is a nonpossessory right in land. Here, Len will argue that there is an easement appurtenant. His land is the dominant tenement, and Michelle's land is the servient tenement. He has a right to use the servient tenement within the scope of the easement.

An easement by prescription is an easement that is acquired through use over time, and the elements are similar to those of adverse possession. The use of the land must be continuous for the statutory period (usually the same as adverse possession), open and notorious, and hostile to the landowner. Here, the facts state that Len has been entering the property and retrieving the dog from the patio for the last 10 years. In many jurisdictions, ten years is the applicable period for the statute of limitations. Therefore, the first element is likely satisfied. Second, his entrance has been open and notorious. First, Michelle knows that Len regularly enters her property, because sometimes the dog is there and sometimes it is not. Based on Len's statement to Michelle, he does not try to keep it a secret that he regularly enters her property. Additionally, Michelle installed a fence and 'no trespassing' signs, showing she was aware of the trespass. Therefore, the open and notorious factor has likely been satisfied. Finally, the entrance is hostile because Len enters knowing it is not his land and knowing that Michelle considers him a trespasser.

Michelle may argue that Len merely had a license to enter her property and remove the dog from the patio, and that she revoked his license to do that when she built the fence and put up the signs. A license is not a right in land, it is merely permission to enter the land of another. Michelle will argue that she implicitly granted Len a license to retrieve the dog from the patio, however she chose to revoke that license, and built a fence so the dog would not enter her property and Len would not retrieve it. Len then clipped the fence and trespassed onto her property.

Michelle may not succeed in an action alleging that all of Len's entrances onto her land constituted trespass. However, she will probably prevail in an action for any trespass that occurred after Len clipped the fence and re-entered her property. Moreover, clipping the fence on Michelle's property constitutes trespass to chattels (interference in the use and enjoyment of personal property) which is actionable.

3. Whether Michelle is likely to prevail in her argument for additional compensation from Town.

The issue here is whether Town has provided Michelle with just compensation for her property.

Takings

Under the 5th Amendment, the government is permitted to condemn private land for public use so long as it provides the landowner with just compensation. Just compensation is measured as fair market value at the time of condemnation. Here, the condemnation is likely valid because the government is taking the land for a public use, to create a public park. The facts state that Town has offered Michelle a sum "substantially exceeding the prices of comparable parcels recently sold in the neighborhood." Generally, the way to determine fair market value for real property is to look at recent sales of similar parcels in the area. Here, Michelle will receive even more than the sale price of comparable lots. While this isn't a guarantee of fair market value, it makes it likely that she is receiving fair market value. However, Michelle will still point out the sum she turned down a few years ago. The fact is that the market a few years ago is not the current market, and a pass offer does not affect the value of property under takings law. She will also argue that the price is insufficient because it doesn't provide compensation for relocation. However, the Takings Clause does not require the government to compensate landowners for relocation costs. Accordingly, Michelle's challenges to the Town's taking will probably not prevail. If she wants to challenge the purchase price, she must have her land appraised and sue the government in court, arguing that what they offered her is below market compensation.

Q4 Criminal Law and Procedure

Claire, a four-year-old girl, went missing. Ike, who regularly provided reliable information to Officer Ava, told her that he had recently overheard Don planning to kidnap a child to raise as his own daughter. Officer Ava's partner, Officer Bert, hurried to the courthouse to apply for a search warrant for Don's house. Meanwhile, Officer Ava rushed to Don's house and knocked on the door. Don answered. Officer Ava told him, "I heard that a missing child might be here," and asked, "Can I come in and look for her?" Don replied, "No." Officer Ava said, "A life is at stake. I am searching your home, whether you want me to or not." Don stepped aside and allowed Officer Ava to enter.

Officer Ava searched the home thoroughly. In a closet in the bedroom, she found a bomb, measuring about 2 feet by 2 feet. In a medicine cabinet in the bathroom, she found several vials of cocaine. While looking under the bed, she found a plain sealed envelope, which she opened, that contained a map with a highlighted route from Don's house to Claire's house. She did not find Claire. Immediately after she completed the search, Officer Bert arrived with a warrant authorizing the "search of Don's home for Claire." Not long afterward, Claire turned up elsewhere unharmed.

Don was charged with: (1) possession of a bomb; (2) possession of cocaine; and (3) attempted kidnapping.

Don filed a motion, under the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution, to suppress evidence of the bomb, the cocaine and the map.

1. How should the court rule on the motion to suppress regarding:

    a. the bomb? Discuss.
    b. the cocaine? Discuss.
    c. the map? Discuss.

2. Can Don be found guilty of attempted kidnapping? Discuss.

Answer A

MOTIONS TO SUPPRESS

Under the Fourth Amendment of the U.S. Const., which applies to states via the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, all unreasonable searches and seizures of persons, properties, and papers are unlawful. Where an unlawful search has taken place, the exclusionary rule generally applies -- that is, the evidence wrongfully obtained will not be allowed in as evidence, although it can typically be used for impeachment and other limited purposes. Similarly, evidence derived from wrongfully obtained evidence is deemed "fruit of a poisonous tree" and will not be admitted unless there has been attenuation. All that said, courts will follow the "harmless error" rule and not overturn a conviction unless the admission of the wrongfully obtained evidence was material and affected the final judgment.

Reasonable Expectation of Privacy

In order to bring a suppression claim under the 4th Amendment, a person must have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the place searched. Here, Don's house was subject to a search. Don, who answered the officer's knock, undoubtedly has a reasonable expectation of privacy in his home.

Warrant Requirement

The Supreme Court has upheld a warrant requirement under the 4th Amendment. The warrant must describe in reasonable specificity the places and persons to be searched, and the types of things to be searched for. Therefore, barring certain exceptions to be discussed, an officer must have a warrant to search someone's house. There are six exceptions to the warrant requirement: (1) Search Incidental to Arrest, (2) Consent, (3) Hot Pursuit and Exigent Circumstances, (4) Automobiles, (5) Plain View, (6) Stop and Frisk.

Here, the prosecution will argue that Officer Ava had both consent to search D's house and was compelled to search his house given the exigency of the situation.

Consent

An otherwise unlawful search is permitted if the searched party voluntarily consented to the search. The person need not have known that he was free to decline consent; however, officers cannot utilize coercive methods in obtaining such consent or else it will not be deemed voluntary.

Here, Ava asked D for permission to search the house but was flatly told, "No." Thus, D can, likely successfully, argue that there was no consent here. Prosecution will respond, however, that when Ava told D that "[a] life is at stake" and that she is therefore searching the house, D's stepping aside was implicit consent. That is unlikely to be a successful argument with a court, especially when it comes at the heels of being denied consent. A court will likely conclude that D felt that he had no choice but to allow the officer in -- indeed, the officer said she would search the home "whether you want me to or not."

Thus, consent is unlikely to provide the exclusion from warrant in this case.

Exigent Circumstances

There is also an exception to the warrant requirement where emergency circumstances require that the officer not wait for a warrant. Such circumstances exist where, say, a felon is fleeing or an officer is worried that defendant will destroy the evidence or instrumentality of the crime in the time it would take to obtain a warrant.

Here, prosecution would argue that Ava had just such a concern. After having sent Bert to obtain a warrant, Ava was worried (given the reliability of Ike) that it might be too late by the time the warrant came -- D might already have concealed or transported Claire by then. D, however, will respond that that does not qualify as an exigent circumstance that would warrant a non-consented, unwarranted search of a person's home. D would argue that Ava, if she was so concerned about Claire's kidnapping, could have waited outside Don's house after he was refused consent -- that would have prevented Don from transporting anyone he had kidnapped. But that might have still given Don time to conceal a small four-year-old girl or perhaps even cause her harm.

Ultimately it will be upon the court to decide whether the "totality" of the circumstances are in favor of allowing the exigent circumstance exception. But even if the court chose not to do so, the government can rely on the inevitable discovery doctrine (discussed below) to argue in favor of admission.

Officer Bert's Search Warrant / Inevitable Discovery

The obtaining of a warrant after a search has been performed does not provide immunity to the unlawful search carried out. Thus, if Ava was unjustified in searching D's home, the warrant would not, by itself, render the search lawful.

Nonetheless, whether Bert's warrant was a valid one is important because, if the warrant was valid, it could render the search harmless under the inevitable discovery doctrine, which provides that evidence that otherwise should be excluded can be included where it would have been inevitably discovered by lawful means.

Here, first, the warrant was a valid one (nothing to the contrary in the facts; moreover, officers are allowed good faith reliance on a warrant they believe valid). Assuming Ava had waited to conduct the search until the warrant arrived, the warrant would have allowed her to then go ahead and conduct the same search that she did (that said, we discuss below how Ava exceeded the scope of her search under either the warrant or exigent circumstance theory).

Thus, between the exigent circumstance and warrant, the court will likely deem the search itself to be lawful, though that brings us to the specific search itself and how it might have exceeded its lawful scope.

Scope of Search

Under both exigent circumstances exception, whereby Don would be searching for a little girl or other evidence of kidnapping, or under the explicit terms of the warrant, Ava's search was limited in scope to the "search of Don's home for Claire" and, perhaps under the former exception, also of evidence of kidnapping.

Bomb

Ava discovered the bomb in a closet in the bedroom. A closet, arguably, is a good place to hide a kidnap victim. Thus, Ava's search of the closet was proper. Once she had opened the closet, of course, the large 2'x2' bomb was in plain view, another exception to the warrant requirement which allows the search (and thus confiscation) of items found in plain sight in a location where the officer is lawfully present. Here, Ava was lawfully in the closet and the bomb was in her plain view. Thus, the court should deny the motion to suppress evidence of the bomb.

Cocaine

The cocaine was found in a medicine cabinet, which is probably too small to hide a child, even a little girl who is four. Prosecution would argue that, at least under exigent circumstance exception where evidence of kidnapping (and not just of Claire physically) would be allowed, Ava looked to find clues to any kidnapping. That, however, is likely to fail because under that theory almost every aspect of the house would be searchable -- courts find warrant exceptions to be narrow in scope. Under the express warrant itself, of course, Ava's search was limited to Claire, who could not have been found in the medicine cabinet. Thus, the court should grant the motion to suppress evidence of the cocaine.

Map

The map was found whilst Ava was looking "under the bed." Like the closet, under the bed is a location where a kidnapping victim might be tied or placed. However, the map was in an envelope that the officer had to open in order to access the map. Under the warrant, that is clearly beyond the scope. Even under the exigent circumstances exception, this is likely to come closer to the finding of the cocaine than the bomb. Unless the map was visible from the outside (facts do not state), Ava would be beyond her authority to search inside it. Thus, the court should grant the motion to suppress evidence of the map.

In conclusion, the court should admit the bomb, but not the cocaine or the map.

2. ATTEMPTED KIDNAPPING OF CLAIRE

Whether Don can be found guilty of Claire's attempted kidnapping.

Kidnapping

Under common law, the prosecution for kidnapping must prove the following elements beyond a reasonable doubt (the first two elements are essentially those involved in the lesser crime of false imprisonment): (1) confinement or restraint, (2) to a bounded area, (3) and victim was either moved or concealed. The confining or restraining must be of such a nature that the victim does not feel that she is free to leave. Similarly, the bounded area must prevent, at least in the victim's knowledge, her from escaping without harm. The confinement or the bounded area need not be physical -- being threatened with a gun on a porch could satisfy the requirements. In addition, kidnapping requires that the victim either be concealed or moved during her state of false imprisonment.

Attempted Kidnapping

Attempted kidnapping (AK) is an inchoate crime and would merge with the actual crime of kidnapping, if that were charged. AK is a specific element crime, which means that D must have had the particular intent to satisfy the elements of kidnapping as described above. In addition, attempt requires the presence of an overt act. Under common law, this meant that D had to be "dangerously close" to committing the actual crime. Modern courts have relaxed that rule some, although they still require more than mere preparation, which is what is needed to prove the overt act in a conspiracy. Typically, they require a "substantial step" in furtherance of the actual crime.

Here, a jury would be able to impute specific intent from both the actual and circumstantial evidence. Assuming Ike testifies, he will be able to tell them what he overheard regarding Don's plan to kidnap a child and the map found in Don's house (assuming it is admitted) will confirm that the child to be kidnapped was in fact Claire. It is unlikely that the bomb and cocaine, assuming that they are admitted into evidence, will inform the charge of attempted kidnapping. Perhaps the bomb was going to be used to threaten or restrain Claire, but the facts do not say anything in that regard. Whilst the evidence is relatively slim, a jury could nonetheless reasonably find that D had the specific intent to commit the kidnapping of C.

The overt act is a closer question, and likely to ultimately resolve in D's favor. While the map is certainly an overt act that at least satisfies the "mere preparation" requirement of a conspiracy, it likely is not a "substantial step" in achieving the crime (and far from coming "dangerously close" to achieving it). The jury would perhaps have to rely on other circumstantial evidence to reach that conclusion, but the facts as presented do not state what other evidence might exist. Without the map, there almost certainly is no overt act.

Thus, under the circumstances and without more evidence of steps taken by D, D is unlikely to be found guilty of attempted kidnapping.

Defenses

According to the prompt, it does not appear that D has any valid defense to his specific intent crime, such as voluntary or involuntary intoxication, duress, entrapment, or insanity.

Answer B

1. DON'S MOTION TO SUPPRESS

The issue is whether the evidence of the bomb, cocaine, and the map were obtained in violation of Fourth Amendment to the US Constitution.

FOURTH AMENDMENT

The Fourth Amendment of the US Constitution protects citizens from unreasonable search and seizures.

Government Conduct

The Fourth Amendment applies to conduct by the government. There must be conduct by a publicly paid police or a person acting in the direction of the police.

Officer Ava (A) is a publicly paid police officer.

Therefore, there was government conduct.

Reasonable Expectation of Privacy

In order to have standing to challenge a search or seizure, the person must have standing. Standing exists where the person has a reasonable expectation of privacy over the place or item to be searched or seized. A person has a reasonable expectation of privacy over his home.

A searched Don's (D) home, so D had a reasonable expectation of privacy.

Therefore, D has standing to challenge the search and seizure.

WARRANT

A search and seizure are reasonable if it is based on a valid warrant. A warrant requires probable cause and particularity. Probable cause requires a fair probability that evidence of a crime will be found in the place or item to be searched. Particularity requires a description of the items that can be searched and seized. Probable cause may be based on information obtained from a reliable and credible source.

A had probable cause to believe that Claire (C) would be at D's home. A reliable informant, Ike, told A that she overheard D planning to kidnap a child to raise as his own, and C, a four-year-old girl went missing. Additionally, B obtained a warrant to search D's house for C, so the warrant contained particularity. However, even though Officer Bert (B) obtained a warrant, A did not have a warrant to search D's house when she conducted the search.

Therefore, the search was not based on a warrant. Since the search was not based on a warrant, the evidence of the bomb, the cocaine, and the map was obtained in violation of D's Fourth Amendment right.

WARRANT EXCEPTION

Absent a warrant, evidence obtained from a search and seizure will be inadmissible at trial unless the search falls within an exception to the warrant requirement.

Consent

A police officer may search an item or place with consent so long as the consent is voluntary and the person has apparent authority to consent.

A knocked on D's door and asked D if she could come in and search for a missing girl. D responded, "No." Although D stepped aside and allowed A to enter and search, D's consent was not voluntary because A told him that he had no choice, indicated by the fact that she said she would search whether D wanted her to or not.

Therefore, the search was not based on consent.

Exigent Circumstances

Under exigent circumstances such as emergency aid, a police officer may enter the home of another and conduct a search without a warrant.

C, a four-year old girl went missing and A had reliable information to believe that D had kidnapped her. The fact that a young child may have been in D's home and likely needed help to escape could constitute an exigent circumstance, which allowed A to enter D's home to render aid to C.

Assuming exigent circumstances exist, the next step is to analyze whether each item found in D's house was obtained through a valid warrant exception.

Plain View

Evidence may be seized without a warrant if (1) the police officer was legitimately on the premises, (2) the item was contraband or evidence of a crime was in plain sight, and (3) the police officer had probable cause to believe that the item was evidence of a crime or contraband.

B. THE BOMB

A searched D's home and found a bomb in a closet in the bedroom. Because there were exigent circumstances, A had a legitimate right to be in D's house. Additionally, A had reason to believe that C could be hidden in the closet, so A was legitimately in the closet, the bomb was in plain sight since A saw the bomb when she opened the closet, and the bomb was about 2 feet by 2 feet. Additionally, given the fact that A is a police officer and the bomb was clearly visible, A had probable cause to believe that the bomb was evidence of a crime.

Therefore, evidence of the bomb was not obtained in violation of D's Fourth Amendment rights.

C. THE COCAINE

It is unlikely that C could be found in the medicine cabinet in the bathroom, but A searched the medicine cabinet and found several vials of cocaine. Since A was searching for C, she did not have a reasonable belief to search D's medicine cabinet. Since A opened the cabinet, the cocaine was not in plain sight.

Therefore, the evidence of the cocaine was obtained in violation of D's Fourth Amendment rights.

D. THE MAP

A had a reasonable belief that C could be under the bed because she is a four-year-old girl and could fit there, so the envelope was in plain sight. However, A did not have probable cause to believe that the envelope was evidence of a crime, since C could not fit inside of it. Since A opened the sealed envelope that contained the map, the map was not in plain sight.

Therefore, the evidence of the map was obtained in violation of D's Fourth Amendment rights.

EXCLUSIONARY RULE

Evidence obtained in violation of a person's constitutional rights is inadmissible at trial. Additionally, evidence obtained from an illegal search and seizure will also be inadmissible as fruit of the illegal search and seizure. However, evidence that would be subject to the exclusionary rule may be admitted at trial if the prosecution can remove the taint of the evidence. The prosecution has the burden of showing by a preponderance of evidence that (1) the evidence would have been obtained through an independent source, (2) the evidence was inevitably discoverable, or (3) intervening acts broke the causal chain between the illegal conduct and the evidence obtained.

Because the map and cocaine were obtained in violation of D's Fourth Amendment right, the map and cocaine should be suppressed at trial unless the prosecution can remove its taint.

The prosecution cannot show that the evidence would have been inevitably discovered. Although A conducted an illegal search, B obtained a warrant to search D's home for Claire and arrived immediately after A had completed the search. The warrant authorized search of D's home for C and since C could not be found in the medicine cabinet or the envelope, A and B would not have been able to search those areas. Because the medicine cabinet and map exceeded the scope of the search warrant, the cocaine and map would not have been inevitably discovered. Additionally, because D did not consent to the search, there were no intervening acts that broke the chain of illegality. Furthermore, it is unlikely that the cocaine and map would have been discovered from an independent source because they were in D's home and in his possession.

Therefore, the evidence of the map and cocaine should be suppressed.

Alternatively, if the court finds that exigent circumstances did not exist and the evidence of the bomb was obtained in violation of D's Fourth Amendment rights, the evidence of the bomb would have inevitably been discovered through the search warrant because the police officers would have had a reasonable belief that C could be hidden in the closet.

Therefore, the court should grant the motion to suppress regarding the cocaine and the map, but should deny the motion to suppress regarding the bomb.

2. ATTEMPTED KIDNAPPING

The issue is whether D can be found guilty of attempted kidnapping.

KIDNAPPING

Kidnapping is the act of confining another person with movement or in a concealed place. Kidnapping is a general intent crime and requires an intent to perform the proscribed conduct or an awareness of the circumstances of one's conduct or that a proscribed result may occur.

ATTEMPT

Attempt is an act to commit a proscribed crime, that falls short of the completed crime. Under the majority view, a defendant is guilty of attempt when he takes a substantial step in committing the proscribed crime. Under the minority view, a defendant is guilty of attempt when he is dangerously close to completing crime. Attempt is a specific intent crime and the defendant must act with the specific intent to commit the crime. Attempted kidnapping requires an act with the intent to kidnap another person.

A searched D's home and found a map that contained a map with a highlighted route from D's home to C's house. Additionally, Ike overheard D planning to kidnap a child to raise as his own daughter. The prosecution will argue that D had the intent to kidnap C because he had a plan to kidnap a child, which shows that he intended to commit a kidnapping. However, D had not taken a substantial step in committing the kidnapping. Although D had the map, D was not in the course of a kidnapping. D was in his home when A arrived and C had already been kidnapped. D had not taken a substantial step to kidnap C and the map was an act of preparation that does not amount to a substantial step in the course of completing the crime. Additionally, D was not dangerously close to committing the kidnapping since he was at his home alone when A arrived.

Therefore, D cannot be found guilty of attempted kidnapping.

Q5 Wills / Community Property

In 2001, Ted, who was married to Wendy, signed a valid will bequeathing all of his property as follows: “$10,000 of my separate property to my daughter Ann; then $2,000 of my separate property to each person who is an employee of my company, START, at the time of my death; and all the rest of my separate property, plus all of my share of our community property to my beloved wife of 20 years, if she survives me.” No other gifts were specified in the will.

In 2003, Wendy died.

In 2005, Ted adopted a child, Bob.

In 2006, Ted signed a valid codicil to his 2001 will stating that, “I hereby bequeath $10,000 of my separate property to my beloved son, Bob. All the rest of my 2001 will remains the same.”

In 2011, Ted married Nell.

In 2012, Ted and Nell had a child, Carol.

In 2016, Ted died, leaving his 2001 will and his 2006 codicil as his only testamentary instruments. After all debts, taxes, and expenses had been paid, Ted’s separate property was worth $90,000, and his share of the community property was worth $100,000. At death, Ted still owned START, which by then had ten employees, none of whom had been an employee of START in 2001.

What rights, if any, do Nell, Ann, Bob, Carol and the START employees have in Ted’s estate? Discuss. Answer according to California law.

Answer A

The facts tell us that the 2001 will and the 2006 codicil were both valid so we do not examine their validity.

Nell

Ted's 2001 will provided for his "beloved wife of 20 years" to receive all his share of community property (CP) and the remainder of his separate property (SP). Under this calculation, the wife would receive $50k in SP and Ted's (T's) interest in the CP. Nell (N) will argue that the will specifically provided for this estate to go to his wife, Wendy (W), who he had been married to for 20 years. This gift failed because it was specifically conditioned on W surviving T. This provision would not be covered by the Anti-Lapse statute because the gift was specifically conditioned on the wife's survival. Had it been silent on this point, we would assess rules of lapse and anti-lapse. Anti-lapse would not apply because that saves gifts to kindred of the testator (not the testator's spouse) who die leaving surviving issue. Here, the gift was to a spouse, not kindred, so even absent the specific condition, the gift would not have been saved by the anti-lapse rules.

Instead, N will argue that she is an omitted spouse, so she is entitled to an intestate share of the estate. If T married N and never updated his will after their marriage, and his will does not provide a gift for his wife, or evidence a specific intent not to provide for his wife, and the wife does not get a gift outside the will (such as an annuity), the wife is considered an omitted spouse and she takes a share of the estate equal to what she would get if her spouse died intestate.

Here, T made his original will in 2001. He republished his will by codicil in 2006. He did not marry N till 2011. He did not update his will to provide for N after he married her. There is nothing to suggest that he intentionally wanted to exclude N from his will, and there is nothing to suggest he provided for her outside his will. Therefore, the only question is whether he intended for N to receive W's share under the will, or whether she should be treated as an omitted spouse.

While a court would permit the introduction of parol evidence to aid in resolving the ambiguity, there are no facts to suggest any evidence that would be helpful. Therefore, the court will likely take the will at face value and find that the gift was meant for W (as she was T's wife of 20 years and N was only T's wife of five years), who died, so the gift failed according to its own condition, and N would take an intestate share. The intestate rules provide that a spouse receives all of her husband's estate if he died without issue or parents. If he died with one child/issue or parents, the spouse would take half his SP and all of the CP. If he died with two or more children/issue or parents, the spouse would get 1/3 of his SP and all of his CP. T died with three living children, so his omitted spouse gets 1/3 of his SP and all of his interest in the CP.

Under these calculations, N would get $30k (which is 1/3 of T's SP) plus all of the CP.

Ann

A was given $10k of T's separate property in the 2001 will. In 2006, T executed a codicil that said he was leaving $10k of his separate property to his beloved son, Bob and leaving the rest of his will unchanged. The court will have to determine whether the codicil was meant to take anything out of the 2001 will, or whether it was meant to simply add another gift to the 2001 will.

A will may be revoked explicitly by a later instrument, or by obliteration (lining out words) or by physical act such as tearing or burning. Here, there are no facts to suggest that A did any of these things. Therefore, the court will find that the 2001 will was not revoked at all, and the 2006 codicil simply added another gift to the 2001 will.

A will get $10k of T's SP.

Bob

B might have been treated as an omitted child (similar to the omitted spouse, as discussed above) except that after he was adopted, T republished his will by codicil and provided specifically for B to take a gift of $10k of T's SP. (Adopted children are treated the same way biological children are treated.)

B will get $10k of T's SP.

Carol

C will be treated as an omitted child. She was born after T last updated his will. T did not evidence any intent to exclude her from his will. He did not provide a specific gift to her mother to care for her - her mother was omitted from the will, too. C was not given a gift outside the will. It appears T updated his will, had a child, and forgot to update his will again to include her. C will take her intestate share under the will.

As discussed above, since T died with more than 1 child (issue), and a spouse, the spouse gets 1/3 of T's SP and the children get 2/3 of the SP. The 2/3 is divided equally, per capita to the children, or per capita with representation if any of the children predeceased their father and left issue.

Here, T's estate consists of $90k in SP. Two thirds of $90k is $60k. C would be entitled to 1/3 (because she is one of three children) of $60k, which is $20k.

The other two children were provided for in the will, so they do not take their intestate share. They only get the gifts they were provided in the will.

START Employees

The court will determine whether the employees are sufficiently identified in the will. The will refers to "each person who is an employee of my company, START, at the time of my death." The court will find that these are facts of independent legal significance. T would have employed these people regardless of whether he wanted them to take under his will. He would employ them because they would make his business succeed. He acted to employ them for reasons other than making his will valid. Therefore, the court will allow the will to refer to these facts of independent legal significance and allow the gift to stand.

Each employee will get $2k. There are 10 employees. The START employees would get a total of $20k, which exhausts T's SP.

Answer B

2. CALIFORNIA IS A COMMUNITY PROPERTY STATE

California is a community property ("CP") state. Therefore, there is a presumption that property acquired during the marriage is community property. Separate property consists of property acquired before or after a marriage, property acquired during the marriage with separate property ("SP") funds, property acquired during the marriage by bequest, devise, or gift, and the rents, issues, and profits from the SP. Courts will trace the assets to determine the source of funds used to acquire the asset, to determine whether the asset is SP or CP. Courts will also look to see if any valid agreements or the spouses' conduct changes the character of assets. Via a valid will, each spouse may devise all of his SP and his half of the CP to any beneficiaries that he wishes.

NOTE: Wendy's Share

In the original will, Ted's gift to Wendy consisted of all of his share of the CP and any SP not devised by will (also known as the "residuary estate"). Ted included a survivorship requirement for Wendy's gift; Wendy did not survive Ted, so these gifts would not be valid. Furthermore, this gift would have failed anyway without this clause. Under California law, a beneficiary of a testamentary gift must survive the testator, or else the gift "lapses" (meaning it fails). If the gift lapses, the gift goes to the testator's residuary devisees, if any, and if not, it is distributed by intestate distribution. A testator's "residuary" estate is a gift of whatever is not specifically devised in his will to certain beneficiaries. California does have an anti-lapse statute. However, it only applies if the devisee is the kindred (blood relative) of the testator and the kindred leaves issue. Wendy was Ted's spouse, not his kindred. Therefore the anti-lapse statute does not save her gift under Ted's 2001 will, and the separate property and community property devised to Wendy by Ted's will therefore lapses and will be distributed via intestate succession (because Wendy was the residuary beneficiary - he devised whatever remained of his SP to Wendy, so it must instead be distributed intestate). Therefore, Wendy's gifts under the will do not preclude others from inheriting Ted's SP.

3. NELL - The Pretermitted Spouse

California has a statute protecting spouses from being accidentally omitted from testamentary dispositions. If, after execution of all testamentary instruments (including wills and codicils, and any intervivos trusts), the testator gets married, the spouse is considered a "pretermitted spouse" and will be entitled to take her intestate share of the estate. Exceptions to this are if the will states on its face that it was not his intention to give this gift to a pretermitted spouse, the pretermitted spouse is otherwise provided for by nontestamentary transactions (for example, if the testator takes out an annuity for the spouse), or if the spouse waives her rights to make claims as a pretermitted spouse.

Here, the last testamentary instrument executed by Ted was in 2006 (his codicil). Ted married Nell in 2011, and no subsequent testamentary instruments were executed. There is no evidence that any of these exceptions to Nell's ability to claim as a pretermitted spouse exist. Therefore, Nell would be entitled to her intestate share of the Testator's estate; under California intestacy distribution laws, when as here, there is one surviving spouse and more than one surviving issue (here, Ted has three surviving children), the surviving spouse is entitled to the testator's one-half of the community property (so she ends up with 100% of the community property) and one third of the testator's SP. Therefore, Nell would be entitled to all of the CP ($100,000) and one-third of the SP ($30,000).

It is unclear whether the value of Ted's business, START, is included in his SP and CP discussed in the facts. If it is not, Nell would also be entitled to her intestate share of the SP and CP value of Ted's ownership of the business.

4. CAROL - The Pretermitted Child

Just like the pretermitted spouse, California protects children who have been unintentionally omitted from a testator's testamentary distributions when the child is born or adopted after the execution of all testamentary instruments. Pretermitted children are entitled to their intestate share of the testator's estate, unless the face of the will indicates an intent not to do so, the child is provided for by a non-testamentary transfer, or all of the testator's assets are given to the mother of the pretermitted child when the testator has other children, with the indication that the mom take care of all the kids. Here, Carol was born in 2012, well after Ted executed his last testamentary instrument (the codicil in 2006), so she is a pretermitted child.

Here, there is no evidence that facts exist that would prevent Carol from making a claim as a pretermitted child. There are no apparent non-testamentary transfers to Carol to be taken instead of a testamentary gift, and in the original will, although Ted left a substantial portion of his estate to his then wife Wendy, he also left gifts to his other children - Ann and Bob. Therefore, Carol is entitled to her intestate share of Ted's estate, which under California's intestate distribution laws described above, would mean that Carol is entitled to her share of 2/3 of Ted's estate (Nell gets 1/3, and all the children would share the other 2/3 of the SP). Therefore Carol would get $20,000 of Ted's SP.

Again, it is unclear whether the value of Ted's business, START, is included in his SP and CP discussed in the facts. If it is not, Carol would also be entitled to her intestate share of the SP value of Ted's ownership of the business.

5. ANN and BOB

Neither Ann nor Bob is a pretermitted child. Ann was born prior to the execution of the 2001 will, and Bob was adopted prior to the 2006 codicil. Note that adopted children are treated the same as natural children for the purposes of distribution in California.

Ann and Bob both receive valid gifts from the will. Ann is devised $10,000 of Ted's SP, and Bob is devised $10,000 of Ted's SP. Unless their gifts have to be abated to accommodate the share of the estate given to Nell and Carol (which, it does not appear that this is the case), they would be entitled to this money.

6. START EMPLOYEES - ACTS OR FACTS OF INDEPENDENT SIGNIFICANCE

To take under a will, the beneficiary must be ascertainable. Usually all of the material terms of the will must be within the will itself, and extrinsic evidence is not allowed to supplement the will provisions. A potential problem with Ted's will is that he wants to give $2,000 to each employee who works at his company at the time of his death. These employees are not individually known at the time of the will, and their names are not included in the will. Generally, the court will not admit extrinsic evidence to probate a will due to fear of fraud. However, a gift to a group of individuals to be determined upon the death of the testator can be a valid gift. Under the theory of acts or facts of independent significance, the court may use external facts to fill in the gaps of a will if the external facts would be in existence regardless of the will. In other words, the existence of the extrinsic evidence is not testamentary in nature and therefore does not have the same concern of fraud. Here, who Ted's company employs exists separate and apart from the will. Therefore, the court will admit extrinsic evidence to determine who the employees were at the time of Ted's death in order to give effect to his testamentary dispositions. At the time of his death, START had ten employees. It does not matter that none of them were employed when the will was created in 2001, or re-published by codicil in 2006, because the will provision applies to the employees of START at the time of Ted's death. Therefore, each of the employees is entitled to $2,000.

Q1 Community Property

Wanda, a successful accountant, and Hal, an art teacher, who are California residents, married in 2008. After their marriage, Wanda and Hal deposited their earnings into a joint bank account they opened at Main Street Bank from which Wanda managed the couple's finances. Each month, Wanda also deposited some of her earnings into an individual account she opened in her name at A1 Bank without telling Hal.

In 2010, Hal inherited $10,000 and a condo from an uncle. Hal used the $10,000 as a down payment on a $20,000 motorcycle, borrowing the $10,000 balance from Lender who relied on Hal's good credit. Hal took title to the motorcycle in his name alone. The loan was paid off from the joint bank account during the marriage.

At Wanda's insistence, Hal transferred title to the condo, worth $250,000, into joint tenancy with Wanda to avoid probate. The condo increased in value during the marriage.

On Hal's 40th birthday, Wanda took him to Dealer and bought him a used camper van for $20,000, paid out of their joint bank account, titled in Hal's name. Hal used the camper van for summer fishing trips with his friends.

In 2016, Wanda and Hal permanently separated, and Hal filed for dissolution. Just before the final hearing on the dissolution, Hal happened to discover Wanda's individual account, which contained $50,000.

What are Hal's and Wanda's rights and liabilities, if any, regarding:

1. The condo? Discuss.

2. The motorcycle? Discuss.

3. The camper van? Discuss.

4. The A1 Bank account? Discuss.

Answer according to California Law.

Answer A

California is a community property state. Unless the parties have agreed otherwise in writing, all property acquired during the course of marriage is presumed to be community property (CP). Property acquired before marriage and after the marital economic community has ended is presumed to be separate property (SP). In addition, property acquired by gift, devise, or descent is presumed to be SP as well. To determine the characteristic of an asset, courts generally trace the property to the assets that were purchased.

At divorce, all CP is equally divided between the parties unless they have otherwise agreed in writing, orally stipulated to in open court, or an exception applies to the general rule of equal division of CP at divorce. A spouse's SP remains his or her SP at divorce. With these general principles in mind, each property will be assessed individually.

The Condo

At issue is whether the condo is completely part of Hal's (H) SP or whether the community estate has an interest in the condo. As stated above, property acquired by gift or devise, such as an inheritance, is presumed to be SP of the spouse receiving the gift/inheritance. Here, H's uncle left him the condo and Hal inherited it. Therefore, unless H and Wanda (W) expressly agreed in writing that it was to change from SP to CP, H owned it as SP alone. However, the facts indicate that H transferred the title to the condo to W into a joint tenancy with W to avoid probate. Therefore, at issue is whether this vested the community estate with an interest in the apartment.

In California, property that is held in joint form is presumed to be CP. Therefore, when H transferred his interest in the Condo to W as joint tenants, the law will presume that he intended to gift the condo to the CP and for each to hold as joint tenants with right of survivorship. When property that is held in joint form is to be divided at divorce, two statutes apply. First, in order for the transferring spouse to have an interest of ownership it must establish that there was either a written agreement that he was to hold it as SP or that the deed itself contains language that the property is only to be SP. Here, no such written agreement exists. On the contrary, W and H agreed to transfer the condo to W and H as joint tenants. However, a spouse who "gifts" SP to CP is entitled to reimbursements for down payment, principal payments for the mortgage, and for improvements made to the property. Here, H essentially paid the price of the condo $250k when he transferred it from his SP to CP. Therefore, he will be entitled to receive a $250k return on the apartment's value if it is deemed to be CP. The remainder of the condo's apartment will be CP.

However, H can argue that the transaction should be set aside because it is presumptively obtained through undue influence and, therefore, void. In the course of dealing with one another, spouses owe the same duties as those who are in confidential relationships. This duty imposes upon them the highest duty of good faith and fair dealing when the spouses enter into transactions with each other during their marriage. If one spouse gained an unfair advantage over the other in a transaction, the court will presume that the transaction was obtained via undue influence and, thus, invalidate it. The spouse who obtained the advantage will have the burden to prove that the transaction was entered into by the other spouse freely and voluntarily with full knowledge of all the facts relevant to the transaction and the basic effect of the transaction.

Here, H will argue that W insisted that he transfer the property into both of their names as joint tenants to avoid probate. H will argue that because W was an accountant, he believed her word and relied on her professional experience to believe that the best move for the couple was indeed to hold it as joint tenants. Furthermore, he will argue that as an art teacher who knows nothing about estates and marital property, he relied on her word and did not know that holding as joint tenants will deprive him of full interest in the condo if they were to divorce. W has the burden here. She will have to show that she explained everything to H and that she indeed told him of the basic effect of the transaction. However, this does not appear to be the case. It appears that all W did was insist that H transfer it to avoid probate, but did not inform him of any other consequences that such a transfer may have. Therefore, H has a good argument to void the transfer to W as joint tenants for the condo because W gained an unfair advantage over him.

If H is successful in arguing that the presumption that property held in joint form is CP, W may argue that the transfer constituted a valid transmutation. A transmutation is an agreement by the parties that changes the form of ownership from CP to SP, or SP to CP, or one's SP to the other's SP. However, to be valid, there must be a written agreement signed by the party whose interest is adversely affected and expressly state that a change of ownership is to occur. Here, this is not the case.

The Camper Van

At issue is whether the camper van is H's SP due to a gift from W or it remains as CP. During their marriage, the parties can enter into agreement to change the character of any particular property by transmutation. As stated above, transmutation is when the parties change CP to SP, or SP to CP, or one's SP to the other's SP. However, for a transmutation to be valid, it must be in writing, signed by the party whose interest is adversely affected and expressly states that a change in ownership is to take place. The general exceptions to writing requirements do not apply here. The only exception is when a spouse gives a gift of a tangible item of personal property to the other spouse. However, this personal gift exception only applies to gifts of low value and does not apply to those with substantial value.

Here, the wife purchased a camper van for $20,000 on H's 40th birthday using money paid from their joint bank account, titled in H's name. Title alone does not establish the characteristic of property for community law purposes. Rather what is more important is the funds that were used to acquire the property. Here, the funds were used from a joint bank account. The joint bank account is indeed community property because both of them were depositing money into it from the income they earned from their respective jobs. Therefore, the camper van purchased with CP is presumed to be CP unless there was a valid transmutation or other exception. Here, there was no valid transmutation. When W gifted the camper van to H, it was not accompanied by any written agreement, signed by W, that stated that H was to own the property as his SP and that W was gifting it to him outright. The issue then is whether the personal gift exception applies here. It does not. Generally, the personal gift exception applies to gifts of personal property with low value (such as a piece of jewelry that was inherited by a spouse). A $20,000 camper purchased with CP will not be presumed to be a personal gift from one spouse to the other for community property law purposes. The subjective intent of the spouses does not matter.

In conclusion, the camper van is CP subject to be divided 50/50 between H and W because it was acquired with CP property and no exception applies to change its characterization.

The Motorcycle

To determine whether property is CP or SP, the courts will trace the funds used to acquire to purchase the property. Here, H used an initial down payment of $10,000 to purchase the motorcycle. This $10,000 was his SP because he had inherited it from his uncle and, as stated above, gifts acquired via inheritance are presumed to be SP. However, H then paid off the remainder of the 10k from a loan borrowed from a lender. Thus, the issue is whether then $10,000 credit to purchase the motorcycle was CP or SP. Each spouse has an equal right of management over CP and, therefore, has the right to individually enter into agreements to purchase property on credit without the approval of the other. Determining whether a property purchased with a credit from a lender hinges on the primary intent of the lender and where he was looking for assurances before giving out the credit. For example, if the purchasing spouse used his own SP for collateral for the credit purchase, then it would be presumed to be SP because the lender's primary purpose for giving the loan was due to the collateral. However, where the lender relies on the purchasing spouse's good credit, the property purchased with that credit is presumed to be SP. This is because one's good credit or reputation as having good credit is community property.

Therefore, because the lender relied on H's good credit in giving out the $10,000 loan for the purchase of the motorcycle, the $10,000 is presumed to be CP. As a result, H owns a 50% SP interest in the motorcycle because he used $10k to purchase the property (50% of the purchase price) and shares the other half of the value of the motorcycle as CP with W. To conclude, H owns 50% of the motorcycle as SP and both H and W own the other half of the motorcycle as CP.

Additionally, even if the court determines that the lender's primary intent was based on H's SP and, therefore, the motorcycle was not presumed to be SP, the community estate will still have a 50% interest due to the principal debt reduction method. Where a spouse has acquired property before the marriage or acquired property through inheritance and then CP funds are used to pay for the principal of the property, the community estate obtains a pro rata interest in the property based off of the principal debt reduction due to funds paid from the CP. Here, the remaining $10k of the motorcycle’s balance was paid off with the joint bank account during the marriage, which is indeed CP. Therefore, the community estate would be entitled to a principal debt reduction of 50%, meaning it would have an interest of 50% of the total value of the motorcycle.

The A1 Bank Account

As stated above, all property acquired during the course of marriage is presumed to be CP, regardless of who holds title to the property. Here, W owned an individual bank account at A1 Bank without telling Hank and deposited some of her earnings into it. Earnings by each spouse are deemed to be community property when earned during the course of the marriage. It does not matter where the spouse transfers the earnings or what type of account she transfers it into. The fact remains that the funds that she deposited in the A1 Bank were CP and she was not entitled from hiding CP or depriving H of his rights to the CP. The fact that she held the bank account solely in her name is not determinative here. Where the A1 Bank account would matter is if third party creditors of H's debts were seeking payment from him, they would not be able to attack this bank account because W expressly held the Bank account in her name, H did not have any rights of withdrawal and there was no commingling. However, at divorce, the bank account is subject to equal division as it was funded by W's earnings. Thus, H and W own 50% interest each in the bank account.

At issue is whether H may argue for an exception to the equal division of assets to apply here because W misappropriated CP. Although the general rule is that CP is to be divided 50-50 on divorce, a spouse who misappropriated community funds may not be entitled to receive an equal share due to her wrongful acts. H will argue that W misappropriated community funds here because she secretly opened up a bank account without informing H and deposited only her earnings in there. H will argue that because each spouse's earnings are CP he was entitled to those funds during the course of their marriage as it was supposed to be part of the community estate rather than W's private funds. Due to this misappropriation, H will argue that W should be forced to forfeit her interest in the A1 Bank and that he be entitled to take the 50k in full. Ultimately, this is a decision for the judge to make when he is ordering the divorce decree.

Additionally, H may argue that W again breached her duty of good faith and fair dealing by hiding the funds from him. He will argue that W had assumed control over the couple's finances and used that power to obtain an unfair advantage over H by hiding funds from him. He will argue that the agreement to allow her to control the couple's finances imposed a duty on W to use the duty of the highest good faith and fair dealing when she managed the finances and that she breached it by failing to disclose all the funds to H. W will have to overcome the presumption of undue influence by showing that H knew of all the facts constituting the transaction. However, because H did not have any idea about the secret bank account it will be impossible for W to overcome this burden.

Therefore, H has a strong argument for having the court strip W's interest in the A1 Bank account funds and reward the full 50k to H for breaching her fiduciary duties as a spouse and for misappropriation of community funds. However, it is important to note that H's and W's marital economic community ended in 2016. The marital economic community ends when there is a permanent separation by the parties and an intent by one of the spouses to not resolve the marriage. The filing for a marriage dissolution is determinative evidence of such intent. Therefore, the marital economic community ended in 2016. From that time, any money that W deposited into the A1 Bank Account will be presumed to be her SP since the marital economic community has ended.

Answer B

General Presumptions

California is a community property state (CP) all property acquired from the date of the marriage until separation is presumed to be CP - owned by the spouses equally 50/50. All wages earned from the time or labor of a spouse during marriage are CP. Property acquired before marriage or after separation is presumed to be Separate Property (SP) of the acquiring spouse. Property received by gift, bequest, or devise is also the separate property of the receiving spouse, as are the rents, issues and profits produced by SP. The character of the property may not be changed simply by changing the manner in which the property is held, the property will be traced to its source and characterized according to the source used to acquire the property. Upon divorce, spouses are entitled to in kind 50/50 distribution of all property.

Transmutation

One spouse may not gift themselves community property. In order to change the character of property from CP to SP or SP to CP, there must be an agreement in writing signed by the spouse whose interest is adversely affected explicitly stating that the spouse intends and understands that she is altering the character of the property. Oral agreements will not be a valid transmutation.

1. THE CONDO

The general presumption is that property acquired during the marriage is CP. Hal acquired the condo in 2010 which was during his marriage to Wanda. However, by law, property acquired through inheritance is the separate property of the inheriting spouse. Since Hal acquired this property from his uncle through inheritance, the condo was Hal’s SP. The issue is that Hal, at Wanda's insistence, titled the property in Joint tenancy with Wanda.

Title in Joint Form

A married couple who takes title in joint form when it is inconsistent with the nature of the funds used to acquire the property will be presumed to have intended the property as CP. Taking title in joint form with no indication that a spouse wanted to reserve a separate property interest creates the presumption of CP. Here, Hal and Wanda took title in joint form and Hal did not reserve any separate property interest, there also is no other writing that evidences an agreement between Hal and Wanda for Hal to keep a separate interest so the court will presume that because they took title in a joint form that they intended the property to be CP.

Transmutation by Deed

In order for spouses to change the character of property from SP to CP as in the case with the condo being Hal's SP and then later conveying to CP, there must be a valid transmutation. The issue is whether the deed from Hal to Hal and Wanda will be a valid transmutation of his interest. Typically, a deed satisfies the writing requirement for the transmutation if signed by the party adversely affected, in this case Hal. However, Hal may not have intended for interest in the property to be adversely affected. The facts indicate that he only agreed to put the condo in joint tenancy after Wanda's insistence that he do so in order to avoid probate. It is likely that Hal being an artist relied on Wanda's assertion because Wanda was a successful accountant who would have known the consequences of such decisions as titling property in a particular manner. The courts have been unclear in whether or not they consider a deed by one spouse to other spouses to be a valid transmutation. Assuming that that the deed from Hal to Wanda is a valid transmutation, then at most Hal would be allowed reimbursement for his SP that was used to acquire the condo by the community. The reimbursement will be allowed without interest or apportionment of increase in value to the items. A court would likely use the value of the property at the time it became CP which for the condo was $250,0000, Hal would be reimbursed for the $250k at divorce and the remaining value of the condo would be divided in kind 50/50 between Hal and Wanda.

Fiduciary Duties of Spouses

Spouses owe one another the highest duty of care and are fiduciaries to one another. If one spouse breaches her fiduciary duty to the other and takes advantage of that spouse by gaining an interest financially or in an asset, then the non-breaching spouse may be able to set aside the conveyance on those grounds. Here, Wanda was a successful accountant and Hal was an art teacher, there is a strong possibility that but for Wanda's insistence that Hal put the condo in joint form that he would not have done so. By insisting that the condo be in joint title, Wanda gained a financial interest in property that she would have otherwise had no rights to because it was received by Hal through inheritance. If Hal can show that Wanda breached her duty to him in convincing him to put the condo in joint form only to benefit herself, Hal may be able to have the conveyance set aside.

Equal Rt of Mgmt

Each spouse has an equal right to manage the assets of the community and keep the other spouse reasonably informed as to the financial situation. Here the facts indicate that Wanda managed the couple's finances and that she also kept a secret bank account without Hal's knowledge. By doing this she breached the duty to share management with Hal and used it to her advantage to try to hide $50k - Hal will also be able to use this to bolster his case that Wanda breached her fiduciary duty to him and should not be allowed to take an interest in the condo.

Conclusion as to the Condo: Hal will likely be entitled to reimbursement for his contribution of SP to CP - in this case the condo was valued at $250k at the time he conveyed to Joint Tenancy so he will have a right to reimbursement of the $250k and the remaining value will be CP. However if the court finds that the deed was not a valid transmutation from Hal's SP to CP then the condo would remain Hal's SP.

2. THE MOTORCYCLE

One spouse may not appropriate CP to themselves by simply taking title to the property in their name alone. When both SP and CP are used for the purchase of an asset the funds used to acquire the property will be traced to their source and the property will be characterized in accordance with funds used for acquisition.

Down Payment

Property that was initially SP will continue to be SP even if the SP is exchanged or sold and the form changes. Hal inherited $10k from his Uncle - inheritance is an area of SP. Hal then took his $10k of SP and used it for a down payment on a motorcycle that he took title to in his name alone. Had the motorcycle cost only $10k, there would be no issue here because the $10k used to purchase the motorcycle could be traced directly to the inheritance which was Hal's SP making the motorcycle then SP as well. The motorcycle cost $20k, though, so it must be determined where the other $10k came from and whether the additional $10k can be traced to other SP or to CP.

Credit - Intent of the Lender

The credit, good will and reputation of a spouse belong to the Community during the marriage, this also includes credit scores. A loan taken out during the marriage is a community debt unless it can be shown that the lender in determining whether to loan one spouse the money relied solely on the borrowing spouse’s separate property for repayment. The fact that a lender "relied" on one spouse’s good credit is not the determining factor because good credit of one spouse belongs to both spouses as community property. When Hal borrowed the additional $10k from the lender, the lender ,relied on Hals good credit - Hal's good credit belongs to the community and so therefore, the loan for the motorcycle was a community debt. If there were other facts that indicated that the lender relied on Hal's separate property interest - such as the condo - for repayment then the debt could belong to Hal alone, but based on the facts present that the lender relied on credit of Hal the debt was community debt.

Repayment of Loan w Joint Acct $

Wages and earning of a spouse are community property if earned during the marriage. Here Wanda and Hal were putting their earnings into a joint checking acct which was used to pay off the motorcycle loan. Because CP was used to pay off half of the motorcycle loan, the community owns a 1/2 interest in the motorcycle.

Conclusion as to the motorcycle: Hal owns the motorcycle as 50% SP because half of the purchase price can be traced to his SP inheritance, the community owns the other 50% interest because community property was used to obtain the loan and pay off the loan.

3. CAMPER VAN

When one spouse uses CP to buy a gift for the other spouse and puts title into that spouse's name alone, it is presumed to be a gift. While one spouse may not appropriate CP, one spouse may make a gift of interest in CP to the other spouse as SP. In this case, Hal will argue that Wanda taking him out for his 40th birthday and buying the camper van was her gifting her interest in the CP to Hal as his SP. On the other side, Wanda will argue that she did not intend to make a gift to Hal as SP, but instead intended to retain a CP interest in the van and that there was no valid transmutation from CP to Hal SP.

Gift Exception to Transmutation

There is an exception to the requirement that all transmutation be in writing. The exception is for gifts given to one spouse that are for that spouse's personal use and that are not substantial in value. Here Hal may argue that the van would also fall into the gift exception even if there was no writing that evidenced Wanda's intent to may a gift. Hal did use the camper van for fishing and summer trips with his friends. There is no mention of Wanda participating in these trips which would indicate that the van was for her personal use. However the gift must also not be substantial in nature and the van cost $20k; whether or not this is of substantial value would be considered in light of Hal and Wanda's station in life - their assets etc. While this may be an arguable issue, courts have typically found that cars are not items that are personal enough in nature to fall within the exception.

Conclusion as to the Van: If a court finds that by purchasing the van and titling it in Hal's name alone that Wanda intended a gift of her CP to Hal SP, then the van will be considered Hal's SP at divorce. Otherwise by tracing the funds to the CP checking account the van will be deemed cp.

4. A1 BANK

Wages earned by either spouse's time, labor, or skill during the marriage belong to the community. Here Wanda took her earnings during the marriage which are CP and deposited them into a secret acct w/o Hal's knowledge or name. Regardless of the fact that Hal's name is not on the account, Wanda's wages still belong to the community and, therefore all of the money in the account ($50k) is CP. A court may continue to have jurisdiction over the proceedings and assets until they are all disbursed. Just because in this case Hal did not discover the $50k until right before the final hearing will not affect his rights - and if Wanda purposely hid the money or failed to inform the court of its existence then she may be denied interest in the money to the extent that justice and fairness require.

Conclusion : The $50k in the A1 acct is CP subject to in kind division upon divorce.

Q2 Professional Responsibility / Evidence

Claire had been a customer of Home Inc., a home improvement company owned by Don. Dissatisfied with work done for her, she brought an action against Home Inc. and Don in California state court, alleging that they had defrauded her.

Don entered into a valid retainer agreement with Luke, engaging Luke to represent him alone and not Home Inc. in Claire's action. Luke then interviewed Don, who admitted he had defrauded Claire but added he had never defrauded anyone else, before or since. Luke subsequently interviewed Wendy, Don's sister. Wendy told Luke Don had admitted to her that he had defrauded Claire. Luke told Wendy that Don had admitted to him too that he had defrauded Claire. Luke drafted a memorandum recounting what Wendy told him and expressing his belief Wendy would be a good witness for Claire.

Shortly before trial, Don fired Luke. Don soon died unexpectedly.

Claire filed a claim against Don's estate and a claim against Home Inc., alleging as in her action that they had defrauded her. As the final act in closing Don's estate, the executor settled Claire's claim against the estate, but not against Home Inc.

At trial against Home Inc., which was now the sole defendant, Claire has attempted to compel Luke to testify about what Wendy told him, but he has refused, claiming the attorney-client privilege. She has also attempted to compel him to produce his memorandum, but he has again refused, claiming both the attorney-client privilege and the attorney work-product doctrine.

1. Should the court compel Luke to testify about what Wendy told him? Discuss. Answer according to California law.

2. Should the court compel Luke to produce his memorandum:

    a. To the extent it recounts what Wendy told him? Discuss. Answer according to California law.

    b. To the extent it expresses his belief that Wendy would be a good witness for Claire? Discuss. Answer according to California law.

3. What ethical violations, if any, has Luke committed? Discuss. Answer according to California and ABA authorities.

Answer A

1. Should the court compel Luke to testify about what Wendy told him?

Attorney-Client Privilege: Don and Luke

The attorney-client privilege protects confidential communications made to facilitate legal representation. It is narrower than the duty of confidentiality, which applies to any information related to the representation of a client, even if no attorney-client relationship is formed. The attorney-client privilege protects communications made by the client or the client's agent to the lawyer or the lawyer's agents. In the corporate context, the attorney-client privilege, in California, protects communications made by a spokesman for the corporation or by someone whose actions could be imputed to the corporations for purposes of liability.

The attorney-client privilege attaches and applies even if a lawyer is subsequently removed from a case. Thus, here, Don's decision to fire Luke did not prevent the privilege from applying to confidential communications made to facilitate legal representation. However, in California, the attorney-client privilege ends when the client dies and his estate is entirely disposed of. Consequently, here, the attorney-client relationship between Luke and Don ended when Don died and his estate settled Claire's claim against the estate. In California court, Luke would not be able to claim attorney-client privilege.

Moreover, the issue here is whether the attorney-client privilege covers communications between Wendy and Luke in the first place. As noted, in order for the privilege to apply, the communication must be confidential and it must be made for the purposes of facilitating a legal relationship. Additionally it must be communicated by either the client or the client's agents. Here, it does not appear that the communication was confidential or that Wendy was Don's agent. Wendy told Luke that Don had admitted to her that he had defrauded Claire. By sharing this information with a third party, Don arguably made it unprotected because it was no longer confidential. Consequently, the attorney-client privilege would not apply on that basis.

Second, it does not appear that Wendy was Don's agent. The attorney-client privilege will potentially protect communications made by a client to the lawyer's agent, such as a physician hired to examine the client, or by the client's agent, such as an employee speaking on behalf of the corporation. But it does not cover statements made by everyone who knows the client or is in a familial relationship with him or her. Here, Wendy does not appear to have been acting in any way as an agent of Don, nor is she an agent of Luke. Consequently, the attorney-client privilege between Luke and Don would not apply.

Attorney-Client Privilege: Wendy and Luke

Additionally, Wendy was not speaking with Luke for the purpose of facilitating his legal representation of her--she was not a client. Moreover, as noted above, it does not appear the communication was confidential. Consequently, there does not appear to be an argument for an independent attorney-client privilege between Wendy and Luke.

Given that Wendy's statement does not appear to have been protected by the attorney-client privilege based on Luke's representation of Don or any purported attorney-client relationship between Luke and Wendy, the court should likely compel Luke to testify about what Wendy told him.

2. Luke's Memorandum

Attorney-Client Privilege

As noted above, the attorney-client privilege does not seem applicable here, either based on Luke's representation of Don or any purported attorney-client relationship between Luke and Wendy. Consequently, the attorney-client privilege is not a basis for the court to refuse to compel production of the memorandum.

Work Product

In California, the work product privilege applies solely to materials prepared by the attorney in anticipation of litigation. This is unlike the federal rules, where the work product doctrine applies generally to materials prepared in anticipation of litigation. Materials prepared in anticipation of litigation that are comprised of the attorney's mental impressions, notes, or opinions, are absolutely protected and are not discoverable. Other materials prepared in anticipation of litigation received are qualified work product. These materials may be discoverable upon a showing of substantial need and inability to acquire the materials elsewhere.

a. Wendy's Statements

To the extent the memorandum recounts what Wendy told Luke, it is qualified work product. This portion of the memorandum would not constitute Luke's mental impressions or opinions regarding the interview. It is merely a factual recounting of the interview. Consequently, this portion of the memorandum would likely receive qualified protection. If Claire can show substantial needs and inability to acquire the information contained in the interview without compelled disclosure, then the court should compel Luke to produce his memorandum. However, this seems unlikely to apply here. The facts indicate Don died, but they do not state that Wendy died. Based on the facts, it appears that Claire could easily subpoena Wendy in order to ask her questions and try to establish the same information she is seeking from Luke. Without this showing of inability to get the information without compelled disclosure, it appears unlikely the court should compel Luke to turn over the memorandum.

b. Luke's Belief That Wendy Would be a Good Witness for Claire

To the extent the memorandum expresses Luke's belief that Wendy would be a good witness for Claire, it is absolutely privileged. This portion of the memorandum is made up of Luke's mental impressions and opinions. The court should absolutely not compel Luke to produce this portion of the memorandum. It is worth noting that the mere presence of an absolutely protected mental impression or opinion in a document does not make the entire document or the information contained therein absolutely privileged. If the court did determine there was substantial need and unavailability, and chose to compel Luke to produce the memorandum to the extent it recounts his interview with Wendy, then it could redact or eliminate the portions of the memorandum that are absolutely privileged.

3. What ethical violations, if any, has Luke committed?

Fee Agreement--Financial Duties

In California, fee agreements must be in writing unless the amount is less than $1,000, the work is for a corporation, the client agrees to forego a written agreement, the work is routine, or there is an emergency. Here, Don entered into a valid retainer agreement. Thus, there is an assumption that this requirement is satisfied. But if the retainer agreement was not in writing, it would likely be a violation of California ethical rules because none of the exceptions appear applicable. The ABA does not have a similar requirement for non-contingent fee agreements--they do not have to be in writing, although it is encouraged. Consequently, there is no ABA violation regardless of whether the fee agreement is in writing.

Luke's Decision to Tell Wendy about the Fraud--Duty of Confidentiality

The duty of confidentiality requires a lawyer not to disclose information learned in the course of representation. It attaches even when no attorney-client relationship is formed, unless there is a disclaimer in plain English, so long as the information is related to legal representation. It survives the representation and the client.

Here, Luke violated the duty of confidentiality by telling Wendy that Don had admitted to defrauding Claire. Luke learned of this information in the course of representing Don, thereby making the information confidential. Luke then failed to safeguard this information by actively revealing it to Wendy.

California and ABA authorities provide exceptions to the duty of confidentiality when a client makes a claim against a lawyer, when the information relates to the services provided by the attorney, when disclosure is required by the court, and when the lawyer learns information relating to imminent death or substantial bodily injury of a third-party. An attorney is also allowed to reveal information that is necessary to represent the client or that the client consents to him revealing. The ABA permits disclosure when a client is using the lawyer's services to perpetrate fraud or commit a crime that is likely to result in substantial financial loss. It also permits disclosure when seeking an ethical opinion on a matter. California does not have an exception for financial loss. Here, none of these exceptions seem applicable. It does not appear that Don consented to Luke telling Wendy that Don had defrauded Claire, nor does it appear that such an admission to Wendy was necessary for Luke's representation of Don. Luke may argue that there was implied consent because Wendy told him that Don had admitted the fraud to her, but it does not appear that Don ever instructed Luke to share this information prior to the interview. Under ABA authorities, Luke could argue that his disclosure was necessary to prevent financial loss, but this argument would not prevail because Don was not using Luke's services to defraud anyone and, since the fraud had already occurred, there was no imminent, substantial financial loss to any party. Moreover, this exception is inapplicable in California.

Consequently, Don likely breached his duty of confidentiality by telling Wendy about the fraud.

Luke Testifying at Trial--Duty of Fairness

Under ABA authorities, a witness may not represent a client if he is likely to have to testify at trial. A client generally may not testify at his client's trial unless his testimony relates to his services, a breach of his duties, or his testimony is necessary to prevent undue hardship. In California, an attorney may testify at a bench trial and may testify if his client consents at a jury trial. Here, Luke would not breach his duty by testifying in the suit against Home Inc. because it was not his client.

Duty of Competence

An attorney owes a duty of competence to his clients. He must have the necessary skill, thoroughness, and preparation required for competent representation. The duty requires the attorney to communicate with the client about important matters. Here, Don fired Luke shortly before trial. Although these facts do not themselves implicate the duty of competence, it suggests that Luke may not have been acting competently in his representation of Don, leading Don to fire him from the case. Moreover, the fact that Luke chose to reveal confidential information, apparently without consulting with Don, further suggests a violation of the duty of competence. California punishes intentional, repeated, or reckless violations of the duty of competence. Here, the facts do not suggest one way or another whether Luke intentionally, repeatedly, or recklessly violated his duty of competence. Thus, it is unclear whether he would be subject to any discipline even if he did act incompetently according to ABA authorities.

Duty of Loyalty

The duty of loyalty requires an attorney not to use non-public information against a client in a subsequent proceeding. According to ABA authorities, if there is a significant likelihood that an attorney will be materially limited in his representation of a client by professional or personal interest, the attorney can only take on the representation if: he reasonably believes he can provide representation unaffected by the conflict, he informs the client, and he receives consent. The informed consent must be memorialized in writing. In California, there is no reasonable belief requirement, both potential and actual conflicts require disclosure, and consent must be in writing unless it is based on an attorney's past representations or personal conflicts. Here, Luke took on the representation of Don, independent of Home Inc. If Luke had tried to represent both Home and Don, then he would have had a significant risk of material limitation and a potential conflict, which would have required informed written consent under the ABA and consent in writing in CA. Given that he did not appear to have any conflicts here, he is likely not in violation. However, if he testifies at Home Inc.'s trial, he may violate his continuing duty of loyalty if he reveals any non-public information he learned in the course of representing Don.

Duties on Withdrawal

When an attorney is fired, he must return all unspent retainer money as well as the client's papers and documents necessary for representation. California authorities specifically prohibit holding on to client documents for the purpose of getting paid. Here, so long as Luke returned Don's papers and any unspent retainer money, he likely did not commit a breach of his duties upon withdrawal from representation.

Answer B

1. LUKE'S TESTIMONY ABOUT WENDY'S STATEMENT

Protection by Attorney Client Privilege

At issue is whether Luke's interview of Wendy is protected by the attorney-client privilege.

In California, the attorney-client privilege attaches to a communication made in confidence between a client and his lawyer in the course of the representation. The client, the sole holder of the privilege, can bar the lawyer from testifying as to the content of the communication. However, the privilege does not survive the death of the client after the client's executor has finished distributing his estate. There are certain exceptions to the attorney-client privilege, including when the lawyer reasonably believes that disclosure would be necessary to avert serious bodily harm to others, and when the client is attempting to use the lawyer's services to perpetrate a crime or fraud.

Here, as part of his preparation for trial, Luke interviewed Don's sister, Wendy. Wendy told Luke that Don had admitted to her that he had defrauded Claire, but never anyone else. Nothing in the facts indicates that Wendy did not tell Luke this information in confidence. Her statement, however, was not a communication between a lawyer and client, but between a lawyer and a third party. It therefore falls outside the scope of the attorney-client privilege. Moreover, by the time Claire was attempting to compel Luke to testify at trial, Don had died. We also know that his executor had closed his estate, since the executor had settled Claire's claim against Don. Therefore, Don's ability to invoke the privilege died along with him, and there is no bar under the attorney client privilege to Luke's testimony. The court should compel Luke to testify.

2. LUKE'S MEMORANDUM

Attorney-Client Privilege with Regard to Wendy's Statement and Luke's Belief

At issue is whether Luke's description of Wendy's statement or Luke's belief about Wendy's suitability as a witness is protected by the attorney-client privilege.

As noted above, the attorney client privilege only attaches to confidential communications between lawyers and clients, and it does not survive the death of the client. Here, Luke wrote a memorandum after interviewing Wendy that contains two components: Wendy's statements, described above, that Don had admitted he had defrauded Claire; and Luke's belief that Wendy would make a good witness for Claire. Neither of these is a communication between Don, the client, and Luke, the lawyer. Moreover, because Don is deceased and his estate has been closed, no one survives to invoke the privilege. The attorney-client privilege does not provide a justification for Luke to refuse to produce the memorandum.

Work Product Doctrine with Regard to Wendy's Statement

At issue is whether Luke's memorandum, to the extent that it recounts Wendy's statement, is protected by the work product doctrine. California law privileges from discovery documents produced in anticipation of litigation. It also draws a distinction between a qualified privilege, which attaches to statements of fact recounted in work product, and an absolute privilege, which attaches to statements of belief or opinion by an attorney contained in work product. The qualified privilege may be overcome by a showing that there is a substantial need for the facts contained in the work product and that they are unavailable through other means, whereas the absolute privilege cannot be overcome. The work product doctrine survives the death of the client.

Here, Luke's memorandum contains Wendy's statement that Luke had defrauded Claire. Luke prepared this memorandum after Don retained him to defend him in the fraud action, causing him to interview Wendy. It was therefore made in anticipation of litigation, placing it within the scope of the work product doctrine. The description of what Wendy told Luke, however, is a factual one. It is therefore subject only to a qualified privilege, and Claire may be able to overcome it. Don's admission that he defrauded Luke would be damning evidence against Home Inc., the remaining defendant at trial. Claire can likely show that there is a substantial need for the testimony. However, it does not appear on these facts that Claire would not be able to obtain this testimony by other means. She could simply subpoena Wendy, or she could have noticed Wendy's deposition during discovery, to obtain Don's admission from Wendy herself. If Wendy is for some reason unavailable, then Claire may be able to compel production.

Therefore, the qualified privilege that attaches to Wendy's statement likely protects the memorandum from discovery.

Work Product Doctrine with Regard to Luke's Belief

At issue is whether Luke's belief about Wendy's suitability as a witness is protected by the work product doctrine. As noted above, this belief is expressed in a memorandum that Luke prepared in anticipation of litigation; indeed, there would be no other reason to speculate as to whether Wendy would make a good witness. Luke's belief, however, is absolutely protected by the work product doctrine, since it expresses a lawyer's beliefs and opinions about the proper strategy for trial. Therefore, regardless of what showing Claire makes at trial, it is protected, and the court should not compel production.

Overall Conclusion

Neither Wendy's statement nor Luke's belief is protected by the attorney-client privilege, but both are likely protected by the work product doctrine. The court should deny the motion to compel.

3. LUKE'S ETHICAL VIOLATIONS

Duty of Confidentiality

At issue is whether Luke breached his duty of confidentiality to Don.

Under the ABA and California rules, a lawyer owes his client a duty of confidentiality. This duty prohibits a lawyer from revealing to any third party information learned from or about the client in the course of the representation, unless an exception applies. It attaches as soon as a lawyer-client relationship begins. Here, Luke and Don entered into a lawyer client relationship when they executed a valid retainer agreement. Luke then interviewed Don and learned that Don had defrauded Claire-a fact learned about Don during the course of the representation. Luke then, in his conversation with Wendy, revealed this fact to Wendy. This was thus a disclosure of a client's confidential information, so unless an exception applies, Luke is subject to discipline under both the ABA and California rules.

Exceptions to the Duty of Confidentiality

i. Implied consent

A client may impliedly consent to a lawyer's use of his confidential information, when such disclosure would be a natural and necessary feature of the representation. Here, Luke could argue that Don impliedly consented for him to reveal this information to Wendy, since Wendy was Don's sister and Luke might need the information to build a rapport with her. However, especially since Luke only revealed the information after Wendy had told him what Don had told her, this exception does not apply.

ii. Averting physical harm

A lawyer may reveal a client's confidential information under the ABA and California rules if he reasonably believes that disclosure is necessary to avoid imminent bodily harm to a third person. In California, the harm must arise out of a criminal act, and the lawyer must first attempt to dissuade the client and inform him of the lawyer's intent to reveal. Here, Don admitted to past fraud, which seems to pose no risk of bodily harm-criminal or otherwise-to anyone. Therefore, this exception does not apply.

iii. Serious financial harm using the lawyer's services

The ABA, but not California authorities, allow disclosure if the lawyer believes it to be reasonably necessary to avoid serious financial harm to a third party, and the harm would be perpetrated using the lawyer's services. Here, Don admitted to fraud in the past, but said he had not defrauded anyone else since. Nor does he appear to have sought Luke's help in perpetrating any such fraud. Therefore, this exception does not apply.

iv. Fact has become generally known

Under both ABA and California rules, a lawyer may reveal a client's confidential information if that information is no longer confidential because it has become generally known. Here, Luke can argue that because Wendy already knew that Don had admitted to defrauding Claire, there was no breach of confidence by revealing what Don had told Luke. However, although this fact might have been known to Wendy, it was not generally known in the world. Therefore, this exception does not apply.

Conclusion

Luke is subject to discipline because he breached his duty of confidentiality and no exception applies.

Safeguarding the Client's Property

At issue is whether Luke violated any ethical rules by not returning the memorandum to Don when Don fired him.

A lawyer owes his client a duty to safeguard the client's property under both ABA and California law. This includes a duty to return to the client all materials related to the representation upon the end of representation. A lawyer may not retain a client's case file, including for the purposes of recovering his fee. Here, Don fired Luke before trial, but Luke appears to have kept possession of the memorandum recounting his meeting with Wendy until the time of trial. Therefore, by failing to return the memorandum to Don or his estate, Luke breached his duty to safeguard client property.

Q3 Remedies

Rick Retailer owns all pieces but the queen of a chess set carved by Anituck, a famous artist who carved 15 chess sets. No one today owns a complete Anituck chess set.

Six existing Anituck queens are owned by collectors. The last one was sold in 1983 for $175,000. The current owners have refused to sell their queens to anyone.

If Rick could exhibit a complete Anituck chess set, he would draw people worldwide who would buy memorabilia with pictures of the full chess set and other products. It is impossible to know exactly how much Rick would make, but a complete Anituck chess set could be worth in excess of $1 million.

Last week, Sam Seller brought to Rick an Anituck queen he found in his attic and asked if it was worth anything. Rick asked what Sam wanted for the queen. Sam asked whether $450 would be fair. Rick replied that $450 would be fair and offered to write a check immediately. Rick and Sam entered into a valid contract. Sam agreed to hand over the queen the next day.

The next day, Sam called Rick and said, “I learned that you defraud people out of expensive antiques all the time and that the queen is worth thousands of dollars. I am going to sell the queen to another collector.”

Rick has sued Sam for specific performance for breach of contract, and has sought a temporary restraining order and a preliminary injunction.

What is the likelihood that Rick will obtain:

1. A temporary restraining order? Discuss.

2. A preliminary injunction? Discuss.

3. Specific performance? Discuss.

Answer A

(1) TEMPORARY RESTRAINING ORDER

The issue is whether or not Rick will likely be successful in obtaining a temporary restraining order.

TEMPORARY RESTRAINING ORDER

A temporary restraining order (TRO) is an order granted in equity that preserves the status quo until a preliminary hearing on the matter can be heard. They are generally granted in emergency situations. For a TRO to be granted, the party seeking the TRO must show: (1) irreparable harm will occur in the absence of awarding the TRO; (2) balance of hardships favors granting the TRO; and (3) the party seeking the TRO is likely to prevail on the merits. While a TRO may be granted ex parte (without opposing counsel's presence), courts will generally requiring a strong showing of a good-faith effort to notify the opposing party or a strong showing of why notice could not be effectuated. TRO's are awarded for a short duration, typically 10-14 days, depending on the jurisdiction. Some courts also require a showing that damages are inadequate.

Here, Rick is seeking a temporary restraining order in order to prevent Sam from selling the Anituck queen to another collector. We do not know when Sam will find a collector or when the sale will be executed. Rick will likely be excused from providing notice of the TRO to Sam because Sam, agitated, may decide to expedite the sale to another collector. If the jurisdiction requires a showing that damages are inadequate, Rick will be successful because the chess piece is unique (there are only 15 chess sets made, 6 possessed by collectors who are refusing to sell). Moreover, as discussed further below, Rick's damages are speculative with respect to how much he would make if he had the complete chess set. Thus, the notice and inadequate damage elements are satisfied)

In all jurisdictions, in order to be successful, Rick must satisfy the elements:

(1) Irreparable Harm: irreparable harm may occur because it is possible that Sam will sell the queen to another collector before the preliminary hearings. If Sam sells the queen to another collector, Rick will suffer irreparable harm because there are only 15 pieces made in the entire world, 6 owned by collectors and all other current owners have refused to sell their queens. Thus, this factor leans in favor of a finding that Rick will suffer irreparable harm.

(2) Balance of Hardships: The balance of hardships must favor granting a TRO, which means that the party seeking the TRO will be substantially harmed if the TRO is not granted during the period before a hearing can be had. Rick will argue that the balance of hardships favors approving the TRO. If Sam does not go through with the sale, Rick will be prevented from obtaining another queen piece. Because Sam does not currently have an expiring offer from another collector, the court will likely find that the balance of hardships favors granting Rick a TRO until a full hearing on the merits can be had.

(3) Likely to Prevail on the Merits: While it is true that Rick will likely not be successful in being awarded specific performance (see below), the court does not analyze the parties defenses when granting a TRO. On its face, there appears to be a valid contract and Sam is repudiating on the contract: Rick offered to buy and Sam agreed to sell the chess piece for $450. Thus, it appears that Rick will likely prevail on his action for specific performance. At the later hearing, the court will consider defenses and other equitable remedies. Thus, the court will likely find that Rick will prevail on the merits.

CONCLUSION

Because the court does not consider defenses in granting a TRO, the court will likely grant Rick a TRO to restrain Sam from selling the piece until a hearing could be had on the matter. If Sam fails to comply with the courts order, he will be held in contempt.

(2) PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION

The issue is whether or not Rick will likely be successful in obtaining a preliminary injunction.

PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION

Similar to a TRO, a preliminary injunction is an injunction issued to preserve the status quo until a full hearing on the merits can be had granted by equity courts. In addition to the elements of the TRO (irreparable injury, balance of hardships, likelihood to prevail on the merits, and in some jurisdictions, inadequate legal remedies), in order for a preliminary injunction to be granted, the opposing party must have notice and an opportunity to be heard at the hearing and no defenses may apply. Additionally, the court may require the plaintiff (here, Rick) to post a bond in case Rick is ultimately not successful in his claim for specific performance.

(1) Irreparable Harm. See above.

(2) Balance of Hardships. See above.

(3) Likelihood of Prevailing on the Merits. See above.

(4) Inadequate legal remedy. See above.

(5) Notice. Rick must give notice to Sam and give Sam an opportunity to be heard at the hearing for the preliminary injunction. At that point, Sam will be able to raise all of his defenses (see below). If Rick fails to give Sam notice, then the court will deny Rick's preliminary injunction.

(6) Bond. The court may require Rick to post a bond to cover any losses to Sam in the event Rick ultimately loses the claim for specific performance. Courts are more relaxed on this requirement if the plaintiff is indigent. There are no facts with respect to Rick's current earnings, thus it is not possible to ascertain whether the court will excuse Rick from the bond requirement.

(7) No Defenses. In order for the court to grant a preliminary injunction, there must not be any viable defenses raised by the defendant. Here, Sam will likely be successful in defending against the grant of the permanent injunction by claiming unclean hands.

Unclean Hands: Unclean hands is an equitable defense. Under this defense, a plaintiff who acted unfairly with respect to the current action will be barred from recovery because they too have "unclean hands." Here, Sam will likely successfully argue that Rick materially misrepresented the value of the chess piece. The last chess piece to be sold was for $175,000 and Rick knew this. Thus, it would be inequitable for him to buy the piece for $450, knowing the true value of the piece, and representing to Sam that $450 is a fair price. Rick will argue that he did not know the true value of the goods. However, this argument will likely fail because Rick understood and appreciated the value of the full set ($1,000,000) and how much money he could make selling memorabilia pictures of the full chess set and other products. Because injunctions are granted in equity, it will be unfair to allow Rick to recover when he was not acting fairly. Thus, the court will likely find the defense of unclean hands applies.

Laches: Laches is another equitable remedy in which case the plaintiff's unreasonable delay in bringing a claim caused substantial prejudice to the defendant. Here, Rick is seeking the preliminary injunction immediately after learning that Sam is repudiating on the contract and thus the laches defense does not apply.

Misrepresentation. See below in damages section.

CONCLUSION

The court will likely not grant the preliminary injunction because Sam will likely successfully raise an unclean hands defense.

(3) SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE

In order for Rick to be entitled to specific performance, there must be a breach of contract.

GOVERNING LAW

The UCC governs contracts for the sales of goods, which are tangible, moveable things. Common law governs all other contracts, including service and real estate contracts. Here, because the queen set is a good (tangible, moveable thing), the governing law is the UCC.

ANTICIPATORY REPUDIATION

Under the UCC, if a party unequivocally expresses their intent to not perform their obligation under the contract, the party has anticipatorily repudiated, which entitles the other party to stop performance and sue immediately. Here, under the terms of their contract (which was valid, see below), Sam was obligated to sell Rick the chess piece for $450. Sam called Rick and told him that he was going to sell the queen to another collector. Because Sam only had one queen piece, this expression evidences Sam's refusal to perform.

Accordingly, Rick is entitled to stop performance and sue Sam for damages or for specific performance.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE

The issue is whether or not Rick will likely be successful in obtaining specific performance.

In contracts, specific performance is a remedy in which the court orders the defendant to perform his obligations under the contract. This is usually available only for unique goods and for real estate transactions. In order for the court to grant specific performance, the following elements must be met: (1) valid contract with clear and definite terms; (2) inadequate legal remedy; (3) feasibility of enforcement; (4) mutuality of performance; and (5) no defenses.

VALID CONTRACT

In order for the court to order specific performance, there must be a valid contract with definite and certain terms. To be valid, a contract must have assent (offer and acceptance) and be supported by consideration. Here, because the queen set is a good (tangible, moveable thing), the governing law is the UCC. Under UCC principles, there was a valid contract formed, at least on its face: there was an offer (offer to buy the chess piece by Rick); there was acceptance (Sam agreed to sell the chess piece), and there was consideration ($450 in exchange for the good).

Additionally, because the contract price was for $450, evidence of the oral agreement did not need to be in writing because the Statute of Frauds does not apply.

Moreover, the facts state that the contract was valid. Thus, this element is satisfied.

However, as discussed below, Sam will likely be successful in raising defenses to the contract formation, including misrepresentation and unilateral mistake.

INADEQUATE LEGAL REMEDY

Money damages must be inadequate in order for a court to grant specific performance. Here, Rick will likely be successful in satisfying this element because the queen set is unique -- there are only 15 sets made and the current owners are refusing to sell their queens to anyone. Moreover, money damages are speculative. Rick does not know how much he would make if he has the full chess set -- he believes that people all over the world would come to him to take memorabilia pictures and purchase other products. He also speculates that the value of the entire chess set would be about $1,000,000. However, these calculations are entirely speculative. Because the goods are unique, the UCC will allow specific performance.

FEASIBILITY

This element refers to whether or not a court can enforce the specific performance. This is usually not a problem in situations where the court is ordering the defendant not to do something (negative) because of the court's power of contempt. Ordering behavior may be more difficult if the defendant is in another jurisdiction and there are oversight issues. Here, that doesn't seem to be the case. The court can order Sam to perform his contract obligations (sell the queen to Rick for $450), and if he fails to do so, the court can hold him in contempt.

MUTUALITY OF PERFORMANCE

Mutuality of performance requires each party to the contract to be willing and able to perform their obligations. Here, this element will be satisfied because Rick has the $450 to pay for the chess piece, and Sam still has the chess piece in his possession.

DEFENSES

Both equitable and legal defenses are available because specific performance is an equitable remedy, but because it requires the existence of a valid contract, contract defenses also apply.

Misrepresentation. Misrepresentation is a defense in which case the party seeks to either rescind the contract or argue that the contract never existed because there was no meeting of the minds. Misrepresentation applies where a party (1) makes a misrepresentation; (2) about a material fact; (3) with the intent to induce reliance; and (4) the other party actually and justifiably relied. Here, Sam will likely be successful in invalidating the contract on this ground. Rick misrepresented the true and fair value of the chess piece, telling Sam that the offering price was fair. However, chess pieces are worth thousands of dollars. The material fact element is satisfied because the price is a fact of the basis of the bargain--the selling price. Rick intended to induce Sam's reliance into believing it was worth only $450 so that Sam would sell it to him for that price. Sam did enter into a contract on that basic assumption, and thus the elements are satisfied. Thus, Sam will likely be successful in defending this contract.

Unilateral Mistake. Unilateral mistake is generally not a defense to a contract. A mistake exists where the party is mistaken about a material fact that is a basic assumption of the contract. If the non-mistaken party knew or should have known that the other party was mistaken, the court will allow the contract to be rescinded. If the other party knew the other was mistaken, then the court will allow the contract be reformed to reflect the intention of the mistaken party. Here, Rick will argue that the court should not prejudice Rick just because Sam failed to do his research and learn the true value of the chess piece. This argument will likely fail because, as previously indicated, Rick knew, or at least should have known, of the true value of the chess piece and that Sam was mistaken. Here, Sam asked Rick if the asking price ($450) was fair... demonstrating his reliance on Rick's response. Thus he was mistaken.

Unclean Hands. See above.

Laches. Will not apply (see above).

CONCLUSION

The court will likely not grant Rick specific performance.

Answer B

1. Temporary Restraining Order ("TRO")

A TRO is a temporary injunction ordered by the court to maintain the status quo until a hearing for a preliminary injunction, and then ultimately a hearing and trial on the merits, can be heard. A TRO lasts no longer than necessary to have the hearing on the preliminary injunction and should not last longer than 14 days. In order to get a TRO, a plaintiff must show they will suffer irreparable harm in the amount of time it takes to wait for a preliminary injunction hearing and that they are likely to succeed on the merits of their case. Typically, the plaintiff must give defendant notice of the TRO and there should be a hearing, unless the plaintiff can show that he tried to notify defendant and failed, or notifying defendant may lead to the irreparable harm. In such case, a TRO hearing may be done ex parte. Here, there are no clear facts showing Rick attempting to notify Sam about a TRO hearing, but he may argue it would be counterproductive because Sam may sell the queen after being served notice of a hearing.

Irreparable Harm

Here, Rick is likely to suffer irreparable harm unless the court grants the TRO preventing Sam from selling the Queen. A TRO is necessary because Sam could likely sell the valuable queen in the amount of time it would take to wait for a preliminary hearing, and if he did so, Rick would be unable to retrieve the queen and unable to replace it because of how rare the Anituck queen piece is. The harm would be irreparable since there are only six existing Anituck queens and the last one was sold 20 plus years ago. Therefore, Rick can likely establish irreparable harm requirement for a TRO.

Likely to Succeed on the Merits

Rick must show/demonstrate a probability that he will be successful on the merits. Here, there was a contract to sell the queen piece between the parties, and the facts state there was a valid contract. Although Sam has many defenses, he can ultimately raise on the merits as to the validity of that contract, the showing of an agreement to enter the contract is likely sufficient to establish the likelihood of success for a TRO.

Balancing of Hardships and Placing of Bond

The court will also balance the hardships in determining whether to grant a TRO. The court will balance the hardship to the plaintiff (extent of the irreparable harm) without the TRO and the hardship to the defendant should the TRO be ordered. Here, the hardships clearly weigh in favor of Rick. Should the court deny the TRO, Sam may sell the queen. The last time a queen was for sale was 1983 and there may not be another opportunity to buy one for years. Moreover, the potential losses if this occurs are monumental, as the completion of the set with the queen could be worth millions to Rick. Meanwhile, the delay in selling the piece in the event that Rick loses on the merits is of very little effect on Sam. He will still possess the queen piece and be able to sell at just a high price. Therefore, the court should grant the TRO preventing Sam from selling the queen piece.

The court should, however, require Rick to post a bond to insure against any injuries that Sam may suffer in the amount of time it takes to have a preliminary hearing should Sam be wrong and lose on the merits.

2. Preliminary Injunction

The process and requirements for a preliminary injunction are almost identical to the requirements for a TRO. The preliminary injunction preserves the status quo for the time it takes to hear the case on its merits in trial. A preliminary hearing may never be done ex parte, and so defendant must be given notice of the hearing. Like a TRO a plaintiff must show irreparable harm and likelihood of success on the merits. Here, for the reasons stated above, the court should grant Rick's request for a preliminary injunction preventing Sam from selling the rare Anituck queen until after a trial on the merits. Again, the court may require Rick to post a bond to cover any potential injuries Sam may suffer from a result of having to wait to sell until after the trial should Rick lose.

3. Specific Performance

Governing Law

The UCC governs all contracts for the sale of goods. Here, the contract is for the sale of a queen piece of a chess set, which is a movable, tangible thing, and therefore goods. Therefore, the UCC governs.

Specific Performance

Specific performance is an equitable remedy in which the court compels a party to a contract to perform his duties under the contract as he promised. A court will grant specific performance when (i) there is a valid, enforceable contract with certain and definite terms (ii) the plaintiff has already performed or is ready, willing and able to perform his duties under the contract, (iii) legal remedies are inadequate, (iv) enforcement of the contract by the court is feasible (v) and the defendant has no defenses to the contract.

(i) Valid, Enforceable Contract with Certain and Definite Terms

A court will not enforce a contract unless there is a valid contract and certain and definite terms so the court knows what to enforce. Here, the facts state Rick and Sam entered a valid contract. Moreover, the terms are certain and definite, the sale of the queen in exchange for $450. Although it is not clear if there was a writing, the statute of frauds does not apply here because the contract is for the sale of goods for less than $500 since the price was set at $450.

(ii) Plaintiff is Ready to Perform

To receive specific performance, the plaintiff seeking performance must have been ready to perform himself. Here, Rick offered to write Sam a check immediately, thus indicating he was willing to perform his side of the contract.

(iii) Inadequate Legal Remedies

In order to receive specific performance, the plaintiff must show that legal remedies, typically damages, are inadequate. In the case of contracts for property, legal remedies may be inadequate if the property is rare or unique. Here, the chess piece is nearly a one of a kind. There are only six in the world and rarely do they become available for sale. Therefore, damages are inadequate because Rick could not use money to cover by going out and buying the queen somewhere else. Therefore, legal remedies are inadequate.

(iv) Enforcement is Feasible

A court will only grant specific performance if enforcement of the contract is feasible. The court enforces orders of specific performance through its contempt power, so the court must have jurisdiction over either the property or the person. Here, so long as Sam and Rick are before the court, there should be no issues of feasibility of enforcement. If Rick wins, the court will simply order Sam to perform under the contract and sell the queen piece to Rick or else be held in contempt of court, subjecting himself to civil and potentially criminal penalties. Therefore, the specific performance is feasibly enforced by the court.

(v) Defenses

The court will not grant specific performance if the defendant has a viable defense. Since specific performance is an equitable remedy, equitable defenses are available to the defendant. Here, Sam has multiple defenses he may raise against Sam to prevent specific performance.

Misrepresentation

A misrepresentation occurs when one party makes a false statement intended or reasonably known to induce action by the other party and the other party justifiably relies on that statement to his detriment. Here, Sam asked Rick if $450 was a fair price. Sam replied to Rick that $450 would be a fair price, even though he knew this was false. He also knew that Sam was likely to rely on this false statement because he had asked Rick if it was a fair price and clearly did not know for himself. Also, Rick clearly intended his response that it was fair to induce Sam to sell at that price. Sam may not have been justified in depending on Rick without seeking his own valuation, especially considering what Sam later learned about Rick's practice of swindling people. However, the court would likely find that Sam did in fact rely on the false statement by Rick, and that this misrepresentation would prevent a granting of specific performance.

Unilateral Mistake

A contract may be voidable by a mistaken party if the mistake was concerning a material fact of the bargain, the mistake had material effect on the bargained for exchange, the unmistaken party knew or should have known of the mistaken party's mistake, and the mistaken party did not assume the risk of the mistake. Here, Sam was mistaken as to the value of the queen piece. He asked for $450 when the queen was in reality worth thousands of dollars. This is a material fact and has a material effect on the bargained for exchange since it impacts how much Sam would have asked for the queen and agreed to sell it for had he known its true value. Moreover, Rick had reason to know of Sam's mistake because he knew the piece was worth thousands of dollars as a collector of chess pieces and someone looking for the queen. When Sam suggested $450, Rick would have known he was mistaken as to its value. Finally, the risk is likely not one Sam assumed. Typically both parties assume the risk of a bad deal and over or under valuing the property. However, here Sam specifically asked Rick if $450 was a fair price and Sam had reason to know that Sam was relying on Rick's evaluation. As such he was not assuming the risk of being wrong. Therefore, the court may void the contract due to Sam's unilateral mistake.

Unclean Hands

Unclean hands is an equitable defense that prevents the court from granting equitable remedies when the one seeking performance has exercised some misconduct in the transaction at issue in the case. Here, Sam lied to Rick about the fairness of the price. As such he likely did not come to court with clean hands and will not be granted remedy in a court of equity.

UCC Good Faith and Fair Dealing

The UCC implies a duty of good faith and fair dealing in all contracts for sale of goods. Here, Rick breached this duty by lying to Rick. Therefore, it would not be enforced under the UCC.

Q4 Civil Procedure

Buyer, who was living in New York, and Seller, who was living in California, entered into a valid contract, agreeing to buy and sell a painting claimed to be an original Rothko, supposedly worth $1 million, for that amount. In a separate valid contract, Buyer agreed to buy from Seller a parcel of California real property worth $5 million, for that amount. Buyer and Seller completed the purchase of the painting on June 1; they were to complete the purchase of the real property on June 30.

On June 15, Buyer resold the painting, but obtained only $200, because the painting turned out to be a fake. Buyer promptly notified Seller of his intent to sue Seller for damages of $1 million. Seller then informed Buyer that Seller would not go through with the purchase of the real property.

Buyer filed suit against Seller in federal court in California. Buyer claimed fraud as to the painting, alleging only that Seller committed "fraud in the supposed value," and sought $1 million in damages. Buyer also claimed breach of contract as to the real property, and sought specific performance. Buyer demanded trial by jury on all issues.

1. May Buyer join claims for fraud and breach of contract in the same suit against Seller? Discuss.

2. Is Buyer's allegation sufficient to state a claim for fraud involving the painting? Discuss.

3. Does the federal court have subject matter jurisdiction over the suit? Discuss.

4. May the federal court apply California law to decide the breach of contract claim involving the real property? Discuss.

5. On what issues, if any, would Buyer be entitled to a jury trial? Discuss.

Answer A

1. JOINDER OF CLAIMS

Joinder of Claims

Generally, a plaintiff may bring any number of claims against the same defendant, even if they are unrelated or do not have a common nucleus of operative fact, in the same action. If the claims are brought in federal court, at least one of the claims must satisfy the requirements of subject matter jurisdiction.

Here, both the fraud claim with respect to the Rothko painting and the breach-of-contract claim with respect to the real property are being brought by the same plaintiff, Buyer (B), against the same defendant, Seller (S). Therefore, the two claims may be joined, and they may be brought in federal court if one of them satisfies subject matter jurisdiction. (The issue of subject matter is discussed below, in Part 3.)

Abstention

If a state law claim is joined to another claim, the federal court asked to hear those claims may abstain from hearing the state law claim, sever it, and remand it to a state court if the interest of the state in resolving the questions of law that are at issue are particularly high. There is a high threshold for abstention, such as in Pullman abstention, where a federal court will decline to address a constitutional question whose adjudication depends on the resolution of an unresolved issue of state law.

Here, the two claims, both based on state law, are for fraud and breach of contract. These are fairly common and ordinary common law (or possibly statutory) causes of action. Neither New York nor California would have a particularly strong interest in divesting the federal court of the case, since the law is mostly, if not entirely in this case, resolved. Therefore, joinder will survive any abstention challenge, and neither claim will be subject to severance and remand.

Conclusion

The claims may be joined in the same suit.

2. SUFFICIENCY OF PLEADING

Well-Pleaded Complaint

To survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted, the pleading in a complaint must allege enough facts to give the defendant notice of the cause of action and the facts on which the claim is based. Under Twombly and Iqbal, a federal court must apply a two-part test to determine whether a complaint is sufficiently well-pleaded. First, the court strikes all conclusory legal allegations. Second, taking all remaining factual allegations as true, the court determines whether the facts as alleged would make it plausible for the plaintiff to succeed in obtaining the relief that is sought.

Here, B's complaint with respect to the Rothko painting alleged only that S committed "fraud in the supposed value." This pleading most likely fails the Twombly-Iqbal test. With respect to the first step, the pleading is essentially entirely a conclusory legal allegation. The complaint states only that fraud relating to the value of the painting occurred. Strictly construing Twombly-Iqbal, the entire allegation must be stricken when applying the first step of the test. The second step may be applicable if the test were loosely construed, and the court took the phrase "supposed value" to mean that fraud can be proved based on the fact that the painting's value as stated by S was false. But falsity alone does not give rise to an action for fraud. Fraud requires intentional, knowing, or reckless conduct with respect to a falsity. Thus, the pleading must allege, in addition to the existence of a falsity, some indication of fault on S's part. Because it fails to do so, it is not well-pleaded.

Fraud Pleadings

For claims of fraud, the Federal Rules require fact-pleading, rather than the notice-pleading permitted by Conley, and, to a lesser extent, Twombly and Iqbal. The plaintiff must allege specific facts that made the defendant's conduct fraudulent.

B's cause of action with respect to the painting is one of fraud, meaning that the fact-pleading standard applies. As discussed above, B did not allege specific facts that demonstrate fraud. To meet the required level of specificity, B should have at least alleged that 1) S represented to B that the painting was a genuine Rothko, 2) that the painting was not a genuine Rothko, 3) that S had requisite mental state required for fraud, and 4) that the painting was not worth the value that S placed on it, and which B paid. Because the pleading did not allege any of these things, even if B can successfully defend his complaint from a notice/plausibility-pleading challenge, the complaint will not survive a fact-pleading challenge.

Conclusion

B's allegation is not sufficient to state a claim for fraud.

3. SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION

Federal Question Jurisdiction

Federal courts are courts of limited subject matter jurisdiction. Subject matter jurisdiction can be conferred on a federal court either through federal question jurisdiction or diversity jurisdiction. Federal question jurisdiction exists where the cause of action, as stated in the complaint, arise under a federal law or federal issue.

Here, B's claims are for fraud and breach of contract. Neither of these are federal claims, so the court does not have federal question jurisdiction.

Diversity Jurisdiction

Generally, diversity can confer subject matter jurisdiction on a federal court if 1) all plaintiffs are completely diverse from all defendants and 2) the amount-in-controversy exceeds $75,000.

Complete Diversity

Complete diversity is measured at the time a lawsuit is filed, and exists if no plaintiff is a citizen of a state of which any defendant is a citizen. For individuals, the state of citizenship for diversity purposes is the state of domicile, i.e. the state wherein the individual resides and has expressed or demonstrated an intent to reside permanently.

Here, B lives in New York. Although he sought to purchase real property in California, it is unclear whether he intends to leave New York. At any rate, as of the time the suit was filed, B was domiciled in New York because he was residing there at the time and expressed no intent to leave. Meanwhile, S is domiciled in California because he lives there and no facts suggest that he is domiciled in any other state. Thus, B is a citizen of New York, and S is a citizen of California. Complete diversity exists between all plaintiffs (B) and all defendants (S).

Amount-in-Controversy

The amount-in-controversy must exceed $75,000 in order for diversity jurisdiction to exist. This requirement is satisfied based on a good-faith pleading that the plaintiff is entitled to at least $75,000 in damages. In addition, where the relief sought is an injunction or specific performance, the amount-in-controversy may be satisfied if the court finds that the economic value of the requested relief exceeds $75,000.

Here, both of B's claims against S satisfy the amount-in-controversy. The claim of fraud alleges damages of $1,000,000. The allegation is in good faith because the painting that B bought was supposedly worth $1,000,000, and B paid that much for it, to his loss of $999,800. Meanwhile, although specific performances rather than a specific monetary amount is sought as a remedy in the breach-of-contract case, the property to be awarded to B if the claim is successful is worth $5,000,000. Because both causes of action request relief that is worth well over $75,000, the requirement is satisfied.

Aggregation of Claims

A plaintiff may aggregate multiple claims against the same defendant in order to satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement.

Had either or both of his claims been worth less than $75,000, B could have aggregated them in order to plead a total amount-in-controversy in excess of $75,000. Of course, since both claims independently satisfy the requirement, this rule does not control.

Supplemental Jurisdiction

A court may exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a claim if it arises out of the same transaction or occurrence as a claim, between the same plaintiff and defendant, over which the court already has subject matter jurisdiction.

If one or the other of the two claims B is bringing against S failed to meet the requirements of diversity jurisdiction, B could still argue that the two claims arose out of the same transaction or occurrence. Although S would respond that the contracts for the painting and the real property were completely separate and occurred nearly a month apart, B might counter that the breach of the contract for the sale of real property was causally connected to B's discovery of the allegedly fraudulent sale of the painting.

Indeed, S only informed B that S would not go through with the sale of the property after B notified S of his intent to sue S for $1,000,000. Both arguments are persuasive, so it is not clear what the result would be if the court were forced to decide the issue of supplemental jurisdiction. However, as analyzed above, the court need not decide this issue because each claim separately falls within the court's diversity jurisdiction.

Conclusion

The court has subject matter jurisdiction.

4. CHOICE-OF-LAW

Erie Doctrine

Generally, in diversity cases, the federal court applies state substantive law, based on the law of the state in which the court sits, and federal procedural law. First, the court must ask whether there is a conflict between state and federal law. If so, then the court must ask whether there is a federal statute or Federal Rule that addresses the issue. If such a federal statute exists, the court must apply it. If a Federal Rule addresses the issue, the court must ask whether the Rule expands, abridges, or modifies a substantive right. If so, then the court may only apply the Rule if its effect on the right is incidental. If there is no federal statute or Rule on point, the court must ask whether the failure to apply state law would change the outcome in the case. If so, then the court must apply the state law. Finally, if the inquiry reaches past this point, the court must consider the relative interests of the state and federal judiciaries in adjudicating the issue, as well as the need to dis-incentivize forum shopping.

That said, here the Erie analysis is simple. There is no conflict between state and federal law with respect to the breach-of-contract claim, because there is no federal law of contract. Moreover, the law of contract is inherently substantive. Therefore, because the court sits in California, Erie dictates that it should apply California substantive law to resolve the claim.

Law of the Situs

The default choice-of-law for determining disputes over real property is to apply the choice-of-law (or the substantive law, if the choice-of-law is silent) of the state in which the property is located.

Based on this default rule, the federal court should apply California law to decide the breach-of-contract claim because the real property at issue is located in California.

Conclusion

The federal court may, and probably should, apply California law to decide the breach-of-contract claim.

5. JURY TRIAL

Right to Jury Trial

In federal cases, a plaintiff is entitled to a jury trial, per the Seventh Amendment of the Constitution, in any action at law. However, there is no entitlement to a jury trial in an equity action. Whether a case is one of law or equity is a purely federal question, and must be decided by the court according to federal law.

Here, the action for fraud is an action at law. The remedy sought is monetary damages amounting to $1,000,000. Therefore, B is entitled to a jury trial on that claim. Meanwhile, the action for breach-of-contract is an action in equity, because the remedy sought is the equitable remedy of specific performance. If B amended the complaint such that, in the alternative to seeking specific performance, it requested money damages, then the action would be at least in part at law and therefore subject to his right to a jury trial.

Conclusion

As pleaded, B is entitled to a jury trial on the fraud claim but is not entitled to one on the breach-of-contract claim.

Answer B

Joinder of Buyer's Claims Against Seller

Joinder of claims in federal court is governed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, regardless of whether or not the original claim was filed under diversity. This is because the FRCP are affirmative federal law under the Supreme Court's decision in Hanna, and they act to pre-empt any contravening state law, even if that state law is purely procedural and otherwise would govern under the Erie Doctrine.

Under the Federal Rules, a plaintiff may join any and all claims that he has against the defendant, regardless of whether or not they arise out of the same transaction or occurrence, a common nucleus of operative fact, or any other shared basis in law or fact. The plaintiff, in other words, is the master of his complaint. Here, the plaintiff has joined claims against this specific defendant. Regardless of whether or not they arise out of the same CNOOF they nevertheless satisfy the requirement for joinder of claims.

Sufficiency of Buyer's Allegation to State a Claim

Under Federal Rule 12(b)(6), which controls in a state law diversity action properly brought in federal court, the Supreme Court has held that a plaintiff must allege specific facts that operate to push the allegations over the line from speculative to plausible. This comes from the Twombly and Iqbal line of cases. This does not move the requirements for pleading from the traditional notice pleading requirement that only requires the plaintiff to provide a short and plain statement of the allegation to fact pleading requiring a detailed list of all facts in the case that make the claim likely to survive, which is what is required under California. Again, what is required to survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted is that the complaint does not allege sufficient facts to make the allegation of fraud plausible.

Fraud Requirements

In determining whether or not sufficient allegations exist to find that there was fraud in a contract, a federal court sitting in diversity in California will apply California law. In California, the common law of contracts applies. Fraud in contract requires that the plaintiff 1) knowingly 2) misrepresent 3) a material term in the contract.

12(b)(6) Analysis

Here, the facts demonstrate that the painting was claimed to be an original Rothko, supposedly worth $1 million, which the Buyer bought for $1 million. However, the Seller will argue in his 12(b)(6) motion that the complaint does not state factual allegations that tend to show that the plaintiff knew that the Rothko painting was a fake, nor even that if he did represent the Rothko as an original, that he had any reason to suspect it was false. Unless the Buyer is able to amend his complaint, which he is eligible to do once as of right within 21 days of the service of a motion to dismiss (or, under California law, before an answer is served) to allege facts with sufficient specificity that a reasonable finder of fact could conclude that the allegations were plausible, then the Buyer's allegation is likely not sufficient to state a claim for fraud involving the painting.

Subject Matter Jurisdiction

Federal courts are courts of limited subject matter jurisdiction. Unlike California state courts, which may hear any claims that are brought before it subject to other limits (including personal jurisdiction), there must be an affirmative grant of federal subject matter jurisdiction that allows for each claim to be properly heard.

Federal Question Jurisdiction

Federal courts have jurisdiction over any claim that arises under the Constitution, statutes, or treaties of the United States. Furthermore, they also have federal question jurisdiction where either there is an important federal interest at stake that effectively supersedes state law (such as in the foreign relations domain) through the application of the modern federal common law, as well as in state law questions that require the interpretation of federal law under the Merrell Dow and Grable doctrine.

In this case, the court is adjudicating claims of fraud and breach of an obligation to purchase real property. These are not federal questions; they do not arise under federal positive law, federal common law, nor do they contain substantial federal questions that must be answered in order to resolve state law claims. Therefore, there is no federal question jurisdiction over either claim.

Diversity Jurisdiction

In order for there to be diversity jurisdiction over a state law claim, the claim must both satisfy the diversity requirements and the amount-in-controversy requirement. Multiple claims can be aggregated in order to satisfy the amount in controversy requirement. I first consider diversity; then move on to the amount-in-controversy for each claim.

Diversity

Under a standard state law claim brought in diversity jurisdiction, there must be complete (so-called "Strawbridge") diversity between all plaintiffs and defendants. Each plaintiff must be a citizen of a separate state from each defendant. Citizenship for individuals, which is the fact pattern in question here, is determined by domicile, which is where a person resides with intent to remain. The facts state that Buyer lives in in New York, and Seller lives in California. There are no other parties to the suit. Assuming that both Buyer and Seller intend to remain in their states indefinitely and are therefore citizens of separate states, the requirement of complete diversity is satisfied.

Amount-in-Controversy

In order for diversity jurisdiction to exist over state law claims, the total amount in controversy must exceed $75,000. A plaintiff may aggregate all the claims that they have, even unrelated claims, to satisfy the amount in controversy requirement against the defendant. The amount-in-controversy claimed must have been arrived at in good faith, though it does not need to be precise.

Here, the amount in controversy substantially exceeds $75,000. The Buyer, in his fraud action, is alleging in good faith that he expected to receive a painting valued at $1 million dollars but instead received a painting valued at only $200 due to the defendant's fraud. That is a difference of $999,800, well over $75,000, and that would be the plaintiff's recovery in expectation damages. And the real estate property in question is valued at $5 million, alleged in good faith, and given that the title to that property is in dispute, the amount in controversy requirement there is also satisfied. Therefore, independently and together, the plaintiff has properly alleged an amount in controversy in excess of the federal requirement for diversity jurisdiction.

Therefore, the federal court has subject matter jurisdiction over these claims through diversity.

Supplemental Jurisdiction

Supplemental jurisdiction allows a state law claim that does not otherwise have jurisdiction to be attached to a federal claim that has subject matter jurisdiction. This is so-called pendent party or ancillary jurisdiction. Here, both state law claims together and independently meet the requirements for diversity jurisdiction, so supplemental jurisdiction does not apply.

Application of California Law to Decide Breach of Contract Claim

Erie

Under the Erie doctrine, there is no general or federal common law. A court sitting in diversity instead applies the substantive law of the state in which it sits, including choice-of-law law, in order to decide questions of law. A federal court sitting in California should apply California law to decide what law to apply.

California Choice of Law

The federal law should therefore apply California choice-of-law law to decide what substantive law to apply. California choice-of-law law for real property in state court requires that a California court use the law of the jurisdiction in which the property is located (as opposed to a contract, where the court will determine whether or not the contract itself has a choice-of-law provision - if that choice-of-law provision is not contrary to public policy, it will apply it. If the choice-of-law provision is contrary to public policy or there is no choice-of-law provision, the California court will apply a governmental interest analysis to determine what law to apply. That analysis essentially queries the relative interests of the governments in question in order to decide what law to apply.)

Real Property

Here, because the situs of the property in question is located in California, a California court would apply its choice-of-law law to use California substantive law to adjudicate the claim as to the real property contract, unless there is a choice-of-law provision in the land sale contract that requires the application of the law of a different state. However, this fact pattern does not suggest any such choice-of-law provision, and so I do not assess this any further.

Contract

In the event, that the choice-of-law question is adjudicated according to contract principles, a federal court applying California choice-of-law law should proceed to balance the interest of the governments in having their law apply. The two states whose laws are implicated here are California and New York. California has an interest in protecting its citizens from claims of fraudulent sales; New York has an interest in protecting its citizens from fraudulent sales. These are relatively equal interests. However, the Buyer filed in California, which may indicate his willingness to have California law applied; the painting was also with the seller in California at the time the alleged contract was signed and fraud committed. These weigh in favor of imposing California law.

Therefore, in either case, the federal court, properly applying California choice-of-law law, may apply California law to decide the claim.

Issues in Which Buyer is Entitled to Jury Trial

Traditionally, under the Erie Doctrine, procedural questions are decided under federal law and substantive questions are decided under state law (unless the procedural dispute is outcome-determinative between filing in a state or federal court, in which case the state procedural law trumps federal law). However, questions of jury procedure are Constitutional in basis and therefore federal law always trumps state jury procedural law.

The Seventh Amendment to the Constitution guarantees a jury trial upon timely demand to litigants in questions of law. There is no right to a jury trial for questions of equity. While under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, actions are no longer brought exclusively in law or equity - there is instead only the "civil action" - the application of the right to a jury trial is determined by whether or not the cause of action contained in the complaint would have qualified for a jury trial in 1789.

Fraud and Damages: Remedy at Law

Damages are a remedy at law. Therefore, the Buyer is entitled, upon timely demand, to a jury trial on the issue of damages (provided that the claim survives the various hurdles earlier laid out).

Real Property and Specific Performance: Remedy at Equity

Specific performance is a version of an injunction, which is a remedy at equity. A litigant is not entitled to a jury trial on an issue of equity; it may instead be decided by a bench trial.

Mixed Issues of Law and Equity

When a complaint alleges both legal and equitable remedies and demands a jury trial, the court should separate the questions and hold a jury trial on the legal question first. It can then move to a bench trial on the equitable question.

Therefore, in this case, Buyer is entitled to a jury trial on the question of his damages in fraud. That should be held first; the court can then move to his demand for specific performance on the real estate contract.

Q5 Torts

Concerned about the dangers of texting while driving, the Legislature recently enacted the following section of the Motor Vehicle Code:

> No person shall operate a motor vehicle upon a public road while using a mobile telephone to send or receive a text message while such vehicle is in motion.

Doug was driving down a busy street while texting on his cell phone. Doug lost control of his car, slipped off the road, and hit Electric Company's utility pole. The pole crashed to the ground, and the fallen wires sent sparks flying everywhere. One spark landed on a piece of newspaper, setting the paper on fire. The burning paper blew down the street, landing on the roof of Harry's house. The house caught fire and burned down.

A technological advance, the Wire Blitz Fuse (WBF), had made it possible to string electrical wires that would not spark if downed. Nevertheless, Electric Company had retained an old wiring system that it and other utility companies had used for years. Electric Company believed that adoption of the WBF system would require a significant increase in electrical rates, and that the WBF system had yet to gain widespread acceptance in the industry. Studies showed that utility companies that replaced their old wiring systems with a WBF system experience vastly increased safety and reliability.

Harry has sued both Doug and Electric Company.

1. What claims may Harry reasonably raise against Doug, what defenses may Doug reasonably assert, and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

2. What claims may Harry reasonably raise against Electric Company, what defenses may Electric Company reasonably assert, and what is the likely outcome? Discuss.

3. If Harry prevails against Doug and Electric Company, how should damages be apportioned? Discuss.

Answer A

H v. D

Harry (H) can bring a negligence claim against Doug (D)

Negligence

A negligence claim consists of duty, breach, causation, and damages. All elements must be present for a plaintiff to recover.

Duty

A person does not generally owe a duty to act. However, if a person acts, they owe a duty to act as prudently as the reasonable man would and is liable for harms that come to foreseeable plaintiffs for the failure to act with reasonable care. In the majority Cardozo view, a foreseeable plaintiff is anyone who is in the zone of danger. Under the minority, Andrews view, a foreseeable plaintiff is anyone who is harmed if the defendant could have foreseen harming anyone, even if the person harmed was not the type of plaintiff the defendant foresaw harming.

Standard of Care

Generally, people owe a duty to act with the care a reasonably prudent man would take. There are different standards for landlords or other special relationships.

In this case, D was driving. A reasonably prudent man would have foreseen that bystanders or property could be harmed by inattention to driving. H can argue that D could foresee that texting while driving could have caused him to crash into a person's property. It was foreseeable that he would have run into H's mailbox. Therefore, it was foreseeable that H was in the zone of danger. The fact that D did not in fact run into H's mailbox but instead hit the utility pole which caused a fire is not too remote. D could have crashed into the utility pole that snapped and fell directly into H's house, rather than sparked and caught fire. H will argue that under Cardozo he was a foreseeable plaintiff in the zone of danger because a driver should have foreseen that distraction would cause him to crash into a person's property. D will argue that this is too attenuated. While H may have been in the zone of danger for his mailbox being smashed, H was not a foreseeable plaintiff for having his house burned down. The key question, however, is not whether D could foresee the type or extent of harm, but rather could D foresee H as a plaintiff. As long as H's house was on the road, H was a foreseeable plaintiff in the zone of danger.

D will argue H was not foreseeable because the burning paper "blew down the street," implying that the crash occurred far from where he texted. However, H was in the zone of danger because he was on the street where D was driving and texting. It will be a close call, and many courts will not find H was a foreseeable plaintiff in the zone of danger under the Cardozo view. Under the Andrews view, H will certainly be a plaintiff D owes a duty of care to, because D could have foreseen his texting while driving would injure someone.

Breach

Assuming D owes H a duty of care, there must be a breach. A driver owes a duty to others to drive responsibly and not be distracted. A reasonably prudent man would not text and drive. Therefore, H will successfully argue that D breached his duty of care.

Negligence Per Se

H can also argue D breached his duty of care under a negligence per se theory. Under negligence per se, a defendant has breached his duty if he violated a 1) statute addressed at the behavior 2) the statute was designed to protect against a specific type of harm 3) the statute protected a specific class of people, and the plaintiff harmed is in that class of people in a way the statute was designed to protect against. Defendants can argue that in the situation it was more reasonable to not follow the statute, because the statute was vague and overbroad, or it would have been more dangerous to follow the statute than to violate it.

In this case, none of the defenses apply. D violated a statute that addressed his behavior. It said that no one should operate a motor vehicle upon a public road while using a mobile telephone and to send or receive a text message while the vehicle is in motion. D was driving the car. He was texting on his cell phone while driving down the street. Because he texted while he was driving, he lost control of his car and hit the utility pole. D will argue that the danger the legislature was trying to avoid was running over people. H will argue that it was to protect against people being run over and against property damage. D will rebut that even if it protected against property damage, the plaintiff it sought to protect would be the owner of the property. It is too much of a stretch to say the legislature intended to pass the statute to establish that a person who crashed while texting is responsible for a burning house down the street. It is simply too attenuated from the likely purpose of the legislature. Therefore, his negligence per se claim will not be successful.

Causation

For a negligence claim to succeed, there must be both actual (but-for) and legal (proximate) causation.

But for (actual)

But for causation means that but for the defendant's action, the plaintiff would not have been harmed. In this case, but for D crashing into the pole, the pole would not have crashed to the ground. But for the pole crashing into the ground, the wires would not have sent sparks up, and the burning paper would not have landed on the roof of H's house. There is but for causation.

Proximate (legal)

The breach must also be the proximate cause of damage. Proximate cause are foreseeable causes. There can be intervening events between D's breach and H's harm as long as D's breach was still a substantial factor in causing D's harm. However, superseding events breach the chain of causation. Superseding events are unforeseeable events such as a criminal act or act of god.

In this case, H will argue that it was foreseeable that Doug texting while driving could result in his house being damaged. As stated above, he will argue it is foreseeable that a distracted driver will drive into another person's property. Even though H's property was damaged in a different way, D could have still foreseen that his actions would lead to this result. However, D will argue that the burning paper is an unforeseeable event, more similar to an act of God. The odds that he would hit the pole just right, the wires would spark, and the wind would take the burning paper down the street onto H's roof is unforeseeable. This is a close case, and different courts might come out differently on it. Under the Andrew's perspective, there would be proximate cause. However, under the Cardozo perspective, this would be similar to the explosion in the train station -- the harm is too attenuated from the breach.

Damages

The damages must have been caused by D's breach. If there was causation, then the court will find there are damages. H was damaged by D's breach of care. His house burned down because of D's action.

Defenses

Contributory Negligence

D can argue that H was contributorily negligent. Good roofs will not catch fire if a sheet of burning paper lands on top of it. Roofs are treated to ensure fire cannot spread. If H's house can be burned so easily, it may be because H did not build to code or maintain his roof as he ought to. D might be successful in arguing H was contributorily negligent. That will reduce his damages but not prevent him from paying, unless they are in a contributory negligence jurisdiction.

Abnormally Dangerous Activity

H could also bring an abnormally dangerous activity claim against D. This claim would be unsuccessful. Abnormally dangerous activities are those that 1) present a substantial risk of bodily harm or death 2) are uncommon to the area and 3) cannot be mitigated by sufficient care. In this case, driving is a common activity. Texting while driving, even if a stupid decision, is a common activity in the area. It can be mitigated by only texting while stopped or in other ways.

2. H v. EC

Abnormally Dangerous Activity

H could bring an abnormally dangerous activity claim against EC. This claim would be unsuccessful. Abnormally dangerous activities are those that 1) present a substantial risk of bodily harm or death 2) are uncommon to the area and 3) cannot be mitigated by sufficient care. The courts often look to whether the value to society of conducting the activity outweighs the risk and probability of harm. In addition, courts do not hold utility companies strictly liable for activities they are engaged in that makes them public utility companies. This is a matter of public policy.

In this case, utility poles are common to the area. While transmitting electricity can present a substantial risk of bodily harm or death, it can be mitigated by sufficient care. In addition, the value to society outweighs imposing strict liability for any damages that arise from running the pole. The wires are also a part of the activity that makes the utility company a public entity: transferring of electricity in the community.

Negligence

H can bring a negligence claim against EC. He has a greater likelihood of success than against D.

Duty

See above.

Standard of Care

See above. That of a reasonably prudent man.

EC owes a duty to all foreseeable plaintiffs to conduct its activities with the same prudence a reasonable man would have. H is a foreseeable plaintiff, because it is foreseeable that wires can break, causing sparks that create fire. Under both the Cardozo and Andrews view, it is foreseeable that a plaintiff's house may be burned down by such a spark. Thus, H is a foreseeable plaintiff.

Breach

H will argue that it has not breached its duty of care because it is using the same wiring system that other utility companies use. Defendants can look to industry standards to show that they have not violated the duty of care. However, industry standards are not dispositive. H can argue that WBF would have prevented the fire, it was not reasonable to rely on old writing systems, and EC should have anticipated its wires sparking. EC will argue that WBF has not gained widespread acceptance among the industry and installing WBF would require significant increase in electrical rates. Ultimately, a court will have to apply Hand's theory to determine whether there was a breach. Hand's theory compares the burden against the probability and the risk. It will look at the expense of installing WBF and compare it to the risk of its wires being defective (and the cost of the resulting damage) against the probability that the wires would break. If the court finds installing WBF or something similar is less than the risk of the old wires causing a fire x the probability of the wires causing a fire, then EC will have breached its duty of care.

Causation

But For

See above. But for not updating the wire system, the wires would not have sparked and caused the fire that burned down Henry's house.

Proximate

See above. It was foreseeable that old wires could break and send sparks. It was foreseeable that sparks could catch fire and spread, causing property damage. EC can argue that the wind was a superseding cause. However, it is foreseeable that the wind would catch a spark and carry it.

Damages

The breach in the duty of care caused the spark to land on H's house which resulted in real property damage.

Defenses

Contributory Negligence

D can argue that H was contributorily negligent. Good roofs will not catch fire if a sheet of burning paper lands on top of it. Roofs are treated to ensure fire cannot spread. If H's house can be burned so easily, it may be because H did not build to code or maintain his roof as he ought to. D might be successful in arguing H was contributorily negligent. That will reduce his damages but not prevent him from paying, unless they are in a contributory negligence jurisdiction.

Defective Product

H can sue for a defective product. Products can be defective in design, manufacture, or label. For a company to be strictly liable, it must be a part of the distributor chain. It could be a manufacturer, distributor, or retail. Companies that do not regularly sell products cannot be held strictly liable.

In this case, EC does not sell its wires. It sells electricity, but that is not a product. Therefore, H's suit will be unsuccessful.

Warranty

N can sue for the breach of warranty of merchantability of fitness for the defective wires. However, to sue for breach of contract there must be privity or N must be a member of the household.

3. Damages

In the majority of states, plaintiff can recover from defendants in joint and several liability. That means he can recover all of the damages from either of the defendants. However, he cannot "double dip" and recover anything more than 100% of his damages. A jury will apportion the fault. If the jury assigns 70% of fault to A and 30% of fault to D, and plaintiff recovers 100% from A, A can demand D reimburse him 30%. In the minority of states, plaintiff can only recover in several liability. That means he can only recover damages from the defendants in proportion to the fault they were liable for.

If the court does find that D and EC are both liable, then a jury should determine the fault. The jury may reasonably decide that the majority of the damages should be apportioned to D because without his negligence the pole would not have fallen down. His actions set it in motion.

Answer B

1. H's claims against D and D's defenses

Harry (H) will file a claim for negligence against Doug (D)

Negligence

To successfully assert a negligence claim, the plaintiff must show that the defendant (i) had a duty, (ii) breached that duty, (iii) the breach of that duty was the actual and proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries, and (iv) that the plaintiff suffered damages.

Duty

All defendants owe a duty of reasonable care to all foreseeable plaintiffs. The majority (Cardozo) view is that all plaintiffs are foreseeable if they are in the zone of danger. The minority (Andrews view) is that all plaintiffs are foreseeable.

Here, D was driving down a busy street, and therefore owed a duty of care to all foreseeable plaintiffs. H will argue that he is a foreseeable plaintiff because his house is on the street, and houses on a street are within the zone of danger if someone is not driving carefully.

Breach

A defendant breaches a duty of care if the defendant does not act as a reasonably prudent person would in carrying out an activity. Here, H will argue that a reasonable person would not text while driving on a busy street. H will argue that reasonable people know that texting is distracting, and driving a vehicle while distracted is dangerous, and a reasonably prudent person would not drive while distracted. On the other hand, D will argue that that many people text while driving, and since many people do it, he did not act unreasonably while texting. D's argument will probably fail, and D will be considered to have breached his duty.

Negligence Per Se

Negligence per se is a doctrine that replaces the standard duty of care with a statute. If the legislator has enacted a statute with criminal penalties, and the statute is designed to protect against the harm caused, and the injured plaintiff is of the class that the statute was intended to protect, then the statute replaces the duty of care standard. If the defendant breaches the statute, then the majority view is that that conclusively proves that the defendant had a duty and the defendant breached that duty.

Here, the legislator recently passed a section of the motor vehicle code that stated that no person shall operate a motor vehicle upon a public road while using a mobile phone to text while the vehicle was in motion. Here, D was driving down a busy street, which was presumably public, while texting. Therefore, H violated the statute.

The statute will only replace the duty if H can prove that it was intended to protect against the harm caused and that H was part of the class of people intended to be protected by the statute. The legislator passed the law because they were concerned about the dangers of texting while driving. Presumably, the dangers of texting while driving include the distracted driver hitting a pedestrian, or hitting something and causing property damage. H will try to argue that D hit the pole, which then caused the fire, and this was within the property damage the legislator intended to protect. However, D will argue that although the statute was probably intended to protect property damage such as hitting the pole, it was not enacted to protect against fires caused by faulty wiring of a pole. D's argument will probably prevail because it was not likely that the legislator intended to protect homeowners from fires when they enacted the statute.

Even if H could prove that the fire to his home was the type of damage the legislator intended to protect, he also needs to prove that he was of the class of people the statute was designed to protect. H will argue that as a homeowner on a busy street, he is of the protected class because the statute was designed to protect against property damage by distracted drivers. On the other hand, D will argue that the statute is designed to protect pedestrians who might be hit, or maybe owners or passengers of vehicles struck by distracted drivers. Again, D will probably prevail on this point, because the statute was probably not designed to protect homeowners.

Therefore, H will not be able to establish negligence per se. However, as discussed above, even without negligence per se, H can prove that D had a duty and breached the duty.

Actual Cause

A defendant is the actual cause of a plaintiff's actions if but for the defendant's conduct, the plaintiff would not have suffered the harm. Here, D was the actual cause of H's damage. If D had not been distracted while driving, he would not have hit the utility pole, and the wires would not have sparked when they hit the ground, and the paper would not have lit on fire and therefore H's house would not have lit on fire.

Proximate Cause

A defendant is liable for all foreseeable incidents of his actions. If a defendant’s actions combine with another force and then cause the damage, the defendant's action is only the proximate cause of the result if the intervening force was foreseeable. A dependent intervening force is a force that is foreseeable. For example, it is foreseeable that injury invites rescue, and therefore it is a dependent intervening force if someone tries to rescue someone injured by the defendant. On the other hand, an independent intervening force is one that is not foreseeable, and it cuts off liability of the defendant because the defendant was not the proximate cause of the injury.

Here, D will argue that Electric Company (EC)'s utility pole had old wiring, and that old wiring is not safe, and it was the old wiring that caused the fire. D will argue that the old wiring should be considered an independent intervening force, because it is not foreseeable that a company would use old wiring that would sent sparks flying everywhere when it fell. He will argue that it is not foreseeable that the sparks would then light a piece of paper on fire, and then that paper would land on Harry's roof. However, D's argument will probably fail. H will argue that it is foreseeable that if you drive distracted and hit an electric company's pole that sparks would fly. H will point to the fact that the new Wire Blitz Fuse (WBF) systems have yet to gain widespread acceptance in the industry, and therefore most electric poles probably have old wiring. Further, H will argue that D was on a busy street, so it was likely that if D hit the pole and there were sparks, it was likely something would catch fire. H is likely to win this argument and therefore D's distracted driving will be considered proximate cause of H's injuries.

Damages

H will be able to show damages because his house caught fire and burned down as a result of D's actions.

Conclusion

H will be able to successfully assert a negligence claim against D, and all of D's objections will fail.

2. H's claims against EC and EC's defenses

H will assert a negligence claim and a strict liability claim against EC.

Negligence

To successfully assert a negligence claim, the plaintiff must show that the defendant (i) had a duty, (ii) breached that duty, (iii) the breach of that duty was the actual and proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries, and (iv) that the plaintiff suffered damages.

Duty

All defendants owe a duty of reasonable care to all foreseeable plaintiffs. The majority (Cardozo) view is that all plaintiffs are foreseeable if they are in the zone of danger. The minority (Andrews view) is that all plaintiffs are foreseeable.

Here, EC has a duty to provide and maintain utility poles as a reasonably prudent electrical company would do.

Breach

H will argue that EC breached their duty in not using the new WBF technology, which made it possible to string electrical wires that would not spark if drowned. H will point to the fact that studies showed that utility companies that replaced their old wiring systems with a WBF system experienced vastly increased safety and reliability. H will argue that a reasonably prudent electrical company would have replaced their wiring with WBF since it is safer and more reliable, and because EC did not, they breached their duty.

On the other hand, EC will argue that they did not breach their duty. They will argue that many other utility companies had used the old wiring for years, and the WBF system had yet to gain widespread acceptance in the industry. Although evidence of other companies' actions and industry customs can be used to determine whether a duty has been breached, it is not dispositive. The court will apply a balancing test when deciding whether a company breached its duty in not implementing new technology. The court will look at the cost of the new technology, the amount the new technology would decrease the risk of harm to potential plaintiffs, and the magnitude of the harm suffered by potential plaintiffs. EC will argue that adopting the WBF systems would be expensive and therefore require a substantial increase in electrical rates. On the other hand, H will argue that the WBF systems would vastly increase safety and reliability, and the risk of harm by not replacing (more fires when people hit electrical poles) is great. This is a close call and the court could come out either way, although the court will probably determine that EC did breach its duty because although the WBF technology would be expensive, it would significantly increase safety.

Actual Cause

But for EC's replacement of the old wires with new WBF technology, the electrical wires would not have sparked if downed and therefore H's house would not have caught fire and burned down.

Proximate Cause

EC will argue that they were not the proximate cause of H's house burning down. They will argue that D's negligent driving is an independent intervening force, and therefore they were not the proximate cause. However, it is foreseeable that a driver would drive negligently and hit a pole. Therefore, D's negligent driving was foreseeable, and D's actions do not cut off EC's liability.

Damages

H suffered damages when his house burnt down.

Conclusion

If the court determines that EC breached their duty in not using the new WBF technology, then H will be able to successfully assert a claim for negligence against EC.

Strict Liability

H will try to claim that EC was conducting an ultrahazardous activity, and H was harmed as a result. A company is strictly liable if the company is conducting an ultrahazardous activity and a plaintiff is injured by the dangerous propensity of that activity.

Here, H will argue EC was operating an electric company, which included stringing live electrical wires on poles, and electrical wires are dangerous because they can start fires. When the pole was hit by D's car, the wires fell and sparked and started a fire. Therefore, H's injury was caused by the dangerous propensity of EC's activity.

However, H's arguments will fail because the court will determine that EC was not conducting an ultrahazardous activity. An ultrahazardous activity is one that cannot be done safely, no matter how careful anyone is in conducting the operation, and it must not be of common usage. Here, every city has electrical companies that string electrical wires on poles. Therefore, the electric company's operation will be considered common usage and not an ultrahazardous activity. Therefore, H's strict liability claim will fail.

3. How damages should be apportioned

If actions by two different defendants combine to cause injury to a plaintiff, neither of which alone would have caused the injury, the defendants will be held jointly and severally liable. If defendants are held jointly and severally liable, then the plaintiff can recover the entire amount of damages from either or both plaintiffs. (The plaintiff can only recover the damages once, but it can be from either defendant alone, or some from each defendant.) If the defendant pays more than their share of the damages, the defendant can recover that amount from the other defendant.

Here, D and EC's actions combined to cause H's injuries. H will be able to recover the damages for his burned down house from either D or EC or a combination of both. Depending on how the court rules, D and EC may be assigned different percentages of liability. D and EC will be responsible for paying the percentage of the damages proportional to their percentage of liability. If either D or EC pays H more than their share of the damages, the defendant who paid more can sue the other party for contribution.

Q1 Wills

Mary was a widow with two adult children, Amy and Bob.

In 2010, Mary bought Gamma and Delta stock. She then sat at her computer and typed the following:

> This is my will. I leave the house to Amy and my stock to Bob.
> The rest, they can split.

Mary printed two copies of the document. She signed and dated both copies in the presence of her best friend, Carol, and her neighbor, Ned. Carol had been fully advised of the contents and signed both copies. Although Ned had no idea as to the bequests, he declared that he was honored to be a witness and signed his name under Mary's and Carol's signatures on both copies. Mary placed one copy in her safe deposit box.

In 2014, Mary married John. She soon decided to prepare a new will. She deleted the old document from her computer and tore up one copy. She forgot, however, about the other copy in her safe deposit box.

On her corporate stationery with her business logo emblazoned on it, Mary wrote:

> I leave John my Gamma stock. My Delta stock, I leave to Bob.
> Amy is to get the house.

Mary signed the document. She neither dated the document nor designated a recipient for her remaining property.

In 2015, Mary sold her Delta stock and used the proceeds to buy Tango stock.

In 2016, Mary died, survived by John, Amy, and Bob.

Mary's estate consists of Gamma stock, Tango stock, her house, and $200,000 in cash in separate property funds.

What rights, if any, do Amy, Bob, and John have in the assets in Mary's estate? Discuss.

Answer according to California law.

Answer A

Validity of Mary's First Will:

The issue is whether the will that Mary signed in 2010 is valid. Because Mary typed this will out using her computer, this will needs to meet the requirements of an attested will. In order to be valid, an attested will needs to:

1) Be written, dated and signed by the testator or someone at testator's direction;
2) Be signed by Mary in front of two uninterested witnesses at the same time. These witnesses can either visually witness Mary's execution of the will, or be conscious of the execution in some way;
3) The two witnesses need to countersign the will at some point during Mary's lifetime, not necessarily when Mary signs the will, and not necessarily at the same time as each other;
4) Each witness needs to understand that they're signing Mary's will (as opposed to a non-testamentary instrument).

Here, we're told that Mary herself typed out, signed and dated both copies of her first will. Therefore, there's no issue as to the validity of Mary's first will as to whether Mary's first will is written, dated, and signed by a permitted party. The facts establish that Mary signed both copies of her first will in the presence of both Carol and Ned (both of whom constitute uninterested witnesses as neither benefit from the bequests stated in Mary's first will), and they further establish that both Carol and Need countersigned the will while Mary was alive. As for whether each witness understood that they were signing Mary's will, it's arguable that this requirement is met because Carol certainly was aware as to the contents of the will, and Ned, though unaware as to Mary's specific bequests, declared he was honored to be a witness. There's no requirement that the witness be aware of the specific details of a will in order for the attested will to be valid.

In addition, for Mary's first will to be valid, she needs to know the assets contained in her estate and she needs to know the natural bounty of her estate (i.e., spouse, issue etc.). We're told at the end of the fact pattern that Mary's estate at the time of her death consisted of her stock, her house and cash in separate property funds. By devising the house to one recipient, her stock to another, and the residue to both of her devisees, Mary demonstrated that she both knew the natural bounty of her estate and the assets constituting her estate.

There are no indications here of any kind of undue influence or fraudulent behavior by any persons in Mary's life causing her to write and sign her 2010 will, so for this reason, Mary's first will is not invalidated as result of lack of intent. Similarly, there's no indication here that Mary lacked the capacity to enter into her first will, as she is an adult at the time she drafted her first will, and there is no indication she suffered from insanity at that time.

Revocation of Mary's First Will:

The issue is whether Mary's first will was effectively revoked by Mary's actions in 2014. A will can be revoked by physical act or implication. If a will is revoked by testator's physical act, the act needs to be one that effectively destroys the will (e.g., ripping the will in half, as opposed to tearing off a corner without any writing on it), and it needs to be done by Mary as testator (or by someone at her direction) with the simultaneous intent to revoke the will. Here, Mary deleted the old document from her computer, which demonstrates the required intent present when she additionally tore up one original copy of her first will. The act does destroy the will because she "tore it up." There's no indication in the facts that her act of tearing up that original of the first will was minor in any way so as to create a doubt as to whether or not she actually fully tore up the document. Lastly the act of tearing up the will was conducted by Mary herself, so there's no issue as to whether or not it was done by the testator.

Revocation of Safe Deposit Box Copy:

The issue here is whether the fact that Mary forgot about the other copy of her 2010 will in her safe deposit box affects the validity of the revocation of said 2010 will. There is a presumption that where there are two identical originals of one will, the revocation of one constitutes the revocation of the other. Here, we've established above that the revocation of one of the originals of her will was effective and complete. For that reason, the revocation of the other original is also deemed valid and effective. There is no indication here of any intent in leaving the copy located in the safe deposit box untouched, so there are no grounds on which to rebut the presumption that all copies of Mary's 2010 will have been revoked.

Validity of Mary's second (2014) Will:

The issue here is whether Mary's second will, signed in 2014, is valid. The facts tell us that this will was written by Mary on her corporate stationery with her business logo emblazoned on it. This likely signifies that she did not type the will; rather this is a handwritten (holographic) will. A holographic will needs to be signed by the testator (anywhere on the document) and the material terms of testator's will need to be in handwriting as well. Unlike an attested will, there's no requirement that the will be witnessed by any witnesses. Here, the facts state that Mary signed the document, and all of the material terms of this second will were also presumably handwritten (as there's no indication that she started up her computer at any point to complete this second will). The material terms are that she left her Gamma stock to John, her Delta stock to Bob, and the house to Amy.

There's a related issue as to whether her 2014 will needs to be dated in order to be valid. It does not. The rule is that a holographic will does not need to be dated in order to be effective. There are exceptions to this rule relating to when the date becomes important because there are two undated wills under consideration. But these exceptions do not apply here.

There's another related issue as to whether Mary designated a recipient for her remaining property (i.e., her residuary estate). There's no need for a holographic will to devise the entirety of a testator's estate; when the testator's estate is not entirely devised by a testator's will, the testator's estate goes to Mary's heirs by intestate succession.

As with Mary's first will, there are no indications here of any kind of undue influence or fraudulent behavior by any persons in Mary's life causing her to write and sign her 2014 will, so for this reason, Mary's second will is not invalidated as result of lack of intent. We're told that Mary decided to prepare a new will soon after marrying John, which is a natural thing to do upon marrying/re marrying. Similarly, there's no indication here that Mary lacked the capacity to enter into her second will, as she is an adult at the time she drafted her second will, and there is no indication she suffered from insanity at that time.

Amy's Rights in the Assets in Mary's Estate:

The issue here is what asset(s) Amy is entitled to. Mary's 2014 will, which was established by the above to be valid, devised "the house" to Amy. There is a related issue as to whether this instruction is valid, because Mary did not specify the address of her house, or any other details clarifying which house Mary was referring to. In such a situation, where there's ambiguity as to the meaning of language contained in a will, or when the language could mean two or more different things (e.g., two different houses), then parol evidence can be admitted into probate to resolve the meaning as to Mary's intent. Here, there's no indication that Mary has more than the one house she's been living in, so parol evidence can be admitted to show that Mary's gift to Amy of her house is valid and refers to Mary's one and only home.

Please see the last paragraph below as to my analysis of Amy's right to a portion of the $200,000 in separate property funds that Mary also left behind but didn't specifically give to anyone via her will.

Bob's Rights in the Assets in Mary's Estate:

Mary's 2014 will devises her Delta stock to Bob. The facts say that in 2015, Mary sold her Delta stock and used the proceeds to buy Tango stock. The issue, known as ademption by extinction, is whether Mary's specific devise of "my Delta stock" fails by ademption by extinction, or whether one of the California exceptions to ademption by extinction apply. The rule is that a specific devise (i.e., a gift of a specific item as opposed to a general item) fails by ademption by extinction when that item is no longer in the testator's possession at the time of her death. California recognizes three exceptions to this rule: 1) when the stock is changed to another form of stock (by merger, etc.), 2) when the executor of the estate sells the property, and 3) when Testator receives condemnation proceedings and there's no issue of traceability. Here, the first exception applies. The facts state that Mary used the proceeds from the sale of her Delta stock to purchase Tango stock. The Tango stock can be clearly traced to the proceeds of her Delta stock. For this reason, the gift of the Delta stock to Bob should not fail because of ademption by extinction because it's clear that Mary intended for her Delta stock (and/or any replacement stock purchased in lieu of her Delta stock (i.e., her Tango stock) to go to Bob. There's no indication here of lack of intent because she didn't quickly die after purchasing the Tango stock, so she had an opportunity to revise her will had she intended a different result to occur.

Please see the last paragraph below as to my analysis of Bob's right to a portion of the $200,000 in separate property funds that Mary also left behind but didn't specifically give to anyone via her will.

John's Rights in the Assets in Mary's Estate:

Lastly, Mary left her Gamma stock via her 2014 will to John. This is just like her gift to Bob, without the added complication of ademption by extinction. We established that Mary's 2014 will is valid, therefore her specific gift of her Gamma stock to John is valid.

Please see the last paragraph below as to my analysis of John's right to a portion of the $200,000 in separate property funds that Mary also left behind but didn't specifically give to anyone via her will.

$200,000 in Cash in Separate Property Funds:

In addition to John's, Amy's and Bob's rights to Mary's stock and house, there's the issue of who is entitled to Mary's $200,000 in cash in separate property funds. The rule is that when a testator doesn't devise her entire estate away using her will, and doesn't name a beneficiary with respect to any remaining property, the remaining property goes to her heirs via intestate succession. And the rule of intestate succession is a testator's spouse is entitled to all of a testator's separate property if the testator didn't leave behind any parents or issue, 1/2 of the testator's separate property if the testator left behind one child, and 1/3 of the testator's separate property if the testator left behind more than one child. Here, Mary the testator left behind 2 children, which is more than one, therefore her spouse John is entitled to 1/3 of Mary's separate property, while the remaining 2/3 get split evenly by Amy and Bob (i.e., each of John, Amy and Bob receive 1/3 of $200,000 in addition to the gifts specifically devised to them that are described above).

Answer B

As a threshold issue to determine the rights that Amy, Bob, and John hold in the assets of Mary's estate, we must determine if Mary died with a valid will and, if so, if the will to be probated is the 2010 instrument or the 2014 instrument.

2010 Instrument

The first issue is whether the 2010 instrument was a valid will and, if so, if it was revoked by Mary's tearing up only one copy of the will in 2014.

Valid Will Instrument

In order for a document to constitute a valid will under California law, (i) the testator must have the capacity and intent to form a will through that document and (ii) the will must meet the formation requirements. A testator will have adequate capacity to form a will if (i) they are 18 years of age or older, (ii) they understand the extent of their property (i.e., they know what property they own), (iii) they know the "nature of their bounty" (i.e., they understand who their issue and/or their spouse is, among other relatives), and (iv) they intend for the document to constitute a will.

For the 2010 instrument, each of the capacity elements is met. While not explicitly stated, Mary is clearly over 18, given the fact that she has two adult children. There is also no evidence that she does not understand the extent of her property. The fact that she leaves specific items to each of Amy and Bob strongly suggests that she knows the nature of her bounty, as it is an explicit recognition of both her children. Finally, there is clear intent to create a will, as the first line in the document states "This is my will." As such, Mary had capacity to create the will.

We then move on to formation requirements. For a non-holographic (i.e., not handwritten) will, there are five formation requirements. First, the will must be in writing.

Second, the will must be signed by the testator or by a third party under the direction of and in the presence of the testator. Third, the testator's signing of the will must be in the presence of two witnesses. Each witness must be present at the same time to see the signing. Fourth, the witnesses must sign the will during the testator's lifetime. Fifth and finally, the witnesses must know that they are witnessing the execution of a will.

Here, Mary typed the 2010 instrument rather than handwrite it, so it must meet the formation requirements described above. The will is clearly a writing, and Mary signed and dated both copies, meeting the first two requirements. She signed and dated both copies in the presence of two witnesses: Carol and Ned (note that neither Carol and Ned receive gifts under the 2010 instrument and therefore there is no issue with interested witnesses). Carol, having been fully advised of the contents, signed the will immediately thereafter, so at least one witness met the fourth and fifth requirements. One might raise issue with Ned, who signed without understanding the bequests, and therefore might have some issue meeting the fifth requirement. Ned, however, only had no idea as to the specific bequests, but he still appears to have understood that a will was being signed. The formation requirements only require awareness by the witness that the document is in fact a will, rather than the contents of each specific bequest in the will, and therefore Ned's lack of knowledge should not be an issue. Even if a court were to find it an issue, however, a California court is allowed to let a will into probate even if there have been minor violations of the witness requirements for will, so long as there is clear and convincing evidence that the testator intended the document to be his or her will. Given the clear language in the document and the substantial adherence to the formation requirements, Mary's estate should be able to prove that.

Therefore, Mary both had capacity and should be deemed to meet the formation requirements necessary to have a valid non-holographic will. As such, the 2010 instrument should be probated, unless it has been properly revoked.

Revocation of 2010 Will

Now that we know the 2010 instrument constitutes a valid will, the next issue is to determine whether the 2010 will was revoked.

A will may be revoked by either (i) physical revocation or (ii) a later testamentary instrument. Physical revocation occurs when, among other things, there is a burning, tearing, crossing out, or obliteration (i.e., erasure of terms) of the physical will document, and the testator through such actions intended to revoke the will. In the event that there are multiple copies of a will, the physical revocation of one copy will create a presumption that there has been a revocation of the will, even if other copies have not been physically revoked.

Here, Mary deleted the old document from her computer and tore up one copy of the 2010 will. The deletion from the computer does not constitute an obliteration of the document, as obliteration does not apply to electronic documents, and thus that act did not constitute a physical revocation. However, Mary's tearing up a copy of the 2010 will does constitute a tearing of the will and, under the rules described above, a physical revocation of the will. This act was intended to revoke the will, as can be proved through the circumstantial evidence that she also deleted the will from her computer (showing it was not a mistake) and that she then devised a new will. Moreover, even though Mary forgot to physically revoke the copy of the will in her safety deposit box, there is a presumption that the physical revocation of one copy creates a revocation of the will, despite other copies being preserved. Here, that presumption will exist, and it will be hard to rebut. The evidence shows a clear intent to revoke, as Mary deleted the will from her computer and drafted a new will after marriage, and there is no evidence showing hesitation on Mary's party to revoke.

Thus, the 2010 instrument was properly revoked through physical revocation.

In the alternative, the 2010 will may have been revoked through later testamentary instrument. A later instrument revokes a prior will if (i) the later instrument expressly states that it revokes the prior will or (ii) the later instrument creates an implicit assumption that the former will is revoked. For (ii), a later will that deals with the entirety of the testator's estate, and therefore leaves nothing for the previous will to distribute, constitutes sufficient implicit evidence of revocation.

Here, one could argue that the 2014 instrument revoked the 2010 will. There is no express statement of revocation, so we must look to see if it implicitly revokes the 2010 will. While there is an arguable case for implied revocation, as the 2014 instrument deals with most of Mary's estate and there are circumstances surrounding the 2014 will that suggest Mary meant to revoke the 2010 will (as described above), one could argue that the lack of a residuary clause defeats the implied revocation, as it leaves something for the 2010 will to distribute.

While good cases can be made either way for revocation by a later testamentary instrument, it ultimately does not matter, as there is a proper physical revocation of the 2010 will. Therefore, the 2010 will does not govern the rights of Amy, Bob, and John.

2014 Instrument

The next issue is whether the 2014 instrument is a valid will and therefore governs the rights of Amy, Bob, and John with respect to Mary's estate. Note that, upon the physical revocation of the 2010 will, that will was permanently revoked unless there has been a revival. There is no indication of a revival of the 2010 will under these facts. As such, if the 2014 instrument is not a valid will, the estate will pass into intestacy and distribution will be governed by the intestacy rules.

The 2014 instrument is handwritten, and therefore if it is a will, we consider it a holographic will. In order to have a valid holographic will, the document must be (i) in writing, (ii) signed by the testator, and (iii) all of the material terms of the will must be in the testator's own handwriting. The testator must also have capacity to execute a will. The material terms are (i) each gift given under the will and (ii) who each gift should go to. The lack of a date will not invalidate a holographic will, except in certain instances where there is an issue with the testator's capacity or there is the possibility that two or more wills should be probated.

Here, Mary wrote on her corporate stationery her bequests to each of John, Bob, and Amy, and signed the document. We first need to make sure there is no capacity issue. There is clearly no issue as to age or the extent of her property; this analysis is the same as what was discussed for the 2010 instrument above. There is also no issue as to the nature of her bounty, as she knows both her children and her spouse as evidence by her gifts. While one may argue that there was not an intent to create a will since there is no clear indication that this document is a will, the surrounding circumstances are sufficient to prove intent. She deleted and tore up the old will right before writing this document, and it is generally written as a will (e.g., it makes gifts as one would expect a will to make). Therefore, there is no capacity issue.

The document also meets the requirements of a holographic will. It is signed by Mary, and each of the gifts made, as well as who it should be made to, is handwritten on the corporate stationery. Given that there is no capacity issue or an issue with multiple wills that are each possibly valid, the lack of a date should be no issue here.

Therefore, the 2014 instrument is a valid holographic will and should govern the rights of Amy, Bob, and John.

Rights of Amy, Bob, and John Under 2014 Will

Now that we have determined what will should govern the distribution of Mary's estate, we will address each of Amy, Bob, and John's rights under the 2014 will in turn. We will lastly address the issue of the $200,000 in cash that is not subject to the will.

Amy

Under the 2014 will, Amy has been gifted Mary's house. This gift will be given to

Amy, pursuant to the 2014 will, unless there is an issue with the house as community property.

California is a community property state. Therefore, there is a presumption that all property obtained by a couple during marriage is community property. Upon the death of one spouse, the living spouse retains a one-half interest in all community property. In the event that a testator spouse's will devises more than one-half of the community property (and therefore intrudes upon the living spouse's one-half interest), then the living spouse may either elect to take its gifts under the will or to receive its proper community property share. Any property acquired prior to marriage, as well as any property acquired during marriage through the expenditure of separate property and the profits, rents, and issue arising from separate property, is considered separate property and is not subject to the community property rules stated above.

Amy's gift, the house, was purchased prior to Mary's marriage to John. Although we do not know the exact date of purchase, we know that it happened prior to marriage because it was described in Mary's 2010 will. Since it was purchased prior to marriage, it will be considered separate property, and therefore John may not assert any rights to it. Thus, Amy will receive her gift under the will, and should get the house.

Bob

Under the 2014 will, Bob is to receive Mary's Delta stock. Since Mary used the term "my" Delta stock, this is considered a specific gift under the will. A specific gift may be extinguished under the will in the event that the testator no longer owns the specific property to be gifted at the time of death. However, under California law, a specific gift will not be automatically extinguished because it is no longer part of the testator's estate if it can be proven that the testator did not intend to have the gift adeemed.

Here, Mary sold Delta stock and therefore the Delta stock is no longer in her estate. However, Bob may argue that this extinction should not cancel the gift, as Mary did not intend to get rid of the gift. He may prove this by showing that the proceeds of the sale of the Delta stock were immediately used to buy Tango stock. Moreover, there is no evidence that the sale occurred because Mary was looking to get rid of Bob's gift. Therefore, given the direct tracing of proceeds and the lack of any evidence that Mary was looking to shut Bob out of the will, Bob has a good case to show that his gift should not be adeemed and he should receive the Tango stock, which can be directly traced from the proceeds of the Delta stock.

Likewise, there is no community property issue, as the Tango stock was bought from the proceeds of separate property (since the Delta stock was acquired prior to marriage).

John

Under the 2014 will, John is to receive the Gamma stock. There is no issue with this devise, and thus he will receive this gift.

$200,000 in Cash

The final issue is what to do with the $200,000 in cash. Since there is no residue clause in the 2014 will, this will pass by intestacy.

Under California's intestacy rules, in the event that there is a surviving spouse, the surviving spouse takes 1/2 of all community property and quasi-community property. The surviving spouse will also take a share of separate property, depending on whether the testator left living children. In the event that the testator left a surviving spouse and more than one living child, the surviving spouse receives 1/3rd of the separate property passing through intestacy, and the children receive the other 2/3rd, to be divided equally among them.

Here, there is a surviving spouse (John) and two living children (Amy and Bob). Therefore, the $200,000 will go 1/3rd to John under intestacy rules, and 2/3rd to Amy and Bob. Thus, each will receive 1/3 of $200,000.

Q2 Remedies / Torts

Steve agreed to convey his condominium to Betty for $200,000 in a written contract signed by both parties. During negotiations, Steve told Betty that, although there was no deeded parking along with the unit, he was allowed to park his car on an adjacent lot for $50 a month. Steve stated that he had no reason to believe that Betty would not be able to continue that arrangement. Parking was important to Betty because the condominium was located in a congested urban area.

On June 1, the conveyance took place: Betty paid Steve $200,000, Steve deeded the condominium to Betty, and Betty moved. She immediately had the entire unit painted, replaced some windows, and added a deck. The improvements cost $20,000 in all. She also spent $2,000 to remove the only bathtub in the condominium and to replace it with a shower, leaving the condominium with two showers and no bathtub.

On August 1, Betty discovered that the owner of the adjacent parking lot was about to construct an office building on it and was going to discontinue renting parking spaces. She also learned that Steve had known about these plans before the sale. She quickly investigated other options and discovered that she could rent parking a block away for $100 a month. At the same time, she also found that, immediately before Steve had bought the condominium, the previous owner had been murdered on the premises. Steve had failed to tell Betty about the incident.

Betty has tried to sell the condominium but has been unable to obtain offers of more than $160,000, partly due to the disclosure of the murder and the lack of a parking space. Betty has sued Steve for fraud.

What is the likely outcome of Betty's lawsuit and what remedies can she reasonably seek? Discuss.

Answer A

Steve's Breach in Respect of the Parking Space

The issue is whether Steve misrepresented to Betty the facts relating to the parking space in a way that would give cause to a right of action.

A misrepresentation is a (i) statement of fact, (ii) that is false, and (iii) either material or the known to the declarant to be untrue, and (iv) which induces a person to act to their detriment in reliance on the representation.

Steve made a clear statement of fact when he said there was an existing parking space available for rent at $50 a month and he had no reason to believe that the arrangement would not be continued. This fact is clearly false since the construction of an office building means that the parking arrangement will be discontinued.

Steve told Betty that he saw no reason she could not continue to park her car subject to the pre-existing arrangement (payment of a $50 a month fee). Parking was important to Betty given the nature of the area (a congested urban area) - a fact that Steve should have been aware of, having lived in the area himself. Betty will argue that this was a material fact of importance in her decision to enter into the condo sale. Steve will argue the opposite, that parking is ancillary to the property purchase and therefore lacks the materiality required for misrepresentation. As Betty later discovered, Steve knew about the plans to discontinue renting parking spaces before the sale occurred, therefore even if the statement is not considered material it will satisfy the requirement of knowledge that it was untrue.

Given the importance of parking to Betty, she will argue that the fact there was a parking arrangement in place was central to her decision to purchase the condo and she therefore acted in reliance on the statement. Again, Steve will try to argue that the parking is ancillary to the condo, it was not part of the deeded property and does not sufficiently constitute reliance as there must have been many other factors that induced Betty to purchase the condo such as price, size and location.

Given that parking is something Betty probably does on a daily basis, the existence of adequate parking arrangements is likely to be viewed by the courts as sufficient motivation for reliance. Therefore Steve's statement is indeed likely to be viewed as a fraudulent misrepresentation.

Failure to Disclose the Murder

The issue is whether Steve was under a duty to disclose that a murder had previously occurred in the condo.

At common law, the seller of property had no duties of disclosure to the buyer, under the doctrine of caveat emptor. The buyer was entitled to inspect the property prior to purchase and had the obligation to discover any defects for herself. The modern trend is to impose on sellers a duty to disclose material defects of which the buyer was not aware and could not easily discover on inspection. Liability for failure to do so arises under the principles of concealment and fraud.

The fact that a murder had taken place in the condo itself is a fact very likely to affect the marketability of the condo. Indeed Betty found the value had dropped significantly once she disclosed this fact to potential new buyers. Betty will argue that Steve had a duty to actively disclose this information to her and his failure to do so constituted fraud. Steve, on the other hand, will argue that he made no representation about the murder and never stated that a murder had not happened and therefore cannot be found liable for fraud because he did not do or say anything dishonest.

The courts will likely find that Steve did have a duty to disclose this information to Betty, as it is a material fact concerning the property that will have an adverse effect on its value. Steve's failure to disclose will amount to concealment and consequently Betty should have a strong course of action against Steve for fraud.

Appropriate Remedies

Where there is fraud in the inducement of a contract, the contract becomes voidable and entitles the innocent party to treat the contract as void and seek remedies accordingly.

The appropriate remedies for Betty will depend on whether she wishes to stay in the condo, but make good her financial loss, or whether she wishes to force a sale of the property and move out.

Money Damages

If Betty decides to stay in the condo the most appropriate course of action will be to affirm the contract and seek money damages. The various money damages rules are all aimed at compensating for loss of expectation, where the expectation was simply no breach. Expectation damages will be used to put the plaintiff in the position she would have been in had the contract been as expected. In order to claim damages, the claimant must show that (i) the defendant's actions were the cause of the loss, (ii) the loss was reasonably foreseeable at the time the contract was entered into, (iii) the loss is certain and not too speculative, and (iv) it was unavoidable (meaning the claimant has taken all steps available to reduce her loss).

For the Parking Space - With respect to the parking, Betty's expectation was that she would have a place to park her car for $50 a month. Steve's misrepresentation is the clear cause of this loss and it was reasonably foreseeable at the time that if Steve's statement about the parking was false, Betty would suffer damage by either having no parking or potentially having to pay more for it. Betty has taken appropriate steps to find an alternative parking space and thereby mitigate her loss. But the parking space will be twice the cost of what she was expecting. This loss is certain in monetary terms (a clear $50 per month). Therefore Betty should have a successful claim against Steve for monetary damages to make good the loss of the parking place.

Judgment for money damages is normally made in one lump sum payment, discounted to today's value without taking account of inflation. However, the modern trend of some courts is to allow for inflation.

For the Loss in Value Due to the Murder - The courts will apply the same test to ascertain damages in respect of the drop in the condo's value due to the murder.

As before, the causal link is clear - Steve's failure to disclose the murder resulted in Betty paying an inflated price for the condo; this was foreseeable at the time, since it is clear to reasonable people that such a fact would necessarily result in the property being less marketable. Betty has attempted to sell the house but has been unable to do so for more than $160,000; therefore the measure of expectation damages will be $40,000. However, Betty has also spent $22,000 on making improvements to the condo and she will argue that they have raised the value of the condo and she should therefore be able to recover for these too under the consequential damages rule. Consequential damages may be sought in order to compensate the claimant for losses over and above expectation damages that were foreseeable.

Steve will argue that removing the only bathtub in the condo has in fact depreciated the property and that the drop in value is more due to this than the disclosure of the murder.

Rescission

Recission is an equitable remedy that the courts may use in their discretion when there is no available legal remedy. Rescission would allow Betty to treat the contract as void, the condo would be returned to Steve and her purchase money would be returned to her.

If Betty decides she no longer wants to live in the condo, this would be a more appropriate remedy. Since land is always considered unique, Betty may argue that the legal remedy of damages is not appropriate and she should be entitled to avoid the contract altogether.

In addition to obtaining back her purchase money, Betty could seek reliance damages for the amounts spent on improving the property. Reliance damages seek to put the claimant in the position she would have been in had she never entered into the contract.

This would allow Betty to recover the $22,000 spent on improvements.

Answer B

Valid Contract:

Governing Law:
The UCC governs contracts for the sales of goods. The common law governs contracts for services, the sale of land, and all others not under the UCC.

Here, the contract was for the sale of a condominium (condo) which is real property; thus the Common Law applies.

Contract formalities:
A valid contract requires: 1) offer, 2) acceptance, and 3) consideration. Further, a land sale contract must be in writing to satisfy the statute of frauds (SOF).

Here, there is a written contract by both parties relating to the sale of the condo, thus this satisfies the SOF. Steve agreed to sell Betty his condo for $200,000. Thus, this was a valid offer. On June 1, the conveyance took place. Steve deeded the condo to Betty; she paid the $200,000 and moved in. Thus, Betty accepted.

Thus, the parties had a valid contract.

Breach of Contract:

A breach of contract occurs when one of the parties fails to perform on the contract. With land sale contracts, once the conveyance is made, it extinguishes the contract and the parties can only sue on the deed and based on which future covenants were granted in the deed (further assurances, quiet enjoyment, or warranty).

Here, the conveyance had already occurred; thus the deed will control and Betty will not be able to sue for breach of contract relating to the land sale. However, a party can nonetheless sue based on fraud if there was an intentional failure to disclose. If Betty can establish that there was fraud, she would be entitled to sue on a fraud theory.

Fraud:

Fraud requires 1) a misrepresentation, 2) of material fact, 3) known to induce reliance, 4) actual reliance, and 5) damages.

Parking:

On August 1, Betty discovered that the owner of the adjacent parking lot was about to construct an office building on it and would discontinue renting parking spaces and Steve knew about these plans. Here, there was a misrepresentation because during negotiations Steve told Betty that although there was no deeded parking, she would be allowed to park on an adjacent lot for $50 per month just as he had. Meanwhile he knew about the building owner's plans that Betty would not be able to park in that lot. Thus, there was a misrepresentation.

This was a material fact because parking was important to Betty because the condo was located in a congested urban area. The materiality is further evidenced by the fact that she is having a hard time reselling the condo because of the parking.

Further, Steve knew this misrepresentation would induce reliance because he told Betty that he had no reason to believe that Betty would not be able to continue that arrangement. This shows that he knew that Betty would rely on this fact in deciding to continue with the purchase.

The next element is met because Betty actually relied on the misrepresentation because she decided to continue with the purchase of the condo and she did not know about the lack of parking until after the sale had been completed.

Betty's damages are established because she will lose lost the ability to park in the nearby lot.

Thus, there was a misrepresentation as to the parking.

Murder:

A misrepresentation does not have to be a lie, but can be an omission as well, if the seller knew of the defect and failed to inform the buyer of the defect.

Here, Betty learned in August, some two months after the purchase, that the previous owner had been murdered on the premises, and Steve failed to disclose to Betty about the incident. Steve knew about the murder but failed to disclose it to Betty. Such a failure to disclose would amount to a misrepresentation based on omission. Here, he knew that this was a material fact because a prospective buyer would want to know if a person had been murdered on the premises. Further, the failure to disclose such a horrible fact would result in an innocent buyer to rely on the fact that no such murders had occurred on the premises. He knew that if he disclosed the murder, Betty would back out of the deal. Further, Betty relied on the fact that there had been no murders in the condo when she decided to proceed with the sale. Had she been informed about the murder, she could have had the opportunity to decide if she nonetheless wanted to continue with the purchase. Lastly, Betty has suffered damages because she cannot sell the house for more than $160,000, partly because she has to disclose the murder to prospective buyers.

Thus, there was a misrepresentation about the murder.

In conclusion, because Steve engaged in fraud for the misrepresentation of the parking situation and the murder, Betty will be successful in her suit against Steve.

Rescission:

A contract can be rescinded based on a mutual mistake or fraud.

Here, Betty will seek that the contract be rescinded because she can successfully assert her claim for fraud against Steve, as established above.

Reliance:

Reliance damages can be obtained to avoid any unjust enrichment on the part of the defendant. Reliance seeks to put the non-breaching party in the position as if there had been no contract.

Here, Betty was excited to own her own condo. In anticipation of living in the condo for a long period of time, she decided to make improvements to it. Betty immediately had the entire unit repainted, replaced windows and added a deck. The total value of improvements cost $20,000. She also spent $2,000 to remove the only bathtub and replace it with a shower. Betty made such improvements because she had relied on the fact that there were no defects with the property. It would be unfair to rescind the contract and return the condo to Steve with $22,000 worth of improvements. Thus, Betty should be able to receive reimbursement for the $22,000 she expended on improvements to the condo.

Expectation:

Expectation damages seek to put the non-breaching party in the same position as if no breach had occurred.

Betty will seek expectation damages to put her in the same position as if she had never purchased the condo. When she purchased the condo she expected to live in a unit with nearby parking and no previous murder. But due to Steve's fraudulent misrepresentations, Betty will not be able to do so. As a result, Betty should be compensated as if no contract had occurred.

Betty has tried to sell the condo, but is unable to get offers of more than $160,000 because of the disclosure of the murder and the lack of parking. If Betty sells the condo for $160,000, Steve will be required to pay her for the difference in the original sale price ($200,000) and the sale price of the condo. Assuming she can get $160,000 for it, Steve will be required to pay Betty $40,000.

Thus, Betty is entitled to $40,000 in expectation damages.

Incidental:

Incidental damages are those damages that the non-breaching party incurs as a result of the breach.

Here, Betty will be entitled to any funds expended in the attempt to sell the condo, such as brokerage fees and listing fees. Further, she should be able to recover the difference of the $50 to park in the current parking lot and the $100 to park in the other lot, until the condo sells.

Punitive Damages:

Punitive damages seek to punish the defendant for willful and wanton misconduct. Generally, punitive damages are not awarded for breach of contract actions. However, a plaintiff may recover punitive damages if there is an underlying tort.

Here, Betty's underlying theory for suit against Steve is for fraud, and fraud is a tort. The court may be compelled to grant Betty punitive damages to punish Steve for his fraudulent actions, and to teach him a lesson.

Thus, Betty may be able to recover for punitive damages.

Limitations on Damages:

Damages must be causal, certain, foreseeable and mitigated.

Here, Betty's damages are caused by Steve's fraud. Her damages are certain because we can place an exact dollar figure on her damages. Her damages are foreseeable because it was foreseeable that she would have to obtain parking at another parking lot which could cost more money. It was also foreseeable that when she discovered the murder in the condo, she would not want to live there, thus motivating her to move out and sell the property. Lastly, damages must be mitigated. This means that Betty must make a good-faith attempt to sell the condo for a reasonable sum of money and within a reasonable time. Further, until she sells the property she will be

Steve's Defenses:

Parol Evidence Rule:
The Parol evidence rule (PER) seeks to prohibit prior oral negotiations of a contract because the parties intended to put their final expression in the writing itself.

During negotiations Steve told Betty that there was no deeded parking but she would be allowed to park on an adjacent lot for $50 per month, just as he had. Steve will argue that because such communications were oral and prior to the final contract, that the court should exclude them. This defense will fail because his actions constituted fraud, and the contract had already been performed.

Laches:
Laches seeks to bar a plaintiff's recovery if they wait too long to assert a claim and such delay of time causes an undue prejudice to the defendant.

Here, the sale occurred in June and Betty is suing in August. Thus, this was only a three month period and not an unreasonable delay.

Unclean Hands:
The court of equity will not aid suitors who come to the court with unclean hands.

Here, Betty did not engage in any misconduct. Rather, she was an innocent purchaser. Thus, this defense too will fail.

Q3 Evidence

Pete sued Donna's Pizza in federal court.

At trial, in his case-in-chief, Pete testified that, as he was driving his car one day, he entered an intersection with the green light in his favor. He further testified that when he entered the intersection, Erin, an employee of Donna's Pizza, was driving a company van, ran a red light, and collided with his car. He sustained serious injuries as a result and was taken to the hospital.

Pete then called Nellie, a nurse, who testified that she treated Pete when he was at the hospital. Nellie testified that Pete told her that, during the collision, his head struck the windshield and that he was still in a great deal of pain. Nellie, pursuant to standard hospital procedure, recorded the information on a hospital intake form. Pete moved the hospital intake form into evidence and rested.

During Donna's Pizza's case-in-chief, Erin testified that she had the green light and that it was Pete who ran the red light. Donna, the owner of Donna's Pizza, then testified that Donna's Pizza was not responsible for the accident. On cross-examination, Donna was asked whether she had ever offered to pay for any of Pete's medical expenses, and she denied she had. Donna's Pizza rested.

In rebuttal, Pete testified that, at the accident scene, Erin told him, "I was in a hurry to make a pizza delivery and that is why I ran the red light." Pete also testified that Donna visited him in the hospital and told him that Donna's Pizza would take care of all of his medical expenses. Pete testified that Donna's Pizza, however, never paid for any of his medical expenses.

Assume all appropriate objections and motions to strike were timely made.

Did the court properly admit:

1. The hospital intake form? Discuss.

2. Pete's testimony about Erin's statements at the accident scene? Discuss.

3. Pete's testimony about Donna's statements at the hospital? Discuss.

Answer according to the Federal Rules of Evidence.

Answer A

1. HOSPITAL INTAKE FORM

Logical Relevance

Evidence is logically relevant if it has any tendency to make a disputed fact more or less probable than it would be without the evidence. Here, Pete (P) is suing Donna's Pizza (D) for a car accident allegedly caused by D's employee, Erin (E). The hospital intake form is logically relevant because it tends to make the fact of P's physical injury, and therefore, damages, more probable.

Legal Relevance

Evidence must be both probative and material in order to be legally relevant. Relevant evidence may nonetheless be inadmissible if its probative value is substantially outweighed by a risk of unfair prejudice. Here, the hospital intake form is legally relevant because it is probative and material as to whether P suffered damages, and its probative value is not outweighed by a risk of unfair prejudice to D.

Witness Competence

A lay witness must have personal knowledge of a matter in order to testify about it. Here, Nellie is a nurse who treated P at the hospital. She was also the one who recorded the information on the hospital intake form. Therefore, Nellie is competent to testify.

Authentication

Tangible evidence must be properly authenticated, either through personal knowledge, distinct characteristics, by showing chain of custody, or, in the event of a reproduction of a photo, knowledge of the person who took the photo. Here, the hospital intake form can be authenticated by Nellie's personal knowledge, because Nellie was the one who filled out the intake form. Therefore, the intake form has been properly authenticated.

Best Evidence Rule

The best evidence rule applies when a witness is testifying about a document or the document is at issue. It mandates that in those circumstances, the original document or a properly authenticated duplicate be entered into evidence. Here, Nellie is testifying to her personal knowledge of what P said to her at the hospital. The best evidence rule does not apply, and the business records exception allows the intake form to be admitted.

Hearsay

Hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted and is generally inadmissible unless it falls under an exemption or an exception to hearsay. The hospital intake form may be hearsay because it was made out of court and is being offered to prove that P struck his head on the windshield and was in a great deal of pain. The intake form is hearsay within hearsay. However, it may fall under one of the following exceptions if both levels of hearsay are exceptions.

Statement for Medical Diagnosis/Treatment

When a statement is made for medical diagnosis or treatment, it falls under an exception to the hearsay rule regardless of whether the declarant is available to testify. Here, P told Nellie that during the collision, his head struck the windshield and that he was still in a great deal of pain. If these statements were made for medical diagnosis or treatment of his head injury, then it is likely the statement will come in.

Statement of Mental/Physical Condition

When a statement is made about a mental, physical, or emotional condition, it falls under an exception to the hearsay rule regardless of whether the declarant is available to testify. Here, P told Nellie that he was still in a great deal of pain. This will likely come in under this exception.

Business Records

Business records fall under an exception to the hearsay rule regardless of whether the declarant is available to testify. The business records must be made in the regular course of business at or near the time of the event, by a person who had knowledge of the event. It must also be a regularly conducted activity of the business to make such records. Here, the facts indicate that Nellie recorded the information on a hospital intake form at or near the time of the event. Nellie had knowledge of the event because the person to whom P made the statements was Nellie and she recorded them during the regular course of her business as a nurse at the hospital. The facts also indicate that she recorded the information pursuant to standard hospital procedure, making the recording a regularly conducted business activity. Therefore, the hospital intake form is admissible under the business records exception to the hearsay rule.

Conclusion

The statement made to Nellie is a statement for medical diagnosis or treatment and also a statement of a physical condition; it is admissible despite the hearsay rule. The intake form itself is admissible under the business records exception. Therefore, despite being hearsay within hearsay, the court properly admitted the hospital intake form.

2. P'S TESTIMONY ABOUT E'S STATEMENTS AT THE ACCIDENT SCENE

Logical Relevance

Evidence is logically relevant if it has any tendency to make a disputed fact more or less probable than it would be without the evidence. Here, P's testimony about E's statements at the accident scene is logically relevant because they tend to make the fact that E was responsible for the accident more probable than without the statements.

Legal Relevance

Relevant evidence may nonetheless be inadmissible if its probative value is substantially outweighed by a risk of unfair prejudice. Here, P's testimony about E's statements is legally relevant because their probative value is not outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice to D.

Witness Competence

A lay witness must have personal knowledge of a matter in order to testify about it. Here, P is testifying about statements E made to him at the scene of the accident; therefore, he has personal knowledge of the statements and is competent to testify about them.

Hearsay

Hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted and is generally inadmissible. P's testimony about E's statements at the accident scene is hearsay because they are out-of-court statements and they are being offered to prove E ran the red light. They will be inadmissible unless they fall under one of the exemptions or exceptions to hearsay discussed below.

Prior Inconsistent Statement

A prior inconsistent statement is admissible as an exemption to hearsay. Here, E testified during D's case-in-chief that she had the green light and that it was P who ran the red light. However, at the accident, P is willing to testify that E told him, "I was in a hurry to make a pizza delivery and that is why I ran the red light." As this statement is inconsistent with what E has testified during D's case-in-chief, it may be admissible under the prior inconsistent exemption.

Vicarious Admission

An employee's statement may be admissible in a case against the employer if the employee was acting within the scope of her duties. A vicarious admission is an exemption to the hearsay rule. Here, E is an employee of D's. She was making a pizza delivery, which is within the scope of her employment. Therefore, what E said at the accident scene is admissible as a vicarious admission in P's suit against D.

Statement Against Interest

A statement against interest is admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule, only if the declarant is unavailable. A declarant may be unavailable for a number of reasons including she is dead, missing, or refuses to testify. Here, E's statement is a statement against interest; however, E is available, therefore, her statements to P at the accident scene will not come in under this exception.

Present Sense Impression

A statement of present sense impression is admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule, regardless of whether the declarant is available. The statement must be made at or soon after the event that is described. It is possible that E's statements could come in under the present sense impression exception because they were made to P immediately following the accident, at the scene of the accident, and they related to the circumstances of the accident--that she ran the red light because she was in a hurry. However, they are more likely to come in via the prior inconsistent and vicarious admission exemptions to the hearsay rule.

Excited Utterance

An excited utterance is admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule, regardless of whether the declarant is available. The declarant must make the statement while under the stress or excitement of the event. Excitement can be evidenced by shouting or other excited behavior. Here, there is no evidence to suggest E's statements were made to P under the stress or excitement of the accident. Therefore, they are not admissible under this exception.

Conclusion

The court properly admitted P's testimony about E's statements at the accident scene, because they were prior inconsistent statements as well as vicarious statements.

3. P'S TESTIMONY ABOUT D'S STATEMENTS AT THE HOSPITAL

Logical Relevance

Evidence is logically relevant if it has any tendency to make a disputed fact more or less probable than it would be without the evidence. Here, P's testimony about D's statements at the hospital is logically relevant because they tend to make the fact that E, and therefore D, was responsible for the accident more probable than it would be without the statements.

Legal Relevance

Relevant evidence may nonetheless be inadmissible if its probative value is substantially outweighed by a risk of unfair prejudice. Here, P's testimony about D's statements is legally relevant because their probative value is not outweighed by any risk of unfair prejudice.

Witness Competence

A lay witness must have personal knowledge of a matter in order to testify about it. Here, P is testifying about statements D made to him at the hospital; therefore, he has personal knowledge about the statements and is competent to testify about them.

Hearsay

Hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted and is generally inadmissible. P's testimony about D's statements at the hospital is hearsay because it is being offered to prove that D offered to take care of all of his medical expenses. However, they are not admissible, even if they fall under the following exemptions or exceptions, because of the public policy exception regarding offers to pay medical expenses (see below).

Prior Inconsistent Statement

A prior inconsistent statement is admissible as an exemption to hearsay. Here, D testified during D's case-in-chief that D was not responsible for the accident. On cross-examination, D testified that she had never offered to pay for any of Pete's medical expenses. Since P is testifying that D had said before that she would pay for his medical expenses, these out-of-court statements may be admitted as prior inconsistent statements.

Statement of Party Opponent

A statement made by a party opponent is admissible as an exemption to the hearsay rule. Even though P's testimony about D's statements at the hospital may be a statement of a party opponent, because P is suing Donna's Pizza, it does not fall under this exemption due to the public policy exception regarding offers to pay medical expenses (see below).

Offers to Pay Medical Expenses

Offers to pay medical expenses are not admissible. Under the Federal Rules of Evidence, statements that accompany offers to pay medical expenses are admissible. Here, the only statement P is offering is D's statement that it would take care of all of his medical expenses. The offer is inadmissible under this public policy exception. Therefore, the court did not properly admit P's testimony about D's statements at the hospital.

Conclusion

The court improperly admitted P's testimony about D's statements at the hospital because an offer to pay medical expenses is never admissible. While not admissible as substantive evidence, it may be used to impeach D.

Answer B

1. Hospital Intake Form

Relevance

Evidence is logically relevant if it tends to prove or disprove a material fact. Evidence is legally relevant if its probative value is not substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice. Here, the hospital intake form includes Pete's (P) statement to the nurse regarding his injury and how it occurred. Thus, it tends to prove a material fact - damages. Additionally, there is little chance of unfair prejudice here as the statement relates directly to the accident and is not shocking to a jury. The form is relevant.
